thou do as much for me as for Jarīr'. This threat induced me to visit him repeatedly and read over his Naqā'iṣ<sup>1</sup>, under his tuition, although I had not the least use for them." Mustuqah means a fur cloak with long sleeves; its plural is masā'ilq. Some persons pronounce mustuqah not mustuqah. A tradition informs us that 'Umar prayed in a mustuqah, and we learn from another tradition delivered by Anas Ibn Mālik, that the king of the Greeks sent a mustuqah of fine silk to the blessed Prophet, who put it on: "And I think", said he, "I still see his hands as they appeared (at the extremity of the sleeves)". He then sent it to Ja'far, the son of 'Ali Ibn Abī Tālib, who said to the Prophet: "Send it to thy brother the Najāshī (king of Abyssinia)." Al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl<sup>2</sup> says that the mustuqah is a sort of wide robe. Muḥammad Ibn al-Kalbī was a follower of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sabā<sup>3</sup>, him who taught that 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib was not dead and that he would return into the world. Sufyān al-Thawrī (No. 248) and Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq (No. 586) cited his authority for some of their Traditions, but, lest it should be known who he was, they gave them under this form: "We were told by Abu 'l-Naḍr that," etc. This al-Kalbī fought at the battle of Dayr al-Jamājim<sup>4</sup>, on the side of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays al-Kindī; his grandfather Bishr, his father al-Sā'ib, and his uncles 'Ubayd and 'Abd al-Raḥmān fought under the khalīf 'Alī at the battles of the Camel (A.H. 36) and Siffīn (A.H. 37). Al-Sā'ib was slain with Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, and the following verses were pronounced on his death by Ibn Warqāh al-Nakha'i:

"Who will tell 'Ubayd, for me, that I struck off his brother's head with the sharp sword. If he wish to know where he is, tell him that he reposes near al-Dayrayn, without a pillow. I struck off his head with my sword, to render orphans Sufyān and Muḥammad."

1 Naqā'iṣ is the plural of Naqīṣah; this word means: Carmen alteri carmini contradicens et argumentum eius quasi dissolvens. These poems were probably al-Farazdaq's answers to those of Jarīr.

2 His life will be found in this work.

3 See Sale's Preliminary Discourse, section VIII and Dr. Cureton's Sharastāni, Arabic text p. 132.

4 The battle of Dayr al-Jamājim was fought A.H. 82. The fullest account we possess of Ibn al-Ash'ath's revolt is that given by Price in his Retrospect, vol I, p. 455 et seq.

Sufyān and Muḥammad were the sons of al-Sā'ib. Muḥammad Ibn al-Kalbī died at Kūfah in the year 146 (A.C. 763-4). Under the letter h we shall give the life of his son Abu 'l-Mundhir Hishām, the celebrated genealogist. Kalbī means descended from Kalb, the son of Wabarah; the tribe of Kalb forms large branch of that of Quḍā'ah, and a great number of persons have derived their patronymic from it. Mustuqah is a Persian word admitted into the Arabic language<sup>1</sup>.

609 QUṬRUB

Abū Alī Muḥammad Ibn al-Muṣṭanir Ibn Aḥmad, the grammarian and philologist, generally known by the name of Quṭrub, was a native of Baṣrah and a mawlā of Sālim Ibn Ziyād. He acquired his literary information from Sibawayh (No. 479) and some of the learned men of Baṣrah. Ardent for the acquisition of knowledge and devoted to study, he always went to Sibawayh's lessons much earlier than the other pupils, and this induced his master to say to him one day: "Thou art nothing else but a night quṭrub, and this surname struck to him. The quṭrub is a little animal always running about. Ibn al-Mustanir was one of the chief (philologists) of the age; his works are: the Ma'āni 'l-Qur'ān (rhetorical figures of the Qur'ān), the Kitāb al-Ishtiqāq (treatise on etymology), the Kitāb al-Qawāfi (treatise on rhymes), the Kitāb al-Nawādir (book of anecdotes), the Kitāb al-Azminah [book of the times (seasons?)] the Kitāb al-Farq (on the difference between the names given to the members of the human body and those given to the same members in animals), the Kitāb al-Aṣwāt [book of cries (or interjections)], the Kitāb al-Ṣifāt (book of epithets), the Kitāb al-'Ilal fī 'l-Nahw (on the examples generally used in grammar), the Kitāb al-Aḍḍād (on the words bearing each two different significations), the Kitāb al-Khulq al-Faras (on the frame of the horse), the Kitāb al-Khulq al-Insān (on the human frame), the Kitāb al-Gharīb al-Ḥadīth (on the unusual expressions occurring in the Traditions), the Kitāb al-Ḥanizah (on the letter hamzah), the Kitāb fa'ala wa af'ala (on the change of signification undergone by certain verbs in passing from the first to the fourth form), the Kitāb al-Radd 'ala 'l-Mulhidīn fī Tashābuh al-Qur'ān (refutation of the impious, with respect to the passages of the Qur'ān which, if taken literally, would lead to anthropomorphism), etc. He was the first author who composed one of those philological treatises called Ternaries<sup>1</sup> (No. 322, note); his work, though small, has the merit of priority, and served for model to Ibn al-Sid al-Baṭalyawsi (No. 322) in his; the latter forms a large book. I have seen a third Ternary composed by a native of Tauris (tabrizī), who was, however, a different person from the Abū Zakariyā al-Tabrizī, whose life is given in this work. I do not at present recollect the author's name, but the work itself is of considerable extent and merit. After all, it was Quṭrub who marked out the way. Quṭrub was preceptor to Abū Dulaf's son (No. 513). The following verses are attributed to him by (Hārūn) Ibn al-Munajjim in his Kitāb al-Bāri' <sup>2</sup>.

<sup>1</sup> The Persian word to which our author alludes is probably mushṭeh مشتته.

"Though thou art not with me, thy remembrance is; my heart sees thee, though thou art absent from my sight. The eye can see the beloved and perceives her absence; but the interior of the heart is never deprived of her presence."

These verses are very well known, but it is only from this work that I learned who was their author. Quṭrub died A.H. 206 (A.C. 821-2). Some say that his real name was Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad, and others, al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad; but that given at the head of this article comes probably nearest to the truth.

610 AL-MUBARRAD

Abu 'l-'Abbās Muḥammad, generally known by the name of al-Mubarrad, was the son of Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Akbar Ibn

1 Ternary, in Arabic Muthallath. By this term is meant such nouns as bear different signification accordingly as their first syllable is pronounced with an a an i, or an u.

2 The life of this Ibn al-Munajjim will be given later.

'Umayr Ibn Ḥassān Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Zayd Ibn Mālik Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Āmir Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bilāl Ibn 'Awf Ibn Aslam Ibn Aḥjan Ibn Ka'b Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Ka'b Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mālik Ibn al-Naḍr Ibn al-Asad Ibn al-Ḡhawth. The 'Awf of this list was called also Thumālah, and Ibn al-Kalbī, who makes the same observation, adds that al-Asad is the same person as al-Azd (the progenitor of the tribe of that name). The grammarian al-Mubarrad, surnamed al-Thumālī al-Azdī (descended from Thumālah of the tribe of Azd), was a native of Baṣrah, but resided at Baghdād. This eminent philologist and grammarian composed a number of works on literary subjects, such as the Kāmil (perfect), the Rawḍah (meadow), the Muqtaḍib (rough draught), etc. He studied under Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Māzinī (No. 115), and Abū Ḥātim al-Sijistānī (No. 262); amongst the many eminent masters who had received lessons from him, Niṣṭawayh (No. 11) was one of the most distinguished. Al-Mubarrad and Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Yaḥyā, surnamed Tha'lab (No. 42), the author of the Faṣḥ. They were both deeply learned, and with them terminated the series of the great philologists. It was of them that a contemporary, Abū Bakr Ibn Abi 'l-Azhar said, in one of his poems:

"Searcher of knowledge! act not foolishly but have recourse to al-Mubarrad or to Tha'lab. In them you will find united the learning of all other men; remain not then (in ignorance, lest you be shunned) like a mangy camel. All the knowledge in the world, from East to West, is combined together in these two."

Al-Mubarrad liked to meet with Tha'lab, because he had then an opportunity of discussing questions with him and acquiring information; but this was highly disagreeable to Tha'lab, who, therefore, avoided him. Abu 'l-Qāsim Ja'far Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥamdān, a jurisconsult of Moṣul and a friend to both, related as follows: "I asked Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Daynawari, Tha'lab's son-in-law, why his relative had such a dislike to meeting with al-Mubarrad, and he replied, because al-Mubarrad expressed himself with elegance and charmed the hearer by his ingenious allusions, purity of language, and clearness of expression; whereas Tha'lab's mode of speaking was that usual with persons accustomed to teach.

It, therefore, happened that, when they met, the assembly were seduced by al-Mubarrad's outward show before they could appreciate (Thalab's real) worth." Al-Mubarrad dictated a great quantity of information and abounded in anecdotes. One of the relations dictated by him was the following: "Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr appointed a person to act as guardian of the blind, the orphans, and distressed housekeepers who were widows. A man reduced to great misery went one day with his son to this officer and said: 'Would you have the kindness to inscribe my name on the list of distressed housekeepers?' 'Those housekeepers are females', observed the guardian, 'how then can I inscribe you among them?'. 'Well,' said the man 'put me on the blind list.' 'That I will,' answered the other, 'for God hath said: It is not the eyes which are blind, but the hearts contained in men's bosoms'— 'And inscribe my boy on the list of orphans.' 'That also I shall do, for he who has a father like you is really an orphan.' The man then withdrew, after obtaining his inscription on the blind list and that of his son on the list of orphans." A certain grandee having asked al-Mubarrad to procure him a preceptor, for his son, he sent him one with a letter to this effect: "I here send what you wished for, and I may say this much for him and in his name:

'When I visit princes, all the protection I require is, that they put my talents to the test.' "

The idea of this verse is borrowed from a note addressed by Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf (No. 117, note), the Kātib to al-Māmūn, on the day of Nawrūz<sup>2</sup>, with the present of an embroidered robe: "I have sent to the Commander of the faithful an embroidered robe which will speak for itself. Adieu." I once saw al-Mubarrad in a dream, and the singularity of our conversation was such that I am induced to relate it: In the year 636 (A.C. 1238-9), I passed five months in Alexandria, and happening to have with me al-Mubarrad's Kāmil and Ibn 'Abd Rabbih's Iqd (No. 45), I perused them occasionally. In the latter work I remarked a chapter entitled: Mistakes of which poets have been accused, and containing verses in which it had been pretended that the authors were mistaken, where-

1 Qur'an, sūrah 22, verse 45.

2 See No. 140, note.

as they were really in the right ; the blunders having been made by critics not sufficiently acquainted with the subjects they were examining. Amongst the persons mentioned in this chapter is al-Mubarrad, of whom the author says ; "And similar to this is a mistake committed by Muḥammad Ibn Yazīd (al-Mubarrad) the grammarian, in his Rawḍah, where he blames al-Ḥasan Ibn Hānī—meaning Abū Nuwās—for having said :

"(The tribe of) Bakr Ibn Wā'il has left no recollections but that of its foolish woman (ḥamqā) and its lying man".

" 'Because', says al-Mubarrad, 'by the word ḥamqā the poet meant the man called Habannaqah al-Qaysi, and he should not, therefore, have designated him as ḥamqā (stulta). Now the fact is that Abū Nuwās meant the female of the tribe of 'Ijl called Dughah, whose silliness was proverbial, and 'Ijl is a branch of the tribe of Bakr.' By this, the author of the 'Iqd meant to say that al-Mubarrad, in blaming Abū Nuwās for having here made use of the word ḥamqā (stulta), imagined that the poet had in view Habannaqah, and, as Habannaqah was a man, that he should have said aḥmaq (stultus), not ḥamqā ; whereas, according to Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, the poet really meant the woman called Dughah. Therefore, concludes the author of the 'Iqd, it is al-Mubarrad who is in the wrong, not Abū Nuwās. A few nights after reading this passage, I dreamt that I was in Aleppo, in the college of the qāḍī Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād, where I had formerly pursued my studies. And it seemed as if we were saying the afternoon prayer in the place appropriated to that purpose, and that the congregation was assembled. When the prayer was ended, I stood up to retire and then saw, at the lower end of the room, a man standing and praying. Being informed by one of the persons present, that it was Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad, I went over and sat down beside him, waiting till he had done. I then saluted him and said : "I am now reading your work, the Kāmil;" on which he asked me if I had seen his Rawḍah. I replied that I had not, and this was in fact the truth, as I had never seen the work. "Well," said he, "come with me and I will show it to you." On this I arose and went up with him to his chamber, wherein I perceived a great quantity of books. He then sat down before them, looking for his Rawḍah, and I took my seat at some distance. Having drawn out a volume, he handed it to me. I opened it and, placing it on my knees, I said to him : "They have remarked a mistake of yours in this book." "What mistake can they have remarked in it?" "They say that you found fault with Abū Nuwās for having said so and so in such a verse." "He was certainly wrong there." "Nay," said I, "he was in the right, and they say that you were in the wrong when you accused him of making a mistake." "How can that be?" I then told him what the author of the 'Iqd had said, on which he bit the end of his finger and stared at me in amazement, looking quite abashed and unable to utter a word. He remained in the same posture till I awoke. My only motive for mentioning this dream is its singularity. Al-Mubarrad was born on Monday, the festival of the sacrifice, A.H. 210 (25 March, A.C. 826);* some say in A. H. 207 (A.C. 822-23). He died at Baghdād on Monday, the 27th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah—some say, of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 286 (Dec., A.C. 899)†; but others place his death in A.H. 285. He was interred in a house bought for the purpose, and situated in the cemetery at the Kūfah Gate. The funeral service was said over him by the qādī Abū Muḥammad Yūsuf Ibn Ya'qūb (No. 578). The following lines, written after his death by Abū Bakr al-Ḥasan Ibn al-'Allāf (No. 164) are currently known, and were frequently recited by Ibn al-Jawālīqī<sup>1</sup>:

"Al-Mubarrad is gone ! his days are past ! and Tha'lab must follow al-Mubarrad. Behold the mansion of literature half demolished, and destruction awaiting the remainder. Lament what time has snatched away, and prepare your minds for another privation. Lay in a provision out of Tha'lab's learning, for he shall soon drink of the same cup as al-Mubarrad. I should tell you even to take note of his sighs, if it were possible to write them."

A similar idea is thus expressed by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī al-Namari<sup>2</sup>, a philologist of Baṣrah, in a

1 The life of Ibn al-Jawālīqī is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 The author of the Fihrist notices two persons of the name of Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Namari; the first as author of a treatise on colours, entitled Kitāb (Continued on page 295)

* 28 March.—Ed.

† 5 December.—Ed.

piece of verse recited by him on learning the death of his rival Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Mu'allā al-Azdī :

"Al-Azdī is gone and al-Namari is going ; the parts of one whole are ever closely united. He was my brother, the partaker of my love, although he never repaid me that debt nor acknowledged that obligation. A coolness always reigned between us, but it redounded to his honour and mine own. For I never despised the men of Azd, although their country was far apart from mine."

Thumāl means descended from Thumālah, a person whose real name was 'Awf Ibn Aslam and from whom a branch of the tribe of Azd drew its origin. Al-Mubarrad says, in his Kitāb al-Ishtiqāq: "This tribe was called Thumālah, because it lost most of its members in a battle, and the people said : "There is only a thumālah of them remaining. Thumālah means a feeble remnant." The following satirical lines were composed on al-Mubarrad and his tribe by a contemporary poet; Abū 'Alī al-Qālī (No. 92) attributes them, in his Amālī, to 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn al-Mu'adhḥil :

"We asked every tribe where was (the tribe of) Thumālah, and they asked us what was Thumālah. I told them that to it belonged Muḥammad Ibn Yazīd, and they said : 'You make it less known to us than ever.' Then al-Mubarrad spoke to me and said : 'Spare my feelings, that tribe of mine is a vile race.' "

It is even stated that these verses were composed by al-Mubarrad himself, from a desire of being known as a member of this tribe: his verses got into circulation, and he thus obtained his wish. He used frequently to recite these lines at his assemblies:

"O you who, in sumptuous array, strut about like princes and scorn the hatred of the poor ; know that the saddle-cloth changeth not the nature of the ass, neither do splendid trappings change the nature of the pack-horse."

(Continued from page 294)

al-Luma' fi 'l-Alwān; of a work entitled Mu'āni 'l-Ḥamāsah, perhaps a commentary on the Ḥamāsah, of Abū Tammām ; and of a treatise having for title كتاب الحلي. The other Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Namari spoke with elegance the language of good society and that of the people بين الكلام الخاص والعام but, says the author of the Fihrist, no works are mentioned as having been composed by him. Fihrist, fol. 112, 121.

The learned explain diversely the origin of his surname al-Mubarrad, and here is what the hāfiẓ Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi (No. 345) says, in his treatise on patronymics : "Al-Mubarrad being asked how he came by this surname related as follows : The chief of the shurṭah (police-guards) wanted me to pass the evening with him in conviviality and conversation, but not wishing to go, I went to Abū Hātim al-Sijistānī's. Soon after, a messenger of that officer (wāll) came in search of me, and Abū Hātim bid me hide in the wicker-case of a large earthen water-jar. Having followed his advice, he put on the lid, and went to the messenger, saying : 'He is not in my house'. 'Nay', said the other, 'I am told that he is in it'. 'Well', replied Abū Hātim, 'come in and look for him'. The man went in, and searched every corner of the house, without noticing the wicker-case. When he went away, Abū Hātim clapped his hands, calling at the same time towards the case : Al-Mubarrad ! al-Mubarrad ! (who wants cool water !) When the public heard of this, they kept it up against me." Some say that this surname was given to him by his master Abū 'Uthmān, al-Māzinī, and others again explain it in a different manner. Habannaqah was the surname given to Abu 'l-Wada'āt—or Abū Nāfi'—Yazīd Ibn Tharwān al-Qaysī, whose stupidity had become so notorious that it was proverbially said : (Such a one is) more stupid than Habannaqah al-Qaysī. One of his camels having gone astray, he offered two camels to whoever would bring it back. They said to him : "How can you offer two camels for one ?" and he replied : "You do not know the pleasure it is to find what one has lost." This gave rise to the proverb. Verses were also made on him which got current (among the tribes), and the following piece, composed by Yaḥyā Ibn al-Mubārak al-Yazīdī, a person whose life we shall give, and directed against Shaybah Ibn al-Walid al-'Absī, the uncle of Daqāqah, contains an allusion to the same subject :

"Live protected by fortune and thy (natural) stupidity will harm thee not ; those whom we see living in prosperity are merely the favourites of fortune. The man of talent is often poor, and the fool enjoys opulence. Live protected by fortune, and you may be like Habannaqah al-Qaysī or Shaybah Ibn al-Walid."

The circumstance which induced al-Yazīdī to compose these lines was, that, being in a discussion with al-Qaysī at the court of al-Mahdī and in the presence of that khalīf, he remarked that Shaybah Ibn al-Walid, who happened to be there, displayed a great partiality against him and favoured his adversary. He, in consequence, lashed him in a number of pieces, one of which was that here given. Dughah was the surname of Māriyah, the daughter of Rabi'ah Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Ijl Ibn Lukhaym. This Rabi'ah bore the surname of Maghnaj or Mi'naj. Her silliness became so notorious that it was currently said: (Such a one is) a greater fool than Dughah. Ibn al-Kalbī assigns her a different origin in his Jamharat al-Nisab; in speaking of the descendants of al-'Anbar, he says: "And Jundub, the son of al-'Anbar, engendered 'Adī, Ka'b and 'Uwayj; their mother was Māriyah, the daughter of Rabi'ah Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Ijl, or, according to another statement, "she was Dughah, the daughter of Maghnaj Ibn Ziyād." He, therefore, considers Māriyah and Dughah as different persons; whether he be in the right or not, God only knows! What established her character for silliness was that, having brought forth a child and hearing it cry, she said to her mother: "Is it the Ja'r which opens its mouth (Yafṭah fāhū)?" to which the mother replied: "Yes; and it reviles its father (Yasubb abāhu)." The word ja'r, in its primitive acceptation, signifies the dung of any wild animal armed with claws but it was then applied, by a species of licence, to the excrements of other animals. Dughah, on bringing forth her child, imagined that it was an excrementitious discharge, and on hearing the child cry, she was filled with wonder and asked whence the noise proceeded. She had married a member of the family of al-'Anbar Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tamīm, and, on her account the Banu 'l-'Anbar were called the Banu 'l-Ja'rā (filii podicis). These notes, though foreign to our subject, furnish some curious particulars, and that induces me to insert them.

611 IBN DURAYD

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Durayd Ibn 'Atāhiyah Ibn Ḥantam Ibn Ḥasan Ibn Ḥamāmī Ibn Jarw Ibn Wāsī' Ibn Wahb Ibn Salamah Ibn Ḥāḍir Ibn Asad Ibn 'Adī Ibn 'Amr Ibn

Mālik Ibn Fahm Ibn Ghānim Ibn Daws Ibn 'Adnān Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Zahrān Ibn Ka'b Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Ka'b Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Malik Ibn Naṣr Ibn al-Azd Ibn al-Ghawth Ibn Nabt Ibn Mālik Ibn Zayd Ibn Kahlān Ibn Sabā Ibn Yashjub Ibn Ya'rub Ibn Qaḥṭān, a member of the tribe of Azd and a native of Baṣrah, was the most accomplished scholar, the ablest philologist and the first poet of the age. Al-Mas'ūdī speaks of him in these terms, in his Murūj al-Dhahab: "And, at Baghdād, Ibn Durayd was one of those who, in our times, excelled as a poet and attained eminence as a philologist. In this science he held the rank of al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad (No. 208), and made known peculiarities of the (Arabic) language which had not been noticed in the works of his predecessors. In poetry he could assume every tone, from grave to gay; and his poetical productions are too numerous to be reckoned; otherwise, we should mention the greater part of them in this book. One of his best pieces is the qaṣīdah, so well known under the title of al-Maqṣūrah, in which he celebrates the praises of al-Shāh Ibn Mīkāl and his son; the former, named 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mīkāl and the latter Abu 'l-'Abbās Ismā'il Ibn 'Abd Allāh'. It is said that, in this poem, he has inserted most of the words terminated by a short alif (maqṣūr). It begins thus:

"If thou seest my head resemble by its colour the rays of morning (appearing) underneath the training robe of darkness, and its white (hair) shining through the black, as shineth the fire in a log of Ghaḍā wood.<sup>2</sup>

He then adds: "In this well-known qaṣīdah, he has had a number of imitators, such as Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Fahm al-Anṭākī al-Tanūkhī" (No. 440), etc. This poem has occupied the attention of many writers, in ancient and modern times, who explained its meaning and elucidated the signification of its words: the fullest of these commentaries is that composed by the jurisconsult Abū

1 According to al-Dhahabī, in his Annals, life of Ibn Durayd, that philologist was employed by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mīkāl, who was then governor of al-Ahwāz for the Khalīf al-Muqtadir, as preceptor to his son Ismā'il. MS. No. 646, fol. 115 v.

2 See No. 458. note.

'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Hishām Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Lakhmī al-Sibtī<sup>1</sup>, a modern author who died towards A. H. 570 (A.C. 1174). It was commented also by the inām: Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far al-Qazzāz, the author of the philological treatise, the Kitāb al-Jāmi': we shall give this writer's life. Amongst Ibn Durayd's most celebrated works are: the Kitāb al-Jamharah (the collection), highly-esteemed philological treatise<sup>2</sup>; the Kitāb al-Ishtiqāq (on etymology); the Kitāb al-Sarj wa 'l-Lijām (on the saddle and bridle)<sup>3</sup>; a large and a small book on horses; a treatise on the Anwā (influence of the stars on the weather); the Kitāb al-Muqtabis (book for him who seeks information); the Kitāb al-Mulāḥim (the elucidator (?)); the Kitāb Zuwār al-'Arab (the Arabs noted for visiting their friends); the Kitāb al-Lughāt (on the dialects or idiomatic expressions of the Arabs); the Kitāb al-Silāh (on weapons) the Kitāb Gharīb al-Qur'ān; on the obscure expressions of the Qur'ān; this work he left unfinished; the Kitāb al-Mujtabā (chosen selection), a work small in size but ample in matter; the Wishāh (embroidered belt), a short but instructive treatise. He composed also some beautiful poetry, and the men of learning in former times used to say: "Ibn Durayd is the most learned amongst poets and the ablest poet amongst the learned." In one of his pieces, the eulogistic portion is turned thus:

"A brilliant (maiden); did her cheeks display their brightness to the rising sun, he could not shine; (her waist) a pliant branch waves on a round sand-hill (the haunches), and over it is seen a moon (her face) shining through the cover of the night (her dark hair) Were beauty told to choose its representative, it would not pass her by ; and were it told to address any other female it would not speak. The darkness of her hair (shades the world and) makes us think the sun is set ; the brightness of her face (enlightens it and) makes us think him rising. She appears, and her lustre dazzles every eye ; woe befall the eyes that close not then !"

1 The manuscript of the Bib. du Roi, No. 490, ancien fonds, contains a very ample and learned commentary on Ibn Durayd's Maqṣūrah. Although the first pages of this commentary have disappeared, it may be easily perceived by a comparison with the edition of the Maqṣūrah, and of the commentary of Ibn Hishām, the first part of which was published at Copenhagen in 1828 by L.N. Boisen, that the Biblio theque imperiale possesses, in this MS., the great commentary of Ibn Hishām al-Lakhmī, and that the printed edition of it is a mere abridgment.

2 A copy of the last half of the Jamharah is in the Biblio theque du Roi.

3 See the observations in the Introduction to vol. I.

Were I not apprehensive of lengthening this article too much, I would give numerous passages from his poetry. He was born at Baṣrah in the street (sikkah) of Ṣālih, A. H. 223 (A. C. 837-8), he passed his youth in that city, and there he made his studies. His masters were Abū Ḥātim al-Sijistānī (No. 262), al-Riyāshī (No. 298), 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Abd Allāh, surnamed the nephew of al-Aṣma'i (Ibn Akhi 'l-Aṣma'i)<sup>1</sup>, Abū 'Uṭhmān Sa'id Ibn Hārūn al-Uṣhnāndānī<sup>2</sup>, author of the Kitāb al-Ma'ānī, and others. He left Baṣrah in company with his paternal uncle al-Ḥusayn, when the Zenj stormed that city and murdered al-Riyāshī (No. 298). He then dwelt at 'Umān<sup>3</sup> twelve years. Having returned to Baṣrah, where he again resided for a time, he set out for Persia and there became the companion of the sons of Mikāl who were at that epoch the administrators of the province of Fārs. It was for them that he composed his Jamharah. They appointed him director of the government office of Fārs, and no official papers were published without his approval, neither was any order executory without his signature. He gained large sums in their service, but, being prodigal of his money and always ready to oblige, he never kept a dirham in his possession, and indulged his generous inclinations to their full extent. In his qaṣidah, the Maqsurah, he introduced the eulogium of his patrons

1 "Ibn Akhi 'l-Aṣma'i": al-Yazīdī writes as follows: His name was 'Abd al-Raḥmān Abū Muḥammad ; some say, Abū 'l-Ḥasan. He was a dull heavy man but the pieces which he transmitted orally on the authority of his uncle and other learned men are held to be correct. He composed a treatise on the ideas occurring in poetry (Ma'ānī 'l-Shi'r)". (Fihrist, fol 75 v.)

2 The name of Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Uṣhnāndānī occurs in the Fihrist, fol. 81 v. and 115 v. He is there stated to have been one of the learned men of Baṣrah and the author of a Kitāb Ma'ānī 'l-Shi'r, and a Kitāb al-Abyāt.

3 Perhaps the word عَمَّان must be pronounced 'Ammān. There was a city of the name in the Balqā of Syria. 'Umān is that province of Arabia which is situated at the entrance of the Persian Gulf.

and received from them a present of ten thousand pieces of gold. In the year 308 (A.C. 920-1), subsequently to the deposition of the sons of Mīkāl and their removal to Khurāsān, he proceeded to Baghdād, where he found a generous protector in 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Khuwārī. The imām al-Muqtadir having been informed by al-Khuwārī of the history and high literary attainments of his guest, settled on him a monthly pension of fifty dinārs, and this allowance was regularly continued to Ibn Durayd as long as he lived. This philologist could repeat from memory a vast number of poems and other pieces; in the quantity of productions which he had learned by heart he surpassed all his predecessors, and, when students read over, under his tuition, the poetical compositions of the Arabs of the Desert, he immediately repeated from memory the remainder of the piece which his pupil had commenced. Al-Dāraquṭnī (No. 409) having been asked if Ibn Durayd was to be considered as a true transmitter of pieces preserved by tradition, replied that some doubts had been expressed on the subject; indeed, it is said that he was careless in his delivery of these pieces, attributing them to the first author whose name came uppermost. The philologist Abū Maṣṣūr al-Azhari (No. 613) relates that, having gone to see Ibn Durayd, he found him drunk, "and therefore," said he, "I never returned to his house again." "When we went to see him," said Ibn Shāhīn (No. 131, note), "we were shocked at the sight of lutes hung up on the wall and of wine unmixed with water." It is related that a beggar having asked him for something, he bestowed on him a cask of wine, having nothing else to give at the time. One of his boys disapproved of this act and said to him: "How can you possibly give wine in charity?" "Why," replied Ibn Durayd, "that was the only thing I had." Some time afterwards, he received ten casks of wine as a present, on which he observed to the same boy: "We bestowed one cask and received it back tenfold." A great number of similar stories are told of him. Towards the ninetieth year of his age he lost the use of his side by a paralytic stroke, but recovered by drinking theriac. He then relapsed deeper than ever into his old habits and denied himself no indulgence. He resumed also his lessons, reciting and dictating to his scholars; but, a year afterwards, having eaten something which disagreed with him, the palsy returned. All his body, from head to foot, was completely paralysed, but he could still move his hands in a slight degree. When in this state, he uttered cries of pain if any person happened to enter the room, even without going near him. Alluding to this, his disciple Abū 'Alī Ismā'il al-Qālī al-Baghdādī (No. 92) made the following remark: "I said to myself: The Almighty has punished him thus, for having said, in his Maqṣūrah, when speaking of time and its effects:

1 To give wine in charity is an infringement of the Muslim law.

'(O Time!) thou hast engaged with one who, if the spheres fell on him from every point of heaven, would not utter a complaint!'

And his sufferings were such that he would cry out like one trod under foot or pricked with needles, although the person who went in did not approach him." Though reduced to this miserable state, he retained all his mental faculties, and answered with perfect justness every question which was proposed to him. "He survived this attack two years," says Abū 'Alī, "and, whilst he was in that state, I consulted him on the points of philology respecting which I had doubts, and as quick as thought, he returned me satisfactory answers. I asked him, one day, a question relative to a certain verse, and he replied; 'Had the light of my eyeballs been extinguished, you would not have found a person capable of satisfying your thirst for knowledge.' And these very words, my son, were addressed to me by Abū Hātim when I once happened to ask him a question; and he told me that al-Aṣmā'i had spoken them to him under the same circumstances.'" "To the last question I ever addressed to him," said Abū 'Alī, "he made this reply: Hāl al-jariḍ dūn al-qariḍ (choking has put a stop to verses); and these were the last words I heard him utter. Before that time, he used frequently to recite this verse, applying it to himself:

1 Horace has said, in a similar strain: Si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinæ. (Od. 3.3.7.)

"Wretch that I am! a life of pleasure was not mine, neither have I wrought a good deed whereby I may please God."

"The following anecdote," says al-Marzubānī<sup>1</sup> "was related to me by Ibn Durayd: I fell from (the top of) my house in Fārs, and broke my collarbone. I passed a sleepless night, and towards morning, having just closed my eyes, I dreamt that a tall pale man with a thin beard came to my room, and, having taken hold of the door posts, one in each hand, he said: 'Repeat to me the best verses you ever composed on wine.' I replied that Abū Nuwās (No. 162) had left nothing for me or any one else to say on the subject. 'Well,' said he, 'I am a better poet than Abū Nuwās.' This induced me to ask him who he was, and he answered: 'Abū Nājiyah, a native of Syria.' He then recited to me these lines:

'Red before it is mixed and pale after, (this wine) comes forth arrayed in narcissus (yellow) and in anemiony (red); pure, it resembles the cheeks of the beloved; mixed, it assumes the (paled) colour of the lover.'

When he had done, I declared the verses bad, and, on his asking my reason, I replied: 'You begin by calling it red, and then you say arrayed in narcissus and in anemiony, thus putting the yellow colour first; why did you so?' 'Such hyper-criticism is most untimely, you reprobate!' was his answer. In another version of this anecdote it is stated that Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī said: "Ibn Durayd recited me these two lines, composed by himself, and told me that Satan appeared to him in a dream and asked him if he had not essayed to rival Abū Nuwās? Ibn Durayd answered that he had. 'Well,' said Satan, 'your verses are not bad, but you have committed one fault'. The rest of the narration agrees with what precedes. Ibn Durayd died at Baghdād on Wednesday, the 17th of Shā'bān, A.H. 321 (August, A.C. 933,)* and was buried on the east side of the river, in the 'Abbāsiyah cemetery. His tomb is situated behind the Arms Bāzār, near the main street (al-Shāri'

<sup>1</sup> His life will be found in this work.

* The date should be 18/14 August. - Ed.

'al-A'zam). The celebrated Motazilite divine Abū Ḥaṣim 'Abd al-Salām al-Jubbā'i (No. 358) died the same day, and this caused the people to say: "To-day, philology and theology have ceased to exist!" It is stated that he lived precisely ninety-three years. Jaḥẓat al-Barmakī (No. 54) lamented his death in the following lines:

"Learning disappeared when Ibn Durayd made the third with the gravestone and the earth (tarb). I at first lamented the departure of generosity, but I now lament the departure of generosity and erudition."

Tarb (an unusual word) is the plural of tarbah, (a lump of earth.) Durayd is the tarkhīm diminutive of Adarad (toothless). This species of diminutive is called tarkhīm (softening), because the letter a, the initial of the primitive word, is suppressed; it is thus that of aswad and azhar they for suwayd and zuhayr. Ḥanṭham, the name of one of his ancestors (mentioned at the commencement of this article), means an earthen jar coated with green varnish; it is used also as a proper name for men. Ḥamāmī, another of his ancestors, was, according to the amīr Abū Naṣr Ibn Mākūlā (No. 414), the first of the family who became a convert to Islāmism. He was one of the seventy horsemen who accompanied 'Amr Ibn al-Āṣī from 'Uman to Madīnah, on learning that the Prophet was dead; the circumstance is well known<sup>1</sup>. Ḥāl al-Jarīd dūn al-qārīd is a well known proverb; it originated with 'Abīd Ibn al-Abrāṣ, an ante-Islāmic poet, who pronounced these words on meeting al-Nu'mān Ibn al-Mundhīr al-Lakhmī, the last king of Ḥīrah, in one of his bad days<sup>2</sup>. Al-Nu'mān resolved to put him to death according to the customs he had adopted, but first asked him to repeat some verses of his own composing; 'Abīd, who had discovered his intentions, replied: Ḥāl al-jarīd dūn al-qārīd (choking has put a stop to verses). It was as if the poet had said: Strangulation has put a stop to the reciting of verses. It is a well known story, and I merely give its outline here<sup>1</sup>. 'Abid, for so his name must be pronounced, was a celebrated poet, contemporary with 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib Ibn Ḥāshim, the grandfather of the Prophet.

<sup>1</sup> None of the historians whom I have consulted allude to this circumstance.

<sup>2</sup> See Pococke's Specimen hist., ar. 2nd ed. p. 73, and causin de Percevel's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, tom. II, page 104.

612 ABŪ 'UMAR AL-ZĀHID AL-MUṬARRIZ

Abū 'Umar Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid Ibn Abī Ḥāshim al-Bāwardī, genearily known by the appellation of al-Muṭarriz and surnamed Ghulām Tha'lab (Tha'lab's boy) received also the denomination of al-Zāhid (the ascetic) for his mortified life, and ranked among the most eminent and the most learned of the philologers. For a considerable time, he had been assiduous disciple of Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab (No. 42), and to this circumstance he was indebted for his surname. He acquired a great stock of information under the tuition of that master, on whose work, the Faṣīḥ, he composed two treatises, the first, a small volume of

---

1 Le roi d'Atwa (Moundhir ou Noman) avait deux amis qui etaient ses convives habituels. Un jour, irrite de quelques propos imprudents qu'ils avaient tenus, et echauffe par les fumees du vin, il ordonna de les mettre a mort. Le lendemain, revenu de son ivresse, il fut vivement afflige et fit elever hors de Hira, deux mausolees a ses amis. Il s'imposa la loi de passer, tous les ans, deux jours aupres de ces monuments funebres. L'un de ces jours fut appele jour de bien يوم نعيم l'autre jour de mal يوم بؤس. La premiere personne qui se presenta au roi assis pres des mausolees, dans le jour de bien, il la combla de presents; la premiere qui s'offrait a sa vue, dans le jour de mal, il la faisait perir et on arrosait de son sang les deux mausolees, qui furent nommes. الغريان. Dans un de ses mauvais jours le roi etant pres des mausolees, vit venir le poete Abid qu'il connaissait et qu'il aimait, Ah! lui dit-il, pourquoi faut-il que tu sois la victime que je dois immoler! au moins, recite-moi une derniere fois ta piece de vers.-Le goiser serre par l'angoisse, repondit Abid, ne peut articuler des vers حال الجريص دون التريض. Choisis, dit le roi, quelle veine tu veux que l' on t'ouvre, celle du col, celle du bras, ou celle de la jambe?. Si tu est decide a m'oter lavie, reprit Abid, fais-moi donner du vin et quand j' aurai bu jusqu'a ce que la sensibilite soit eteinte en moi, tu feras ce que tu voudras. On apporta du vin au poete, et lorsqu'il fut enivre on lui ouvrit une veine du col et on arrosa de son sang les deux mausolees. (Kitāb al-Aghānī), tom IV, fol. 260.) (A. Caussin de Perceval).

corrections, and entitled Fā'it al-Faṣīḥ (omissions of the Faṣīḥ), the second, a commentary, forming also one volume. His other works were the Kitāb al-Yawāqūt (book of jewels) the Kitāb al-Jurjānī; the Kitāb al-Mūḍīḥ (the elucidator); the Kitāb al-Sā'āt (book of hours) the Kitāb Yawm wa laylah (book of the day and the night); the Kitāb al-Mustaḥsan (the approved); the Kitāb al-'Aṣḥārāt (book of decennaries); the Kitāb al-Shūrā (treatise on counsel); the Kitāb al-Buyū' (treatise on sales) a treatise on the meaning of the names of the poets; a work on the Arabian tribes; the Kitāb al-Maknūn wa 'l-Maktūm (the concealed and the hidden); the Kitāb al-Tuffāḥah (on the apple); the Kitāb al-Madākhil; the 'Ilal al-Mudākhil; the Kitāb al-Nawādir (book of anecdotes); the Kitāb Fā'it al-'Ayn [omissions of (al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad (No. 208) in his work) the 'Ayn]; the Kitāb Fā'it al-Jamharah [omission of Ibn Durayd (No. 611) in his work] the Jamharah, and a notice on the expressions which the Arabs of the Desert reprehended as inaccurate in the lessons and writings of Abū 'Ubayd (No. 509). Many rare obsolete terms of the language were made known by Abū 'Umar, and the greater part of the words indicated by Ibn al-Sid al-Baṭalyawṣī in his Ternary, is taken from his indications. Many strange stories are told of this philologist. The information which he communicated to his scholars was then transmitted down by Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Zarqūyah, Abū 'Alī Ibn Shādhān, and others. His birth took place in the year 261 (A.C. 874-5), and he died at Baghdād, on Sunday, the 13th of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 345 (February, A.C. 957),* or 344. He was interred the next day in the cloister (suffah) situated near the tomb of Ma'rūf al-Karkhī<sup>1</sup>, from which it is only separated by the road. Abū 'Umar devoted himself to study with such assiduity that he had not time to provide for his livelihood, and always remained in a state of poverty. The quantity of information which he communicated to his disciples and of the pieces which he knew by heart was so great that the learned men of that time impugned as false the greater part of his philological observations, and they used to say that if a bird flew by, Abū 'Umar would bring forward

1 The life of Ma'rūf will be found in this work.

* 15 February.—Ed.

something on the subject, heading it with these words: "Tha'lab told us, on the authority of Ibn al-A'rābī, that," etc. He is considered, however, as a correct and trustworthy Traditionist by all competent masters in that branch of knowledge. The greater portion of the works and pieces which he taught was dictated by him from memory without his having recourse to a book; it is said that the philological matter which he thus made known filled thirty thousand leaves of paper. It was this copiousness which exposed him to the imputation of falsehood. A number of persons concerted together and imagined a question which they might propose to him; when they obtained his answer, they let a year pass over, and then submitted to him the same question, but his answer corresponded exactly with that which he had previously given. A similar attempt to ensnare him was made by some persons who were going to hear his lessons: they happened to be conversing of the vast quantity of information which he was ever ready to communicate, and observed that, by this very talent, he had incurred the imputation of falsehood. On their way, they passed by a bridge, and one of them said: "Let us write down the name of this bridge and ask him about it; we shall see what answer he makes." When they entered the place where Abū 'Umar was, that person addressed him, saying: "O shaykh! what does the word bridge (qantarah)* mean with the Arabs?" The professor answered that it meant so and so (stating its different significations), and his auditors received this answer with a secret smile. A month afterwards, they set forward a person to ask him about that particular bridge, on which he replied: "Was not the same question proposed to me a month ago, and did I not answer it so and so?" On hearing these words, the assembly was filled with admiration at his quick apprehension, acuteness, and promptitude in calling to mind the question and the time at which it had been proposed; but whether his answer was exact or not, they had no means of verifying. Mu'izz al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh (No. 71) had given the command of the Baghdād police-guards to one of his young slaves whose name was Khawājah. When Abū 'Umar heard of this appointment, he was dictating to his scholars the contents of his Kitāb al-Yawāqit (book of jewels), and at his next lesson he said, on taking his seat: "Write: Yāqūt Khawājā (a merchant's jewel); the word Khawājā, in the dialect of the Arabs, means hunger." He then discussed this subject in its various ramifications and made his scholars write down his remarks. The persons present were struck with amazement at his boldness in advancing such falsehoods, and began to look out for the word in the treatises of philology<sup>1</sup>. Abū 'Alī al-Ḥātimī (No. 623), the Kātib and philologist, said: "We extracted from a dictation made by al-Ḥāmiḍ (No. 255) on the authority of al-Aṣma'ī who cites Ibn al-A'rābī, that the word khawājā means hunger." Abū 'Umar al-Muṭarriz was giving lessons to the son of the qāḍī Abū 'Umar Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf, and one day he dictated to him nearly one hundred philological questions, indicating their niceties and concluding with two lines of poetry. (Some time after,) Abū Bakr Ibn Durayd (No. 611) came in to the qāḍī Abū 'Umar's, with Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī (No. 616) and Abū Bakr Ibn Muqsim<sup>2</sup>. The qāḍī submitted to them these questions, but they had no idea of them and knew nothing of the verses. "Well," said the qāḍī, "what say you to that?" "For my part", said Ibn al-Anbārī, "I am so much engaged in composing a treatise on the obscurities of the Qur'ān (Mushkil al-Qur'ān), that I can say nothing on the subject." Ibn Muqsim answered in similar terms, pretending that he was taken up with the reading of the Qur'ān but Ibn Durayd declared positively that the questions were all of (the philologist) Abū

---

* The editor of the Egyptian edition observes that they had changed the word to (hartanqa) the reverse of (qan'arah) to confuse the shaykh, and if the correct word were given all its charm would go.—Ed.

---

1 Regular dictionaries did not then exist.

2 The Imām Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Ya'qūb Ibn Muqsim al-Aṭṭār, a learned Qur'ān reader and grammarian of Baḥḥadā, composed some works on the Qur'ānic sciences, one of which, the Kitāb al-Anwār (book of lights) contains an explanation of the meaning, and an elucidation of the style of the Qur'ān. Having adopted the readings taught by Ibn Ṣhanbūd (See No. 602), he gave such scandal to the public that he was cited before an assembly of doctors presided by Ibn Mujāhid and forced to retract, but on the death of Mujāhid he returned to his former opinions. Born A.H. 265 (A.C. 878-9); died A.H. 354 (A.C. 965). (Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā, fol. 84).

'Umar's invention and had no foundation whatever in the language: after this, they withdrew. When Abū 'Umar heard of what had passed, went he to the qāḍī and told him to bring in the collected poetical works (diwāns) of some ancient poets whom he named. The qāḍī opened his library and took out the books. Abū 'Umar then began to discuss each question successively and adduced from these diwāns a number of passages in proof of all his statements and pointed out those passages to the qāḍī. On concluding, he said: "As for the two verses, they were recited by Tha'lab in your own presence, and you yourself wrote them down on the cover of such a work," naming it. The qāḍī brought in the book and found the verses written on the cover and in his own hand-writing. "I found," said the Ra'is al-Ru'asā<sup>1</sup> "in the works of the philologers, and particularly in Abū 'Ubayd's Gharīb al-Muṣannaf, many of the expressions which had been considered as the mere fabrications of Abū 'Umar." Abu'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Wāhid Ibn 'Alī Ibn Barhān al-Asadī said: "None of the ancients or of the moderns ever treated philological points so well as Abū 'Umar al-Zāhid". Abū 'Umar composed a Gharīb al-Ḥadīth (obscure terms occurring in the Traditions), founded on Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal's work, the Musnad, and on this production he set the highest value. Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ḥātimī said: "An indisposition having prevented me from attending the sittings of Abū 'Umar al-Zāhid, some days passed over and he at length asked for me. Being informed that I was unwell, he came the next morning to see me, and as I happened to have gone out to take a bath, he wrote the following line on my door with a piece of chalk:

"The strangest thing we ever heard of is that of a sick man whose people come to visit, but cannot find."

---

1 The Ra'is al-Ru'asā 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Muslimah, wazīr to the ḫalīf al-Qā'im, commenced his career in a subordinate station at Baḡhdād, and rose by his talents to the wazīrate. He was versed in jurisprudence, the Traditions, and other sciences. Having incurred the enmity of the Turkish guards, he was expelled by them from Baḡhdād, but returned soon after; being then attacked by Abu 'l-Ḥārith al-Baṣāṣirī al-Turkī (See No. 78) and having fallen into the hands of his enemies, he perished in excruciating tortures, A.H. 450 (A.C. 1058). (Al-Du'al al-Islāmiyah),—Reiske calls him supremus Rais; see Abulfedae Annales, t. III, p. 173.

"The verse was his own." Muṭarriz signifies an embroiderer ; as Abū 'Umar practised that art, he derived from it a surname which has been borne also by other learned men. Abū 'Umar professed an excessive admiration of Mu'āwiyah, and, having composed a treatise on the merits of that khalif, he obliged every person who came to study under him to read that book. He was a man of great merit and extensive information, but what we have said in this article must suffice. I looked out for the name of Abū 'Umar in al-Sam'ānī's Kitāb al-Ansāb, under the word al-Muṭarriz ; he does not mention him, but he speaks of a poet called Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Wāhid Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Ayūb al-Muṭarriz, a native of Baghdād ; this may perhaps be the father of Abū 'Umar, if we are to judge from his name ; if not, he is a person unknown to me. Al-Sam'ānī adds that his poetry bore a high reputation and obtained great publicity. He then cites the following passage of his composition :

"Overcome with grief, we stopped at al-Ṣarāt<sup>1</sup>. one evening, to exchange adieus ; and, despite of envious foes, we stood unsealing (the packets of) every passionate desire. On saying farewell, she saw me borne down by the pains of love and granted me a kiss. Impelled by startled modesty, she drew her veil across her face, on which I said: 'The full-moon has now become a crescent.' I then kissed her through the veil, and she observed: "My kisses are wine, to be tasted they must be passed through the strainer.'"

Although al-Sam'ānī says nothing of Abū 'Umar in that article, he mentions him under the head of Ghulām Tha'lab, adding the remarks which we have already made at the commencement of this notice. Since writing the above, a number of years had elapsed when I found at Baghdād the Diwān of Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Wāhid, surnamed al-Muṭarriz. He was a native of that city, and the greater part of his poetry is very good. His birth took place in the year 354 (A.C. 965-6), and his death in 439, on Sunday, the first of the latter Jumādā (November, A.C. 1047).* It is therefore evident that he was not the father of Abū

1 See No. 129, note

* 22 November.—Ed.

'Umar, but another person of the same trade. Bāwardī means belonging to Bāward or Abīward, a village in Khurāsān and the native place of Abu 'l-Muẓaffar al-Abīwardī, a poet whose life we shall give.

613 ABŪ MANṢŪR AL-AZHARĪ

Abū Manṣūr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Azhar Ibn Ṭalḥah Ibn Nūḥ Ibn Azhar al-Azharī al-Harawī (native of Herāt), a philologist of the highest rank and celebrity, was doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect, but addicted himself so exclusively to the study of the language that his reputation is founded on his acquirements in that branch of knowledge. His piety, his talents, and his exactitude as a transmitter of philological information were universally acknowledged. The matter of his lessons was derived by him from the philologist Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Abī Ja'far al-Mundhirī, who had received it from Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab and other masters. Having proceeded to Baghdād, he met Ibn Durayd, but never taught any thing on his authority. He received also a part of his information from Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Arafah, surnamed Niṣṭawayh (No. 11), and from Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Sarī, a grammarian more generally known by the name of Ibn al-Sarrāj. [We shall give his life, (No. 615)]. Some say, however, that he obtained no part of his information from the latter person. To acquire a more complete knowledge of the Arabic language, al-Azharī travelled over Arabia; and a person of merit has stated that he read a note, to the following effect, in Abū Manṣūr's handwriting: "I had the misfortune to be made a prisoner, the year in which the Qarmāṭs intercepted the pilgrim-caravan at al-Habir. The people to whose share I fell were Arabs, bred in the desert; they passed the grazing-time in visiting with their flocks the regions in which rain had fallen, and, in the hot season, they returned to a number of watering-places situated at the spots where they usually stationed; they kept camels and lived on the milk of these animals; they spoke an idiom suited to their Bedwin habits, and very rarely indeed, did they mispronounce a word or commit a gross fault of language. I remained in bondage amongst them for a long time ; our winters we passed at al-Dahnā, our spring at al-Ṣammān, and our summers at al-Sitārān. From discoursing with them and from their conversation one with the other, I learned a great quantity of words and singular expressions ; and most of these I inserted in my book"—by his book he means the Tahdhīb—"where you will find them classed under their proper heads." He again resumes the subject in this discourse, and mentions that he passed two winters at al-Ṣammān. Abū Maṣṣūr al-Azhārī had a passion for collecting loose scraps of philology and possessed a perfect acquaintance with all the secrets and niceties of the language. His philological treatise, the Tahdhīb (arrangement) fills upwards of ten volumes and is a highly-esteemed work. His Gharīb al-Alfāz (signification of rare words), a work in one volume, is held by jurists as their main authority for the signification of every obscure and doubtful word in the law language.

The Kitāb al-Taḥṣīl [explanation of difficult words (?)] is another of his productions. At Baghdād he met Abū Ishāq al-Zajjāj (No. 12) and Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī, but has given nothing on the authority of either. He was born A.H. 282 (A.C. 895-6), and he died at Herāt towards the close of the year 370 (ends in July, A.C. 981). Some place his death a year later. The surname al-Azhārī he derived from the circumstance of having an ancestor who bore the name of Azhar. Of Harawī we have already spoken (No. 35). The Qarmāṭs (Qarāmiṭah) were so called after a man named Qirmīṭ, who belonged to the Sawād<sup>1</sup> of Kūfah. They held a most reprehensible doctrine, and they made their first appearance in the year 281 (A.C. 894-5), under the khālīfate of al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh. This sect subsisted for a long period and acquired such strength that it not only rendered the roads dangerous for travellers, but conquered a great number of provinces. Of these events a full account will be found in the works of historians<sup>2</sup>. The combat of al-Habl to which al-Azhārī alludes, took place A.H. 311 (A.C. 923-4); the Qarmāṭs, who had then for chief Abū

---

1 See No. 485.

2 Ibn Khallikān has already given some account of them. See No. 182 et seq.

Ṭāhir al-Jannābī al-Qirmīṭī, attacked the pilgrim-caravan, slew some of the travellers, reduced others to slavery, and seized on all their property. This occurred in the khalifate of al-Muqtadir, son of al-Mu'taḍid. It is said the Qarmaṭs made their first appearance in the year 278 (A.C. 891-2), and that their first chief was Abū Sa'id al-Jannābī, who established his authority in the province of Baḥrayn and Hajar. He was murdered in the year 301 (A.C. 913-4) by one of his slaves. Abū Ṭāhir lost his life in A.H. 332 (A.C. 943-4). Jannābī means belonging to Jannābah, a town in the province of Baḥrayn, and situated on the sea-coast, near Sīrāf. Habīr (as an appellative noun) signifies a low ground. Al-Dahnā, or al-Dahna with a short final a, is the name of a large tract of country in the Arabian desert, forming part of the territory belonging to the tribe of Tamīm. It is said to consist of seven mountains of sand; according to some, it is situated in the desert of Baṣrah and in the territory of the tribe of Sa'd. Al-Ṣammān is a red mountain in the neighbourhood of al-Dahnā; an easy road leads across it in three days' time, and its height is not great. Some say that it is situated near the sandy desert of 'Ālij. at nine days' journey from Baṣrah. Al-Sitārān, the dual of Sitār, is a name serving to designate two valleys which lie in the territory of the tribe of Sa'd; one of them is called al-Sitār al-Aḡhar (the dusty Sitār), the other the al-Sitār al-Ḥā'irī<sup>1</sup>, and both bear the denomination of Sūdāh. They contain some springs of running water which serve to irrigate date-trees. The preceding remarks have no direct connexion with our subject, but, as they serve to explain some words which might embarrass the reader of this compilation, we have judged it useful to insert them.

614 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-YAZĪDĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Muḥammad al-Yazīdī, a nawlā to the tribe of 'Adī Ibn

<sup>1</sup> The MS. of al-Yāqūtī's Muṣhtarik, in the Bib. du Roi, reads al-Jabirī (الجابري).

'Abd Manāt (al-'Adawi), was a grammarian and philologist of the highest rank, a relator of (philological) anecdotes and a transmitter of the phraseology current among the Arab of the desert. We shall give the life of his ancestor Abū Muḥammad Yahyā Ibn al-Mubārak. One of the anecdotes told by him was the following : An Arab of the desert loved a female of the same region and sent her, by a slave, a present of thirty sheep and a skin filled with wine. On the way, the slave killed one of the sheep and ate a portion of it, and drank part of the contents of the wine-skin. When he brought the rest to her, she perceived the trick, and on the slave's asking her, when about to return, if she had any message to send back, she resolved on acquainting the master with the fellow's conduct, and answered: "Give him my salutation, and tell him that our month was maḥāqa, and that Suḥaym, the keeper of our sheep, came here with a bloody nose (marthūm)."<sup>1</sup> The slave, not knowing what she intended by these expressions, bore them back to his master, who immediately perceived their drift, and calling for a cudgel, said to the messenger ; "Tell me the truth, or I will give you a sound drubbing." The slave confessed his fault and obtained pardon. This message contained the most subtle and elegant allusions to what the slave had done. The word marthūm means one whose nose is broken and bleeds ; ratham, another derivative of the same root, means a white spot on the upper-lip of a horse. Marthūm is employed metaphorically to designate a wine or water-skin<sup>1</sup>. He left some works, such as the Kitāb al-Khayl (book of horses), the Manāqib, etc. (merits of the 'Abbāsides), the Akhbār al-Yazīdiyyīn (history of the Yazīd family), and a compendious treatise on grammar. Having been employed, towards the close of his life, as preceptor to the children of al-Muqtadir

---

1 Our author has here imitated the manner of many Arabian commentators, who explain what is clear enough and pass over what is obscure. He might have added that a maḥāq month is one, on the last night of which there is no moonshine. So that it contains only twenty-nine moonlight nights in place of thirty. The expression : the month was maḥāq is therefore equivalent to one of the thirty was wanting. This, of course, referred to the thirty sheep. Our author might also have observed that Suḥaym, a very common Bedwin name, means the little black ; an epithet designating perfectly well a wine-skin rubbed over with pitch to preserve it.

bi Allāh, he filled that office for some time. Soon after his entry into the khalif's service, one of his friends met him and asked his protection, but he replied : "I am too busy for that."<sup>1</sup> Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Yazīdī died on the eve of Monday, the 18th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 310 (October, A.C. 922)*, at the age of eighty-two years and three months. Yazīdī here means related to Yazid Ibn Maṣṣūr; of this we shall again speak, in the life of his ancestor Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā Ibn al-Mubārak.

615 IBN AL-SARRĀJ THE GRAMMARIAN

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Sarī Ibn Sahl the grammarian, generally known by the name of Ibn al-Sarrāj, was one of the most distinguished masters in that science, and his high abilities in it and in philology are universally acknowledged. Amongst the persons from whom he acquired his philological information was Abu 'l-'Aḥbās al-Mubarrad (No. 610); and some eminent masters, such as Abū Sa'id al-Sirāfī (No. 154) and 'Alī Ibn 'Isā al-Rummānī (No. 410), studied it under his tuition. Al-Jawharī in his Ṣaḥūḥ cites his authority in a number of articles. Ibn al-Sarrāj composed some grammatical works of great repute, and his Kitāb al-Uṣūl (principles), one of the best treatises on the subject, is always referred to when the traditional information on any grammatical point is uncertain or contradictory. His other works are the Jumal al-Uṣūl (the collected principles), a short treatise called the Mūjaz (compendium); the Kitāb al-Iṣṭiqāq (on etymology), a commentary on Sibawayh's Kitāb (No. 479), the Iḥtijāj al-Qurā (appreciation of the motives which influenced Qur'ān-readers in their readings), the Book of the Poets and Poetry, the Book of the Winds, the Air, and Fire; the Book of the Camel, and the Kitāb al-Muwāṣīlat (book of loving unions, or book of gifts). He pronounced the letter r incorrectly, giving it the sound of gh, and happening, one day, to dictate a word in which this letter occurred, and perceiving that his disciple wrote it with a ghayn, he exclaimed : "No, no ! with a gha, with a gha !" <sup>1</sup> I found in an anthology some verses attributed to him, but am unable to ascertain whether they are really his or not. They relate to a girl whom the poet loved and are familiar to most persons. The lines to which I allude are these:

---

<sup>1</sup> It was perhaps the idiomatic form of this expression in Arabic which caused it to be remarked.

* 14 October.—Ed.

"I compared her beauty with her conduct, and found that her charms did not counterbalance her perfidy. She swore to me never to be false, but it was as if she had sworn never to be true. By Allāh ! I shall never speak to her again, even though she resembled in beauty the full moon, or the sun, or al-Muktafi !"

This article was already terminated when I discovered that these verses are certainly his, and a curious anecdote is connected with them : The author, Abū Bakr, loved a young girl, but she treated him with marked disdain : it happened at that time that the imām (khalif) al-Muktafi returned from al-Raqqah, and the people assembled to witness his entry into the city, and Abū Bakr was so much struck with his beauty that he recited these verses to his companions. Some time after, the kātib Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Zinjī<sup>2</sup> repeated them to Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn al-Furāt (No. 462), saying that they were composed by Ibn al-Mu'tazz (No. 316), and Abu 'l-'Abbās communicated them to the wazīr al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh (No. 438). The latter then went to the khalif and recited the verses to him, adding that they were by 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir (No. 333), to whom al-Muqtadir immediately ordered a present of one thousand dinārs. "How very strange," said Ibn Zinjī, "that Abū Bakr Ibn al-Sarrāj should compose verses which were to procure a donation to 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir!" Abū Bakr died on Sunday, the 26th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 316 (February, A.C. 929)*. Sarrāj means a saddler.

1 He meant to say : with a ra.

2 'Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Zinjī, a kātib celebrated for the beauty of his penmanship, left a collection of epistles composed by himself and a treatise on his art (Fihrist, fol. 178).

* 31 January.—Ed.

616 IBN AL-ANBĀRĪ THE GRAMMARIAN

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Abī Muḥammad al-Qāsim Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Bashshār Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Bayyān Ibn Samāah Ibn Farwah Ibn Qaṭan Ibn Di'āmah Al-Anbārī the grammarian, and author of various well-known treatises on grammar and philology, was the most learned man of his time in the different branches of general literature, and their superior also by the quantity of literary matter which he knew by heart. He was a veracious and conscientious traditionist, pious, virtuous, and a strict follower of the sunnah. Amongst his numerous works were treatises on the different Qur'ānic sciences, on the rare and the obscure expressions occurring in the Qur'ān, on the pause, on the commencement of phrases, a refutation of those who impugn the edition of the Qur'ān in general use, and a book called al-Zahīr (the blooming). High praise is bestowed on him by the Ḥaṭīb (No. 33) in his History of Baghdād; this author says: "I have been informed that Abū Bakr made dictations even in his father's lifetime, each of them dictating in a different part of the mosque. His father was learned in philology and an exact, veracious, and trustworthy transmitter of literary pieces preserved by tradition. He inhabited Baghdād. A number of learned men and his own son delivered pieces on his authority. He composed a treatise on the (name of the parts of the) human frame, a treatise on the frame of the horse, a book of proverbs, a treatise on the long and the short final alif, a treatise on the genders, a treatise on the uncommon expressions occurring in the Traditions and other works." Abū 'Alī al-Qālī (No. 92) says: "It is stated that Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī knew by heart three hundred thousand verses illustrative of expressions occurring in the Qur'ān, and that a person having said to him: 'The great quantity of pieces which you know by heart is often spoken of; how much do you really know? he answered: 'I have in my memory (as much as would fill) thirteen chests.'" It is mentioned that he knew by heart one hundred and twenty explanations of the Qur'ān with their isnāds<sup>1</sup>. Abu 'l-

---

<sup>1</sup> See vol. I, Introduction.

Ḥasan al-Dāraquṭnī (No. 409) relates that, on a certain Friday, he happened to be present at one of the sittings held by Ibn al-Anbārī for the purpose of making dictations, and that he gave a wrong pronunciation to a name occurring in the isnāds of a Tradition. "He said Ḥayyān (حيان)" relates al-Daraquṭnī, "instead of of Ḥabbān, (حببان) or Ḥabbān instead of Ḥayyān." I thought it would be a pity that an error of this kind should be adopted and propagated on the authority of so able and so eminent a man as Ibn al-Anbārī, but not daring to acquaint him with his mistake, I waited till the lesson was over, and approached the disciple to whom the dictations were directly addressed, pointing out the error of the master and informing him of the true reading. I then retired. The following Friday, I attended the next sitting, and Abū Bakr said: 'Let it be known to all here present, that, last Friday, in dictating a certain Tradition, I gave a wrong pronunciation to a name, and that youth indicated the true one; and let that youth know that I referred to the source whence I derived the Tradition and found the word written as he said.' Amongst Ibn al-Anbārī's works may be noticed his Ḥarīb al-Ḥadīth (unusual terms occurring in the Traditions.) filling, it is said, forty-five thousand leaves, a commentary on the grammatical treatise the Kāfi<sup>1</sup>, filling about one thousand leaves; a treatise on the final h, in about one thousand leaves; a list of words each of which bears two contrary significations, the Kitāb al-Jāhiliyāt<sup>2</sup> filling seven hundred leaves, a treatise on the genders, the most complete ever composed; the Risālat al-Muḥkil [epistola dubii (?)] in which he refutes Ibn Qutaybah (No. 306) and Abū Ḥātim (No. 262). He was born on Sunday, the 11th of Rajab, A.H. 271 (January, A.C. 885)*, and he died on the eve of the Festival of the Sacrifice, A.H. 328 (August, A.C. 940); some say, A.H. 327. His father al-Qāsim died at Baghdād, A.H. 304 (A.C. 916-7); some say, in the month of Šafar, A.H. 305. We have explained the meaning of the word Anbārī (No. 320). At one of his dictations he quoted the following verses by a Bedwin Arab :

---

1 Ḥājji Khalifah notices a treatise on grammar entitled the Kāfi, and composed by Abū Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn al-Naḥḥās. As this grammarian was a pupil of Ibn al-Anbārī's (No. 39), it is possible that the commentary mentioned by Ibn Khallikān referred to the work of Ibn al-Naḥḥās. The author of the Fihrist mentions the grammatical treatise the Kāfi, as the work of Ibn al-Anbārī himself, and takes no notice of the commentary.

2 This appears to have been a collection of poems composed in the times anterior to Islāmism, a work similar to the Mufaḍḍaliyāt (See No. 607, note). What may help to confirm this conjecture is, that in the list of Ibn al-Anbārī's works, as given in Fihrist, fol. 105v. we find a Kitāb al-Mufaḍḍaliyāt and not Kitāb al-Jāhiliyāt.

"When you hindered her from speaking to me, why did you not hinder her image from leaving the distant region where she now resides and visiting my slumbers in its unerring course ? May God shed His favour on a certain dwelling, in the sands of the tribe's reserved grounds, although the aspect of its ruins made me betray the passion I concealed. Were my corpse borne on its bier past these abodes, the very owl which dwells therein would say: "O my friend ! come and stay with me."

At another sitting, he dictated these lines :

"In the white regions of al-Urabah, if you visit its people, you will see fair gazelles roaming at liberty without a keeper. They go forth for the pleasure of encountering danger, and incur no jealous suspicions; chaste they are, and he who wishes to sport with them may despair."

617 ABU 'L-'AYNĀ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Khallād Ibn Yāsir Ibn Sulaymān al Hāshimī (a member, by enfranchisement, of the Hāshim family), surnamed Abu 'l-'Aynā, was a mawlā to (the Khalif) Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr. The family of Abu 'l-'Aynā, who was a blind man, remarkable for his repartees, verses, and literary knowledge, belonged to (the province of) al-Yamāmāh (in Arabia), but he himself was born at al-Ahwāz and bred at Baṣrah. He there learned Traditions and cultivated literature, having heard the lessons of Abū 'Ubaydah<sup>1</sup>, al-Aṣma'ī (No. 354), Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī (No. 245), al-'Utbī<sup>2</sup>, and other masters. He was an excellent ḥāfiẓ and spoke with great elegance; fluent in his discourse, prompt in his repartees, and surpassing in penetration and sharpness all his contemporaries, he ranked among the most brilliant wits of the age. Numerous amusing anecdotes are related of what passed between him and Abū 'Alī al-Ḍarīr<sup>3</sup>, and of the charming pieces of verse which he composed on those occasions. Being one day in the society of a certain wazīr, the conversation turned on the history of the Barmakides and their generosity; on which the wazīr said to Abu 'l-Aynā, who had just made a high eulogium of that family for their liberality and bounty: "You have praised them and their qualities too much; all this a mere fabrication of book-makers and a fable imagined by two authors." Abu 'l-Aynā immediately replied: "And why then do book-makers not relate such fables of you, O wazīr?" The wazīr remained silent, and the company were struck with astonishment at Abu 'l-Aynā's boldness. Having one day complained of his distressed circumstances to 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Wahb (No. 12 note), the latter replied: "Did I not write in your favour to Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mudabbar<sup>4</sup>?" "It is true," said Abu 'l-Aynā; "but you wrote to a man prevented from satisfying his generous inclinations by the protraction of poverty, the humiliation of captivity, and the cruelty of fortune; so my efforts were frustrated and my hopes disappointed." "But," said the wazīr, it was you yourself who made choice of him". "O wazīr!" replied Abu 'l-Aynā, "I am not to be blamed for that; Moses chose (out of) his people seventy men<sup>5</sup> and

---

* 3 January.—Ed.

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 The life of al-'Utbī will be found in this work.

3 Abū 'Alī al-Ḍarīr (the blind), called also (perhaps by antiphrasis) Abū 'Alī al-Baṣīr (البصير) (the clear-sighted), was an eminent poet and epistolary writer; the author of the Fihrist informs us under the heads of Abū 'Alī al-Baṣīr and Abū 'l-Aynā, that the former corresponded with and satirized the latter. (Fihrist, fol. 169, 171).

4 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mudabbār and his brothers, Aḥmad and Muḥammad, were eminent poets and prose writers جميعهم شاعر مترسل بليغ (Fihrist, fol. 169). The word مترسل seems to indicate that they were employed in the Board of Correspondence.

5 Qur'ān, sūrah 7, verse 154.

there was not a prudent man among them; the blessed Prophet chose for secretary 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sa'd Ibn Abī Sarḥ, and he fell into apostacy and joined the infidels; and 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib, chose for arbitrator Abu Mūsa 'l-Ash'ari, and he decided against him." By the words humiliation of captivity, Abu 'l-Aynā alluded to the circumstance of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mudabbar's having been imprisoned at Baṣrah by 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad, chief of the Zinj (No. 298, note). Ibrāhīm effected his escape by breaking through the prison wall. Abū 'l-Aynā having one day gone to visit Abū 'l-Saqr Ismā'il Ibn Bulbul (No. 553, note), that wazīr said to him, "What has kept you away from us so long, "Abū 'l-Aynā?" "My ass was stolen from me."—"How was it stolen?" "I was not with the thief, so I cannot say."—"Why then not ride to visit us on another?"—"My poverty prevented me from buying; my pride, from hiring; and my independence, from borrowing." He one day had a dispute with a descendant of 'Alī, and his adversary said to him: "You attack me, and yet you say in your prayers: Almighty God! bless Muḥammad and the family of Muḥammad."—"Yes," replied Abū 'l-Aynā, "but I add: who are virtuous and pure." A common fellow having stood in his way, he perceived it and said: "What is that?"—"A man of the sons of Adam;" was the reply. "Welcome, welcome!" exclaimed Abū 'l-Aynā, "God grant you long life! I thought that all his sons were dead." Having gone one day to the door of Ṣā'id Ibn Makhlad and asked permission to enter, he was told that the wazīr was engaged in prayer. "Ah!" exclaimed Abu 'l-Aynā, "there is pleasure in novelty." It must be here observed the Ṣā'id had been a Christian before his appointment to the wazīrate<sup>1</sup>. Happening to pass by the door of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Maṣṣūr, who was then recovering from an attack of sickness, he asked the servant how he was. "Just as you could wish," was the answer. "Why then," replied Abu 'l-Aynā, "do I not hear the funeral cry?" A mendicant whom he invited to partake of his supper having eaten it all up, he said to him ; " I asked you through charity, and it will be a charity in you to leave me." One of his friends met him at an early hour of the morning and expressed his astonishment at his being up so soon : " You do as I do," replied Abu 'l-'Aynā, " and yet you wonder at me." Having been informed that al-Mutawakkil had said of him : " Were he not blind, I should take him for a boon companion ;" he said : " Provided the khalif dispense me from watching for the new moon " (which is the duty of a muwadhhdhin) and from reading the inscriptions on seals " (which is the duty of a kätib) " I should make a good boon companion." Being asked how long he would continue to praise some and satirize others, he replied : " As long as the virtuous do good and the wicked do evil ; but God forbid that I should be as the scorpion which stingeth equally the Prophet and the infidel." Ibn al-Mukarram<sup>1</sup>, with whom he frequently engaged in playful dispute, having heard a man observe that he who loses his sight loses his shrewdness, he said : " What makes you forget Abu 'l-'Aynā ; he has lost his sight and gained immensely in shrewdness."

---

<sup>1</sup> Ṣā'id Ibn Makhlad was one of al-Mu'tamid's wazīrs. Ibn al-Athīr informs us in his Kāmil, under the year 276, that Ṣā'id Ibn Makhlad went that year to Wāsiṭ, where al-Muwaffiq the Khalīf's brother and lieutenant, received him with the highest marks of honour. On this occasion, Ṣā'id conducted himself with much haughtiness, and, soon after, al-Muwaffiq imprisoned him and his family.

The same Ibn al-Mukarram heard him say one day, in his prayers : " O Lord, hearken to thy petitioner!" on which he exclaimed : " You son of prostitute ! whom have you not petitioned ?" The same person once asked Abu 'l-'Aynā maliciously, how many liars there were at Baṣrah, and obtained for answer : " As many as there are reprobates at Baghdād <sup>2</sup>". Having gone to see Ibn Thawābah<sup>3</sup>, who had got the better of Abu 'l-Ṣaqr<sup>4</sup> in a dispute, he said to him : I have learned what passed between you and Abu 'l-Ṣaqr, and if he did not make you a full reply, it was 1 According to the author of the Fihrist, fol. 170, Muḥammad Ibn Mukarram was an eloquent Kätib and epistolary writer. In the Khaṭīb's great History of Baḡhdād, we find mention made of an Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn Mukarram al-Ṣaffār who died, as it would appear, in the year 231 (A.C. 854-6).

2 Baḡhdād was the native place of Ibn al-Mukarram, as Baṣrah was that of Abu 'l-'Aynā.

3 The author of the Fihrist indicates two persons bearing the surname of Ibn Thawābah, one called Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Thawābah, a man of learning and talent ; and the other, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Thawābah, an accomplished epistolary writer and secretary of the khalif al-Mu'taḍid. (Fihrist, fol. 176 v).

4 He means the wazīr ; see No. 553, note.

because he could find no pride in you to humble, and no honour to blast ; and moreover he detested your flesh too much to devour it, and despised your blood too much to think it worth spilling." "And what business have you," exclaimed Ibn Thawābah, "to thrust yourself into my affairs and those of people in his station ? beggar that you are ! " "Blame not a man of fourscore," replied Abu 'l-Aynā, "a man who has lost his sight and who is ill-treated by his prince, if he has recourse to the charity of his brethren; that is a better occupation than the trade of a catamite<sup>1</sup> hindering men to have progeny and increasing the burden of their crimes. "When two persons rail at each other," said Ibn Thawābah, "it is the vilest who gains the day." "Right !" retorted Abu 'l-Aynā, "and you gained the day over Abu 'l-Ṣaqr, and silenced him yesterday." Happening, in the year 246 (A.C. 860-7), to enter into the presence of al-Mutawakkil, who was then in his palace called al-Ja'farī, that khalif said to him : "What thinkest thou of this our dwelling-house ?" to which he made this reply : "Others have built houses in the world, but you have built a world in your house." Al-Mutawakkil expressed his satisfaction at the answer, and then asked him how he stood wine. The other replied : "I cannot resist a small quantity, and I disgrace myself if I take much." "Come !" said the khalif, "do not say so, but be our boon-companion." "I am a sightless man," replied Abu 'l-Aynā ; "all who sit in your company are ready to serve you, and I require a person to serve me ; neither am I free from the apprehension that you may look at me with the eye of one who is well pleased whilst your heart is wroth against me, or that your eye may express wrath whilst your heart is well-pleased ; and if I cannot distinguish these two signs, it may cost me my life. So I shall prefer safety to risk." "I am told," said the khalif, "that thou hast an evil tongue." "Commander of the faithful !" replied Abu 'l-Aynā, "the Almighty himself has uttered praise and satire ;

---

1 Instead of this word, Abu 'l-Aynā uses a periphrase still grosser ; but as some of the terms he employs are not perfectly intelligible, it may be here observed that انزال signifies emissio seminis ; استنزال provocatio ad emissionem ; ماء الصلب semen. The word اوزار here signifies : burthen of crime.

he has said : How excellent a servant ! for he frequently turned himself unto God<sup>1</sup> and ; a defamer, going about with slander, a preventer of good, a transgressor, a wicked wretch<sup>2</sup>.

And a poet hath said :

"If I praise not the honest man and revile not the sordid, the despicable, and base, why should I have the power of saying, That is good, and this is bad ? And why should God have opened (men's) ears and my mouth ?"

"Whence dost thou come?" said the khalif. "From Baṣrah." "What hast thou to say of that place ?" "Its water is bitter ; its heat is a torment, and it is pleasant when hell is pleasant". "When Najāḥ Ibn Salamah was delivered over to Mūsā Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Iṣbahānī,* who had been commissioned to exact from him the sums which he owed (to government), the cruel tortures to which the prisoner was submitted caused his death<sup>4</sup>. This

1 Qur'ān, sūrah 38, verse 29.

2 Qur'ān, sūrah 68, verses 11 and 12.

3 See something similar to this in No. 103.

4 Najāḥ Ibn Salamah was president of the Board of Requests (dīwān al-tawqī'ālī) an office in which were drawn up the answers to the memorials presented to the sovereign. He was charged also with the control of the agents who administered the estates belonging to the government. Having discovered some extensive peculations committed by Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, chief of the Revenue-Office (al-kharāj) and al-Ḥasan Ibn Maḥlād, president of the Board of Estates, he sent in a memorial to the khalif al-Mutawakkil, representing to him that these two officers had retained in their possession forty millions of dirhams. The khalif replied that, the next day, Mūsā and al-Ḥasan should be delivered over to him that he might proceed against them. But that night, the wazīr 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Yahyā, who favoured those two officers, induced Najāḥ to withdraw his accusation and promised that he would arrange the affair. The next morning, Najāḥ's retraction was presented to the khalif with a declaration signed by Mūsā and al-Ḥasan, wherein they stated that they had already paid into the hands of Najāḥ upwards of two millions of dīnārs, for which he had not accounted to the state. Al-Mutawakkil immediately delivered over Najāḥ and his sons to Mūsā, who obliged them to confess that they had in their possession about forty millions of dīnārs, without counting their magazines of corn, their horses, and landed property. Mūsā took all this wealth from his prisoners, and after inflicting a severe flogging on Najāḥ, he put him to death by happened on Monday, the 22nd of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 245 (Feb. A.C. 860).* The same evening al-Mu'tazz bi-Allāh, the son of al-Mutawakkil, attained the age of puberty, and some persons of high rank were assembled at Abu 'l-Aynā's. One of them having asked him if he had any news of Najāḥ Ibn Salamah, he answered in the words of the Qu'rān, sūrah 28, verse 14: "Moses (Mūsā) struck him and killed him." Those words came to the ears of Mūsā, who, soon after, met Abū 'l-'Aynā in the street and threatened him, on which the latter said (in the words of the same chapter, verse 18): "Dost thou intend to kill me, as thou killedst a man yesterday?" A certain great man having made him a promise which he did not fulfil, Abu 'l-'Aynā wrote to him in these terms: "The confidence I have in your word prevents me from complaining of your slowness; and the knowledge I have of your constant occupations induces me to awaken your recollection. Yet, confident as I am in your kindness though slow, and convinced of your generous spirit, I dread lest death overtake me, and death is the destroyer of hope. May God increase your days and make you attain the term of your wishes. Adieu." The anecdotes told of Abu 'l-'Aynā are very numerous; the following one is stated to have been related by himself: "I was one day sitting with Abu 'l-Jahm<sup>1</sup> when a man came in and said to him: 'You made me a promise, and it depends on your kindness to fulfil it.' Abu 'l-Jahm answered that he did not recollect any thing of it, and the other replied: 'If you do not recollect it, 'tis because the persons like me to whom you make promises are numerous; and if I remember it 'tis because the persons like you to whom I may confidently address a request are few.' 'Well said! blessings on your father!' exclaimed Abu 'l-Jahm, and the promise the compressing of his testicles. The sons of the victim were then beaten till they acknowledged having in their possession seventy thousand dīnārs and other property. Mūsā took all from them, and extorted also large sums from the agents employed by Najāḥ in the different cities of the empire. (Ibn al-Aṭḥr's Kāmil, year 245).

(Continued on page 325)

* M. de Slane corrects it in erata as Mūsā Ibn Abdal Malik ; but the editor 'Abd al-Ḥamid does not agree with him.—Ed.

(Continued from page 324)

1 Al-Dhahabī states in his obituary that Abu 'l-Jahm Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn, a poet, remarkable for his moral exhortations خطيب الشعر, died A.H. 319 (A.C. 931).

* 19 February.—Ed.

was immediately fulfilled." Abu 'l-'Aynā was born A. H. 191 (A. C. 806-7) at al-Ahwāz, as we have already said; he passed his early youth at Baṣrah; on attaining his fortieth year, he lost his sight, and, having resided for a time at Baghdād, he returned to Baṣrah, and died there in the month of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 283 (July - August, A.C. 896); some say, 282. His son Ja'far says that his death took place on the 10th of the first Jumādā, and his birth in A. H. 190; God best knows which of these statements is the more correct. He received the surname of Abu 'l-'Aynā (father large-eye) from the circumstance of his having asked Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī (No. 245) how he formed the diminutive of 'āyn (eye), to which he received this answer: "'Uyanā, O Abu 'l-'Aynā!" which nickname stuck to him ever after. We have already spoken of al-Yamāmah, (No. 297) and al-Ahwāz.

618 MUḤAMMAD IBN 'UMAR AL-WAQIDĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Wāqid al-Wāqidī, a native of Madinah (al-Madanī) and a mawlā to the Hāshim family—or to that of Sahn Ibn Aslam, according to some—was a man eminent for learning, and the author of some well-known works on the conquests of the Muslims [al-Maghāzī] and other subjects. His Kitāb al-Riddah, (history of the apostacy), a work of no inferior merit, contains an account of the apostacy of the Arabs on the death of the Prophet, and of the wars between the Companions and Ṭalayḥah Ibn Khuwaylid al-Azdī, al-Aswad Al-'Ansī and Musaylamah al-Kadhḍhāb (the liar).<sup>1</sup> He received traditional information from Ibn Abī Dhi'b (No. 540), Ma'mar Ibn Rāshid (Introduction), Mālik Ibn Anas (No. 524), al-Thawrī (No. 248), and others; his secretary Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd (whose life comes immediately after this), and a number of other distinguished men delivered traditional information on his authority. He held the post of qāḍī in the eastern quarter of Baghdād, and was appointed by al-Māmūn to fill the same office at 'Askar al-Mahdī. The Traditions received from him are considered of feeble authority, and doubts have been expressed on the subject of his veracity. Al-Māmūn testified a high respect for him and treated him with marked honour. Al-Wāqidi once wrote to him, complaining that straitened circumstances had obliged him to contract debts, and specified the amount of what he owed. On this memorial al Māmūn inscribed the following answer: "You possess the qualities of liberality and modesty: liberality allows your hand to disperse freely what you possess, and modesty induces you to mention only a part of your debts. We have therefore ordered you the double of what you ask; if this be not sufficient, the fault is your own; and if it answer your expectations, be yet more liberal than before, for the treasures of God are open, and His hand is stretched forth to do good. When you acted as qāḍī to al-Rashīd, you told me that the blessed Prophet said to al-Zubayr! : 'O Zubayr! the keys of the provision which God grants to His creatures are placed before His throne; He bestoweth on them in proportion to their expenditure; if they spend much, He gives much, and if they spend little, He gives little.'" "I had completely forgotten this Tradition," observed al-Wāqidi "and I derived more pleasure from his reminding me of it than from the present he made me." Bishr al-Hāfi (No. III) related one single fact relative to al-Wāqidi, which was that he heard him say: "How to write a charm to cure fevers. Take some olive leaves, and, on a Saturday, being yourself in a state of purity, write on one of these leaves:

<sup>1</sup> See Abu 'l-Fidā, reign of Abū Bakr; Price in his Retrospect, vol. I; Kosegarten's Annals of al-Ṭabarī, part I.

I Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwām Ibn Khuwaylid Ibn Asad Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzzā Ibn Quṣayyi, a member of the tribe of Quraysh and of the family of Asad, was a cousin of Muḥammad by the mother's side, and one of the ten proselytes to whom the founder of Islāmism announced their certain entry into paradise. Persecuted, like the other Muslims, by the Pagan Arabs, he took refuge in Abyssinia, but returned in time to accompany Muḥammad in his emigration to Madīnah. He fought in all Muḥammad's battles, and, at the combat of Badr, he was the only warrior among the true believers who took the field on horseback. At the conquest of Makkah, he bore Muḥammad's standard, and upwards of thirty wounds received in various combats against the infidels attested his bravery and his attachment to that faith in the cause of which his was the first sword ever drawn. Jealous of 'Alī, he espoused the quarrel of 'Āyishah, and fell by the hand of 'Amr Ibn Jarmūz the 10th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 36 (December, A.C. 656),* soon after the battle of the Camel. He met with his death in a valley near Baṣrah, called Wādi 'l-Sab'a (the valley of the lions).—(Abu 'l-Fida, Ṭabaqāt al-Muḥaddithīn, Siyar al-Salaf.)

* 4 December.—Ed.

Hell is hungry, on an other, Hell is thirsty, and on the third, Hell is refreshed. Put them in a rag and bind them on the left arm of the person suffering from fever. I made the experiment myself," said al-Wāqidi, "and found it successful." Such is the relation given by Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 345) in his life of Bishr al-Hāfi. Al-Mas'ūdi mentions, in his Murūj al-Dhahab, that al-Waqidi related the following anecdote; "I had two friends, one of whom belonged to the family of Hāshim, and we were all as if animated by one soul." Misfortune then came upon me, and I was reduced by poverty to deep distress, when my wife said to me, as the great Festival was drawing near; 'As for ourselves, we can support in patience our misery and affliction; but there are our children, and it cuts me to the heart to think that they will see the neighbours' children dressed out and adorned for the Festival, whilst they must continue as they now are, in their worn-out clothes. Could you contrive to procure the means of clothing them?' I immediately wrote to my friend, the Hāshimite, requesting him to let me have whatever sum he could dispose of, and he sent me a purse sealed up, and containing, he said, one thousand dirhams. I had hardly recovered from the joy I experienced when I received a note from my other friend, wherein he made me a request similar to that which I had addressed to the Hāshimite; I immediately sent him the purse without even breaking the seal, and, being then ashamed of appearing before my wife, I went to the mosque and remained there till morning. When I returned home, instead of being reproached for what I had done, I had the satisfaction of receiving her full approbation, and just at that moment, the Hāshimite came in, with the purse sealed up as before. 'Tell me sincerley,' said he, 'how you disposed of what I sent you: I told him the plain fact. 'Well,' said he, 'when you applied to me, I sent you all I possessed on earth, and having then written to my friend requesting him to share with me what he had, I received from him my own purse, sealed with my signet.' We then decided on making an equal partition of the thousand dirhams, having first taken out one hundred for my wife<sup>1</sup>. Al-Māmūn having heard of 1 One thousand pieces could not be equally divided between three persons; the difficulty was obviated by reducing the sum to nine hundred.

---

the circumstance, sent for me and made me relate what had passed ; he then ordered us a present of seven thousand dīnārs, two thousand dīnārs for each of us, and one thousand for my wife." The kḥaṭīb relates this anecdote, with some slight difference, in his history of Baghdād. al-Wāqidi was born in the beginning of A.H. 130 (Sept. A.C. 747) ; he died on Monday evening, the 11th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 207 (April, A.C. 823) ;* being then qādī of the quarter of Baghdad situated on the western side of the Tigris. Such is the statement of Ibn Qutaybah, but al-Sam'ānī says that he was qādī of the eastern quarter of Baghdād, as we have already mentioned. The funeral service was said over him by Muḥammad Ibn Samā'ah al-Tamīmī, and he was interred in the Kḥaizurān cemetery. Some place his death in 206 or 209 but the date we have given is the true one. The kḥaṭīb says, in his History of Baghdād, towards the beginning of his notice on al-Wāqidi, that he died in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, but towards the end of the article, he places his death in Dhu 'l-Hijjah. I found among my rough notes, and in my own handwriting, that al-Wāqidi died at the age of seventy eight years. Wāqidi means descended from Wāqid ; one of his ancestors bore this name. Of al-Madanī we have already spoken (No. 592). 'Askar al-Mahdī (al-Mahdī's camp), a place now known by the name of al-Ruṣāfah, is situated in the eastern quarter of Baghdād. It was built by Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr for his son al-Mahdī, after whom it was called. This confirms the statement that al-Wāqidi was qādī of the eastern quarter of the city, not of the western.

619 MUḤAMMAD IBN SA'D

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd Ibn Manī' al-Zuhri, was a man of the highest talents, merit, and eminence. He lived for some time with al-Wāqidi (see the preceding article) in the character of a secretary, and for this reason he became known by the appellation of Kātib al-Wāqidi. Amongst the masters under whom he studied was Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249) ; traditional information was delivered on his own authority by Abū Bakr Ibn Abī 'l-Dunyā (No. 228, note) and Abū Muḥammad al-Hārith Ibn Abī Usāmah al-Tamīmī. He composed an excellent work, in fifteen volumes, on the different classes (ṭabaqāt) of Muḥammad's Companions and of the Tābi'īs; it contains also a history of the khalīfs, brought down to his own time. He left also a smaller Ṭabaqāt. His character as a veracious and trustworthy historian is universally admitted. It is said that the complete collection of al-Wāqidi's works remained in the possession of four persons, the first of whom was his secretary, Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd. This distinguished writer displayed great acquirements in the sciences, the Traditions, and traditional literature; most of his books treat of the Traditions and law. The Khaṭīb Abū Bakr (No. 33), author of the History of Baghdād, speaks of him in these terms: "We consider Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd as a man of unimpeached integrity, and the Traditions which he delivered are a proof of his veracity, for in the greater part of the information handed down by him, we find him discussing it, passage by passage." He was a mawlā to al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. At the age of sixty-two, he died at Baghdād, on Sunday the 4th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 203 (December, A.C. 818)*, and was interred in the cemetery outside the Damascus Gate (Bāb al-Shām).

* 27 April.—Ed.

620 ABŪ BISHR AL-DŪLĀBĪ

Abū Bishr Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥammād Ibn Sa'd al-Anṣārī al-Dūlābī al-Rāzī, was a native of Dūlāb in the province of Ray, and allied, by adoption, to the Anṣārs of Madīnah. The surname of al-Warrāq was borne by him (because he copied or sold books). Al-Dūlābī displayed great learning in the Traditions, historical narrations, and general history; he learned the Traditions in Syria and 'Irāq from Muḥammad Ibn Bashshār<sup>1</sup>. Aḥmad <sup>1</sup> Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Bashshār Ibn 'Uṭhmān Ibn Dāwūd Ibn Kaysān al-'Abdī, called also Bandār, was a traditionist and a native of Baṣrah. Al-Bukhārī cited his authority for some Traditions. He died A.H. 252 (A.C. 866). (Tab. al-Muḥaddithīn).

* 5 December.—Ed.

Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār al-'Uṭāridī, and a great number of other teachers. His own authority was cited for traditions by al-Ṭabarānī (No. 256) and Abū Ḥātim Ibn Ḥayyān* al-Bustī. He left some useful works on history and on the dates of the births and deaths of the learned; these productions are so correct that persons who cultivate such branches of knowledge place full reliance on the information they derive from them, and his statements may be found quoted in works of the highest repute. In a word, he was one of the first masters on these subjects, and an authority to whom constant reference is made. His productions are drawn up with great care. He died at al-'Arj, A.H. 320 (A.C. 932). It is related that he gave the following lines as the production of 'Urwah Ibn Ḥizām al-'Udhri (No. 671) :

"When my heart designed to abandon her, it found its project opposed by two strenuous intercessors (love and remembrance? established) in my bosom. When it said No; they said Yes; but all were soon unanimous, for they prevailed."

Dūlābī, or Dawlābī, which last is considered by al-Sam'ānī as the more exact pronunciation, means belonging to al-Dūlāb, a village in the province of Ray. Another place of the same name lies in the province of al-Ahwāz, and near it was fought the celebrated battle against the Azāriqah (No. 516, note). Another Dūlāb is situated to the east of Baghdād, and a fourth place of this name is Dūlāb al-Jār. Dūlāb, pronounced also Dawlāb, is the name of the thing which turns round (the wheel for raising water). Al-'Arj is a steep mountain-pass on the pilgrim-road from Makkah to Madinah. Near Ṭā'if is a populous village called al-'Arj, the native place of al-'Arjī the poet (No. 115 note), whose real names were: 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān. I do not know in which of these two places al-Dūlābī died. There is also a place in Yaman called Sūg al-'Arj.

621 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-MARZUBĀNĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Imrān Ibn Mūsā Ibn Sa'id Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Kātib al-Marzubānī was born at Baghdād, * M. de Slane gives Ḥabbān but 'Abd al-Ḥamīd does not agree with him.—Ed.

but his family belonged to Khūrāsān. Besides drawing up numerous works and curious compilations<sup>1</sup>, which are well known, he delivered orally a great deal of literary and historical information. As a transmitter of the Traditions relative to Muḥammad, he bore the character of a sure authority, but in his religious belief he leant towards the Shi'ite doctrines. He gave his Traditions on the authority of 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Baghawī (No. 130, note), Abū Bakr Ibn Abī Dāwūd al-Sijistānī (No. 254), and other masters. It was he who first collected and revised the poetical works of the Umayyad (khalif), Yazīd, the son of Mu'āwiyah, the son of Abū Sufyān; they form a small volume of about sixty pages<sup>2</sup>. After him, other persons undertook the same task, but they inserted in the collection a great number of pieces which were not Yazīd's. The poems of this prince, though not numerous, are highly beautiful; one of his sweetest passages is that contained in the piece rhyming in 'ayn, where he says:

"Separated from Laylā, I longed for a glimpse of her figure, thinking that the flame which raged within my bosom would be calmed at her aspect; but the females of the tribe said: 'You hope to see the charms of Laylā! die of the (lingering) malady of hope! How couldst thou look on Laylā, whilst the eyes which you cast on other women are not yet purified by tears? How canst thou hope to enjoy her discourse, since thy ears have hearkened to the voice of strangers? O Laylā! thou art too noble to be seen! he only can see thee whose heart is humble and submissive<sup>3</sup>."

I conceived so great an admiration for Yazīd's poetry, that, in the year 633 (A.C. 1235-6), being then at Damascus, I learned it all by heart, and succeeded in distinguishing the genuine pieces from those which were falsely attributed to him. I examined also the latter with attention, and was enabled by my researches, to

---

1 Ibn Khallikān mentions, in the life of the poet Abū Bakr al-Khuwārizmī, that al-Marzubānī was the author of a Mu'jam al-Shu'arā, or dictionary of notices on the poets.

2 The original has: of about three kurrāsahs. A kurrāsah, or quire, generally contains twenty pages.

3 These verses seem to have a mystic import; the Beloved signifying the Divinity.

discover by whom each of them was composed ; these results I should set forth here were I not apprehensive of lengthening this article too much. Al-Marzubānī was born in the month of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 297 (Feb. March, A.C. 910) some say 296—and he died on Friday, the 2nd of Shawwāl, A.H. 384 (November, A.C. 994)*. His death has been placed incorrectly in the year 378. The funeral service was said over him by the doctor Abū Bakr al-Khawārizmī. He was interred in his house, situated in the shārī of 'Amr the Greek ('Amr al-Rūmī), a street in that quarter of Baghdād which lies on east side of the river. He delivered traditional information on the authority of Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Baghdādī<sup>1</sup>, Abū Bakr Ibn Durayd (No. 611), and Abū Bakr Ibn al-Anbārī (No. 616) ; his own authority was cited by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ṣaymarī, Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī (No. 531), Abū Muḥammad al-Jawharī, and others. He received the surname of al-Marzubānī because one of his ancestors bore the name of al-Marzubān, a designation applied by the Persians to great and powerful men only. This word signifies (guardian of the frontier, as we learn from Ibn al-Jawālīqī's<sup>2</sup> work, entitled al-Mu'arrab.

622 ABŪ BAKR AL-ṢŪLĪ

The Kātib Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṣūl Tikīn, generally known by the appellation of al-Ṣūlī al-Shatranjī (al-Ṣūlī the chess-player), bore a high reputation as a man of talent and an accomplished scholar. He delivered traditional information on the authority of Abū Dāwūd al-Sijistānī (No. 254), Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab (No. 42), Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad (No. 610), and other great masters ; Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Dāraquṭnī (No. 409), Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Marzubānī (see the preceding article), and others have transmitted

---

1 This I believe to be the same person as the 'Abd Allāh al-Baḡhawī already mentioned in this article.

2 His life will be found in this work.

* 9 November.—Ed.

down the information which he imparted. He became one of (the khalif) al-Rāḍī's boon-companions, after having been his preceptor; the khalif al-Muktafī and his successor al-Muqtadir received him also into their intimacy on account of his convivial talents. He composed a number of celebrated works, such as the Kitāb al-Wuzarā (book of wazīrs), the Kitāb al-Waraqah (book of leaves), the Adab al-Kātib (the knowledge requisite for a kاتب), the Kitāb al-Anwā' (book of species) the History of Abū Tammām (No. 145), the History of the Qarmāṭs, the Kitāb al-Ghurar (book of brilliancies?), the History of Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā (No. 480) the Kitāb al-'Ibādah (book of devotion), the History of Ibn Harmah<sup>1</sup>, the History of al-Sayyid al-Ḥimyarī (No. 409, note), the History of Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm (No. 84), a biographical dictionary of modern poets, etc. The science which he chiefly cultivated was biography, but he knew by heart and transmitted down a great number of literary productions. Sincere in his religious belief and virtuous in his conduct, he merited the deference which was always paid to his opinions. In chess-playing he remained without an equal, and, even to the present day, it is said proverbially of a player whose abilities are intended to be extolled, that such a one plays at chess like al-Ṣūlī. I have met a great number of persons who believed that al-Ṣūlī was the inventor of chess, but this is an erroneous opinion; that game having been imagined by Ṣiṣṣah Ibn Dāhir the Indian, for the amusement of king Shihrahām. Ardashīr Ibn Bābek, the founder of the last Persian dynasty, invented the game of nard (tables)<sup>2</sup>, which was therefore called nardashīr<sup>3</sup>. He designed it as an image of the world and its inhabitants, and therefore divided the board into twelve squares to represent the months in the year; the thirty counters (or men) represented the days of the month, and the dice, fate, and the vicissitudes through which it conducts the people of the world.

1 "In A.H. 176 (A.C. 972-3) died Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muslimah Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Harma (هرمه) al-Fihri, a celebrated poet of whom al-Aṣma'ī said: 'Ibn Harmah was the last of the poets.' No testimony can be stronger than this in favour of his talents." (Nujūm).

2 Hyde has fully treated of these games in his treatise De Ludis Orientalium.

3 Ibn Khalikān, or his author, seems therefore to have considered the word nardashīr as the equivalent of nard Ardashīr (Ardashīr's nard).

But, to expatiate on these points would lead us too far, and make us digress from the subject in which we are now engaged. The Persians count the game of nard as one of the inventions which did honour to their nation. (Balhayt was at that time king of India, and for him Şişşah invented the game of chess. The sages of the epoch declared it superior to the game of nard, and that for reasons too long to be explained)<sup>1</sup>. It is said that, when Şişşah invented the game of chess and presented it to Shihrām, the latter was struck with admiration and filled with joy; he ordered chess-boards to be placed in the temples, and considered that game as the best thing that could be learned, inasmuch as it served (as an introduction) to (the art of) war, as an honour to religion and the world, and as the foundation of all justice. He manifested also his gratitude and joy for the favour which heaven had granted him in illustrating his reign by such an invention, and he said to Şişşah. "Ask me for whatever you desire." "I then demand," replied Şişşah, "that a grain of wheat be placed in the first square of the chess-board, two in the second, and that the number of grains be progressively doubled till the last square is attained: whatever this quantity may be, I ask you to bestow it on me." The king, who meant to make him a present of something considerable, exclaimed that such a recompense would be too little, and reproached Şişşah for asking so inadequate a reward. Şişşah declared that he desired nothing but what he had mentioned, and, heedless of the king's remonstrances he persisted in his demand. The king at length consented and ordered that quantity of wheat to be given him. When the clerks of the government office received orders to that effect, they calculated the amount, and answered that they did not possess near so much wheat as was required. These words were reported to the king, and he, being unable to credit them, ordered the clerks to be brought before him. Having questioned them on the subject, they replied that all the wheat in the world would be insufficient to make up that quantity. He ordered them to prove what they said, and, by a series of multiplications and calculations, they demonstrated to him that such was the fact. On this, the king said to Şiṣṣah: "Your ingenuity in imagining such a request is yet more admirable than your talent in inventing the game of chess." The way in which this doubling of the grains is to be done consists in the calculator's placing one grain in the first square, two in the second, four in the third, eight in the fourth, and so on, till he comes to the last square; placing in each square the double of what is contained in the preceding one. It appeared to me doubtful that the amount could be so great as is said, but having met one of the accountants employed at Alexandria, I received from him a demonstration which convinced me that their declaration was true: he placed before me a sheet in which he had doubled the numbers up to the sixteenth square, and obtained thirty-two thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight grains<sup>1</sup>. "Now," said he, "let us consider this quantity to be the contents of a pint measure, and this I know by experiment to be true;"—these are the accountant's words, so let him bear the responsibility—"then let the pint be doubled in the seventeenth square, and so on progressively. In the twentieth square it will become a waybah (peck), the waybahs will then become an irdabb (bushel), and in the fortieth square we shall have one hundred and seventy-four thousand seven hundred and sixty-two irdabbs. Let us suppose this to be the contents of corn-store, and no corn-store contains more than that; then, in the fiftieth square we shall have the contents of one thousand and twenty-four stores; suppose these to be situated in one—city and no city can have more than that number of stores—we shall then find that the sixty-fourth and last square gives sixteen thousand three hundred and eighty-four cities<sup>2</sup>. Now, you know there is not in the world a greater number of cities than that, for geometry informs us that the circumference of the earth is eight thousand parasangs<sup>3</sup>; so that, if the end of a cord were laid

---

<sup>1</sup> If the passage here placed between crotchets be not an interpolation, the author has been led into a contradiction by his forgetting to compare the additional notes which he inserted in the margin of his work with what he had already written. It may be here mentioned that nothing positive is known of Şişşah, Shihrām, and Balhayt.

---

1 This is perfectly exact.

2 These sums are exact,

3 The reasoning which follows is so inconclusive, that we must suppose our author to have misunderstood what was said, part of the earth, and the cord passed round it till both ends met, we should find the length of the cord to be twenty-four thousand miles, which is equal to eight thousand parasangs. The truth of this is positive and indubitable." Were I not apprehensive of extending this article to too great a length and being led away from my subject, I should render this evident, but, in my notice on the sons of Mūsā, I shall touch again on the subject<sup>1</sup>. You know also that the inhabited portion of the earth forms about one quarter of its surface. These observations have caused us to digress, but as they convey some useful information and a curious piece of reckoning, I decided on inserting them so that they might come under the notice of such persons as treat with incredulity the result obtained by doubling the squares of the chess-board, and oblige them to acknowledge its exactitude; the demonstration here given clearly proves the truth of what has been said on the subject. Let us return to al-Ṣūlī. Al-Mas'ūdī relates, in his Murūj al-Dihāb, that the imām al-Rāḍī bi-Allāh went to a delightful garden filled with flowers, at one of his country-seats, and asked the boon-companions who accompanied him if they ever saw a finer sight. They all began to extol it and describe its beauties, declaring that it surpassed every garden in the world: on which al-Rāḍī said: "Al-Ṣūlī's manner of playing chess is yet a finer sight and surpasses all you could describe." It is related that when al-Muktafī (bi-Allāh) first heard of al-Ṣūlī's extraordinary talent in that game, he had already taken into his favour a chess-player named al-Māwardī, whose manner of playing had excited his admiration. When al-Ṣūlī and al-Māwardī were brought together and set to play in the presence of al-Muktafī, that khalīf, yielded to his partiality for the latter, and, led away by the friendly feelings which a long acquaintance had established between them, he prompted him and encouraged him so openly that al-Ṣūlī felt at first embarrassed and confused. However, as the game went on, he recovered his self-possession and

1 The life of Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn Shākir will be found in (No. 681); but it does not contain the slightest allusion to the Arithmetical problem of the chess-board.*

* M. de Slane seems to have misunderstood the words of Ibn Khallikān. He meant the measurement of the sphere of the earth; which he has dealt in the life of Ibn Mūsā.---Ed.

vanquished his adversary so completely that no one could gainsay it. Al-Muktafī being then convinced of his talent, lost all his partiality for al-Māwardī and said to him ; "Your mā-ward (rose water) is turned into urine." Innumerable anecdotes are told of al-Šūlī and his adventures ; yet, with all his talent, his acknowledged learning, humour, and elegant taste, he met with a depreciator in Abū Sa'īd al-'Uqaylī, who attacked him, but not severely, in a satire : al-Šūlī had a room filled with works compiled by himself and all in differently-coloured bindings ; these he used to call the fruits of his studies<sup>1</sup>, and, when he had occasion to refer to any of them, he would tell his boy to bring him such and such a book. This led Abū Sa'īd to compose the following lines :

"Of all men, al-Šūlī possesses the most learning—in his library. If we ask him for an explanation on a point of science, he answers : 'Boys ! bring here such and such a packet of science<sup>2</sup>.' "

Al-Šūlī died at Baṣrah, A.H. 335 (A.C. 946-7), or 336 ; he had sought concealment there to avoid the active search which people of all ranks were making after him with the intention of putting him to death. The crime imputed to him was his publishing a certain Tradition relative to (the rights of) 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib. Some time previously, he had been obliged, by straitened circumstances, to leave Baghdād. We have already spoken of the word Šūlī in the life of Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Šūlī (No. 10), the uncle of Abū Bakr's father. Šiṣṣah is to be pronounced with an i followed by a double ṣ. Dāhir is pronounced with an i in the second syllable. Ardashīr is thus spelled by al-Dāraqutnī ; another author says that it is a Persian word signifying flour and milk ; ard means flour, and shīr, milk. Some say that Ardashīr means flour and sweetness<sup>3</sup>, and others state that it should be written Azdashīr. It was this prince who overthrew the provincial kings (Mulūk al-Ṭawā'if) and formed, out of their empires, a kingdom for himself. He was the ancestor of that Persian dynasty which ended in Yazdajird (Yezdegird) and was overthrown in the thirty-second year of the 1 Literally : his hearing ; that is, what he learned at his master's lectures.

2 The grammatical construction of this last verse is incorrect : for العلم we should read العلم.

3 These derivations, which have been already given (No. 238), are to ofutile to merit attention.

Hijrah, in the kh ulfate of 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān. Their history is well known. This dynasty must not be confounded with the first series of the Persian kings which terminated in Dārā (Darius), the son of Dārā, him who was slain by Alexander. This conqueror established provincial kings throughout the country, and he gave them this name because each of them had a different people under his rule; previously to this, these states belonged to a single man. Ardashīr was one of the provincial kings, but he succeeded in subduing the others and establishing the empire in its primitive unity. The country had remained under the provincial kings during four hundred years. The last Persian dynasty subsisted for the same period. I am unable to fix with certainty the orthography of Balhayt, the name of the king of India, but I found it thus written by the copyist of the book which I consulted. It may or it may not be correct.

623 AL-ḤĀTIMĪ

Abū 'Alī Muḥammed Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Muẓaffar, surnamed al-Ḥātimī, a native of Baghdād, a kātib and a philologist, was one of the most eminent among those illustrious men who had attained celebrity by their extensive information and numerous productions. He studied the belles-lettres under Abū 'Umar al-Zāhid (No. 612), and dictated historical information on his authority at literary assemblies. He gave also some pieces on the authority of other masters. The qāḍī Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī (No. 531) and a number of other highly-talented men transmitted down information received from him. Al-Ḥātimī composed an epistle called al-Risālat al-Ḥātimīyah, in which he relates his interview with al-Mutanabbī (No. 49), and the manner in which he exposed, on that occasion, the plagiarisms and defects which occur in that poet's compositions. This treatise is a proof of the extensive acquirements and vast information possessed by its author. In commencing, he explains the motive which led him to (write it), and he then says: "When Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Mutanabbī arrived at Madīnat al-Salām (Baghdād), on his return from Egypt, with the project of fixing his abode at the court of the Wazīr Abū Muḥammad al-Muhallabī (No. 170), he folded himself up in the cloak of pride and swept along with the train of ostentation, whilst his haughty mien and lofty gait displayed his arrogance and vain presumption<sup>1</sup>; from every person whom he met he turned away in disdain, and spoke of none but with insidious calumnies. Deluded by self-admiration he imagined that all literary talent pertained to him alone; he thought that poetry was an ocean to whose pure waters none but himself had a right to approach, and a garden whose blooming flowers he alone was entitled to gather; and whose nosegays were to be called by him alone, to the exclusion of all others. It is easy for any man to strut about when in solitude<sup>2</sup>, but every reputation requires a foundation to support it. For a length of time, he continued to run in this path, and I allowed his insolence to roam even to the full extent of its tether; he strode about in his vanity, thinking that he was the unrivalled courser of the hippodrome, the steed which never yet had found another to run with it neck and neck, the sole master of the language, the only deflowerer of virgin phrases, the sovereign lord of eloquence in prose and verse, the unequalled hero of the age in talent and in learning! His heavy tread bore down many of those who distinguished themselves by the insignia of the belles-lettres, whilst he forced out from the soil of literature springs of the sweetest water. Some hung down their heads before him, others drooped the wing, testifying by their looks humble submission. But Mu'izz al-Dawlah Aḥmad Ibn Buwayh—I have already traced his history (No. 71)—"saw with displeasure that his capital, the abode of the khalifate, the seat of glory, the pearl of the empire, should be visited by a man who had just left the court of Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān." I have also spoken of this prince (No. 456)—"the open enemy of Mu'izz al-Dawlah, and that he should not find in his kingdom a person able to compete with the new comer in his art. For that monarch had a lofty soul, an imperial resolution, and a will which, if directed towards the conduct held by fortune, would have prevented her vicissitudes from

1 The arrogance and extravagant vanity of al-Ḥātimī are fully displayed in the long declamation which follows.

2 The writer means to say that, if the man who presumes on his talents mingles with the world he will quickly find rival or a superior.

sporting with worthy men and her changes from revolving over them. As for the wazīr al-Muhallabī, he was led by mere supposition to imagine that none could cope with al-Mutanabbī, that he himself could not equal him nor attain to the height of any of his thoughts, much less lift the burden of talent which the poet bore so lightly. Great men have various ways of exalting, extolling, and honouring those whom they think fit; but their sentiments sometimes alter, and then they promptly abandon their former line of conduct. This was the case with the Wazīr al-Muhallabī in the change which his opinion underwent respecting the man whom he patronised; for, in reality, Abu 'l-Ṭayyib had no other merit to distinguish him from the vulgar herd of literary men (not to speak of the noble leaders of the flock), but a talent for poetry. Herein, I avow, his various productions were brilliant, and the flowers he culled were full of sweetness. I therefore undertook to seek out his faults, cut off his nails, publish his secrets, disclose to view what he kept folded up, and put to the test the negligences of his compositions, till such time as the palace of some distinguished man should unite us, so that I and he might race in the same hippodrome and make known who was the vanquisher, who the vanquished, who reached the goal, and who was distanced. I then possessed a talent copious as the rain-cloud, a mind which, in all accomplishments, flashed forth a sparkling radiance, and a genius like the pure wine which is crowned with bubbles and betrays the secret of the liquor contained in the goblet. Besides this, the lake of my youth was translucent and its raiment ample, the stuff of my life was glossy, its zephyrs mild, and its clouds dropping genial rain. But my youth, ardent though it was, had to await the harbinger of a fitting time; for horses run not on the day of trial by means of their nerves and strength, but by the impulse of their riders. However, each man obtains in his day a moment wherein he may fully accomplish his wishes, and, though great his expectations, the path to their fulfilment opens wide. At length, a succession of days withdrew from before the time of our meeting, and I set out for his dwelling-place, having underneath me a quick-paced, hawk-eyed mule, its head towering as if borne on the wings of an eagle. It was really a magnificent conveyance, and I seemed like a blazing star mounted on a cloud conducted by the south wind; whilst before me a number of handsome pages, some free-born, some slaves, ran in succession, as pearls run off the string. I mention this, not through ostentation and boasting, but because Abu 'l-Ṭayyib himself saw it all; its beauty did not, however, excite his admiration, neither did its splendour attract his attention; that brilliant troop, which, as I suspect, filled his eyes and heart (with wonder), served only to increase his self-love and make him turn his face away from me. He had opened a shop (school) in that place and uttered his literary wares to some youths who had never received a learned education, nor whetted their talents in debate<sup>1</sup>, nor trained their minds by study of literature; unable to distinguish between the beauties of language and its faults, between its facilities and its difficulties; their utmost talent consisting in being able to read the poems of Abū Tammām, to discourse on some of his ideas, and to cite some of the readings which the editors of his works had written down as authorised. I found there a company of young men, learning from al-Mutanabbī passages of his poetry; but, when my arrival was announced and permission asked for me to enter, he sprang up from his seat and hastened to hide from my sight. I had however anticipated his departure by dismounting from my mule, and he saw me full well, for I had ridden up to a spot where his eyes could not fail to light upon me. On entering the assembly, I was received with profound respect by all, and seated in al-Mutanabbī's own place. I then perceived that his seat was covered with an old cloak which, through the injuries of time, had become a tattered remnant, a collection of loose threads. I had scarcely time to sit down, when he entered; I rose and saluted him politely, not withholding a salutation which he did not really deserve: for he had left his place to avoid rising up on my entrance. When I saw him, I applied to myself the words of the poet:

'It was a disgrace for me to visit thee, but my desire to see thee prevented my retreat.'

'And he (might well have) applied to his own case these words of another poet:

<sup>1</sup> Literally: He had established a market with some youth, whom learned men had not educated and who had not been ground down on the mill-stone of adversaries.

'Some men render others as wretched as themselves ; and God permits that some make others happy. Man obtains not his subsistence by superior cunning; wealth and subsistence are portions (distributed by fate). 'Tis thus the skilful archer sometimes misses the deer, and one who is no archer strikes it.'

'And behold ! he had put on seven vests, each of a different colour ; and yet we were in the burning heat of summer, and the day was warm enough to melt the contents of the skull. I sat down, ready to rise up if necessary ; he sat down in a kneeling posture and averted his head, as if he saw me not. I then turned from him negligently, reproaching myself with my folly in coming to see him, and the trouble I had taken in setting out to meet him. He remained for some time, his face averted and not deigning to lend me a glance of his eye, whilst every one of the band assembled before him was making signs to him and pointing towards me, endeavouring to arouse him from his torpor and rudeness. Their efforts served only to augment his indifference, insolence, and pride ; but he at length thought proper to turn towards me and show me a certain degree of politeness ; and I declare upon my honour, and that is the best of oaths, that the only words he said were ; 'How are you ?' I replied : 'Well ; were it not for the wrong I did myself in coming to see you, the degradation which my dignity has incurred in making you this visit, and the determination which led me reluctantly to one like you who has never profited by the lessons of experience and prudence.' I then fell upon him as the torrent falls on the depths of the valley : 'Tell me,' said I, 'whence come your pride and presumption, your self-conceit and haughtiness ? What motive have you to aspire to a height which you can never attain ? Have you ancestry to ennoble you ; honour to exalt you ; a sultān to patronise you, or learning to distinguish you ? Had you judged rightly of your own worth, had you weighed your merits in a just balance, vanity would never have seduced you, and you would have remained what you always were, a mere poet, rhyming for a livelihood.'

1 In Arabic Aysh khabarak. It is remarkable that the vulgar form aysh, for ayyu shay'in, was in use at that early period. Al-Hātimī seems to have been struck with the singularity of such an expression coming from the mouth of al-Mutanabbī.

At this invective, his colour changed, his respiration became embarrassed, and he commenced making humble excuses, and asked for pardon, swearing repeatedly that he had not recognised me, and that it was not his intention to insult me. I replied: Nay, sir! if your visitor be a man nobly born, you appear ignorant of his descent; if an accomplished scholar, you seem not to perceive his learning; and if a favourite of the sultān, you refuse him the place of honour! Are you then the sole heir of all glory? No, by Allāh! but you have taken pride as a veil to hide your inferiority, and have made it an antechamber, that you may avoid being questioned! He again uttered excuses, but I only made answer: 'All your entreaties are of no avail.' The assembly then began to request me to spare him and accept his excuses, and to show that moderation which offended dignity employs in its own defence; but I still continued to reprimand him and reproach him with his despicable character, whilst he persisted in swearing that he had not recognised me in time to do me fitting honour. 'Did I not send in to you', said I, 'my name and surname when I applied for permission to enter? If you recognised me not there were persons in this assembly who did; and even were the case as you say, did you not remark my aspect? did you not scent the odour of my superiority? did you not feel that I was a man apart?' Whilst I was thus filling his ears with invectives, he continued to exclaim: 'Be calm! moderate your passion! restrain your impetuousity! have patience! patience is the characteristic of persons so respectable as you.' I, at length, resumed my affability and softened towards him, regretting to have passed the bounds in reprimanding him; but I had already broken him in as you would tame a young and restive camel. He then began to extol my merits and praise me, swearing that, since his arrival in 'Irāq, he had ardently longed to see me, and was always promising to himself the satisfaction of meeting me and gaining my friendship. He had just ended his declarations, when a young student from Kūfah, a descendant of 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib, requested permission to enter: he ordered him to be introduced, and in came a boy of an active form, moving with all the grace and vivacity of youth, who explained the object of his visit with a gentle voice, a sweet tongue, a gay humour, a ready answer, a smiling mouth, the gravity and dignity of old age. I was struck at the aspect of such endowments and captivated by the talents he displayed. Al-Mutanabbî then made him repeat some verses." Here the author commences the relation of his discourse with al-Mutanabbî relative to the plagiarisms and faults in that poet's compositions. The preceding extract is very long, but the passages were so closely connected that it was impossible to make suppressions. The epistle itself contains a mass of information<sup>1</sup>, and if, as the author states, he pointed out to the poet, in one sitting, all the faults he there mentions, such a feat must be considered as a proof of prodigious information. He entitled this work al-Mūdiḥah (the exposé); it is of a considerable size, filling, as it does, thirteen quires (two hundred and sixty pages), and it serves as a testimony of the eminent talent possessed by the author, of his presence of mind, and of the readiness with which he adduced his numerous proofs. The Ḥilyat al-Muḥāḍarah (ornaments of conversation), another work of his, forms two volumes and contains a great quantity of literary matter. He died on Wednesday, the 26th of the latter Rabi' A.H. 388 (April, A.C. 998).* He received the surname of al-Ḥātimī because one of his ancestors bore the name of Ḥātim<sup>2</sup>.

624 IBN AL-QŪṬIYYAH

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Isā Ibn Muzāḥim, generally known by the name of Ibn al-Qūṭiyyah (son of the Gothic woman), was born in Cordova and resided in that city, but his family belonged to Seville. In the latter place he received lessons from Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh

---

1 An extract from this epistle is given in the notice on al-Mutanabbî, and his writings, which has been cited in No. 49, note, of this work.

2 The author repeats here, and I suppress the same anecdote which he has already given in the life of Abū 'Umar al-Zāhid. See No. 612.

* 27 April.—Ed.

Ibn al-Qūq<sup>1</sup>, Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Zubaydī<sup>2</sup>, Sa'īd Ibn Jābir<sup>3</sup>, and other masters ; in Cordova he studied under Ṭāhir Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz<sup>4</sup>, Ibn Abi 'l-Walīd al-A'raj, Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn Muḡhith, and others. He was one of the ablest philologers and grammarians of the age, and possessed extensive information in the Traditions, jurisprudence, and history ; he also knew by heart a fund of curious anecdotes, and, by the quantity of poetical pieces which he transmitted down and of historical facts which he discovered, he outstripped every competitor. In the history of Spain he displayed the highest acquirements, and he passed much of his time in dictating from memory the biography of the amīrs, jurisconsults, and poets who flourished in that country. The works which treat on philology formed the principal subject of his lectures, and their contents were taken down under his dictation ; but, in transmitting Traditions and maxims of jurisprudence, he was by no means correct, not having the original works to refer to. It therefore resulted that the texts which he delivered were appreciated for their meaning only, not for their literal accuracy, and it frequently happened that, under his tuition, students read over works the contents of which, as far as implies correctness, he could not repeat from memory<sup>5</sup>. He lived to an advanced age and gave lessons to successive generations ; shaykhs and old men cited passages which they had learned from him, and, as he himself had

1 Al-Maqqarī, MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale, ancien fonds, No. 704, fol. 205, notices on 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Kh-Haqq al-awlānī, surnamed Ibn al-Qūq, who died A.H. 318 (A.C. 930). This may perhaps be the person whom Ibn Khallikān meant. According to al-Maqqarī, Ibn al-Qūq was a native of Seville ; he studied at Cordova and proceeded to Makkah in A.H. 266 (A.C. 879-80). He took lessons in that city and became an eminent jurisconsult of the Ḥanafite sect (faqih fi 'l-rayl). He drew up bonds with great ability and bore the reputation of a pious Muslim and a trustworthy traditionist.

2 Al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Madhḥij al-Zubaydī died towards A.H. 320 (A.C. 932).—(Bughyah).

3 Sa'īd Ibn Jābir Ibn Mūsā al-Kilā'i, a native of Seville, died A.H. 326 (A.C. 937-8).—(Bughyah).

4 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ṭāhir Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz al-Ruwaynī, a native of Cordova, a traditionist, and a philologer of eminent abilities, died A.H. 304 (A.C. 916-7). (Bughyah).

5 A good professor never taught a work the contents of which he had not already got by heart.

met and conversed with all the eminent masters of that epoch who lived in Spain, he transmitted down a great quantity of instructive observations which they had communicated to him. Amongst the useful works composed by him on the Arabic language may be noticed the Kitāb Taṣārīf il-Af'āl (on the conjugation of verbs); this was the first treatise ever composed on the subject, that of Ibn al-Qaṭṭā' (No. 422) having been drawn up in imitation of it. His treatise on the words which terminate in a long or in a short alif, contains an immense quantity of information, and surpasses all the imitations of later writers as much as it surpassed all the former productions on the same subject<sup>1</sup>. When Abū 'Alī 'l-Qālī (No. 92) went to Spain, he frequented the society of Ibn al-Qūṭīyyah and always spoke of his talents in the highest terms : being asked by the reigning sovereign of Spain, al-Ḥakam, the son of al-Nāṣir li-Din Allāh 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who was the ablest philologist whom he had met in that country ? he replied : "Muḥammad Ibn al-Qūṭīyyah". The eminent abilities of Ibn al-Qūṭīyyah were accompanied by a spirit of profound piety and an assiduous attachment to the practices of devotion ; he displayed also considerable talent as a poet, but he afterwards renounced that occupation, although his poetical compositions were remarkable for correctness of style, perspicuity of thought, the beauty of the exordiums and grace of the transitions. The accomplished scholar and poet Abū Bakr Yaḥya Ibn Hudḥayl al-Tamīmī<sup>2</sup> relates that as he was going, one day, to a country-house which he had at the foot of the Cordova mountain, in one of the most delightful spots on earth, he met Ibn al-Qūṭīyyah returning from a country-seat which he possessed in the same neighbourhood. "On seeing me," said Ibn Hudḥayl, "he reined his horse over to me

---

1 The MS. of the Bibliothèque impériale, ancien fonds (No. 706). contains two curious works on the conquest of Spain by the Muslims and the history of that country under the Arabian governors and first Marwānid amīrs. One of these works bears Ibn al-Qūṭīyyah's name as the author ; the other is anonymous. For the character of Ibn al-Qūṭīyyah's work see Mr. Dozy's al-Bayān al-Maghīb, Introduction, p. 28.

2 Abū Bakr Yaḥyā Ibn Hudḥayl an accomplished scholar and a poet of great reputation, died A.H. 385 (A.C. 995), or 386, aged eighty-six years. (Bughyah).

and expressed great pleasure at our meeting. I then, in a sportive mood, recited extempore this verse :

'Whence comest thou, incomparable man? thou who art the sun and whose sphere is the world !'

On hearing these words, he smiled and answered with great promptitude ;

'I come from an abode where the devotee can enjoy solitude, and where sinners may transgress in secret.'

I was so highly delighted with his reply, that I could not forbear kissing his hand and praising him, and invoking God's blessing on him ; he was moreover my old master, and therefore deserved these marks of respect." Abū Bakr Ibn al-Qūṭiyyah died at Cordova on Tuesday, the 23rd of the first Rabi' A.H. 367 (November, A.C. 977)* ; he was interred the following day in the Quraysh cemetery, at the hour of the evening prayer. Some persons place his death in the month of Rajab of the year just mentioned, but the former date is more correct. Qūṭiyyah (the Gothic woman) is derived from Qūṭ (Goth) ; this Qūṭ was the son of Hām, the son of Noah, and from him the Sūdān (the negroes), the Indians, and the natives of Sind draw their origin. Al-Qūṭiyyah was the mother of Ibrāhīm, the son of 'Isā Ibn Muzāhīm, this Abū Bakr's ancestor, and the daughter of Ubbah (Oppas), the son of Ghūṭiṣhah (Witiza). Her father was king of Spain, and from him it was and from his brothers, Arṭabās, (Ardabast), count of Spain<sup>1</sup>, and Sīdah that Ṭāriq Ibn Nuṣayr<sup>2</sup>, at the head of the Muslims, took the cities of Spain. Al-Qūṭiyyah went to (the khalif) Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik to complain of the injustice with which she had been treated by her uncle Arṭabās, and, when in Syria, she married 'Isā Ibn Muzāhīm, a mawlā of the Umayyad (khalif) 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz. Her husband, Ibn

1 Mariana says that Ardebast, count of Spain, was a Greek refugee.

2 Ibn Khallikān probably meant to write Ṭāriq, the mawlā of Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr.

* 6 November.—Ed.

† The Egyptian edition adds Mawlā Mūsā (enfranchised slave of Mūsā) after Ṭāriq.—Ed.

Muzāhim, accompanied her back to Spain, and his descendants continued to inhabit that country. She returned with a letter of recommendation addressed by Hishām to (Abu) 'l-Khaṭṭār<sup>1</sup> al-Sha'bi al-Kalbī, the chief to whom he had entrusted the Government of Spain. (Abu) 'l-Khaṭṭār put a stop to the persecutions which she suffered from her uncle, rendered full justice to all her claims against him, and treated her with marked respect. She lived to an advanced age and saw the vicissitudes of fortune establish the Umayyad prince, the amīr 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, surnamed al-Dākhlil (the enterer, the new comer), on the throne of Spain. She some times went to see him, and he granted whatever requests she had to make<sup>2</sup>. Her posterity have continued to bear the name of the Sons of the Gothic woman, even to the present day. Such is the statement made by Abū Bakr al-Qubbashī in his enlarged and embellished extract from the jurisconsult Abū 'Umār Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Afīf al-Tārikhī's<sup>3</sup> work, entitled, Kitāb al-Iḥṭifāl fī A'lām il-Rijāl (the careful remembrancer of eminent men), which is a compilation of notices on the jurisconsults and learned men of Cordova who flourished in latter time. Abū Bakr al-Qubbashī, whose full names were Abū Bakr al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mufarrij Ibn 'Abd Allāh Mufarrij, a member of the tribe of al-Ma'āfir and a native of Cordova, transmitted down al-Tārikhī's work from memory.<sup>1</sup> Abū Muḥammad Ibn al-Rushāṭī (No. 327) says, in his Ansāb, that 'Ayn Qubbashī, a spring of water in the western suburb of Cordova, gave the title of al-Qubbashī to Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Mufarrij al-Ma'āfirī al-Qubbashī, who died on the eve of Friday, the 5th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 371 (March, A.C. 982)*. I may here observe that this person was the father of the Abū Bakr al-Ḥasan just mentioned.

1 In place of al-Khaṭṭār (الخطار) the MSS. read al-Khaṭṭāb (الخطاب). This error seems to have originated with Ibn Kḥallikān or his copyist. Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār al-Kalbī was the nineteenth governor of Spain.

2 See al-Maqqarī, in Gayangos's translation, vol. II, p. 50.

3 Abū 'Umar Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Afīf, a native of Cordova, was distinguished for his learning, profound piety, and skill in drawing up bonds and contracts. He is the author of a work in five volumes destined as a guide to students (fī adab al-muta'allimīn) and a history of jurisconsults, occasionally cited by Ibn Bashkuwāl. Having removed from Cordova to Almeria, he was appointed qāḍī of Lorca, and died there, A.H. 420 (A.C. 1029), in the month of the second Rabi'. (Ibn Bashkuwāl's Ṣīlat.) The author of the Bughyah mentions an Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Tārikhī, probably the same person as the above, and informs us that he composed a number of works on the history of Maḡrib, and wrote a large volume in which he described the roads, harbours, and cities of Spain, the six junds, or military divisions of that empire, etc.

625 ABŪ BAKR AL-ZUBAYDĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Maḍḥij Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bishr al-Zubaydī, a native of Seville and a resident of Cordova, was the ablest grammarian and the most learned philologist of the age. He surpassed all his Spanish contemporaries by his knowledge of syntax, rhetoric, and curious anecdotes; besides which, he was well versed in biography and history. The works which he left us are a proof of his extensive learning, and, amongst them, we may notice his abridgment of the 'Ayn (No. 208), and his classified list (ḵabaqāt) of grammarians and philologists who flourished either in the East or in Spain, from the time of Abu 'l-Aswad al-Duwalī (No. 285) to that of his own master, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Riyāḥī the grammarian. He composed also a refutation of the doctrines held by Ibn Masarraḥ<sup>2</sup> and his followers; this work he entitled: Ḥaṭṭ Sutūr al-Muḥidīn (the impious unmasked). His other works are: a treatise on the incorrect phraseology of the vulgar; the Wāḍiḥ. (plain treatise), a highly instructive work on grammar; and a treatise on the grammatical forms, which has never been surpassed. (The Umayyad prince) al-Ḥakam al-Mustanşir bi-Allāh, lord of Spain, confided his son and publicly declared successor, Hishām al-Muwayyad bi-Allāh, to the tuition of al-Zubaydī; and the young prince not only learned arithmetic and grammar under this preceptor, but acquired a great stock of other information. To the favour of his pupil, al-Zubaydī was indebted for his large fortune, his appointment to the place of qādī at Seville, and his nomination to command of the police-guards (shurṭah). The ample wealth which he accumulated was long enjoyed by his descendants. He used to extol in terms of the highest praise the abilities and intelligence of his young pupil, al-Muwayyad, declaring that, amongst all the boys of the imperial family and the sons of the grandees, he never conversed with one more acute, more quick of comprehension, more sagacious, or more prudent. He related of him also a number of extraordinary anecdotes. Al-Zubaydī composed a great quantity of poetry, and, in one of his pieces, directed against Abū Muslim Ibn Fihri<sup>1</sup>, he says :

1 Abū Bakr al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mufarrij al-Ma'āfirī al-Qubbashī, a native of Cordova and a learned traditionist, the author of the Iḥṭifal, or history of the ḵhalīfs, jurisconsults, and qāḍīs mentioned here by Ibn Ḵhallikān, died somewhat later than A.H. 430 (A.C. 1039). (Ibn Bashkuwāl's Sīlar).

2 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Masarraḥ al-Jalālī was a native of Cordova. His application to the doctrines of the sūfīs and his studies in some philosophical works attributed to Empedocles induced him to admit and to teach privately the doctrine of pantheism. His works were publicly burned in Seville under the reign of 'Abd al-Raḥmān II. He died in the month of Ṣhawwāl A.H. 319 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 931) at the age of fifty years. Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥukamā; Dozy's Historie des musulmans d'Espagne, t III, p. 19).

* 4 March.—Ed.

"Abū Muslim ! a man must be judged from his intelligence and discourse, not from his equipage and dress. A man's clothing is not worth a straw, if he possesses a narrow mind. It is not long sittings in the professor's chair, my good Abū Muslim! which can procure learning, wisdom, and intelligence."

When employed in the service of al-Ḥakam al-Mustanşir, he ardently longed to see a slave-girl whom he had left at Seville, and, being unable to obtain the permission of going to visit his beloved concubine, he wrote to her these lines :

"Alas, my dear Salmā ! take it not to heart ! separation must be endured with fortitude. Think not that I bear your absence with patience, unless it be with the patience of the dying man. God hath not created a torture more excruciating than the moment of adieu. Death and separation appear to me the same, except that the former is accompanied by the wailing of the funeral mourners. Promptly severed as we were, though once closely united, reflect that every meeting leads to a departure. that the boughs divide into branches, that proximity tends to remoteness, and union to separation."

1 In the Bughyah, this name is written Fahd.

He frequently recited the following lines :

"To be poor in one's native country is like living in a foreign land ; a foreign land with wealth is home ; the earth is all the same ; mankind are brothers and neighbours."

When Abū 'Alī al-Qālī (No. 92) arrived in Spain, al-Zubaydi took notes at his literary and philological lectures ; he studied also under Qāsim Ibn Aṣḥab<sup>1</sup>, Sa'id Ibn Faḥlūn<sup>2</sup>, and Aḥmad Ibn Sa'id Ibn Ḥazm<sup>3</sup>. His family belonged to the military division of Syria called the Jund of Emessa. He died at Seville on Thursday, the 1st of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 379 (September, A.C. 989)*. He was interred the same day, after the celebration of the afternoon prayer, and the funeral service was said over him by his son Aḥmad. He lived to the age of sixty-three years. Madḥij in its primitive acceptation, served to designate a red sand-hill in Yaman. Mālik, the son of Udud, was born on it and received the name of Madḥij for that reason. This word then got into such use among the Arabs as a proper name for men, that they ended by considering it as such and forgetting that it applied to this hill. Zubaydi means descended from Zubayd ; this was the surname of Munabbih

1 Abū Muḥammad Qāsim Ibn Aṣḥab<sup>h</sup> Ibn Muḥammad al-Bayyānī, an eminent ḥafīẓ, traditionist and genealogist, composed a great number of works, the titles of which, with the names of the persons under whom he studied, are given in the Bughyah on the authority of Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ḥazm. He bore a high reputation for learning and for his exactitude as a traditionist, and his Ansāb, or patronymics, is a most copious and an excellent work. His family belonged to Bayyānah (البينانه), but he himself resided in Cordova and died at an advanced age in that city, A.H. 340 (A.C. 951-2). (Bughyat al-Multamis Maqqari).

2 Abū 'Uṭṭmān Sa'id Ibn Faḥlūn (or Faḥl) Ibn Sa'id, learned Traditions at Cordova in A.H. 274 (A.C. 887-8) from Muḥammad Ibn Waḍḍāḥ ; he studied also under other masters, and was giving lessons himself in A.H. 341 (A.C. 952-3). (Bughyah).

3 Abū 'Umar Aḥmad Ibn Sa'id Ibn Ḥazm al-Ṣadafī al-Muntajilī (المنتجيلي) the author of a voluminous biographical work, died A.H. 350 (A.C. 961-2). (Bughyah).

* 5 September.—Ed.

the son of Ṣa'b, the son of Sa'd al-'Aṣḥirah (No. 49), the son of Maḍḥij, him who was called by the name of the hill. Zubayd is a large tribe established in Yaman, and has produced a great number of remarkable persons, some of them companions of Muḥammad.

626 ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-QAZZĀZ

The grammarian Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far al-Tamīmī (member of the tribe of Tamīm), surnamed al-Qazzāz, was a native of Qayrawān. He applied himself with ardour to the study of grammar and philology, and composed a number of works on various subjects. One of his productions, the Kitāb al-Jāmi' (collector), treats of philology and is a work of great extent and high repute. Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Širāfi (No. 425, note), the Egyptian Kātib, says that Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Qazzāz was employed in the service of al-'Azīz Ibn al-Mu'izz al-'Ubaydī, the sovereign of Egypt, and that he composed some works at the desire of his master. According to another statement, al-'Azīz Ibn al-Mu'izz ordered him to compose and draw up in alphabetical order a work containing all the words of that third class which is indicated in the well-known grammatical definition: 'The parts of speech are: the noun, the verb, and the particle'. And Ibn al-Jazzār<sup>2</sup> observes that he does not know of any grammarian's having composed a work on a similar plan. In pursuance to the prince's commands, al-Qazzāz collected all the scattered information contained in the most esteemed treatises on this subject, and arranged it in a clear, simple, and easy order. He thus formed a volume of two thousand pages. The preceding indications are taken from the amīr al-Mukḥtār al-Musabbihī's (No. 627) Greater History. In a work called Kitāb al-Ta'riḍ (book of allusions), he inserted the parables and allusions employed in common discourse. Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn Rashīq (No. 157) says in his Annuḍḥaj:

1 In Arabic, the words particle and letter are called ḥarf. To distinguish them, the former is called the ḥarf employed to modify the sense (jā'u li ma'nā). Prepositions, conjunctions, etc., are ḥarfs.

2 It is possible that this may be Ibn al-Jazzār mentioned in No. 97, note.

"Al-Qazzāz brought the ancient writers to shame and reduced the modern authors to silence ; respected by the princes, the men of learning and the men of rank, he was beloved by the people. He rarely engaged in conversation unless to speak of the religious or the profane sciences ; he had a great command of language<sup>1</sup> and composed equally well in the natural and the artificial styles of poetry. He sometimes pronounced his verses to enliven conversation without seeming to care about them ; and he attained with great ease, and in a gentle quiet way, the highest point to which persons having a talent for poetry can aspire ; namely, novelty of thought and force of expression. Versed in all the forms of rhetoric, he was equally well skilled in the art of poetry. As specimens of the pieces to which we allude, we may here insert the following :

"I swear by the place which thy beloved image holds in my heart, by the lasting sway of love over my bosom, that if my wish were granted to dispose of thy person at my will, I should treasure thee up in the pupil of my eye and shelter thee under the curtains of my eyelids ! Then I should enjoy my utmost wishes, and fear no longer for thy character the danger of unjust suspicions ; suspicions which daily force my soul to taste the goblet of death. When the hearts of other men are at peace, mine fears for thee the secret glances of the evil eye ; and why should I not fear for thee who art my world : nay, God's vengeance alone prevents me saying : who art my divinity !*

"Love me in secret and let thy thoughts alone inform me of my happiness. Sure of thy affection, I care not for the lot which may await me.*"

"Who will console the travellers whom fortune has separated, and who now proceed, some to the Far East and some to the distant West<sup>2</sup>. Fate seemed to have dreaded meeting with its fate, had it kept them together ; and it, therefore, dispersed them throughout the world.'*

---

1 Or, as the Arabic may also signify : He kept a strict command over his tongue.

2 Literally : to Najd and Tiahāmah (نجد و تيهام) a frequent expression with the poets.

* 'Another piece by him' is omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

'In Abū Rabi'ah we find a meadow (rabi'ah) where our hopes may roam unconfined ; he always remembers his promises, and he forgets the favours he bestows.'*

'Since you know that you are the light of my eye, and that I see nothing if I see not you, why have you withdrawn from my sight? Then indeed every object but thyself is hidden from my view.' "

After giving many other pieces by the same author, Ibn Rashīq adds : "Some of the poems by Abū 'Abd Allāh" (meaning al-Qazzāz) "are yet finer than those I have quoted ; but I could not recall them to memory, and besides, I made it a rule, in composing this book, to limit the number of poetical citations. He died at al-Ḥaḍrah, A.H. 412 (A.C. 1021-2), aged nearly seventy years." By al-Ḥaḍrah, he means Qayrawān, which was at that time the capital of the kingdom<sup>1</sup>. Qazzāz means a worker, or a dealer, in silk (qazz). A number of persons were known by this surname.

627 THE AMĪR AL-MUKHTĀR AL-MUSABBIḤĪ.

The amīr al Mukhtār 'Izz al-Mulk (the chosen, the glory of the empire) Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, generally known by the appellation of al-Musabbihī the kātib, drew his origin from a family of Ḥarrān, but Egypt was the place of his birth. This highly accomplished and learned scholar was the author of a celebrated history (of Egypt) and other works, all of them attesting (by their popularity) the eminent talents with which he was gifted. He always wore the military dress, and it was in the service of al-Ḥākim al-'Ubaydī, the son of al-'Azīz, sovereign of Egypt, that he rose to fortune. He mentions in his history, that he entered into al-Ḥākim's service in the year 398 (A.C. 1007-8), and that, after holding the governments of al-Qays and al-Bahnasā, in the province of al-Ša'id, he was appointed head of the Dīwān al-Tartīb.<sup>1</sup> The interviews and conferences which he had with al-Ḥākim are attested by his Greater History. He compiled about thirty works, and, in speaking of his History, he says: "This valuable work, the contents of which render all other treatises on the same subject unnecessary for the reader, offers him the history of Egypt, of its governors, amīrs, imāms, and khalifs, the description of its wonders, its edifices, its various productions which serve for food, a notice on the Nile, a history of the persons who settled in that country, brought down to the time in which the copy of this title-page was first written, the compositions of the poets, the biography of learned men, and an account of the sittings held by the qādīs, the magistrates (ḥākims), the mu'addils<sup>2</sup> the literary men, the amatory poets, etc." This work fills twenty-six thousand pages<sup>3</sup>. Another of his works, containing two thousand pages, bears the title of al-Tulwiḥ wa 'l-Taṣrīḥ (indirect and direct indication), and treats of the ideas occurring in poetry, and the other species of composition. His Kitāb al-Rāḥ wa al-Irtiyāḥ (repose and activity) fills three thousand pages; his kitāb al-Ḡharb wa 'l-Šarq (drowning and strangling), in which he mentions the persons who met with their death in either of these manners, four hundred pages; his Kitāb al-Ṭa'ām wa 'l-Adām (book of meats and sauces), two thousand pages; his Darak al-Buḡḡyah (the fulfilment of wishes), treating of religions and religious practices, seven thousand pages; his Qiṣaṣ al-Anbiyā (history of the prophets), three thousand pages; his Kitāb al-Mufaṭḥah wa 'l-Munākāḥah (liber initionis et congressus), treating de variis congressus modis, two thousand four hundred pages; his Kitāb al-Amṭilah li-Duwal al-Muqbilah (book of emblems for the kingdoms which are to come), a work founded on the stars and calculations, one thousand pages; his Qaḍāya 'l-Šābiyah* (Sabean judgements), on judicial astrology,

<sup>1</sup> Ḥaḍrah signifies presence, and therefore the metropolis, because the sovereign is there present. Ḥaḍratkum (your presence) is the equivalent of your majesty, your excellence and sir.

* 'Another piece by him' omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

1 I am inclined to believe that the Dīwān al-Tartīb was the same establishment as the Dīwān al-Rawātib, or military pay-office.

2 The mu'addil is the public officer who certifies the morality of such persons as appear before the qāḍī to give evidence. He is also called the muzakkī (purifier).

3 The author says; Thirteen thousand leaves (waraqah).

* The Egyptian edition has Šā'ibah (correct).—Ed.

six thousand pages ; his Jūnat al-Māshīṭah (comb case of the female hair-dresser) containing curious relations, pieces of poetry, and anecdotes never before repeated, which miscellany fills, three thousand pages ; his Kitāb al-Shajan wa 'l-Sakan (sadness and alleviation), containing the history of true lovers and their sufferings, five thousand pages ; and his Kitāb al-Suwāl wa 'l-Jawāb (book of questions and answers), six hundred pages. He composed also the Mukhtār al-Aghānī wa Ma'āniha (selections from the Kitāb al-Aghānī with an explanation of its verses)<sup>1</sup>, and other works. We possess some good poetry of his composition, and in one of his pieces, which is an elegy on the death of his concubine, he says :

"O let me take the path which leads to God ! my heart is broken, and affliction has exhausted my tears. Can I bear my loss with patience, now that my love sojourns in the tomb ? O how great, how poignant are my sorrows ! O that I had died before her, or that death had taken us off together !"

The celebrated scribe and book-copyist, Abū Muḥammad 'Ubayd. Allāh Ibn Abi 'l-Jaw', having accepted an invitation from al-Musabbiḥī, and gone to visit him, was addressed by his host in these extempore lines ;

"By lodging with me you have lodged joy in my heart, and it is ready to fly from excess of felicity. The science has showered (down on us, copious as) the rains of heaven ; were it not for thee, no rain had fallen to-day. Your presence has spread around a reviving perfume, and the darkness has been changed into light."

This Ibn Abi 'l-Jaw' was a poet, an accomplished scholar, a pleasing companion and universally agreeable. He composed a great quantity of epistolary, expostulatory, and satirical pieces. He copied books at the rate of fifty leaves (or one hundred pages) for a dīnār about ten shillings), and his writing was so extremely beautiful, that the specimens of it still in the hands of the public are in the highest request. He died A.H. 395 (A.C. 1004-5). Al-Musabbiḥī was born, as he himself informs us in his Greater His- tory, on Sunday the 10th of Rajab, A.H. 366 (March, A.C. 977).* He died in the month of the latter Rabi', A.H. 420 (April-May, A.C. 1029). His father died on Monday morning, the 9th of Sha'bān, A.H. 400 (March, A.C. 1010)†, at the age of ninety-three years, and the funeral prayer was said over him, in the Great Mosque of Old Cairo. He was interred in the (court of the) house where he resided. Al-Musabbiḥī lamented his death in the following lines :

<sup>1</sup> See No. 415.

"To deplore this misfortune (our) tears are not sufficiently abundant ; it repels resignation, and betrays the feelings we suppressed. A misfortune which slays our hearts within our bosoms, which casts us into restless affliction. O fate ! thou hast struck thy talons into my heart and covered it with wounds. O fate ! thou hast clothed me in a robe of sadness, since a person so dear to us has been laid in the tomb. Hadst thou accepted a ransom, I should have redeemed him for whose sake my bones are broken (with grief) whilst his are mouldering into dust. O thou who seest me overcome by an event so unexpected, and blamest my weakness ! why dost thou blame me ? I have lost my father ! no orphanage is more painful than the loss of parents in our youth<sup>1</sup>. I used to grieve when death seemed to approach him, or when worldly cares took him by surprise."

A number of other poets whose names are mentioned in the Greater History, composed elegies on his death. Al-Sam'ānī says in his Ansāb : "Al-Musabbiḥī<sup>2</sup> means descended from an ancestor whose name was Musabbiḥ. This surname was borne by the author of the History of the Maghribīns and of Miṣr." The writer means the amīr of whom we have been just speaking.

---

1 Al-Musabbiḥī was not then so very young ; he had passed his thirty-third year, and probably did not feel so much as he pretends. The sentiments expressed in these verses are too artificial for real grief.

2 The surname of this historian is often incorrectly written al-Masīḥī; المسيحي for المديحي.

* 4 March.—Ed.

† 27 March.—Ed.

628 IBN ḤAMDŪN THE KĀTIB

Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Muḥammad Ibn Abi Sa'd al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ḥamdūn the kātib, surnamed Kāfi 'l-Kufāt (the most serviceable of assistants) Bahā al-Dīn (splendour of religion), was a native of Baghdād, highly distinguished for his talents and consummate abilities as a literary man and a kātib. He came of a family noted for producing men of influence and merit, as not only he, but his father and his brothers, Abū Naṣr and Abu 'l-Muẓaffar, occupied eminent posts in the service of the state. Having pursued his studies under Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il Ibn al-Faḍl al-Jurjānī and other masters, Abu 'l-Ma'ālī composed his Tadhkirah (remembrancer), an excellent compilation of historical notices, pieces of literature, anecdotes, and poems. Nothing like it has ever been produced by later writers, and, being a most useful work, it still retains its reputation and continues in the hands of the public. 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī mentions him in the Khariḍah, and says: "He was army-inspector under al-Muktafī (li amr Allāh), and intendant of the palace under al-Mustanjid; ardent for praise and eager for renown, he spread the shade of his protection over literary men; and gifted with talents and genius, he composed a work entitled the Tadhkirah, wherein he combined gaiety with seriousness, frivolity with knowledge. But the khalif al-Mustanjid having remarked in it some anecdotes, extracted, according to the author's account, from historical works, but which seemed allusions to the fallen state of the empire, he imagined that Abu 'l-Ma'ālī's object was to vilify the government, and he therefore took him from his seat of office and cast him into prison, where he remained in suffering till he died. This occurred at the beginning of the year 562 (November, A.C. 1166). He once recited to me the following piece of his composition, containing an enigmatical description of the linen fan<sup>1</sup>:

"Fast and loose, it cannot touch what it tries to reach;
though tied up, it moves swiftly, and though a prisoner, it is free.

1 The linen fan (mirwaḥat al-ḥaysh) is a large piece of linen stretched on a frame and suspended from the ceiling of the room. It is moistened with rose-water and set in motion by a cord. They make use of it in 'Irāq. See de Sacy's Hawiri, page 474.

Fixed in its place, it drives before it the gentle breeze ; though its path be closed up, it moves on in its nocturnal journey. It received from Solomon an inheritance<sup>1</sup>. It remains dry when the star Simāk (Spica Virginis) exerts its (cooling) influence (over the weather), but it sheds its moisture when the ardours of Orion return. Its salutation consists in one of the (four) elements, and for that reason every soul is its friend<sup>2</sup>".

'Imād al-Dīn gives also the following passages as his :

"May your glory never require augmentation ! May thy gifts never require pressing to be granted ! But yet I desire increase of fortune, though reason bids me to remain contented.

Little of head and of wit ! heavy in breath and in body ! you pretend to smell sweet like me ; sweet you smell, but it is of perfumes<sup>3</sup>."

Another writer says that he learned by heart a great quantity of Traditions. Ibn Ḥamdūn relates that he heard the imām (khalif) al-Mustanjid repeat the following verses, composed by Abū Ḥafṣ al-Shaṭranjī on a girl who had a cast in her eye :

"When tormented with love, I praised God for the obliquity of vision which rendered sidelong glances unnecessary ; I looked 1 This is an allusion to the 81st verse of the 21st sūrah of the Qur'ān: "And unto Solomon (we subjected) a strong wind which ran at his command." The next hemistich of Ibn Ḥamdūn's verse presents a double difficulty: the verb عربت may be read in various manners, and the allusion made by the poet is very obscure. From the opposition which exists between the ideas of 'Arab and Nabatean, I am inclined to read this doubtful verb as if it were pointed thus: عربت; the meaning of the hemistich would then be: and its materials i.e. the substance of which it is formed, have received an Arabic appearance, as the Nabateans have received one. We should then have an allusion to the proverbial expression: (قد استعرب النبط): the Nabatean may become like an Arab), and another allusion to the fact that the name of the material employed to make the fan is kattān (linen), an Arabic modification of the Persian word ketān. The text, however, is too uncertain, to justify any attempt at translation, and I therefore pass to the next verse.

2 Nafs, here translated soul, is the equivalent of the Latin anima. The author plays upon the double meaning of the word.

3 The word (لبن) appears, in this verse, to bear the meaning of لبان or لبنيل. (frankincense).

at her, and the spy who watched me thought that I looked at him<sup>1</sup> I thus felt secure from treachery<sup>2</sup>”.

This is certainly a novel and striking idea. Ibn Ḥamdūn was born A.H. 495 (A.C. 1101-2), and he died on Tuesday, the 11th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 562 (August, A.C. 1167)*. He was interred the next day, in the Quraysh Cemetery, at Baghdād. He died in prison. His brother, Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan, surnamed Ghars al-Dawlah (plant of the empire), an officer of the civil administration (āmīl), was esteemed a highly virtuous and holy man, and his society was much sought after. He was born in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 488 (Feb.-March, A.C. 1095), and he died at Baghdād in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 545 (March-April, A.C. 1151). He was interred in the Quraysh cemetery. Their father was a kātib of high rank, a skilful administrator and a good accountant. He composed a work on the nature of the different posts in the civil service (fi ma'ārifat al-A'māl), and lived to an advanced age. He died on Saturday, the 10th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 546 (August, A.C. 1151)†.

629 IBN QURAY'AH

The Qāḍī Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, a native of Baghdād and generally known by the surname of Ibn Quray'ah, filled the functions of his office in al-Sindiyaḥ and other places in the province of Baghdād, by the appointment of the qāḍī Abū 'l-Sā'ib 'Utbah Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh. Ibn Quray'ah was one of the wonders of the world for the promptitude with which he replied to every question submitted to his opinion; and his answers were expressed in the purest style and in the most beautiful rhythmical

1 It was, therefore, the poet who squinted, not the girl; Ibn Khallikān sometimes forgets himself.

2 The MSS. and the printed text read (العذر), but the true reading appears to be (القدر).

* 29 August.—Ed.

† 25 August.—Ed.

prose. Having been received into the intimacy of Abū Muḥammad al-Muhallabī (No. 170), he attached himself exclusively to that wazīr. There exists, in the hands of the public, a well known work containing a collection of questions proposed to Ibn Quray'ah and the answers which he returned. The men of rank and the literary characters of that age took great pleasure in jesting with him and consulting him, by writing, on odd and laughable questions; to these he immediately replied by written answers in the same style. The wazīr of whom we have just spoken encouraged some persons to invent a number of ridiculous questions on a variety of burlesque subjects, in order to obtain his answers, and the kātib Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn al-Mu'allā wrote to him as follows: "What does the qādl (may God favour him!) say of a Jew who committed fornication with a Christian, and she brought forth a child with a human body and the head of an ox? They are now both under arrest. What does the qādl opine respecting them?" On this paper he immediately inscribed an answer in these terms: "This evidence none can refuse—it bears hard upon the accursed Jews—and proves that they drank down the love of the calf into their hearts<sup>1</sup>—so that it now comes out from their lower parts—I opine that on the Jew's neck the calf's head you should tie—and on the Christian's shoulder fix the leg and the thing—and that they should be dragged on the ground—whilst the words: Darkness upon darkness<sup>2</sup> are proclaimed around. Receive my salutation." When the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) visited Baghdād, he went to the wazīr al-Muhallabī's levees<sup>3</sup>, and was there so greatly struck by the qādl Ibn Quray'ah's wit and delicate repartees, that, in a letter addressed by him to Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Amīd<sup>4</sup>, he said: "And there was at the levee a facetious shaykh, called the qādl Ibn Quray'ah, with whom I discussed some questions too indelicate to be mentioned here; and I must say that I found his conversation singularly witty." An elderly man who

1 Qur'an, Sūrah 2, verse 87.

2 Qur'an, Sūrah 24, verse 40.

3 The word majlis, here rendered by levee, signifies in general a sitting held to render justice, a tribunal; it also designates the levees of a wazīr.

4 The life of Ibn al-'Amīd will be found in this work (No. 670).

smelt strongly of perfumes having asked him, in the presence of the wazīr Abū Muḥammad, the definition of the term qafā<sup>1</sup>, he replied: "It is that part which is surrounded by thy skirts (jurubbān); which draws on thee the railleries of thy friends; the part on which thy sultān corrects thee, and in which the familiariter utuntur epebi tui<sup>2</sup>. There are four definitions of it." The jurubbān of a coat is the broad piece of stuff which covers the os coccygis and hidest the qafā. It is a Persian word Arabicized<sup>3</sup>. All the questions proposed to him were of this sort, and I should mention some more of them here, did I not wish to avoid prolixity; but a good number of them, with the answers, have been inserted by the celebrated poet Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Sharaf al-Qayrawānī<sup>4</sup>, in his work entitled Abkār al-Afkār. The qādī Abū Bakr Ibn Quray'ah died at Baghdād on Saturday, the 19th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 367 (Feb., A.C. 978)*, aged sixty-five years. Quray'ah was the surname of one of his ancestors, according to al-Sam'ānī. Al-Sindiyah is the name of a village situated on the (cannal called) Nahr 'Isā, between Bāghdād and al-Anbār. To indicate that a person is a native of this place, they say Sindawānī (not Sindī), lest he should be taken for a native of Sind, the country which lies on the borders of India.

630 IBN MUḤRIZ AL-WAHRĀNĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Muḥriz Ibn Muḥammad al-Wahrānī, surnamed Rukn al-Dīn (column of religion)—some say, Jamāl al-Dīn (beauty of religion)—was a man of wit and talent. He left his country and came to Egypt in the reign of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, but, as the art in which he excelled was the drawing

1 Qafā signifies the back of the neck. It is also employed to designate the lower part of the back.

2 By these words he alluded to the muliebris patientia, of which men who perfumed their person were often suspected.

3 The Persian word is qiribān. (گریبان).

4 'Imād al-Dīn, in his Kharīdah (MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale, Supplement gives numerous extracts from the poems of Ibn Sharaf al-Qayrawānī, and says that he was a contemporary of Ibn Rashīq (No. 157). Hājji Khalifah places his death in A.H. 460 (A.C. 1067-8) which agrees with 'Imād al-Dīn's statement.

* First February.—Ed.

up of official papers, and as he found there al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil (No. 349), the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī, and other distinguished individuals of the same class, he felt his inferiority, and perceived that his abilities, eminent as they were, could not be employed with profit to himself. He therefore abandoned the grave style of writing, and, having taken to light compositions, he wrote the collection of visions and epistles which bears his name. This work, copies of which are very common, is a proof of the buoyant humour, acute mind, and accomplished wit possessed by the author. The Great Vision alone would suffice for his reputation; it abounds in charming ideas, but its length precludes its insertion here. He afterwards visited different countries, and, having resided for some time at Damascus, he was nominated preacher (khaṣīb) at Dārāyā<sup>1</sup>, a village situated in the Chūṭah<sup>2</sup> and at the gates of the city. He died at Dārāyā, A.H. 575 (A.C. 1179-80), and was interred at the entrance of the funeral chapel erected over the grave of the shaykh Abū Sulaymān al-Dārānī (No. 338). I found in the handwriting of al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil that, on the 17th of month of Rajab, the news of al-Wahrānī's death came (to Egypt) from Damascus—Wahrānī, means native of Wahrān (Oran) a large city in the land of Qayrawān. It is situated on the Syrian Sea (the Mediterranean), at the distance of two days journey from Tilimsen. Al-Ruṣṣāṭī (No. 327) says that it was founded A.H. 290 (A.C. 903), by Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Awn, Muḥammad Ibn 'Abdūs and a band (of adventurers from Spain)<sup>3</sup>. It has produced many distinguished characters, some of them remarkable for learning.

631 IBN TAYMIYAH AL-ḤARRĀNĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'l-Qāsim al-Khiḍr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Khiḍr Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh, generally known by the appellation of Ibn Taymiyah al-Ḥarrānī and sur-named Fakhr al-Dīn (glory of religion), was an eminent preacher

1 In No. 338, this name is incorrectly spelt Dariya. Its orthography is here fixed by Ibn Khallikān

2 The cultivated country around Damascus is called the Chūṭah.

3 See Ibn Khaldūn's Histoire des Berbers tome I, p. 283 of the French Translation, and al-Bakrī's Description de l' Afrique septentrionale, p. 165 of the French translation.

and a jurisconsult of the Ḥanbalite sect. He held first place in his native country by his learning, and was highly distinguished for his piety. Having cultivated the sciences under some men of great erudition, he proceeded to Baghdād, where he studied jurisprudence under Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ibn al-Mannī (No. 407), and learned Traditions from Shuhdah Bint al-Ibari (No. 271), Ibn al-Muqrab, Ibn al-Baṭṭī (No. 325), and others. He composed a very good compendium of the doctrines professed by Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19), and an excellent collection of khutbahs (sermons), a work of high repute. He left also a commentary on the Qur'ān, and some good poetry. He occupied the post of preacher (khaṭābah) at Ḥarrān, and this office was afterwards filled by other members of his family. His life was one uniform course of rectitude and virtue. He was born at Ḥarrān towards the end of the month of Sha'bān, A.H. 542 (January, A.C. 1148), and he died in that city on the 11th of Ṣafar, A.H. 621 (March, A.C. 1224).* Abu 'l-Muzaffar Sibṭ Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 183, note) says: "He incurred general odium in Ḥarrān, and, when any person of that place commenced to display abilities, he never ceased persecuting him till he drove him out of the city. He died on the 5th of Ṣafar, A.H. 621". This date differs from ours. He then adds: "I heard him, one Friday, on the conclusion of the public prayer, recite the following verses in the great mosque of Ḥarrān :

"My beloved friends ! I have warned my eyes that they and sleep shall never meet unless we meet again. Spare a heart tortured with love, and pity an enfeebled body worn away. How often have you adjourned the night of our promised meeting ! life has passed away, and yet we do not meet."

Abū Yūsuf Maḥāsin Ibn Salāmah Ibn Khalīfah al-Ḥarrānī mentions Ibn Taymiyah with commendation in his history of Ḥarrān, and says that he died on Thursday, the 10th of Ṣafar, A.H. 622 (February, A.C. 1225)† soon after the hour of the ʿaṣr prayer<sup>1</sup>. Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) speaks of him <sup>1</sup> See No. 257, note on times of prayers.

---

* 4 March.—Ed.

† 20 February.—Ed.

in his History of Arbela, and states that he arrived in that city in the year 604, with the design of making the pilgrimage to Makkah. He then extols his merit and adds : "He gave lessons every day on the interpretation of the Qur'ān ; he related anecdotes with great elegance, his discourse had a peculiar charm, and this, joined to an agreeable disposition, rendered his company most acceptable to people of all ranks. His father was one of the abdāls<sup>1</sup> and holy ascetics. He (the son) acquired his knowledge of jurisprudence at Harrān and at Baghdād ; in controversy he displayed singular acuteness. He composed some compendious treatises on jurisprudence, and left a collection of sermons in the style of Ibn Nubātah's (No. 348). As an expounder of Qur'ān he stood pre-eminent, and in all the sciences his abilities were highly conspicuous. He learned Traditions from first masters at Baghdād." Ibn al-Mustawfī then cites the following piece as the production of Ibn Taymiyah :

"Receive my salutations and let the past be forgotten ; my departure from you was sore against my will. Ask the night if sleep has ever closed my eyelids since I left you. Friends beloved of my heart ! I swear by Him who decreed our separation, that if the joyful day of our meeting return and the woes which afflict me be healed, I shall go forth to meet the camels which bear you hither, and lay my face as a carpet in their path ; even should I apply my forehead to the ground—even should the (heat, ardent as) brands of ghadā wood<sup>1</sup>, scorch my cheeks ! Then I should receive new life—then wrapt in joy, I should exclaim : Receive my salutation ! the past is now forgotten” !

1 The Muslim saints are supposed to form a corporation composed of a certain number of members and always subsisting. In this corporation the highest rank is held by the chief or Ghawth; the next, by four Awtād; the third, by seven Akhyār; the fourth, by forty Abdāl; the fifth, by seventy Nujabā; and the sixth, by three hundred Nuqabā. See on this subject a passage of al-Ishāqī, quoted by Lane in his translation of the Thousand and One Nights, vol. I, p. 233. In the dictionary of technical terms employed by the ṣūfis, MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale, Supplement, I find the following explanations of the terms: The Qutb (axis) is the individual to whom has been delegated Almighty God's inspection over the universe at all times. The Qutb, at the moment in which recourse is had to him is the Ghawth (assistance). The awtād (pegs) are the four men who preside over the four regions of the world, the east, the west, the north, and the south. By them God preserves these regions, because they are charged to inspect (over their respective quarters). The Budālā (substitutes; the word abdāl has the same meaning); are seven men; when one of them travels forth, he leaves behind him a body in his image, so that no one can perceive his absence. The Nujabā (excellent) are forty persons occupied in rectifying the affairs of men, in bearing their burdens and in exercising the rights of the creature (not of the Creator, like the Qutb and the Awtād). The Nuqabā (administrators) are those who inspect and produce to view the secret of men's bosoms. They are three hundred in number. It would appear that, in the ṣūfī confraternity, these names served to designate the grand-master and the principal chiefs.

He then adds : “I asked him the meaning of his name Taymiyah, and he replied : ‘My father or my grandfather, I am not sure which, made the pilgrimage, leaving his wife in a state of pregnancy. On arriving at Taymā, a little girl who came out of a tent attracted his attention, and, on his return to Ḥarrān, he found that his wife had lain in of a daughter. When the child was presented to him he exclaimed : Yā Taymiyah ! yā Taymiyah ! (O the girl of Taymā ! the girl of Taymā !)—being struck with its resemblance to the little girl he saw there. The child was therefore named Taymiyah’. Such was the purport of his words.” Taymā is the name of a village in the desert of Tabūk, half-way between Khaybar and Syria. Taymiyah means a female belonging to Taymā; but the more correct expression (in this case) is Taymāwiyah, because the masculine form of the relative adjective derived from Taymā is Taymāwī. The statement is furnished, however, by Ibn Taymiyah himself, and has been generally adopted.

632 AL-‘ATTĀBĪ THE GRAMMARIAN

Abū Maṣṣūr Muḥammad Ibn ‘Alī Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Zibirj the grammarian, surnamed al-‘Attābī, possessed a good knowledge of grammar, philology, and the belles-lettres. His writing was so beautiful and correct, that specimens of it are much sought after by literary men. He studied the belles-lettres under Abu 'l Sa'ādāt Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Shajari (a sharif whose life we shall give), Abū Manṣūr Mawhūb Ibn al-Jawālīqī<sup>1</sup>, and others. He learned Traditions from the first masters of that age, and transcribed a great number of books. Volumes in his handwriting are highly prized. His birth took place in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 484 (April-May, A.C. 1091), and his death occurred on the eve of Tuesday, the 25th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 556 (May, A.C. 1161)*. 'Attābi means belonging to al-'Attābiyūn, a place in Baghdād so called, and situated on the west side of the river. Abū Manṣūr resided there, but he afterwards removed to the east side. The surname of al-'Attābi was also borne by a celebrated poet called Abū 'Amr Kulthūm Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ayyūb, but he derived it from the circumstance of his being descended from 'Attāb Ibn Sa'd Ibn Zuhayr Ibn Jusham. Kulthūm was an eloquent and able poet, who celebrated the praises of Hārūn al-Rashīd and other great men. He belonged to Qinnisrīn, an ancient city of Syria, near Aleppo. I should have mentioned him in this work, but as it was designed to contain notices on those persons only the dates of whose death were known, and as I was unable to ascertain the time of his death, I felt constrained to omit him<sup>2</sup>.

---

1 According to the Arabic philologists, the wood of the Ghadā tree gives out great heat and retains its fire very long.

633 AL-MAS'ŪDĪ AL-BANDAHĪ

Abū Sa'id—some say Abū 'Abd Allāh—Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Sa'ādāt 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Muḥammad al-Mas'ūdī, surnamed Tāj al-Dīn (crown of religion) al-Bandahī, was a native of Marwarrūd in Khurāsān, a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect and a ṣūfī. He displayed great talents as a philologist and composed on al-Ḥarīrī's Maqamahs (No. 510) the fullest and most complete commentary ever written on that work. I saw a copy of it in five large volumes, which is more than twice the size of any other commentary

1 The life of Ibn al-Jawālīqī will be found in this work.

2 He died A.H. 208 (A.C. 823-24), according to the author of the Nujūm.

* 23 May.—Ed.

composed to elucidate the Maqāmahs. This work bears a high character, and copies of it are very common. He resided at Damascus, in the Sumaysāṭ convent (Khānqāh), and gave public lessons there. Previously to this, he had been preceptor to al-Malik al-Afḍal (No. 461), the son of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and, through his means, he was enabled to procure the numerous rare and valuable books, by the assistance of which he composed his commentary on the Maqāmahs. Abu 'l-Barakāt al-Hāshimī, a native of Aleppo, relates as follows: "When the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn entered Aleppo in the year 579 (A.C. 1183), al-Mas'ūdī (al-Bandahī) went down to the great mosque of that city, and having installed himself in the library formed of the books given as waqf<sup>1</sup> to that establishment, he selected a great number of them (and took them away) without meeting the slightest opposition. I myself saw him pack them up in a pannier." I met some of al-Bandahī's disciples and received from them lessons and certificates authorising me to teach what I had learned from them. We read, in the work of a modern historian, that al-Bandahī's birth took place in the year 521, but one of our literary men states that he found the following note in al-Bandahī's own handwriting: "I was born at the hour of sunset, on the eve of Tuesday, the first of the latter Rabi' of the year 522 (April, A.C. 1128): "* This statement is evidently more correct than the former, because it is taken from the handwriting of the person himself and indicates the day and the month. He died at Damascus on the eve of Saturday, the 29th of the first Rabi', A.H. 584 (May, A.C. 1188). † Some place his death on the 1st of the latter Rabi'. He was interred at the foot of Mount Qāsiyūn. He settled his books as waqf on the convent of which we have spoken. The following verses were often in his mouth:

"I saw tears of blood flow from your eyes,' said she, 'through apprehension of our departure; why now hast thou replaced those tears of blood by tears of water?': I replied 'Not that I was solaced in thy absence or that I yielded to consolation; those

<sup>1</sup> See No. 21, note on waqf.

* 4 April.—Ed.

† 29 May.—Ed.

tears have turned grey from the lengthened age of my weeping'."

Similar to this are the words of another poet :

"Su'ād said : 'Dost thou shed tears of water after tears of blood ?' I replied : 'My tears have turned grey from the lengthened age of my weeping.'"

This doctor bore the surname of al-Mas'ūdi because he had an ancestor called Mas'ūd. Of Marwarrūd we have already spoken (No. 22). Bandahl means belonging to Panj Dih, a district of Marwarrūd. Panj Dih signifies five villages. To designate a native of this place, they employ also the words al-Fanjdihi and al-Banjdihi. It has produced many eminent and learned men. Qāsiyūn is the name of a mountain rising on the north side of Damascus. It contains many beautiful country-seats, schools (madāris), convents (rubṭ), and gardens ; the river Yazid (has its source) in it, and the Ṭhawrā flows at its foot. It possesses also a large mosque built by the sovereign of Arbela, Muẓaffar al-Dīn, the son of Zayn al-Dīn (No. 522). Ibn 'Unayn, a poet whose life we shall give, composed a qaṣīdah, rhyming in I, in praise of the sovereign of Yaman, Sayf al-Islām Ibn Ayyūb (No. 282), and, as he expresses in this piece his desire of seeing Damascus again, he enumerates the delightful spots in its vicinity, and says, when speaking of Mount Qāsiyūn :

"The ardent love of my heart for Qāsiyūn will subsist even when the foundations of that mountain have passed away."

It is a brilliant poem, full of originality and ornament.

634 IBN NUQṬAH

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Ḡhanī Ibn Abī Bakr Ibn Shujā' Ibn Abi 'l-Naṣr Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥanbali (doctor of the Ḥanbalite sect), generally known by the appellation of Ibn Nuqṭah and surnamed Mu'in al-Dīn (defender of the faith), was an eminent traditionist and a native of Baghdād. His ardour in search of Traditions, the quantity of them which he heard and committed to paper, and the frequent journeys which he undertook for the purpose of procuring them raised him to celebrity. He travelled to Khurāsān, Persian 'Irāq, Mesopotamia, Syria, and Egypt, visiting the principal traditionists, hearing their lessons, and obtaining information from their lips. He wrote a great deal and took down a quantity of useful notes. In the Supplement which he composed to the amir Ibn Mākūlā's Ikmāl (No. 414), and which forms two volumes, he displayed no inferior talent. He wrote also a small work on patronymics (ansāb), which serves as a Supplement to the treatise composed on that subject by Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir al-Maqdisi (No. 593), and to that of Abū Mūsā al-Iṣbahānī (No. 592). Another work of his, the Kitāb al-Taq'īd (book of fixation) contains all the (requisite) information respecting the traditionists, (the unusual words occurring in) the different collections of Traditions and the isnāds<sup>1</sup>. When I first heard of him, he was still living, but I never had an opportunity of meeting him. Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) mentions him, in the History of Arbela, as one of the persons who visited that city and heard Traditions delivered there. He speaks of him with commendation and adds: "He recited to me the following verses as having been composed by Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Abi 'l-Shibl, a native of Baghdād and one of the best poets that 'Irāq has produced in modern times." Ibn al-Ḥazīrī (No. 242) gives them also in his Zīnat al-Dahr :

"Discover not thy sufferings or thy joys to a censor or a false friend ; for pretended sympathy is as bitter to the heart as the exultation of foes."

Ibn Nuqṭah died at Baghdād on thy 22nd of Ṣafar, A.H. 629 (December, A.C. 1231),* at an advanced age. I was then residing at Aleppo for the purpose of pursuing my studies, and it was there we received intelligence of his death. His father 'Abd al-Gḥanī died at Baghdād on the 4th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 583 (August, A.C. 1187) †, and was interred near the mosque of his

1 See vol. I. Introduction.

* 19 December.—Ed.

† 11 August.—Ed.

(quarter). His frugality and disinterestedness rendered him celebrated. Abū 'Alī Ibn Abi 'l-Shibl died A.H. 473 (A.C. 1080-1). The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn speaks of him in the Khariḍah.

635 IBN AL-DUBAYTHĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Ma'ālī Sa'id Ibn Abi Ṭālib Yahyā Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥajjāj, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Dubaythī, was a native of Wāsiṭ, an historian, and a doctor of the sect of al-Shāfi'. He received a great quantity of Traditions by oral transmission, and formed some collections of useful notes (ta'ālīq). His memory was stocked with pieces of great beauty, and these he often cited in conversation. By his learning in the Traditions and his correct knowledge of the names of the traditionists and of history, he acquired the reputation of an able hāfiẓ and a genius of the first order. He composed a work which he designed as a continuation to Abū Sa'd 'Abd al-Karīm al-Sam'ānī's (No. 370) Supplement to the Khataib's (No. 33) History of Baghdād, and in it he gives notices on the persons whom al-Sam'ānī had forgotten and on those who lived subsequently to that writer. It fills three volumes and possesses considerable merit<sup>1</sup>. He wrote also a history of Wāsiṭ and other works. Ibn al-Mustawfi (No. 528) makes mention of him in the History of Arbela and says: "He entered our city in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 611 (March, A.C. 1215). He was a fine-looking old man." He then adds that Ibn al-Dubaythī recited to him the following piece as of his own composition :

"I put mankind to the test, but found not a true friend, a helper, in adversity. I showed them the sincerest friendship, but received a troubled and insincere attachment in return. Never, when I chose from among them a companion who pleased me, had I cause to praise his conduct in the end."

---

<sup>1</sup> The second volume of this work is in the Bibliothèque imperiale, ancien fonds, (No. 745). It begins with the Aḥmads and finishes with the ha, the sixth letter of the Arabic alphabet.

Ibn al-Dubaythī continued to study and take notes up to the moment of his death. His birth took place at Wāsiṭ on Monday, the 26th of Rajab, A.H. 558 (June, A.C. 1163;)* he died at Baghdād on Monday, the 8th of the latter Rabi', 637 (November, A.C. 1239)†. The next day, he was interred in the Wardiyah cemetery. Dubaythī means belonging to Dubaythā, a village in the neighbourhood of Wāsiṭ. His ancestors belonged to Kanjah (in the province of Arrān), and his grandfather removed from Dubaythā to Wāsiṭ, where the family multiplied. His father Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Sa'ūd died at Wāsiṭ on the eve of the Festival of the Sacrifice, A. H. 585 (January, A. C. 1190)‡. he was born in that place on the 27th of Ṣafar, A.H. 527 (January, A.C. 1133). §

636 IBN ṢAFAR AL-ṢAQALLĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Abī Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṣafar al-Ṣaqallī (native of Sicily), surnamed Hujjat al-Din (proof of religion), was an accomplished scholar versed in the belles-lettres, and author of some instructive works. One of these, the Sulwān al-Muṭā' jī 'Udwān al-Atbā' (consolation for the master who suffers from the enmity of his servants), he composed in the year 554 (A.C. 1159), for one of the chiefs (who were in Sicily)<sup>1</sup>. His other works are: the Khayr al-Bashr bi-

1 Sicily was, at that time, under the domination of William the Bad, the second Norman king. This circumstance induced me to examine Ibn Ṣafar's work in the hopes of finding some information respecting the state of that country, but was unable to discover any thing of the kind. It is a collection of apologues and historical anecdotes. This work, of which three or four copies are preserved in the Bibliothèque imperiale, is highly esteemed in the East, and has been translated into Persian and Turkish. An English translation of it accompanied with a very instructive preface, was published in London, by Mr. M. Amari, in the year 1852.

* 1 July.—Ed.

† 9 November.—Ed.

‡ 19 January A.C. 1190.—Ed.

§ 7 January.—Ed.

Khayr il-Bashar (excellent news concerning the best of mankind)<sup>1</sup>, a large commentary on the Qur'ān, entitled al-Yanbū' (the source), the Kitāb Nujabā al-Abnā (history of clever children)<sup>2</sup> a Hāshiyah or appendix to al-Ḥarīrī's Durrat al-Ḡhawwāṣ (No. 510), and two commentaries on the same author's Maqāmahs,—one ample, the other concise. He left also some other compositions of great elegance. I read, towards the beginning of his commentary, that he had been taught (the Maqāmahs) by the ḥāfiẓ Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī (No. 43), who had learned them from the author, al-Ḥarīrī: people say, however, that when al-Silafī saw al-Ḥarīrī in the mosque of Baṣrah, teaching his Maqāmahs to a circle of students, he asked who he was, and receiving for answer: "That man has fabricated a set of lying stories, and is now dictating them to the public," he turned away from him in disdain. God best knows which of these statements is true. The following anecdote has been handed down as a relation made by the shaykh Tāj al-Dīn al-Kindī (No. 233): "Having obtained a financial draft on the government office (diwān) in Ḥamāt for a gratuity, I went to receive the amount, and, after my arrival, I met with Ibn Zafar at an assembly. We then engaged in a grammatical and philological discussion, during which I proposed to him some questions on the former subject and brought him to a stand. His skill in philology appeared nearly as limited, and, when the assembly was about to break up, he said: 'The Shaykh Tāj al-Dīn surpasses me in grammar, but I excel him in philology;' on which I answered: 'Thy first assertion is granted and thy second denied.' We then separated." Ibn Zafar was of a short stature, a puny figure, and by no means well-looking. Some 1 A copy of this work is preserved in the Bibliothèque imperiale. It is divided into four chapters: the first on the passages in the Books of God (the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Gospel) which foretell the mission of Muḥammad. The second contains the ancient popular traditions relating to this event; the third, the predictions on the same subject made by the kāhins (Arabian diviners); and the fourth, such information respecting the coming of Muḥammad as was derived from the jinn (genii).

2 A copy of this work is in the Bibliothèque imperiale. As the title indicates, it contains anecdotes of children remarkable for precocious talent. The historian and the philologist will find in it much curious information.

poetry is ascribed to him, and I found the following verses in a compilation which goes under his name :

"I bear thee in my heart ; dost thou not then know that thou art borne about even when thou remainest at home ? Is not that person highly prized by me whom I long to meet and who dwells within my bosom ?"

He has borrowed this thought from an Arab of the desert, who said :

"Though I never inhabited the land where Sulaymā took up her abode, I pray that a dark cloud may show her its lightnings, and refresh with its showers the dwelling-place of a person dear to my heart."

Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī quotes, in his Kharīdah, a number of pieces composed by Ibn Ḥafar, and, amongst others, the following :

"A man's misfortunes correspond to his merits ; and, by his patience under affliction, his share of merit may be known. He who has but little firmness in facing what he apprehends, will have but little chance of gaining what he hopes for."

Ibn Ḥafar was born in Sicily and brought up at Makkah ; he kept removing from one country to another, and at length al-Ḥamāt where he died in the year 565 (A.C. 1169-70). The whole period of his life was passed in struggling against poverty : it is even related that, in Ḥamāt, want and misery forced him to marry his daughter to a person much beneath her ; the bridegroom then left the city with his wife, and sold her as a slave in another country<sup>1</sup>. Ḥafar is the noun of action belonging to a verb which, taking ḥafira in the preterite and yaḥfaru in the aorist, means to obtain a thing. (It is here employed as a proper name.) having already spoken of Ṣaqa-līyah (Sicily) (No. 371), we need not repeat our observations here.

637 AL-'UTBĪ THE POET

Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn 'Umar Ibn 'Utbah Ibn Abī Sufyān

<sup>1</sup> This act was contrary to law.

Ṣakhr Ibn Ḥarb Ibn Umayyah Ibn 'Abd Shams, surnamed al-'Utbi, was a member of the tribe of Quraysh and of the family of Umayyah, a native of Baṣrah and a poet of great celebrity. This accomplished scholar and able poet delivered orally historical Traditions and the narrations of the combats which took place between the Arabs of the desert; he composed also some elegies on the death of his sons. The authorities which he cited for his information were Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249), Lūṭ Ibn Mikhnaf, and his own father; amongst those who delivered traditional information on his authority were: Abū Ḥātim al-Sijistānī (No. 262), Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Riyāshī (No. 298), and Ishāq Ibn Muḥammad al-Nakha'ī. Having proceeded to Baghdād, he taught Traditions to the people of that city, but he was more generally noted for drinking wine and composing love verses on 'Utbah. He and his father held a high rank by the respectability of their family, and both bore the reputation of accomplished scholars and elegant speakers. Amongst the works which he compiled were: a Book of Horses, a collection of poems composed by the Arab of the desert, a collection of poems composed by females whose love had turned to hatred, the Kitāb al-Dḥabliḥ (victims for sacrifice), and the Kitāb al-Akhlāq (de moribus), etc. Ibn Qutaybah (No. 306) mentions him in the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, and Ibn al-Munajjim<sup>1</sup> in the Kitāb al-Bārī. He relates that he heard a wild Arab of the desert say to another man: "If such a fellow smile upon thee, his scorpions (emblems of treachery) will glide towards thee; if thou dost not treat him openly as an enemy, do not (at least) treat him in private as a friend." The latter writer gives the following verses as al-'Utbi's:

"When the maidens remarked the tinge of grey appearing on my cheeks, they turned away from me their faces radiant with beauty. When they saw or heard me, they ran off to the tops of the sand-hills at al-Maḥājir<sup>2</sup>. But though they turn their eyes away from me they cast (towards me) furtive glances like those of

---

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 This is merely a conjectural translation of the verse.

the fawn and the gazelle ; for I belong to a family of high renown, whose feet were formed to tread the pulpit<sup>1</sup> ; khalifs in Islāmic times ; mighty chiefs in the times of idolatry ; to them belonged every glory, and such an ancestry might form the boaster's proudest vaunt."

A collection of pieces in my own handwriting contains some verses of the sharīf al-Riḍā's<sup>2</sup>, in which a similar thought is expressed. (Ibn al-Munajjim) quotes also these verses as his :

"When Sulaymā saw me turn my eyes away—and I turn my glances away from all who resemble her—she said : 'I once saw thee mad (with love) ;' and I repl ed : 'Youth is a madness of which old age is the cure.'"

This verse has now acquired the force of a proverb. Al-Mubarrad (No. 610) cities, in his Kāmil, two verses in which al-'Utbi deplores the death of one of his sons ; they are as follows :

"Tears have furrowed my cheeks through grief for thy loss, and wounds have covered my heart. Resignation meets with approval in every case, but in thine it merits blame."

This verse also has obtained great currency. The poetical pieces of al-'Utbi are numerous and good ; he was one of the best poets of Islāmic times. He died A.H. 228 (A.C. 842-3). The surname of al-'Utbi was borne by him because he drew his descent from 'Utbah, the son of Abū Sufyān. 'Utbi' signifies also descended from 'Utbah Ibn Ghazwān, one of the Prophet's Companions. It is possible also that our poet may have received this surname on account of the poems which he composed in praise of his beloved 'Utbah.

1 Literally : "For whose feet the tops of the pulpits were formed." In the first ages of Islāmism, the khalif in person pronounced the khutbah from the pulpit. The poet here alludes to his descent from the Umayyads.

2 His life will be found in this work.

638 ABŪ BAKR AL-KHUWĀRAZMĪ

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-‘Abbās al-Khuwārazmī, surnamed also al-Ṭabarkhazī, [because, says al-Sam‘ānī (No. 370), his father belonged to Khuwārazm and his mother to Ṭabaristān, and these two denominations combined into one were given to the son,] was, as we have already said in the life of Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī (No. 544), a sister's son to that historian. Abū Bakr ranked among the greatest and the most renowned of the poets; he was held also as a first-rate authority in philology and genealogy. He resided for some time in Syria, in the neighbourhood of Aleppo, and was highly distinguished by his contemporaries. It is related that having gone to see the Ṣāhib Ibn ‘Abbād (No. 93), who was then holding his court at Arrajān, he requested one of the chamberlains to announce to him that a literary man desired permission to enter. The chamberlain took in the message, and his master replied: "Tell him that I have bound myself not to receive any literary man unless he knows by hearts twenty thousand verses composed by the Arabs of the desert." The chamberlain returned back with this answer, and Abū Bakr said: "Ask him if he means twenty thousand verses composed by men, or twenty thousand composed by women?" This question was repeated to the Ṣāhib, who immediately exclaimed: "This must be Abū Bakr al-Khuwārazmī! let him come in." Abū Bakr then entered, and being recognised by the Ṣāhib, he met with a most favourable reception. Abū Bakr left a collection (diwān) of epistles and another of poetry. Al-Ṭha‘ālībī (No. 356) mentions him in the Yatīmah and quotes a passage from his prose-writings, to which he subjoins some extracts from his poems. Amongst the pieces given there are the following:

"I see that you, when wealthy, pitch your tent close to us, and that, when you are in want, you visit us seldom. 'Tis with you as with the moon: when her light is diminishing, she delays her visits, but when it increases, she remains with us long."

* "O thou who longest for draughts of pure wine, but who, occur what may, will never break the seal of the paper (in which thy money is rolled up); know. that the purse and the goblet cannot be full at the same time; empty then thy purse, that thou mayest fill thy goblet."

* 'From his verses' omitted by de Slane.—Ed.

Abū Sa'īd Aḥmad Ibn Shuhayb, a native of Khuwārazm, composed the following verses on Abū Bakr :

"Abū Bakr possesses learning and talent, but he does not adhere to his engagements. The attachment which he shows for a friend lasts from morning to night (and no longer)"

The anecdotes told of Abū Bakr are very numerous. On his return to Syria, he settled at Naysābūr, and died in that city on the 15th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 383 (4th November, A.C. 993); but, in the historical work of our master Ibn al-Aṭhīr (No. 435) his death is placed ten years later. God best knows which is right. Abū Bakr being dissatisfied with Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād, composed the lines on leaving him :

"Praise not Ibn 'Abbād even when his hands shower forth beneficence so abundant as to shame the rain-cloud. Such acts are merely the suggestions of his fancy; he grants, but not from liberality, and he refuses, but not from avarice."

Ibn 'Abbād was told of this, and, on receiving intelligence of the poet's death, he said :

"I said to the caravan returning from Khurāsān : 'Is your Khuwārazmite dead?' and they answered : 'Yes'. On this I said : 'Inscribe these words upon his tomb : 'May the curse of the Almighty light upon the ungrateful!'"

I thought that the verses directed against the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād were composed by Abū Bakr al-Khuwārazmī, a number of literary men having made that statement in their compilations and in conversation; but happening since to examine al Marzubānī's (No. 621) Mu'jam al-Shu'arā, I met the following lines in the life of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Sufyān surnamed Abū 'l-Qāsim al-A'mā (the blind), a poet and one of the persons who, at Baghdād, repeated from memory the compositions of former authors; he had been a pupil of al-Kisā'i's (No. 408), and was employed by al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl (No. 169) to instruct his children. Having incurred Ibn Sahl's reprehension for something which he had done, he pronounced these satirical lines :

"Praise not Ḥasan for generosity, though his hands shower gifts in abundance ; blame him not if he withhold his favours. It is not through parsimony that he refuses, neither is it in hopes of fame that he bestows. Such acts are merely the suggestions of his fancy ; he grants, but not from liberality, and he refuses, but not from avarice."

God best knows the truth in this matter. We have already spoken of the word Khawārazmī<sup>1</sup>.

639 AL-SALĀMĪ THE POET

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh<sup>2</sup> Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā Ibn Khulays Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yahyā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Walīd Ibn al-Walīd Ibn al-Mughīrah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn Makḥzūm Ibn Yaqqah Ibn Murrah Ibn Ka'b Ibn Luwayyi Ibn Ghālib Ibn Fihri Ibn Mālik Ibn al-Naḍr Ibn Kinānah Ibn Khuzaymah Ibn Mudrikah Ibn al-Yās Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'dd Ibn 'Adnān al-Makḥzūmī al-Salāmī, a celebrated poet drew his descent from al-Walīd, the son of al-Walīd Ibn al-Mughīrah al-Makḥzūmī and the brother of Khālīd Ibn al-Walīd (the first Muslim conqueror of Syria). Al-Tha'ālibī (No. 356) speaks of him in these terms<sup>3</sup> : "He was incontrovertibly the best poet of 'Irāq, and his right to that rank is sufficiently evinced by his merit. The opinion which we have expressed concerning him is supported by a sure testimony,

1 This, I believe, is an error ; in the part of his work which precedes, the author has said nothing on the subject. In Arabic, the word is pronounced Khawārazmī, and means native of Khawārazm. The Persian pronunciation of the word is Khārizum.

2 In the MS. of the Yatīmah, No. 1370, al-Salāmī's names are written : Abū Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh.

3 See Yatīmah, MS. of the Bib. du Roi, ancient fonds No. 1370, fol. 194 verso.

that of his poems ; and the beauties of his compositions which we have here inserted are a delight for the eye, a charm for the heart, and a satisfaction for the mind. He began to utter verses at the age of ten years, and the first piece he ever pronounced was the following, recited by him one day at school :

'The charms of beauty (which we remark) in him are various : the eyes of mankind are fixed on him with one accord, The arrow of his glances is sharp, and his glance never misses its aim. Beauty has inscribed upon his cheek : This is a beauteous being as true as his Creator exists. !'

He passed his early youth at Baghdād, and removed to Moşul when yet a boy. He there met some poets of the highest eminence, such as Abū 'Uthmān al-Khālidi, (one of the two Khālidi<sup>1</sup>) Abu 'l-Faraj al-Babbaghā (No. 366), Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Talla'fari, and others. When they saw him, they were astonished that such talents could exist in a boy so young, and they suspected that the verses which he repeated were not his own. Al-Khālidi then observed that he would undertake to put him to the test, and having prepared a banquet, he invited these poets and al-Salāmi. When in the midst of their potations, they proceeded to make a trial of his talents and a heavy fall of snow having very soon after covered the face of the earth, al-Khālidi took an orange and threw it upon the hail ; 'Now,' said he to his companions, 'let us try and describe that object.' Upon this al-Salāmi delivered extemporaneously the following lines :

How admirable the talent of al-Khālidi, a genius unrivalled, generous, and grand ! To the frozen water of the cloud he made a present of an ardent fire<sup>2</sup>, and when the noble hearts of (his companions) addressed reproaches to him, the hands of joy offered him this excuse drawn from my mind : Blame him not : he has only given the cheeks as a present to the mouth<sup>3</sup>.

1 No. 407.

2 The poet thus designates the orange on account of its colour.

3 That is : He permitted the mouth to kiss the cheek. The teeth are often compared to hail-stones, and the red-skinned orange is compared to the cheek of the beloved.

When they saw him capable of producing such verses as these, they let him alone ; all praised his talents and acknowledged his merit and acuteness, with the exception of al-Talla'farī, who persisted in his former opinion. In this he was so obstinate, that al-Salāmi at length attacked him in these lines :

"Al-Talla'farī aspired to my friendship, but the soul of a dog would despise such friendship as his. His character is repugnant to mine, and my actions scorn to be joined with his. Ars mea nobilis in lingua sita est, ars ejus vilis in tergo. Homo non est ille mihi versus facienti conveniens ; homo non sum ad illum pertundendum aptus."

"He composed also many more satires on the same person. Having gone one day to see Abū Taghlib,—Abū Taghlib al-Ḥamdānī<sup>1</sup> I suppose is meant, 'the latter, who had a coat of mail lying before him, desired the poet to describe it in verse. Al-Salāmi immediately extemporised these lines :

How often has an ample (coat of mail) rendered me service and I requited it with evil, yet no one reproached me ; from morn to night it preserved me from death, and yet I exposed it to the strokes of every sword."

This idea is borrowed from a piece already quoted (No. 316, note), in which 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz speaks of boiled wine : he there says :

"It preserves me from the fires of hell, and that, we must allow, is a great service."

Al-Salāmi proceeded to the court of al-Šāhib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) at Iṣbahān, and recited to him the poem rhyming in b, which contains this verse :

"We abandoned ourselves to sin, when we found that forgiveness was the fruit of crime.

---

<sup>1</sup> For the history of Abū Taghlib al-Ḥamdānī, see No. 167 and Abu 'l-Fidā's Annals. years 358, 359. 367, 369.

This verse, which is one of his finest, contains an allusion to the idea expressed by Abū Nuwās al-Ḥasan Ibn Hānī (No. 162) in a poem the subject of which is self-mortification ; he says :

"You shall gnaw your hands with regret, for the pleasure which you avoided through fear of hell."

It approaches also to the thought which (the khalif) al-Māmūn thus expressed : "If criminals knew what pleasure I take in pardoning, they would strive to gain my favour by committing crimes." "Whilst al-Salāmi remained with the Ṣāhib, he enjoyed favours in profusion, ample honours and untroubled pleasure. At length he resolved on visiting the court of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh (No. 507) at Shīrāz, and the Ṣāhib not only provided him with a conveyance for his journey, but gave him a letter of recommendation addressed to the kātib Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Yūsuf an eloquent writer and one of the persons employed by 'Aḍud al-Dawlah in the capacity of wazīr. Here is a copy of the letter : 'Your lordship knows that the traders in poetry (shi'r) are more numerous than the hairs of the head (sha'r), and that those persons are much less so whose jewels, when offered (for sale), can be confidently taken as the workmanship of their own genius, and whose embroidered tissues, when presented (to a patron), can be considered as wrought on the loom of their own imagination. Now, amongst the persons whom I have put to the test and approved, whom I have tried and chosen, is Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad al-Salāmi, the originality of whose talent surpasses expectation, and hastens on in the career of excellence, tempting the ear to hearken with attention to his compositions and the eye to peruse them. Mounted on the steed of hope, he is induced to visit your Excellency, in the expectation of being admitted into the band of his fellow poets and attracting notice by sharing their good fortune. I have, therefore, dispatched (to you) in his person, the amīr of poets, escorted by the train of his (accomplishments), and I have adorned that vigorous courser of eloquence with the harness which becomes him. This, my letter, serves him as a guide towards the (regions watered by the) showers (of liberality), or rather as a conductor towards the ocean (of beneficence) ; therefore, if your lordship judge proper to take into consideration these words of mine in his favour, and to let them be the means of procuring your consent to his wishes, you will, I hope, execute what you resolve.' When Abu 'l-Qāsim received this letter, he took the poet under his charge and treated him with special favour. He then presented him to 'Aḡud al-Dawlah, that he might recite to that prince the qaṣīdah which contains this passage :

1 Ibn Khallikān here resumes his extract from the Yatīmah. See MS. No. 1370, Fol. 196 v.

"To reach thee, a man who made the sight of thy palace the term of his camel's journey, crossed the wide-extended desert. I and my courage in the depths of darkness, and my sword, were three companions, united like (the stars of the constellation of) the eagle. I encouraged my hopes with the sight of a king who (for me) would replace mankind, of a palace which (for me) would be the world, and of a day of meeting which (for me) would be worth an eternity'."

We have already mentioned these verses in the life of 'Aḡud al-Dawlah (No. 507). " 'Aḡud al-Dawlah then took him under the wing of his favour, and handed him the key which opened (the door) to the advantages he expected ; sojourning or journeying, he kept him attached to his person, and raised him to ample fortune by his donations. 'When I see al-Salāmi,' said he, 'at my levees, it seems to me as if the planet Mercury<sup>1</sup> had descended from its sphere to stand before me.' On the death of this prince, al-Salāmi returned to his usual habits, and his means underwent diminution ; sometimes, they rose, sometimes they fell, and so they continued till the moment of his death." He composed a number of highly beautiful qaṣīdahs on 'Aḡud al-Dawlah, and it is in one of those pieces that we find the following passage :

"I roused my boon companions as the dog-star passed above us, and the moon in the expanse of heaven seemed like a pond in the midst of a meadow. 'Awake.?' (said I), hasten to drink of generous wine, for this world is a mere illusion! the spy now sleeps from fatigue, and pleasure has awaked !' Satan prompted us (to sin), and we all declared him an excellent counsellor ! (we lay) prostrate on that battle-field (of pleasure), which is shunned by the vultures and beasts of prey<sup>1</sup>. The blooming flowers of our meadow were female cheeks, and female waists were its pliant shrubs. The enjoyments of life are always best hidden when the veils (in which false modesty shrouds us) are rent away. The cup-bearers passed the goblet around, and offered it to the guests as the falcon offers the game to the sportsman. The virgin liquor comes disguised by the admixture of water, concealed in it as the soul is concealed in the body. The red surface crowned with bubbles seems like a cheek receiving a kiss<sup>2</sup>. We at length sunk in prostration, but we had then before us for imām (to direct our devotions) the cords of the lute<sup>3</sup>. "

1 Tr. from previous p. note No. 8.

In another piece of verse, he says of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah :

"Thy bounty visits the needy, thy sword the rebel, and are received, that by hands, and this by necks. Each day adds to the treasury of thy glory, whilst it exhausts the wealth of thy treasury."

He said also of the same prince :

"For bravery and generosity his eulogists compared him to persons who, had they seen this prince, would have become the humblest of his servants. Why ! in his army he has fifty thousand 'Antars braver even than 'Antar and in his treasurers a thousand Hātims<sup>4</sup>.

In one of his pieces he says :

"If (our) lips be impressed upon thy cheek, they are imprisoned in the chains of thy ringlets<sup>5</sup>"

1 The poet here imitates a verse of Imra 'l-Qays, where he says : Et pernociavimus, feris a nobis retroce-dentibus, humi jacentes ac si du occisi essemus. (Diwān 'Amro 'l-Kais, p. 72).

2 The mouth, or rather the teeth, are compared to white objects, such as flowers, hailstones, bubbles on water, etc.

3 Literally : There we had for imām the imām and zīr. The treble cord of the lute is called the zīr ; the base was designated by the term imām.

4 The bravery of 'Antar and the generosity of Hātīm are well known.

5 See Introduction.

And from this verse al-Talla'fari took the idea expressed in the following line : "

"Suppose that a cheek be pressed to thine, how could thy ringlets, then imprisoned, roam freely.1"

Al-Salāmi had in fact recited to al-Talla'fari the piece to which this verse belongs. Al-Talla'fari's names were al-Shihāb (Shihāb al-Dīn) Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Mas'ūd al-Shaybānī<sup>2</sup>. We may sum up al-Salāmi's merits by saying that the greater part of his poems are exquisite. He was born in Karkh, the suburb of Baghdād, on Friday evening, the 6th of Rajab, A. H. 336 (January, A.C. 948),* and he died on Thursday, the 4th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 393 (March, A.C. 1003)†. Salāmi means belonging to Dār al-Salām (the abode of welfare), that is, Baghdād. This remark we have already made in the life of the hāfiẓ Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir (No. 599).

640 IBN SUKKARAH AL-HĀSHIMĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad, a celebrated poet of Baghdād and generally known by the appellation of Ibn Sukkarah al-Hāshimī, drew his descent from 'Alī, the son of al-Mahdi, the son of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, the 'Abbāsīd khalīf. Al-Tha'ālībī has an article on him, in which he says<sup>3</sup> : This poet had a great command over all the beauties of composition ; in the expression of novel and witty allusions he surpassed the ablest poets, even those who took the lead, directing, as he pleased, his course through the hippodrome of humour and licentiousness. It was currently said at Baghdād that an epoch

1 The verb راح here rendered by roam freely, bears also the signification of to smell sweetly. The poet plays upon this double meaning.

2 Ibn Khalikan has committed an error here : The author of the Yatimah informs us that al-Talla'fari's names were Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad. As for the poet and philologist Shihāb al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Mas'ūd al-Shaybānī al-Talla'fari, we learn from the Nujūm that he was born at Moṣul, A.H. 593 (A.C. 1196-7), and died at Ḥamāt in the month of Shawwāl A.H. 675 (March, A.C. 1277).

3 Yatimah, MS. No. 1370, fol. 207.

* 21 January.—Ed.

† 11 March.—Ed.

which bestowed upon the world such men as Ibn Sukkarah and Ibn Hajjāj (No. 186) was extremely bountiful and that these two were for that age what Jarīr (No. 127) and al-Farazdaq were for theirs." It is said that the diwān of Ibn Sukkarah's works contains upwards of fifty thousand verses. A charming comparison of his is that expressed in the following lines, composed on a boy bearing in his hand a branch tipped with flowers :

"A branch of willow (a slender-waisted youth) appeared, and in his hand a branch bearing a string of pearls. I stood in admiration at these two branches ; one bore a rising moon (a handsome face), and the other bore stars (flowers)<sup>1</sup> "

In another of his pieces he says :

"By Allāh ! I perish ! I despair of my life, unless I see that waist which laid waste my heart."<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Faṭḥ, a poet of Baghdād and generally known by the surname of Ibn Abi 'l-'Aṣb—or Ibn al-'Aṣb—al-Uṣhnānī al-Milḥī<sup>3</sup> relates as follows : "Ibn Sukkarah al-Hāshimī wrote to me these lines :

"O friend whom fortune has bestowed upon me ! fortune so avaricious in bestowing true friends ! We are now far asunder, and cannot meet except in dreams<sup>4</sup>. One single cause has placed a distance between us : I am sukkar (sugar) and thou art milḥ (salt)."

To this I wrote in reply :

"Shall our brethren say to a friend the sincerity of whose attachment is tainted with sarcasm : 'There is sugar

1 Here follow, in the original, two other pieces, each containing two verses. As they evidently refer to an unnatural passion, they have not been translated.

2 In the original is a play upon the words qāmat, aqāmat, and qiyāmat all deriving from the same root.

3 Uṣhnānī means belonging to Uṣhnān, a place near Baghdād. Milḥī signifies a seller of salt.

4 Literally ; Unless the ḥiyyāl (image of the friend, or of the beloved, seen in a dream) kindly effect (our) meeting.

between us, spoil it not !' or shall they say : 'Wretch that thou art! there is salt between us (prove not a traitor to it)'

In a satire directed against a man in power, Ibn Sukkarah said :

"You treat us with haughtiness, yet you are not a khalif or a khalif's heir. Be insolent, even more than you are, (I care not), I have neither pension nor place to lose. Say not : 'I am faultless : the chastest maiden is exposed to the strokes of slander. Poetry is fire without smoke, and rhymes possess a subtle magic. How many the powerful, the aspiring, whom a few words have hurled from their elevation. Musk, though worthy of all praise, is converted by satire into carrion.'<sup>2</sup>"

Another of his pieces is the following :

"I was asked what I had prepared against the cold which had just set in with intensity ; and I replied : "A waistcoat of nakedness, and underneath it a shirt of trembling."

He is also the author of the two following verses, quoted by al-Ḥarīrī in his Maqāmah, entitled al-Karajiyah<sup>3</sup> :

"The winter set in, and I provided myself with seven things necessary when the rain prevents us from pursuing our usual occupations. (These things are :) A shelter, a purse, a stove, a cup of wine preceded by a bit of meat, a tender maid, and a cloak<sup>4</sup>."

1 These words appear to mean : Friendship still subsists between us ; spoil it not ! Friendship cemented by conviviality subsists between us, but thou art about to ruin it.

2 Musk may be considered as carrion, because it is animal substance.

3 See de Sacy's Ḥarīrī, page 262.

4 In the Arabic, the names of the seven things commence with the letter k ; for which reason they are designated as the seven k's. By the sixth k (al-Kaf al-Sādisah) is meant the female sexual organ. Ibn 'Arab-Shāh relates in his history of Timūr, that Shāh Manqūr, on being advised by his principal officers to avoid a battle with so powerful a chief, held up his mace and exclaimed : "هذا الآف في الكاف السادسة من ام من يفرون تيمور" may this (mace, as strait, as the letter) alif be struck into the sixth kuf of the mother of him who flies from Timūr ! "—Manger, the editor of the text and Latin translation of that work, has as usual, completely misunderstood the passage.

Ibn al-Ta'āwidi<sup>1</sup>, a poet whose life we shall give, composed the following lines on the same model :

"When seven things are collected together in the drinking-room, it is not reasonable to stay away. These are : Roast meat, a melon, honey, a young girl, wax-lights, a singer to delight us, and wine<sup>2</sup>."

And Abu 'l-Thanā Maḥmūd Ibn Ni'mah Ibn Arsilān, the grammarian, composed these verses on the same-subject :

"They say that the k's of winter are numerous, and yet none can doubt that there is only one : If you possess the k of kīs (purse), you possess all the rest ; in the flesh of the onager is found the taste of every species of game<sup>2</sup>."

Speaking of youth, Ibn Sukkarah said :

"Youth has departed ! that youth which once was full of sap, covered with fruit and shady foliage. It was a portion of thyself, but it has perished ; know that when a portion of thyself has perished, all of thee has perished."

The poetical compositions of Ibn Sukarah abound in beauties. He died on Wednesday, the 11th of the latter Rabi' A.H. 385 (May, A.C. 995)*. The birth of Ibn Abi 'l-'Aṣb took place subsequently to the year 285 (A. C. 898), and, in the year 374 (A.C. 984-5), al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī al-Jawharī heard him repeat the verses quoted above. Abu 'l-Thanā Maḥmūd Ibn Ni'mah died at Damascus, A.H. 565 (A.C. 1169-70). The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn speaks of him in the Kharidah, and mentions that, in the year 563, he met him at Damascus and heard him repeat numerous fragments of his poetical compositions. Sukkarah (sugar) : this word is so well-known that it requires no explanation.

1 Here, the seven words begin by an sh.

2 This is a common proverbial expression. See Freytag's Meilanii proverbial, tom II, p. 316.

* 16 May.—Ed.

641 THE SHARĪF AL-RADĪ

The Sharīf al-Radī (the favourably accepted descendant of Muḥammad)<sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad, surnamed al-Mūsawī (the descendant of Mūsā), was the son of al-Ṭāhir Dhu 'l-Manāqib, the son of Abū Aḥmad al-Ḥusayn, the son of Mūsā, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Mūsā, the son of Ibrāhīm, the son of Mūsā al-Kāẓim<sup>2</sup>, the son of Ja'far al-Sādiq (No. 128), the son of Muḥammad al-Bāqir (No. 534), the son of 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn (No. 397), the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib; God's blessing on them all! The Sharīf al-Radī is the author of a diwān of poems, and al-Ṭha'ālībī (No. 356) has an article on him in the Yatīmah. "He began," says this writer<sup>3</sup>, "to utter verses soon after he had passed his tenth year, and he is, at this day, the most remarkable person that the age has produced, and the most illustrious of the descendants of Muḥammad who inhabit 'Irāq. To his noble origin and exalted hereditary glory, he joins the ornaments of brilliant literary information, splendid talents, and a copious portion of every fair endowment. He is moreover the ablest poet of all the descendants of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, past or present, though many of them were eminent in that art; were I even to declare him the best poet ever produced by the tribe of Quraysh, I should not be far from the truth. My words will be fully confirmed by a strong testimony, that of his high-aiming verses which defy the severest criticism and combine ease with majesty, facility with the perfection of art, and contain thoughts easy of comprehension and profound in meaning. His father had, in former days, exercised the functions of chief president of the descendants of 'Alī (niqābah nuqabā il-Ṭālibiyyin), first magistrate of the empire (al-Nazar fi 'l-Maẓālim) and commander of the pilgrim caravan; these offices then devolved to his son al-Radī, in the year 388 (A.C. 998), his father being still alive." One of his most brilliant

1 This person must not be confounded with 'Alī al-Riḍā, another member of the same family. See No. 398.

2 His life is given by our author.

3 See Yatīmah, MS. of the Bibliothèque impériale No. 1370, fol. 251.

qaṣīdahs is that which he addressed in the form of a letter to the imām (khalīf) al-Qādir bi Allāh Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad, the son of al-Muqtadir, and in which we find the following passage :

"I crave indulgence, Commander of the Faithful! we are not borne on different branches of the tree of glory! On whatever day we may vaunt our honours, no difference shall appear between us; we are both firmly rooted in our illustrious rank. The khalīfate alone makes a distinction between us; you wear that noble collar, I do not."

He is the author of these five lines :

"I aspired to honours, but they repelled my advances; the beloved always repels the lover. I waited with patience till I attained them, and I never said, through disgust: For an untoward wife, repudiation is the cure."

In one of his pieces he says :

"O my two friends! stop and satisfy my wishes: give me news of the land of Najd.<sup>1</sup> Is the enclosure of al-Wa'sā (the sandy grounds) covered with flowers? Have the rains refereshed Khamīlat al-Ṭalḥ (the acacia groves), where flourish the willow and the laurel? Must a dwelling between this and Kāzimah be my place of repose to-night? Shall I pass this evening in conversation with the people of that tribe? When they approach, the perfumes of Najd breathe from their garments, so lately was it that they departed from that home."

His poetical works fill a large diwān of four volumes. This collection is so frequently to be met with that it is useless to quote more passages of it. The grammarian Abu 'l-Faḥ Ibn Jinnī (No. 387) relates, in one of his compilation, that the Sharīf al-Raḍī, when a mere boy, under ten years of age, went to take lessons from the grammarian Ibn al-Sirāfi (No. 154), and one day, as he was sitting in the circle of scholars, his master questioned him on some points of syntax, according to the usual mode of instruction: "When we say," said he, "ra'ytu 'Umara" (I saw 'Umar), by what mark is it known that 'Umar is 'in the accusative case!?" To this the Sharif made answer; "By his hatred for 'Alī." Al-Sirāfi and all the other persons present were struck with his acuteness of mind. It is said that he commenced learning by heart the Qur'ān at an advanced age, and completed the task in a very short time. He composed a work on the rhetorical figures of the Qur'ān (Ma'ānī 'l-Qur'ān), to which it would be difficult to find one equal in merit; it indicates the author's vast information in grammar and philology. He drew up also a treatise on the metaphors of the Qur'ān (Majāzāt al-Qur'ān), one of the most remarkable works on the subject. Different persons have essayed to collect the poetical works of the Sharif al-Raḍī, but the best edition is that of Abū Ḥakīm al-Khabrī.<sup>2</sup> * I was told by a man of considerable talent that he read the following anecdote in a certain compilation. One of the literati happened to pass by the house of the Sharif al-Raḍī at Sarr man ra'ā; (Samarra) he was not aware of the circumstance, but being struck by the ravages it had sustained from time, by its decayed magnificence, its mouldering walls, and the shattered ruins which still testified its former splendour and beauty, he stopped to contemplate it, and reflect upon the vicissitudes of time and the sudden strokes of adversity. He then recited the following lines, composed by the Sharif al-Raḍī, applying them by an appropriate allusion to the objects before his eyes:

<sup>1</sup> See No. 498, note on Najd.

"I stopped at the vernal habitations of my friends, but the hand of ruin had devastated their walls. And I wept till my weary camel grew impatient and my fellow-travellers rebuked my delay. I then turned my eyes away from those mouldering remains; yet, when hidden from my sight, my heart still turned towards them."

1 'Umar is pronounced 'Umarū, in the nominative, and Umara in the dative and the accusative; there is nothing by which these two cases can be distinguished except the part of speech by which one or the other is governed. The accusative case, in Arabic, is called naṣb and the same word signifies malevolence. The Sharif took it in the latter meaning alluding to the manner in which his ancestor 'Alī was treated by 'Umar. One of the parties opposed to 'Alī was called Ahl al-Naṣb (the malevolents)—[according to the traditions of a particulars sech.—Ed.]

2 This name is printed in different manners: it may be read Khabrī, Khayrī, and Khubrī. I can find no information respecting the person who bore it.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Khayrī.—Ed.

'A person who passed by and heard him recite these verses, asked him if he knew to whom that house had belonged? He answered that he did not. 'Well,' said the man, 'it belonged to the author of these verses—to the Sharīf al-Raḡī.' The other was filled with astonishment at this singular coincidence." This reminds me of an anecdote somewhat similar which is related by al-Ḥarīrī (No. 510) in his Durrāt al-Ḡhawwās. 'Abīd Ibn Sharyah al-Jurhumī lived three hundred years<sup>1</sup>; he attained the epoch of the promulgation of Islāmism and became a convert to that faith. Having entered into the presence of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abī Sufyān, who was then in Syria and established in the khalīfate, that prince said to him; "Relate to me the strangest thing you ever saw." 'Abīd replied: "I passed one day near some people who were committing to the tomb the body of a relative. Having gone up to them, my eyes overflowed with tears and I recited these verses of a poet as applicable to the spectacle which I there beheld:

'O my heart! thou hast been seduced by (the charms of) Asmā; reflect (upon thy state); but can admonition now be of avail? Thou hast revealed thy love; thou concealest it from none; nay, thy rapid (tears) flow unrestrained. Thou knewest not, neither dost thou know, whether the prompt fulfilment of thy wishes will be more favourable to thy welfare than their tardy accomplishment. Let God dispose for thy good, and be resigned to His will; in the depth of misfortune happiness may arrive. Whilst man yet enjoys the pleasures of existence, he is turned into dust, and the winds efface even the marks of his tomb. The stranger who knew him not then weepeth over him, whilst his relations in the tents of the tribe are rejoicing.'

One of these people then asked me if I knew who was the author of these verses. I replied that I did not, on which he said: 'Him who first uttered them we have just buried; thou art the stranger who weepeth over him without knowing him, and that person who now cometh out from the tomb is his nearest relation and the man who most rejoiceth in his death." "Truly," said Mu'āwiyah "you saw a thing to wonder at; who was the dead man?" 'Abid answered: "He bore the name of 'Iṭhyar Ibn Labīd al-'Udhri.<sup>1</sup>" Let us return to the Sharīf. The Khatīb (No. 33) says, in his History of Baghdād, that, being in the presence of Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ibn Maḥfūz, who held a high rank in the service of the empire, he heard kātib Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh say that some literate men had declared, in his hearing, that the Sharīf was the best poet ever produced by the tribe of Quraysh. On this Ibn Maḥfūz said: "That is perfectly true; some poets there were among them who expressed themselves well, but their compositions were not numerous; none of them shone by the excellence and the quantity of his works but al-Raḍī." The Sharīf al-Raḍī was born at Baghdād, A. H. 359 (A.C. 969-70); he died there on Sunday morning the 6th of Muḥarram—some say, of Ṣafar—A. H. 406 (June, A.C. 1015),* and was interred at his residence situated in that part of the suburb of al-Karkh, which is called the street of the Anbārīte Mosque (khuff masjid il-Anbāriyīn). The house in which he resided fell into ruin, and all traces of his tomb disappeared. When the burial was about to take place, his brother Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Murtaḍā withdrew to the mausoleum of Mūsā Ibn Ja'far<sup>2</sup>, feeling his inability to support the sight of the bier and the interment; it was therefore the wazīr Fakhr al-Mulk who recited the funeral prayer in the house of the deceased, before a large assembly. His father al-Ṭāhir Dhu 'l-Manāqib Abū Aḥmad al-Ḥusayn was born A. H. 307 (A.C. 919-20); he died at Baghdād in the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 400 (Dec.-Jan. A.C. 1009-10) some say, 403 and he was interred in the funeral chapel of the Quraysh cemetery, near the Fig Gate (Bāb al-Tīn). His son al-Raḍī composed an elegy on his death, and Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46) deplored his loss in a qasīdah which begins thus:

---

1 Arabic writers are singularly credulous respecting the longevity of certain Arabs who flourished towards the time of Muḥammad. According to them, Labīd the poet lived one hundred and fifty years; 'Abīd al-Jurhumī, three hundred; and 'Abd al-Masīḥ, three hundred and fifty; but they died prematurely, compared with the two celebrated diviners Shiqq and Saṭīḥ, who attained the advanced age of six hundred years.

1 The editions of Gottingen and Boulae introduce here another anecdote of the same kind, containing same philological observations. As my manuscripts do not give it, I abstain from inserting it here.

2 The life of Mūsā Ibn Ja'far al-Kāzīm is given by Ibn Khallikān.

* Sunday fell on 6 Muḥarram corresponding to 27 June, A.C. 1015.—Ed.

"O that misfortune would cease to afflict us! the man is dead whose wealth was for the impoverished and whose acceptance, amber (bounty) for those who were desirous of perfumes (gifts)."

It is a long poem and displays the highest excellence. We have already spoken of his brother the Sharif al-Murtaḍā Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī (No. 418). Pronounce أبي 'Abid. and شريح Sharyah. Jurhumī means descended from Jurhum, the son of Qaḥṭān and the progenitor of a large and celebrated Yamanite tribe. 'Ithyar, in its primitive means dust, but it has been employed as a proper name for men. Of al-'Uḍhrī we have already spoken (No. 138).

642 IBN HĀNĪ THE POET

Abu 'l-Qāsim, surnamed also Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Hānī, a member of the tribe of Azd, a native of Spain, and a celebrated poet, is said to have drawn his descent from Yazīd Ibn Ḥātim Ibn Qabiṣa* Ibn al-Muḥallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah al-Azdī, or from Rūḥ Ibn Ḥātim (No. 228, note), Yazīd's brother. His father Hānī belonged to a village in the territory of al-Mahdiyyah, a city in Ifrīqiyyah, and displayed considerable talent as a poet and philologist. Having passed into Spain, he there became the father of Muḥammad, who was born at Seville and passed his early youth in that city. Muḥammad Ibn Hānī acquired, in the course of his studies, an ample stock of literary information, and displayed a superior talent for poetry. He knew by heart a great number of poems composed by the Arabs of the desert and numerous facts relative to the history of that people. Having gained the favour of the prince who governed Seville, he plunged into dissipation and incurred the suspicion of holding the doctrines of the philosophers (materialism). This report acquired at length such consistence, that it drew on him the hatred of the people; they murmured also against his patron, whom they imagined to hold the same impious opinions. The prince recommended him to retire from the city and remain absent till his conduct was forgotten; and Ibn Hānī left the place, being then twenty-seven years of age<sup>1</sup>. His subsequent adventures would afford matter for a long narration, but we shall only state, in a summary manner, that he crossed over to Maghrib, where he met and eulogized in verse the Qā'id Jawhar (No. 141), mawlā to al-Manşūr, and the same general who (afterwards) marched into Egypt and conquered that country for al-Mu'izz. He then went to visit Ja'far and Yaḥyā, the sons of 'Alī (No. 133), who were at that time governors of al-Masīlah, the capital of the province of al-Zāb<sup>2</sup>. They treated him with the utmost honour and kindness, but his reputation having reached al-Mu'izz Abū Tamīm Ma'add al-'Ubaydī, the son of al-Manşūr, that prince, whose life we shall give under the letter M, sent for him, and received him, on his arrival, with the highest marks of favour. Al-Mu'izz having then set out for Egypt, as we shall relate in his life, Ibn Hānī accompanied him to some distance and then returned to Maghrib with the intention of taking his family and rejoining the prince. Having set out with them, he arrived at Barqah, where he was hospitably received by one of the inhabitants, and passed some days with him in friendly intercourse. He there lost his life, in a drunken squabble it is said. But some persons relate that he went out of his host's dwelling in a state of intoxication, and, having fallen asleep on the road, he was found dead the next morning, but the cause of his death could not be ascertained. According to a third account, he was found strangled in the waistband of his trousers in one of the gardens<sup>3</sup> of Barqah. This event occurred on Wednesday morning the 23rd of Rajab, A.H. 362 (April, A.C. 973)*. He had then attained his thirty-sixth year; some say, his forty-second. Such is the information furnished by the author of

* Mr. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives Qubayṣah.—Ed.

---

1 This must have taken place in the year 347 or in 353. The prince Umayyad 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir was at the former epoch sovereign of Spain and held his court at Cordova. It was probably his son al-Ḥākim al-Mustaṣfir who then governed Seville and protected Ibn Hānī.

2 See my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Histoire des Berbers, tome II. page 553, and Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, tome III, page 316.

3 The word sawānī, the plural of sāniyah, means irrigated gardens. In its primitive acceptation, it designates the camels and wheels employed to draw up water from wells for agricultural purposes.

* 30 April.—Ed.

the History of Qayrawān<sup>1</sup>, but he gives us to understand that the poet was (travelling) with al-Mu'izz (when he lost his life), which is in contradiction with the statement which we have made, namely : that he accompanied al-Mu'izz to some distance and then returned to take his family. Al-Mu'izz had arrived in Egypt when he heard of Ibn Hānī's death. He expressed great grief at his loss and said : "We hoped to have placed this man in competition with the poets of the East, but that pleasure was refused us." Ibn Hānī composed some brilliant and exquisite poems on al-Mu'izz. In one of them, which is the qasīdah rhyming in n he begins thus<sup>2</sup> :

"Has Yabrin then become one of the valleys of 'Ālij ? or, rather, do the large-eyed gazelles (maidens) whom the camels bear along in covered litters belong to both these regions.<sup>3</sup> To whom were we indebted for the nights which, from the time these (maidens) existed, never excited our complaints, although (these fair ones) were sources of affliction (by their cruelty) ; (maidens,) brilliant as stars, graceful as the (pliant willow) branch, whose clear complexion (spread radiance around) even before the first smiles of the dawn ; and yet they were dark with the musk (blackness) of the fringe which adorns handsome females (the hair). For them the coral ensanguined the surface of its cheek, and (their teeth) made the pearls weep (with envy) in their shell. My lamentations for their departure excited the mournful cry of the turtle-dove, and served as an accompaniment to its monotonous

---

1 Seven or eight authors have composed works containing biographical notices on the eminent men of Qayrawān. I know not which of them our author had in view here.

2 This piece, which is extremely obscure and very incorrectly given in all the copies, does not admit of a literal translation. I have given, however, all the ideas, and followed the text as closely as I could, the text which I found in Ibn Hānī's Diwān, MS. of the Bibliothèque Imperiale, Supplement ar., No. 1056, fol. 168, but it was necessary to paraphrase most of the verses.

3 Yabrin and 'Ālij are the names of two places in Arabia. The meaning of the verse appears to be this : Has the territory of Yabrin been removed to the neighbourhood of 'Ālij, so that the numerous gazelles (nymphs) of both regions have been collected together ? Or rather, do not these gazelles of Maḥ̣ḥrib come from Yabrin and 'Ālij ? ". The Diwān reads عند خالج (the valleys of Khālij).

melody. They departed rapidly and as they saw (our grief), sighs proceeded from their litters, and plaintive cries were uttered even by the camels. Their (red) tents seemed to have given a tint to the morning<sup>1</sup>; or rather, (the evil influence of jealous) eyelids had cast a yellow hue over its cheek. Why should the robe of anemony (the carnation complexion) with which these maidens clothed their cheeks be not revealed to sight?" Now that they have departed, I let the meadows (where they sported) be parched with drought, and no copious tears of mine shall water (the thirsty soil). Shall I permit my eyes to borrow a stolen glance at the splendid aspect of their beauty, and thus deceive (their modest coyness)? No! I should then be disloyal. (For me) the land is no longer a brilliant land, even though arrayed in flowers! (For me) the water of the spring is no longer pure! Let (these fair ones) not depart! the soil of this land is amber, its woods are the (graceful) willows, and the sun its humble slave. (O for) the days when the canvass (tents) displayed in that land their alternate stripes, and the fine tissues (which formed our dress in times of peace) were folded up and laid by—when the lances were couched, the swords glittering, and the steeds ready to start. ! (I dwell with pleasure on) the recollection of (my beloved) Zamyā; her people were not jealous, neither was their warfare stubborn, (Hers) is the land which I regret, and yet it was a land of lances, and the coverts where its fawns took shelter were dens of lions. Can a sleek and rapid steed, well-girthed and mettlesome, bear me thither? (My companion shall be) a sword, the watered blade of which shows on its surface traces like the paths of the emmet, and which waits in ambush behind the point of my spear; its sharp edge is without a defect, and the souls (of foes) dwell upon its point; death was the water in which its steel was tempered, and its blade was not forged by (human) workmen. Before it descends, the victim seems already struck by the might of al-Mu'izz or by (the terror of) his cherished name."

In the same piece he gives the following description of horses:

"And neighing (steeds), for whom, on the day of inroad, the hills were not hills, neither was the rugged ground rugged; they were recognised the instant they passed all rivals, not by the fact that the eye could have followed them in their career on the day of trial. All that the lightning knows of them is, that they were borne along on its wings, and that their speed was equal to that of thought. The copious rains may serve (O prince !) as an emblem of thy liberality ; thy right hand seems to have touched the constellations which shed their humid influence upon the earth."<sup>1</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Red tents were used only by persons of the highest rank.

Were this high-sounding poem not so long, I should insert it all here : but what we give suffices to prove how highly the author ranked as a poet and to exhibit the peculiar beauty of his manner. His poetical works form a large volume, and were it not that he carries his eulogiums to an excess bordering on impiety, the diwān of his verses would be one of the finest which exists. The people of the Western countries have never possessed his equal either in ancient or modern times ; he is incontestibly their best poet, and they esteem him as much as the people of the East prize al-Mutanabbī (No. 49) : both were contemporaries, but some difference of opinions subsists relative to the superiority of the latter to Abū Tammām (No. 143). To discover the date of Ibn Hānī's death, I never ceased consulting historical works and other sources where that information might be expected to be found ; I questioned a great number of masters in this branch of science, but all my pains were useless, till, meeting with a little volume composed by Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Rashīq al-Qayrawānī (No. 157), and entitled Qurāḍat al-Dhahab, I discovered in it what I sought. From another quarter I learned the age at which he died. I found in a notice composed on the life

---

1 In the Diwān of Ibn Hānī, MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale, Supplement, this poem is preceded by the following short introduction : "It is said that this was the first qaṣīdah which he recited at Qayrawān, and that al-Mu'izz ordered him the presents of a carpet (?) (dast) valued at six thousand dinārs, and the poet said : 'Commander of the faithful ! I have no place large enough to hold it, if it be spread out'. On this, the prince ordered a palace to be built for him at the expense of six thousand dinārs and sent to it three thousand dinārs worth of furniture to match (the beauty of) the palace and the carpet." The Diwān of Ibn Hānī contains a great number of remarkable pieces, unfortunately the copy in the Bibliothèque imperiale, has neither gloss nor comment.

of Ibn Hānī by an author of talent and prefixed to the diwān of his poems, that he lived to the age here mentioned ; but the date of his death is not given, the writer not having been able to meet with it. It is said that, when Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46) heard any of Ibn Hānī's verses recited, he used to say : "I can only compare that to a mill grinding horns ;" alluding to the harshness of the poet's phraseology ; he pretended also that, under these rugged terms no real meaning existed. This opinion I am obliged to declare unjust, but he was led into it by his partiality for al-Mutanabbī. To sum up in a word Ibn Hānī's merits, we cannot but pronounce him one of the great poets.

643 IBN 'AMMĀR DHU 'L-WIZĀRATAYN

Dhu 'l-Wizāratayn<sup>1</sup> Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Ammār al-Mahrī al-Andalusī al-Shilbī (native of Silves in Portugal) was a celebrated poet, the rival of Ibn Zaydūn al-Qurṭubī (No. 56), and nurtured, like him, in the practice of the varied styles of elegance in literary composition ; they were, in fact, the two great poets of that age. The princes of Spain dreaded Ibn 'Ammār for the acrimony of his tongue and his talent (as a satirist) and more particularly when al-Mu'tamid 'alā Allāh Ibn 'Abbād, the sovereign of the west of Spain<sup>2</sup> [his life will be found (No. 660), under the letter M], took him into favour, adopted him for a companion, and raised him to the rank of wazīr and privy counsellor. Al-Mu'tamid then confided to him the seal of the empire and dispatched him as amīr (to lead his armies). And yet the time had been when Ibn 'Ammār was a person of no importance ; but now, he marched in pomp, followed by tents, 1 Dhu 'l-wizāratayn, the regular title of the grand wazīr under the first Spanish dynasties, signifies holder of the two wazīrships, namely, that of the sword and that of the pen ; this officer was generalissimo and secretary of state. But, (in Spain,) the title of wazīr was common to all who were admitted into the intimacy of the sovereign and were attached to his personal service. The wazīr who acted as his lieutenant bore the title of Dhu 'l-Wizāratayn (See Maqqarī, Arabic text, Vol. I. p. 320).

2 The 'Abbādite dynasty, of which al-Mu'tamid was the third sovereign, reigned at Seville.

steeds, led-horses, troops and squadrons, drums beating behind him, banners and colours flying over his head. Having taken possession of the city of Tudmir<sup>1</sup>, he became one of those who mount the pulpit and the throne<sup>2</sup>, notwithstanding his incapacity as a statesman and his inability as a ruler. He then rose against the sovereign who had every right to his gratitude, and hastened to disobey his orders and infringe his rights. But al-Mu'tamid had recourse to stratagem and directed against him the arrows of wily artifice, till he deprived him of all means of escape and got him into his power. He then slew him, by night, in the palace, with his own hand, and ordered the corpse to be buried. This occurred at Seville in the year 477 (A.C. 1084-5). Ibn 'Ammār was born A. H. 422 (A.C. 1031)<sup>3</sup>. His friend Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Jalīl Ibn Wahbūn al-Mursī (No. 49, note) composed an elegy on his death, in which he said :

"'Tis strange! I shed floods of tears for his loss, and yet I must exclaim: May the right hand of him who slew him be never blasted!"

Abū Naṣr al-Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān (No. 500) says, in his Qalā'id al-Iqyān: "Some years later, I saw the bones of Ibn 'Ammār's legs taken out of an excavation which was making close to the palace; the bracelets were still closed around them, having never been taken off or undone. O that they were still closely filled<sup>4</sup>! The people looked on at this moral lesson, and the most incredulous then believed the history of his death." By bracelets (asāwir) the writer means fetters. One of Ibn 'Ammār's most celebrated qaṣīdahs is that in which he says:

"Pass round the glass! the zephyrs are come, and the Pleiades rein in (their steeds) and cease their nocturnal journey.

1 See note on Tudmir below.

2 That is, he pronounced the khutbah from the pulpit as representative of the sovereign, and he sat on the throne as governor of the province.

3 For a full account of Ibn 'Ammār's life and adventures see the fourth volume of Dozy's Historie de l'Espagne musulmane.

4 By this he expresses his wish to see Ibn 'Ammār again among the living. A fetter is closely filled when the prisoner is alive, and loosely when the flesh has mouldered away in the tomb. I read وليتهما مشددة.

The morning has bestowed upon us its camphor (brightness), now that the night has taken from us its amber (darkness)."

In the eulogistic part of that poem, he says of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād :

"When princes crowd towards the fountain (of glory) and he approaches, they advance not to it until he has quenched his thirst and retired. (His presence is) more soothing to the heart than the dew-drop, and more grateful to the eyes than balmy sleep. It is he who striketh sparks from (the steel of) glory ; he never leaves the fire of war, but he lights the fire of hospitality."

It is a long and excellent poem<sup>1</sup>. Another of his good pieces is that rhyming in m, and composed also in honour of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād. It begins thus :

"If not for me, for whom do the clouds shed their tears? If not for me, for whom do the doves utter their plaintive cry?"

He gives in it the following description of his native place :

"May the rains clothe it in a mantle of youth, for there it was that puberty delivered me from the amulets of childhood. (Standing) there, I recalled to mind the days of love, and that recollection awoke the flames of passion in my bosom. (I thought of) those nights when I heeded not the advice of reproofing friends, and turned not away from the delusive path of the lover ; when the eyes of slumbering maidens kept me awake, and their graceful figures kept me in torment. (I thought of) the night we passed at Suddatayn,* where the meandering river glided on like a serpent ; (where the breezes) flitted to and fro, like envious tale-bearers passing between us. We remained that night, unseen by treacherous spies in a spot as retired as that in which the secrets of the bosom lie concealed."

In the eulogistic part of the same poem he says :

<sup>1</sup> Ibn Khāqān gives it in the Qalā'id.

* 'Abd al-Hamīd gives : السدين al-sadd bayn meaning dam.

"Princes at whose abodes glory took its station, palaces, the dwellings renown. Their noble house, founded by the sword, is supported by the spear. When terror arrests the step (of the warriors), these (princes) lead them on with long lances in the outstretched arm. Their hands scorn to return (from combat) till they succeed in cutting off (a prisoner's) forelock or a foeman's head. (Constant) guests (at the banquet) of war, they pass the death-cup around, as their swords, with redoubled strokes, cleave the skulls. With them we see the lance couched in support of honour, and the spear brandished in execution of noble designs."

In the same piece, he says (of the prince) :

"See him, when they take to horse, the first to strike the foe ; behold him, when they dismount, the last to partake of food."

This is also a long and magnificent piece. One of the crimes imputed to him by al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād was his having composed two satirical lines on his father al-Mu'taḍid and himself. These lines, which we here give, were the principal cause of his death :

"What makes me dislike conversing of Spain, is to hear of a Mu'taḍid's being there and a Mu'tamid ; two royal names out of their place<sup>1</sup> ; it reminds me of the cat which strives, by swelling, to attain the size of the lion."

His poetry abounds in beauties. Mahl means descended from Mahrah Ibn Ḥaydān Ibn al-Ḥāf Ibn Quḍā'ah (the progenitor of) a great tribe from which many persons derived their surname. Shilbī means belonging to Shilb (Silves), a maritime city in the Spanish peninsula. Tudmir is the same city as Murcia<sup>2</sup> ; al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād sent Abū Bakr Ibn 'Ammār to Tudmir as his lieutenant ; Ibn 'Ammār revolted there, and al-Mu'tamid never discontinued his efforts to circumvent him till he got him

1 These name were first borne by 'Abbāsīd khalīfs.

2 The city and territory of Tudmir were so called after Theodomir, a Gothic general who encountered the Arabs on their first invasion. He continued his resistance for some time after the defeat and death of king Roderic, but finally made peace with 'Abd al-'Azīz, the son of Mūsā Ibn Naṣīr, (Nuṣayr?) and obtained for himself a principality which included the provinces of Valencia and Murcia.

into his power and put him to death, as we have already said. This event is so well known, that we need not enter into details. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Isbahānī says, in his Kharīdah, when giving a notice on Ibn 'Ammār and an account of his death: "One of the principal circumstances which conduced to his death was, his composing a satirical poem on al-Rumaykiyah, the concubine by whom al-Mu'tamid had his children; in one passage he says:

'You chose her from among the daughters of an ignoble stock, that Rumaykiyah a woman who (if slain) would not be worth the price of her blood. She brought (into the world) a puny race, doubly vile by their paternal and maternal descent.'

I must here observe that al-Rumaykiyah, the concubine of al-Mu'tamid, was purchased by him, in his father's lifetime, from (one) Rumayk Ibn Ḥajjāj, and that she was surnamed after her former master. Al-Mu'tamid displayed an extreme attachment to her and allowed her to acquire a great ascendancy over him. Her real name was I'timād (support) and this induced him to assume the corresponding surname of al-Mu'tamid (the supported). She died at Aghmāt (in Morocco) subsequently to al-Mu'tamid. After his death, she neither shed a tear nor uttered a sigh, but expired of grief. It was she who excited al-Mu'tamid's anger against Ibn 'Ammār, being incensed at the satire which that poet had directed against her. It is said, however, that he was not the author of the piece, but that his enemies passed it under his name with the intention of irritating al-Mu'tamid's heart against him.

644 ABŪ BAKR IBN AL-ŠĀ'IGH IBN BĀJJAH (AVEMPACE)

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Bājjah al-Tujibī al-Andalusī al-Saraqustī (native of Saragossa in Spain) and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Šā'igh (the son of the goldsmith), the philosopher, was a poet of considerable celebrity. Al-Faḥ Ibn Khāqān (No. 500) mentions him in the Qalā'id al-Iqiyān and represents him as an atheist and an infidel, professing the doctrines held by the (ancient) sages and philosophers. The same author says of him, in his Matmah al-Anfus<sup>1</sup>: "He studied these doctrines<sup>2</sup> and directed his mind towards the dimensions of the spheres and the boundaries of the climates; he rejected the book of God the All-wise and haughtily cast it behind his back<sup>3</sup>; he wished to prove false that revelation which falsehood never does nor can attain<sup>4</sup>, and applied himself exclusively to astronomy. He denied that we should return unto God, and he declared his belief in the governing influence of the stars; boldly insulting the majesty of the intelligent and All-knowing God, he hearkened with audacious indifference to His threats and prohibitions, laughing to scorn these words of His: He Who hath placed thee under the rule of the Qur'an will surely bring thee back unto Him<sup>5</sup>; he believed time to be a revolution (of vicissitudes), and considered man as a plant or a flower for which death was the ripening, and for which the snatching out (of existence) was the gathering of the fruit. Faith disappeared from his heart and left not a trace behind; his tongue forgot (the praises of) the Merciful, neither did (the holy) name cross his lips." But I must say that Ibn Khāqān's statement is exaggerated, and that he passes all bounds in accusing him of doctrines so perverse<sup>6</sup>. God, however, knows best what

1 This passage is also to be found in the Qalā'id. For an account of the Maṭmah, see Dozy's Historia Abbassidarum, page 10.

2 I suspect that the word ta'dīm, here rendered by doctrines, means the mathematics.

3 Qur'an, sūrah, 3, verse 184.

4 Qur'an, sūrah, 41, verse 42.

5 Qur'an, sūrah, 28, verse 85.

6 Through the diffuse and pretentious phraseology of Ibn Khāqān, in his Qalā'id, we perceive that Ibn Bājja was wazīr to the amir Abū Bal'īr Ibn Ibrāhīm (governor of Murcia), and that he removed to Valencia on perceiving the progress made by the Christians. He then proceeded to Saragossa, and, after the capture of that city by king Alphonso, he went to Xativa, where he was imprisoned by Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm, the amir of that place, and returned to Islāmism that he might save his life. It appears also that, during his wazīrate, he had offended 'Imād al-Dawlah Ibn Hūd, sovereign of Saragossa, and, at a later period, that prince was on the point of putting him to death. Ibn Khāqān informs us also that Ibn Bājja was a skilful musician.

his principles were. The same writer quotes the following amongst other pieces of Ibn al-Ṣā'igh's poetry :

'Inhabitants of Nu'mān al-Arāk<sup>1</sup>, know that in my bosom also you possess an abode ! Continue to preserve (for me) your friendship ; alas ! how long have I suffered from the perfidy of men in whom I placed my trust. Ask the nights which I have passed, if slumber ever imbued my eyelids since you pitched your tents in a distant land ! Ask your skies if ever the swords of their lightnings were drawn without their finding sheaths in my eyes<sup>2</sup>.

When I was in Aleppo, a learned Maghribiyan shaykh recited to me these lines as having been composed by Ibn al-Ṣā'igh, but, some time after, I met with them in the diwān containing the works of Abu 'l-Fityān Muḥammad Ibn Ḥayyūs, a poet whose life shall be given in (No. 647). This led me to doubt the exactitude of the shaykh's statement, and I said (to myself) that he was probably mistaken but I then found the piece in (Ibn Khāqān's) Maṭmah, where it is given as Ibn Ṣā'igh's. God best knows by which of the two it was composed. The following piece is also by Ibn al-Ṣā'igh :

"(The travellers) encamped amidst the flowers of the meadow, where the fluttering zephyr breathed perfumes around. I sent my heart to accompany their heavy-laden camels, and, bleeding from its wounds, it followed in the path of the caravan. Why didst thou not ask their captivated (lover) if they had not among them a prisoner to be set free (from the bonds of love) ? thou mightst have asked him, jealous (though he was). I swear by Him Who made their (slight and) graceful figures with the (slender) twigs (of the willow), and their teeth with the (white) anthemis flowers, that, as the zephyr fled by me since their departure I never inhaled it, without breathing it forth in an ardent flame."

1 Nu'mān al-Arāk (Nu'mān of the acacia trees) is the name of a valley near Iṣṣakāh. It is frequently mentioned by the Arabic poets, because the manners of its inhabitants presented a perfect image of pastoral life.

2 The poet's meaning is, that he kept his eyes always turned in the direction of their abodes. H : plays also upon the word jufūn (sheaths of the eye eyelids) and ajfān (scabbards).

When his death drew near, he repeated these lines :

"I said to my soul when death stood before it, and, when impelled by terror, it fled to the right and to the left : 'Stand and support the evil thou abhorrest ; how long wert thou accustomed to seek for death as a refuge (against affliction) ?' "

He died at Fez in the year 533 (A.C. 1132-39), from eating a poisoned badinjān<sup>1</sup>. By another account, his death is placed in 525. Bājjah is the name of silver in the language of the western Franks<sup>2</sup> Tujibī, pronounced also Tajībī, means descended from Tujib, the mother of 'Adī and Sa'd, the sons of Ash, as Ibn Shabīb Ibn al-Sukūn. She herself was the daughter of Thawbān Ibn Sulaym Ibn Madhij, and her sons were surnamed after her. Saraqusfī means belonging to Saraqusfah (Saragossa) a city of Spain which produced a number of learned men. It was taken by the Franks in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 512 (January A.C. 1119).<sup>3</sup>

645 IBN AL-RAFFĀ AL-RUṢĀFĪ.

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ghālib al-Raffā al-Andalusi al-Ruṣāfī (a native of al-Ruṣāfah in Spain and) a well-known poet, is the author of some charming verses in which he displays an elegant talent for versification. His poems are widely circulated throughout all (Muslim) countries. One of his most celebrated pieces is that composed on a young girl who followed the trade of weaving :

1 The badinjān is the egg-plant, or solanum melongena of Linnaeus.

2 I know of no European word bearing a resemblance to bājjah and signifying silver, except the Italian baiocco, the coin so called ; the word pajolu existed in the old Italian, but, according to the cardinal Zurlo (in a treatise cited by the viscount de Santarem, in his Recherches sur la decouverte des pays situes sur la cote occidentale de l' Afrique), it signifies gold. It is, perhaps, an alteration of the Spanish word plata.

3 It was taken by Alphonso I., king of Arragon. M. de Gayangos has given a translation of Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah's life of Ibn Bājjah in the appendix to the first volume of his Muḥammedan Dynasties in Spain. Munk has published a good article on Ibn Bājjah in his Melanges de philosophie arabe et juive, p. 385 et. seq.

"(My friends) made me long reproaches for loving her, and they said : 'Wert thou enamoured with any but a vile and worthless creature (we should excuse you)'. I replied : 'Had I power to control my passion, I should hearken to (your advice), but I have not that power. I love her for her pearly teeth, the perfume of her mouth, the sweetness of her lips, the magic of her eyes ; (I love) that gazelle (ghuzayyil) in whose fingers the thread (ghazl) ever revolves, like the mind (of the poet) when composing sonnets (ghazal) on his mistress. Gaily her hand piles the shuttle across the warp, playing it as fortune plays with the hopes of man ; pulling with her hand, striking with her foot, she seems like the deer entangled in the toils of the hunter. ' "

Another exquisite piece of his is that which he composed on a young girl, who pretended to weep and moistened her eyes with saliva :

"Let me be excused for loving that wanton (maid) who weeps (as if) in sadness and yet whose bosom is free from the (sorrow) she affects. She moistens her eyes with saliva to imitate tears, though she smiles like the (opening) flowers. She would make us think that moisture to be the drops of her eyelids ; but when was wine (saliva) extracted from the narcissus (the eye)<sup>1</sup> ? "

In another piece he says :

"A maid who resembled the willow branch by her slender waist, but not by her aspect, for that troubled every heart, was sleeping during the moon-tide heats, her cheek crowned with perspiration ; and I said : 'Behold the rose moist with its own sap. ' "

This poet died at Mālaqā in the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 572 (March, A.C. 1177). Ruṣāfī means belonging to al-Ruṣāfah, a small town in Spain, near Valencia. There is another village of the same name near Cordova ; this one was built by 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, the first Umayyad sovereign of Spain ; he was called al-Dākhil (the enterer, the new comer) because he entered into Spain on leaving Syria, whence he had fled through fear of the 'Abbāsīd (khalīf), Abū Ja'far al-

<sup>1</sup> See Introduction to vol. 1.

Maṅṣūr. His adventures are well known. On entering Spain, he obtained possession of the country and was proclaimed sovereign at Cordova on the day of the Festival of the Sacrifice, A. H. 138 (May, A.C. 756),* at the age of twenty-five years. He built this place and named it after the celebrated village in Syria, founded by his grandfather, Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. Such are Yāqūt al-Ḥmawī's words, in his Mushtarik<sup>1</sup>; he indicates nine places bearing this name, but these I abstain from mentioning, to avoid lengthening the present article. He does not, however, notice the Ruṣāfah of Valencia; that would have made up ten places of the name.

646 IBN ZUHR (AVENZOAR)

Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Iyādī, the son of Abū Marwān 'Abd al-Malik, the son of Abu 'l-Alā Zuhr, the son of Abū Marwān 'Abd al-Malik, the son of Abū Bakr Muḥammad, the son of Marwān, the son of Zuhr, a native of Seville in Spain, belonged to a family of which all the members were (either) men of learning (in the law), chiefs (in the civil administration), physicians, or wazīrs<sup>2</sup>; they obtained the first offices in the state, they enjoyed the favour of sovereigns and exercised great authority. The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Ibn Diḥyah (No. 472) says, in his work entitled al-Muṭrib min Ash'ār Ahl al-Maghrib [the charming (portion) of the poems composed by people of the west]. "Our shaykh Abū Bakr," meaning Ibn Zuhr, "occupied a firm station in philology, and drew his knowledge of medicine from the purest sources; he knew by heart the poems of Dhu 'l-Rummah (No. 498) (and they form the third part of the language spoken by the desert Arabs), to which he joined a full acquaintance with all the doctrines held by the physicians; he enjoyed high favour under the sovereigns of the West; his family was ancient,

1 The life of this geographer is given by Ibn Khallikān.

2 The Avenzoars belonged to the Arabian tribe of Iyād 'bn Nizār.

* 14 May.—Ed.

his wealth great, and his possessions ample. I attended his lessons during a long period, and derived from him a copious share of literary information." He then gives the following verses as Ibn Zuhr's :

"Whilst the fair ones lay reclining, their cheek pillowed on the arm, a hostile inroad of the dawn took us by surprise. I had passed the night in filling up their cups and drinking what they left ; till inebriation overcame me, and my lot was also theirs. The wine well knows how to avenge a wrong ; I turned the goblet up, and that liquor turned me down."

After quoting this passage, he adds : "I asked him the year of his birth, and he replied, in 507 (A.C. 1113-4) ; towards the close of A.H. 595 (October, A.C. 1199) I received news of his death." In these verses, Ibn Zuhr comes near the idea expressed by the ra'īs Abū Ghālib 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Hibat Allāh al-Aṣḥabī<sup>1</sup>* in the following lines :

"I filled them out cool draughts of a liquor which, did it keep peace towards those who drink it, had not been named 'uqār'. It called to mind the wrongs it suffered of old when it lay prostrate (in the vintage. vat) and the presser trod it under foot. It then

1 Abū Ghālib al-Aṣḥabī, surnamed Tāj al-Ru'wasa (crown of the *ra'īs*es, most probably because he held under the empire the highest rank as a ra'īs, or chief in the civil administration,) was sub-director of the register and general account office نائب عن ديوان الزمام in the reign of the khalīf al-Muqtadī. Under the reign of al-Mustaẓhir, he acted for a time as secretary of state. He composed a work as a guide for secretaries<sup>2</sup> (علم الكتاب) and the *kātib*s of 'Irāq drew up the public accounts after the system introduced by him (يكتبون الحساب على طريقته). He embraced Islāmism in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 484 (March-April, A.C. 1091) one day before the conversion of Ibn al-Mūsālāyā (see No. 484, note), in consequence of an edict emanating from the court of the khalīf (التوقيع الشريف) ordering the dhimmīs, that is, the Christians, Jews, and Ṣābeans, to wear certain marks by which they might be distinguished from the Muslims. (Kharidāh, MS. No. 1447, fol. 7.) This Abū Ghālib was probably the son of the Hibat Allāh mentioned in the life of Ibn al-Mūsālāyā.

2 The word عقار signifying wine, is derived from a root which means to wound to hamstring.

* Abd al-Ḥamīd gives Ibn Sā'id instead of al-Aṣḥabī.—Ed.

yielded to them, but when they drank to intoxication, it got them in its power and cried : 'Now is the time for vengeance' ! "

It is said that he is the author of the following lines on one of the most esteemed and voluminous works studied by physicians, namely, Galen's Ḥilat al-Bar'i<sup>1</sup>.

"The Ḥilat al-Bar'i was composed to keep the sick in hopes of life or to divert their fears ; but, when death comes, it says : the Ḥilat al-Bar'i is not a means of cure<sup>2</sup>"

In one of his poems, Ibn Zuhri expresses the ardent desire which he felt for the sight of his child (from whom he happened to be separated) ; in this piece he says :

"I have a little one, a tender nestling<sup>3</sup>, with whom I have left my heart. I dwell far from him ; how desolate I feel in the absence of that little person and that little face. He longs for me, and I long for him ; for me he weeps, and I weep for him. (Our) affectionate wishes are weary with passing from him to me, from me to him."

When his hair turned grey with age, he composed these lines :

"I looked into the polished mirror and my eyes know not the object they beheld. I saw a little old man whom I did not recognise, although I had formerly seen him a youth. 'Where,' I exclaimed, 'is the person who was here yesterday ? when, when did he depart ?' The mirror smiled and answered with surprise : 'He is here, but thy eyes recognise him not. The fair Sulaymā used to call thee brother, but now she calls thee papa.'"

This last verse is a reminiscence of the idea expressed by the celebrated poet al-Akḥṭal<sup>4</sup> in the following lines :

1 Ḥilat al-Bār'i (the means of cure) is the title given to the Arabic translation of Galen's work de methodo medendi (Greek version).

2 The last verse may also be translated thus : But when death comes, the Ḥilat al-Bar'ee says : "There is no means of cure."

3 Literally : Like a young quṭā. The qaṭā is a species of grouse.

4 The life of al-Akḥṭal, an anteislamic poet, has been given by M. Caussin de Perceval in the Journal Asiatique for April, 1834.

"When the girls call thee uncle, that title serves only to increase thy vexation, but when they call thee dear brother, it indicates a feeling nearer to love and attachment."

He gave directions that when he died, the following lines should be inscribed upon his tomb ; they contain an allusion to his medical occupations :

"Stand and reflect ! behold the place to which we are all impelled. The earth of the tomb covers my cheek, as if I had never trod upon its surface. I treated people to save them from death, yet here I am, brought to it myself."

These verses which I received from the lips of some learned men are attributed to Ibn Zühr, but God best knows whether they are genuine or not ; we have nothing in support of their authenticity but the word of those who transmitted them. Ibn Dihyah speaks of him in these terms : "And a species of composition for which our master was specially distinguished and wherein his imagination swayed his genius, so that persons of the highest talent became his humble followers, was that of muwashshah<sup>1</sup>, compositions which are the cream, the quintessence, the substance, the pure extract of poetry, and an art, by the invention of which the people of the West surpassed those of the East, and wherein they shone like the rising sun and the brightness which illuminates." He then gives a muwashshah of the poet's which is very fine. Speaking of Abu 'l-'Alā Zühr, Ibn Zühr's grandfather, the same writer says : "He was the Wazir of that epoch and its grandee, the philosopher of that age and its physician. He died at Cordova, A.H. 525 (A.C. 1130-1), from the sufferings caused by an ulcer which broke out between his shoulders." Of his great-grandfather, 'Abd al-Malik, he says : "He travelled to the East, where he long practised as a physician and became head of the faculty in Baghdād ; he then removed to Egypt and afterwards to Qayrawān. At a later period, he took up his residence at Denia, whence his reputation spread over all the regions of

1 See Introduction. to vol. I.

Spain and Maghrib. His pre-eminence in the art of medicine was so conspicuously displayed that he outshone all his contemporaries. He died at Denia." Of Muḥammad Ibn Marwān, the grandfather of Ibn Zuhr's grandfather, Ibn Dihyah writes as follows :

"He was learned in speculation<sup>1</sup>, a ḥāfiẓ in literature<sup>2</sup> and a jurisconsult singularly acute in his fatwās (opinions) ; he held a high rank in the general council (of his native place)<sup>3</sup>, he was versed in various sciences remarkable for his handsome mien and talents, a transmitter of traditional literature, and, moreover, a man of extensive information. He died at Ṭelabirah (Talavera), A.H. 422 (A.C. 1031), aged eighty-six years. A great number of learned Spaniards delivered traditional information on his authority, and they spoke highly of his piety, merit, generosity, and beneficence." We have already explained the words Iyādī (No. 31) and Ṭalabirah<sup>4</sup> ; this dispenses us from repeating our observations here. Zuhr is to be pronounced with an u after the z, then an h, without a vowel, followed by an r. The kätib 'Imād al-Dīn says, in his Khariḍah, that the following lines were composed on a member of this family, called Abū Zayd Ibn Zuhr, by Abū 'l-Ṭayyib Ibn al-Bazzār :

"Tell the plague and Ibn Zuhr that they had passed all bounds in working deeds of woe. Say to them : Spare mankind a little ! one of you is quite enough."

I have since found these verses attributed to Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Abyaḍ, a person who is stated to have died in the year 544 (A.C. 1149-50)<sup>5</sup>.

---

1 Speculation, in Arabic rā'i. He perhaps means Ḥanafite jurisprudence. See vol. I. Introduction and No. 227, note.

2 That is, he knew by heart a great number of literary pieces preserved by tradition.

3 Seville became a republic towards the year 1023.

4 The author has not yet spoken of Talabirah.

5 In the appendix to Maqqari's Muḥammadan dynasties in Spain, by M. de Gayangos, will be found a translation of the lives of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Zuhr and Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Zuhr, from the Arabic of Ibn Abi 'Uṣaybi'ah.

647 IBN ḤAYYŪS

Abu 'l-Fityān Muḥammad Ibn Sulṭān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥayyūs Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Murtaḍā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Haytham Ibn 'Uṭhmān al-Ḡhanawī, surnamed Muṣṭafa 'l-Dawlah* (the chosen of the empire), and styled al-Amīr (the amīr) because his father was amīr over the Arabs of the desert, ranks among the ablest poets of Syria. The collection of his poetical works forms a large dlwān. He met a number of princes and great men by whom he was amply rewarded for the poems which he composed in their praise, but he attached himself more particularly to the Banū Mirdās, a family which then reigned at Aleppo. Al-Jawhari says, in (his lexicon) the Ṣaḥāḥ, under the root r d s; "mirdās signifies a stone which is thrown into a well for the purpose of discovering if there be water in it or not. It is used also as a proper name for men." Ibn Ḥayyūs composed in their honour some beautiful qaṣīdahs, and his adventure with Jalāl al-Dawlah Ṣamṣām al-Dawlah<sup>2</sup> Abu 'l-Muzaḥḥar Naṣr Ibn Maḥmūd Ibn Shibl al-Dawlah Naṣr Ibn Šāliḥ Ibn Mirdās al-Kilābī, the sovereign of Aleppo, is well-known. The circumstances of it were these: Having celebrated the praises of Maḥmūd Ibn Naṣr, that prince rewarded him with the gift of one thousand dinārs. On the death of Maḥmūd, he went to his son and successor (Jalāl al-Dawlah) Naṣr and recited to him his poem rhyming in r, in which he extolled the qualities of the new sovereign and condoled with him on the loss of his father. It began thus:

"The rank which fortune has bestowed upon thee is a sufficient glory for religion; those who (like me) have made a vow (for thy accession) must now engage in its fulfilment."

In one passage of it, he says:

(In thee) eight (qualities) are combined, which never were nor ever will be separated as long as the eyelash protects the eye:

1 Ḡhanawī signifies descended from Ḡhanī Ibn A'ṣur, the progenitor of a family which formed a branch of the Qays 'Aylān Arabs.

2 This double title signifies: magnificence and sword of the empire. In Ibn al-'Adīm's History of Aleppo, the title of Naṣr Ibn Maḥmūd is not given.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, gives Ṣafī 'l-Dawlah.—Ed.

firm belief and piety, beneficence and wealth, eloquence and depth of thought, resolution and success."

Alluding to Naṣr's accession on the death of his father he says :

"We bore with patience the sentence pronounced by tyrant time ; but, without thee, patience had not been possible. (Time) overwhelmed us with a misfortune which surpassed our deepest feelings of) affliction, and was equalled only by those favours (which thy father granted and) for which (our utmost) gratitude was insufficient."

In another passage, he says :

"I left thee through constraint, not through self-mortification ; I went to find thee when evil fortune overtook me, and (with thee) I found a secure shelter to which no obstacle debarred access, and a door of glory to which no curtain impeded our approach. Long did I dwell in the bondage of thy beneficence ; thy noble acts ceased not, neither did my bondage cease. Thus the Lord of the heavens fulfilled His generous promise, that adversity should be followed by prosperity. The son of Naṣr bestowed upon me one thousand pieces taken from the stock (of his treasures), and I well know that his son Naṣr will repeat the gift. I was told to expect as much ; and why should I not, since command and prohibition depend upon thy will ? I need not press and insist ; the merchandise is known and the price is fixed. I have pitched near thee the tent of my hopes, and how many are the mortals who sojourn whilst their hopes range through the world ! In thy hands is the object for which I express my wishes in polished phrase ; the least of thy favours would enslave even a freeman's heart."

When he had finished the recitation of this piece, the amīr Naṣr exclaimed : By Allāh ! had he said, Naṣr will redouble the gift manifold, in place of Naṣr will repeat the gift, I should have done so." He then bestowed on him one thousand dinārs in a silver tray. A number of poets had assembled at the court of the amīr Naṣr and celebrated his praises, but the recompense which they expected did not appear. They therefore proceeded to the house of Bawuls (Paul) the Christian, where the amīr used to drop in occasionally and make up a social party. Amongst these poets was Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Duwaydah al-Ma'arri (native of Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān<sup>1</sup>), who, having written on a sheet of paper the following verses, in the composition of which they all had a share, they sent them in to the amir. (Some say, however, that the lines here spoken of were composed by Ibn al-Duwaydah) :

"At your well-guarded door is a band of the indigent ; turn your attention towards the state of the indigent. The whole troop would be satisfied with the tenth of what you gave to Ibn Ḥayyūs. Our talents do not differ from his in that proportion<sup>2</sup> ; but the lucky man cannot be placed in comparison with him who is unlucky."

When the amir Naṣr read these verses, he ordered them one hundred dīnārs, declaring at the same time that, if they had said with as much as you gave to Ibn Ḥayyūs, he would have given it to them. The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn quotes these verses in the Kharidah and ascribes them to Abū Sālim 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Duwaydah, the son of the poet named above, and who was generally known by the surname of al-Kāf ;* God knows best ! The amir Naṣr, a prince distinguished for his generosity and liberality, became sovereign of Aleppo in A.H. 467 (A.C. 1074-5), on the death of his father Maḥmūd. He had not been long on the throne when some of his own troops attacked and slew him, on the 2nd of Shawwāl, A.H. 468 (9th May, A. C. 1076). We have already spoken of his great-grandfather Ṣāliḥ Ibn Mirdās (No. 274). Ibn Ḥayyūs arrived at Aleppo in the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 464 (June - July, A. C. 1072), and the house in which he there resided is now known as the House of the amir 'Alam al-Dīn Sulaymān Ibn Ḥaydarah.† "One of Ibn Ḥayyūs's finest pieces is 1 'Imād al-Dīn quotes a few extracts from the poems composed by different members of the Duwaydah family, but furnishes no information respecting them. (See Kharidah, MS. 1414, fol. 129).

---

2 Literally : All that difference does not subsist between us.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives al-Wāqī.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Hamid gives Ḥaydar.—Ed.

the qasīdah rhyming in I (lāmiyah), wherein he praises Abu 'l-Faḍā'i'l Sābiq Ibn Maḥmūd, the brother of the amīr Naṣr. In the eulogistic portion of that poem he says :

"Whenever I was asked about you, I replied, (my object always being, to direct him who goes astray) ; 'If you wish to know them well, meet them in the midst of their beneficence, or on the day of battle ; you will find them white (brilliant) in honour, black with the dust of the combat, their shoulders green (stained with the friction of their armour), and red the points of their spears.' "

How beautiful this enumeration ! it seems to have occurred to him quite naturally and bears some resemblance to a passage in a magnificent qasīdah composed by the celebrated poet Abū Sa'īd Muḥammad al-Rustamī (No. 93, note) and containing the eulogium of the Ṣāḥib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93). The verses to which we allude are these :

"A band illustrious in peace and war, a family crowned with noble deeds and formed to wield the spear. When they encamp, the soil turns green (receives fresh verdure) ; when they encounter the foe, their spears turn red. "

There, by Allāh ! is poetry in all its purity, unmixed with superfluous words. Ibn Ḥayyūs acquired great wealth by the favour of the Mirdās family, and he built a house at Aleppo, on the door of which he inscribed the following lines of his own composing :

"We built this abode and in it we resided, enjoying the bounty of the Mirdāsids, a family which delivered us from adversity and the tyranny of fortune. Say to the sons of earth : 'Let men act thus towards their fellow-men.' "

Some persons ascribe these verses to the grand amīr (al-Amīr al-Jalīl) Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbar, a native of Aleppo and generally known by the name of Ibn Abī Ḥaṣīnah. In this, they are quite right. A splendid and well-known qasīdah of Ibn Ḥayyūs's is that which commences thus :

"Here was the vernal abode of the fair Mālikiyan maid ; let us halt and ask of the summer rains where lay the dwelling of which they have effaced the trace. Invoke the flashing clouds to water the neglected vestiges of her tribe's presence, in these their reserved grounds, and excuse the insufficiency of my tears now exhausted (in weeping) before one (a mistress) who, though near, repelled me, and after one (a friend) who resolutely journeyed to a distant land. If travellers speak of me, they tell of eyes that are in tears and of a heart in pain. Restore to us the days (we passed in loving converse) at the sandhill, days which we may hope for whenever we dare hope that thou (dear maid!) mayest grant us thy affection. Hadst thou known even the slightest of my sufferings, thou hadst restored to us the possession of thyself, that utmost object of our wishes. Nay, did the external aspect of my passion offer thee sufficient proof of the ardent flame concealed within my bosom, thou hadst relented after thy reproaches, loved after thy hatred, and granted after thy refusal. Were I just to myself, I should save my heart from (the pain of) becoming like him who seeketh and findeth not."

This poem contains the following passage :

"I invoked the favours of the generous, but succeeded not ; yet now, I return thanks for favours granted though unasked. Strange it is, yet wonders are not rare, that speedy favours should find but tardy gratitude."

In one of his pieces he says :

"Stop in the midst of thy hatred and let thy reproaches go no farther ; be not like him who, when raised to power, plays the tyrant. I see you justify the falsest lovers, whilst near thee true love meets its death. If you followed justice in your decisions, why do you not still follow the same path ? In former times, men bent the blow to gain a livelihood, and that spear of mine (my stature now bent) was once straight and erect. The greyness which approached my locks has wronged me not, if it permit that my lot be still (a mistress with) dark (hair) and rosy lips<sup>1</sup>. A closely-guarded maiden of rare beauty and seldom rivalled, chaste and fair as a statue ; for her I burned with a passion which no reproach (of the censorious) could control, and respecting whom I questioned the ruined dwellings in the desert, but obtained no reply. Ask what are the feelings of her lover ; his tears will give thee the surest information ! but ask not whither roams his heart. For a time, it enabled me to endure my pains with patience, but it departed from me on the day in which the tribe (of my beloved) departed from the plain in which they fed their flocks. (That was) a departure which deprived me of consolation ; and ever since, my patience journeyed towards the province of Najd, whilst I myself advanced into that of Tihāmah<sup>1</sup> (Therein was) a torture of separation, dreadful as the stroke of Mālik (the angel who guards hell), but under which, to my disgrace, I did not perish. O my two friends ! if you help me not to support my affliction, you are no longer mine and I am no longer yours. You counselled me to be indifferent and to forget (her), but you mentioned not the way to indifference and forgetfulness. May the (spot where I passed my) days of love be watered by gushing clouds, rising in the horizon each time the rain clears off. (And yet we enjoyed) a life of which we stole the pleasures in spite of the jealous spy who, fatigued with waking, sunk the head to slumber."

1 I suspect that the text of this verse is corrupted.

The poem to which this passage belongs is of a considerable length. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416) states, in his History of Damascus, that, in the year 507 (A.C. 1113-4), the following observation was repeated to him by Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Ibrāhīm al-'Alawī : "The anīr Abu 'l-Fityān Ibn Ḥayyūs took me by the hand when we were at Aleppo and said ; 'You may give this verse as mine and say that it was composed on Sharaf al-Dawlah Muslim Ibn Quraysh<sup>2</sup> :

1 That is : My patience went one way and I went another. The expressions سهر and سجد frequently occur in poetry.

2 Abu 'l-Makārim Muslim, the son of Quraysh, the son of Badrān, the son of al-Muqallad, the son of al-Musayyab, hereditary chief of the 'Uqayl Arabs, lord of Moḡul, Naḡibīn, Anbār, Takrīt, and other cities, had established his authority over the greater part of Syria, when he fell A.H. 478 (A.C. 1085) in combating the troops of Sulayman Ibn Qutulmish the Saljuqid. See Abu Thou art he for whom eulogium is always ready<sup>1</sup> and whose veins flowed with generosity before they flowed with blood ! ”

This verse is the acme of eulogium. In the life of Abū Bakr Ibn al-Šā'igh (No. 644) we have given some verses rhyming in n, and mentioned that they are attributed to him, but they exist also in the collected poetical works of Ibn Ḥayyūs: God best knows the truth in this matter. In the year 472 (A.C. 1079-80), the poet Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Kḥayyāt (No. 59) arrived at Aleppo and wrote the following lines to Abu 'l-Fityān (Ibn Ḥayyūs) who was then in that city :

“All I possess would not sell for a dirham, and from my looks you may judge of my state. But I have still some honour left ; that I never offered for sale, and where, where could I have found a purchaser<sup>2</sup> ? ”

On this it was observed that, had he said, and thou art surely the purchaser, it had been better. Ibn Ḥayyūs was born at Damascus on Saturday, the 29th of Šafar A.H. 394 (27th December, A.C. 1003), and he died at Aleppo in the month of Šha'bān, A.H. 473 (Jan. Feb., A.C. 1080-1†). He was the šaykh (preceptor) of the Ibn al-Kḥayyāt just mentioned. The name حيويس must be pronounced Ḥayyūs ; among the poets of the West is an Ibn Ḥabbus (حبوس) whose name is nearly similar, except that, instead of an y (ي) it is written with a b (ب). I mention this, because these names have been often confounded, and I have frequently met with persons who supposed that the western poet's name was Ibn Ḥayyūs also, which is a mistake.

(Continued from page 149)

'l-Feda's Annals years 453, 458, 472, 477. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says, in his Kharīdah, that Abu 'l-Makārim Muslim Ibn Quraysh Ibn (Akhī) Qirwāsh, king of Syria, styled Šharaf al-Dawlah (nobleness of the empire), Majd al-Dīn (glory of religion), the sultān of amīrs and the sword of the commander of the faithful, was extremely generous and that he granted the city of Moṣul in fief to Ibn Ḥayyūs as a recompense for the eulogiums which that poet had bestowed upon him in his poems. Ibn Ḥayyūs survived this favour only six months. Šharaf al-Dawlah himself displayed great talents as a poet. (MS. No. 1414, fol 129).

1 Literally : In whose market eulogium stations.

2 Literally : Except some water of the face. See No. 49, note.

INDEX

A

- 'Ābir, 111.
- 'Abbād, Ibn al-Ḥarīsh, 61.
- 'Abbādite, 400 n.
- Abbān, 144, 244.
- al-'Abbās, Ibn al-Faḍl, 26.
- al-Abbās, 146.
- al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn
  - 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-
  - 'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭ-
  - ṭalib, 282
- al-'Abbās Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn
  - Shāfi' 134.
- al-'Abbāsī, Sharaf Shāh Ibn
  - Malik Dād, 214n.
- 'Abbāsīd, 13, 109, 151, 161.
- 264n, 314, 386, 403n, 408.
- 'Abbāsīyah, 303.
- 'Abd, 264.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn
  - Ḥanbal, 134
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Durrah, 156n.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥārith, 71n.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far, 177.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mājah, 255.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Maṣṣūr, 32i.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad,
  - al-Taymī 25.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muslim Ibn
  - Qutaybah : 78
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz,
  - 316, 382.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sabā, 288.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sa'd Ibn Abi
  - Sarḥ, 321.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Shihāb, 150.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Shīrshīr. 239.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir : 40, 251,
- 266.
- 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn
  - 'Amr Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn
  - 'Affān, 331.
- 'Abd Allāh al-Awlānī, 346n.
- 'Abd Allāh al-Murtadā, 53.
- 'Abd Allāh, Najm al-Dīn, 50.
- 'Abd Allāh al-Qudā'i, 186.
- 'Abd Allāh, Umm 146.
- 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwān,
  - 91, 93, 94, 95.
- 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Mūsā 403n.
- 'Abd al-Aziz Ibn 'Umar, 116.
- 'Abd al-Dār, 114n.
- 'Abd al-Ghānī, 371.
- 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, 22, 324, 331n,
- 392n, 395n, 401n, 402n,
- 414n, 416n.
- 'Abd al-Ḥārith, 287.
- 'Abd al-Ka'bah, 260n.
- 'Abd al-Khālīq 269.
- 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Hishām, 254
- 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān,
  - 29, 72, 89, 90, 92, 150, 153n,
  - 160.
- 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr, 29.
- 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Zuhri, 412,
- 413.
- 'Abd Manāf, 134, 252.
- 'Abd al-Masīḥ, 393n.
- 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib Ibn Hāshim,
  - 305.
- 'Abd Qays, 242.
- 'Abd al-Raḥīm, Abū Naṣr, 198.
- 'Abd al-Raḥmān, Ibn 'Abd al-
- Ḥakam 167.

- 'Abd al-Raḥmān II, 350n.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī Laylā, 151n.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Awf, 141, 260, 260n.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Khālid Ibn Musāfir al-Fāṭimī, 105.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Dākhil 349, 408.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Mughīrah 157.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays, 288.
 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn Mu'adh-dhal, 74, 295.
 'Abd Yālil. 265n.
 'Abdallaṭif, 79, 80, 120n, 278n.
 'Abdī, 265.
 Abī Dāwūd, 162.
 'Abid Ibn al Abraṣ, 304, 305.
 'Abid Ibn Sharyah al-Jurhumī, 393, 394, 395.
 'Abidah al-Salmāni, 155.
 Abīward 30, 32, 311.
 Al-Abīwardī, Abu 'l-Ḥuẓaffar, 94, 311.
Abkār al-Afkār 363.
 Abraham, 89, 207.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn al-Mu'allā, 362.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās Ibn al-Qāṣṣ 177.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās Ismā'il Ibn 'Abd Allāh 298.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās Muḥammad Ibn Ṣabīḥ, 277.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn Abī Faṭḥ Ṣāliḥ 59.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Daynawari 291.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Hāshimī, 281, 282.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn al-Baṣrī, 262.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn al-Wāsiṭī, 228.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Arafah, 311.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Kūfī, 28, 29.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad 269n.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh, Kātib 394.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Zinjī, 316.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Masarraḥ al-Jalālī, 350n.
 Abu 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Sa'adah, 55, 55n.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ziyād, 282.
 Abū Aḥmad al-Ḥusayn, 390.
 Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmad, 269.
 Abu 'l-'Alā, al-Ma'arrī, 132, 133, 225, 394, 400.
 Abū 'Alī Ibn 'Abī Hurayrah, 256.
 Abū 'Alī al-Daqqāq, 249.
 Abū 'Alī al-Ḍarīr, 320.
 Abū 'Alī al-Fārisī 33, 333.
 Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn 371, 372.
 Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn Muqlah, 274, 277.

- Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn al-Mustanīr 289.
 Abū 'Alī al-Qālī 295, 302, 317, 347, 352.
 Abū 'Alī al-Rāzī, 31.
 Abū 'Alī al-Shabbū'i, 190.
 Abū 'Alī al-Sinji, 171.
 Abū 'Alī al-Tanūkhī, the Qādī, 129, 131, 132, 133.
 Abū 'Alī al-Thaqafī, 179, 179n.
 Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā, 70, 334.
 Abū 'Amr Aḥja' Ibn 'Amr al-Sulamī, 76.
 Abū 'Amr Kulthūm Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ayyūb, 368.
 Abū 'Amrah, 154.
 Abū 'Āṣim al-'Abbādī 188, 189.
 Abu 'l-Aswad al-Duwalī, 181, 350.
 Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah, 15, 254.
 Abū 'Awn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Awn Ibn Artabān, 156n.
 Abu 'l-'Aynā, 319, 326.
 Abū Ayyūb al-Simsār, 277.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Abi 'l-Azhar, 29.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Abi Dāwūd al-Sijistānī, 332.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Abi 'l-Dunyā, 238, 330.
 Abū Bakr Ibn 'Ammār, 403.
 Abū Bakr Ibn al-Bazzāz, 183.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Ibrāhīm, 405n.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Mājah, 255.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Muqsim, 308, 308n.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Qāsim, 159.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Ṣā'igh Ibn Bājjah 250 404, 407, 420.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Ishāq Ibn Ayyūb, 178n.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Abyaḍ, 413.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad al-Arrajānī, 35.
 Abū Bakr Ayyūb Ibn Abi Tamīnah, 154n.
 Abū Bakr al-Baghdādī (khaṭīb), 86, 133, 253, 259, 267.
 Abū Bakr al-Fārisī, 185, 189, 189n.
 Abū Bakr al-Ḥasan Ibn al-'Allāf, 294.
 Abū Bakr al-Ḥāzimi, 50.
 Abū Bakr al-Ismā'īlī, 177.
 Abū Bakr al-Khuwārizmī, 37, 166, 332n, 333, 378, 379, 380.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad, 51, 409.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh 270.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Ḥanbalī, 370.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 361.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Dāwūd al-Zāhiri, 237, 238.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Ājurri, 267.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Iyādī 409.
 Abū Bakr al-Qaṣfāl al-Shāghī 173, 174, 175, 179, 189, 257.
 Abū Bakr al-Qaffal al-Marwazī 183, 187.
 Abū Bakr al-Qubbāshī, 349.
 Abū Bakr al-Ṣayrafi, 173-175.
 Abū Bakr al-Ṣhibli, 281.

- Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddiq, 38, 39, 141, 153n, 154, 207, 209, 224, 326n.
 Abū Bakr Yahyā Ibn Hudhayl al-Tamīmī, 347, 347n.
 Abū Bakr al-Zubaydī, 41, 350, 353.
 Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Anbārī, 127.
 Abu 'l-Barakāt al-Hāshimī, 369.
 Abu 'l-Barakat al-Mawṣilī, 217.
 Abū Bishr al-Dūlābī, 330, 331.
 Abu 'l-Dunyā, 238n.
 Abū Dahmān, 75n.
 Abū Dawūd al-Sijistānī 114n, 177, 333.
 Abū Dufaf al-'Ijlī 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 290.
 Abu 'l-Faḍā'i'l Sābiq Ibn Maḥmūd, 417.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Abī Ja'far al-Mundhirī, 311.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir 267.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Riyāshī, 376.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn Shābas, 87.
 Abu 'l-Faraj al-Iṣbahānī, 44n, 92.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Mandā'i al-Wāṣitī, 45.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Abdūs Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 263.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār, 417.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad, 251.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Sahl, 197.
 Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshīd, 88.
 Abu 'l-Feda, 38, 48, 64n, 140n, 166n, 326n, 327.
 Abulfedae Annales, 36n 209n, 382n, 420n.
 Abulfedae Historia Anteislamica 44n.
 Abu 'l-Futūḥ al-'Ijlī, 190.
 Abū Ghālib al-Aṣbaghī, 410, 410n.
 Abū Ḥafṣ al-Shatranji, 360.
 Abū Ḥākim al-Khabrī, 392.
 Abū Ḥanīfah, 107, 108, 109n, 127, 136, 152, 153, 158, 159 170, 188n, 286.
 Abu 'l-Ḥajnā, 16.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Sālim, 280.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshīd, 83, 84, 216.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Mubārak, 125.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Balkhī, 60.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Khall, 202, 203.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Makki, 263.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Alī Zaki al-Dīn, 214.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Muntakhib, 61.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Wāḥidī, 196.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Mawṣilī, 53.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Ziyādī, 136.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Zarqūyah, 306.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Tāhir al-Ruwaynī, 346n.

- Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Talla'fari, 381.
 Abu 'l-Ḥawl al-Ḥimyari, 10.
 Abū Hāshim 'Abd Allāh, 145, 161, 162.
 Abū Hāshim 'Abd al-Salām al-Jubbā'i, 246, 304.
 Abū Ḥātim Ibn Ḥayyān al-Bustī, 331.
 Abū Ḥātim al-Sijistāni, 291, 296, 302, 376.
 Abū Hāzrah, 19.
 Abū Hurayrah, 145.
 Abu 'l-Hudhayl al-'Allāf, 242, 243, 244.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ibn Maḥfūz, 394.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Abd al-Ḥaqq, 269.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Bāhili, 229.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad 386n.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī al-Salāmi, 23.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Baṣri, 247, 248, 248n.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 380.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad, 274.
 Abū Ibrāhīm al-Muzani 171, 229.
 Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm, 405n.
 Abū Ishāq al-Jizi, 87.
 Abū Ishāq Ibn Tāshifin, 4.
 Abū Ishāq al-Isfarā'ini, 229.
 Abū Ishāq al-Marwazi, 171, 176, 178, 183.
 Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābi, 33.
 Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzi : 53, 14i, 159, 165, 168n, 175, 176, 182, 182n, 196, 230n, 234, 273n.
 Abū Ishāq al-Zajjāj, 170, 312.
 Abū Ja'far al-Ṣaffār, 322n.
 Abū Ja'far al-Tirmidhi-169.
 Abū Ja'far Ibn Shirzād, 28.
 Abu 'l-Jahm, 325, 325n.
 Abū Jum'ah, 89.
 Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Ibn Diḥyah, 409.
 Abu 'l-Khaṭṭār al-Kalbī, 349, 349n.
 Abū Lahab, 275.
 Abu 'l-Ma'ālī, 359, 373.
 Abū 'l-Maḥāsin, 71n, 83n.
 Abū Maṣṣūr Ibn al-Anbārī, 268.
 Abū Maṣṣūr al-Azdi, 188.
 Abū Maṣṣūr al-Barawī, 200, 204.
 Abū Maṣṣūr Shihirdār Ibn Shirūyah, 269.
 Abu 'l-Ma'shar al-Balkhī, 123n.
 Abū Maṣṣūr al-Ṭūsī, 195.
 Abu 'l-Misk, 83, 84.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Jawhari, 333.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Muhallabī, 362.
 Abu 'l-Munghir Hishām, 289.
 Abū Mūsa 'l-Aḥ'arī, 321.
 Abū Mūsa al-Iṣbahāni, 261, 262, 263, 371.
 Abū Muslim Ibn Fihri, 351.
 Abū Muslim al-Khurāsāni : 58.
 Abu 'l-Muṭarrif : 73.

- Abū Muslim al-Kajjī, 267.
 Abu 'l-Muẓaffar, Kātib, 359.
 Abū 'l-Muẓaffar Aḥmad al-
   Khawāfi, 198.
 Abū Nājiyah, 303.
 Abu Naṣr Kāhli, 286n, 359.
 Abū Nū'aym 'Abd al-Malik
   177.
 Abū Nu'aym al-Iṣbahānī, 267.
 Abū Nuwās, 293, 294, 303.
   383.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim, Kātib, 383, 384.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd Allāh, 43.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Raḥmān,
   232.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Wāhid,
   309, 310.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Muṭarriz, 310.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Aflaḥ, 48.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad
   Ibn Rayyān, 263.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Ibrāhīm
   al-'Alawī, 419.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-A'mā, 379.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Anmāṭī, 229.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Anṣārī, 228, 250.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Baghdādī, 333.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Maghribī, 78.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Murtaḍā, 394.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Sirafī, 353.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Tanūkhī, 132, 133, 298, 339.
 Abū Qumāsh, 120, 120n.
 Abū Rabī'ah, 355.
 Abū Rajā Qutaybah, 254n.
 Abū Sa'd al-Harawī, 189, 189n.
 Abū Sa'd al-Mutawalli, 195.
 Abu 'l-Sā'ib 'Utbah Ibn
   'Ubayd Allāh, 130, 361.
 Abū Sa'id Aḥmad Ibn Shuhayb, 379.
 Abū Sa'id al-Hārūnī, 246.
 Abū Sa'id al-Jannābi, 313.
 Abū Sa'id Muḥammad al-
   Rustamī, 417.
 Abū Sa'id Naṣr, 127.
 Abū Sa'id al-Sirafī, 315.
 Abū Sa'id al-'Uqaylī, 338.
 Abu 'l-Ṣaqr, 181, 321, 322, 323.
 Abū Shu'ayb al-Harrānī, 267.
 Abū Sūfyan, 332, 377.
 Abū Sulaymān al-Dārānī, 364.
 Abū Taghlib, 382.
 Abū Ṭāhir al-Jannābi al-
   Qirmiṭī, 313.
 Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī, 374.
 Abū Ṭālib (s/o Hāshim), 89,
   140, 280, 321, 338, 390.
 Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī 279, 280.
 Abū Tamīm, 295.
 Abū Tammām, 28, 120, 194,
   334, 342, 399.
 Abu 'l-Ṭayyib Ibn al-Bazzār, 413.
 Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṣu'lūkī, 178,
   178n.
 Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Simsār, 169.
 Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī, 171, 176.
 Abu 'l-Ṭhanā Maḥmud Ibn
   Ni'mah, 389.
 Abu 'l-Ṭhawr, 136.
 Abū 'Ubaydah, 284, 320.
 Abū 'Umar Tārikhī, 349, 349n.

- Abū 'Umar al-Bastāmī, 188.
 Abū 'Umar Muntajili, 352n.
 Abū 'Umar Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf, 308.
 Abū 'Umar Sa'id Ibn Muslim, 74.
 Abū 'Umar Yūsuf Ibn Abd al-Barr, 258.
 Abū 'Umar al-Zāhid al-Muṭarriz, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 339, 395n.
 Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Khālidi, 381.
 Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Māzini, 291, 296.
 Abū 'Uṭhmān Sā'id Ibn Fahlūn 352n.
 Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Uṣhnāndānī, 300, 300n.
 Abū 'l-Walid al-Bāji, 239.
 Abū 'l-Walid 179, 179n.
 Abū 'l-Waqt 'Abd al-Awwal al-Sijazī, 269.
 Abū Ya'lā, al-Khalili, 164, 257.
 Abū Ya'la Ibn al-Habbāriyah, 220, 220n.
 Abū 'l-Yaqzān Suḥaym 145, 145n, 156.
 Abū Yūsuf (Imām), 158.
 Abū Yūsuf 31n.
 Abū Yūsuf al-Ḥarrānī, 365.
 Abū Zakariyā al-Tabrizī 133, 268, 283n, 290.
 Abū Zar'ah al-Maqdisī, 127, 127n.
 Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī, 39, 320, 326.
 Abū Zayd al-Marwazī, 182, 183, 184, 229.
 Abū Zayd al-Sarūjī 43, 44, 45.
 Abwāb, 273.
 Abū Zinād, 149.
 Abyssinia, 260n, 288, 327.
 Acre, 6, 79 98.
 'Ād, 142.
 Adah al-Khawāṣṣ, 78.
 Adab al-Kātib, 334.
 Adab al-Qāḍi, 42.
 Adam, 34, 321.
 Adama, 150.
 al-'Adawī, 314.
 Aden, 110.
 Adham, 155.
 Ādharbā'ijān, 9, 133, 215, 216, 235n, 269.
 'Adī Ibn Dughaj, 297.
 'Adī Ibn Tujib, 407.
 'Adī Ibn 'Abd Manāt, 313-314.
 al-'Āḍid al-'Ubaydī, 217.
 al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār, 128.
 'Ādites, 142n.
 'Ādiliyah College, 174.
 'Adnān, 51, 134.
 'Aḍud al-Dawlah, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 63, 87, 383, 384, 385.
 'Aḍudian, 37.
 al-Afḍal Shāhanshāh, 240, 241.
 Africa, 73n, 272.
 Afṣā, 89.
 Aghlabites, 73n.
 Aghmāt, 404.
 Ahl-al-Naṣb, 392n.
 Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād al-Iyādī, 286.
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Ammār, 29.
 Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, 41, 134,

- 135, 136, 166n, 214, 253, 254, 255n, 278, 309, 365.
 Aḥmad Ibn al-Mudabbbar, 320n.
 Aḥmad Ibn Kāmil, 39, 169.
 Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn, 168.
 Aḥmad Ibn Yahya al-Ḥulwānī, 267.
 Aḥmad Ibn Yūsuf, 21, 292.
 Aḥmad al-Khawāfi, 250.
 Aḥmad al-Rādḥānī, 191.
 Aḥmad al-Zubaydi, 352.
 Al-Aḥnaf, 165.
 al-Ahwāz, 71n, 129n, 298n, 319, 326, 331.
 al-Ājurr, 267.
 Ājurri, 267.
Ajwibat al-Masā'il al-Najjāriyah (by al-Rāzi), 225.
 al-'Akawwak, 58.
Al-Ḥār al-Khawārij, 187n.
Al-Ḥār al-Qusṣāṣ, 273.
Al-Ḥār al-Umam, 187n.
Al-Ḥār al-Yazidiyyin, 314.
 al-Akḥṭal, 411.
 'Alā'iyyah College, 231.
 'Alam al-Din Sulaymān Ibn Ḥaydarah, 416.
 Albumaser, 123n.
 Aleppo, 44, 83, 88, 119, 204, 205, 219, 220, 221, 222, 236, 293, 348, 369, 371, 378, 414, 416, 417, 419, 420.
 Alexander, 53, 54, 339.
 Alexandria, 54, 172, 192, 200n, 242, 271, 292, 336.
 Algerias, 282.
 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās, 146, 160, 162.
 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 23, 37, 62, 90, 104, 140, 141, 144, 145, 146, 147, 153n, 155n, 156n, 164, 207, 209, 288, 321, 327n 338, 344, 390, 392.
 'Alī Ibn Ḥujr, 255, 255n.
 'Alī Ibn al-Ikhshid, 83, 88.
 'Alī Ibn al-Khālīd, 16.
 'Alī Ibn 'Isā Ibn Māhān, 20, 24, 61.
 'Alī Ibn 'Isā al-Rummānī, 315.
 'Alī Ibn Mahdi, 386.
 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Balkhī, 61.
 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad, Zinjī 321.
 'Alī al-Riḍā, 23n, 146, 147, 390n.
 'Alide, 26.
 'Ālij, 313, 397, 397n.
 al-'Allāf al-Mutakallim, 242.
 Allāh, 14, 15, 42, 75, 91.
 Almeria, 55, 349n.
 Almoravides, 55.
 Alphonso, 405n.
 Alphonso I, 407.
Amālī, 257, 295.
 Amari, M. 373n.
 al-A'mash, 154n, 278.
 al-Āmidī, 234, 235, 236.
 al-Amin. 8, 20, 21, 23, 24.
 Āminah, 151.
 'Āmir, 157.
 'Amr Ibn al-'Aṣī, 142, 304.
 'Amr Ibn Dinār, 149.
 'Amr Ibn Jarmūz, 327n.
 'Amr Ibn Luḥayyi, 89.
 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd, 70.
 'Amr al-Rūmī, 333.

- Amro 'l-Kais, 93n.
al-Amthāl 40.
 Āmul, 166.
 al-An'ām, 245.
 Anas Ibn Mālik, 38, 153, 153n,
 154, 156, 288.
Anbā 'an al-Anbiyā, 186.
Anbā al-Ruwāt fi Abnā al-
Nuḥāt, 44.
 al-Anbār, 9, 363, 419n.
 al-'Anbar Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tamīm, 297.
 al-'Anbar, Banu, 297.
 Anbārī, 319.
 'Anbas, 281.
Anmūdḥaj, 353.
 al-'Annābin, 281.
Ansāb, 110, 175, 236, 255, 259,
 261, 262, 280, 350, 532n., 352, 358.
 'Antar, 385, 385n.
 Antioch, 88.
 Anujūr, 83, 172.
 Anūshirwān, 50.
 Anšārs, 330.
 Apostle, 108, 114, 150, 153n.,
 170, 183, 193n., 201, 208,
 209, 211, 212.
 Aqr Bābil, 92.
al-Aqsām, 250.
 Arab, 752, 76, 77, 78, 91, 93,
 120n., 134, 145, 172, 243,
 285, 286, 314, 360n., 376.
 Arabia, 68n., 92n., 104n., 197n.,
 300n., 311, 319, 397n.
 Arabian, 50, 71, 85n, 88, 144n,
 197n., 256n., 262, 286, 306,
 313, 314n., 374, 347, 409.
 Arabic, 48, 49, 74n., 75n., 77,
 80, 83, 101n., 120n., 126,
 130n., 138n., 142n., 145, 156,
 172, 173n., 183n., 199n., 226,
 227n., 283, 284, 286, 289,
 290n., 298, 311, 315n., 343n.,
 347, 353n., 354n., 360n.,
 367n., 372n., 380n., 388n.,
 392n., 393n., 400n., 406n.,
 411n., 413n.
 Arabic Philology, 273n.
 Arabs, 11, 43, 52, 53, 56, 271n.,
 282, 283n., 301, 306, 307,
 308, 311, 326, 376, 378,
 393n., 395, 403, 409, 414.
 'Arafāt, (Mount), 100.
 'Arā'is al-Nafā'is, 235.
 Aral, 175n.
Arba'in (by al-Rāzi), 225.
Arba'in al-Ājurri, 267.
 Arbela, 52, 53, 67, 69, 95, 96,
 98, 102, 113, 119, 120, 121,
 123, 124, 125, 126, 232, 366,
 370, 371, 372.
 Ardashīr, 334, 338, 339.
 Arfakhshad, Ibn, 111.
 Arfaxed, 111.
 Arghiyān, 196.
 Arghiyāni, 196, 197.
al-'Aridat al-Ahwa'lli fi-Sharḥ
il-Tirmidhi, 272. al-'Arj, 331.
 al-'Arji, 331.
 al-'Arqalah, 121, 121n.
 Armenia, 74.
 Arrajān, 378.
 Arragon, 407n.
 Arrān, 373.

- Arsīlān Shāh, Nūr al-Dīn, 231.
 Arṭabāst, (Ardabart), 348.
 Asad, 4, 156, 327n.
 al-Asad, 291.
 Asad Ibn Razīn, 28.
 Asad al-Dīn Shayrkuh, 78.
 al-As'ad Ibn Mammātī, 79.
 As'ad al-Mīhanī, 217, 230n.
 As'ard, 5.
 al-Asbaghī, 410, 410n.
 al-Aṣḥāhī, 110.
 Aṣḥāhīte, 111.
 Aṣhāb al-Rā'i, 151n.
 al-Ash'arī, 194n, 229, 244, 245, 246.
 Asha'rite, 194, 246, 250.
 al-Ash'ath: Ibn Qays al-Kindī, 77, 141.
 Ashhab, 166, 167, 168.
 al-Ashraf, 104.
 Ashras Ibn Shabīb Ibn al-Sukun, 407.
 al-Ashyam, 89.
 Asia Minor, 1, 27, 219.
 'Askar al-Mahdī, 326, 329.
 'Askar Mukram, 130.
 Asmā, 393.
 al-Asmā wa 'l-Ṣifāt, 266.
 al-Aṣma'i, 72n., 76, 156, 177, 134, 180n., 272, 284, 300, 304, 308, 320.
 'Asqalān, 136.
 al-Aswad, 37.
 al-Aswad al-'Ansī, 326.
 'Aṭā, 152.
 Atābak, Banu, 96.
 'Ātikah, 90.
Atrāf, 262.
 'Attāb Ibn Sa'd, 368.
 al-'Attābī, 16n.
 al-'Attābī, the grammarian, 367, 368.
 al-'Attābiyūn, 368.
 al-'Attārī, 215.
 Avenzoar, 409.
 Averrhoes, 192n.
 Avicenna, 225, 226.
 Awdānī, 184.
 Awhad al-Dīn, 235, 236.
 'Awn al-Dīn, 47n.
 al-'Awzā'i, 107.
 Aydaḥ, 130.
 'Āyishah, 327n.
 Aylah, 144, 161.
 'Aylān, 71n.
 'Ayn, 306, 350.
 'Ayn Qubbash, 350.
 'Ayn al-Tamr, 154, 156, 252, 254.
 Ayyūb, 97, 104.
 Ayyūb al-Sakhtiyānī, 154, 154n.
 Ayyūbiḍ, 121n.
 Azāriqah, 71, 331.
 al-Azd, 89, 258, 260, 291, 295, 298, 395.
 Azdashīr, 338.
 al-Azdī, 295.
 Azhar, 312.
 al-Azharī, 301, 311, 312, 313.
 al-'Aziz al-'Ubaydī, 36, 353, 355.
 al-Azraqī, 114n.
 'Azzah, 88, 89, 91, 92, 93, 94, 144, 151.

B

- al-Bahnasā, 356.
 al-Babbaghā, Abu 'l-Faraj, 381.
 Bābil, 130, 130n.
 Babylon, 54.
 Badī' al-Zamān, 44
 Badr, 134, 150, 209, 260n., 327n.
 Badr al-Dīn, al-Marāghī, 235.
 Badrān, 419n.
 al-Baghawī, 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammād, 332, 333n.
 Baghdād, 18, 20, 21, 25, 27, 33, 37, 41, 45, 47, 48, 52, 53, 54, 61, 63, 68, 73n., 96, 100, 106n., 127, 128, 130, 132, 133, 135, 136, 137, 139, 147, 158, 159, 163, 164, 166, 169, 173, 176, 179, 183, 185n., 186, 187n., 191, 195, 196, 200, 201, 202, 214, 215, 217, 218, 219, 221, 222, 230, 231, 233, 240, 246, 248, 250, 252, 253, 254, 255, 258, 259, 263, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 273, 274, 277, 278, 280, 281, 286, 290, 298, 301, 303, 306, 307, 309, 310, 311, 312, 317, 391, 322, 326, 329, 330, 331, 338, 339, 359, 361, 362, 363, 365, 366, 368, 370, 371, 372, 373, 376, 379, 381, 386, 387, 394, 412.
 Baghdādi, 244.
 Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād, 79, 97, 222, 293.
 Bahā al-Dīn As'ad 68.
 Bahā al-Dīn Sābūr, 200n.
 Bahā'iyah, 200, 200n.
 Bāhilah, 76, 77, 78.
 Bāhilī, 76.
 Bāhilitē, 76, 77, 78.
 al-Baḥr al-Zākhīr, 37, 71n.
 Baḥrā, 247.
 Baḥrānī, 247.
 al-Baḥrayn, 82, 313.
 Bakhtyār, 33.
 Bakr Ibn al-Naṭṭāḥ, 58, 60.
 Bakr Ibn Wā'il, 293.
 al-Bakrī, 364n.
 Baktikīn, 104.
 al-Balad, 103.
 Balhayt, 335, 339.
 Balī, 187.
 Balḫ, 9, 254n.
 Balqā, 300n.
 al-Bandahī, 368, 369, 370.
 Bandār, 330n.
 Bānyās, 6.
 al-Baqī', 110, 144, 146, 260n. al-Bāqlānī, Abū Bakr, 246, 247.
 al-Bāqir, 145, 390, 146.
 al-Baradān, 133.
 al-Barīnak, 9.
 Barmekide, 7, 14, 16, 18, 19, 23, 243, 320.
 Barqā, 271n.
 Barqah, 396.
 Barqa'id, 116.
 Barqān, 273n.
 al-Barqānī, 273, 273n.
 al-Basāsīrī, 309n.
 Basīf, 174.
 Baṣrah, 18, 37, 43, 44, 47, 48, 50, 72, 71n., 76, 105n., 112, 113, 129, 130n., 132, 133, 153.

- 154n., 155, 156, 178, 240, 244,
246, 247, 252, 255, 273, 280,
283, 289, 290, 294, 300, 313,
319, 321, 322n., 324, 326,
331n., 338, 374, 376.
Başrah Mu'tazilites, 242.
Başām, 66.
al-Ba'th wa 'l-Nuḡūr, 266.
Bāward, 311.
Bāwardī, 311.
Bawuls, 415.
Bawwān, 34, 37.
al-Bayhaqī, Abū Bakr Aḥmad,
266, 273n.
al-Bayhaqī, Abu 'l-Ḥasan, 199.
Bayt al-Maqdis, 263.
Bayyānah, 352n.
al-Bayyānī, 352n.
Bedwin, 311, 314n., 319.
Berbers, 271n.
Bermek, 7.
Bībars, 128, 264, 264n.
Bible, 111n.
al-Bimaristān al-'Aḡudī, 37.
al-Bīrah, 97n.
Bīsetūn, 65n.
Bīshr al-Ḥāfī, 260, 327, 378.
Boisen, L.N., 299n.
Book of Genealogies, 287.
Book of the Seven, 273.
Boulac, 394.
Būgh, 254, 255.
Būghī, 255.
Bughyah, 346n., 347n., 394n.,
351n., 352n.
Bughyat al-Multamis Maqqarī,
352n.
al-Buḥturī, 181n.
Bukhāra, 72, 164, 165, 184, 185,
215, 235, 236, 252, 262, 265.
al-Bukhārī, 41, 55, 114n., 136n., 162, 163, 165, 183, 252, 253,
254, 257, 258, 262, 265, 266,
273n., 330n.
Būrān, 27.
Būrḥān al-Dīn al-Zarnūjī, 235n.
Burhān al-Uṣul, 261n.
Būrī, 104n.
al-Burj al-Qadid, 242.
al-Buḡḡārī, 251n.
Buṭnān, 285, 286.
Buwayh, 33, 257.
- C
- Cabalistic, 205.
Cæsarea, 264.
Cairo, 1, 44, 50, 57, 79, 80, 83,
86, 88, 89n., 106, 107, 111n.,
119, 128, 137, 150n., 166, 167,
172, 186, 199, 200n., 205n.,
217, 221n., 234n., 236n., 241,
246n., 281n., 358.
Canon, (by Avicena), 226.
Ceuta, 282.
China, 32, 106, 286.
Chinese, 100, 101.
Chrestomathie, 48, 59n., 218n.
Christ, 208.
Christian, 176, 240, 362.
Christians, 405n., 410n., 415.
Cirr, 175n.
Companions, 77n., 134, 326, 330.
Copenhagen, 299n.

Cordova, 250, 345, 346, 347,
348, 349, 350, 352n., 396n.,
409, 412.
Cureton, Dr., 25, 71n., 288n.

D

Ḍabbah, 256n., 283n.
al-Ḍabbī, Mufaḍḍal, 180, 256n.
al-Ḍabbī Mūḥammad, 179, 180.
Daghfal Ibn Ḥanzalah, 70,
70n., 71.
Daghfal Ibn al-Jarrāḥ al-Badawī, 36.
al-Ḍaḥḥāk, 53.
Dāhir, 338.
al-Dahmān al-Ḡhalānī, 74.
al-Dahnā, 312, 313.
Dajjāl, 253, 254.
Dalā'il al-Nubuwwah, 266, 273.
Damascus, 4, 6, 7, 16, 35, 36,
37, 83, 88, 104, 117, 121,
158, 160n., 174, 186, 192, 201,
204, 213, 214, 219, 221, 223,
230n., 235, 236, 259, 332,
364, 369, 370, 389, 419, 420.
Damascus-gate, 330.
Daqāqah, 296.
Dār al-Salām, 386.
Dār al-Sunnah, 176.
Dārā (Darius), 339.
Darak al-Bughyah, 356.
al-Dāraqūṭnī, 170, 183, 185n., 257, 258, 262, 301, 317, 318,
333, 338.
Dārāyā, 364.
Ḍarb Darrāj, 116.
Ḍarb al-Majūs. 247.

al-Ḍarīr Ibn al-Dahhān, 126.
al-Ḍarīr, Abu Mu'āwiyah, 283. al-Ḍarīr, 'Isā Ibn Ibrāhīm, 239.
Darrāj, 116.
David, 228n.
Dawlābī, 331.
Dāwūd, 151.
Dawraq, 61.
Daylam, 66.
Daylamite, 269.
Dayr al-Jamājim, 288.
al-Dayrayn, 288.
de Gayangos, M., 407n., 413n.
de Ludis Orientalium, 334n.
De Methodo Medendi (Greek version), 411n.
d'Ohsson, 231n.
de Perceval, Causin, 304n.,
305n., 411n.
de Sacy, 218., 278n, 281, 359n., 388n.
de Slane, M., 457n., 114n., 170n., 203n., 337n., 354n.,
355n.
Denia, 412, 413.
Description de'l-Afreque septem trionali, 364n.
al-Dhahabī, 40, 107n., 187n.,
189n., 253n., 286n., 298, 325n.
Dhamm al-Hasad, 273.
Dharawī, 119.
Dharaw, 119.
Dhayl, 46, 52, 53, 60, 175, 232,
250.
Dhu 'l-Kilā'a, 1.
Dhu 'l-Qarnayn, 53.
Dhu 'l-Riyāsatan, 23.
Dhu Ru'ayn, 57.

Dhu 'l-Rumma, 409.
Dhu 'l-Wizāratayn, 400, 400n.
Dhu 'l-Yamīnayn, 23.
Dhubyān, 78.
Dūhāk, 53.
Di'bil, 27.
Didd-al-'Aql, 273.
Qirār, 287.
Diwan d 'Anīro 'l-Kais, 283n.
Qiyā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faḍā'il al-Qāsim, 218, 221, 231.
Qiyā al-Dīn Naṣr Allāh, 116.
Qiyā al-Dīn 'Umar, 228.
Qiyā al-Islām 'Ubayd Allāh, 50.
Diyār Bakr, 218.
Dozy, 347n., 350n., 396n., 401n., 405n. al-Ḍubā'i, 178n.
al-Dūbī, 263.
Dujyal, 71.
Dūlāb, 71, 330, 331.
Dulaf, 62, 63.
Dūmat al-Jandal, 160.
Dūnah, 235n.
Dūnī, 235n.
al-Dūr (Dūr-al-Wazīr), 263n.
Durrat al-Ḡhawwāṣ, 48, 374, 393.
Duwaydah, 416n.
al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah, 21n., 28, 181n., 264n., 309n.
Duwar, Ja'far, 42.

E

Edessa, 97, 98.
Egypt, 35, 36, 44, 55, 56, 78, 83, 84, 86, 88, 93, 94, 104.

105, 117, 119, 121n., 128, 135, 163, 164, 166, 169n., 170, 171, 176, 187n., 192, 199, 200n., 217, 255, 258, 259, 262, 271, 272, 273, 282, 339, 355, 356, 363, 364, 371, 396, 397, 412.
Egyptian, 57, 67n., 71, 74n., 97n., 107n., 117, 127n., 186, 264n., 272, 273n., 277, 286n., 307n., 348n., 353, 356n.
Eichhorn, 89n., 134n.
Emessa, 352.
Empedocles, 350.
English, 11n., 234n., 373n.
Essai sur les Medailles des Sasanides, 222n.
Essai sur les ecoles Philosophiques cher les Arabes, 193n.
Euphrates, 138.
Europe, 123n.
European, 197n., 407.
Excerpta ex Historia Halebi, 222n.
Expose de l'Histoire des Druzes: 162n.

F

al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān, 27, 28, 29.
al-Faḍl Ibn Al-Rabī', 18, 19, 20, 21, 28.
al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl, 23, 24, 25, 26.
al-Faḍl, Ibn Yaḥyā al-Barmakī, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18.

- Fahm, 107.
Fahm al-Manāsik, 273.
 Fahmī, 107.
Fā'it al-Faṣīḥ, 306.
 Fakhr al-Dīn Mas'ūd Ibn al-Za'farānī, 97n.
 Fakhr al-Dīn, al-Rāzī, 224, 226, 227, 228, 229, 247.
 Fakhr al-Islām, 195.
 Fakhr al-Mulk, 394.
 Faqīh al-Ḥaram, 266n.
Farabī, 164, 183, 265. al-Farazdaq, 287, 387.
 Farghānah, 72, 73.
 al-Farghānī, 88.
 Fāris, 185.
 al-Fārisī, 177n., 185.
 Al-Fārisī, 'Abd al-Ghāfir, 195, 266.
al-Farj ba'd al-Shiddah, 129.
 al-Farrā, 39, 159, 181, 229.
 Fārs 32, 185, 251, 262, 269, 300.
 al-Fāshānī, 182, 184.
al-Faṣīḥ, 291, 305, 306.
Fatāwā Arghiyāniyah, 197. al-Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān, 3, 401, 404.
 Fātik al-Majnūn, 1, 2, 3, 83.
 Fātimah, 62, 147, 253.
 Fatimids, 186.
Fawād al-Shuyūkh, 257. al-Fayyūm, 1.
 Fazārah, 78.
 Fez, 270, 407.
 al-Fihrist, 267, 283, 284n., 294n., 295, 300n., 316n., 318n., 319n., 322n.
 Firrūh, 57.
 Fityān al-Shāghūrī, 4, 6.
 Flamsteed, 52.
 Fleischer, 44.
 Fluegel, 150n., 163n., 225n.
 French, 81, 193n., 464n.
 Frankish, 242.
 Franks, 57, 79, 98, 128, 242, 246, 407.
 Freytag, 51, 70n., 76, 77n., 389n.
 Fuḍayl, 13.
 al-Fuḍayl Ibn 'Iyād al-Ṭālaqānī, 29, 30, 31, 32.
 Fujā'ah, 81.
 Fundin, 32.
 Fundinī, 32.
 Furāwah, 266.
al-Furāwī, 265, 266, 267.
al-Fuṣūḥāt al-Makkiyah, 272n.

G

- Galen, 411.
Ghāfiq, 187.
Ghālib, 24, 26, 224n., 287.
Ghanawī, 414, 414n.
Ghani, (tribe), 78, 414n.
al-Gharā'ib, 262.
Gharib al-Alfāz, 312.
Gharib al-Ḥadīth, 40, 309, 318.
al-Gharib al-Muṣannaf, 40, 309.
Gharib al-Qur'ān, 286n.
 al-Gharnāti, Abū Hāmid, 230.
Ghars al-Dawlah, 361.
 al-Ghawr, 97, 97n.
Ghaylān, 254n.
Ghaznah, 227, 249.

Ghazzah, 136, 154n.
 al-Ghazzālī, Abū Ḥamid, 126,
 174, 174n., 184, 188, 190n.,
 193n., 194, 194n., 195,
 198, 215, 225, 230, 233,
 271.
Ghuṭīshah, 348.
Ghurār al-Adillah, 247.
Ghūṭah, 37, 158, 364.
Ghuzz, 199, 216.
Gospels, 210n.
 Gottingen, 394n.
Grammaire arabe, 63n., 191n.
 Granada, 230, 251n.
 Greek, 1, 39, 83, 123n, 141, 143,
 157, 205, 224n, 228, 348n.,

H

Habannaqah al-Qaysī, 293, 296.
 Ḥabbān, 318.
 al-Ḥabir, 311, 312, 313.
 Ḥaddād, 172.
 al-Ḥādī, 254.
 Hafadah, 215, 216.
 Hajar, 313.
 Ḥājir, 49, 68n.
 al-Ḥajjāj, 72, 73, 80, 81, 82,
 153n., 160, 179n.
 Ḥājji Khalīfah, 150, 163n.,
 186n., 187, 200n., 225, 225n.,
 234n., 235n., 248n., 255n.,
 257, 261n., 318n., 363n.
 al-Ḥakam al-Mustanşir, 347, 351.
 Ḥākim Ibn al-Bālī, 135n.
 al-Ḥākim al-Mustatşir, 369n.

al-Ḥākim al-'Ubaydī, 355, 356.
 al-Ḥākimī, Imām Ismā'il, 194.
 Hakkār, 96.
 Ḥām, 348.
 Hamadān, 63, 189n., 269.
 Hamadhān, 262, 264, 268, 269,
 270.
 Ḥamāmī, 304.
 Ḥamāsah, 6, 76, 82, 194, 295n.
 al-Ḥamāt, 97, 119, 374, 375,
 386n.
 al-Ḥāmid, 308.
 Hamilton, 62n.
 Ḥammād, 152, 153, 154n.
 Hammām, 46, 47.
 Ḥanafite, 99, 106, 127, 140,
 178n., 189n., 215, 231, 234,
 235, 246n., 413.
 Ḥanbalites, 104, 127, 365, 670.
 Ḥānī, 395.
 Ḥanīfah, 141.
 Ḥanṭham, 304.
 Ḥanṭalah Ibn Şafwān, 85n.
 Ḥanṭalah al-Sadūsī, 71.
 Ḥaqīqat al-Qawlayn, 193.
 al-Ḥarā' inī, 235n.
 Harām, Banū, 43, 50.
 al-Ḥarāmī, 50.
 al-Ḥarāmīyah, 43.
 Ḥarastā, 158.
 al-Harawī, 188, 261, 312.
 Ḥarb, 92.
 Ḥarb Gate, 247, 260, 268, 281.
 Ḥarbiyah cemetery, 268.
 al-Ḥarīrī, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47,
 48, 49, 50, 81, 81n., 85n., 247,
 281, 359n., 368, 374, 388,
 388n., 393.

- Haririi consessus*, 75n.
 Hārith (Ibn, Hammām), 46, 47.
 al-Hārith (Dhū Aṣṣabāḥ), 111.
 al-Hārithah, 280.
 Hārithī, 280.
 Harrān, 96, 97, 98, 161, 355, 365, 366, 367.
 Hārūn al-Rashīd, 7, 17, 30, 158, 161, 254, 278, 368.
 al-Hārūnī, 246.
 Ḥasan, 32.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 143, 146, 147.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Hānī, 293.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Makhlad, 324n.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad, 290.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl, 22, 27, 379, 380.
 al-Ḥasan al-'Askarī, 148.
 al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, 70, 154n., 155, 155n., 156. al-Ḥasan, al-Baqillānī, 247.
 al-Ḥasan al-Jawharī, 389.
 al-Ḥasan al-Zubaydī, 346, 346n.
 Hāshim Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, 76, 281, 282, 319, 326, 328.
 Hāshimide, 59, 134.
 Hāshimite, 328.
 al-Hāshimiyah, 38, 107n.
 al-Haṣirī, 236.
 Hātib Ibn Abī Balta'ah, 141.
 Hātim, 345, 385n.
 al-Hātimī, Abū 'Alī, 308, 309.
 al-Hāṭimi, Aḥmad, 183.
Haṭk Sūṭr al-Mulḥidin, 350.
 Haṭṭān, 117.
 al-Haytham al-Sāmī, 28.
 Ḥayyān, 318.
 Ḥayyūs, 420.
 Ḥāzim, 270.
 al-Hāzimī, the Ḥāfiẓ, 50, 50n., 111, 111n., 265, 270.
 al-Ḥazīrah, 69.
 al-Ḥazīrī, 68.
Hedaya, 62n.
 Herāt, 39, 42, 188, 189n., 198, 226, 228, 229, 311, 312.
 Hibat Allāh, 410n.
 al-Ḥijāz, 88, 104, 135n., 150, 163, 173, 176, 256n., 257, 262, 271.
 Hilāl al-Raqqī, 40.
Ḥilat al-Bar'i, 411.
Ḥilyat al-Awliyā, 267.
Ḥilyat al-Muḥāḍarah, 345.
Ḥilyat al-'Ulamā, 195.
 Ḥimyar, 186.
 al-Ḥimyarī, al-Sayyid, 334.
 Hind, 216.
 al-Ḥirah, 196, 249, 253, 304.
 al-Ḥirī, 249.
Ḥirz al-Amānī wa Wajh al-Tahānī, 54.
 Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 149, 150, 348, 349, 409.
 Hishām Ibn 'Urwah, 253, 278.
 Hishām al-Muwayyad bi-Allāh, 351.
 Ḥisn Kaifa, 97n.
Historia Abbadsidrum, 405n.
Histoire des Berbers, 364n., 396n.
Histoire de l'Espagne Musulmane, 401n.

Hist. des Monghols, 125n.
Historie des Musalmans d'Espagne, 350n., 396n.
Historia Saracenica, 71n.
 Hittin, 97.
 Horace, 302n.
 Hubayrah Ibn Masrūḥ, 77.
 Hubayrah Ibn Muṣḥamraj al-Kilābī, 77n.
 Hūd, 142n.
 al-Ḥudaybiyah, 37.
 al-Ḥadhdhā, 154n.
 al-Ḥujjah Muḥammad, 148.
 Ḥujjat al-Dīn, 373.
 Ḥujjat al-Islām, 191.
 Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl, 253n, 260.
 al-Ḥumaydī, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 110, 258, 260.
 al-Ḥumaydī, Abū Bakr, 135, 135n.
 al-Ḥummaymah, 146, 162.
 Hurmuzshahr, 129n.
 Ḥurqūs, 80n.
 Ḥusām al-Dīn al-Ḥājirī, 123.
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 92n., 140, 143, 145, 146, 147, 156n., 161, 390. al-Ḥusayn al-Azdī, 302.
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 330.
 Ḥusayn Ibn Bakr al-Kilābī, 78.
 al-Ḥusayn al-Nasawī, 129, 130.
 Ḥusayn al-Sa'dī, 82.
 Ḥusayn al-Farrā, 215.
 Ḥusayn al-Marwarrūdī, 229.
 Ḥusn al-Muḥādharah, 169n.

I

Ibn 'Abbād, 281, 379.

Ibn 'Abbās, 'Abd Allāh, 13, 95, 143, 149.
 Ibn 'Abd, 113.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, 54.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, 135, 135n., 166, 167, 168, 168n., 292, 293.
 Ibn 'Abdūs, 198.
 Ibn Abi 'l-'Aṣb, 387, 389.
 Ibn Abi Ḍhi'b, 108, 157, 326.
 Ibn Abi Duwād al-Iyādī, 166, 167.
 Ibn Abi Jum'ah, 90.
 Ibn Abi Ḥaṣīnah, 417.
 Ibn Abi Hurayrah, 176.
 Ibn Abi Jarādah, 221, 222n.
 Ibn Abi 'l-Jaw, 357.
 Ibn Abi Laylā 151-153.
 Ibn Abi Randaqah, 239.
 Ibn Abi Sabrah, 157.
 Ibn Abi Salamah, 157.
 Ibn Abi 'Usrūn, 221.
 Ibn Abi 'l-Ṣaqr, 220, 221.
 Ibn Abi Uṣaybi'ah, 407n., 413n.
 Ibn Abi 'l-Walid al-A'raj, 346.
 Ibn al-Abraḍ al-Kalbī, 81.
 Ibn al-'Adīm, 222n., 414n.
 Ibn Akhi 'l-Aṣma'i, 300, 300n.
 Ibn Akhi Qirwāsh, 419n., 420.
 Ibn al-'Amid, 362.
 Ibn 'Āmir, 37.
 Ibn al-Anbārī, 41, 308, 317, 319 333.
 Ibn 'Arab Shāh, 388n.
 Ibn al-A'rābi 39, 39n., 180, 259n., 282, 286, 283, 285, 286, 307, 308.

- Ibn al-'Arabī, Abū Bakr, 259n., 270, 271n., 272.
 Ibn 'Asākir, 201, 219, 419.
 Ibn al-'Aṣb, 387.
 Ibn al-Aṣḥ'ath, 153n.
 Ibn al-Aṭhīr al-Jazarī, 8, 22, 23, 69, 113, 259, 260, 321, 325n., 379.
 Ibn 'Awf, 55, 156.
 Ibn 'Awn, 156n.
 Ibn Ayyūb, 24.
 Ibn al-Azraq, 71n., 148, 199.
 Ibn Bājjah (Avempacc), 405n., 407n.
 Ibn Bannā al-Bashshārī, 251.
 Ibn Barrajan, 204, 205, 214.
 Ibn Bashkuwāi, 112, 241, 267, 272, 349n., 350n.
 Ibn Bashshār, 255, 330, 330n.
 Ibn Bāṭish, 172.
 Ibn al-Baṭṭi, 365.
 Ibn Baṭūṭah, 98n.,
 Ibn al-Bayyī' al-Ḥākīm, 174, 175, 176, 176n., 178, 178n., 184, 185, 256, 256n., 257, 256-258.
 Ibn Bindār, 253n.
 Ibn Bulbul, 181n.
 Ibn al-Dahhān, 114, 115, 126.
 Ibn Dāwūd al-Zāhirī, 237, 239, 237n., 238, 239.
 Ibn al-Dharawī, 118.
 Ibn Diḥyah, 4, 102, 413.
 Ibn al-Dubaythi, 223, 224, 232, 372, 373.
 Ibn Durayd. (Abū Bakr), 140, 251, 297-305, 297, 298, 299, 301, 302, 304, 308, 311, 333.
 Ibn al-Duwaydah, 416.
 Ibn Faḍlān, 269n.
 Ibn Farqad, 158.
 Ibn Firūh, 54.
 Ibn Fūrak, 248.
 Ibn al-Furāt, 84, 110, 316.
 Ibn 'l-Ḥaddād Abū Bakr, 171-172.
 Ibn al-Ḥajjāj, 129, 220n, 387.
 Ibn Ḥamdūn the Kātib, 360, 361.
 Ibn Ḥammād, 169, 170.
 Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 161, 162.
 Ibn Ḥanbal, 270.
 Ibn Hānī, 395, 396, 397, 399, 400.
 Ibn al-Ḥārithiyah, 162.
 Ibn Harmah, 334, 334n.
 Ibn Hārūn, 272n.
 Ibn Hasan, 97.
 Ibn Hāshim, 282.
 Ibn Hāshim al-Lakhmī, 299n.
 Ibn Hawqal, 245.
 Ibn Haydan, 403.
 Ibn Ḥayyūs, Abū'l-Fityān, 406, 416, 417, 419, 420.
 Ibn al-Ḥaziri, 371.
 Ibn Ḥazim, 352, 352n.
 Ibn Hishām, 299n.
 Ibn Hubbārah, 363.
 Ibn Hudhayl, Abū Bakr, 347, 347n.
 Ibn Hudhayl, Abū 'l-Ḥasan, 55, 56.
 Ibn Ishāq, 252, 253, 254, 288.
 Ibn Jakinā, 48.

- Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī, 165, 166,
 174, 239, 239n., 378.
 Ibn al-Jarrāḥ, 257.
 Ibn al-Jawālīqī, 50, 294, 332,
 368, 368n.
 Ibn al-Jawzī, Abu 'l-Faraj, 41,
 109, 109n., 113n., 268, 269,
 328.
 Ibn al-Jazzār, 42, 53.
 Ibn Jinnī, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, 391.
 Ibn Jurayj, 136n., 237.
 Ibn al-Kalbī, 89, 111, 286, 287,
 289, 291.
 Ibn Karrām, 226n., 249, 249n.
 Ibn Khaldūn, 156n., 271n.,
 364n., 396n.
 Ibn al-Khallī, 202.
 Ibn Khallikān, 1, 26, 38, 39, 40,
 46, 50, 65n., 77, 98n., 109n.,
 119n., 127n., 135n., 137n.,
 143n., 149n., 154n., 168n.,
 180n., 189n., 204n., 224n.,
 229, 230n., 248n., 264n., 268,
 294, 318n., 332n., 334n., 337n.
 Ibn Khāqān, 4, 402n., 405, 406.
 Ibn al-Khaṭīb, 224.
 Ibn al-Khayyāt, 420.
 Ibn al-Labbān al-Faraḍī, 18.
 Ibn al-Layth, 24.
 Ibn Lujaym, 140.
 Ibn al-Maḍīnī, 136n., 253n.
 Ibn Maḥfūz, 394.
 Ibn Ma'īn, 253n.
 Ibn Mājah, 255, 256, 262.
 Ibn Mākūlā, 58, 162, 165, 258, 259, 304, 371.
 Ibn Man'ah, 'Imād al-Dīn, 229,
 231, 232, 233.
 Ibn Mandā'i, 50.
 Ibn Mandah, 174, 174n., 264,
 265.
 Ibn al-Maunī, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ,
 365.
 Ibn al-Marāghah, 287.
 Ibn Masarraḥ, 350.
 Ibn Mas'ūd, 187n.
 Ibn Mikāl ('Abd Allāh), 298.
 Ibn al-Mubārak, 6, 32, 176.
 Ibn Muhājir, 215.
 Ibn Muḥammad, 290.
 Ibn Mujāhid, 274, 275, 277,
 308n.
 Ibn al-Mukarram, 322.
 Ibn al-Munajjim, 290, 367, 377.
 Ibn al-Mundhir, al-Naysabūrī, 182.
 Ibn Munqidh, 117, 118, 119.
 Ibn Muqlah, 275.
 Ibn al-Muqrab, 365.
 Ibn Muslim, 73.
 Ibn Musu, 337n.
 Ibn al-Musalaya, 410n.
 Ibn al-Mustanir, 289.
 Ibn al-Mustawfī, 52, 69, 113,
 119, 121, 122, 123, 124,
 125, 126, 232, 365, 366,
 371, 372.
 Ibn Muzāḥim, 349.
 Ibn Muḥriz al-Wahrānī, 363,
 364.
 Ibn al-Naḥḥās, 318n.
 Ibn al-Naṭṭāh, 58, 59.
 Ibn al-Ni'mah, 56, 56n.
 Ibn Nubātah, 366.
 Ibn Nūh, 111.
 Ibn Nuqṭah, 370, 372.

- Ibn Qa'nab, 110.
 Ibn Qānī' 167, 169.
 Ibn al-Qattā', 347.
 Ibn al-Qaysarānī, 262, 264.
 Ibn al-Qūq, 345n., 346, 346n.
 Ibn Quray'ah, 361, 363.
 Ibn Qutaybah, 32, 90, 160, 318, 329, 376.
 Ibn al-Qūṭiyyah, 345, 350, 347, 348.
 Ibn al-Raffā al-Ruṣāfī, 407, 409.
 Ibn Rashīq, 353, 355, 363n., 399.
 Ibn Rawāḥah al-Anṣārī, 119n.
 Ibn al-Rūmī, 22, 181, 238.
 Ibn al-Rushāṭī, 350.
 Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh, Abū Naṣr, 195.
 Ibn Sābī, 88n.
 Ibn Sahl, 379.
 Ibn Sa'd, 94, 107, 287, 326, 329,
 Ibn Sa'īd, 164, 164n., 410n.
 Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Ḥamīd, 254n.
 Ibn al-Ṣā'igh, 250, 404, 406.
 Ibn Sālim, 280n.
 Ibn al-Sammāk, 277, 279.
 Ibn Sam'ūn, 280, 281.
 Ibn al-Sarrāj the grammarian, 311, 315,
 Ibn al-Sarrāj (Abū Muḥammad), 110.
 Ibn al-Sawādī, Abu 'l-Faraj, 127.
 Ibn Shaddād, 79n., 96.
 Ibn Shāhīn, 169, 301.
 Ibn al-Shujarī, 368.
 Ibn Ṣulāikh, 11.
 Ibn Ṣhanbūdī, 275, 308n.
 Ibn Sharaf al-Qayrawānī, 363, 363n.
 Ibn Shībal, 107, 148, 149, 151, 252.
 Ibn Shīrshīr, 239n.
 Ibn Shubrumah, 151.
 Ibn al-Sīd al-Baṭa Iyawṣī, 290, 306.
 Ibn al-Sikkī, 284.
 Ibn al-Sirāfī, 391.
 Ibn Sirin, 153, 154, 155, 156.
 Ibn Sukkārah al-Hāshimī, 387, 388, 389.
 Ibn Surayj, 173, 174, 229, 137, 238, 239, 280.
 Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī, 224, 389.
 Ibn Ṭabāṭaba, 84.
 Ibn Tarāra, 165.
 Ibn Tarāwah, 130.
 Ibn Tāshīfīn, 4.
 Ibn Taymīyah, 365, 366, 367.
 Ibn Ṭhawābah, 322, 323, 322n.
 Ibn Ṭulūn, 168.
 Ibn 'Umar, 106, 107, 149, 154.
 Ibn 'Unayn, 6, 228, 370.
 Ibn 'Uyaynah, 154n.
 Ibn Wahb, 105, 108, 166.
 Ibn Yunus, 164, 166.
 Ibn al-Za'farānī, 97.
 Ibn Zafar al-Ṣaqallī, 373, 375.
 Ibn al-Zaniyah, 152.
 Ibn Zakī, 204.
 Ibn Zaydūn al-Qurṭubī, 400.
 Ibn Zinjī, 316.
 Ibn al-Zubayr, 71n., 80, 141, 142, 143, 144, 153n., 154, 288.

- Ibn Zuhr (Avençoar), 409, 410, 411, 412,, 413.
 Ibrāhīm (Imām), 161, 162.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Šūli, 25, 27.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥasan, 283n.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Isa, 345, 348.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mahdī, 21.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Mudabbār, 320, 321.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Mūsā Ibn Ja'far al-'Alawī, 26, 390.
 Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī, 39, 284,
Idāh, 33, 233.
Idāh al-Maḥṣūl fī Burhān-il-uṣūl, 261.
 Idris, 58, 111, 134, 139.
 al-Idrisī, 130n.
 Ifriqiyah, 9, 258, 395.
 Iftikīn, 35, 36.
Iḥtiṣāl, 350.
Iḥtiṣāj al-Qurā, 315.
Ihyā 'Ulūm al-Dīn, 192.
 'Ijl, 178, 277, 293.
 al-'Ijlī, 63, 174.
 al-Ikhshid, 1, 83, 84.
Ikmāl, 58, 165, 258, 261, 371.
 'Ikrimah, 13, 95.
 'Imād al-Dawlah Buwayhid, 32, 33, 65, 65n.
 'Imād al-Dawlah Ibn Hūd, 405n.
 'Imād al-Dīn, 43n., 45, 47, 49, 220, 223, 224, 360, 393n., 372, 413, 416, 416n., 420n.
 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Bāṭish, 171.
 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Mun'ah, 229, 233.
 'Imād al-Dīn Hafadah, 215.
 'Imād al-Dīn Abū Ḥamīd, 232.
 'Imād al-Dīn Aḥmaḍ, 224.
 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī, 5, 6, 50, 97, 121n., 193, 203, 364, 375, 404.
 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Yūnus, 215.
 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, 218.
 Imām al-Ḥarmayn. 191, 195, 196, 197n. 226, 228n., 229, 266.
 Imām al-Shāfi', 229.
 Imām Zāda, 235n.
 Imāmites, 148, 248.
 Imra 'l-Qays, 93, 385n.
 'Imrān Ibn Ḥuṣayn al-Khuzā'i, 154, 154n.
 'Imrān Ibn Mūsā al-Najjār, 187.
 India, 249, 335, 339, 363.
 Indian, 334.
 Indians, 348.
Intiṣāf fī Masā'il al-Khilāf, 198.
'Iqd, 292, 293, 294.
al-'Iqd al-Shamīn, 114.
Iram Dhat al-'Imād, 273.
 Irān, 37.
 'Irāq, 9, 10, 32, 34, 37, 41, 42, 53, 60, 63, 72, 80, 84, 92n., 100, 104, 105n., 124, 135n., 158, 163, 164n., 167, 173, 176, 177, 178, 191, 195, 214, 216, 230n., 248, 255, 256, 257, 258, 262, 269, 273, 279, 281, 330, 359n., 371, 380, 390, 410n.

'Irāq al-'Ajam, 63.
 al-'Irāqī, 57.
 al-Irbilī, 52.
Irshād, 257. al-Irshād, 235.
Irshād al-Nuẓẓār ila laṭā' if il-Asrār (by al-Rāzi), 225.
 'Isa Ibn Ma'qil, 58.
 'Isa Ibn Muzāḥim, 348.
 'Isa al-Hakkāri, 78.
 Iṣbahān, 63, 130n., 177, 178,
 179, 237, 248, 251, 261, 262,
 264, 269.
 Iṣbahānī, 382.
 al-Iṣbahānī, Abū Mūsa, 261, 262, 265.
 Isfijāb, 285, 286.
 Iṣḥāq Ibn Ibrāhīm, 334.
 Iṣḥāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Jurjānī, 40.
 Iṣḥāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣili,
 10.
 Iṣḥāq Ibn Muḥammad al-
 Nakḥa'i, 376.
 Iṣḥāq Ibn Rāhwayh, 41.
 al-Iṣḥāqī, 366n.
Iṣḥārah, 273.
Iṣḥārāt (by Avicena), 225.
Ishrāf, 189.
al-Ishrāf 'ala Ghawāmiḍ al-Ḥu- kumā, 189n.
 al-Iskandar, 53, 54.
 Islāmic, 304, 377.
 Islāmism, 107, 155n., 126, 176,
 191, 195, 198, 206, 207, 209,
 211, 213, 226, 246, 247,
 248n., 260n., 304, 318n.,
 327n., 377n., 393, 405n., 410n.

Ismā'il, 281, 295n.
 Ismā'il Ibn Bulbul, 181.
 Ismā'il Ibn Ṣabīḥ, 19.
 Ismā'ilian, 162n.
 Isrā'il, 228n.
 Istirābād, 176.
 Italian, 407n.
 'Iṭhyar al-'Udhri, 394, 395.
I'timād, 404.
 'Iyād Ibn Nizār, 409.
 Iyādi, 413.
 'Izz al-Dīn al-Ansārī, 116, 119,
 119n.
 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhīr, 96, 116.
 'Izz al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, 115.
 'Izz al-Dīn Farrūkh Shāh, 6.
 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd Ibn
 Mawdūd, 69, 115, 222.
 'Izziyah, 231.

J

al-Jabal, 63, 279.
 Jacob, 196.
 Ja'far Barmakī, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14,
 20, 23.
 Ja'far Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 141, 288.
 Ja'far Ibn 'Alī, 396.
 Ja'far Ibn Ḥarb, 248n.
 Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn Mazyad,
 147.
 Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān 109.
 Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, 146, 147, 253n., 390.
 al-Ja'fari, 323.
 Jaḥḥẓah, 283n.

- Jaḥaẓat al-Barmakī, 304.
 al-Jārmī, Abū Ḥamīd, 233, 34.
 (Jalāl al-Dawlah), Naṣr, 414.
 Jalāl al-Dīn, 142n.
 Jalāl al-Dīn Abū Aḥmad, 218.
 Jamāl al-Dīn, Abū 'l-Mujāhid, 235.
 Jamāl al-Dīn Mahmūd Ibn
 'Abd, 113.
 Jamāl al-Dīn 'Amīd al-Dawlah,
 44.
 Jamāl al-Dīn al-Qifṭī, 44.
 Jamāl al-Dīn Wāthiq Ibn Faḍlān,
 269, 269n.
Jamharah, 299, 300, 306.
Jamharat al-Nisab, 88, 11, 297.
Jāmi', 114n., 158, 268.
Jami' al-Qaṣr, 289.
al-Jāmi' al-Ṣāḥib, 163.
Jāmi' al-Sulṭān, 268.
Jāmi' al-Uṣūl, 69.
Jāmi' al-Uṣūlfi-Aḥādith il-Rasūl, 114.
al-Jāmi' wa 'l-'Ilal, 254.
 Jamīl, 89.
al-Jam'o bayn al-Ṣāḥihayn, 258.
 Jannābah, 313.
 Jannābī, 313.
 'l-Ja'rā, Banu, 297.
 Jaramī, 233.
 al-Jarīr, 74, 150, 287, 288, 387.
 al-Jarjarā'i al-Aqṭa', 186.
 Jarjarāyā, 154.
 Jaṣāṣah (Gāte), 125, 126.
 Jathīl, 107.
 al-Jawād, 147.
 al-Jawālīqī, 50.
 al-Jawharī, 72n., 144, 185, 414.
 Jaxartes, 175n.
 Jay, 251.
 al-Jayyānī, 272.
 al-Jazarī, 'Alī Ibn al-Aṭhīr, 259.
 Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar, 115, 116,
 129.
 al-Jazirat al-Khaḍrā, 282.
 Jerusalem, 83, 192, 204, 205,
 207, 208n., 241, 263.
 Jesus, 208.
 Jew, 362.
 Jewish, 251.
 Jews, 410n.
 Jibāb al-Turkmān, 119.
 al-Jibāl, 53.
 Jibrīl, 183.
 al-Jihshyarī, 9, 12, 13, 26.
 Jihūn, 265.
 Jīl, 66.
 Jīlān, 66.
 Jīlī, 66.
 Jizah, 79.
 Juktan, 111n.
 Jordan, 97n.
Journal Asiatique, 411n. al-Jubbā'i, Abū 'Alī, 229, 244,
 245, 246.
Judhwat al-Muqṭabis, 110, 163, 258.
 Ju'fī, 162, 165.
 Juhaynah, 145, 187.
Jumal al-Uṣūl, 315.
Jūnat al-Māshīyah, 357.
 al-Junayd, 40, 270.
 Jundub, 297.
 Jurhum, 265n., 395.
 Jurhumī, 395.

Jurjān, 65, 65, 176, 233, 257. al-Jurjānī, Abu'l-'Abbās Aḥmad, 240.
 al-Jūrjānī, Abu 'l-Qāsim, 359.
 Jurijāniya, 226n.
 Jūshn, 57.
 al-Juwaynī, Abū Muḥammad, 195.

K

Ka'b, 224n., 297.
 al-Kāfī, 318, 318n.
 Kāfī 'l-Kufāt, 359.
 Kāfūr, 1, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87,
 88, 172.
 Kalābādī, 184.
 al-Kalābādī, 184, 185.
 Kalb, 121n., 187, 289.
 al-Kalbi, 88, 286, 288, 289.
 al-Kamāl al-Mawṣilī, 124.
 al-Kamāl al-Simnānī, 226.
 Kamāl al-Dīn Mūsā, 215, 232.
 al-Kāmikhī, 263.
 Kāmil (Ibn al-Aṭhīr), 8n., 22n.,
 321n., 325n.
 Kāmil (al Mubarrad), 80, 141,
 291, 292, 293, 377.
 Kanjah, 373.
 al-Karaj, 60, 61, 63.
 Karbalā, 92n.
 Karkh, 248n., 386, 394.
 Karrāmiyah, 226, 226n.
 al-Kāshānī, 184n.
 Kaṣṣī fī wa 'l Bayān, 114n.
 Kaṣṣhāf, 114, 114n.
 Kathīr Ibn Ghālib, 165.
 Kathīr Ibn Yahyā, 169.

Kaysān, 18, 144.
 al-Kaysāniyah, 144.
 al-Kāzarūnī, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 195.
 Kāzimah, 391.
 Khaḍari, 191.
 Khaḍir, 191.
 Khalāt, 104.
 Khālīd (Barmakī), 8, 16.
 Khālīd al-Bayāḍī, 94.
 Khālīd al-Ḥadhdhā, 154.
 Khālīd, al-Khuzā'i, 89, 164.
 Khālīd Ibn al-Walīd, 140n., 141, 154, 209, 252, 380.
 al-Khālīdī, 381.
 Khālīdites, 59, 381.
 Khalīfah Ibn Khayyāt, 254.
 Khālīj, 397n.
 al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad, 180, 181,
 298, 306.
 al-Khalīlī (Abū Ya'lā), 257. al-Khamat, 148.
 Khān Sabil, 79.
 Kharīdah, 5, 43, 44, 46, 47, 48,
 49, 121n., 203, 220, 223, 359,
 363, 372, 375, 389, 404, 410n.,
 413, 416, 420n.
 Khārijites, 71, 80, 81, 155n.
 Khartank, 164, 165.
 al-Khashshāb, 127.
 al-Khatan, 176, 177.
 al-Khaṭīb al-Baghdādī, 25n.,
 37n., 41, 54, 139, 243, 267,
 273n., 317, 330, 322n., 329,
 372, 394.
 al-Khaṭṭāb, 349n.
 al-Khaṭṭār, 349n.
 Khawlah, 140.

Khaybar, 209, 367.

Khayr al-Baḡhr bi Khayr al-Baḡhar, 373.

Khayrī, 392.

al-Khayzurān, 7, 8, 254, 329.

Khayzurān Gate, 254.

al-Khazraji. Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, 56.

Khidr, 191.

al-Khidri, 189.

Khīṭaṭ, 79n., 88, 168, 169, 171, 172.

Khīṭaṭ Miṣr, 186.

Khubūshān, 217.

al-Khubūshānī, 216, 217.

Khulāṣah fi 'l-Fiqh, 192.

Khurāsān, 8, 9, 10, 18, 20, 25, 27, 32, 53, 60, 61, 63, 72, 74, 105n., 163, 164, 165, 173, 175, 176, 179n., 189, 227, 249, 250, 251, 255, 262, 266, 273, 301, 332, 368, 371, 379.

Khuthayl, 107.

al-Khuwārī, 301.

Khuwārazm, 72, 72n., 171, 226, 226n., 227, 250, 251, 266, 273n., 378, 379, 380n.

Khuwārazmī, 380.

Khuwārazmite, 379.

Kūwayyi, 235n.

Khuẓā'ah, 89.

Khuẓā'ī, 95.

Khūzistān, 61n., 103n., 245, 262.

Khwarizm Shāh, 227.

al-Kifāyah, 233.

Kilāb, 77n.

Kilābite, 77n.

al-Kilā'ī, Sa'id Ibn Jābir, 346n.

Kindah, 77n.

Kinānah, 171.

Kirmānshah, 133.

al-Kisā'ī, 39, 159, 181, 284, 379.

Kitāb al-Abyāt, 300n.

Kitāb al-Aḍḍad, 289.

Kitāb al-Aghānī, 92, 305n., 357.

Kitāb al-Aḥdāth, 42.

Kitāb al-'Ajālah, 111.

Kitāb al-Akhḷāq, 376.

Kitāb al-Alfāz, 285.

Kitāb al-Amḥilāh li-Duwal al-Muqbilah, 356.

Kitāb al-Amwāl, 42.

Kitāb al-Ansāb, 52, 262.

Kitāb al-Anwā, 285, 334.

Kitāb al-Anwār, 308n.

Kitāb al-'Aḡharāt, 306.

Kitāb al-Aṣwāt, 289.

Kitāb al-'Ayn, 180, 306.

Kitāb al-Azminah, 289.

Kitāb al-Badī', 115.

Kitāb al-Bārī', 290, 376.

Kitāb al-Bayān wa 'l-Burhān, 225.

Kitāb al-Buyū', 306.

Kitāb al-Buzāt wa 'l-Ṣayd, 58.

Kitāb al-Dhabīḥ, 376.

Kitāb al-Dīakhā'ir, 128.

Kitāb Dīakhā'ir al-'Ulūm, 187n.

Kitāb al-Dhayl, 52.

Kitāb al-Dhubāb, 285.

Kitāb Dīyā' al-Qulūb, 180.

Kitāb fa'ala wa af'ala, 290.

Kitāb Fā'it al-'Ayn, 306.

Kitāb Fā'it al-Jamharah, 304.

Kitāb al-Fākhīr, 180.

- Kitāb al-Farq*, 289.
Kitāb al-Faṣḥūsh, fī Aḥkām Qarāqūsh, 79.
Kitāb al-Fayṣal, 269.
Kitāb al-Furū, 171.
Kitāb al-Ḡhāniyah, 228n.
Kitāb al-Ḡharb wa 'l-Sharq, 356.
Kitāb Ḡharib al-Ḥadīth, 289.
Kitāb Ḡharib al-Qur'ān, 299.
Kitāb al-Ḡharibayn, 261.
Kitāb al-Ḡhurar, 334.
Kitāb al-Ḥamzah, 289.
Kitāb al-'Ibādah, 334.
Kitāb al-I'dhār, 239.
Kitāb al-I'jāz fī Ḥall il-Aḥōjī wa 'l Alghāz, 68.
Kitāb al-Inṣāf, 114.
Kitāb al-Intiṣār, 239.
Kitāb al-Irshād, 164.
Kitāb al-Ishrāf, 182.
Kitāb al-Ishṭiqāq, 180, 289, 295, 299, 315.
Kitāb al-Istī'āb, 258.
Kitāb al-Istizkār, 187n.
Kitāb Iṭḥbāt al-Muḥaṣṣal, 120.
Kitāb al-Jāhiliyāt, 318.
Kitāb Jalā al-Shubah, 180.
Kitāb al-Jamharah, 299.
Kitāb al-Jūmi, 299, 353.
Kitāb al-Jurjānī, 306.
Kitāb al-Khayl, 285, 314.
Kitāb Khulq al-Faras, 289.
Kitāb al-Khulq al-Insān, 289.
Kitāb al-Lughāt, 249.
Kitāb al-Lum'a fī 'l-Aḥwān,
Kitāb al-Ma'ānī, 300.
 294n.
Kitāb al-Mu'arīf, 32, 376.
Kitāb al-Mabāḥiṭh al-'Imādiyah fī'l-Maṣālib al-Ma'ādiyah, 225.
Kitāb al-Madākhil, 304.
Kitāb al-Maḥṣūl, 247.
Kitāb al-Maknūn wa 'l-Maktūm, 304.
Kitāb al-Milal wa'l-Niḥal, 250.
Kitāb al-Mūḍiḥ, 306.
Kitāb al-Muṣāṭahah wa'l-Munākahah, 356.
Kitāb al-Muṣḥaf ḍaliyāt, 318n.
Kitāb al-Mughīth, 261.
Kitāb al-Mujtabā, 299.
Kitāb al-Mulāḥim, 299.
Kitāb al-Mu'lim bi Fawā'id Kitāb Muslim, 261.
Kitāb al-Muqtabis, 299.
Kitāb al-Mustaghīṭhīn, 112.
Kitāb al-Mustaḥsan, 306.
Kitāb al-Mustajād min Fa'alāt al-Ajwād, 129.
Kitāb al-Muwāṣilāt, 315.
Kitāb al-Nabāt, 285.
Kitāb Nashwān al-Muḥāḍarah, 129.
Kitāb al-Nawādir, 285, 289, 306.
Kitāb al-Nazẓām, 120.
Kitāb al-Nihāyah, 114.
Kitāb al-Nisab, 42, 145.
Kitāb Nujabā al-Abnā, 374.
Kitāb al-Nuzaḥ, 58.
Kitāb al-Qawāfī, 289.
Kitāb al-Ra'ūd 'ala 'l-Mulḥidīn fī Tashābuh al-Qur'ān, 290.
Kitāb al-Rāḥ wa al-Irtiyāl, 356.
Kitāb al-Riddah, 326.
Kitāb al-Rasā'il, 187n.

- Kitāb al-Sā'āt*, 306.
Kitāb al-Ṣaḥīḥ, 164.
Kitāb al-Salāḥ, 58.
Kitāb al-Sarj wa 'l-Lijām, 299.
Kitāb al-Ṣihāb, 186.
Kitāb al-Ṣhajan wa 'l-Sakan, 357.
Kitāb al-Ṣhukūk, 242, 243.
Kitāb al-Ṣhūrā, 306.
Kitāb al-Ṣifāt, 289.
Kitāb al-Ṣilāḥ, 299.
Kitāb Siyāsāt al-Mulūk, 58.
Kitāb al-Sunan, 255.
Kitāb al-Suwāl wa 'l-Jawāb, 357.
Kitāb al-Ṭa'ām wa 'l-Adām, 356.
Kitāb al-Ṭafsīr, 312.
Kitāb al-Ṭayf, 180.
Kitāb al-Ṭamhīd, 150.
Kitāb al-Taq'īd, 371.
Kitāb al-Ṭaqrīz, 41.
Kitāb al-Tarīd, 353.
Kitāb al-Tārikh, 180.
Kitāb Taṣārīf il-Af'āl, 347.
Kitāb al-Tuffāḥah, 306.
Kitāb al-'Ūd wa 'l-Malāḥl, 180.
Kitāb al-'Ujālah, 265, 269.
Kitāb al-Uṣūl, 315.
Kitāb al-Wāqidi, 329.
Kitāb al-Waraqah, 334.
Kitāb al-Waṣūl ilā Ma'rifat al-uṣūl, 239.
Kitāb al-Wuzarā, 334.
Kitāb al-Yawāqit, 306, 308.
Kitāb al-Yawm wa 'l-laylah, 306.
Kitāb al-Zar'a wa 'l Nabāt, 180.
Kitāb al-Ziyādāt, 261.
Kitāb al-Zuwwār al-Arab, 299.
 Koran, 63n., 119n.
 Kūfah, 32, 37, 92n., 104, 107n., 151, 152, 155n., 157, 158, 180, 202, 249, 253, 255, 273, 277, 278, 279, 282, 283, 284n., 287, 289, 312, 344.
 Kūfah Gate, 294.
 Kūkubrī, 95, 104.
 Kulābite, 77n.,
 Kulthūm, 16n., 368.
 Kurds, 59.
 al-Kushmihani, 230.
 Kulḥayyir, 144, 151.
- L
- al-Labbān, 18.
 Labīd, 138, 393.
 al-Lakhmī, 214.
Lawāqih al-Anwār fī-Ṭabaqāt il-Akhyār, 270n.
 Laylā, 90, 332.
 al-Layth, 38, 105, 106, 107.
 Līnah, 104, 104n.
 London, 373n.
 Luḥaym, 57.
 Luḥayyī, 89. -
 Lūṭ Ibn Mikhnaḥ, 376.
 Luwayyī, 157, 224n.
- M
- Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān, 51, 186.
 al-Ma'āfir, 168, 349, 168, 270, 349.
 Ma'ālim, 225.
 Ma'ani 'l-Ḥamāsah, 295n.
 Ma'ani 'l-Qur'ān, 289, 392.
 Ma'ani al-Ṣhi'r, 40, 285, 300n.

- Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān*, 416.
Mabsūt, 178n., 182, 188.
 Macedonia, 54.
 Madanī, 262, 326, 329.
 al-Madā'in, 54, 133, 155, 277.
 Madhhiij, 352, 353.
 al-Madhkūr, 277, 277n.
 al-Mad.nah, 7, 38, 39, 41, 42, 89, 91, 94, 95, 100, 107, 108, 110, 131, 143, 145, 146, 149, 157, 160n., 170, 208, 218, 224, 252, 253n., 260n., 262, 266, 304, 326, 327n., 330, 331.
 Madīnat al-Fil, 72n.
 Madīnat al-Salām (Baghdād), 339.
 Madinī, 262.
al-Maghāzī, 252, 253, 326.
 Maghnaj, 297.
 Maghrib, 47, 116, 192, 349n., 396, 397n., 413.
 Maghribīns, 358.
 Maghribiyan, 116, 406.
 Magian, 243.
 Magians, 9, 165, 249.
 al-Maḥājir, 376.
Maḥakk al-Nazar, 192.
 Maḥāmīlī, 183n., 183.
 Maḥdī, 144, 148.
 al-Maḥdī, 12, 13, 16, 22, 42, 283n., 284, 297, 329, 386.
 al-Mahdiyyah, 261, 395.
 Maḥmūd, 414, 416.
 Maḥmūd Ibn Wahb Ibn 'Abbās, 83.
 Mahrāh, 403.
 Mahri, 403.
Maḥṣūl, 225, 232.
Majāzāt al-Qur'ān, 392.
 al-Majd al-Jilī, 226.
 Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhīr, 69, 113, 116.
 Majd al-Dīn Ibn Munqidh, 117.
 al-Mājin, 24n.
 al-Mājjah, 114n.
 al-Majnūn, 1.
 Majorca, 258, 259, 260.
Makārim al-Aḥlāq, 234n.
 Makḥramah, 252.
 Makḥūl, 149.
 Makḥzūm, 128, 169n.
 al-Makīl, 37n.
 al-Makīn, 71n.
 Makkah, 32, 39, 41, 42, 71n., 88, 89, 100, 104, 114n., 135n., 136, 137, 139, 146n., 149, 157n., 182, 183, 190, 192, 207, 208, 214, 255, 258, 263, 266, 267, 273, 279, 280, 327n., 331, 346n., 366, 375, 406n.
 Makkan, 272n.
 al-Makkī, 279, 280.
 Malāqā, 408.
 Malāqah, 130.
 Mālik Ibn Anas (Imām), 38, 55, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 112, 114n., 127, 135, 137, 149, 154n., 157, 166, 167, 168, 169n., 170, 240, 253, 254, 261, 326, 352, 359.
 Mālik Ibn Dīnār, 112, 113.
 al-Malik al-'Adil, 231.
 al-Malik al-Afḍal, 369.

- al-Malik al-Mu'azzam, 67, 95,
 96, 97, 98, 102, 103, 123, 125,
 232, 370.
 al-Malik al-Qāhir Mas'ūd, 231.
 al-Malik al-Šālih, 221n., 222.
 al-Malik al-Zāhir, 125, 264.
 Mālikite, 111n., 114n., 167,
 239.
 Mālikiyah, 280.
 Mālikīyan, 417.
Maljā al-Ḥukkām 'ind Iltibās il-Aḥkām, 222.
 Ma'mar Ibn al-Muthannā, 70.
 Ma'mar Ibn Rāshid, 326.
 al-Māmūn, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24,
 26, 26n., 27, 57, 73n., 147,
 251, 266, 292, 326, 327, 328, 383.
 al-Māmūn al-Baṭā'ihī, 241.
Manāqib, 314.
Manāsik, 273.
 Manāzil al-'Izz (College), 199.
 Manbaj, 235.
Manḍūn bihi 'ala ghayri Ahlihī, 192, 193.
al-Manḥūl wa'l Muntaḥal, 192.
 al-Manšūr Abū Ja'far, 13, 38n.,
 42, 109n., 145, 153, 157, 159,
 161, 268, 283n., 292, 319,
 329, 386, 408.
 Manšūr Ibn 'Ammār, 105,
 105n.
 Manšūr Ibn Bādān, 60.
 Manšūr Ibn Ismā'il, 159.
 al-Manšūr, 'Ubaydī, 396.
Maqāmah, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47,
 48, 49, 50, 81, 281.
Maqāmahs, 368, 369, 374.
Maqāmāt, 42.
 al-Maqbarat al-'Atiqah, 263.
 al-Maqdisī Ibn Zāhir, 127n., 280, 371.
 al-Maqdisī Abu Zar'ah, 263.
 al-Maqqarī, 55, 56, 346n., 400n., 413.
 al-Maqrizī, 79n., 169n., 186n., 241n. al-Maqs, 79.
al-Maqṣad al-Asnā, 193.
Maqṣūrah, 298, 299n., 300, 302.
Maqāsid, 192.
 Marāghah, 226, 230n., 235.
Marāsid, 82n., 92n., 130n., 160n.
 Mardāw'j, 65.
 Marianā, 348n.
Ma'rifat al-Ḥadlith, 257.
 Māriyah, 297.
 Ma'rūf al-Karkhī, 306.
 Marw, 32, 184, 188, 189, 191,
 215, 255n., 262.
 Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam, 92n.
 Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah, 7.
 Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, 161.
 Marwān Ibn Zufr, 409.
 Marwānid, 347n.
 Marwarrūd, 215, 368, 370.
 al-Marwaz Jībū Ishāq, 229.
 al-Marwazī Abū Zayd, 184, 229.
 Mary, 208.
 al-Marzubāni, 28, 303, 331,
 332, 333, 379.
al-Masālik wa'l-Mamālik, 245.
 Māsarijis, 176.

- al-Māsarjisi, 175, 176.
 al-Mashān, 46, 48, 50.
 Mashhad, 37, 104.
 al-Masīhī, 358n.
 al-Masilah, 396.
 Masrūh, 77.
 Masrūr, 14, 15.
 Mas'ūd, 188, 232, 370.
 al-Mas'ūdī, Abū Ḥasan 'Alī,
     9, 187n., 244, 298, 328,
     337.
 al-Mas'ūdī, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 187, 188, 188.
 al-Māsūdī al-Bandahī, 368, 307, 369, 370.
 al-Mas'ūdī al-Qāsim, 284n.
 Mas'ūdian, 188.
 al-Maṭālib al-'Āliyah, 225.
 Maṭmah, 406.
 Maṭmah al-Anfus, 405.
 Maṭmah al-Anfus wa Masrah al-Ta'annus fi Mulaḥ Ahl il-Andalus, 3.
 al-Māwardī, 337, 338.
 Mawḍiḥ, 273.
 Mawdūd, 6, 95n.
 Maysān, 154, 156.
 Mayūrqah, 260.
 al-Mayūrqī, 259.
 Mayyāfāriqīn, 148, 195, 196,
     199.
 al-Māzarī, 260, 261.
 Meidanii Proverbia, 51, 77n., 389n.
 Meidini tom, 364.
 Mclange de philosophie arabe et juive, 407n.
 Mesopotamia, 5, 33, 52, 74,
     97n., 100, 104, 173, 216, 262,
     273, 371.
 Messiah, 98.
 Mikāl, 300, 301.
 Milās, 243.
 Milhī, 387n.
 Mi'naj, 297.
 Minūchehr, 66.
 Mir'āt al-Zamān, 106n., 240n.,
     253n., 266n.
 Mirdās, 417.
 Mirdās, Banū, 414.
 Mirdāsids, 417.
 Miṣkāt al-Anwār, 193.
 Miṣr, 271, 358.
 Miskīn al-Dārimī, 131, 132.
 al-Miṣṣisah, 42, 83, 88.
 Mi'yār al-'Ilm, 192.
 Moorish, 3, 242n.
 Morocco, 4, 192, 214, 272,
     404.
 Moses, 320, 325.
 Moṣul, 33, 52, 53, 67, 69, 74,
     95, 100, 103, 104, 115, 116,
     125, 126, 216, 217, 218, 219,
     221, 222, 223, 224, 230, 231,
     232, 233, 269, 272, 273, 291,
     381, 386n., 419n., 420n.
 Mo'tazilite, 304.
 Mount Qāsiyūn, 236, 369, 370.
 Mu'add, 51.
 al-Mu'āfā Ibn Zakariyā, 165.
 Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abī Sufyān
     37n., 71, 141, 142, 310, 332,
     393, 394.
 Mu'āwiyah Ibn Sufyān al-A'mā,
     379.
 Mu'ayd, 51.

- al-Mu'aydi, 50, 51.
 al-Muayyid, 234n.
 al-Mubāarak, 118, 262.
 al-Mubarrad 80, 141, 143, 290,
 293, 315, 333, 377.
 Mubashshir Ibn 'Amr al-Kalbi,
 286.
Mudkhil, 180.
al-Mūdiḥāh, 345.
Mudkhil ilā 'Ilm il-Ṣaḥīḥ, 257. al-Mufaḍḍal, 181.
 al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍabbī, 51, 283,
 283n.
 al-Mufaḍḍal Ibn Muḥammad
 al-Jundī, 267.
Mufaḍḍaliyāt, 283, 318n.
Mufaṣṣal (by al-Zamakhsharī), 120, 225.
 al-Mughīrah Ibn Aḥnaf, 165.
 al-Mughīrah Ibn Shu'bah, 37.
Mughrib, 4.
 Mughul, 125n.
 Muḥaddhab, 171, 230, 234.
 al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah,
 71n., 72, 73.
 al-Muhallabī, 341, 362.
 Muḥammad (Prophet), 37n., 61,
 87, 92n., 111, 119n., 134,
 139, 141, 144n., 149, 153n.,
 162n., 193n., 207, 208n.,
 209, 213, 240, 253, 252, 260n.,
 266, 273, 276, 321, 327n.,
 330, 332, 353, 374n., 390,
 393n.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-
 Wahhāb, 346.
 Muḥammad 'Abdī, 265.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'At Jūs, 364.
 Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Awn,
 364.
 Muḥammad Ibn Abī Bakr, 38,
 235n.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī, al-Ḥaṣhmī,
 145, 159, 160, 161, 162.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan, 108, 136, 158, 159.
 Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq al-
 Nadīm, 267.
 Muḥammad Ibn Mandah Ibn
 Mihra-Yazd, 147.
 Muḥammad Ibn Marwān, 413.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Mudabbār,
 320n.
 Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn
 Shākir, 337n.
 Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir, 386.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Qāsim al-Ḥāriri, 44n., 46n., 50n.
 Muḥammad Ibn Samā'ah, 339.
 Muḥammad Ibn Tāhir, 24.
 Muḥammād Ibn Tukush (Sul-ṭān), 227.
 Muḥammad Ibn Waḍḍāḥ, 352n.
 Muḥammād Ibn Wahb al-
 Mas'ūdī, 40.
 Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā, 197,
 199, 200, 216, 226.
 Muḥammad Ibn Yazīd, 293,
 295.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Zayyāt, 29.
 Muḥammad (al-Amin), 8, 18, 20, 21, 23.
 Muḥammad al-Ḥujjah, 148.
 Muḥammad al-Ikhshīd, 88.
 Muḥammad al-Jawād, 146, 147, 148.

- Muḥammadan, 211, 213.
Muḥammadan dynasties in Spain, 407n, 413n.
 Muḥī al-Dawlah, 213.
 Muḥī al-Dīn Ibn al-Zakī, 204, 205.
 Muḥī al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī, 272n.
Muḥīt, 198, 216, 230.
 Mu'in al-Dīn, 97, 233, 370.
 al-Mu'izz al-'Ubaydī, 396, 397, 398, 399n.
 Mu'izz al-Dawlah, 32, 36, 307, 340.
 Mujāhid, 308n.
 Mujāhid al-Dīn Qā'imāz, 67, 68, 96, 115.
 Mujallī Ibn Jumayyī, 128.
Mu'jam al-Shu'arā, 28, 332n., 379.
 al-Mukhtār al-Thaqafī, 144.
Mukhtār al-Aghānī wa Ma-āniha, 357.
 al-Mukhtār 'Izz al-Mulk, 355.
 al-Muktafī, 316, 334, 337, 338.
 al-Muktafī (li 'amr Allāh), 359.
Mulakhkhaṣ (by al-Rāzī), 225.
Mulḥah, 49.
Mulḥat al-l'rāb, 45, 49.
 Munabbih, 352.
 al-Mundhir Ibn Mā 'al-Samā, 51.
 al-Mundhir Ibn al-Zubayr, 253.
 al-Mundhir, Zakī al-Dīn, 241.
al-Munqidh, 118.
al-Munqidh min al-Ḍalāl, 193.
 Munyah Harb, 172.
 al-Muqallad, 419n.
 Muqaṭṭam (Mount), 80, 166.
 al-Muqrī Abū Bakr, 272n.
 al-Muqtadī, 410n.
Muqtaḍib, 291.
 al-Muqtadir, 298n., 301, 313, 314, 316, 334, 390.
 al-Muqtafī, 218, 219, 263n., 264n.
al-Muqtariḥ fi 'l-Muṣṭaliḥ, 200.
 Murcia, 55, 137, 405n., 403.
 Murrah, 224n.
 al-Mursī, 401.
 al-Murtaḍā, 'Abd Allāh, 51.
Murūj al-Dhahab, 9, 187n., 244, 298, 328, 337.
 Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 324n., 325n.
 Mūsā Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Iṣbahānī, 324.
 Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr, 348n, 403.
 Mūsā al-Kāzim, 146, 147, 390, 394, 394n.
 Mūsā Ibn Shākir, 337, 337n.
 Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Zubayr, 29, 74, 74n., 80, 90, 150.
 al-Musabbihī al-Mukhtār, 353, 355, 357, 358.
 Muṣallā, 186, 187.
 al-Mūsawī, 390.
 Musaylamah al-Kadhḍāb, 140n., 326.
 al-Musayyab, 419.
al-Muṣāḥadāt wa 'l-Akhbār, 27.
 Muṣhamraj, 77.
Muṣkil al-Qur'ān, 308.
Muṣkilāt, 190.
Muṣhtarik, 251, 313n.

- Muslim Ibn 'Abīs, 71n.
 Muslim Ibn 'Amr, 72, 74.
 Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj, 253.
 Muslim Ibn Khālīd al-Zanjī, 136.
 Muslim Ibn al-Walīd al-Anṣārī, 26.
Muslim (Ṣaḥīḥ), 55, 114n., 257, 257n., 258, 261, 262, 266, 273n.
Musnad, 115, 177, 273n., 309. al-Mustaḍī, bi Amr Allāh, 201.
Mustadrak 'ala 'l-Ṣaḥīḥayn, 257.
Muṣṭaṣfā, 192, 215.
 Muṣṭafā 'l-Dawlah, 414.
al-Muṣṭafā wa 'l-Mukhtār fi'l-Ad'iyyat wa 'l-Adhkār, 114.
 al-Mustanjīd, 264n., 359, 360.
 al-Mustanṣir, 125.
 Mustanṣiriyah, 269n.
 al-Mustarshīd, 43, 44, 251.
 al-Mustazhir, 195, 410n.
 al-Mustazhirī, 195, 202, 240. al-Mu'taḍīd, 181n., 312, 313, 322n., 403.
 Muṭahhar Ibn Salām, 44.
Mu'talif wa Mukhtalif, 258.
Mu'tamid, 247.
 al-Mu'tamid, 28n., 164, 181n., 321n.
 al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404.
 al-Mutanabbī, 1, 2, 3, 17, 33, 34, 35, 64, 84, 85, 86, 120, 201, 339, 341, 342, 343n., 345, 399, 400.
 al-Muṭarriz, 266, 305, 310.
 al-Mu'taṣim, 27, 29, 57, 147.
 al-Mutawakkil, 322.
 al-Mu'tazilah, 70.
 Mu'tazilite, 25, 70, 187n., 194, 229, 242, 244, 245, 247.
 al-Muṭī', 83n., 130.
 Muṭī' Ibn Iyās, 76.
al-Muṭrib min Ash'ār Ahl al-Maghrib, 409.
 al-Muṭṭalib, 134, 252.
 al-Muwaffaq, 164, 181n., 321n.
 al-Muwammal, 176.
al-Muwaṭṭā, 55, 111, 111n., 114n., 135, 169n.
 al-Muwayyad Hishām, 351.
 al-Muwayyad Ibn Ziyād, 127.
 al-Muẓaffar, 51, 53.
 Muẓaffariyah (College), 127.
 al-Muzanī, 167, 168, 171, 176, 187, 252n., 278n.
 Muzdākḥān, 229.
- N
- Nabatean, 360n.
 Naḍr Ibn Shumayl, 288.
 Na'f, 150.
al-Nafā'is, 235.
Nafā'is al-'Arā'is, 228n.
 Nāfi' Ibn Abī Nu'aym, 106, 107, 154n.
 Nāfi' Ibn al-Azraq, 71n.
 Nafīsiyah, 231.
 al-Nafī, 55, 55n.
 al-Nafs al-Zakiyah, 283n.
 Nahār Ibn Tawsi'ah, 72.
 Nahr 'Isā, 363.
 Nahrawān, 9.
 Najāḥ Ibn Salamah, 324, 324n, 325.

- Najāshī, 288.
 Najd, 354n., 391, 419.
 al-Nājirī, 235, 236.
 al-Najjār, 38, 186, 187.
 Najjārian, 225.
 Najm al-Dīn 'Abd Allāh, 50.
 Najm al-Dīn Abū 'Alī 'l-
     Ḥasan, 216, 218.
 Najm al-Dīn al-Mirindī, 235.
 al-Na'mān, 196.
 al-Namarī, 294, 295, 295n.
 al-Naqqāsh, 272, 274.
 Narjis, 148.
 Nasaf, 262.
 al-Nasā'i, 114n., 262.
 Naṣībīn, 100, 219, 419n.
Naṣīhat al-Mulūk, 126.
 Nāṣihīyah, 266.
Nāsikh wa 'l-Mansūkh, 269.
 al-Nāṣir Yūsuf, 212.
 al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh, 269n.
 al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh 'Abd al-
     Raḥmān, 347.
 Nāṣirah, 98.
 Naṣr (Amīr), 415, 416, 417.
 Naysābūr, 24, 174n., 176, 177,
     178, 179, 179n., 183, 183n.,
     184, 185, 188, 191, 193, 195,
     196, 197, 198, 199, 214n.,
     215, 217, 233, 234n., 236,
     248, 249, 250, 256, 257, 262,
     265, 266, 269n., 279.
 Naysābūrī, 257.
 Nazareth, 98.
 al-Nassām al-Balkhī, 251.
 al-Ni'ālī, 202.
 Niftawayh, 291, 311.
 Nihāwand, 235n.
Nihāyah, 174.
Nihāyat al-Iqdām, 250.
Nihāyat al-Maṭlab, 197, 266.
Nihāyat al-'Uqūl, 225.
Nisab al-Khayl, 285.
 al-Nisā'i, Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 167, 172.
 Nizām al-Dīn, 235.
 Nizām al-Mulūk, 18, 191, 200n.,
     220n., 222.
 Nizāmiyah, 127, 168, 191, 193,
     195, 198, 200, 201, 214, 230,
     269n.
 Noah, 37, 111, 142n., 348.
 Norman, 373n.
 al-Nūbihār, 9.
 Nujāh, 366n.
Nujūm, 37, 83n., 113n., 156n.,
     164n., 174n., 255n., 274n.,
     277n., 283n., 284n., 334n.,
     368n., 386n.
Nujūm Ḥuffāz, 269n.
al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah, 25.
 al-Nu'mān, 127, 304, 406n.
 Numayr, 24.
 Nūr al-Dīn, 219, 224, 231.
 Nūr al-Dīn Arslān Shāh, 115.
 Nūr al-Dīn Mawdūd, 6.
 Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, 218, 219.
 Nūr al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn
     Qarā Arslān, 97n.
 Nūriyah, 231, 236.
*Nuṣrat al-Fitrah wa 'Uṣrat al-
     Fitrah*, 50.

O

- Old Testament*, 112.
 Olympias, 54.

Omayyids, 70.
Oran, 364.
Ottomon, 47.
Oxus, 72, 265.

P

Palestine, 1, 162.
Panj Dih, 370.
Paradise, 34, 74, 147, 153n.,
169n., 209, 278.
Paris, 104n., 193n.
Paul, 415.
Pentateuch, 210n.
Persia, 11, 33, 53, 61n., 156,
300.
Persian, 37, 38, 53, 60, 63, 95,
100, 126, 185, 226, 234n.,
251, 256, 262, 273, 279, 286,
289, 334, 335, 339, 360n.,
363, 373n., 380n.
Persian Gulf, 300n.
Persian 'Irāq, 60, 371.
Persians, 333.
Pharaoh, 28, 160.
Pococke, 51n., 89n., 123n.,
134n., 304n.
Portugal, 400.
Portugese, 11.
Price, 71n., 73n., 76n., 77n.,
140n., 326n.
Principles of Grammar, 115.
Prophet, 41, 42, 55, 70, 71, 77,
134, 139, 144, 147, 151, 152,
153n., 154, 155n., 169, 170,
186n., 187n., 207, 254, 257,
258, 288, 304, 305, 321, 322,
326, 327.

Prophet's Companions, 377.
Paslms, 210n.

Q

Qūbūs Ibn Washma'ir, 64, 65, 66.
Qadāya 'l-Subiyah, 356. al-Qādi 'l-Fāḍil, 57, 204, 364.
Qādi 'l-Khāfiqayn, 52, 53.
al-Qādi al-Wajih, 118.
Qadib al-Bān, 224.
al-Qādir bi-Allāh, 391.
Qādīsiyah, 209.
al-Qaffyl al-Marwāzī, 171, 229.
al-Qāffāl al-Shāshī, 173n., 175, 187, 188.
al-Qāhir, 232.
Qahṭān, 111, 395.
Qā'id Jawhar, 187, 376.
al-Qā'im, 309n.
Qā'imāz, see Mujahid al-Dīn.
Qais al-Ishb'ili, 3.
Qaisāriyah, 264.
Qal'ah al-Jabal, 79, 79n.
Qalā'id, 402n.
Qalā'id al-Iqyān, 3, 4, 401, 404.
Qal'at, Jābar, 218.
Qalqashandah, 107.
Qāmūs, 53, 71n., 107n., 127n. al-Qa'nabī, 110.
Qarāfah, 57, 88, 106, 128, 137,
166, 199.
Qarāmiṭah, 312.
Qarāqūsh, 78, 80, 78, 327n.
Qarmaṭs, 311, 312, 313, 334.
al-Qāsim al-Anbārī, 319.

- Qāsim Ibn Aṣḡagh, 352.
 al-Qāsim Ibn Sallān Abū
   'Ubayd, 39, 41, 134, 306, 309.
 al-Qāsim Ibn Ma'an, 283.
 al-Qāsim Ibn al-Qaffāl, 174, 175.
 al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 25, 316.
 al-Qāsim al-Ḥariri, 46.
 Qāsiyūm (Mount), 104, 214,
   221, 370.
 al-Qaṣr, 130.
 Qaṣr Ḥarb, 115.
 Qaṣr al-Imārah, 37.
 Qatādah 70, 154, 154n., 156.
 Qaṭan, 156.
 Qaṭar, 82n.
 Qaṭari, Abū Na'āmah, 80, 81, 82,
 al-Qaṭṭān, Yahyā, 253n.
 Qayrawān, 353, 355, 364, 397,
   399n., 412.
 Qays Ibn Maḡramah, 252.
 al-Qays, 356.
 Qays Ibn Rifā'ah, 105.
 Qays Ibn Sa'd, 142.
 Qays (tribe), 285.
 Qays 'Aylān, 107, 107n., 414n.
 Qayṣar, 157.
 Qaysarānī, 262.
 al-Qaysī, 297.
 Qazwīn, 255n., 246, 262.
 al-Qazzāz, Ibn Ja'far, 299, 353, 354, 355.
 Qift, 44.
 Qiliḡ Arslān Ibn Mas'ūd, 219.
 Qinnisrīn, 16, 368.
 Qirmisīn, 133.
 Qirmīṣ, 312.
 Qīṣaṣ al-Anbiyā, 356.
 Qubayṣah, 395n.
 al-Qubbāshī Abū Bakr, 349,
   350, 350n.,
 Quḡā'ah, 186, 289.
 al-Quḡā'i, 88, 168, 171, 172, 186, 187.
 Qudayd, 38, 39.
 al-Quds, 204.
 Qurāḡat al-Dḡahab, 399.
 Qur'ān, 30, 42, 54, 55, 56, 57,
   70, 100, 102, 107, 112, 114,
   123n., 127, 134, 136, 142n.,
   144n., 158, 165, 166n., 172,
   174n., 177, 178, 180, 181,
   193, 196, 197n., 203n., 204,
   205, 206, 207, 208n., 209n.,
   210n., 212n., 213n., 214,
   225, 226n., 228n., 245, 248,
   249, 253n., 255, 269, 272,
   273, 274, 275, 276n., 278n., 286, 287, 289, 290, 308, 315,
   317, 320n., 324n., 355, 360n.,
   362n., 365n., 366, 374, 392,
   405.
 Qur'ānic, 55, 165, 308n., 317.
 Quraysh, 112, 128, 134, 135n.,
   136n., 139, 147, 148, 151, 157,
   204, 234, 252, 260, 281, 348,
   361, 363, 376, 390, 394, 419.
 Qurayshite, 149.
 al-Qushayrī, 198, 250, 266.
 Qūt, 348.
 Qūḡ al-Qulūh, 279.
 Quṭaybah Ibn Muslim 72, 73, 74, 78.

- Quṭaybah Ibn Sa'īd, 254.
 Quṭb, 366n.
 Quṭb al-Dīn Ināl Ibn Ḥassān, 97n.
 Quṭb al-Dīn Mas'ūd al-Naysābūri, 175.
 Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd, 95, 218, 222.
 al-Qūṭīyyah, 348.
 Quṭrub, 289, 290.
 al-Quṭrubullī, 28n.
- R
- al-Rabī' Ibn Sulaymān al-Murādī, 137, 158.
 al-Rabī' Ibn Yūnus, 18, 19, 20.
Rabī' al-Abrār, 28, 31.
 Rabī'ah (tribe), 255.
 Rabī'ah Ibn 'Āmir, 131n.
 Rabī'ah Ibn Ḥārithah, 89.
 Rabī'ah Ibn Sa'd Ibn 'Ijl, 297.
 Rabī'ah Khātūn, 97, 104.
 Rabī'ah al-Rā'i, 107.
 Rabī'at al-Faras, 48.
 al-Raḍī, 83, 334, 337, 390, 394.
 Raḍī al-Dīn, 118, 234n.
 Raḍwāh (mountain), 144, 145.
 al-Raḥabah, 202, 218.
 Ra'īs al-Ru'asā, 309, 309n.
 Rāmāh, 68.
 Rāmhumuz, 130.
 Ramlah, 1.
 Ranbawayh, 159.
 Randaqah, 242.
 al-Raqqah, 97, 159, 313.
 al-Rashīd, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14, 16, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, 30, 159, 251, 278, 283, 327.
 Rawḍah, 291, 293.
 Ray, 63, 72, 159, 224, 226, 229, 255, 263, 330, 331.
 al-Rāzi, Fakhr al-Dīn, 175, 232, 245.
 Razīn, 114n.
 Ribāt, 79, 115, 116, 201, 218.
 Ribāt Furāwah, 266.
 Richard Coeur de Lion, 6.
 al-Riḍā, 377.
 Riḍā al-Dīn Muḥammad, 232, 234, 235.
Risālah, 174, 179n., 249.
al-Risālat al-Ḥātīmīyah, 339.
Risālāt al-Khamīs, 13.
Risālāt al-Mushkil, 318. al-Riyāhī, 35.
 al-Riyāshī, 300.
 Roderic, 403n.
 al-Roha, 97n.
 Roman, 323n.
 Ru'aynī, 57.
 Rūh Ibn Ḥātim, 395.
 Rukn al-Dawlah, al-Daylamī, 32, 36.
 Rukn al-Dīn al-'Amīdī, 234, 235, 235n., 236.
 Rukn al-Dīn al-Horā'īnī, 235n.
 Rukn al-Dīn Imām Zāda, 235, 235n.
 Rukn al-Dīn al-Ṭāwūsī, 233, 234n., 235.
 Rumayk Ibn Ḥajjāj, 404.
 al-Rumaykiyah, 404.
 al-Ruṣāfah, 105, 258, 329, 407, 408, 409.
 Ruṣāfi, 408.

al-Rushāṭī, 364.

Ruzayn, 114, 114n.

S

Şa'b, 353.

Sabeen, 356.

Sabeans, 410n.

Sābilah, 125.

Sacy, M. de, 46, 48, 49, 54, 59n., 63n., 79n., 80n., 81n., 85n.,
89n., 120n., 131n., 162n.,
174n., 187n., 191n.

Sa'd Ibn Abī Waqqās, 141.

Sa'd Ibn Ashras, 407.

Sa'd (tribe), 313.

Sa'd Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Şhaybānī al-As'ardī, 5, 6.

Sa'd al-'Ashīrah, 353.

Sa'd al-Ḥaṣīrī, 68, 68n.

Sa'd al-Dīn Mas'ūd, 97.

al-Sadid, 230n.

Sadid al-Dawlah, 117.

Sadid al-Mulk, 117n.

al-Sadid al-Salamāsi,
214, 215n., 230.

Şadr al-Islām, 46.

Şadriyah, 46, 47.

Sadūsi, 71.

Sadūs Ibn Şhaybān, 71.

al-Saffāh, 145, 159, 161, 162.

Şafi 'l-Dawlah, 414n.

al-Sāfir al-Kabīr, 273.

Şafīyyah, 154.

Şahāh, 71n., 72n., 144, 414.

Şāhib Ibn 'Abbād, 64, 124,
179, 281, 362, 378, 379, 382,
383, 417.

Şahāh, 55, 114n., 164, 183, 253, 257, 273, 315.

al-Şahīhān, 257.

Şahīhs, 255, 257, 261, 262,
265, 266.

Sahl, 22, 27.

Sahm Ibn Aslam, 326.

al-Sā'ib, 134, 288, 289.

al-Şa'id (upper Egypt), 119, 356.

Sa'id Ibn Abī Sa'id, 266.

Sa'id Ibn Fahlūm, 352.

Sa'id Ibn Jābir, 346.

Sa'id Ibn Ja'far al-Ju'fī, 165.

Sa'id Ibn Makhlād, 321, 321n.

Sa'id Ibn Muslim, 74, 75, 76.

Sa'id al-Sa'ādah, 199.

al-Sāji Abū Zakariyā, 252,
252n.

Şakhr, 92.

Sakhtiyān, 155n.

al-Sakhtiyānī, 155n.

Şaladini vita et res Jesta, 79n.

al-Salafī, 242.

Şalāh, 111, 212.

Şalāh al-Dīn, Sultān, 6, 78, 79,
80, 96, 97, 117, 121n., 204,
205, 217, 219, 231, 363, 369.

Salamah, 254n.

Salamah Ibn 'Aşim, 180.

Salamān, 229n.

Salamās, 215.

Salamī, 254n.

al-Salamī, 74.

al-Salāmī, the Ḥāfiẓ, 267, 268.

al-Salāmī, the Poet, 34, 380,
380n., 381, 382, 383, 384,
386.

- Salāmiyah, 254n.
 Sale, 63n., 119n., 123, 132n.,
 134n., 144n., 145n., 226n.,
 254n., 275n., 288.
 Sālīh Ibn 'Abd al-Quddūs, 16,
 242.
 Sālīh Ibn Mirdās, 415.
 Sallām, 39.
 Sālim Ibn Muḥammad, 38.
 Sālim Ibn Ziyād, 289.
 Saljūq, 50, 199, 264n.
 Saljūqid, 419n.
 Salm, 254n.
 Salma, 351.
 Salūl, 77.
 Sām, 111.
 Sāmāh Ibn Luwayy, 28.
 Sāmāh Ibn Luwayyi, Banu, 112.
 Samak, 279.
 al-Sam'ānī, Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr, 215.
 al-Sam'ānī Abū Sa'd, 46, 52,
 53, 60, 89, 106, 110, 159,
 170, 171, 172, 175, 184, 186,
 189, 193, 202, 236, 247, 248,
 250, 252, 255, 259, 262, 268,
 310, 329, 331, 358, 363, 372,
 378.
 Sāmānid, 257.
 Samarqand, 32, 37, 72, 165,
 234, 262.
 Sāmarra, 392.
 al-Sammāk, 278, 279.
 al-Sammān, 312, 313.
 Samūn Ibn Ḥamzah, 270,
 270n.
 Šan'ā, 247.
 San'ānī, 247.
 Santarein, Viscount de, 407n.
 Sāpūr, 251.
 Šaqalliyah (Sicily), 375.
 Sarakhs, 24, 26, 27, 30.
 Sarakhsi, 27.
 Saraquštah (Saragossa) 114n., 239, 404, 407.
 Saraquštī, 407.
 al-Sarāt, 310.
 Šarī' al-Ḡhawānī, 26.
 al-Sari al-Saqtī, 270n.
 Sarra man ra'a (Samarra), 148,
 244, 392.
 al-Sarrāj, Abū Bākr, 316.
 Sarūj, 43.
 Satan, 303, 385.
 Saṭih, 393n.
 Sawād, 312.
 Sawdah Ibn Abhar al-Darimī,
 81.
 Sayl al-Aram, 89.
 Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān,
 84, 340.
 Sayf al-Dawlah al-Mubārak,
 117, 119.
 Sayf al-Dīn Ḡhāzī Ibn 'Imād
 al-Dīn, 218.
 Sayf al-Islām Ibn Ayyūb, 370.
 Sayf al-Islām Tuḡhtikīn, 117.
 Sayl, 223, 224.
 al-Sayl al-Juhāf Ḥisl, 187.
 al-Saymarī, 248, 248n., 333.
 Šayrafi, 173.
 Sem, 37, 111.
 Seville, 3, 240, 270, 271, 272,
 345, 346, 350, 351, 352, 395,
 396n., 400n., 401, 409, 413n.
 Šhabbū'i, 191.

- Shabbūyah, 191.
 al-Sha'bi, 151, 155.
Shādbakht, Jamāl al-Dīn, 221n.
Shafā al-Sundur, 273.
Shāfi', 134.
 al-Shāfi'i, 41, 99, 105, 108, 109n., 111, 115, 128, 135n., 158, 159, 166, 167, 169, 170, 171, 172, 174n., 177, 178n., 179n., 184, 186, 188, 189, 190n., 196, 199, 204, 215, 216, 217, 226, 231, 235, 252, 257, 267, 269, 270, 372.
Shāfi'ite, 18, 127, 128, 166, 167, 170, 173, 174, 175, 177, 178, 179n., 180, 182, 185, 186, 187, 189, 190n., 191, 192n., 195, 197, 198, 199, 200, 202, 214, 216, 217, 218n., 224, 229, 230, 231, 233, 240, 266, 269n., 311, 368.
Shaghb, 150, 151.
 al-Shaghūri al-Mu'allim, 4, 6, 7.
Shāh, 185.
 al-Shāh, Ibn Mikāl, 298.
Shāh Manşūr, 388n.,
Shāhawayh, 185.
 al-Shahhām al-Baṣrī, 244.
Shahrastān, 250.
 al-Shahrastānī, Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, 25n., 71n., 249, 250, 251, 288n.
Shahrūzūr, 53, 96, 98,
 al-Shahrūzūrī Abū Aḥmad al-Qāsim, 51, 52, 53.
 al-Shahrūzūrī. Abū 'l-Faḍā'il Yahyā, 231.
 al-Shahrūzūrī, Kamāl al-Dīn, 52, 53, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 224, 231. al-Shahrūzūrī, Muḥl al-Dīn, 52, 219, 220, 221, 222, 224.
 al-Shāmīl, 195, 226
Shamir Ibn Ifriqish, 32.
Shamirkand, 32.
 al-Shammākh, 93.
Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh, 117.
Shams al-Dīn, al-Irbilī, 126.
Shams al-Dīn al-Khuwayyī, 235, 236.
Shams al-Ma'ālī Abū 'l-Ḥasan Qābūs al-Jilī, 64.
Shanbūdh, 276n.
Shaqiq al-Mulk, 240.
Sharaf al-Dawlah Muslim Ibn Quraysh, 419, 420n., Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn al-Mustawfī, 121, 123, 124, 125, 126.
Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn 'Unayn, 227.
Sharaf al-Dīn, al-Bawāzji, 124.
Sharaf al-Dīn, al-Qashūnī, 43.
Sharaf al-Dīn, al-Dimishqī, 230.
Sha'rānī, 'Abd al-Wahhāb, 270n.
 al-Sharāt, 161, 162.
Sharat al-Islām, 235n.
Shāri' al-Attābin, 281.
Sharīf, 214n., 220n., 392, 394.
Sharīf al-Murtaḍa, 395.
Sharīf al-Raḍī, 390.
Sharwān, 9.
Sharyah, 395.

- al-Shāsh, 175, 195.
al-Shāshi, 175.
al-Shāshi, Abū Bakr, 195, 196, 202, 240, 259. al-Shāshi, Abū Bakr, al-Qaffāl, 257. al-Shāshi, Abū Naṣr, 201.
Shāṭibah, 57.
al-Shāṭibi, 54, 56, 57.
Shaybah Ibn al-Walid, 296, 297.
Shaybān, 52, 158, 181n.
Shaybān Ibn Dhuhl, 70n.
Shaybān, Banū, 282.
Shayṭān al-Shām, 126.
Shayzar, 119.
Shi'b Bawwān, 34, 37, 63.
al-Shihāb.
Shihāb al-Dīn al-Ghūrī, 227.
Shihāb al-Dīn al-Talla'fari, 386n.
Shihāb al-Dīn Muḥammad, 198.
Shihāb al-Dīn Qarāṭā, 103.
Shihāb al-Dīn al-Ṭūṣī, 199.
Shihrah, 334, 335.
Shi'ite, 332.
Shi'ites, 148, 161.
Shilb (Silves), 403.
Shilbi, 403.
Shiqq, 393n.
Shiqqah al-Dārimī, 51.
Shirāz, 33, 87, 185, 383.
Shirāz Gate, 196.
al-Shirāzi, Abū Ishāq, 195, 201, 202, 259, 266.
Shu'bah Ibn al-Ḥajjāj, 252.
Shudhūr al-'Uqūd, 109.
Shuhdah Bint al-Ibarī, 365.
Shūnizi, 248, 270.
Shurayh, 155n.
Shūstar, 61n.
Sibawayh, 181, 185, 289, 315.
Sibt Ibn al-Jawzī, 365.
Sibt Ibn al-Ta'āwidi, 68.
al-Sibt al-Lakḥmī, 299.
Sicily, 119, 261, 373, 375.
Sidah, 348.
Ṣifat al-Khayl, 285.
Ṣifat al-Zar'i, 285.
Siḥūn, 175.
Sijistān, 32, 74.
al-Sijistāni, Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Uzayr, 286, 286n. al-Sijistāni, Abū Ḥatīm, 300.
al-Silafi 55, 114n., 137, 374.
Ṣilat, 241, 259n., 349n., 350n.
Silsilat al-Dhahab, 270.
Silves, 400, 403.
Simāk, 360.
Sind, 74, 282, 348, 363.
Sindawāni, 363.
Sindi, 363.
al-Sindiyyah, 361, 363.
Sinjar, 53, 96, 100, 199.
Siqf al-Zand by (Abu 'l-'Alā), 225.
Sirāf, 313.
al-Sirāfi 173, 315, 392.
Sirāj al-Hudā, 241.
Sirāj al-Mulk, 241.
Sirat al-Rasūl, 254.
Sirin, 154.
al-Sirr al-Maktūm (by al-Rāzi), 225.
Sirr al-Sanī'ah, 120.

- al-Sīs, 42.
 Şişşah, 334, 335, 336, 338.
al-Sitār Aghbar, 313.
Sitār al-Hā'iri, 313.
 al-Sitārān, 312, 313.
 Solomon, 228, 360n.
 Spain, 55, 57, 114n., 130, 230,
 239, 242, 250, 258, 260, 271,
 282, 285, 346, 347, 348, 350,
 351, 352, 364, 395, 396n.,
 400, 403, 404, 407, 408, 409,
 413.
 Spaniards, 3, 413.
 Spanish, 11, 258, 350, 400n., 403, 407.
 Su'ād, 370.
 al-Şubaḥ, 277n.
 Sūdah, 313.
 Sūdān, 348.
 Suddatayn, 402.
Şudūr Zamān il-Fuṣūr wa Futūr
Zamān il-Şudūr, 50.
 Şūfī, 174n., 279n., 280n., 368.
 Şūfīs, 193n., 214, 236, 266.
 Şūfism, 55, 235n., 266.
 Sufyān Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 136n.
 Sufān Ibn al-Abrād, 81.
 Sufyān Ibn al-Sā'ib al-Kalbī,
 289.
 Sufyān al-Thawrī, 107n., 149,
 151, 288, 289.
 Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah, 30,
 107n., 135, 136, 149, 252,
 329, 376.
 Şuḡd, 37.
 Suḡaym, 145n, 314.
 Sukkarah, 389.
 Sulamī, 254n.
 Sulaym, 174n., 254n.
 al-Sulaym al-Rāzī, 175.
 Sulaymā, 375, 377.
 Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik,
 73, 162.
 Sulaymān Ibn Qutulmish, 419n.
 al-Şūlī, Abū Bakr, 21, 129, 333, 334, 337, 338, 339.
 al-Şūlī, Ibrāhīm, 29, 338.
 al-Şu'lūkī 178, 179, 256.
Sulwān al-Mutā' fi-'Udwān al-
Atbā', 373.
 Sumaysāṭ, 98, 369.
 al-Sumaysāṭī, 201.
Sunan, 114n., 167.
 Sunnah, 134, 149, 170, 215.
 Sunnite, 103, 226, 229.
 Sūq al-Ahwāz, 129.
 Sūq al-'Arj, 331.
 Sūq al-'Iṭr, 277.
 Surayjiyan, 202.
 al-Suyūṭī's Ḥusn al-Muḥāḍa:ah,
 200n.
Syar al-Salaf, 38.
 Syria, 42, 51, 83, 88, 89, 104,
 117, 126, 128, 150, 158, 161,
 163, 173, 192, 219, 221, 240,
 255, 258, 262, 263, 269, 271,
 273, 282, 300n., 303, 330,
 348, 352, 367, 368, 371, 378,
 379, 380, 393, 408, 409, 414,
 419n., 420n.
 Syrian Sea, 364.

T

- Ta'abbata Sharran, 283n.
Ṭabaqāt, 176, 185n., 330.

- Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā*, 136n., 141,
 154n., 155n., 157n., 159, 165,
 171, 182, 189n., 252n., 269n.
Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā al-Furāwī,
 266n.
Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanafiyah, 31,
 234n., 235n.
Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz, 107n.,
 185n., 253n., 274n.
Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥukamā, 350n.
Ṭabaqāt al-Muḥaddithīn, 38,
 327n., 330n.,
Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā, 308n.
Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn, 18, 135n.,
 178n., 179n., 184n., 189n.,
 197n., 198n., 215n., 229,
 230n., 269n.
Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā, 90.
al-Ṭabarān, 194.
al-Ṭabarānī, 331.
al-Ṭabari, 17, 26, 29, 72n., 74,
 77n., 140n., 145, 154n., 161,
 162, 165, 166, 286, 326n.
Ṭabaristān, 64, 66, 67, 74, 81,
 165, 166, 224, 378.
al-Tabarkhazī, 378.
Ṭaberistanesis Annales, 140n., 154n.
Ṭābi'is, 38, 70, 148, 151, 154n.,
 155n., 207.
 Tableau general de l'Empire othoman, 47.
Tabūk, 367.
Tadhkirah, 359.
Tahqīq al-Muḥīṭ, 216.
al-Ṭaff, 92.
Tafsīr al-Amthāl.
Tahūfat al-Falāsafah, 192.
Tahdhīb, 215, 312.
Tahdhīb al-Dalā'il wa 'Uyūn
al-Masā'il (by al-Rāzī), 225.
Ṭāhir Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, 346.
Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn, 16, 21, 23, 24.
al-Ṭāhir Dhu 'l-Manāqib, 390.
Tahmān, 256n.
al-Tahmānī, 256, 256n.,
Tahṣīl al-Ḥaqq (by al-Rāzī),
 225, 228.
Ṭā'if, 144, 331.
Tāj al-Dīn 'Abd al-Rahmān,
 232.
Tāj al-Dīn Yahyā, 218.
Tāj al-Dīn Kindī, 374.
Tāj al-Millat, 33.
Tāj al-Ru'wasā, 410n.
al-Tājī, 33.
al-Ta'jiz fi Ikhtisār il-Wajiz, 232.
Takmilah, 33.
Ṭakrit, 419n.
Ṭalabīrah, 413.
Ṭālaqān, 29, 32.
Ṭālaqānī, 32.
Ṭalḥah Ibn Muḥammad 273.
Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 141.
Ta'lim al-Muta'allim, 235n.
Ta'liqah, 200, 231.
Talkhīṣ, 177.
Talkhīṣ al-Aqsām li-Madhlāhih,
al-Anām, 250.
al-Talla'farī, 382, 386.
al-Tahwīḥ wa 'l-Taṣrīḥ, 356.
Tamīm, 29, 73, 260, 285, 287,
 313, 353.

- al-Tamīmī Abū Muḥammad, 329, 330.
 al-Tamīmī, Abū 'Abd Allāh, 260.
 Tamīmītes, 73n.
Tanbih, 202.
Tanbih wa 'l-Ishraf, 187n.
al-Tanwīr, 102.
 Taqī al-Dīn, 97, 200.
al-Taqrīb 174, 175.
Tarājim al-Shuyūkh, 257.
 Ṭarasūs (Tarsus), 39; 42, 83, 88.
Tārīkh al-Islām, 40, 187n., 286n.
Tārīkh al-Qabā'il, 285.
Tārīkh al-Uḍabā, 187n.
Tārīkh 'Ulamā Naysābūr, 257. al-Tārīkhī, 349.
 Ṭāriq. 348n.
Ṭarīqah, 214, 241.
Ṭarīqah fi 'l-Khilāf, 234n.
 Tartar, 125.
 Tartars, 233, 236.
Taṣaffi' al-Adillah, 247.
Tatimmah al-Ibānah, 195.
 Tauris, 216, 290.
Tawājīh al-Tanbih, 202.
Tuwārīkh al-Khulafā, 186.
 al-Tāwūsī, 235.
 Ṭay (Jabali Ṭay), 160n.
 Taym, 224n.
 Taym Allāh, 25n.
 al-Taymī, 25, 25n.
 Taymā, 367.
 Taymāwī, 367.
 Taymiyah, 367.
 al-Tha'alībī, 36, 64, 114, 129, 378, 380, 386, 390.
 Tha'lab, 284, 285, 286, 291, 292, 294, 307, 309, 311, 333.
 Tha'labah Ibn al-Sind, 283n.
 Thāmūd, 142.
 Thaqīf, 254n.
 Thawbān, 407.
 Thawrā, 370.
 al-Thawrī, 151, 154n., 326.
 Theodomir, 403n.
Thousand and One Night, 273n., 366n.
 Thumālah, 291, 294.
 Thumālī, 291, 295.
 Thumāmah, 24, 25.
 Tibrīz, 216.
 al-Tibrīzī, 268.
 Tigris, 37, 116, 130n., 133n., 192, 254, 263, 329.
 Tihāmah, 354, 419.
 Tikrīt, 96.
 Tilimsen, 364.
 Tīmūr, 388n.
 Tirmidh, 170, 171, 254, 255.
 al-Tirmidhī (the Jurisconsult), 114n., 169, 171.
 al-Tirmidhī (the Traditionist), 164, 254, 262, 272.
 Torrent of Dike, 89.
 Tortosa, 239, 242.
 Tradition, 338.
 Traditions, 41, 55, 105, 114, 115, 127, 130, 133n., 134, 136, 149, 153n., 154, 156, 158, 162, 163, 164, 165, 167, 169, 170, 172, 173, 174, 176, 177, 179n., 183, 185, 186, 190, 196, 202, 214, 216, 217, 230, 234, 240, 246, 250, 252.

253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258,
261, 262, 263, 266, 267, 269,
270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 278,
280, 284n., 288, 307, 309,
317, 318, 319, 326, 330, 332,
346, 352n., 360, 365, 368,
370, 371, 372, 376.
Traditionists, 103, 105, 127n.,
135n., 136, 137, 148, 154n.,
163, 169, 234n., 252, 253,
263, 266, 267, 271, 346, 371.
Transoxiana, 32, 165, 171, 173,
174, 226, 257, 273, 286n.
Tudmir, 401, 403.
Ṭuḡhtikin, 117, 117n.
Tujīb, 407.
Tujibi, 407.
Ṭulayḡah, 326.
Tunis, 264.
Turayṡiṡh, 199.
Turkish, 73, 80, 104, 309n.,
373n.
Turkomān, 95, 119.
Turks, 10, 35, 72.
Ṭurṡūshah (Tortosa), 242.
al-Ṭurṡūshi, Abū Bakr, 239, 240, 241, 242, 271.
Ṭūs, 17, 20, 191, 192, 194, 199,
201, 215.
al-Ṭūsī, Ḥafadat, 215, 216.

U

Uballah, 37, 58, 63.
‘Ubayd, 288.
‘Ubayd Allāh, 50.
‘Ubayd Allāh Ibn ‘Abd Allāh
Ibn Ṭāhir, 316.

‘Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān,
19, 230.
‘Ubayd Allāh Ibn Yaḡyā, 324n.
Ubayyi Ibn Ka‘b, 154.
Ubbah (Oppas), 348.
‘Ūdanah, 184.
al-‘Ūdanī Ibn Warqa, 184, 185.
al-‘Udhāfur, 17.
‘Udhrah, 187.
al-‘Udhri, 395.
‘Ūdī, 184.
Uḡud, 150, 260n., 352.
‘Umān, 82, 89, 300, 304.
‘Umar, 37.
‘Umar, Ibn ‘Abd al-‘Azīz, 91,
93, 149, 348.
‘Umar, Ibn al-Ḳhaṡṡāb, 37n.,
143, 153n., 207, 209, 260n., 288.
‘Umar Ibn Mālik, 186.
‘Umar Ibn Sa‘īd, 75.
‘Umar Ibn Shabḡah, 156.
‘Umārah Ibn Ḥamzah, 10, 11,
12, 13.
Umayyad ‘Abd al-Raḡmān al-
Nāṡir, 396n.
Umayyad 89, 92n., 151, 161,
179n., 332, 348, 349, 351,
408.
Umayyads, 377n.
Umayyah, 376.
Umm al-Banīn, 91.
Umm al-Faḡl, 147.
Umm Ḥazrah, 150.
‘Uqayl Arabs, 419n.
al-‘Uqayr, 82n.
al-Urabah, 319.
Ursūf, 128.

'Urwah, 331.
 Usāmah Ibn Munqidh, 69.
 Usāmah Ibn Murshid, 117.
 Ushnān, 387n.
 al-Ushnāni al-Milḥi, 387, 387n.
 al-Ustād, 248.
 Ustuwā, 217.
 Uṣūl al-Khamsah, 248.
 al-'Uṭāridī, 331.
 'Utbah, 376, 377.
 al-'Utbi, 320, 376, 377.
 al-'Utbi (the poet), 320, 375, 376, 377.
 al-'Utbi, Wazir, 257.
 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, 18, 38, 71n., 144, 153n., 156, 204, 207, 209, 244, 275, 339.
 'Uwayj, 297.
 'Uyūn al-Ḥikmah, 25.
 'Uyūn al-Masā'il, 189n.
 'Uyūn al-Tawārikh, 153n., 157n.
 al-'Uzayrī, 286.

V

Valencia, 55, 403n., 405n., 408, 409.
 Venice, 192n.

W

Wabarah, 289.
 Wādi 'l-Sab'a, 327n.
 Wādīh, 350.
 Wahrān (Oran), 364.
 al-Wahrānī, 363, 364.
 Wā'il, 111n.
 al-Wajīh, 126, 127.

Wajīz, 174, 190, 192, 225, 230, 232, 233.
 Waki, 73.
 Wa lah. 242.
 al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 72, 91.
 al-Walid Ibn al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī, 380. al-Wāqī, 416n.
 Wāqid, 329.
 Waqidī, 329.
 al-Wāqidī, 107, 108, 110, 116, 196, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330.
 Waqqāṣ Ibn Ḥafṣ, 89.
 Wardān, Sūlāh, 64.
 Wardiyah, 128, 373.
 Warqah al-Nakha'i, 288.
 al-Warrāq, 330.
 al-Wa'sā, 391.
 Washmagir, 65n.
 Wāsiṭ, 45, 50, 51, 70, 126, 128, 130n., 158, 174, 184, 188, 190, 192, 198, 215, 216, 230, 372, 373.
 al-Wāsiṭī, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn, 228.
 al-Wāsiṭī Abu 'l-Fath, 50.
 al-Wāsiṭī Abu 'l-Ḥasān, 220.
 al-Wāthiq, 147.
 William the Bad, 373n.

X

Xativa, 56, 57, 405n.

Y

Yabrīn, 397.

- al-Yāfi'i, 164n., 240n., 253n., 266n., 274n.
 al-Yahūdiyah, 251.
 Yahya Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb, 265.
 Yahyā Ibn 'Alī, 396.
 Yahyā Ibn Bukayr, 169, 169n.
 Yahyā Ibn Hubayrah, 264n.
 Yahyā Ibn Khālīd Ibn Barmak, 7, 8, 9, 10, 12, 13, 14, 16, 19, 23, 243.
 Yahyā Ibn Ma'īn, 41, 135, 253.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'īd Abū Muḥammad, 164n.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'īd (qāḍī), 38, 107, 107n.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'īd al-Qaṭṭān, 253, 253n.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'īd Ibn Qays, 38n.
 Yahyā Ibn Salāmah, 56.
 Yahyā Ibn Zayd al-Farrā, 39.
 Yamāmah, 140, 310, 326.
 Yaman, 57, 89, 104, 111, 117, 136, 147, 285, 331, 332, 353.
 Yamanite, 395.
 al-Yanbu' 145, 374.
 Ya'qūb Ibn al-Layṭī, 24.
 Ya'qūb al-Kindī, 77.
 Yāqūt, 187n.
 Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī, 251, 409.
 Yāqūt Khawāja, 308.
 al-Yāqūtī, 313n.
 Yarmūk, 209.
 Ya'rub Ibn Qaḥṭān, 111.
 Yasār, 252.
 Yatimah, 36, 64, 129, 378, 380n., 383n., 386n., 390.
 Yazdajird (Yezdegird), 38, 338.
 Yazdizbah, 165.
 Yazid (river), 370, 395.
 Yazīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 93, 150, 150.
 Yazid Ibn Abī Muslim, 160.
 Yazīd Ibn Ḥātim al-Azdi, 395.
 Yazid Ibn Maṣṣūr, 315.
 Yazid Ibn Mu'āwiyah, 72, 72n., 90, 332.
 Yazīd Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah, 72, 91.
 Yazid Ibn Tharwān al-Qaysī, 296.
 al-Yazīdī Abū 'Abd Allāh, 313, 315.
 al-Yazīdī Yahyā, 296, 297, 314, 315.
 Yemen, 26.
 Yemenite, 265n.
 Yūnus, 215.
 Yūnus al-Ṣadafī, 176.
 Yuqṭān, 111.
 Yūsuf Ibn Bindār, 230, 230n.
 Yūsuf Ibn 'Adī, 169.
 Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifin, 192.
 Yūsuf Ibn Ya'qūb, 239, 294.

Z

- al-Zāb, 396.
 al-Zabadānī, 5, 7.
 Zabīd, 117.
 Zafar, 375.
 al-Za'farānī, 136.
 Zāfir al-Ḥaddad, 172.
 al-Zāhid, 281n., 282, 305.
 al-Zāhir, 317.

- al-Zāhir al-'Ubaydī, 186.
 al-Zāhiri 'Alī Ibn Ḥazm, 258.
 Zakī al-Dīn, 204, 214, 219.
 al-Zamaḥsharī, 28, 31, 92n., 114, 120, 142n., 225.
 Zamyā, 398.
 Zangebar, 136n.
 Zanjān, 63.
 al-Zanji, 136n.
 Zayn al-'Ābidīn 'Alī, 38, 145,
     390.
 Zayn al-Dīn 'Alī Ibn Baktikīn,
     67.
 Zayn al-Dīn, Kūchak, 95, 96,
     370.
 Zayn al-Dīn Bannā, 205.
 Zayn al-Dīn Yūsuf, 96, 98.
 Zayn al-Islām Abu 'l-Abbās
     Muḥammad, 44, 46.
 Zayniyah, 231.
 Zenj, 300.
 Zephyr, 197n.
Zīnat al-Dahr, 371.
 Zindarūd, 251.
 Zinj, 321.
 Zinkī, 95, 218.
 Ziyād, 272n., 282.
Ziyādāt, 265.
 Ziyār, 64.
 Zubayd, 352.
 Zubaydah, 7, 283n.
 al-Zubaydī Abū Bakr, 350, 351, 352.
 al-Zubayr, 285, 327, 327n.
Zuhdah (by al-Rāzī), 225.
 Zuhrah Ibn Kilāb Ibn Murrah,
     151.
 Zuhrah, 260.
 al-Zuhrah, 237.
 al-Zuhri, 105, 105n., 107, 148, 149, 150, 151, 252.
 Zūr, 53.
 Zur'ah, 127n.
 Zurla, 407n.
 al-Zūzinī, 44.

Ibn Khallikan's

WAFAYAT AL-A'YAN

WANBĀ' ABNA' AL-ZAMĀN

(A Biographic Dictionary)

Vol. 5

Eng. Translation
M. de Slane

Edited by
Dr. S. Moinul Haq

BASIC CONCEPTS OF THE QUR'AN

By MAULANA ABUL KALAM AZAD

Translated by DR. SYED ABDUL LATIF

Being a Resume of the views advanced by him in his Commentary of the Surat-ul-Fatiha, the opening chapter of the Qur'an

The volume sets out on a brief canvas the ideology of the Qur'an as estimated by the late Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and should serve as an illuminating Introduction to the Study of the Qur'an.

ISBN 81-7151-217-8 23x36/16 pp. 16+118 1996

Book Code No. B00075

Rs 60/-

AN ORIENTAL BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

T. W. BEALE

Dr. T. W. Beale's Oriental Biographical Dictionary, revised and enlarged by H.G. Keene, is still the most comprehensive work of its kind. It provides detailed biographical information on the main figures in the history of the East from the seventh century A.D. to the nineteenth century.

The Dictionary is an outstanding work of scholarship and has been widely acclaimed by Orientalists and historians all over the world. It is indispensable for scholars and students of the history of Muslim India, consisting as it does material gathered from Persian, Arabic, Urdu and European sources. The history of the Maratha and Rajput States and Kingdoms is also covered in full detail. Students of Muslim India's art, music and literature will find much of great interest and use in the volume.

More than 4500 entries are listed according to the English variant of each individual's name together with their Persian form in the parenthesis.

ISBN 81-7151-214-3 20x26/8 pp. 8+432 1996

Book Code No. O00018

Rs. 300/-

KITAB BHAVAN

1784, Kalan Mahal, Darya Ganj

New Delhi-110002 (India)

Phones : 3274686, 3277392-93

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Ibn Khallikan's
Wafayat al-A'yan

wa
Anbā' Abna' al-Zamān
(A Biographical Dictionary)

(M. de Slane's English Translation)

VOLUME V

Edited by:
S. MOINUL HAQ
M.A., Ph.D.

KITAB BHAVAN

New Delhi - 110002 (India)

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set

ISBN 81-7151-175-9 (Vol. V)

First Published in India      1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan

1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj

New Delhi-110002

Printed in India at:

Johar Offset Printers

Maujpur, Ghonda

Delhi-110053

CONTENTS

No.		PAGE
	NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION	viii
648	Al-Abiwardi, The Poet	1
649	Ibn Abi'l-Şaqr	6
650	Ibn al-Habbāriyah	8
651	Ibn al-Qaysarānī, The Poet	14
652	Ibn al-Kizānī	18
653	Al-Abilah, The Poet	19
654	Sibt Ibn al-Ta'āwidi	22
655	Ibn al-Mu'allim, The Poet	30
656	Muwaffaq al-Din al-Irbili	35
657	Ibn al-Dahhān al-Faraḍī	38
658	Ibn 'Unayn	40
659	Al-Qā'im al-'Ubaydi	45
660	Al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād	47
661	Al-Mu'tasim Ibn Şumādih	69
662	The Mahdi Ibn Tūmart	75
663	Al-Ikhshid	89
664	Ṭughrulbek al-Saljūqi	98
665	Alp Arsalān al-Saljūqi	104
666	Muḥammad Ibn Malik Şāh Saljūqi...	107
667	Al-Malik al-'Ādil, the brother of Şalāḥ al-Dīn....	110
668	Al-Malik al-Kāmil, the son of al-'Ādil	115
669	Ibn al-Zayyāt, The Wazir	126
670	Ibn al-'Amid, The Kātib	135
671	Ibn Muqlah	148
672	Ibn Baqiyah, The Wazir	155
673	Fakhr al-Mulk, The Wazir	162
674	Fakhr al-Dawlah Ibn Jahir, The Wazir	165
675	Al-Rūdhirāwari	174
676	Al-'Amid al-Kunduri	178
677	The Wazir Jamāl al-Dīn al-Jawād al-Işbahānī...	184

No.		PAGE
678	The Katib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī... ..	189
679	Abū Naṣr al-Fārābī ... ..	197
680	Abū Bakr al-Rāzī ( Rhases ) ... ..	203
681	Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn Shākir . ... ..	207
682	Muḥammad Ibn Jābir al-Battānī ( Albategnius )... ..	209
683	Abu'l-Wafā al-Būzjānī ... ..	213
684	Jār Allāh al-Zamak h sharī ... ..	214
685	Abū Ṭālib al-Qāḍī al-Iṣbahānī ... ..	222
686	Maḥmūd Ibn Subuktikīn ... ..	223
687	Maḥmūd, the Saljuqid ... ..	232
688	Al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn ... ..	234
689	Marwān Ibn Abi Ḥafṣah ... ..	239
690	Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj ... ..	245
691	Quṭb al-Dīn al-Naysābūrī ... ..	248
692	The Sharif Abū Ja'far Mas'ūd al-Bayāḍī ... ..	250
693	Mas'ūd al-Saljuqi ... ..	252
694	Mas'ūd Ibn Mawdūd ... ..	254
695	Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin al-Ṣan'ānī ... ..	261
696	Quṭb al-Dīn al-Marwazī ... ..	265
697	Muwaffaq al-Dīn Muẓaffar ... ..	266
698	Mu'adh Ibn Muslim al-Harrā ... ..	270
699	Al-Mu'āfā Ibn Zakariyā ... ..	275
700	Al-Mu'izz li-Dīn Allāh ... ..	278
701	Al-Mustaṣfir bi-Allāh ... ..	283
702	Ma'rūf al-Karkhī ... ..	286
703	Al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, the Ziride ... ..	288
704	Abū 'Ubaydah ... ..	291
705	Ma'an, the son of Zā'idah ... ..	302
706	Muqātil, the commentator of the Qur'ān ... ..	314
707	Abu'l-Hayjā Shibl al-Dawlah ... ..	318
708	Ḥusām al-D <sup>aw</sup> lah-al Muqallad ... ..	322
709	Muk h liṣ al-Dawlah Muqallad ... ..	334
710	Makki, the teacher of the Qur'ān readings ... ..	340
711	Makki al-Ḍarir ... ..	346
712	Makḥul al- Shāmi ... ..	349
713	Malik Shāh , the son of Alp Arslān... ..	352

No.		PAGE
714	Manşūr al-Tamīmī the Jurisconsult ...	359
715	Al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh ...	363
716	Al-‘Āmir bi-Aḥkām Allāh ...	369
717	Qutb al-Dīn Mawdūd ...	373
718	Muwarrij al-Sadūsī ...	374
719	Mūsā al-Kāzīm ...	379
720	Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn Man‘ah ...	383
721	Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr ...	392
722	Al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf Muẓaffar al-Dīn... ..	406
723	Mūsā Ibn ‘Abd al-Malik ...	413
724	Ibn al-Jawālīqī ...	420
725	Al-Muwayyad al-Ṭūsi ...	424
726	Al-Muwayyad al-Ulūsī ...	425
727	Al- Muhallab Ibn Abī Şufrah ...	430
728	Mihyār al-Daylamī ...	442
INDEX	...	449

NOTE ON transliteration

ا = a	ط = t
ب = b	ظ = z
ت = t	ع = 'e'
ث = th	غ = gh
ج = j	ف = f
ح = h	ق = q
خ = kh	ك = k
د = d	ل = l
ذ = dh	م = m
ر = r	ن = n
ز = z	و = w
س = s	ه = h
ش = sh	ة = aw
ص = s	ي = y
ض = d	ى = ay

Long vowels : ā. ī. ū

Short vowels : a. i. u

IBN KHALLIKAN'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

648 AL-ABIWARDĪ THE POET

Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Ishāq Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās al-imām Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Fityān Ishāq Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Abi* Marfū'ah† Manṣūr Ibn Mu'āwiyah al-Aṣḡhar<sup>1</sup> Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-'Abbās 'Uṭhmān Ibn 'Anbasah al-Aṣḡhar Ibn 'Utbah,‡ Ibn al-Aṣḥraf Ibn 'Uṭhmān Ibn 'Anbasah<sup>2</sup> Ibn Abi Sufyān Ibn Ṣakhr Ibn Ḥarb Ibn Umayyah Ibn 'Abd Ṣhams Ibn 'Abd Manāf, a member of the Umayyad family and of the tribe of Quraysh, a descendant of Mu'āwiyah [the less (al-Mu'āwī)] was a native of Abiward (al-Abiwardī), a poet of great celebrity, distinguished scholar, a transmitter of traditional information and a genealogist. The collected works of this elegant poet are classed under various heads, such as the 'Irāqiyāt (pieces relative to Irāq), the Najdiyyāt (pieces relative to Najd, pastoral pieces), the Wajdiyyāt (amatory pieces), etc. His learning as a genealogist was very extensive, and his authority is cited by the most exact and the most trustworthy ḥāfiẓes. The ḥāfiẓ Abū Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Ṭāhir al-Maqdisī quotes his words more than once in his Ansāb (No. 503). In that work, he says of him,

---

1 From this genealogy we learn that there were two Mu'āwiyahs in the Umayyad family: one of them was styled al-Aṣḡhar (the less), to distinguish him from the ḫalīf of the same name. It has been already observed, No. 465, that there were also two Umayyads in the same family.

2 This 'Anbasah must have been brother to the ḫalīf Mu'āwiyah.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid omits this word—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid inserts Ibn between Marfū'ah and Manṣūr—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives عنبسه 'Anbasah—Ed.

under the article al-Mu'āwī : "He was the paragon of the age in various sciences, and we have quoted, in different parts of this book, a number of observations made by him. He wrote himself down as a descendant of Mu'āwiyah and this verse of Abu 'l-'Ala al-Ma'arri might be applied to him with the utmost propriety :

" Though I came the last in time, I am able to produce what the ancients could not furnish. "

Before this line Al-Maqqisī had just mentioned some verses in which the poet vaunts his own renown, but these it is not necessary to insert. Abū Zakariyā Ibn Mandah<sup>1</sup> mentions him in the history of Iṣbahān and says : "He was an honour to the ra'ises, the most excellent of the empire<sup>2</sup>, orthodox in his belief, exemplary in his conduct, and versed in a number of sciences ; well acquainted with the genealogies of the Arabs, elegant in his language, skilled in the composition of books, filled with intelligence, perfect in talents, the pearl of the epoch, the paragon of the age, but elated with vanity, pride, and arrogance : when he prayed, he used to say : 'Almighty God ! make me king over the eastern countries of the earth and western thereof.' " The ḥāfiẓ Ibn al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) takes notice of him in the Ansāb, under the word al-Mu'āwī, and mentions him also in the Dhayl (supplement) ; he says ; "(Al-Abīwardī) was surnamed after Mu'āwiyah al-Aṣghar (the less)" the same whose name is given in the genealogical list (at the head of this notice). "He once addressed a memorial to the Commander of the faithful, al-Mustazhir bi-Allāh, and headed it with these words : al-Khādīm al-Mu'āwī (your humble servant, the descendant of Mu'āwiyah). The khālif, who disliked the use of a patronymic which indicated that the bearer of it drew his descent from Umayyah, scratched out the m of al-Mu'āwī and sent back the memorial with the superscription changed into al-Khādīm al-'Āwī (your humble servant)

1 The life of Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn Mandah will be found in this work.

2 This writer means to say that al-Abīwardī was one of the most distinguished amongst the persons employed in the civil service, (ruwasa, plural of ra'is) and that he bore the title of Afdal al-Dawlah (the most excellent of the empire).

the howler)." As specimens of the beauties with which his poetry abounds, we may indicate the following passages :

"We ruled over the kingdoms of the earth, and to us their grantees submitted, some willingly, some through constraint.<sup>1</sup> But, when the days of our prosperity attained their height, adversity seized us and seldom relaxed its hold. In our days of joy, (these kingdoms) smiled with pleasure at our happiness, in our days of sorrow, they wept with sympathy. We met our misfortunes with faces of ingenuous dignity, radiant with honour<sup>2</sup>, and, when we thought of disclosing the wrongs which fortune made us suffer, our modesty withheld us.

*[ Fortune knew not my worth and was not aware that I was proud of soul and I despised the strokes of adversity ; whilst it showed me how calamities could assault (their victim), I let her see what patience was.]

*[ That maiden with the slender waist ! I hearken not to him who blames me for loving her, and, when he depreciates, her, I only love her the more. When she appears, I turn one eye towards her, and, with the other, I watch her jealous guardian. The delator is thus deceived, and knows not that my eye has got its full share of (the sight of the fair) Sulaymā." ]

He composed the following lines on Abu 'l-Najib 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār al-Marāghī, a person who, by his talents, was one of the most eminent men of the time. This Abu 'l-Najīb resided in the fortress of Ḥirah<sup>3</sup> and often employed, in his poetical compositions, the figure called luẓūm ma la yalzum (the submitting to unnecessary obligations<sup>4</sup>) :

1 In these verses he speaks as a member of the Umayyad family.

2 Radiant with honour ; literally ; the water of which (faces) had nearly fallen in drops. See the meaning of the expression water of the face explained in No. 49. The same line offers another example of the various significations which the expression رقيق الحواشي can assume ; it is here rendered by ingenuous dignity.

3 The name of this place is written variously in the MSS. They give the following reading بحيره خير حسره and نجيره. It is perhaps the Ḥirah of Naysābūr ; see No. 584.

4 See No. 46, note.

* [The words : "From his verses " are omitted by de Slane]

"The verses of al-Marāghī, may God preserve you from them ! are like his mind, the best parts of them are bad. In composing, he submits to unnecessary obligations but he neglects those which are necessary."

It was al-Abīwardī who composed the following piece :

"O beloved Umaymah ! if thou refusest me thy visits, grant that thy image come at night and visit me in my dreams. By Allāh ! neither calumny<sup>1</sup> nor absence can efface from the soul of thy adorer the impress of thy love."

I may here observe that Sibṭ Ibn al-Ṭa'āwidi, a poet of whom notice shall be taken in this work, borrowed from the first of these verses the thought which he has thus expressed in one of his qaṣīdahs :

"If thou refusest, when awake, to grant me a salutation, order thy image to fleet by me and salute me in my slumbers. Promise to visit me in my dreams : then, perhaps my eyes may yield to sleep, in the hope of seeing thee."

In one of his Najdiyyāts he says :

"We halted at Nu'man al-Arāk<sup>2</sup>; the dew-drops moistened our garments, and I passed the night suffering the pains of love whilst my fellow-travellers were sunk in sleep ; the fatigues of the night-journey and of the desert had overcome us all. I thought of that charming maiden now so far away ; and my flowing tears answered to the summons of love. Her abode is still in the recesses of that valley ; my heart knows it, though my eyes perceive it not ; I stopped near that dwelling, and my tears were mostly blood ; my eyelids seemed to flow with blood (nu'mān) instead of my nose<sup>3</sup>"

---

1 Literally ; calumniators.

2 Nu'mān al-Arāk is the name of a valley or glen between Makkah and al-Ṭā'if.

3 This idea, so burlesque in the translation, does not present the same ludicrous image in the original text ; the quibble on the word bi-nu'mān (which signifies also at the place called Nu'mān) diverting the attention of the reader from its absurdity.

A novel thought of his is that contained in a piece of verse descriptive of wine ; he says :

"Joy is its essence, and therefore the bubbles dance (upon its surface)."

In one of his qaṣīdahs he says :

"The age is corrupt, and all whom I chose for friends were either hypocrites who hoped for favours or flatterers who feared to offend. When I put them to the test, I found in them a sullen heart and a smiling countenance."

This thought he took from a qaṣīdah of Abū Tammām's (No. 143), in which that poet elegantly says :

"If you wish to conceive the worst opinion of mankind, examine that multitude of human beings ; he is not a friend who offers thee a smiling countenance and conceals a sullen heart."

These digressions have led us away from our subject. Al-Abīwardī composed a great number of works, such as a History of Abīward and Nasā, a mukhtaliṣ and mu'taliṣ (dictionary of synonyms and homonyms), a ṭabaqāt, or synoptical view, of all the sciences, a treatise on the synonyms and homonyms occurring in the genealogies of the Arabs, and various philological works drawn up on an original plan. His life was virtuous and his conduct exemplary. He died of poison at Iṣbahān on the afternoon of Thursday, the 20th of the first Rābī', A.H. 507 (4th September A.C. 1113), and the funeral prayer was said over him in the Jāmi' al-'Atīq (the old mosque) of that city. Abīwardī means native of Abīward, called also Abāward and Bāward, a village in Khurāsān which has produced many learned and eminent men. Al-Sam'ānī says, in his Ansāb, under the word Al-Kūfānī.* "This relative adjective signifies belonging to Kūfah, a small village of Khurāsān, at six parasangs from Abīward. It was built by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir (No. 318) and has produced a number of Traditionists and other eminent men, one of whom was the philologist Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Kūfānī, better known by the appellation of al-Abīwardī the philologist."

---

* 'Abd al-Hamid gives al-Kūqanī—Ed.

649 IBN ABI 'L-ŞAQR

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Umar, surnamed Ibn Abi 'l-Şaqr, was a native of Wāsiṭ and a doctor of Shāfi'ite sect. He studied jurisprudence under the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) but, yielding to his predominant passion for the cultivation of literature and poetry, he became principally known as an amateur of the belles-lettres. I saw at Damascus, in the Ashrafiyah library, the diwān of his poetical works which collection is preseved in the turbah (or mausoleum) erected over the tomb of al-Malik al-Ashraf. It is situated to the north of the (edifice erected as an) addition of the Great Mosque (al-Jāmi' al-Kabir) and called al-Kallāsah. This diwān forms one volume. The author was extremely partial to the Shāfi'ite sect, and manifested this sentiment in a number of qaṣīdahs generally known by the title of al-Shāfi'iyah (the Shāfi' iyan); he composed also some elegies on the death of the shaykh Abū Ishāq. In the elegant precision of his style, the beauty of his penmanship, and the excellence of his poetry, he displayed talents of the very highest order. Abu 'l-Ma'ālī 'l-Ḥazīrī (No. 242) mentions him in the Zinat al-Dahr and quotes the following piece of his amongst others :

"Every favour which you may expect from men always encounters some obstacle ; and I shall say, may God pardon me (for doing so) ! but my words are figurative, not serious : I approve of nothing in the conduct of Satan, except his refusing to worship a created being<sup>1</sup>."

He gives also these verses which are still currently known :

'By the sacredness of love ! no person can replace you (in my heart) ; never, shall I turn my affections towards any other object ! I long for your presence, and your image is sent to (visit my slumbers and thus) effect our meeting ; but, alas ! I cannot close my eyes. I proposed to my companions this condition—that you, not they should have my heart, and they agreed (to it). I spoke of you so often, that they said : 'He is unwell ;' and I replied : 'May that malady never leave me ! ' "

1 "And (remember) when we said unto the angels : Worship Adam ; and they all worshipped him, except Satan (Iblis), who said : Shall I worship him whom Thou hast created of clay ?"—Qur'ān, surāh 17, v. 63).

Having attained an advanced age and being obliged to sustain his feeble steps with a staff, he said :

"In every thing which you examine, you will perceive something extraordinary ; when strong, I went on two legs, but now, being weak, I go on three."

To the idea expressed in the last verse, I have myself alluded in the following lines :

"O thou who askest how I am ; receive this summary answer : After possessing strength enough to split a rock, I now walk on three legs, and the best of them is the staff."

To excuse himself for not rising to receive his friends, he composed these verses :

"An indisposition called eighty years hinders me from rising to receive my friends ; but when they reach an advanced age, they will understand and accept my excuse."

The following piece also was written by him on his great age :

"When I approached towards the unities of ninety, an age which none of my fathers ever reached, I knew full well that I should soon have other neighbours and another home (the dead and the tomb) ; so I turned towards God, repenting of my past life ; God will never cast into the fire him who turns towards Him."

Having gone to pay a visit of consolation to a family which were mourning the death of a little child, the persons present nodded to each other, as if to say : "How strange that a man trembling with old age should survive, whilst this child could not escape death !" Perceiving their thoughts, he pronounced these lines :

'An aged shaykh entered where the youths were met to mourn the death of a little child, and you saw an objection against God's justice, because the infant died and the old man lived. But you may say to him who has lived one month and to him who has lived one thousand or an intermediate number : We must all come to this !'

The following piece is by him :

"Meditatus est Ibn Abi 'l-Ṣaqr dixitque, aetate jam provecta :
'Per Deum, nisi me lotium quotidie mane exureret, oblitus essem mihi mentulam inter efmora esse'. "*

His poems abound in fine passages. He was born on the eve of Monday, the 13th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A.H. 409 (23rd March, A.C. 1019), and he died at Wāsiṭ on Thursday, the 14th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 498 (1st February, A.C. 1105).

650 IBN AL-HABBĀRIYAH.

The sharīf Abū Ya'lā Muḥammad † Ibn Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ḥamzah Ibn Muḥammad ‡ Ibn 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammadh Ibn Dāwūd Ibn 'Isā Ibn Mūsā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās al-Hāshimī (a member of the Hāshim family) al-'Abbāsī [descended from Ibn 'Abbās (No. 43, note)], generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Habbāriyah and surnamed Nizām al-Dīn (the maintainer of religion), was a native of Baghdād and a poet of great talent and celebrity. Though animated with the best intentions, he had an evil tongue and so strong an inclination for satire that he hardly spared a single person. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him in the Kharīdah and says : (He was one) of Nizām al-Mulk's (No. 171) poets, and his predominant styles of composition were the satirical, the humorous, and the obscene. Cast (as it were) in the same mould as, Ibn Ḥajjāj (No. 186), he trod in the same path and surpassed him in licentiousness, but those pieces of his in which decency is respected are highly beautiful<sup>1</sup>". Attached to the service of

1 The extracts which 'Imād al-Dīn gives of his poetry justify, to a certain degree, this eulogium.

* Verily Ibn Abi 'l-Ṣaqr meditated and said in his old age; By Allāh ! had there not been urine burning me at the time of morning, I would not have known that I have an organ between my thighs.

† The Egyptian edition inserts [Ibn Muḥammad].—Ed.

‡ The Egyptian edition omits this name.—Ed.

Nizām al-Mulk Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ishāq, the wazīr of the sultān Alp Arslān and of Malik Shāh, that prince's son, he was treated by him with the utmost kindness and unceasing beneficence. A spirit of hatred and jealousy having sprung up between Nizām al-Mulk and Tāj al-Mulk Abu 'l-Ghanā'im Ibn Dārist<sup>1</sup>, a thing which frequently happens with men high in office, the latter told Ibn al-Habbāriyah to compose a satire on Nizām al-Mulk, promising the poet his favour and an ample recompense in case he consented. "But how," said Ibn al-Habbāriyah "can I attack a man to whose kindness I am indebted for every object I see in my house?" "I insist on your compliance," said Tāj al-Mulk; and the poet composed the following piece:

"Wonder not that Ibn Ishāq rules and that fate assists him; (wonder not that) prosperity flows pure for him and turbid for Abu 'l-Ghanā'im. Fortune is like the wheel for raising water, it cannot be turned but by oxen."

When these verses were communicated to Nizām al-Mulk, who was a native of Tūs, merely observed that they contained an allusion to a common proverb: The people of Tūs are oxen<sup>2</sup>, and not only abstained from punishing the poet, but overlooked his conduct and treated him with greater kindness than ever<sup>3</sup>. This is cited as an instance of Nizām al-Mulk's noble conduct and of his extreme indulgence. Notwithstanding the extraordinary degree of favour shown to him by this wazīr, Ibn al-Habbāriyah had much to suffer from the malice of his patron's pages and followers,

1 Tāj al-Mulk Abu 'l-Ghanā'im al-Qummi was secretary and privy counsellor to Turkān Khātūn, the wife of Malik Shāh and mother of the sultān Mahmud. He succeeded to the wazīrate on the death of Nizām al-Mulk. In Mir~~k~~hond's History of the Saljuqids (ed. Vullers, Giessen 1838) will be found an account of Nizām al-Mulk's fall and of the enmity which prevailed between him and Turkān Khātūn (princess of the Turks), the daughter of the khān of Turkistān. (See also Abu 'l-Feda's Annals year 485, and No. 171 of this work.)

2 In English it would be said: are asses.

3 Imād al-Dīn says, in his Kharīdah, that, on this occasion, Nizām al-Mulk clothed the poet in a robe of honour and bestowed on him five hundred pieces of gold.

(who detested him) from what they knew of his evil tongue. Their petulance became at length so excessive that he wrote the following lines to Nizām al-Mulk<sup>1</sup>:

"Take refuge with Nizām al-Ḥaḍratayn al-Riḍā when people of this age detest thee. Let his aspect cleanse thy eyes from the dust which makes them smart when worthless people overcome thee. Bear with the wild humours of his pages; every rose must have its thorn".

Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī says, in the Kharīdah, that the poet sent his son with these verses to the Naqīb al-Nuqabā 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād al-Zaynabī, surnamed Nizām al-Ḥaḍratayn Abu 'l-Ḥasan<sup>2</sup>.

1 It appears, by what follows that it was not of the pages of Nizām al-Mulk that the poet had to complain, but of those in the service of Nizām al-Ḥaḍratayn, a person noticed lower down.

2 The title of Sharīf was given not only to the descendants of 'Alī by Fāṭimah, the daughter of Muḥammad, and by al-Ḥanafīyah, but to the descendants of Hāshim. Muḥammad's great-grandfather. The sharīfs of each province were placed under the control of a naqīb (ruler or magistrate), chosen by the Government from among their own body. The Naqīb al-Nuqabā or chief naqīb, resided at Baḡhdād. 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād was appointed to this office A.H. 491 (A.C. 1097-8), on the death of his father. They drew their descent from Zaynab, the daughter of Sulaymān Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbas No. 110 note) for which reason they bore the surname of al-Zaynabī. It appears from the verses given by Ibn Khalikān and the observation made by Imād al-Dīn, that 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād bore the surname of al-Riḍā and Nizām al-Ḥaḍratayn. Sibṭ Ibn al Jawzī informs us, in his Mir'āt al-Zamān, that Ṭirād, the father of 'Alī, was surnamed Dhu 'l-Sharafayn (possessor of the double nobility) Shihāb al-Ḥaḍratayn (flambeau of the two courts), which latter title may have been given him on account of his diplomatic services when employed by the court of the khalīf as its agent at the court of the Saljūq sultān. This conjecture receives some degree of probability from the statement of the author of the Mir'āt, that Ṭirād was frequently sent by the khalīf as ambassador to different sovereigns, and that he distinguished himself by his talents and probity. The title of Nizām al-Ḥaḍratayn (bond of union between the two courts) seems to have been given to his son for a similar reason. That of al-Riḍā, by which 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād is designated in the verses mentioned by Ibn Khalikān, was borne by a number of sharīfs, and is the equivalent of Riḍā al-Dīn (accepted for piety). From the Kharīdah (MS. 1447, fol. 12, 15, 29), it would appear that 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād held at one time the post of wazīr, as we

(Continued on page 11)

By the same :

"My countenance is too modest for asking favours, and my means are yet more modest. My real merits are but slight, and the emoluments they gain me are yet slighter."

An original idea of his is that of a piece in which he refutes those who pretend that a man can obtain the satisfaction of his wants by travelling abroad ; he says :

"They said : 'You remain at home and cannot procure a livelihood yet the man of prudence can always gain wealth by travelling.' I replied : 'It is not every journey which prospers ; profit results from good fortune, not from the fatigues of travel. How often has one journey been productive, whilst another, under the same circumstances, has been injurious ; thus the covetous man some times gains and some times loses. It is thus that the moon, in journeying, reaches to her full, and that, deprived of her prosperity, she wanes away.' "

---

(Continued from page 10)

find there some poems addressed to him in that quality by the poets Ḥayṣ Bayṣ (No. 241) and Abū 'Alī 'l-Faraj Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Uḫwah al-Muwadd'ib. In the same work, fol. 35, under the article Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Bāri In al-Dabbās, a grammarian whose life is given by Ibn Ḳhallikān, (No. 190) we find a long extract from a poem addressed by al-Bāri 'to Sharaf al-Din 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād.

After this note was written, I found a notice on 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād in the Duwal al-Islāmiyah. MS. No. 895. fol. 280. It is there stated that Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād al-'Abbāsī was the first person to whom the Ḳhalif al-Muqtafī (li amr Allāh) confided the post of wazīr. After some time, a coolness took place between them, and Ibn Ṭirād fled for protection to the court of the sultān (Mas'ūd the Saljuqid). By distributing the greater part of his fortune in presents to the sultān's wives and principal officers, he succeeded in obtaining Mas'ūd's mediation in his favour, and the Ḳhalif allowed him to return to Baḡhdād. During the rest of his life, he remained unemployed, and being reduced to the utmost poverty, he died, recommending his children to the Ḳhalif's benevolence. Al-Muqtafī fulfilled his desire and raised them to wealth. Ibn Ṭirād spent large sums in presents to the officers of the state, the men of learning, the strangers who arrived at Baḡhdād, and the sharifs descended from 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib. The text of the Duwal al-Islāmiyah has been published at Gotha, A.C. 1860, under the title of Elfachri by Mr. Ahlwardt.

By the same :

"Leave off the details of your misery and sum them up (in these words) : There is not in the world a man (worthy of the name). When the pawn on the chess-board becomes a queen, it seems just that the queen should become a pawn<sup>1</sup>."

As a specimen of his humorous poetry, we may give the following passages :

"When Abū Sa'īd perceived that, for a whole year, I abstained from wine, he said : 'Tell me who was the shaykh by whom you were converted ;' and I replied : 'That shaykh was poverty.'

I dreamt that my wife held me by the ear, and that she wielded in her hand an object of leather, crooked in shape, black in colour, but marked with spots, and shaped, beneath, like a foot<sup>2</sup>. I awoke with the fright, and the nape of my neck was already quite red ; had my dream lasted, I, a learned shaykh, should have lost my eyes."

By the same :

"The Tājiyan court<sup>3</sup> is a garden ; may its beauty last for ever ! In that garden, an humble (poet) is the ring-dove ; its cooings are eulogies, and its collar rewards."

By the same :

"Let her do as she pleases ; it is indifferent to me whether she shun (me) or accept (me). How often have we seen darker locks than her's turn grey<sup>4</sup>."

1 The application of this last verse is by no means manifest. In the Kharīdah and one of the MSS. of Ibn Khallikān, it is placed before the other.

2 He dreamt that his wife was striking him on the nape of the neck with an embroidered slipper ; a mode of correction employed, it is said by Muslim ladies in their female servants and some times on their husbands.

3 He means the court of Tāj al-Mulk Abu 'l-Ghanā'im.

4 In the original piece, of which a translation slightly disguised is here given, the affix in نيلها might embarrass the Arabic scholar. It must be referred to the word لحيه understood. I may also observe that اسود as a comparative form, is not good Arabic ; it should be اشد سواداً.

Ibn al-Habbāriyah's poetry abounds in beauties; he turned Kallilāh wa Dimnah into verse and gave it under the title of Natā'ij al-Fiṣnah (offspring of the intellect). In the life of al-Bāri' al-Dab-bās (No. 190), we have mentioned a piece of Ibn al-Habbāriyah's rhyming in d, with al-Bāri''s answer and an account of what passed between them; in our article on the wazīr Fakhr al-Dawlah Muḥammad Ibn Jahīr we shall mention an amusing adventure of the poet al-Sābiq al-Ma'arri<sup>1</sup> with Ibn al-Habbāriyah. His poetical works are very numerous and their dīwān (collection) forms from three to four volumes. One of his most original pieces of versification is a work in the style of Kalilah wa Dimnah and entitled al-Ṣādiḥ wa 'l-Bāghim (the loud speaker and the murmurer). The composition of this book, which contains two thousand verses in the rajaz measure, occupied the author ten years. It is an excellent production<sup>2</sup>. He sent his son with it to the amīr Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ṣadaqah Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Dubays al-Asadī, lord of al-Ḥillaḥ (No. 276). It concludes with the following lines:

"Here is a fine book which astounds the intelligence; on it I spent ten years, from the time I first heard thy name. I composed

---

1 Of this poet, who was a native of Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, as his surname implies, 'Imād al-Dīn says, in his Kharidah (MS. No. 1414, fol. 144), that Abu 'l-Yumn Sābiq Ibn Abī Mahzūl went to 'Irāq during the administration of (the wazīr) Ibn Jahīr and there met Ibn al-Habbāriyah. He then gives some short extracts from his poetry without furnishing any further information respecting him.

2 There are several copies of this work in the Bibliothèque imperiale, ancien fonds, and Supplement. Like Kalilah and Dimnah, it consists of apologues, fables, and moral maxims. In d'Herbelot's Bibliothèque orientale, under the word Hareba, will be found a passage in which that orientalist gives a description of the al-Ṣādiḥ wa 'l-Bāghim, from which may be perceived that he knew nothing of it except the title, and even that imperfectly. Hārebah is also a false reading of the Arabic هباريه Harbāriyah. He read it as if it had been written هاربه. In noticing this article of d'Herbelot's I by no means wish to cast an imputation on his talent or deny the services he rendered to oriental literature; the Bibliothèque Orientale is a very useful book, yet truth obliges me to state that not one of the indications given in it merits entire confidence unless it can be verified from other sources. A part of these errors he would probably have corrected, had he lived to superintend the printing of his work.

it for thy sake ; the number of its verses is two thousand, all of them replete with meaning. Were any poet, versifier, or prose-writer to pass a life as long as that of Noah's in composing a single verse like those contained in it, he would not be able to accomplish the task, for it is not every one who can make verses. I send it with my son, or rather with my heart's blood and liver ; for in my opinion, thou art worthy of every favour. Confiding in thy kindness, he hastens towards thee, encountering great fatigues and a long journey. Had I been permitted, I should have gone myself with speed and delayed not, for honour and glory are exclusively thy heritage. "

Şadaqah granted him an ample recompense in return for his work. According to 'Imād al-Dīn al-Isbahānī, in his Kh̲arīdah, Ibn al-Habbāriyah died at Kirmān, A. H. 504 (A.C. 1110-1), where he had passed the latter days of his life after having resided for a time at Işbahān. Al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) says that he died subsequently to the year 490. Habbāriyah means a female descended from Habbār ; this Habbār was Ibn al-Habbāriyah's grandfather by the mother's side. Kirmān, pronounced sometimes Karmān, is a large province (wilāyah) containing a number of cities and towns. It has produced many eminent men. One side of it is bounded by the sea and the other by Kh̲urāsān.

651 IBN AL-QAYSARĀNĪ THE POET

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Naşr Ibn Şaghīr Ibn Dāghīr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Kh̲h̲ālīd Ibn Naşr Ibn Dāghīr Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Muhājir Ibn Kh̲h̲ālīd Ibn al-Walīd al-Makhzūmī al-Kh̲h̲ālīdī al-Ḥalabī (descended from Kh̲h̲ālīd of the family of Makhzūm and native of Aleppo), surnamed Şharaf al-Ma'ālī (glory of high deeds) 'Uddat al-Dīn (maintenance of religion), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Qaysarānī, was not only a poet of great talent and celebrity, but a philologist of the soundest learning. His genealogy, as here given, was dictated to me by one of his descendants. In the belles-lettres he had for masters Tawfīq Ibn Muḥammad and

Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Khayyāt, the poet whose life we have already given (No. 59). He displayed great acquirements in philology and astronomy. At Aleppo, he studied under the khaṭīb Abū Ṭāhir Hāshim Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥalabī and other masters. He himself gave lessons to the ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416) and the ḥāfiẓ Abū Sa'd Ibn al-Sam'āni (No. 370), both of whom mention him in their respective works. Abu 'l-Ma'ālī 'l-Ḥazīrī (No. 242), who also received lessons from him, speaks of him in his work, the Mulaḥ. Ibn al-Qaysarānī and Ibn Munīr (No. 63) were the two principal poets of Syria at that epoch, and their encounters gave rise to many curious and amusing anecdotes. The latter was accused of attacking the character of Muḥammad's companions and of being inclined to the Shi'ite doctrines; this induced Ibn al-Qaysarānī, who was told that Ibn Munīr had directed his satirical talent against him, to write him the following lines:

"Ibn Munīr! in reviling me, you have insulted a man of learning whose rectitude of judgment was beneficial to mankind. But my heart is not oppressed for that; I have before me an example in the Companions<sup>1</sup>."

A fine passage of his poetry is the following:

"How many nights did I pass sipping intoxicating draughts from the wine-cup and her lips; thus mingling one delicious liquor with another! She defended not her mouth from my kisses; it was like a fortress without a guard<sup>2</sup>."

When in Aleppo, I found the dīwān of his poetical works, all in his own handwriting; and I extracted from it some passages, one of which was the following in praise of a preacher:

"The bosom of the pulpit expands with pleasure to receive you. Tell me; does that (odour of sanctity) proceed from the

---

1 These verses occur also in the life of Ibn Munīr, but not recollecting the circumstance from which they took rise, I gave an erroneous explanation of the second line.

2 In Arabic, ṭuḡhr signifies both mouth and fortress; the poet quibbles on this double meaning.

preacher which it contains or has it been anointed with some sweet perfume.

This alliteration is really excellent<sup>1</sup>. I have since found these verses attributed to Abu 'l-Qāsim Zayd Ibn Abi 'l-Faṭḥ Aḥmad Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Faṣṣāl* al-Mawāzīnī, a native of Aleppo whose father was generally known by the appellation of al-Māhir (the skilful). It is there said that Ibn al-Qaysarānī recited them to the khaṭīb Ibn Ḥāshim on the appointment of the latter to the office of preacher at Aleppo, and that they were attributed to him for this reason. Having met with a different reading of the first verse, I give it here :

"The pulpit was proud of his honours, when you mounted it as a preacher."

The following is a piece of his in the amatory style (ghazal) :

"At the foot of Mount Lebanon I possess a moon (a beauty) whose stations are (not in the zodiac but) in the hearts of men. The north wind bears me her salutation, and the south wind bears mine to her. Her qualities are unrivalled and rare ; for beauty, in this world, is a rarity. I have not forgotten the night when she said, on seeing my body worn away : 'I pray thee, tell me, youth, who caused thy sickness ?' and I replied : 'The person who can cure it<sup>2</sup>.'"

A charming qaṣīdah of Ibn al-Qaysarānī's contains the following original idea :

"Here is the person who ravished sleep from her lovers ; dost thou not see her eyes filled with (the stolen) languor<sup>3</sup> ?"

1 The alliteration to which our author alludes is the perfect consonance which exists between the last words of the two hemistichs of the last verse : damma Khaṭībān dammakha ṭībān.

2 I omit here a couplet not fit to be translated.†

3 The Arabic word wasan, here rendered by languor, signifies also drowsiness.

* 'Abd al-Hamid gives Faḍl.—Ed.

† The translation of the same is given here. "They said : His cheek has become hoary, but his government is not managed. I said : cheeks of him who is loved is his principality."—Ed.

In composing this verse, he had in mind the eulogium addressed by al-Mutanabbī (No. 49) to Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān ; that poet said :

“Thou hast taken the lives of so many (enemies) that, couldst thou add their days to thine, thou wouldst acquire immortality and rejoice the world.”

Ibn al-Qaysarānī frequently expressed himself highly satisfied with the following verse from one of his own qaṣīdahs :

“I love a person before whom the moon fell prostrate in adoration ; seest thou not, on her face (disk) the marks left by the dust.”

Being present at a concert of (religious) music where there was an excellent singer, he composed these lines on seeing the audience overcome with a thrill of ecstatic delight :

“By Allāh ! if lovers knew the just value of their souls, they would sacrifice them for thine, though they were dear to them and precious guarded. When thou singest in their assemblies, thou art really the breath of the zephyr and they are the branches (which it agitates).”

My friend al-Fakhr (Fakhr al-Dīn) Ishāq Ibn al-Mukhtaṣṣ al-Irbilī (native of Arbela) recited to me a stanza of four verses (dubayt), composed, by himself, on seeing the cushions fall off the sofas at a concert of (religious) music, when the audience, some of whom were (ṣūfis) far advanced in the practices of mysticism<sup>1</sup>, fell into an ecstasy of delight :

“The herald of song entered unawares, at midnight, into the assembly of lovers who longed for the sight of God<sup>2</sup>, and he was answered by sobs and burning sighs. Had the rocks heard his strains, they had fallen prostrate with delight, why then should cotton and tattered (cushions) not do the same?”

---

1 Literally : owners of the hearts.

2 Literally : the circle of desire.

Ibn al-Qaysarānī was born at 'Akkah (Acce) in the year 478 (A.C. 1085-6), and he died at Damascus on the eve of Wednesday, the 21st of Shahbān ; A.H. 548 (11th November, A.C. 1153). The next morning, he was interred in the cemetery at the Farādīs Gate. Khālidī means descended from Khālid Ibn al-Walid al-Makhzūmī<sup>1</sup> ; so say the people of Ibn al-Qaysarānī's family, but the majority of historians and the learned in genealogy declare that the posterity of this Khālid became extinct after a lapse of time. God best knows the truth ! Qaysarānī means belonging to Qaysariyah (Caesarea), a village on the coast of Syria.

652 IBN AL-KIZĀNĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Thābit Ibn Faraj al-Kinānī, a professor of the Qur'ān-readings, a philologist, a follower of the sect of al-Shāfi'ī, a native of Egypt, surnamed also al-Khāmi (the dealer in raw hides) and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Kizānī, was a poet of considerable reputation and a pious devotee. There is an order (of dervishes) in Egypt called Kizānites after him, and they place implicit faith in his sayings. He left a dīwān of poems, most of which inculcate self-mortification ; I have never seen the book, but I heard one verse of his which pleased me much ; it is the following :

"Since passion befits the lover, so should kindness befit the beloved."

His poetry contains some very fine passages. He died at Old Cairo on the eve of Tuesday, the 9th of the first Rabi'—some say in the month of Muḥarram—A.H. 562 (3rd January, A.C. 1167), and he was interred in the Lesser Qarāfah, near the mausoleum of the imām al-Shāfi'ī (No. 532). His body was afterwards removed to the foot of mount Muqattam, and deposited

---

1 He means the celebrated Khālid who commanded the Muslims on the first entrance into Syria.

near the cistern which is called by the name of Umm Mawdūd. The tomb erected over him there is a well-known object of pilgrimage ; I have visited it myself more than once. Kizānī means a maker or seller of pitchers (kīzān) ; one of his ancestors followed that trade.

653 AL-ABLAH THE POET

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Bakhtyār Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Muwallad, surnamed al-Ablah, a celebrated poet, was a native of Baghdād and one of the best poets who flourished in these latter times. In his compositions he united tenderness (of sentiment) to artifice (of style and expression), and the dlwān of his poetical works is often to be found in the hands of readers. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him in the Kharīdah and says : "He is an ingenious youth and wears the military dress. His poetry is written in a strain of tender sentiment ; it delights by the artifice of its composition, ravished by its excellence and pleases by the sweetness of its style ; in tenderness it surpasses the morning zephyr, and in beauty the flowered silks of Tustur<sup>1</sup>. His poetical essays, though few in number, get all into wide circulation, and the musicians sing his charming verses set to old airs ; they rush as eagerly to obtain his delightful poems as the bird, in its circling flight, rushes down to the pure fountain." He then adds that, in the year 555 (A.C. 1160), al-Ablah recited to him, at Baghdād, the following passage of a qaṣīdah as his own composition :

"She whose visits give me life came to me when the evening had (assumed) the tint of her hair. When she turned her head (she seemed) a moon ; and wrapped in the folds of her green mantle (she seemed) a willow branch. I passed the night unsealing<sup>2</sup> the wine (of her lips), whilst I deceived the vigilance of spies and took her unawares. O how sweet that visit ! though short, it ended for ever (the pains I suffered from) her protracted cruelty.

1 "On fabrique a Tuster de belles etoffes de soie. C'etait des ateliers de cette ville que sortait l, etoffe destinee a couvrir la Ka'aba." Geographie d'Edrisi, tom. I, p. 383.)

2 Literally : Manifesting.

I sigh for that slender waist and for the refreshing coolness of those lips. I sigh for her who in beauty is a statue ; we are all in the pagan troop of her adorers."

A well-known verse of his is the following, taken from a brilliant qaṣīdah :

"None knows what amorous passion is except him who suffers its torments ; none knows what love is except him who feels its pains."

The following sentimental verses are taken from a passage of a qaṣīdah in which he praises his mistress :

"Leave me to my sufferings ; let me undergo the pains of love ! O how wide the difference between him whose heart is free and him whom beauty has made its captive ! I swear that I shall heed not the reproaches (of my friends) ; they have only excited my impatience from the time that passion first held my rein. (I swear that the counsels of) censorious females shall not amend (me) as long as I see gardens of beauty in the cheeks of the fair ! In me (the feelings of) consolation are (vainly) sought ; love always lives (within me), but consolation is dead. O thunder cloud ! if thou art unkind to the valley (where my beloved resided and refuseth it thy refreshing showers), know, that often the clouds of our eyes have supplied it with the rains refused by thee. No ! never shall I forget the hill where I met thee (my beloved !) nor the time I stationed at a spot which I envy to its jealous possessor. And that maid with the slender waist and languishing eyes ; how long have I preserved my love for her, yet it was lost upon her ! How long have I obeyed her, yet she never yielded to my wishes<sup>1</sup> ! She wounds the hearts of lovers with glances yet sharper than the point of the spear. Her movements are full of grace ; I went astray in the darkness which her hair shed around, on the day of our separation, and was directed again by the brightness of her teeth<sup>2</sup>.

1 Literally : I preserved her, and she destroyed me ; I obeyed her, and she disobeyed me.

2 In this verse I have developed the poet's idea to render it intelligible. He employs a rhetorical figure which, in Arabic, is called laff wa nashr (folding and unfolding): See de Sacy's Chrestomathie arabe, Vol. III, p. 143, 2nd ed.

When she stands up, in her fair proportions, and gracefully bends her waist, the pliant branch of the willow blushes (to be vanquished). Dwellers in the valley of Nu'mān! it was after your cheeks, and not after the king al-Nu'mān, that the anemonies were called shaqā'iq al-Nu'mān.<sup>1</sup> Taper lances in skilful hands wound not the heart so deeply as the bitterness of (her) disdain."

This passage is taken from a long qaṣīdah of which the eulogistic part is excellent. All his poetry is of the same cast, and his transitions from the description of the mistress to the praises of the patron are beautifully managed and have been rarely equalled. As an example of this, we may cite the qaṣīdah which begins thus:

"I gathered crops of roses off those cheeks, and in clasping that waist, I embraced a willow branch."

On coming to the transition. he says:

"And if I ever permit the disparise of (my beloved) Hind to ring in my ears, may I never resent the dispraise of Hind! may my eyes never find a way to shed tears of love! may I never pass the night in the bondage of love and passion! may I reveal the favours I have received, and may I return home manifesting ingratitude and coldness for the bounties of Majd al-Dīn."

Again, in another qaṣīdah, he says:

"There is no real love but mine for Laylā; there is no glory but that of Ibn al-Dawāmi<sup>2</sup>."

And again, in another:

"I swear that in love I stand alone, and that Kamāl al-Dīn stands alone in beneficence!"

To these might be added other examples. Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 183, note) says, in his History, that al-Ablah died at Baghdād in the month of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 579 (Sept-Oct, A.C. 1183). Others place his death a year later. He was interred at the Abzir Gate, opposite to the (edifice called) al-Tājiyah. Ablah (simpleton)

1 See No. 319, note.

2 One of the manuscripts gives the reading al-Dawā'i.

is a word so well-known that it is unnecessary to mark its pronunciation. He was called by this name because there was a shade of simplicity in his character, or, according to some, because he was extremely shrewd: ablah being one of those words which bear two opposite significations. It is thus that they call a negro Kāfur<sup>1</sup>. Having conceived a friendship for a youth of Baghdād, he passed one day by his house, and taking advantage of a moment when no person was present, he wrote on the door the following lines (the Kātib 'Imād al Dīn says that they were repeated to him by the author):

"Thy dwelling, O full moon of the darkness! is a paradise which alone can give delight to my soul. And in a tradition it is said that the greater part of the people of paradise are the simple."

Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī a poet whose life we shall give, satirized al-Ablah in the grossest terms, but though the piece is well versified, I shall abstain from inserting it.

654 SIBT IBN AL-TA'ĀWĪDHĪ

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh the Kātib, surnamed Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī was a celebrated poet. His father, who was mawlā to the al-Muẓaffar family<sup>2</sup>, bore the name of Nushtikīn, but the son changed it into 'Ubayd Allāh. The mother of Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad was daughter to the holy ascetic, Abū Muḥammad al-Mubārak Ibn al-Mubārak Ibn 'Alī Ibn Naṣr al-Sarrāj al-Jawharī, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī and by the title of Jamāl al-Dīn (beauty of religion)<sup>3</sup>. Having been brought up from 1 With the Arabs camphor is synonymous with whiteness.

2 See lower down in this notice.

3 A short account of al-Mubārak Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī will be found at the end of this article.

his childhood by his maternal grandfather, and having passed his youth under his care, he also was surnamed Ibn al-Ta'āwidi. As a poet, Abu 'l-Faḥ stood, in his days, without a rival; in his verses he combined correctness and sweetness of expression with tenderness and subtlety of thought. His pieces are charming and beautiful in the highest degree; I do not think that, for two hundred years before, any poet existed at all like him; and let not the reader of this article blame me when I say this, for opinions vary according to the character of him who pronounces them, and it has been well said by a poet: Men's tastes differ as to what they love. Ibn al-Ta'āwidi was a kātib (clerk) in the chief office (diwān al-Maqaṭi'āt) at Baghdād. In the year 579 (A.C. 1183-4), towards the close of his life, he lost his sight, and in some of his later poems he laments that privation and regrets the happy days of his youth. Before he became blind, he collected his own works into a diwān, drawn up in four sections and preceded by an ingenious introduction (khuṭbah). The pieces which he composed afterwards, he entitled al-Ziyādāt (additions), and it therefore happens that these additions are wanting in some copies of his diwān. When he lost his sight he was a pensioner of the Diwān (the board of public service), and then obtained that his own name should be replaced on the register by those of his sons; but, some time after, he wrote the following lines to the imām (khalif) al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh, requesting a new pension for himself, to be continued as long as he lived:

"Khalif of God! you sustain the weight of religion, the world, and Islāmism; you follow closely the regulations perscribed by the ancient imāms, those land-marks of sure guidance. Under thy reign, poverty and injustice have disappeared: sedition and heresy are seen no longer, and all the people tread in the paths of good policy, beneficence, and justice. Mighty prince! you at whose prohibition fortune ceases her tyranny—you who have bestowed on us favours double and fourfold! my land is struck with sterility, and you alone can restore the impoverished possessor to plenty. I have a family, alas too numerous! which have consumed my means, and their appetite is yet unsated; when they saw me in opulence, they assembled around me, and sat and hearkened to my wishes, but, long since, they broke every tie and turned away on finding me penniless<sup>1</sup>. They roam about me on every side, and, like scorpions, wherever they pass they sting. Among them are children, boys, infants at the breast just able to creep, aged men, and youths full grown. From none of them, young or old, can I hope to derive advantage; they have throats leading to stomachs which receive a greater load than they can carry. Their paunches are wide and empty; their consuming appetite cannot be satisfied. With them, chewing is useless: the morsel which enters their mouth is swallowed without that ceremony. The story which I now relate concerns myself, and will amuse him who is well disposed and lends his ear. I foolishly made over my pension to sons, of whom, as long as I live, I shall get no good. I had in view their advantage, but I had not the talent of drawing any profit from them. I said to them; "When I die, this shall be yours;" but they obeyed me not, neither did they hearken to my wishes. They juggled me out of my money, before I could cast my eye upon it, or touch it with my hand. By Allāh ! I did wrong and harmed myself, and they also have done wrong. But, if you wish to end our contestations, grant me a new pension, wherewith to encounter and amplify my straitened means; and if you say that I have been made a dupe, know that the generous man is often duped. God forbend that my old pension should be erased from the registers of your office and cut off. Sign your consent to my demand, for my hopes are excited and those hopes are firm. Defer not your answer, for I am not to be put off, even though you pushed me away with your own hands; put it in my power to swear that, to transport my pension to another, I shall never raise my hand nor put it (to paper)."

With what ingenuity he adduces, in these verses, the motives which should tend to the fulfilment of his desire ! were the piece recited to a rock, it would soften and bend it ! So, the Commander of the faithful gave orders that he should receive the pension. Having then obtained (as an equivalent for his monthly pay) a quantity of bad flour, he addressed a versified complaint to the storekeeper Fakhr al-Dīn ; it begins thus ;

---

1 The word qitā' the plural of qit'ah, signifies segments, pieces cut off a coin, to serve as small change.

"My lord Fakhr al-Dīn ! thou art prompt to deeds of generosity, when other men are averse and slow. God forbid that you should consent to my receiving an allowance like that of common door-porters and torch-bearers<sup>1</sup>. (they have given me) a substance black as night, worth from a farthing to a qīrāt (four pence) a bushel, altered by age and spoiled to an excessive degree. My offended senses are troubled (by it), my health impaired, and the humours of my constitution corrupted. Take charge of my cure ; I submit to an able Hippocrates the malady of which I complain."

Sharaf al-Dīn Abu Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Tamīmī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Baladī<sup>2</sup>, was wazīr to the imām (khalīf) al-Mustanjid bi-Allāh and president of the council of state (wazīr al-Diwan al-'Azīz) He once removed the directors of all the government offices from their places and committed them to prison ; having then examined their accounts, he inflicted on them heavy fines, personal chastisements, and tortures. This occurrence induced Sibṭ<sup>3</sup> Ibn al-Ta'āwidi with the following lines :

"Traveller to Baghdād ! avoid a city overflowed by the swollen waves of tyranny. If you go to request a favour, return, for all the doors are shut against him who hopes. That place is no longer what it lately was when its hotels<sup>4</sup> were filled with solicitors, and when the heads of noble families, eminent scholars, and distinguished *kātib*s resided within its walls. Time was then in its newness, and fortune in the bloom of its youth ; talent and learning were richly rewarded by generous protectors. (That city) is now ruined and so are its inhabitants ; their mansions have been desolated by the existence of our lord the wazīr. Baghdād offers nought to the living but the grave, with stones and earth to be

1 The word lū (naḥḥū) means a preparer of combustibles with naphtha.

2 An account of the rise and fall of the wazīr Ibn al-Baladī is given in the Diwān al-Islāmiyah by Ibn al-Ṭiqṭīqā p. 365 of the edition published by Mr. Ahlwardt under the title of al-Fakhrī, Ibn al-Aḥḥir gives an account of his death in the Kāmil, year 565.

3 Sibṭ (سبط) signifies a daughter's son, a grand-son by the female line.

4 The signification of the word rab'a has been explained in No. 142, note.

cast upon their corpses. Some are condemned to perpetual imprisonment, where tortures ever renewed are heaped upon them. From thence no hopes of return; can we hope for the return of those who inhabit the tomb! The people are in desolation; ties of blood and ties of friendship hold no longer. The father betrays the son, the wife the husband; relations and friends betray. The mediation of intercessors avails not; offenders obtain no respite to repent of their faults. They all see the day of judgment arrived; and those who doubted of the resurrection have now become believers: the crowd is not wanting, nor the balance, nor the books of men's acts presented to view, nor the volumes opened, nor the call to reckoning; the inexorable guards execute the sentence upon mankind; chains are there, clubs, and punishment, nay, all the threatened terrors of the day of judgment, but a Merciful and Beneficent Being is not there."

He composed the following lines on the same wazīr :

"O Lord! hearken to our affliction, for thou canst remove it; (alas!) have we not come to a time in which Abū Ja'far is wazīr."

Muḥibb al-Dīn Ibn al-Najjār (No. 5, note) states, in his History of Baghdād, that on Monday, the 8th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 566 (19th December, A.C. 1170), the imām al-Mustanjid bi-Allāh died and was succeeded by his son the imām al-Mustaḍī bi-amr Allāh. The next day, Tuesday, the new khalif held a sitting to receive the allegiance of his people. Immediately after, the mayor of the palace, (Ustādḥ al-Dar) 'Aḍud al-Dīn Abū 'l-Faraj (a person of whom we shall again speak lower down), came forth with Ibn al-Bastī<sup>1</sup>, and said: "The khalif has given orders that the law of talion shall have its course against this man;" pointing to the wazīr. They instantly seized on Abū Ja'far and dragged him along the ground, after which they cut off his nose, one of his hands, one of his feet, and finally his head. The trunk and the vered members were then placed in (the concavity of) a shield and cast into the Tigris.

<sup>1</sup> None of the historians whose works I have consulted speaks of this person. One of the 'ISS. of Ibn Khallikān reads al-Sibtī (السبتي) instead of al-Bastī (البستي).

This wazīr, when in power, had cut off the nose of Ibn al-Bastī's mother, and the hand and the foot of his brother, but that day Ibn al-Bastī took his revenge; God preserve us from the evil consequences of our own deeds! Sibt Ibn al-Ta'āwidi<sup>1</sup> was the son of a mawlā to 'Aḍud al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faraj Muḥammad Ibn al-Muẓaffar, the same who treated the wazīr Ibn al-Baladi in this manner, and he once wrote to his patron the following piece, requesting (an allowance of) barley for his horse:

"O my patron! thou whose acts of kindness cannot be counted, and whose generosity is ample and abundant when the gifts bestowed by other men are rare! thou to whom we have recourse, and under whose shade we repose when fortune plays the tyrant! I have a long story to tell of my old bay horse: I bought him without necessity, and behold the consequence of indulging in superfluities: I thought he would have carried my travelling furniture, but all my fine hopes were disappointed, and I never imagined, O misery, that I should myself have to carry his heavy burden. A saddle is good to sit on, but it is a heavy object on my shoulders. His back is white like the owl's<sup>2</sup>; his worth is neither great nor little; his qualities are not of the best, and his appearance far from handsome; he is a ḥarūn<sup>3</sup> and slow in his movements; he is not a racer, nor obedient to the bit; neither does his crupper nor his neck awake admiration in the beholder; when he steps out he stops short, but when they give him enough to eat, it is long before he stops. Straw and clean barley delight him, as also clover and green fodder, but thou wilt see his teeth water at the sight of 'ikrish<sup>3</sup>'; he has only one good point—that of being a good feeder. Then give him to-day whatever is at hand, and treat

---

1 This whiteness of the back resulted probably from its having been ex-coriated by the saddle.

2 The word ḥarūn has two meanings; when taken as a noun, it is the name of a famous race-horse (see No. 517, note); and when employed as an adjective, it means a horse that suddenly stops short. It may be perceived that the poet means to play upon this double signification.

3 'Ikriṣh is the Arabic name of four or five different plants. Here it may perhaps designate tritium repens. See Sontheimer's Heil. und Nahrungsmittel von Ebn Baitar, p. II. s. 204.

him as one of your own. Say not: 'That is too little'; a single straw is precious in his eye."

I give these pieces because they are greatly admired<sup>1</sup>, but his qaṣīdahs containing the praises of his mistress and his patrons are of the utmost beauty. He composed a book called Kitāb al-Ḥajabah wa 'l-Ḥijāb (on chamberlains and door-curtains)<sup>2</sup>; it fills about fifteen quires (three hundred pages) and is a scarce work. The author treats the subject at great length. 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī mentions, in his Khariḍah, that when he passed into Syria and was attached to the service of the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, Ibn al-Ta'āwidi, with whom he had been acquainted when in 'Irāq, addressed to him an epistle with a qaṣīdah in which he requested from him a present of a furred pelisse. He gives a copy of the epistle, which ran as follows: "(The humble servant) imposes a task on your noble qualities which never felt beneficence to be a task<sup>3</sup> and he here offers thee his expectations as a present, and such a present! They consist in the obtaining of a Damascus furred pelisse, magnificent, spotless, soft to the touch, an ornament to the wearer, made with skins carefully dressed, sewn with care, long as thy longanimity, ample as thy beneficence, fair as thy reputation, handsome as thy deeds, large as thy heart, spotless as thy honour, excellent as thy merit, embroidered like thy poetry and prose; its exterior (pleasing) like thy aspect, its interior (sound) like thy heart, adorning the wearer, and embellishing the assemblies; to serve as a cloak to thy humble servant and a lustre to thy glory, which God protect! so that even he who does not wear it may be grateful to thee, and he who does not put it on

---

1 The easy graceful style in which this last piece is written has disappeared in the translation.

2 The doorway leading into the saloon where a great man gives audience is closed by a curtain; a chamberlain (ḥājib) posted there lifts up a corner of the curtain to let the visitor enter. As the titles of Arabic books rarely indicate the subjects of which they treat, this work of Ibn al-Ta'āwidi's may not perhaps have any reference to chamberlains: Ḥajabah wa 'l-Ḥijāb may signify the keepers of secrets and the veils under which secrets are hidden.

3 In the Arabic text of this letter, the third person singular is employed in place of the second. This is a customary form of respect.

may praise thee for it. The gloss of its fur may fade, but the impression of gratitude which it produced will remain; the skins may wear out, but our thanks and praises shall be renewed. (Thy servant) has composed some verses in which he has combined every species of ornament, and, though the sending of them to you is like the sending of dates to Hajar<sup>1</sup>, yet he presents them in the same manner as perfumes are offered to the perfumer and as clothes are placed in the hands of the vender. (Thy servant) thus deposits his eulogium in its fitting place, and he brings the merit (of his production) into conjunction with the meritorious, by composing this (qaṣīdah) in thy honour and confiding it to the safeguarding of thy generosity," Imād al-Dīn then gives the qaṣīdah, which begins thus :

"I should sacrifice my father to preserve that person for whom, in my love, I pine with desire and passion."

This piece is to be found in his (Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī's) diwān. In reply to this qaṣīdah, Imād al-Dīn wrote another, rhyming in the same syllable; they are both of great length. Before mentioning the epistle and the qaṣīdah, Imād al-Dīn speaks in these terms of the author: "A young man of talent, instruction, influence, discretion, manliness spirit, and honour, with whom I was united in the bonds of friendship by the sincerity of our mutual sentiments, and who possessed in perfection all the means (of pleasing) which wit, ingenuity, and intelligence can bestow." He then inserts the epistle with the qaṣīdah and its answer. I never saw any thing like this letter except one of which I shall speak in the life of Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād, to whom Ibn Kharūf al-Maghribī indited an epistle of great originality, in which he asked him for a pelisse of marten-skins. Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī was born on Friday, the 10th of Rajab, A.H. 519 (12th August, A.C. 1125) and he died at Baghdād on the 2nd of Shawwāl, A.H. 584 (24th November, A.C. 1188); some say, 583. He was interred at the Abrez Gate.

---

1 Hajar, a town of Arabia, in the province of Bahrayn, was renowned for the abundance of its dates; whence the proverb: "Like him who carries dates to Hajar," It is equivalent to the English one of carrying coals to Newcastle.

According to Ibn al-Najjār, in his History, the birth of Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī took place on a Friday, and his death on Saturday, the 18th of Shawwāl. Ta'āwīdhī means a writer of amulets; ta'āwīdh signifying amulets. It was under this surname that Abū Muḥammad al-Mubārak Ibn al-Mubārak Ibn al-Sarrāj al-Baghdādī, the pious and holy ascetic already named towards the beginning of this article, was generally known. Ibn al-Sam'ānī (No. 370), who mentions him in the Dhayl (supplement) and in the Ansāb, says: "Perhaps his father dealt in charms and wrote amulets." Ibn al-Sam'ānī received from him some traditional information; this writer says also; "I asked him where and when he was born, to which he replied: 'At al-Karkh (the suburb of Baghdād)', in the year 476 (A.C. 1083-4).' He died in the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 553 (June, A.C. 1158), and was interred in the Shūnīzi cemetery. He recited to me the following lines as his own:

"Let one object only (God) engage your thoughts, and leave aside all other cares. You may thus happily obtain such knowledge as may render all human learning useless."

"He then informed me that these were the only verses he ever composed<sup>1</sup>." Nushtikīn is a foreign name borne by white slaves (mamlūks). We have already stated, in the beginning of this article, that Nushtikīn was a mamlūk belonging to a descendant of al-Muẓaffar, the son of Ra'īs al-Ruwāsā Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī being one of their mawlās and much indebted to their kindness, composed a number of brilliant poems in their praise, and these he assembeled in one of the four chapters into which his dīwān is divided.

655 IBN AL-MU'ALLIM THE POET

Abu 'l-Ghanā'im Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Fāris Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Qāsim al-Wāsiṭi (native of Wāsiṭ),

1. 'Imād al-Dīn, who met al-Mubārak Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī at Damascus subsequently to the year 540 (A.C. 1146), says that he was a holy and virtuous shaykh of an engaging aspect, agreeable in his manners, and pleasing in his discourse. (Kharidah, MS. No. 1447, fol. 72 verso.)

al-Hurthī, surnamed Najm al-Dīn (star of religion), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Mu'allim (the son of the preceptor), was a highly celebrated poet. His pieces are so replete with pathetic sentiment and natural delicacy of thought, that they seem to melt with tenderness. He was one of those whose poems got into wide circulation, whose name acquired popularity, and whose verses procured them public esteem, wealth, and influence. The composition of verses formed the occupation of his life, and the epoch in which he lived encouraged him to persevere. His poems are chiefly amatory, eulogistic, or miscellaneous: the style is easy and the thoughts are just. The greater part of his poetry is devoted to the description of love, desire, affection, and passion; his verses seize the heart and possess a charm to which very few are insensible: people listen to them with pleasure and retain them in their mind; they communicate them one to another, preachers quote them in their exhortations, and the assemblies listen with delight. I heard some shaykhs of al-Batā'ih<sup>1</sup> say that Ibn al-Mu'allim's poetry derived its touching effect from a single circumstance, namely: that every qaṣīdah which he composed was immediately committed to memory by the dervishes (faqīrs) belonging to the order which is called the Rifā'ī, after its founder the shaykh Aḥmad Ibn al-Rifā'ī (No. 69) and, as they sang these poems at their (religious) concert for the purpose of exciting their minds to a state of mystic rapture, the blessed influence of their sighs passed into and pervaded his poetry. I found them all convinced of this as of a fact which left no doubt on their minds, (Be this as it may, I shall only observe) in a summary manner, that his poems resemble elegies, and that no man with the least spark of love in his bosom can bear them without yielding to their charm and feeling his passion revive. A mutual jealousy subsisted between Ibn al-Mu'allim and Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī (No. 654); this led the latter to satirize our poet in a piece of verse rhyming in j, which, however, we need not insert. Ibn al-Mu'allim composed a long qaṣīdah which opens thus:

"Bring back the camels which have hastened off with their fair burdens; when the mansion is no longer inhabited, it ceases

---

1 See 69, note.

to be home. In that valley resided (a maid) from whose access you were debarred, and whose pliant waist laughed to scorn the willow-branch. She betrayed her inconstancy at (our) first assignation (by staying away); who now can engage that she will fulfil a second promise? How can we meet whilst (warriors) of her tribe, sons of combat and lions of battle, surround her? (warriors) who long have borne the spear and whose hands, methink, were only formed to wield the pliant lance. They have girded the bright swords, and nought is seen in the nomadic camp, but the Indian scimitar and the pike. If I turned away, 'twas to avoid the observation of foes, not from satiety or indifference. Inhabitants of Nu'mān<sup>1</sup>! where are the days we passed at Ṭuwayla? (Tell me where!) inhabitants of Nu'mān!"

In another poem he says:

"How often did I say: 'Beware (the valley of) al-'Aqīq, for its gazelles (maidens) are wont<sup>2</sup> to make its lions (warriors) their prey.' But you chose to chase the tender fawns of Ḥijāz, and fortune being adverse, you became their prey."

He says again in another qaṣīdah:

"O neighbours! the tears which flowed (from my eyes were once plentiful and) worthless, but (separated as we now are) by the hands of absence, (they are exhausted and) precious. Let us tarry at the valley (where my beloved resided); stop there for an instant short as that which is required to gird on a mantle or undo a camel's fetter. How often did I station there! Such moments I would cheaply purchase with my life; judge then if I would spare my wealth."

In another qaṣīdah he says:

"(I swore) an oath by the refreshing moisture enclosed within the lips (of my beloved) and encircled with hidden pearl; that,

---

1 See No. 644, 648, 653,

2 I suppose that the copyists have written, by mistake, دربت for هربت.

when the camel-driver reached the hill from which al-'Udhayb<sup>1</sup> could be seen, I should breathe my last. But who now will help me to expiate my oath? Had I not seen in that valley the traces of my beloved Laylā and (objects to awaken my slumbering) passion, I should not have returned here like one possessed (by a demon)."

The motive which induced Ibn al-Mu'allim to compose the qaṣīdah (from which this last passage is extracted) was, that he, al-Ablah (No. 653) and Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī (No. 654) having read the exquisite qaṣīdah of Ṣurr-Durr's (No. 449) which begins with this verse: Is it thus that the love of all (my) companions is requited? Is such the general character of large-eyed gazelles (maidens)? and of which we shall again speak in the life of 'Amīd al-Mulk Muḥammad, they were filled with admiration, and Ibn al-Mu'allim composed this poem in the same prosodiac measure; Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī wrote, on the same occasion, a brilliant qaṣīdah which he sent to the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who was then in Syria. It contains the praises of this prince and begins thus:

"If your habits, when in love resemble mine, let us stop our camels at the two sand-hills of Yabrin<sup>2</sup>"

Al-Ablah also composed a qaṣīdah, but Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī's is the best of the three. A story has been handed down that Ibn al-Mu'allim related as follows: "When in Baghdād, I passed one day by the place where the shaykh Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 345) used to hold his sittings for the purpose of delivering pious exhortations; and, seeing a dense crowd assembled, I asked a person there what had brought them together? He replied: 'It is the preacher Ibn al-Jawzī who is holding a sitting.' Not being aware that he did so, I forced my way forward till I could see and hear him. He was then preaching, and, in the midst of his exhortation, he pronounced these words; 'And it has been well said by Ibn al-Mu'allim:

---

1 Al-'Udhayb is the name borne by a number of springs situated in different parts of the Arabian desert.

2 See 642, note.

'The repetition of Thy name gives fresh pleasure to my ear; and he who repeats it is charming to my sight.'

"I was greatly struck with the coincidence of my presence and this citation of verse from one of my own poems, but neither Ibn al-Jawzī nor any person in the assembly knew that I was there." The verse of which he speaks belongs to one of his most celebrated qaṣīdahs. In another poem, Ibn al-Mu'allim says :

"My fortitude has been overcome by a person whom I dare not make known, and my heart's blood has been wantonly shed by one whom I dare not name. She was cruel, but my tongue had not power to reproach her; yet my heart had strength enough to suffer her tyranny."

On the day when the battle of the Camel was fought near Baṣrah, the engagement had not yet begun, when (the khalif) 'Alī sent his cousin 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās with a letter to Ṭālḥah and al-Zubayr, in which he endeavoured to dissuade them from commencing hostilities. In giving Ibn al-'Abbās the letter, he said; "Do not have any interview with Ṭālḥah, for you will find him (headstrong) as the bull which twists up its nose; he will mount an unruly camel and say it is perfectly broken<sup>1</sup>; but meet al-Zubayr, for he is of a more tractable disposition, and say to him: 'Thy maternal cousin<sup>2</sup> sends thee this message: Thou hast known me in Ḥijāz and wilt not know me in 'Irāq; what has occurred to change thy former feelings<sup>3</sup>?' 'Alī was the first person who employed this expression, and Ibn al-Mu'allim inserted it in the following verse :

"They offered him their salutations at al-Jadh<sup>4</sup>, and they turned their backs on him at al-Ghawr<sup>5</sup>; what has occurred to change their former feelings?"

1 Or: "He will engage in difficulties and say that they are easily got over."

2 Ṣafīyyah, the mother of al-Zubayr, and Abū Ṭālib, the father of 'Alī, were brother and sister.

3 The Ababic words signify literally: What has passed away of that which has commenced? This proverbial expression is noticed by al-Maydānī, tome II, p. 657 of Freytag's edition.

4 Al-Jadh'a (the valley); some valley in Arabia is here meant.

5 Al-Ghawr is the name given to the valley of the Jordan.

This verse is to be found in one of his long qaṣīdahs ; I took 'Alī's message from a work entitled Nahj al-Balāghah (the highway of eloquence),<sup>1</sup> It is needless to expatiate on the beauties<sup>2</sup> of Ibn al-Mu'alim's poetry, as his diwān is well-known and in general circulation. He was born on the eve of the 17th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 501 (2nd February, A.C. 1108), and he died at al-Hurth on the 4th of Rajab, A. H. 592 (3rd June, A.C. 1196). Hurthī means belonging to al-Hurth, which is a village in the district of Nahr Ja'far, at ten parasangs from Wāsiṭ. It was his native place, and he continued to reside in it till his death.

656 MUWAFFAQ AL-DĪN AL-IRBILĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Qā'id al-Irbilī (native of Arbela), surnamed Muwaffaq al-Dīn (favoured in his religion), was brought up at Arbela, the native place of his family, but he was born at Baḥrayn, (whence his surname of al-Baḥrānī). This celebrated poet, who bore also the highest reputation as a grammarian, displayed equal talents in all the various species of poetry ; he ranked with the most learned of the age in the science of prosody and rhyme ; in poetical criticism he was one of the most acute, in distinguishing faults from beauties, one of the most skilful, and in testing poetical compositions, one of the most expert. Having acquired some knowledge of the sciences of the ancients (the Greeks), he drew up an explanation of (the difficulties offered by) the Book of Euclid. At Baḥrayn, when yet a boy, and before he had commenced his literary studies, he composed verses in imitation of the example offered by the Arabs of the desert. He was the master under whose tuition Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfi (No. 528), the author of the History of Arbela, studied the sciences connected with the art of poetry, and finished his education. This writer speaks of him in his work and says after enumerating his merits : "Our shaykh Abu 'l-Ḥaram Makki al-Mākisīnī the grammarian"—we shall give his life—"had recourse to him for the solution of numerous grammatical difficulties and obtained answers to all the questions which he proposed to him." Muwaffaq al-Dīn travelled to Shahrzūr and resided there for some time ; he then removed to Damascus and celebrated, in a long qaṣīdah, the praises of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. He left a diwān of good poetry and of elegant epistles. As a poet, he ranked with those of his contemporaries whom we have already noticed in this work. One of his productions is a qaṣīdah composed in honour of Zayn al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yūsuf Ibn Zayn al-Dīn, the prince of Arbela of whom some mention has been made in the life of his brother Muẓaffar al-Dīn (No. 522). This piece, which is remarkable for its length and excellence, opens with the following lines :

1 Nahj al-Balāghah (the highway of eloquence). This work is stated by some writers to have been compiled by the sharīf Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī al-Murtaḍā (No. 418), and that it consists of maxims and discourses uttered by 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib ; but the general opinion is unfavourable to its authenticity. Some large commentaries have been composed to elucidate this work.

2 I read farā'id with the edition of Boulac.

"The mansion at al-Gḥaḍā has long suffered from decay, and travellers stop to shed tears over its ruins. Its walls have mouldered away, and nought remains but the traces which time has only spared to efface them hereafter. There I spent many (happy) days : but alas ! they have passed away ; the blessings of God be on those days and on that dwelling ! The dark clouds of morning stopped over it and shed the contents of their bosom upon its naked soil ; weeping over these ruins in the absence of my tears ! may God recompense that service ! Say to those who resided here<sup>1</sup> "The ties (of friendship) with which I bound you hold no longer<sup>2</sup> ; and yet I loved you, for (by your honourable renown) you were a tree whose summit no bird could reach. Every night that passed, a guard stood around it, their lances moist with gore<sup>3</sup> ; and when a transgressor stretched his hand towards its

---

1 Literally : to neighbours.

2 Literally : are rotten in their strands. The strands of a rope are the smaller ropes of which it is composed. Ropes are generally made of three strands of twisted cords. The Arabic word is qiwā (قوى), the plural of qūwah (قوة).

3 Literally : The points of their spears sweated death.

branches, that hand was severed (from the arm) before it touched the fruit. But the duty (of defending your honour) was at length relaxed, so that it seemed to the spectator an unprotected and an easy prize. Your soil is fruitful, but I approach not, in search of pasture, except to grounds of difficult access; God created me not to feed my flocks in a meadow easy of approach, where he may lead his flocks who will<sup>1</sup>. When hope impelled me to court your favours, despair stood before me and turned me away. (My feelings towards you are) now the last remains of that love which commenced with desire. Think not that I shall return to you; experience has removed the bandage from my eyes. Know that Zayn al-Din has granted me a favour which precludes me from desiring any other."

This poem is long and its eulogistic part is very fine. His father was a native of Arbela and followed the profession of a merchant; like the other merchants, he used to visit Baḥrayn and remain there for some time, procuring pearls from the diving-beds; it therefore happened that his son al-Muwaffaq Abū 'Abd Allāh was born in that place. The child was taken to Arbela, and, for the reason just given, the surname of al-Baḥrānī was bestowed upon it. Muwaffaq al-Dīn al-Irbilī died at Arbela on the eve of Sunday, the 3rd of the latter Rabi', A.H. 585 (21st May, A. C. 1189), and was interred in the family cemetery, situated to the south of al-Bast. Al-Muṭarrizī, says in his kitāb al-Mughrib, al-bast is a Persian word (bast) which signifies the spreading out of the water at the mouth of a river<sup>2</sup> Baḥrānī means belonging to al-Baḥrayn, which is a small town near Hajar<sup>3</sup>. Al-Azhari (No. 613) says that it received the name of al-Baḥrayn (the two seas) because (it lies near the sea, and because) a lake is situated near the villages of that place, at the entrance into (the region called) al-Aḥsā. The villages of Hajar

---

1 Throughout this piece the poet employs, with a figurative signification, the pastoral terms employed by the nomadic Arabs, Feeding flocks, here signifies: obtaining riches or favours.

2 At the end of the article the author informs us what the Bast of Arbela is.

3 See No. 654, note.

are ten parasangs distant from the Green Sea (the Persian Gulf). The lake is three miles in length and as many in breadth ; its waters are brackish ; they never dry up, but remain stagnant. Abū 'Ubayd (No. 509) states that Abū Muḥammad (Yalīyā) al-Yazīdī<sup>1</sup> related the following anecdote : "(The khalif) al-Mahdī asked me and al-Kisā'ī (No. 408) why a native of Baḥrayn should be called a Baḥrānī, whereas a person belonging to al-Ḥiṣnāy was designated as a Ḥiṣnī (and not as a Ḥiṣnānī). To this al-Kisā'ī replied that people dislike saying Ḥiṣnānī on account of (the disagreeable sound caused by) the proximity of the two n's ; and I answered for Baḥrānī, that they preferred it to Baḥrī, because the meaning of the latter term might be mistaken, bearing, as it does, another signification, namely : 'belonging to the sea.'" Al-Bast is the bed of a broad river passing through Arbela ; the winter torrents and those of spring flow into it. It contains a great quantity of small stones.

657 IBN AL-DAHĤĤĤĤ AL-FARAḌĤ

Abū Shujā' Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Shu'ayb, surnamed Fakhr al-Dīn (glory of religion), and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Dahān (the son of the oilman) was a native of Baghdād, a calculator of inheritance-shares (faraḍī)<sup>2</sup>, an arithmetician, and a philologer. Having left Baghdād, he proceeded to Moṣul and attached himself to the wazīr Jamāl al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī<sup>3</sup> ; but he afterwards passed into the service of the sultān Ṣaiāḥ al-Dīn, and was nominated by him director of the government office at Mayyāfāriqīn. Being unable, in this post, to come to a good understanding with the governor of the city, he removed to Damascus and obtained a very inadequate pension, by which he dragged on a miserable existence. In the year

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 See No. 179, note.

3 The life of the wazīr Jamāl al-Dīn Abū Ja'far Muḥammad al-Iṣbahānī will be found in this work.

586 (A.C. 1190), he went to Egypt, and subsequently returned to Damascus, where he settled. He drew up, on the partition of inheritances, a number of works, containing tables, and amongst other treatises, he composed a Gharib al-Ḥadīth (unusual expressions occurring in the Traditions), the contents of which fill sixteen small volumes. In this production he employed certain letters by means of which any word sought for could be found out. His pen was more eloquent than his tongue. He compiled also a history and other works. Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) mentions him in the history of Arbela, and counts him among the strangers who visited that city: "He was," says he, "a man of learning and solid information; he composed some good poetry." This historian then gives the verses composed by Ibn al-Dahhān in praise of the shaykh Tāj al-Dīn Abu 'l-Yumn Zayd Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Kindī (No. 233). The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn also speaks of him with high commendation in the Kharidah, and gives some fine passages from his poetry. One of these pieces is the following, composed on the grammarian Abū Muḥammad Sa'īd Ibn al-Mubārak Ibn al-Dahhān, generally known by the surname of al-Nāṣiḥ (the monitor), who had lost one of his eyes; we have already spoken of this person (No. 247):

"Al-Dahhān is not far from having a son more deceitful than himself in two ways. ('Tis like) one of the wonders of the sea, you may well relate it: (the son has) a single eye and a double face?"

Another of the passages cited in the same work is the following, addressed to a person of rank on his recovery from sickness:

"The people made a vow that on the day of thy recovery they would hold a fast; I alone vowed not to hold one, but to break it. For I knew that the day of thy recovery would be a festival; and on such days I disapprove of fasting even though obliged to do so by a vow."

1 Dahhān signifies not only an oilman but also deceitful.

2 A double face means duplicity; the influence of the evil-eye was particularly active in one-eyed man.

He composed also some fine poems for recitation. He was well skilled in astronomy and in the use of astronomical tables. His death took place at al-Ḥillat al-Sayfiyah in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 590 (January-February, A.C. 1194). He had set out from Damascus to perform the pilgrimage, and, in returning, he took the road leading to 'Irāq; but on arriving at al-Ḥillah, his camel fell under him, and a piece of the wood of the saddle struck him in the face and killed him on the spot. His stature was low, his face smooth, his beard long, and white, inclining to yellow. Some say that he bore the surname of Burhān al-Dīn (proof of religion). Having already spoken of al-Ḥillah (No. 276), we need not repeat our observations.

658 IBN 'UNAYN

Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn Muḥammad Ibn Naṣr Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Unayn al-Anṣārī, surnamed Sharaf al-Dīn (nobleness of religion), was born in Damascus, but his family belonged to Kūfah. With him closed the series of our great poets; his equal has never since appeared, and, towards the close of his life, he remained without a rival. In his poetical compositions, excellent as they are, he did not confine himself to one particular style; on the contrary, he displayed his talents in all the various branches of that art. His literary information was most extensive; the greater part of the poetry composed by the Arabs of the desert was familiar to him, and, as I have been informed, he could repeat from memory the contents of Ibn Durayd's (No. 611) philological work, the Jamharah. He had a strong passion for satire and took pleasure in attacking the reputation of others; a long qaṣidah of his, to which he gave the title of Miqrād al-A'rād (the scissors to cut up reputations), is directed against some of the chief men at Damascus. The recurrence of his invectives against individuals having obliged the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn to banish him from that city, he composed, on leaving it, the following lines:

"Why have you banished an honest man who never committed a crime, who never stole? Expel the muwadhhdhin from your country, if all are to be expelled who speak the truth<sup>1</sup>."

Ibn 'Unayn travelled over various countries, such as Syria, 'Irāq Mesopotamia, Adharbā'ijān, Khurāsān, Ghaznah, Khuwārizm and Transoxiana; he next visited India, and afterwards passed into Yaman, which was then under the rule of Sayf al-Islām Ṭuḡhtikīn Ibn Ayyūb (No. 282), the brother of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. After residing there for some time, he proceeded to Damascus by way of Hījāz and Egypt. From Damascus he made frequent excursions to other cities and returned home again. In the year 623 (A.C. 1226) I saw him at Arbela, but did not obtain any thing from him<sup>2</sup>; he had been sent there on a political mission by al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Sharaf al-Dīn 'Isā, the son of al-Malik al-'Ādil and sovereign of Damascus (No. 490). He made but a short stay, and set out again. When in India, he wrote the following lines to his brother at Damascus; the second verse he borrowed from Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46), but this he was well entitled to do (if we take into consideration his own talents):

"Separated as we are, I forgive thy silence, for I know that thy letters could not find a bearer: and I pardon thy ṣayf<sup>3</sup> its cruelty (in not visiting my slumbers), for, after travelling all night, it was still separated from me by a journey of many days<sup>4</sup>."

How well that is expressed, and with what elegance he introduces the verse of Abu 'l-'Alā! The same thought recurs in different passages of his poetry; thus, in a long qaṣīdah, he says:

"O zephyr that comest from Tall Rāhiṭ and the meadows of al-Ḥimā! how has thou found thy way to India?"

1 When the muwadhhdhin calls the people to prayer, he proclaims that there is but one God and that Muḥammad is the apostle of God. It is to this the poet alludes.

2 The author means that he did not learn any of Ibn 'Unayn's verses from that poet's own lips.

3 See vol. I, Introduction.

4 Literally: by stations.

He said also in a piece composed at Aden, a city in Yaman :

"O my friends ! I ask not your ṭayf to visit (my slumbers); for, alas ! how far is al-Daylamiyāt from Aden !"

Al-Daylamiyāt, Tall Rāhiṭ, and al-Ḥimā are places situated in the plain of Damascus. The verse in al-Ma'arri's poem, which precedes the one given here, runs as follows :

"I asked how far it was from al-Aqīq to al-Ḥimā ? and I marvelled at the wide interval and the journey's length."

Al-Ma'arri borrowed this thought from Di'bil Ibn 'Alī al-Khuzā'i, the poet of whom we have already spoken (No. 213). Di'bil composed a satire on the khalif al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh, the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd, and, search having been made for him, he fled from 'Irāq to Egypt and took up his residence at Uswān (Syene), in the farthest extremity of that country. On this occasion he composed the verses which follow :

"A man driven by his apprehensions to Uswān has not preserved the least trace of fortitude. I have fixed my abode in a spot which the eye cannot reach, and which the ṭayf itself would be unable to attain, were it to undertake so fatiguing a journey."

We have been here led away from our subject, but one word brought on another. Subsequently to the death of the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, when al-Malik al-'Ādil took possession of Damascus<sup>1</sup> Iōn 'Unayn was absent on the journey which he undertook in consequence of his banishment ; but (on learning the events which had taken place), he directed his steps towards Damascus and wrote to al-Malik al-'Ādil the qaṣīdāh rhyming in r, wherein he requests permission to enter the city. In this poem he describes Damascus, relates the sufferings which he underwent in foreign lands, and addresses a most touching appeal to that prince's commiseration. This piece, which is of the highest beauty, begins thus :

---

<sup>1</sup> The occupation of Damascus by al-Malik al-'Ādil took place A.H. 592 (A.C. 1195).

"Could it harm the ṣayf of my friends, were it to undertake a nocturnal journey (and visit me)? Could it harm (my foes) did they let me indulge in sleep<sup>1</sup>?"

In the beginning of the poem he describes Damascus, its gardens, rivers, and the delightful spots in its vicinity; he then alludes to his banishment in these terms:

"I left it, but not willingly; I abandoned it, but not through hatred; and I journeyed forth, but not from choice. I seek to share in (the prince's) bounty which overspreads every land; how strange that (by me alone his favours) must be requested by urgent prayers! I (therefore) veil the face of my eulogiums, not to profane them; and, disguising (my talents), I tuck up the (proud) train of my expectations".

In the same piece he says, complaining of his sufferings during his absence from home:

"To thee I complain of the pains of absence; time passed so slowly, that each of those days seemed to me a month; my existence never brightens up, the traces of love are never effaced from my heart and the hand of slumber never touches my eyelids. My days are spent in an abode far from the luxuriant vegetation (of Damascus), and I pass the nights debarred from access to the pure water (of its streams). Strange that I alone should be an outcast in the desert!"

This is a most beautiful qaṣīdah and it surpasses, in my opinion, Abū Bakr al-'Ammār al-Andalusi's (No. 643) qaṣīdah in the same rhyme and measure, which commences thus and of which we have already spoken:

"Pass round the glass, for the zephyr has come."

When al-Malik al-'Adil read Ibn 'Unayn's poem, he authorised him to enter Damascus. On arriving there, the poet said:

"I satirised the grandees in Jilli<sup>2</sup>, and I appalled the lower ranks by my invectives against the higher. Driven from it I was, but I returned despite them all."

---

1 The poet means: Could it harm my jealous foes were they to allow me to sleep, so that I might see the ṣayf in my dreams.

2 Jilli was one of the names given to Damascus. See No. 88, note.

He displayed great acuteness in the composition and solution of enigmas, and, when any were sent to him in waiting, he resolved them immediately and wrote back an answer in verse, much finer than the question was. As he had no inducement for collecting his poetical works into a dīwān, he never undertook that task, so that now his pieces are found dispersed in the hands of different persons. A native of Damascus made a small collection of his poems, but this dīwān does not contain the tenth part of what he composed, and we even perceive in it some things which are not his. Ibn 'Unayn was a man of great wit, gaiety, and humour. One of his qaṣīdahs, in which he speaks of his travels and mentions his journey towards the East, contains the following admirable verse :

"I penetrate into<sup>1</sup> the heart of East, as if I were searching in its recesses for the lustre of renown."

In a word, his poetry abounds with beauties. In one of the months of the year 649 (A.C. 1251-2), being then in Cairo, I had a dream<sup>2</sup> in which I saw Ibn 'Unayn holding a broad, red-coloured sheet of paper, on which were inscribed about fifteen verses. "I composed these verses," said he, "for al-Malik al-Muẓaffar (No. 476), the sovereign of Ḥamāt." That prince was also dead at the time of which I am speaking. The assembly where we were seemed to be numerous, and he read the verses to us. One of them struck me greatly and I repeated it over and over in my dream ; when I awoke, it was impressed on my memory and I give it here.

"To recite verses is not laudable, unless he whose praises they extol be deserving."

This verse is not to be found in his poems. In the life of Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (No. 574), we have spoken of him and his poem which rhymes in f ; we have also mentioned him in the life of Sayf al-Islām (No. 282). High favour was shown to him by different sovereigns, and he filled the post of wazīr at Damascus, towards the end of al-Malik al-Mua'ẓẓam's reign and during 1 Literally ; I split the heart.

2 The belief of Muslims in dreams is well-known.

the reign of al-Malik al-Nāṣir, that prince's son. On the accession of al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf, he resigned his office, and, having retired to his house, he continued to reside there and never again occupied a situation under government. His birth took place at Damascus on Monday, the 9th of Sha'bān, A.H. 549 (19th October, A.C. 1154), and he died in that city on Monday evening, the 20th of the first Rābi', A.H. 630 (4th January, A.C. 1233). The next morning, he was interred in the the mosque founded by himself at Arḍ al-Mizzah (the land of al-Mizzah), which is a village at the gate of Damascus. Ibn al-Dubaythi (No. 635) states that he heard him say: "We came originally from a place in Kūfah called Masjid Bani 'l-Najjār (the mosque of the Najjārids), and we drew our descent from the Anṣārs." Subsequently to my copying this passage, I visited the tomb of Bilāl, Muḥammad's muwadhḥin<sup>1</sup>, which is situated in the cemetery lying outside that gate of Damascus which is called Bāb al-Ṣaghīr. On coming out of the chapel erected over the grave, I observed a large tomb near the door (or near the Gate) and, being informed that it was Ibn 'Unayn's, I stopped and invoked on him the mercy of God.

659 AL-QĀ'IM AL-'UBAYDĪ

Abu 'l-Qāsim Muḥammad, called also Nizār, was the son of Abū Muḥammad, 'Ubayd Allāh, surnamed al-Mahdī, the same who established an empire in Maghrib. Abu 'l-Qāsim bore the title of al-Qā'im (the maintainer). We have already spoken of his father (No. 332), and of his son al-Manṣūr Ismā'il (No. 95). Having been solemnly proclaimed by his father as the next successor to the throne of Ifriqiyah and the adjoining country, his name was inscribed on all the official papers and the umbrella

---

1 Bilāl Ibn Rabāḥ, an Abyssinian mawlā to Abū Bakr, embraced Islāmism at an early period and fought in all Muḥammad's battles. He was the only muwadhḥin whom Muḥammad ever employed to call the people to prayer and he accompanied him in all his expeditions and sojournings. Bilāl died at Damascus, towards A.H. 20 (A.C. 641), aged sixty-four years.

(of state) was borne over his head. On the death of his father A.H. 322, (A.C. 934), the people renewed to him their oath of allegiance. He had been twice sent by his father into Egypt; the first time, he set out on the 18th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 301 (15th July, A.C. 914), and, having taken possession of Alexandria and al-Fayyūm, he levied the land-tax (kharāj) throughout the greater part of Egypt and oppressed the people<sup>1</sup>. In the second expedition, he reached Alexandria in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 307 (August, A.C. 919), with a numerous army. The officer who governed there in the name of the imām (khaliḥ) al-Muqtadir having retired at his approach, al-Qā'im took possession of the city and marched to al-Jizah with an immense body of troops. Intelligence of these events having reached Baghdād, al-Muqtadir provided Mūnis al-Khādim (the eunuch) with men and money, and sent him to repel the invader. Mūnis hastened by forced marches to Old Cairo, and found, on his arrival, that al-Qā'im had obtained possession of al-Jizah, al-Ushmunayn and the greater part of al-Ṣa'id (Upper Egypt). The two armies then met, and a number of desperate conflicts ensued; but al-Qā'im having lost a great part of his men and horses by pestilence and famine, departed for Ifriqiyah, and was pursued to some distance by the Egyptian army. He entered al-Mahdīyah on Tuesday, the 3rd of the month of Rajab, the same year (29th November, A.C. 919). It was under his reign that Abū Yazīd Maḥlād Ibn Kandād* the Khārijite revolted (against the Shī'ite dynasty). To give the particulars of this insurrection would lead us too far; and, besides, we have already related, in the life of al-Manṣūr (No. 95), what happened to this rebel and how he died a prisoner<sup>2</sup>. Al-Qā'im was born at Salāmiyah (No. 332), in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 280 (March-April, A.C. 893),—some say in 282, and others again in 277. He was taken to Maghrib by his father, and he died on Sunday, the 13th of Shawwāl, A.H. 334

---

1 He was then obliged to evacuate Egypt by Mūnis the eunuch, who had been sent against him by the khaliḥ al-Muqtadir. (Ibn al-Aṭhir.)

2 Ibn Khaldūn gives a full account of Abū Yazīd's revolt in his History of the Berbers, tome II.

* M. de Slane gives : Kaydād.—Ed.

(18th May, A.C. 946), at al-Mahdiyyah, where Abū Yazīd held him blockaded. Ismā'il, al-Qā'im's son, concealed his father's death lest the insurgent chief, who was then in the neighbourhood, besieging the city of Sūsah, should learn the event and conceive fresh hopes of success. He, therefore, left all things as they were, and distributed donations and presents in abundance. He avoided also assuming the title of khalif, and headed his letters with these words: From the amir Ismā'il, the designated successor to the command of the Muslims<sup>1</sup>.

660 AL-MU'TAMID IBN 'ABBĀD

Al-Mu'tamid 'alā Allāh (the supported by God) Abu 'l-Qāsim Muḥammad, the son of al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh Abū 'Amr 'Abbād, the son of al-Zāfir al-Muwayyad bi-Allāh Abu 'l-Qāsim Muḥammad, qāḍī of Seville, the son of Abu 'l-Walid Ismā'il, the son of Quraysh, the son of 'Abbād, the son of 'Amr, the son of Aslam, the son of 'Amr, the son of 'Itāf, the son of Nu'aym, a member (by descent) of the tribe of Lakhm (al-Lakhmī) and a descendant of al-Nu'mān Ibn al-Mundhir, the last king of al-Ḥirah<sup>2</sup>, was sovereign of Cordova, Seville, and the portion of the Spanish peninsula situated in the proximity of these two cities. It was of him and his father that a certain poet said:

"The sons of 'Abbād, the progeny of the Mundhirs (there is an origin!) have added fresh lustre to the renown of their ancestors. Glory has engendered no other offspring but these heroes; the children of glory are few:"

The authority which this dynasty acquired in Spain originated in the following manner: Nu'aym and his son 'Itāf were the first of the family who passed from the East into Spain; they were natives of al-'Arīsh, an ancient city which marks the point of separation between Syria and Egypt, and is situated on the edge of the Syrian desert. (On their arrival in Spain) they settled

1 Literally: The holder of the covenant of the Muslims. That is: the person to whom the Muslims engaged their fealty as successor to the throne.

2 For the history of the Lakhmides of al-Ḥirah, see Pococke's Specimen Hist. Ar. p. 67, ed. 1806, and Mr. Caussin de Perceval's. Essai sur la Histoire des Arabes.

at Tūmīn, a village in that district of the province of Seville which is called Ṭushānah (Tocina). 'Iṭāf left issue, and one of his descendants, the qāḍī al-Ẓāfir Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il, was the first of the family in that country who emerged from obscurity. Having risen to the post of qāḍī at Seville, he acted towards the people with such justice and moderation as drew on him the attention of every eye and the love of every heart. When the sovereign of Cordova<sup>1</sup>, Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn Ḥammūd al-Ḥasanī, surnamed al-Musta'li,* who was a prince of a tyrannical disposition, laid siege to Seville, the chief men of that city went to the qāḍī Muḥammad and said to him: "Seest thou not what this tyrant hath brought down upon us, and how he hath destroyed the property of the people? Arise then with us, and let us go forth against him; we will give thee the sovereignty over us and concede to thee the supreme authority." He accepted their proposal, and they sallied forth against Yahyā. That prince, who was then intoxicated with wine, mounted on horseback to encounter them, and met with his death. The power of Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il being thus established, he took possession of Cordova and other places. The history of his proceedings with the pretended Hishām Ibn al-Ḥakam is well known: Hishām Ibn al-Ḥakam, the last Umayyad sovereign of Spain, had allowed al-Manṣūr Ibn Abī 'Āmir not only to acquire an absolute authority over him, but to exclude him from all communication with the public; no orders issued from the palace but such as were dictated by that minister; the prince was debarred from the exercise of power and deprived of all the attributes of royalty, with the exception of the imperial title and the mention of his name in the khuṭbah (public prayer) offered up from the pulpits. Nothing was then heard of him for upwards of twenty years, and various changes had taken place when the qāḍī Muḥammad was informed, some time after his accession and the reduction of the (neighbouring) cities under his rule, that Hishām Ibn al-Ḥakam was in a mosque at Qal'at Rabāḥ† (Calatrava). He immediately sent for him, and having placed the supreme authority in his hands, he constituted himself the wazīr of this (mock sovereign). Alluding to this circumstance, the ḥāfiz Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ḥazm al-Ẓāhiri (No. 423) says, in his Nuqaṣ al-'Arūs: "An imposture the like of which never occurred before: upwards of twenty years had elapsed since the death of Hishām Ibn al-Ḥakam, surnamed al-Muwayyad, when there appeared a man called Khalaf al-Ḥaṣri the (mat maker) who gave himself out for that prince, and, being proclaimed sovereign, the public prayer was offered up in his name, at different periods, from all the pulpits of Spain. He caused great bloodshed; armies encountered in battle on his account, and during more than twenty years he persevered in his pretensions. The qāḍī Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il held the rank of wazīr under him and possessed all the authority. Things continued in this state till the false Hishām's death, when the qāḍī assumed the supreme power." (This qāḍī) was a man of great learning and skilled in literature; he possessed a perfect knowledge of the means by which empires are governed, and he continued to reign with absolute authority till his death. This event took place on Sunday, the 29th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 433 (24th January A.C. 1042). He was interred in the citadel of Seville. Some say that he died towards the year 450; different dates also are assigned to his accession; 'Imād al-Dīn mentioning, in his Kharīdah, the year 414 (A.C. 1023-4), and others giving the year 424. God best knows the truth in all these statements! On the death of Muḥammad the qāḍī, his son Abū 'Amr 'Abbād, surnamed al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh, succeeded to the throne. Speaking of this prince Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Bassām (No. 439, notes) says, in his Dhakhīrah<sup>1</sup>: "Then the authority passed to 'Abbād, in the year 433; he at first bore the surname of Fakhr al-Dawlah

<sup>1</sup> This Idrisid sovereign reigned at Malaga. Cordova was, at that time, an independent republic.

* M. de Slane gives Motali.—Ed.

† Abd 'al-Ḥamid gives Riyāḥ.—Ed.

---

1 A better acquaintance with Ibn Bassām's work obliges me to acknowledge that it contains a mass of precious information borrowed mostly from other authors, but his own style is detestable. This author, according to al-Maqqarī, was a native of Santarem and died A.H. 542 (A.C. 1147-8). In the year 1861, I published an account of the Dhakhīrah in the Journal asiatique. See also Professor Dozy's Histori Abbadiadrūm, tome III, page 38.

(glory of the empire), and afterwards that of al-Mu'taḍid<sup>1</sup>. He was the axle of the mill-stone of affliction (for his foes) and the utmost limit of torment : think of a man whom neither high nor low could withstand<sup>2</sup>, from whom neither the near nor the distant could escape ; a mighty prince who consolidated the power which had been shaken, a lion who whilst crouching, devoured the fawn ; a precipitate (politician) against whom even the astucious had to be on their guard, and a dastard of whom the bravest warriors stood in awe ; misguided, he followed the right path ; consolidating (one state), he cut away and spared not ; he assaulted, and the people were hostile (to him). Yet, he established his authority, agitated as he was<sup>3</sup> so that he extended his power, enlarged his kingdom, multiplied his troops, and increased his means. Besides this, he was gifted with a handsome face, a body perfect in its proportions, a colossal stature, a liberal hand<sup>4</sup>, penetration of intellect, presence of mind, and a just perception. By these qualities he surpassed all his contemporaries ; and moreover, before ambition led him to aspire after power, he had looked into literature with a close glance and an acute apprehension ; so that by his quick intelligence, he acquired an abundant stock of information, noted down without serious study, without advancing far into its depths, without extensive reading, and without indulging in the passion of collecting books of that kind. With these accomplishments, he derived from his genius the talent of speaking in an ornate style. He composed also pieces of verse remarkable for sweetness, containing thoughts which the natural turn of his disposition enabled him to attain, expressing perfectly well what he wished to say, and displaying such excellence as caused them to be copied by literary men. To these brilliant qualities he united a liberal disposition, wherein he rivalled the (copious) rain-clouds. The history of al-Mu'taḍid, in all his actions and his various projects, is singular

---

1 Al-Mu'taḍid, or more correctly al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allah, signifies : one who recurs to the assistance of God.

2 Literally ; The standing and the mowed down. A metappor taken from corn.

3 Literally : Between standing up and sitting down.

4 Literally : Copiousness of fingers.

and striking, he was addicted to women, of whom he had great numbers and of various races ; in this indulgence he reached a limit which none of his contemporaries ever went, and by its frequency and his natural vigour, he begot a numerous progeny. It is said that he had about twenty sons and as many daughters. ”<sup>1</sup>

This writer gives some pieces composed by him, of which this is one :

“When the night was washing from its eyes the collyrium (of darkness) with the water of morning, and the zephyr blew mildly, we drank an old (liquor, in colour) the gold, in perfume strong, and in body weak<sup>2</sup>.”

In the life of Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn ‘Ammār (No. 643), we have given some extracts from the two qaṣīdahs composed by that wazīr in honour of al-Mu’taḍid<sup>3</sup> ; one of these poems rhymes in r and the other in m. Al-Mu’taḍid is thus described in a piece of verse composed by his son al-Mu’tamid :

“A generous prince, bestowing thousands before the request is made, and who offers excuses, thinking his gifts too small. His hand is kissed by every mighty man, and were it not for its moisture (its liberality), we should say it is the sacred store (of Makkah’s temple).”

He continued in the glory of power and the enjoyment of pleasure, till he was attacked by a quinsy which soon carried him off. On perceiving his death draw near, he ordered a singer to be brought in, with the intention of drawing an omen from the first words of the piece which might be sung, and the singer commenced with this verse :

“We kill time, knowing that it will kill us ; mix then the (wine) with the water of the cloud and give us to drink.”

---

1 The latter half of this extract consists of a passage which Ibn Bassām borrowed from Ibn Ḥazm.

2 I believe that, with the Arabian poets, a weak-bodied wine means a pure transparent wine.

3 This is a mistake. The poems of which Ibn Khallikān speaks were composed in honour of al-Mu’tamid.

From these words he drew a bad omen, and effectively, he only survived five days. His death took place at Seville, on Monday, the first of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 461 (28th March, A.C. 1069), and he was interred there the next day. His son al-Mu'tamid 'ala Allāh Abu 'l-Qāsim Muḥammad succeeded to the throne. Speaking of al-Mu'tamid, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Qaṭṭā' (No. 422) says, in his Lumaḥ al-Mulaḥ: "The most liberal, the most hospitable, the most munificent, and the most powerful of all the princes who ruled in Spain. His court was the halting place of travellers<sup>1</sup>, the rendezvous of poets, the point towards which all hopes were turned, and haunt of men of talent; so much so, that, at the door of no other contemporary prince were to be found so many eminent poets and literary men as were assembled in his presence<sup>2</sup>." Ibn Bassām says, in the Dhakhīrah: Al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād left some pieces of verse (beautiful) as the bud when it opens to disclose the flower; and, had the like been composed by persons who made of poetry a profession and a merchandise, they would still have been considered as charming, admirable, and singularly original." One of these pieces is the following:

"Thou hast often shunned me, though sometimes events induced thee to treat me kindly. The time of our separation seemed (dismal) as night, and the moments of our meeting (bright) as the moon."

This idea bears some relation to that which a poet has expressed in the following verses of a poem:

"The light of morning removed (the cover of darkness) off her face, and the mole on her cheek arose, imbued with moisture. The mole on her cheek seemed, like the moment of (a mistress') displeasure during the hour of love."

Having resolved to send his concubines from Cordova to Seville, he set out with them and escorted them from night-fall till

---

1 Literally: The place where the baggage is taken off.

2 Literally: As were enclosed between the two ranks of servants in his hall.

morning. He then bade them farewell and returned back, reciting some verses, two of which ran as follows :

"I travelled with them whilst the robe of night was of one uniform colour, but, when it appeared striped (by the rays of dawn), I stopped to say farewell, and the morning received from my hand those stars<sup>1</sup>.

This idea is highly beautiful. He said also on the subject of his bidding them farewell :

"Early in the morning, when I stopped to say farewell, standards were waving in the court of the castle, and we wept blood, so that, by the shedding of red tears, our eyes appeared like wounds."

This is an imitation of the thought which a poet has thus expressed :

"I wept blood, so that a person said : 'This youth is bleeding from the nose with the lids of his eyes.' "

A similar idea occurs also in a piece of al-Abiwardi's which we have already given (No. 648). The following verses are by al-Mu'tamid :

"Were the eyes of delators not fixed upon me, and did I not fear that the guards might tell, I should have made you a visit to retribute your cruelty, even were I to creep on my face or walk on my head.<sup>1</sup>"

He addressed the following lines from his palace at Cordova to his boon-companions who had made a morning party at al-Zahrā, inviting them to come and carouse with him that evening :

"On your account, the palace envied al-Zahrā, and I swear by my existence and yours that it was not in the wrong ! At al-Zahrā you rose as suns to light the day ; appear near us as moons to light the night."

This idea is novel and striking. "Al-Zahrā<sup>2</sup> is one of the most admirable edifices in the world ; its erection was commenced in

1 Read, in the text, لنرتكم لا كانيكم and او سعي

2 Zahrā is the feminine singular of the adjective azhar (bright, splendid).

the beginning of the year 325 (November, A. C. 936) by Abu 'l-Muṭarrif 'Abd al-Raḥmān, surnamed al-Nāṣir, (the son of Muḥammad, the son of 'Abd Allāh), who was one of the Umayyad sovereigns of Spain. It lies at the distance of four miles and two-thirds from Cordova. Its length from east to west is two thousand seven hundred cubits, and its breadth, from north to south<sup>1</sup>, one thousand five hundred cubits; the number of its pillars is four thousand three hundred, and it has upwards of fifteen thousand* doors. Al-Nāṣir divided the revenue of the state into three portions; one was given to the troops, another deposited in the treasury, and the third spent on the construction of the Zahrā. The taxes of Spain at that time amounted to five millions four hundred and eighty thousand dīnārs, besides seven hundred and sixty-five thousand dīnārs produced by the tolls and the demesnes of the sovereign. The Zahrā is one of the most colossal buildings erected by man, the most splendid and the most renowned<sup>2</sup>. The preceding indications are taken from Ibn Baṣḥkuwāl's history of Spain (No. 206). The celebrated poet Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad al-Lakhmī al-Dānī felt a natural partiality for the 'Abbād family in consequence of the patronage which he had received from al-Mu'tamid<sup>3</sup>; and he celebrated the praises of that prince in a number of beautiful pieces. In one of these poems, he mentions al-Mu'tamid's four sons namely: al-Raṣhīd 'Ubayd Allāh, al-Rāḍī Yazīd, al-Māmūn al-Faṭḥ, and al-Mūtamin. In this piece he says, with the utmost elegance:

“(He is) a helper in want, an assister in adversity; in armour, he appals; in silks, he excites admiration. (His are) beauty, beneficence, rank, and power; (he is) like the noontide sun, the (refresh.

---

1 Ibn Khallikān's copyists have here committed a blunder which it is impossible to render into English. The passage, if translated into French, would run thus Et sa largeur, du sud au midi, est, etc. They have written الجنوب instead of الجوف.

2 Not a trace of Zahrā can now be discovered.

3 Literally: Because al-Mu'tamid was the person who drew him by the arm. In English, we should say: Who took him by the hand.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives "fifteen" only. —Ed.

ing) cloud, the lightning (which announces the genial rains) and the thunder (which threatens). With his blood he raised a monument of glory, and he enlarged that edifice by sons, mighty and resolute; four in umber, like the temperaments, combined to maintain in health the body of renown and the nobleness of ancient descent."

Notwithstanding the illustrious deeds and the generosity of this family, it could not escape detracting; thus, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ja'far Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ḥājj al-Lūrqi<sup>1</sup> said of them:

"Mourn for the world and for the death of beneficence, since beneficence subsists not in the family of 'Abbād! I passed three months with them as a visitor, yet never obtained a dinner; I then left them and received no provisions for my journey."

At that time, Alphonso (VI), the son of Ferdinand, the sovereign of Castile and king of the Spanish Franks, had become so powerful that the petty Muslim kings of that country were obliged to make peace with him and pay him tribute. He then took Toledo on Tuesday, the 1st of Ṣafar, A. H. 478 (29th May, A.C. 1085), after an arduous siege. That city belonged to al-Qādir bi-Allāh Ibn Dhī 'l-Nūn. In allusion to this event, the following verses were pronounced by Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Faraj Ibn Ghazlūn al-Yaḥsubī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-'Assāl (السال) al-Ṭulayṭilī, and of whom Ibn Bashkuwāl speaks in his Ṣilat<sup>2</sup>.

1 Dhū 'l-Wizāratayn Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ja'far Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ḥājj al-Lūrqi (native of Lorca), a distinguished poet and prose-writer, belonged to an eminent family some members of which rose to the rank of wazīr. Addicted in his youth, to wine and pleasure, he afterwards reformed his life and passed the remainder of his days in asceticism and self-mortification. (Bughyah. Qal'id al-'Iqyān.) The date of his death is not given, but Ibn Khāqān, the author of the latter work, cites a piece of verse composed by him in the year 517 (A.C. 1123-4).

2 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Faraj Ibn Ghazlūn al-Yaḥsubī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-'Ammāl (العمال), was a native of Toledo, a learned traditionist, a grammarian, a philologist, and a poet. He gave lectures on the interpretation of the Qur'ān and these assemblies were numerously attended. He led a retired life, and succeeded Abu 'l-Walid al-Waqshī as qādī of Talavera. He died A.H. 487 (A.C. 1094), aged upwards of eighty years. (Ibn Bashkuwāl, in his Ṣilat.)

"Hasten the speed of your horses, inhabitants of Spain ! none can dwell in quiet there unless by chance. The beads (fortresses) drop off from the ends of its necklace, and soon, I think, the necklace of the peninsula will be broken in the middle. He who resides near evil should not think himself secure from its attacks ; how could a man live in a basket of snakes ? "

Al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād surpassed all the other kings in greatness of power and extent of empire, yet he also paid tribute to Alphonso. After capturing Toledo, the latter conceived hopes of getting that prince's kingdom into his possession, and therefore refused to receive the tribute. At the same time, he sent him a threatening message, ordering him to deliver up his fortresses ; on which condition, he might retain the open country as his own. These words provoked al-Mu'tamid to such a degree, that he struck the ambassador and put to death all those who accompanied him. Alphonso had set out with the intention of besieging Cordova when he received intelligence of this event, and he immediately returned to Toledo in order to provide machines necessary for the siege (of Seville). When the shaykhs of Islāmism and its doctors were informed of his projects, they assembled and said : "Behold how the Muslim cities fall into the hands of the Franks, whilst our sovereigns are engaged in warring against each other ! If things continue in this state, the Franks will subdue the entire country." They then went to the qādī (of cordova) 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Adham, and conferred with him on the disasters which had befallen the Muslims and on the means by which they might be remedied. Every person had something to say, but it was finally resolved that they should write to Abū Ya'qūb Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn, the king of the al-Mulaththimūn<sup>1</sup> and sovereign of Morocco, imploring his assistance. (We shall give the life of Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn).* The qādī then waited on al-Mu'tamid and 1 This word signifies the liṭhām wearers, and is frequently used to designate the Almoravides. The liṭhām is the piece of stuff worn by the inhabitants of the great African desert to protect their faces from the reflected heat of the sun. It covers the forehead, the cheeks, the extremity of the nose, the mouth, and the chin. It is still in use among the Tu-warigs.

* No. 817—Ed.

informed him of what had passed. Al-Mu'tamid concurred with them on the expediency of such an application, and told the qādī to bear the message himself to Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn. The qādī hesitated at first, but as the prince insisted, he retired, imploring of the Almighty that things might turn out well. Having then written to the sovereign of Morocco, acquainting him with what had taken place, he despatched the letter by one of his slaves. When Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn received this communication, he set out in all haste for Ceuta; and the qādī, with a numerous company, proceeded to the same place for the purpose of meeting that monarch and representing to him the situation of the Muslims. Yūsuf then gave orders that the army should be taken over to Algeziras, which is a city in the territory of Spain, whilst he himself remained at Ceuta, a city in the territory of Morocco and lying opposite to Algeziras. He recalled from (the city of) Morocco the troops which he had left there, and when all were assembled, he sent them across to Spain, and followed with a body of ten thousand men. Al-Mu'tamid, who had also assembled an army, went to meet him; and the Muslims, on hearing the news, hastened from every country for the purpose of combating the infidels. On receiving intelligence of these events, Alphonso, who was then at Toledo, took the field with forty thousand horse, exclusive of the other troops which came to join him. He wrote also a long and threatening letter to Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn, who inscribed on the back of it these words: What will happen thou shalt see! and returned it. On reading the answer, Alphonso was filled with apprehension, and observed that this was a man of resolution. The two armies then advanced and met at a place called al-Zallāqah, near the town of Baṭalyaws (Badajoz), where they formed in line. The Muslims gained the victory, and Alphonso fled with a few others, after witnessing the extermination of his troops. Some state that this engagement took place on a Friday, in one of the first ten days of the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 479, but the true date is the middle the 12th of Rajab of that year (23rd October, A.C. 1086). This year was adopted in Spain as the commencement of a new era, and was called the year of al-Zallāqah. The battle of al-Zallāqah is one of the most celebrated in history. Al-Mu'tamid on that day made a most firm resistance, and numerous wounds in his face and body attested his undaunted courage. The beasts of burden and the arms of the enemy fell into the hands of the Muslims. The amir Yūsuf (Ibn Tāshifīn) then returned to Africa, and al-Mu'tamid to his kingdom. The ensuing year, Yūsuf passed into Spain, and al-Mu'tamid having gone to meet him, he laid siege to a fortress (named Aledo and) belonging to the Franks, but was unable to take it. Having resumed his march, he went across to Granada, and 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bulukkin, the lord of that city, came out to receive him. 'Abd Allāh then re-entered Granada with the intention of sending the customary presents (to his powerful visitor) but Yūsuf penetrated perfidiously into the city, expelled 'Abd Allāh, and proceeded to the palace, where he found an immense quantity of money and treasures. After this exploit he returned to Morocco, his mind deeply impressed with the beauty of Sabin, its magnificence, its edifices, its gardens, the rich productions of its soil, and those various (sources of) riches which did not exist in Morocco, a country inhabited by (rude) Berbers and wild uncivilised Arabs. The persons whom he admitted into his intimate society then began to extol Spain in his presence, to represent to him the facility with which he might obtain possession of so fine a country, and to irritate him against al-Mu'tamid, by repeating things which, as they pretended, that prince had said. Yūsuf's feelings towards al-Mu'tamid thus underwent a complete change, and he at length marched against him. On arriving at Ceuta, he sent his army across to Spain and placed it under the orders of Sir Ibn Abi Bakr al-Andalusi<sup>1</sup>. This general (after achieving various conquests) reached Seville and besieged it vigorously. Al-Mu'tamid, who was then in the city, displayed the greatest firmness and bravery, encountering every danger with unheard-of courage. The inhabitants, overcome with consternation and filled with terror, wandered (in despair) through the streets; some escaped by swimming across the river, and others let themselves down from the battlements of the walls. At length, on Sunday, the 20th of Rajab, A.H. 484 (7th Sept. A.C. 1091), the army of the amir Yūsuf burst into the city, spread devastation

---

1 Sir Ibn Abi Bakr belonged to the Berber tribe of Limtūnah, I do not know why Ibn Khallikān calls him (al-Andalusi) (native of Spain).

through every quarter, and deprived the people of all they possessed. The inhabitants, concealing their nudity with their hands, fled from their houses, and al-Mu'tamid, with his family was taken prisoner. He had already lost two of his sons; one of them, al-Māmūn, commanded at Cordova as his father's lieutenant, but being besieged there (by the Almoravides) he was taken and executed. Al-Rāḍī, the other son met with a similar fate at al-Rundah, a strong fortress in which he also commanded as his father's lieutenant. Al-Mu'tamid composed a number of elegies on their death. This prince was no sooner made prisoner than they bound him in chains and embarked him with his family on board a ship. Ibn Khāqān (No. 500) says, in his Qalā'id al-'Iqyān, on coming to this part of (al-Mu'tamid's history): "Then he and his family were borne off in the lofty (masted) coursers (of the sea), enclosed therein as if they were dead; they for whom, (but a short time before) a palace was not sufficiently ample, and whose presence had given lustre to the age. The people assembled on the banks of the river, shedding tears as the clouds of morning (shed rain), and (the exiles) departed with lamentations to escort them, and the manifestation of general grief failed them not." Alluding to this event, Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Isa al-Dānī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Labbānah<sup>1</sup>, expressed his feelings in a long qaṣīdah, which we need not insert, and which begins thus :

"The heavens shed tears, evening and morning, over the noble princes, the son of 'Abbād.

Describing the same event, the Sicilian poet Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Ḥamdis (No. 371) composed a long piece of verse which contained these lines :

"When you left us and bore off in your hands generosity itself, whilst the mountains of your (power) were shaken to their

---

1 At the end of this article, Ibn Khallikān gives a note on Ibn al-Labbānah. See also (No. 371 n).

basis<sup>1</sup>, I raised my voice and exclaimed: The day of judgment has come! behold the firm mountains pass away<sup>2</sup>!"

The idea of this last verse is taken from the following lines composed by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz (No. 316) on the death of Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al al-Furāt (No. 462).

"The human race are now all on a level; perfection is dead and the vicissitudes of time exclaim: Where are the (great) men?<sup>3</sup> Behold Abu 'l-'Abbās on his bier! arise and see how the mountains are removed from their places."

It has been said that Ibn al-Mu'tazz recited these verses on the death of the wazīr Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Wahb, and this statement I have since found confirmed. Al-Mu'tamid pronounced the following verses one day, whilst suffering from the weight and tightness of his chains:

"For the shade of my once triumphant banners I have received in exchange the ignominy of fetters and the weight of chains. The irons which I once used were the pointed lance and the sharp, thin, and polished sword; but both are now turned into rusty (chains), grasping my leg as lions grasp their prey."

They then bore him to Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn, at Morocco, and that amīr sent him to Aghmāt and imprisoned him there for life. Ibn Khāqān says: "Torn from his country and stripped of his possessions, he was carried off in a ship and deposited on the (African) shore as a corpse is deposited in its place of burial; the pulpits of his (states) and the throne<sup>4</sup> deplored his absence, those who once visited his table or his bed of sickness went near 1 This is an allusion to the third verse of the 81st sūrah of the Qur'an, where Mu ammad mentions the signs which announce the approach of the day of judgment.

2 See (No. 371), where the same verses are given.

3 These verses are incorrectly rendered in No. 371.

4 The word اعواد signifies boards, and is elegantly employed in Arabic, to designate the pulpit. To avoid tautology, I have employed the word throne. It signifies also a bier.

him no more, he remained alone in his grief, uttering deep-drawn sighs and pouring forth tears as a conduit pours forth water; none were left to console him in his solitude, and, instead of the bowers (which he once frequented), he now saw nought but strangers. Deprived of consolation, hopeless of the approach (of friends), debarred from the aspect of joy, he called to mind his native abodes, and that thought made him long for home; he saw in imagination the splendour of his (court), and that image filled him with delight; his fancy showed him his dwelling laid desolate, the palace bewailing its (former) inhabitants, its heavens (extent) darkened by the absence of its full moons (beautiful women), and of its guards and the companions of his evening hours."

His imprisonment inspired Abū Bakr al-Dānī (Ibn al-Labbānah) with the celebrated qaṣīdah which begins thus:

"Each thing has its appointed hour; each wish, a time for its fulfilment. Fortune has been immersed in the dye of the camelion, and the colours of its various states are always changing. We are chessmen in the hands of fortunes, and sometimes the pawn may check the king<sup>1</sup>. Cast off the world and its inhabitants; the earth is now tenantless; men (worthy of the name) are dead. Tell the creatures who dwell here below, that the secret plan of Providence above is now concealed at Aghmāt."

This is a long poem, containing about fifty verses. In the year 485 (A.C. 1093) he (Ibn al-Labbānah) composed at Aghmāt the following piece on al-Mu'tamid's Imprisonment<sup>2</sup>:

"Smell this nosegay of salutations; by it I break the seal of that musk (condolence) from which thou hadst been precluded. Let me know indirectly, if thou canst not do it openly, that thou

---

1 The rhyme here obliges us to pronounce the word shāh as if it was written shat; this is a fault against the rules of versification. The observation is made by Ibn Kṛallikān in the text, but, as it interrupts the piece, I have placed it here.

2 In the Khariḍah, MS. No. 1375, fol. 183, the verses of this poem are given in another order, and part of them suppressed. The piece itself is very obscure, and I am by no means certain of having rendered its meaning correctly in some parts.

who gavest happiness to others canst yet taste of it thyself. When I think of those times which for thee passed over so brightly, the light of morning becomes darkness for me. I marvel how the milky way, on seeing thee, a sun, eclipsed, could ever rise again and shew its stars. Though our affliction for thy loss was great, we found thee a still greater affliction (for thy foes): a spear rushing to the charge till it was shivered, a sword dealing its blows till it was indented. The rain-cloud pouring down its showers wept for the family of 'Abbād, but equalled not (in abundance the gifts once bestowed by) Muḥammad and his sons. A friend dear to my heart wept for the family of 'Abbād: How dearly I love Ḥabīb<sup>1</sup> for these words: "Perhaps a (ship) appearing in the horizon may bring them near (to us); perhaps it may!<sup>1</sup> When their morning (their prescence) dawned upon us, we praised (our diligence in) travelling (even) by night (to reach their court); but since we have lost them, we travel in darkness. We once borrowed in the pasture ground of honour all around their park (empire) but now that pasture-ground is barren, and that park is deserted. Time hath clothed their dwelling with a raiment, the warp and woof of which are formed by the rains<sup>2</sup>. Their palaces are no longer inhabited; nought is seen therein but the fallow (deer) walking around the statues<sup>3</sup> still erect. The echo answers the screech-owl in those halls where the birds once sung responsive to the voice of the musician. It is now as if no human being had ever resided there; as if ambassadors had never found therein a crowded court; as if (hostile) troops had never found there an army (to repeal them)."

In the same piece the poet says:

"On departing from thy kingdom Thou wert like unto Mālik and I, through grief for thee, am like Mutammim<sup>4</sup>. (What) a 1 By Ḥabīb the poet means Abū Tammām (No. 143).

2 That is: the palace and the grounds about it are furrowed and cross-furrowed by torrents.

3 It is strange that a Muslim prince should have ornamented his gardens with statues in the human form.

4 See the life of Waṭḥimāh Ibn Mūsā (No. 742), and the Easai l' Histoire des Arabes, tome III.

misfortune (was yours)! it cast down the luminaries from their exalted sphere, and left not a mark to distinguish the region of beneficence. Oppressed by the narrowness of the earth, I think that I and it have been formed for each other as the bracelet is formed for the arm<sup>1</sup>. I have lamented thee so that grief hath left me neither tears nor blood to weep thy loss withal. I shall persevere in that course, and, if I die, I shall leave my conduct as an example for other mourners. For thee the rain wept, the wind tore open its bosom, and the thunder uttered thy name in its meanings; the lightning rent its robe, the day put on the raiment of mourning, and the stars of heaven formed an assembly to deplore thee. Thy son, the light of day, was bewildered with sorrow and swerved from its path; thy brother, the ocean, shrunk with indignation and swelled no more<sup>2</sup>. Since thy departure, the full moon hath never stationed within a halo, and the noontide sun hath never been seen to smile. God ordained that thou shouldst be dismounted from a bay and towering (steed) and be embarked in a black and unlucky (vessel.)”

In the following passage of the same poem, the poet alludes to the circumstance of al-Mu'tamid's chains having fallen off:

“Thy chains melted away and thou wert loose; thy chains were then more compassionate towards the generous than they. I marvelled that the iron should soften whilst their hearts remained hard; the iron knew better the secret intentions of Providence than they. He will deliver thee Who delivered Joseph from the well; He will protect the Who protected Jesus, the son of Mary.”

Ibn al-Labbānah composed a number of detached pieces and long qaṣīdahs, in which he lamented the (glorious) days of that family and the ruin of their power. These poems he collected in a small volume, to which he gave the title of Naẓm al-Sulūk fī Wa'z il-Mulūk (the string of beads, being an admonition to kings). He

1 The earth oppressing by its narrowness is a Qur'ānic expression to denote intense grief. As the poet takes this figurative expression in its literal sense, it is impossible to render his meaning clearly in another language.

2 The poet calls the day al-Mu'tamid's son on account of its splendour, and the ocean his brother because its waters were as copious as his beneficence.

visited al-Mu'tamid at Aghmāt with the intention of fulfilling a duty, not with the hope of obtaining a present, and it is stated that, when about to take leave, he received from the prince a present of twenty dinārs and a piece of Baghdād cloth, accompanied with a note containing these lines :

"Receive these precious objects from the hand of a captive ; if you accept them, you will be truly grateful. Accept (a trifle) from one who melts with shame to (offer) it, although poverty is his excuse."

These verses are only a part of the piece. Abū Bakr Ibn al-Labbānah here says : I sent this present back to him, being aware of his poverty and knowing that he had nothing left. I wrote to him at the same time the following answer to his note :

"Thou hast met with a man who knoweth what is honour ; leave me then in the ideas I have formed of thee. May I renounce the love I bear thee, and which forms half my soul, if the mantle which covers me ever discloses an impostor ! May I never be delivered from misfortune if I wrong a captive. Thou art Jadhīmah ; al-Zabbā deceived thee, and I shall not be less than Qaṣīr<sup>1</sup>. I journey forth but not with mercenary views ; God preserve me from motives so disgraceful ! I know thy merit better than thou dost thyself ; I have often enjoyed its shade in the ardent heat (of affliction). Thou wheelst about squadrons of noble deeds in the field of generosity, and out of little thou bestowest much. I wonder how thou art left in the darkness (of despair) whilst thou settest up beacons of light to guide the needy traveller. Have patience ! thou shalt hereafter overwhelm me with joy, when the time returns for thee to mount the throne ; thou shalt place me in an honourable rank, the morning of thy arrival at yonder palace. There thou shalt surpass Ibn Marwān in liberality, and I shall surpass Jarīr (in talent)<sup>2</sup> Prepare to rise again : the moon doth not remain eclipsed for ever."

---

1 See Pococke's Specimen Hist. Ar. p. 68 ; Fleischer's Historia Antei Islamica. p. 123 ; Rasmussen's Additamenta, p. 2 ; and Freytag's Meiduni tom. I. p. 424 ; especially the two last.

2 He means Jarīr the poet, who was a favourite with the Khalīf 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān. See No. 127.

One festival day, he received, in his prison, the visit of his daughters ; who were then gaining a livelihood at Aghmāt by spinning ; one of them was even employed as a spinner by the daughter of a person who had been in the service of her father and commanded the police guards when he was on the throne. Seeing them dressed in old tattered clothes, his heart was rent (with grief)<sup>1</sup> and he recited these verses (addressing them to himself) :

"In former times festivals made thee rejoice, but now, a prisoner in Aghmāt, a festival afflicts thee. Thou seest thy daughters hungry and in rags, spinning for hire and penniless. They went forth to salute thee, with down-cast eyes and broken hearts ; they walk barefoot in the mud, as if they had never trod (on floors strewed with) musk and camphor. Not a cheek (of theirs) but its surface complains of drought (miser), and is never watered but with sobs (and tears). Fortune was once obedient to thy command ; now it has reduced to obey the commands of others. He who, after thee, lives rejoicing in the exercise of power, lives in the mere delusion of a dream. "

Whilst in this (miserable) state, "with fetters enclosing his legs in a lion's grasp, encircling them as with the coils of black serpents, unable to stir his limbs, shedding not a single tear unmixed with blood, he, who had seen himself mounted on the pulpit and the throne, who (had lived) in the midst of silks and gardens, with standards waving over him. whilst the assemblies were enlightened by his presence"<sup>2</sup>, he received the visit of his son Abū Hāshim, and on perceiving him, he wept and recited these lines :

"O my chains ! see you not that I am resigned, and yet you shew neither pity nor compassion? My blood hath been your drink : my flesh you have devoured ; but do not break my bones. Abū Hāshim sees me in your grasp, and broken-hearted, he turns away his face. Pity a boy light of heart, who never supposed that he should have to implore your mercy. Pity his little sisters, whom

1 I translate thus, by conjecture, the words فصد عن قلبه

2 The phrase is borrowed from the notice on al-Mu'tamid by Ibn K'l āqān.

like him, you obliged to swallow the poisonous and bitter draught (of misery). One of them can comprehend in some degree (her situation), and I have sometimes feared that she would lose her sight from excessive weeping; the other comprehends nothing, and only opens her mouth to take the breast."

Whilst he was in this situation, a number of needy solicitors assembled in his room and assailed him with importunities. On this occasion, he pronounced the following lines:

"They ask a trifle from a prisoner; yet strange enough, I have greater cause to ask than they. Were it not for a feeling of shame and that hereditary pride<sup>1</sup> which imbues the inmost folds of my bosom, I should follow their example in begging."

The poems composed by al-Mu'tamid and those composed on him are very numerous. We have now passed our usual limits, but we were induced to lengthen this article because the like of so extraordinary a fate as his was never seen; our notice contains besides an account of his father and grandfather, and this contributed to extend it. Al-Mu'tamid was born in the month of the first Rabī', A. H. 431 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 1039); in Bājjah (Beja), a city of Spain. He succeeded to the throne on the death of his father, in the year already mentioned; he was deposed in the year which we have indicated (above), and he died in prison at Aghmāt, on the 11th of Shawwāl (16th October)—some say, of Dhu 'l-Hijjah A.H. 488 (11th December, A.C. 1095). At his internment, the crier called on the people to come to the funeral prayer about to be said over a stranger; singular fate of a once mighty and powerful prince! glory be to the Being Whose existence, power, and might endure for ever! A great number of the poets who had visited his court to celebrate his praises, and who had been generously rewarded by him, assembled round his grave, to weep and recite over it various long qaṣīdahs in which they lamented his death. One of them was Abū Baḥr 'Abd al-Ṣamad, his favorite poet, who then deplored his loss in a long and excellent qaṣīdah beginning thus :

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally: Lakḥmite pride. The 'Abbād family drew its descent from the progenitor of the tribe of Lakḥm.

“King of kings ! canst thou still hear, so that I may call on thee ? or doth a fatal misfortune prevent thee from hearing ? On quitting thy palace, in which I saw thee no longer as once I did on days of rejoicing, I came, in humble respect, to kiss this grave and make the tomb the place of my recitation. ”

On finishing, he kissed the grave, and rolled himself on the ground, and soiled his face with dust ; at this sight all the assembly burst into tears. It is related that after (al-Mu'tamid's) overthrow, a person dreamt that he saw a man mount the pulpit in the mosque of Cordova, turn towards the people and recite the following lines :

“How often have the caravans halted with the camels in the court of their glory, when it surpassed all rivalry ! During a time, misfortune addressed them not, but, when it spoke, it caused them to shed tears of blood. ”

Al-Mu'tamid had a grandson, who, in the days of their power, bore the surname of Fakhr al-Dawlah (glory of the empire), which, with that dynasty, was an imperial title. This boy, who was remarkably well looking, took to the trade of a goldsmith, and Abū Bakr al-Dānī (Ibn al-Labbānah) having seen him one day blowing the fire by means of a hollow reed, composed a qaṣīdah in which he introduced the following passage :

“Great is our affliction for thee, O Fakhr al-'Ulā (glory of exaltation), and great the misfortune for one whose rank was so high ! Time has placed around thy neck the tight collar of its vicissitudes ; yet how often didst thou place round ours the collar of thy beneficence ! The collar given thee in return (thou didst receive) in the shop of adversity, and yet thou once dwelledst in a palace like that of Iram<sup>1</sup>. Thou wieldest goldsmith's tools in that hand which only knew beneficence, the sword, and the pen ; a hand which I have often seen thee hold out to be kissed, and then the Pleiades aspired to become a mouth.<sup>1</sup> Artisan ! thou for whom high rank formed a brilliant ornament and who once was decked with sets of pearls ! the blowing of the trumpet (on the day of judgment) will create a consternation equalled only by that which I felt on seeing thee blowing coals. When I saw thee thus employed, I wished that, before it, my eyes had been afflicted with blindness. When fortune degraded thee from thy rank, it did not degrade thee, neither did it diminish thy noble qualities. Shine in honour ! shine as a star, if thou canst not as a moon ; rise in honour as a hill, if thou canst not as a mountain ! By Allāh were the stars just towards thee, they would eclipse their light, and were men's eyes faithful to thee, they would spend their tears. Thy story would make even the pearls weep, since they resemble thee in family, in words, and in smiles<sup>2</sup>.

---

<sup>1</sup> See an account of this fabulous city in Lane's translation of the Arabian Nights, vol. II, p. 342.

It is unnecessary to make further additions to this article. Lūrqi means belonging to Lūrqa (Lorca) a city in Spain. The author of the Khariḍah mentions the poet al-Lūrqi in that work, and states that he survived al-Mu'tamid many years ; he gives also numerous specimens of his poetry. Aghmāt is a town situated at a day's journey beyond Morocco ; it has produced many men distinguished for learning. As for Abū Bakr [Muḥammad Ibn 'Isā al-Dānī (native of Denia), surnamed] Ibn al-Labbānah, none of the works which I have consulted give the date of his death, and I never met with any person who knew it. I saw, however, in the Ḥamāsah composed by Abu 'l-Ḥajjāj Yūsuf al-Bayyāsī, a person of whom we shall again speak, that Ibn al-Labbānah arrived at Majorca. towards the end of the month of Ṣha'bān, A. H. 489 (August, A. C. 1096), and that he celebrated the praises of Mubashshir Ibn Sulaymān<sup>3</sup>, sovereign of that island, in a piece of verse commencing thus :

1 The meaning of the last hemistich is doubtful.

2 In the MS. the verse runs thus : The poet here indicates the points in which the young prince resembled pearls ; first, by his family, who were the pearls of the age ; secondly, by the elegance of his discourse, the expressions he made use of being the pearls of the language ; and thirdly, by his teeth, which appeared when he smiled, like two rows of pearls.

3 See Gayanjos's History of the Moḥammedan dynasties in Spain, vol. II, p. 258, and Appendix, p. XLII.

"A king who, when arrayed with jewels, strikes thee with admiration by his splendour, and whose magnificence gives lustre to the qualities of the age in which he lives."

Not finding any elegies of Ibn al-Labbānah on the death of al-Mu'tamid, I imagined that he had died before that prince; I then found al-Bayyāsī's statement, which, if true, proves the contrary.<sup>1</sup>

661 AL-MU'TAŠIM IBN ŠUMĀDIH

Abū Yaḥyā Muḥammad Ibn Ma'an Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Šumādiḥ, surnamed al-Mu'tašim al-Tujībī<sup>2</sup> was sovereign of al-Mariya (Almeria), Bajjānah (Pechina), and al-Šumādihiyah<sup>3</sup>, cities in Spain. His grandfather Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Šumādiḥ possessed the city and district of Huesca (Washqah) in the days of al-Muwayyad Ḥishām Ibn al-Ḥakam, the Umayyad prince of whom mention has been made in the life of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād (No. 660). Being attacked and defeated by his cousin Mundhir Ibn Yaḥyā al-Tujībī, and unable to resist the numerous troops of his adversary, he took to flight, and, having abandoned Huesca, he remained without the smallest tie to connect him with that city. (Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad) was endowed with judgment, acuteness, and eloquence, qualities in which none of the military chiefs of that time were his equals. His son Ma'an, the father of al-Mu'tašim, married the daughter of 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Abī 'Āmir, (al-Manšūr) the sovereign of 1 For a much more satisfactory account of these sovereigns see Mr. Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, vol. IV. Most of the pieces written by the Arabs on the 'Abbāside dynasty have been published by him in three volumes in 40, under the title of Scriptorum Arabum loci de Abbasis. I have profited by many of Mr. Dozy's observations.

2 Al-Mu'tašim al-Tujībī signifies the Mu'tašim of the tribe of Tujib. It appears that he was descended by that branch, from the Yamanite tribe of Kindah.

3 It appears from al-Maqqarī, who relates some anecdotes of Ibn Šumādiḥ's generosity, that the Šumādihiyah was a magnificent palace. For this portion of Spanish history see the fourth volume of Dozy's Musulmans d'Espagne.

Valencia, who subsequently, when Zuhayr, his father's mawlā who commanded at Almeria, lost his life, seized on that city, pretending that it belonged to a mawlā of his family<sup>1</sup>. This act excited the jealousy of Abu 'l-Jaysh Mujāhid Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-'Āmirī (No. 121, note), the sovereign of Denia, who immediately set out to invade the territory possessed by 'Abd al-'Azīz whilst the latter was engaged in taking possession of the heritage which Zuhayr had left. When 'Abd al-'Azīz heard of Mujāhid's march, he departed from Almeria in all haste with the intention of suing for peace, and left his son-in-law and wazīr, Ma'an Ibn Ṣumādīh, to govern that city as his lieutenant. Ma'an betrayed the confidence placed in him and, having declared himself independent, succeeded in establishing his authority, notwithstanding the universal reprobation which this act excited amongst the provincial kings who then ruled in Spain. On his death, the kingdom passed into the hands of his son al-Mu'taṣim. This prince, who had assumed one of the surnames special to khalīfs, was distinguished for hospitality, liberality, and aversion to bloodshed; the hopes of the needy were turned towards him, every mouth spoke his praise, visitors flocked to his court<sup>2</sup>, and eminent poets, such as Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥaddād and others, devoted their talents to his praise. Al-Mu'taṣim himself composed some good poetry, such as the following verses addressed by him in a letter to Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Ammār al-Andalusī (No. 643), complaining of his conduct :

"My knowledge of the world and long experience has estranged me from mankind. Never did fortune show me a friend who pleased me on a first acquaintance, but in the end he gave me motives of complaint; and never did I expect a friend's assistance against misfortune, but I found in him also another affliction."

To this Ibn 'Ammār replied in a long piece of verse which it is unnecessary to reproduce. Another of al-Mu'taṣim's pieces is the following :

"O thou whose absence hath afflicted my body with a sickness not to be cured but by thy return! My eyes and sleep are engaged in a warfare to which the battles of Şifî'n appear a trifle<sup>1</sup>. Though vicissitudes of time keep us separated, the ṭayf al-khiyāl<sup>2</sup>. may unite us."

1 See vol. III, Introduction.

2 Literally : And the caravans (or camels) were impelled unto his court.

It was from this passage that the Kātib Bahā al-Dīn Zuhayr Ibn Muḥammad (No. 231) took the idea expressed in the following verse of one of his poems :

"Since thy absence, my eyelids and slumber are at war."

Al-Mu'tamid* left a great number of other pieces besides these. Some splendid qaṣīdahs were composed in his praise by Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Khalaf Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Uḥmān Ibn Ibrāhīm, a native of Almeria, and generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Ḥadād al-Qaysī. One of these poems begins thus :

"Hast thou then walked on the bank of this blessed valley ? for the soil on which I tread smells like Indian ambergris. In the perfume which thou hast left I recognise the sweet odour which floated around those (whom I loved), and the gales of passion again spring up within my bosom. In my nocturnal journey, their fire and their beacon were my guides and conductors, when the stars were extinguished. By some such cause, my camels were excited, my Arabian steeds neighed, and the quickest (in the caravan) seemed to move too slowly. Were they urged on by the same motive as I was ? perhaps they took refuge in the ardour (which animated them) that they might escape from the fires of my heart. Slacken your speed, for this is the valley of (my beloved) Lubaynā ! this is the spot where I shall accomplish my wishes and quench the thirst which consumes me<sup>3</sup>. Fair is the abode of Lubnā's people ! fair the soil on which Lubnā trod ! In that land was the hippodrome of my passionate desires ; there, the field in which I gave career to my imagination ; there, my

1 The battle of Şifî'n was fought between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah in A. H. 37. The two parties remained in the field eleven months, and ninety conflicts or skirmishes took place between them.

2 See vol. I Introduction.

3 Literally : Certe (est) aquarium volorum meorum, et certe sum sitiens.

* It should be : He (al-Mu'tasim).— Ed.

love took its beginning and received its utmost height. Think not the maidens of that land (cruel and) ungrateful; those were hearts indeed which their bosoms contained; under their azure veils (was sheltered) well-protected honour, guarded by the azure points of watchful spears. Beauty, sent on her (divine) mission abolished the creed of indifference and made all men converts to the religion of love.

The same piece contains the following passages,

The space which extends between his two ear--rings (i. e. his face) excites the love of the brunettes whose necks are so graceful, and the languor of his eyes charms the large-eyed gazelles (maidens). In the sporting ground of (his) ringlets is a clear white (complexion) mixed with a bright red to complete its beauty.

Maiden, so prompt to wound with your treacherous glances! so insensible to love! you stood in fear of God, but the glance of your eyes was sinful. Your lovers are pierced with wounds; but their blood is floods of tears, and their eyes are the wounds. How can I endure thy sharp glances striking me to the heart, when no magician can close the gash left by that fatal steel? How can I expect to be cured of love? It is not all who suffer from sickness that are cured."

From this the poet makes a transition to the praises of his patron. It is a long and high-sounding qaṣīdah. Abu 'l-Qāsim al-As'ad Ibn Billīṭah<sup>1</sup>, another Spanish poet and one of the most eminent among them, celebrated al-Mu'taṣim's praises in a qaṣīdah rhyming in ʔ (b) which opened thus:

"At Rāmah<sup>2</sup> I received the visits of a fawn (a maiden) which at first had avoided me; in my dream, I caught it on the bank of the river, then it fled away. The fruits which love produced in the bosoms of men were its pasture, not the odoriferous and acid shrubs of the desert<sup>3</sup>."

1 Al-As'ad Ibn Billīṭah, a celebrated poet and a native of Cordova, died towards. A. H. 440 (A. C. 1048-9). (Bughyah.)

2 See No. 89, note.

3 Literally: Not the 'arār nor the khāmā. In the preceding line شمس seems to be a poetical license for شمس

In this poem he says :

"The black collyrium of darkness was dissolved by the tears of the dawn, and the morning light appeared like greyness in black hair. The darkness seemed like a host of Negroes (Zenj) taking to flight and pursued by (tawny) Copts sent after them by the morn.

In the same poem he introduces the following description of a cock :

"We might think that Anūshirwān had placed his crown on the animal's head, and that the hand of Māriyah had suspended ear-rings to his ears<sup>1</sup>. He has stolen the robe of the peacock, the handsomest part of his dress, and not content with that, he has stolen his mode of walking from the duck<sup>2</sup>."

In the same poem he says :

"The curve of the ringlet on her cheek might be taken for a nūn, (ن) and the black mole on that cheek represents the point<sup>3</sup>. In mien like a young page, she approached, and darkness had inscribed a line of black (literally : of civet) on the perfumed seal of her mouth. She came moistening her toothpick in the coolness (humidity) of her mouth, after imbuing her comb with the musk of her hair. And I said, in taunting her with the (languor) of her eyes and the beauty bestowed upon her dark red lips : 'O thou whose glances are unsteady, but not from intoxication ! since when did the glances of thy eyes drink wine ? I see the yellow toothpick<sup>4</sup> in thy red lips, and the green (dark) moustaches traced with musk (blackness). Methinks thou hast kissed a rainbow and its colours have been impressed upon thy dark lips."

1 Māriyah, the wife of the Ghassanid prince Abū Shammir, possessed a pair of ear-rings, each composed of a single pearl of immense value. See the proverbs on this subject Freytag's Maidani, tome I, p. 422. and Rasmussen's Additamenta, p. 52.

2 I am unable to assign any other meaning than this to the words حتى سبي البطا المشيعة البطا.

3 In this piece he describes a youth who had the appearance of a young girl, and whom he pretended to take for one.

4 Toothpicks in the south of Europe are made of olive wood, which is yellow.

This poem contains the following eulogistic passage :

"(The rains fall in torrents) as if poured forth by (the beneficence of) Abū Yaḥyā, the son of Ma'an and as if his hand had taught the clouds to shower forth abundance. His lineage is composed of pearls and beads of gold, and renown bears it as a collar round her neck. When he marches forth, glory marches under his standard, and glory takes its station only where he sojourns. At night, he rears a pillar of fire to guide nocturnal travellers, and the camel, arriving unexpectedly, stumbles no more through the shades of darkness. I say to the caravans which seek the spot where the rains of generosity are wont to fall, when its riders have passed the desert which separated them from thee : 'Do you seek a rival to Ibn Ma'an in glory? He who lights a candle in sunshine is much mistaken!'"

This is a long qaṣīdah, containing about ninety verses, the poet has displayed great skill in its versification when we consider the difficulties attending the peculiar rhyme which he adopted. When the amīr Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn passed into Spain, he treated al-Mu'taṣim with more benevolence than he shewed towards the other provincial Kings; he even received him into his intimacy; but, when al-Mu'tamid (No. 660) openly resisted Yūsuf, whose mind had been turned against him, al-Mu'taṣim sided with the former and repudiated the authority of the African monarch. The amīr Yūsuf, on his return to Spain, resolved to dethrone and imprison them both, a circumstance to which Ibn Bassām (No. 439, note) alludes in the following passage of his Dhakhīrah : "Some secret (agreement) must have existed between al-Mu'taṣim and God, or else some meritorious act must have preceded his death, for, a few days only before the great catastrophe happened, he died in the exercise of power, still possessing his native city and surrounded by his family and children. I have been informed by a person whose statement I can have no motive to reject, that Arwā, an aged concubine of al-Mu'taṣim's father, made him the following relation : 'Truly, I was near him whilst he was giving his last injunctions, and he had almost lost the power of his hands and his tongue. The camp of the amīr of the Muslims'—she meant Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn—'was then so near that we might count his tents and hear the confused cries of the soldiers when any thing remarkable occurred. Al-Mu'taṣim then said: 'There is no god but God! we have been troubled in all things and even in dying.' 'On this, said Arwā, my tears began to flow, and I shall never forget the look he gave me, as he lifted up his eyes and repeated with a voice so feeble as hardly to be heard:

'Spare thy tears! spend them not! a time of long weeping awaits thee!' "

Muḥammad Ibn Ayyūb al-Anṣārī composed a work in the year 568 (A.C. 1172-3), for the sultān al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (Saladin); it contains a notice on al-Mu'taṣim Ibn Ṣumādīḥ, in which he says after giving a sketch of his history, some passage of his poetry, an account of the siege he had to sustain, and mentioning his words: We have been troubled in all things and even in dying. "He died soon after, at Almeria, on Thursday, the 22nd of the first Rabi', A.H. 484 (14th May, A.C. 1091); towards the hour of sunrise, and was interred at the Bāb al-Khawḥah (the gate with the wicket), in a mausoleum erected to receive him." Ṣumādīḥ signifies strong. Billīṭah, the name of Abu 'l-Qāsim al-As'ad's father, is a word of which I do not know the signification; it belongs to the language of the Spanish Christians (A'ājim)<sup>1</sup>. Of Tujib we have already spoken (No. 147). Bajjānah * (Pechina) is the name of a town in Spain. Al-Mariyah (Almeria) has been already mentioned (No. 18). Al-Ṣumadīḥiyah was so named after the Ṣumādīḥ of whom we have spoken. Washqah (Huesca) is a town in Spain.

662 THE MAHDĪ IBN TŪMART

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Tūmart al-Harghī, styled al-Mahdī<sup>2</sup>, the chief of the call<sup>3</sup> made in Maghrib

1 Bellido, in Spanish, signifies handsome; billete means a billet or note.

2 The meaning of this title is explained in No. 533. See also my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Prolegomena, in the Nocices et Extraits, t. xx, premiere partie, p. 53. My translation of the same author's History of the Berbers, t. II, p. 161, et seq may also be consulted.

3 See No. 194, note. and No. 524, note.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Bajjāyah.—Ed.

in favour of 'Abd al-Mūmin Ibn 'Alī (No. 383)—see some particulars respecting him in the life of the latter—was stated to be a descendant of al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib. I here copy textually a note which I found inscribed on the cover of the treatise on patronymics (Kitāb al-Nisab) attributed to al-Sharīf al-Ābid, which note is in the handwriting of some literary man of the present age: Muḥammad (Ibn Tūmart was) the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Hūd Ibn Khālid Ibn Tammām Ibn 'Adnān Ibn Ṣafwān Ibn Sufyān Ibn Jābir Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn 'Aṭā Ibn Rabāḥ Ibn Yasār Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib. God best knows how far this statement may be true<sup>1</sup>. He belonged to Jabal al-Sūs (the mountain of al-Sūs) in the farthest part of Maghrib, and there he passed his early years. When a youth, he travelled to the East for the purpose of acquiring learning, and, on his arrival in 'Irāq, he met Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī (No. 562), al-Kiyā al-Harrāsī (No. 405), al-Ṭurṭūshī (No. 579), and other masters. Having made the pilgrimage, he remained, for a time, at Makkah, and attained a very fair knowledge of the law, the Traditions of Muḥammad, and the fundamental principles of jurisprudence and religion<sup>2</sup>. Pious and devout, he lived in squalid

---

1 Ibn Khaldūn admits as correct a genealogy by which Ibn Tūmart is made to descend from 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib by Sulaymān, the brother of Idris, the progenitor of the Idrisids. Though Ibn Tūmart belonged to the Berber tribe of Harġhah, he was not a member of it by descent, but by a matrimonial alliance contracted by one of his ancestors. Ibn Khaldūn observes that this was also the case with some of the descendants of Idris.

2 Having examined the collection of treatises composed by Ibn Tūmart, I can bear testimony to the correctness with which his talents are here appreciated. These treatises form a small but closely-written volume, transcribed, as the post-scriptum informs us, in the month of Ṣha'bān, A. H. 579 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 1183), fifty-five years after the author's death. This MS. is in the bibliothèque imperiale supplement. The doctrines taught by al-Mahdī bore a great resemblance to those of al-Aṣḥ'arī; like him, he had recourse to tāwīl, or allegorical interpretation, in explaining certain verses of the Qur'ān which, if taken in their literal sense, would have led to anthropomorphism, a belief which he accused the Almoravides of professing. His doctrines were orthodox, one single point excepted and which he borrowed from the Shī'ites; namely, that the true imām, or spiritual and temporal chief, of the Muslims was impeccable (muṣṣim). He particularly insisted on the belief in the unity poverty, subsisting on the coarsest fare and attired in rags; he generally went with downcast eyes; smiling whenever he looked a person in the face, and ever manifesting his propensity for the practices of devotion. He carried with him no other worldly goods than a staff and a skin for holding water; his courage was great; he spoke correctly the Arabic and the Maghrib (Berber) languages; he blamed with extreme severity the conduct of those who transgressed the divine law, and not content with obeying God's commandments, he laboured to enforce their strict observance<sup>1</sup>; an occupation in which he took such pleasure that he seemed to have been naturally formed for it, and he suffered with patience the vexations to which it exposed him. The ill usage which he incurred at Makkah by his zeal obliged him to pass into Egypt, and having expressed the highest disapprobation of the culpable proceedings which he witnessed there, the people treated him in the roughest manner, and the government drove him out of the country. When he saw himself in danger of personal violence and chastisement, his discourse became incoherent, and this circumstance was considered as a proof of his insanity. On quitting Cairo, he proceeded to Alexandria and embarked for his native country. When in the East, he dreamed that he had drunk up the sea at two different times<sup>2</sup>. He was no sooner on board the vessel than he began to reform the profane conduct of the crew, obliging them to say their prayers at the regular hours and to read (each time) a portion of the Qur'ân. In this occupation he persevered till his arrival at al-Mahdiyyah, a city of Ifriqiyah, which was then, A. H. 505 (A. C. 1111-2) under the rule of the amir Yaḥyā Ibn Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs al-Ṣunhāji. So I find it stated in the History of

(Continued on page 77)

---

(Continued from page 76)

of God (tawḥīd), and for this reason he gave his disciples the name of al-Muwahhīdīn (professors of the unity). This denomination has given rise to the word Almohades of European writers.

1 Every Muslim is obliged by his religion to maintain, by his example and exhortations, the strict observance of the law. He cannot employ constraint to effect his purpose, that faculty being reserved for the qāḍī, the governor, and the police magistrate.

2 According to the most approved treatises on the oneirocritic science, a branch of knowledge still sedulously cultivated by the Muslims, drinking up the sea means, the acquisition of a great empire.

Qayrawān; I have mentioned, however, in the life of Tamīm, Yaḥyā's father (No. 123), that it was under Tamīm's reign that Ibn Tūmart passed through Ifrīqiyah on his return from the East, and so also have I found it written. God best knows which of these accounts is right; Ibn Tūmart did not make two journeys to the East, so we cannot suppose that he returned twice, and if he came back in the year 505, as we have just mentioned, it must have been during the reign of the amīr Yaḥyā; for Tamīm, Yaḥyā's father, died in 501, as we have already said in his life. I notice this contradiction, lest the reader should suppose that it escaped my attention. In the historical work drawn up in the form of annals by al-Qāḍī 'l-Akrām Ibn al-Qifṭī, the wazīr of Aleppo (No. 510, note), we find the following passage: "In this year,"—that is, towards the close of 511—"Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart left Egypt in the dress of a jurisconsult, after having pursued his studies there and in other countries, and he arrived at Bijāyah (Bugia)."<sup>1</sup> God knows who is in the right!! On arriving at al-Mahdiyyah, he took up his abode in a mosque built over vaulted chambers<sup>2</sup>, and situated on the road-side; there he used to sit at a window, watching those who passed by, and, whenever he perceived any thing reprehensible, such as musical instruments or vessels containing wine, he never failed to go down and break them. When the people of the city heard of his conduct, they went to see him and read over treatises on the principles of religion under his tuition. The amīr Yaḥyā being informed of these proceedings, assembled a number of jurisconsults, and caused Ibn Tūmart to be brought before him. Struck with his appearance and discourse, the prince showed him the highest respect and requested the holy man to offer up a prayer in his favour. "May God direct thee," said Ibn Tūmart, "for the welfare of thy subjects!" A few days after this he departed from 1 Ibn Khaldūn says that al-Mahdī landed at Tripoli and proceeded to Bugia, which was then (A. H. 512) under the rule of al-'Azīz Ibn al-Manṣūr, who expelled him from the city. It appears from the sequel of Ibn Khallikān's relation that he had previously visited al-Mahdiyyah. Al-Nuwayrī says that Ibn Tūmart arrived at al-Mahdiyyah, from Tripoli, in the reign of 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā.

2 The meaning of the word mu'allaqah is thus explained by M. de Sacy in his Abd-Allatif, page 482.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Muḥallaq.—Ed.

al-Mahdiyyah and proceeded to Bugia, where he passed some time in his usual occupation of reproving acts contrary to religion. Being expelled from the city, he went to Mallāiah, a village in the neighbourhood<sup>1</sup>, and there met 'Abd al-Mūmin Ibn 'Alī 'I-Qaysī (No. 383). I have read in the work entitled : Kitāb al-Maghrib 'an Sīrat Mulūk al-Maghrib<sup>2</sup> that Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart had studied the Kitāb al-Jafr<sup>3</sup>, a work containing one of those (mysterious) sciences with which the People of the House (the decendants of 'Alī) alone are acquainted, and that he found therein the description of a man descended from the Prophet, who was to appear in a country of al-Mghrib al-Aqṣā called al-Sūs, and invite the people to the service of God ; that person was to dwell and be buried at a place the name of which was spelt with these letters, T, I, N, M, L ; his authority was to be supported and established by a man of his disciples, the letters of whose names were A, B, D, M, U, M, N, and that this was to happen subsequently to the fifth century of the Hijrah. God then put it into his head that he was the person destined for this undertaking, and that the time of its accomplishment was at hand ; therefore, wherever he passed, he made inquiries respecting the person who was to support his cause ; asking the name of every individual whom he saw and examining his appearance, for he had with him 'Abd al-Mūmin's description. Journeying on his way, he passed by a youth answering the indications, and said : "What is thy name, my boy ?" The other replied : " 'Abd al-Mūmin." On hearing these words, he turned

1 The village of Mallālah lies at the distance of three miles or four S. W. of Bugia.

2 This title signifies : the relator of extraordinary things concerning the history of the kings of Maghrib. I suspect this to be the same work which is cited lower down under the title of Kitāb al-Maghrib, etc. (the relator of extraordinary things concerning the honorable characteristics of the people of Maghrib), and in which the historian and geographer Abu 'I-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Ḡharnāfi (native of Granada), generally known by the appellation of Ibn Sa'īd, gives a series of biographical notices on the eminent men of Spain and North Africa. Ibn Sa'īd was born A. H. 610 (A. C. 1214), and he died at Tunis A. H. 685 (A. C. 1286-7). M. De Gayangos has inserted a note on Ibn Sa'īd in the first volume of his Mohammedan Dynasties in Spain. Ḥājji Khalifah places Ibn Sa'īd's death in the year 673 (A. C. 1274-5).

3 See No. 383 and Ibn Khaldūn's Prolegomena, tome II, pp. 215, 224.

back to him and said : "God is great ! thou art the person whom I seek !" He then examined his features, and, finding them to correspond with the description he had with him, he said : "To what people dost thou belong ?" 'Abd al-Mūmin answered : "To the Kūmīyah." Wither art thou going ?" "To the East." "With what intention ?"—"To acquire knowledge." "Well !" said Ibn Tūmart, "knowledge thou hast found, and glory moreover, and renown ; be my disciple and thou shalt obtain them." 'Abd al-Mūmin accepted his proposal, and Muḥammad (Ibn Tūmart) then explained to him his project and confided to him his secret. He communicated also his design to a man called 'Abd Allāh al-Wanṣharīsī*, who had become his disciple, and he obtained his full consent to the undertaking. Al-Wanṣharīsī had studied jurisprudence and learned the substance of various works<sup>1</sup> ; he was handsome in person, and spoke with elegance the language of the Arabs and that of the natives of Maghrib. As he and Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart were one day conversing on the means by which their project might be accomplished, the latter said to him : "My opinion is, that you conceal from the people your learning and eloquence, and that you manifest such incapacity, such incorrectness of language, such mean abilities and such a want of talent as may render your name notorious ; we shall then represent as a miracle, when we require one, the suddenness with which you quit your assumed character and become possessed of learning and eloquence ; then, every word you say will be believed." Al-Wanṣharīsī acted accordingly. Muḥammad (Ibn Tūmart) then got about him some Maghribis remarkable for bodily strength, but grossly ignorant ; preferring such persons to men of intelligence and penetration. They were six in number, and, being accompanied by them and by al-Wanṣharīsī, he set out for the farthest extremity of Maghrib. 'Abd al-Mūmin then joined him and the whole party took the road to Morocco. Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the sovereign of that city, was the son of Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifīn, the same of whom we have spoken in the lives of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād (No. 660) and al-Mu'taṣim Ibn Ṣumādīh (No. 661). He was a powerful prince, mild, devout, just, and humble (before God), and he had then at his court a learned and pious native of Spain called Mālik Ibn Wuḥayb (No. 421, note). Muḥammad began, as usual, to express his disapprobation of what he witnessed, and even dared to reprimand the daughter of the king. The particulars of this last adventure are too long to be related here<sup>1</sup>. The king, being informed of his conduct, and learning he talked of reforming the state, spoke to Mālik Ibn Wuḥayb on the subject, and received this reply: "We should be afraid of opening a door which we shall find difficulty in shutting again; we had best cite this fellow and his companions before an assembly of jurisconsults belonging to the city, and hear what they have to say." The King approved of his counsel and sent for Muḥammad and his disciples, who were then sojourning in a ruined mosque outside the town. When they entered the hall of audience, the king said to his jurisconsults: "Ask this man what he wants with us," and Muḥammad Ibn Aswad, the qāḍī of Almeria, obeyed and said: "What are those discourses which thou art said to hold relative to the just and merciful king who is so submissive to the (doctrines of) truth and who prefers being obedient towards God to the following of his passions?" To this Muḥammad replied: "The discourses spoken of I did hold, and I have yet more to make; as for thy words, that the king prefers being obedient towards God to the following of his passions, and that he is submissive to the truth, the moment is now come to put them to the test. It shall then be known, if he possess not the qualities you mention, that he is led astray by the discourses and flattery which you address to him, though you are well aware that their refutation is at hand. Hast thou been informed, O qādl ! that wine is sold here publicly ? that swine run about in the midst of the Muslims ? that the property of the orphan is seized upon ?" He proceeded in this manner with a long enumeration, and the king was so deeply affected that he shed tears and hung down his head with shame. The persons present perceived from the drift of this discourse that the speaker aspired to the possession of the kingdom, but, remarking that the king remained silent and had evidently been imposed on by Ibn Tūmart's words, they abstained from making any reply. At length Mālik Ibn Wuhayb, who could take great liberties with the king, addressed him in these terms : "O king ! I have an advice to give, which, if you accept it, will have the most satisfactory results, whilst its rejection will expose you to great danger." "Let me hear it," said the king. "I am afraid," said Ibn Wuhayb, "that this man will do you harm, and my advice is that you imprison him and his companions and assign to them for their support the daily sum of one ḍinār. This will secure you from his evil intentions ; and, if you refuse doing so, he will cost you all the money in your treasury, and your indulgence will have profited you nothing." The king approved the counsel, but his wazīr said : "It would be shameful for you, after having wept at the exhortations of this man, to treat him ill in the same sitting, and disgraceful for you who possess so great a kingdom to stand in dread of a man who does not possess where-withal to appease his hunger." The king, whose pride was excited by these words, declared Ibn Tūmart's proceedings unworthy of attention, and dismissed him after asking his prayers. The author of the work entitled Kitāb al-Mughrib fī Akhbār Ahl al-Maghrib, says : "Ibn Tūmart, whilst retiring from the king's presence, kept his face turned towards him till he reached the door, and some persons having said to him : 'We see that thou showest respect to the king in not turning thy back to him' ; he replied : 'My intention was to watch vanity as long as I could, until the time come that I may change it.'" On leaving the king's presence, Muḥammad said to his companions : "We cannot possibly remain at Morocco whilst Mālik Ibn Wuhayb is there ; he is capable of bringing our business again before the king, and subjecting us to ill usage. But we have, in the city of Aghmāt, a brother in God ; let us go to him, and his good advice and prayers shall not fail us." This man, whose name was 'Abd al-Ḥaqq Ibn Ibrāhīm, was a jurisconsult to (one of) the Maṣmūdah tribes. They set out to find him, and, having stopped at his house, Muḥammad told him who they were, and informed him of their design and of what had passed between them and the king. 'Abd al-Ḥaqq replied : "This place cannot protect you, but one of the strongest holds in the neighbourhood is the town of Tin-Mall ; it lies in this mountain, at the distance of a day's journey. You may remain there in retirement till all recollection of your proceedings has passed away." The mention of this name recalled to Ibn Tūmart's memory the name of the place which he had seen in the Jafr, and he immediately proceeded thither with his companions. When the inhabitants saw them arrive in that state and learned that they were students in pursuit of knowledge, they stood up to give them an honourable reception and a friendly welcome, lodging them in the best rooms of their dwellings. After their departure from Morocco, the king asked about them and learned with satisfaction that they had left the city : "We have escaped," said he, "the sin of putting them in prison." When the mountaineers were told that Muḥammad, he of whom they had already heard so much, was arrived among them they came unto him from every deep valley<sup>1</sup>, thinking that, in going to see him, they should obtain the divine favour. Every person that came, he took apart, and discovered to him his intention of revolting against the king ; if the visitor promised to assist him, he admitted him into the number of his partisans ; if he refused, he turned away from him. He sought particularly to gain over the young and inexperienced ; but as the more prudent and intelligent advised them to avoid him, and warned them not to become his followers lest they should incur the vengeance of the king, his efforts were useless. Whilst thus engaged, time passed away ; he began to fear that death might surprise him before the accomplishment of his purpose ; he dreaded lest an order from the king might oblige the people to deliver him up and abandon him.

1 The word تهذيب means : To extract the essential part of a thing. It seems employed here to denote that he had not attained that degree of proficiency which would enable him to repeat from memory the entire contents of the works which he had studied ; in fact, that he was still a mere scholar.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd : gives Wanṣharīshī—Ed.

---

1 According to Ibn al-Aṭhīr, the Almoravides, the rulers of Morocco at that period, differed from the other Muslims in one remarkable particular; the men wore a veil (liḥām) and their women wore none. Al-Mahdī met the sister (not the daughter) of the king, taking a ride and accompanied by a numerous train of handsome female slaves, all mounted. The reformer was scandalised at this spectacle, and ordered them to cover their faces; he and his companions even dared to strike their horses, in consequence of which the princess was thrown off. She complained of this to her brother, who ordered al-Mahdī to be brought before him. The rest of the narration is given by Ibn Khallikān.

---

<sup>1</sup> Qur'an, sūrah 22, verse 28.

These considerations induced him to have recourse to stratagem in order to forward the affair in which he had engaged them, and he laid a plan for pushing them to rebellion. Having remarked that some of their children had rosy cheeks and blue eyes, although the fathers were of a tawny complexion and black-eyed, he asked them the reason. They at first refused to answer, but yielding at length to his urgent request, they said: "We are subjects of this king, and pay him a tax (kharāj); therefore, every year, his mamlūks<sup>1</sup> come up to us (to receive it), and they lodged in our houses after turning us out; there they remain alone with our women, who, in consequence, bear children of that complexion. This treatment we have no means of resisting." "By Allāh!" exclaimed Muḥammad, "death were preferable to a life such as that; how can you consent to such a disgrace, you who are the best swordsmen and spearmen that God ever created?" "We do not consent to it," was the reply; "it is done against our will." "Well," said Muḥammad, "answer me; if a person offered to help you against your enemies, what would you do?" "We would march before him even to our death; who is he?" "Your guest," replied Muḥammad, meaning himself.—"We engage to hear and obey him", answered the people. From that moment, they treated him with extreme respect and bound themselves to him by pacts and engagements, so that his heart was tranquillised. He then said to them: "Prepare your arms for the coming of these fellows, and, on their arrival, let them pursue their usual course; leave them and the women together, serve them with wine, and when they are drunk, let me know." When the mamlūks came, the people of the mountain treated them as Muḥammad advised, and, the night having set in, they informed him of what had been done. He immediately ordered them to slay them all, and the first hour of the night had not passed over when they were exterminated. Only one mamlūk escaped; he had gone out on some necessary occasion, and, hearing the cries of Allāh akbar (God is great) and the noise of the attack, he fled in avoiding the beaten path and succeeded in getting out of the mountain and reaching Morocco. When the king was informed of what had happened, he repented of having suffered Muḥammad to escape, and felt that the advice given him by Mālik Ibn Wuhayb was the result of foresight and prudence. He immediately despatched an army large enough to fill up such a narrow pass as that of Tin-Mall; but Muḥammad, convinced that troops would be sent against the insurgents, called some of the neighbouring (tribes) to his assistance and posted the people of the mountain in the defiles of the valley and on the heights by which it was commanded. As the cavalry advanced, showers of stones were poured down upon them from every side, and the defence was sustained in this manner from morning till night. The approach of darkness put an end to the combat, and the army returned to the king and acquainted him with what they had suffered. The king, perceiving his inability to subdue the rebels in their stronghold, turned his attention from them and Muḥammad, who had foreseen this result won the devoted attachment of the mountaineers. He then called al-Wanṣharīsī and said to him: "Now is the time to display thy talents all at once; that will serve us as a miraculous sign whereby we shall gain the hearts of those who have not acknowledged our authority." Having concerted together, it was agreed on that al-Wanṣharīsī should say the morning prayer, and that, after having so long stammered out his ideas in a language full of barbarisms, he should say, in a clear and intelligible voice: "I dreamt yesterday that two angels came down from heaven and split open my heart and washed it, and filled it with science and wisdom and the Qur'ān<sup>1</sup>". The next morning he did so; and we shall only state, without entering into particulars, that even the most stubborn yielded, and all were struck with amazement at 1 In the latter part of this passage, the author has passed from the first to the third person. This is a negligence readily pardoned by Arabian critics, as frequent examples of it are found in the Qur'ān. They observe that, in such cases, the ḥikāyah passes into ikhbār, or, in other words, that the literal reproduction of a conversation or discourse passes into a mere account given of the same discourse. In the former case the speakers utter their sentiments in the first person, and, in the latter, they are made to speak in the third.

---

<sup>1</sup> These mamlūks were natives of Spain. The Almoravides, the Almohades, and the Merīnides always kept in their capital a troop of four or five thousand Christians.

---

his learning by heart the Qur'ān in a dream. Muḥammad then said to him : "Tell us quickly the heavenly news ; are we destined to eternal happiness or everlasting misery?" Al-Wanṣharīsī replied : "As for thee, thou art the Mahdī, the maintainer (qā'im) of the cause of God ; whosoever followeth thee shall be saved, and whosoever resisteth thee shall perish." He then said : "Present thy followers unto me, in order that I may separate those who are destined for paradise from those who are destined for hell." He thus executed a stratagem by means of which all those who resisted Muḥammad were to be put to death ; but the narration of these proceedings would lead us too far<sup>1</sup>. His object was, not to leave in the mountain a single adversary to Muḥammad. When these people were slain, Muḥammad perceived that those among the survivors who had thus lost relations or (a part of their) family were by no means satisfied ; he therefore assembled them and announced that the kingdom of the sovereign of Morocco would pass into their hands and that the wealth of the enemy would become their prey. On hearing these words, they were much rejoiced and they ceased to regret the loss of their relatives. The details of these events are abundant but they do not enter into our subject. We shall only state, in a summary manner, that Muḥammad never relaxed his efforts till he sent forth an army of ten thousand men, horse and foot, with 'Abd al-Mūmin, al-Wanṣharīsī, and all his other disciples, whilst he remained in the mountain. These troops besieged Morocco for the space of a month, but they then met with a most disgraceful

---

1 Ibn Tūmart having remarked that a number of profligate and wicked men inhabited the mountain, he assembled the chiefs of the tribes and ordered them to exhort such persons to amend their lives, and to take down the names of those who refused. Having received these lists, Ibn Tūmart caused a second and a third warning to be given to the obstinate. He then selected out of the lists the names of the persons whom he disliked, and gave them to al-Wanṣharīsī, directing him to pass the tribes in review and to place those people on his left hand. This operation being terminated, al-Mahdī said : "Behold a set of reprobates whom it is a duty to put to death." The people hastened to execute this sentence, each tribe slaying the individuals who belonged to it. That day was ever afterwards called : Yawm al-Tamyīz (the day of the discrimination).—(Ibn al-Aṭḥīr, Kāmil al-Tawārīkh, year 514) defeat, and 'Abd al-Mūmin took a flight with the survivors. In this engagement, al-Wansharīsī lost his life. Muḥammad was in the mountain when he received the news, and he died before his partisans returned<sup>1</sup>; but, in his last moments, he enjoined the persons present to inform them that victory and complete success awaited them; wherefore they should not despond, but renew the fight; God would enable their hands to achieve a signal triumph; the vicissitudes of war were alternate; his followers would be now strong and now weak, now numerous and now few; their power was only commencing, whilst that of their enemies was drawing to a close. He continued a long series of injunctions in the same style, and then expired. This event took place A. H. 524 (A. C. 1130). He was buried in the mountain, and his tomb is still a well-known object of pilgrimage. His followers designate this year as the 'ām al-Baḥīrah<sup>2</sup>. He was born on the festival of 'Āshūrāh (10th of Muḥarram), A. H. 485 (21st Feb., A. C. 1092). The first time he made his appearance to call the people to his cause was in the year 514 (A. C. 1120). He was a man of middle size and slight form; his complexion was tawny, his head large, and his eyes piercing. The author of the Kitāb al-Mughrib says respecting him: "The traces which he has left acquaint thee with his history as plainly as if thou sawest him with thy eyes:

His foot was on the earth, but his mind towered to the Pleiades!

His soul preferred shedding the water of life (his own blood) to shedding the water of the face (doing a degrading act). The Almoravides saw him with indifference stop and settle (in their country), and they allowed him to steal forward as the dawn steals upon the darkness, and to leave the world filled with the sound (of his renown). He laid the basis of an empire which would have obliged Abū Muslim (No. 347), had he seen it, to acknowledge the foresight of its founder. He subsisted on what his sister earned by spinning: a biscuit each day with a little butter or oil sufficed him, nor did he abandon this simple nourishment when he abounded in worldly wealth. Remarking, one day, that the minds of his followers were turned towards the ample booty which they had obtained, he ordered all the spoil to be heaped together and burnt. 'Whoever follows me,' said he, 'for worldly goods shall have nothing from me but what he sees there, and whoever follows me for the recompense of the next world shall find his reward with God.' Though plain in his dress and affable in his manners, he inspired a profound respect; he was of difficult access except for persons who came to complain of oppression, and he had a man whose duty was to wait on him and give admittance to visitors." Ibn Tūmart left some poetry of which we may notice the following passage :

---

1 He died four months after their defeat.—(Ibn Khaldūn.)

2 Al-Nuwayrī informs us that, at the siege of Morocco, the Almohades, on finding themselves attacked by superior numbers, retreated to the wall of a large garden called al-Baḥīrah (the Kitchen garden), and leaning their backs against it, they fought desperately till night put an end to the combat. "And this battle," adds the historian, "was called the battle of al-Baḥīrah, and the year of al-Baḥīrah ('ām al-Baḥīrah)."

"When these people were far off, you lent them your assistance, and when they bade thee farewell, they left thee (with indifference). How often did you forbid them (to sin) and were not obeyed; how often did you give admonitions, yet you were not heeded. Whetstone (of others' wit)! how long will you sharpen steel, and never receive a cutting edge yourself?"

He frequently repeated the following lines :

"Strip thyself of the world (and its passions); for naked thou camest into the world."

And he often applied to himself these verses of al-Mutanabbī's :

"When you strive after glory much-desired, cease not to aspire until you reach the stars. In a mean and in a noble undertaking, the taste of death is quite the same."

The two following passages of the same poet were often repeated by him :

"He who knows the times and mankind as well as I do, should quench without remorse his lance's thirst for blood. He would meet no mercy from them if they got him in their power; to hurl destruction on them is not then a crime.

I become not one of them by living among them ; sandy earth is the gangue in which gold is found."

Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart did not make any conquests ; he laid the foundations of the enterprise, organised and established it, but the conquests were achieved by 'Abd al-Mūmin. Harghī means belonging to Harghah, which is a large tribe of the Mašmūdah (Berbers), who occupy the mountain of al-Sūs in the farthest extremity of Maghrib<sup>1</sup>. They are considered as descended from al-Ḥasan, the son of (the khalif) 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib<sup>2</sup>; and it is said that they settled in that place when the county was subdued by Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr. Tūmart is a Berber name.<sup>3</sup> Wansharisī means belonging to Wansharis, a village of Ifrīqiyah in the province of Bugia<sup>4</sup>. Of Tin-Mall mention has been already made (Nö. 383).<sup>5</sup> In the life of 'Abd al-Mūmin we have spoken of the Jafr.

663 AL-IKSHĪD

Abū Bakr Muḥammad, the son of Abū Muḥammad Ṭughj, the son of Juff, the son of Yaltikīn, the son of Fūrān, the son of Fūrī, the son of the Khāqān of Farghānah, and lord of the throne

1 He means the chain of the Atlas which bounds the south and south-east frontiers of the kingdom of Morocco.

2 This is a manifest error ; the Harghah were a Berber race, and consequently they could not have sprung from an Arabian stock. Ibn Khaldūn observes that many of the indigenous tribes of North Africa sought, by means of false genealogies, to prove their descent from the Arabs.

3 I am almost certain that Tūmart is the diminutive of the Arabic name 'Umar, and that it signifies little 'Umar. In Berber, the feminine and the diminutive are formed by the addition of a t at the commencement and another t at the end of the masculine noun. I must add that the letter 'ayn does not exist in Berber.

4 Wansharis is not a village, but a mountain ; it lies, not in the province of Bugia, but in the province of Algiers, to the south of Milyānah.

5 Tin-Mall is incorrect, the true name est Tinmelel (illa quoc alba est), that is to say : the white or snowy mountain. Those words belong to the Berber language.

of gold<sup>1</sup> was surnamed al-Ikhshīd. He drew his descent from the kings of Farghānah and became sovereign of Egypt, Syria, and Hijāz. The word Ṭughj is the equivalent of 'Abd al-Rahmān (the servant of the Merciful (?). (The khalif) al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh, the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd, drew into his service, from Farghānah, a great number (of warriors), and, being informed of the courage and intrepidity which Juff and some others displayed in war, he sent for them and received them with the highest honour. They obtained from him the concession of certain fiefs (qaṭā'i) at Sarra man r'ā (Sāmarrah), and one of these grants is called the Qaṭā'i of Juff to the present day. Juff took up his residence there and became the father of a family. He died at Baghdād the night in which (the khalif) al-Mutawakkil was murdered. This event occurred on the eve of Wednesday, the 3rd of Shawwāl, A. H. 247 (10th December, A. C. 861). The sons of Juff then went abroad to seek a livelihood for their family, and Ṭughj entered into the service of Lūlū, the page (ghulām) of Ibn Ṭūlūn (No. 70); (the latter) was at that time residing in Egypt, and had appointed (Lūlū) as his lieutenant in that country. Ṭughj afterwards passed into the service of Ishāq Ibn Kundāj<sup>2</sup> and remained with him till the death of Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn. A peace having been effected between Abu 'l-Jaysh Khumarawayh, the son of Aḥmad Ibn Ṭūlūn (No. 209) and Ishāq Ibn Kundāj, the former noticed Ṭughj who was then in Ishāq's suite, and being struck by his appearance, he took him from Ishāq and gave him the command of all his troops.

---

1 The lord of the throne of gold, in Arabic: Ṣāhib surir al-Dhahab. D'Herbelot says that the throne of gold was the name given to a country or province situated near Darband, between the Black Sea and the Caspian. It was so called because the Marzubān, or governor, enjoyed the privilege of sitting on a throne of gold see also al-Mas'ūdī t. II, p. 41 of the French translation.

2 Whilst the Zanj were attacking the dominions of the khalif on the southern side, Ibn Abi 'l-Sāj, the governor of Qinnisrīn in the north of Syria, and Ishāq Ibn Kundāj, or Kundājīk, the governor of Moṣul, took possession, the former of Syria, and the latter of Mesopotamia. These two chiefs then waged war against each other, and Ibn Kundāj acknowledged Khumarawayh for his sovereign. He subsequently turned his arms against the Egyptians, and during some years a desperate struggle for power was maintained between four parties: Khumarawayh, the khalif, Ibn Kundāj, and Ibn Abi 'l-Sāj. The details of their proceedings are given by Ibn al-Aṭhīr.

He appointed him also governor of Damascus and Tiberias. On the death of Khumarawayh, Ṭughj, who had always remained with him, went to join al-Muktafi bi-Allāh, and this (mark of respect) gave the khalif such satisfaction that he bestowed on him a pelisse of honour. Al-'Abbās Ibn al-Ḥasan was then al-Muktafi's wazīr; accustomed to see all (the officers of the state) bend in humble submission to his will, he endeavoured to exact the same deference from Ṭughj; finding, however, that his spirit scorned to brook such humiliation, he excited the khalif's anger against him, and succeeded in having him and his son, Abū Bakr Muḥammad, cast into prison. Ṭughj died in confinement, but his son at length recovered his liberty and received a pelisse of honour. Burning to avenge the death of their father, Abū Bakr and 'Ubayd Allāh waited with unremitting vigilance for an opportunity of attacking the wazīr, and they at length obtained the satisfaction of seeing him fall by the hand of al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ḥamdān (No. 462), 'Ubayd Allāh then, A. H. 296, went to join Ibn Abi 'l-Sāj, and Abū Bakr fled into Syria, where, during the space of a year, he remained a fugitive in the desert. Having then joined Abū Mansūr Tikīn al-Khazari* (governor of Egypt and Syria)<sup>1</sup> he became one of his most efficient supporters, and, being invested by him with the government of 'Ammān and the mountains of al-Sharāt<sup>2</sup> he gained a great name by the expedition which he made to al-Nuqayb<sup>3</sup>. This was in the year 306 (A. C. 919), a large band had assembled to intercept the pilgrim-caravan, but Abū Bakr marched against them, slew some, took others prisoners, put the rest to flight, and delivered the caravan. A female attached to the palace of the khalif al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh, and known by the name of 'Ajūz, happened to make the pilgrimage that year, and, on her return, she related to al-Muqtadir what she had witnessed of 1 Ibn Khallikān has a short notice on this person, towards the end of the present article. Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn gives an account of his government in the Nujūm.

2 'Ammān and al-Sharāt lie between the Dead Sea and Aylah.

3 Al-Nuqayb lies in the north-west extremity of Arabia, between Ma'an and Tabūk, on the road of the pilgrims from Syria to Makkah.—(Marāsīd.)

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives; al-Jazari.—Ed

Abū Bakr's (intrepid conduct). This account induced the khalif to send him a pelisse of honour and increase his pay. Abū Bakr remained with Tikin till the year 316 (A. C. 928-9), when he left him for a reason too long to be exposed here. He then proceeded to Ramlan and received letters from (the khalif) al-Muqtadir, constituting him governor of that city. He remained in this post till the year 318, when al-Muqtadir sent him his nomination as governor of Damascus. He continued at Damascus till the month of Ramaḍān, 321 (August-September, A. C. 993), when al-Qāhir bi-Allāh appointed him governor of Egypt. During thirty-two days, the prayer was offered up for him in Egypt (as governor), but he had not yet entered it, when al-Qāhir nominated Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Kayghaligh governor of that province for the second time. This appointment took place on the 9th of Shawwāl, A. H. 321*. Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Ikhshid was restored to the government of Egypt by al-Rāḍī bi-Allāh, the son of al-Muqtadir, on the deposition of his uncle al-Qāhir, and he received from him besides, the command of Syria, Mesopotamia, al-Ḥaramayn (Makkah and Madīnah) and other places. He entered Egypt on Wednesday, the 23rd Ramaḍān, A. H. 323 (26th August A. C. 935). It is said, however, by some that, till the death of al-Rāḍī, in 329, he possessed only the government of Egypt; Syria, Ḥijāz, and the other provinces having been then placed under his orders by al-Muttaqī bi-Allāh†, the brother and successor of al-Rāḍī. In the month of Ramaḍān, 327 (June-July, A. C. 939), al-Rāḍī granted to him the title of al-Ikhshid because he drew his descent from the kings of Farghānah, a circumstance which we have already noticed towards the commencement of this article. Ikhshid was the title borne by these sovereigns; it signifies king of kings<sup>1</sup>. It was thus they gave to the king of Persia the title of Kisrā (Chosroes), to the king of the Turks that of Khāqān, to the king of the Romans that of Qaysar (Caesar), to the kings of Syria that of Hiraql (Heraclius), to the king of Yaman that of Tubba', to the king of 1 Abū Maḥāsīn adds: in the language of the Farghāniyans,

* 2 December, A. C. 933—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives by mistake al-Muqtafi bi-umr Allāh, (1096-1160 A. C.) for al-Muttaqī bi-Allāh (940-944).—Ed.

Abyssina that of al-Najāshī, etc.<sup>1</sup> Qayṣar is a Frankish word, signifying: delivered by means of an incision<sup>2</sup>. He was so called because his mother died in childbirth, and he was extracted through an incision made in the womb. This was a circumstance in which he vaunted his pre-eminence over other kings, in as much as he had not been born of woman. His name was Ughuṣtus (Augustus); he was the first king of the Romans, and it is said that, in the forty-third year of his reign, the blessed Messiah, Jesus the son of Mary (al-Masīḥ 'Isā Ibn Maryam) was born. Others say that Jesus was born in the seventeenth year of his reign. The kings of the Romans all bore the title of Qayṣar. In the prayers offered up from the pulpits for Muḥammad Ibn Ṭughj, he was designated by the title of al-Ikhshid; he thus became known by it, if it was his as proper name. Al-Ikhshid was a resolute prince, displaying great foresight in war, and a close attention to the prosperity of his empire; he treated the military class with honour, and he governed with ability and justice. His bodily strength was so great that he made use of a bow which none but himself could draw. Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadānī (No. 167) says, in his lesser historical work entitled: 'Uyūn al-Siyar (sources of history), that his army consisted of four hundred thousand men, that he was a coward, and had eight thousand mamlūks. Two thousand of them guarded him every night, and, when travelling, his eunuchs were posted around his tent; yet, not trusting to these precautions, he would go to the tents occupied by the tent-pitchers (farrāshin) and sleep there. He continued in his government and the enjoyment of good fortune till the year 334, when he died at Damascus, on the fourth hour of Friday, the 21st of Dhu' l-Ḥijjah (24th July, A. C. 946). His corpse was borne to Jerusalem in a bier, and interred in that city. Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Rāzī says that he died A. H. 335; God knows best! His birth took place on Monday, the 15th of Rajab, A. H. 268 (8th February, A. C. 882), at Baghdād, in the street leading to the Kūfah Gate (Shāri' Bāb al-Kūfah). Kāfūr al-Ikhshīdī and Fātik al-Majnūn were slaves of his: in the preceding part of this work (No. 499 and No. 520) we have allotted a separate article to each of these two persons. On the death of al-Ikhshīd, his sons Abu 'l-Qāsim Anujūr and Abu 'l-Ḥasan were taken charge of by his servant Kāfūr, who conscientiously discharged that duty. We need not mention here the dates of their birth and death, nor the length of their reign, as we have already given a brief indication of these points in the life of Kāfūr; we have also related the history of the latter up to the time of his death, and, after stating that the military then placed Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad, the son of 'Alī, the son of al-Ikhshīd, on the throne, we referred to the present article for the remainder of our observations. As Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad was only eleven years of age, they established as his lieutenant in the administration of the state his father's cousin, Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ṭughj Ibn Juff, the lord of Ramlah in Syria and the same person whose praises were celebrated by al-Mutanabbī in the qaṣīdah which commences thus:

1 To this list may be added, on the authority of Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn in the Nujūm, year 320. Al-Iṣbahid (الإصبهيد) the title of the king of Ṭabaristān Ṣul (سول) that of the king of Jurjān; al-Iṣṣhin, that of the king of Ushrī ṣḥnah; Sāmdn, that of the king of Samarqand and Fir'awn, that of the king of Egypt in ancient times.

2 It is impossible to render exactly the terse concision of the Arabic words (شق عنه); their literal translation would be, it was split off from him, diffissum fuit ab eo, but these expressions are unintelligible. Pliny says; Primusque Caesarum a caeso matris utero dictus. Hist. Nat. VII. 7. 9.

"I should reproach myself were I conscious, when my companions blame (me for yielding to affliction), of all (the grief) I feel in the midst of these ruined dwellings<sup>1</sup>."

In the same piece, he enters into his subject by means of the following transition:

"When I attack the foe, I leave no resistance for (other) warriors to vanquish; when I utter (verses), I leave no maxim for (other) sages to adduce. If this be not the case, my poetic talent has deceived me, and want of resolution has hindered me from (doing fit honour to the merit of) Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh!"

1 In translating these fragments I have followed the authority of the excellent commentary on al-Mutanabbī preserved in the Bibliothèque imperiale. In the MSS. of Ibn Khallikān these verses are disfigured by errors resulting from the negligence or ignorance of copyists.

The followidg passage from the same poem is really beautiful :

"I see at the foot of the region which extends from the Euphrates to Barqah<sup>1</sup>, a combat in which the steeds trample on warrior's heads ; I see lances wielded by princes whose hands must have known the spear before they knew the bracelet<sup>2</sup>. On every side, that troop is guarded against the foe by the swords of the sons of Ṭughj Ibn Juff, those gallant chieftains. 'Tis they who nobly return to the charge in the tumult of battle, and yet more nobly do they return to acts of beneficence ! 'Tis they who grant a generous pardon to offenders ; 'tis they who pay the fine (of blood) for him who is amerced. Modest in their deportment, yet, when they encounter an adversary, they face, but not with modesty, the edge of the sword. Were lions not too vile, I should compare these heroes to them, but lions are creatures of an inferior class."

In the same piece he says :

"On reaching that noble prince I shook off all other men, as the traveller, on arriving, shakes from his bag the old and dried remains of his provisions. Yet my joy could hardly compensate my sorrow for having kept away from him during my past life."

This is a long and brilliant qaṣīdah. When this arrangement was effected, al-Ḥussayn Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh married Fāṭimah, the daughter of his uncle al-Ikhshīd, and remained in Syria, but his name was mentioned in the prayer offered up from the pulpit, immediately after the name of Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī. Matters continued in this state till Friday the thirteenth of Sha'bān, A.H. 358 (2nd July, A.C. 969), when the Maghribīn army commanded by the qā'id Jawhar (No. 141), the general (of al-Mu'izz), entered Old Cairo with flying colours and overthrew the Ikhshidite dynasty after it had subsisted thirty-four years, ten months, and twenty-four days. Some time previously (al-Ḥusayn)

---

1 The word Barqah signifies a stony soil ; a number of places bore this name, one of them in the neighbourhood of the Euphrates.

2 Bracelets here spoken of are the amulets tied round the wrists of young children in order to protect them from the evil eye.

Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh had arrived there from Syria, having fled before the Qarmāṭs who had taken possession of that country. He went to the palace of his wife and cousin Fāṭimah, and assuming the exercise of sovereign authority, he arrested the wazīr Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt (No. 130), whom he put to the torture and amerced with a large sum. He then departed for Syria, on the 1st of the latter Rabi', A.H. 358 (February, A.C. 969)* Ja'far Ibn Falāh (No. 134) having occupied Syria, into which country he had been dispatched by the qā'id Jawhar, as we have already related, he took Abū Muḥammad (al-Ḥusayn) Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh prisoner and sent him with a number of Syrian amīrs to Jawhar, who had remained in Egypt. They entered Old Cairo in the month of the first Jumādā, A.H. 359 (March-April, A.C. 970), and, as (al-Ḥusayn) Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh had tyrannised over the Egyptians during the time of his rule, (the guards) kept their prisoners standing and exposed to public gaze, for the space of five hours, much to the satisfaction of those who had to complain of their conduct. They were then brought into Jawhar's tent and placed among the other captives kept there in chains. On the seventeenth of the first Jumādā †, the qā'id Jawhar dispatched his son Ja'far to al-Mu'izz, with a quantity of presents too precious to be described, and he sent off with him the prisoners brought from Syria. They were put into a boat on the Nile whilst Jawhar stood by and looked on; the boat upset, and (al-Ḥusayn) Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh cried out to him: "Do you mean to drown us?" Jawhar offered some excuses and made a great show of pity for his unfortunate prisoners. They were then removed into another boat, all of them bound in chains. This is the last information I could learn respecting al-Ḥusayn. I have since found, in the historical work composed by al-'Utaqī (No. 122, note), that al-Ḥusayn died on the eve of Friday, the 20th Rajab, A. H. 371 (19th January, A.C. 982), and that the funeral prayer was said over him in the citadel of Cairo by al-'Azīz Nizār, the son of al-Mu'izz. Al-Farghānī states, in his history<sup>1</sup>, that al-Ḥusayn 1 See No. 71 and No. 125, note.

---

* 22 February—Ed.

† 28 March, A. C. 970—Ed.

was born in the year 312 (A.C. 924-5) ; he assigns also to his death the date which has been just given. According to the same author, Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī died on the 13th of the first Rabi', A.H. 377 (13th July, A.C. 987). Al-Ikhshīd Ṭughī<sup>1</sup> Juff or Jaff Yaltikin, Fūrān, Fūrī ; such is the pronunciation of the names فوري and فوري يلتيكين جف طاج الاخشيد. The Tikin mentioned in this article was thrice governor of Egypt ; he died on Saturday, the 16th of the first Rabi', A.H. 321 (16th March, A.C. 933), whilst occupying that post for the third time. He was succeeded by Abū Bakr al-Ikhshīd. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn Asākir (No. 416) gives a separate article on Aḥmad Ibn Kayghaligh, in his History of Damascus ; speaking of his administration in Egypt, he says ; "A warfare was carried on between him and Muḥammad, the son of Tikin, al-Khāṣṣah, but he finally remained in the full possession of his authority. Muhammad Ibn Ṭughj was then sent by the khalif al-Rādī as amīr over Egypt, and Ibn Kayghaligh resigned the command to him. Aḥmad possessed abilities as a scholar and a poet ; in one of his poems he says :

"On rainy days, let not the goblet linger in thy hand (but pass it round) ; knowest thou not that rain is an urgent cupbearer<sup>2</sup> ? "

His brother Ibrāhīm Ibn Kayghaligh died on the first of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 303 (7th May, A. C. 916). Ishāq the son of Ibrāhīm, was the governor of Tripoli who, when al-Mutanabbī visited that city on his journey from Ramlah to Antioch, endeavoured to extort from the poet a qaṣidah in his praise. Al-Mutanabbī not only refused to gratify his wish, but attacked him in a satire commencing thus :

"Men's hearts love a secret known to none but them, etc".

He then left him, and having afterwards learned his death in Jabalah, he said :

"They told us Ishāq was dead, and I said to them, etc."

1 This name should be pronounced Turj.

2 This is a quibble ; the verse signifies also : Knowest thou not that rain is an impetuous waterer ?

These two qasīdashs are to be found in his dīwān, for which reason I omit them. He composed also other satires against the same person.

664 ṬUGHRULBEK AL-SALJŪQĪ

Abū Ṭālib Mikāyil Ibn Saljūq Ibn Duqāq, surnamed Rukn al-Din Ṭughrulbek (Toghrulbek, the column of the faith), was the first monarch of the Saljūq dynasty. This people, before it established its domination over so many provinces, dwelt beyond the rivers (the Oxus) at a place twenty parasangs distant from Bukhārā. They were Turks, and their numbers were immense; they lived in complete independence, and, when armies too strong for them to resist were sent against them, they passed into the deserts and took refuge in the midst of the sands, where no one could approach them. Maḥmūd Ibn Subuktikīn, sultān of Khurāsān, Ghaznah, and that country (we shall give his life), having crossed the river and entered Transoxiana, he found the leader of the Saljūqids to be a powerful chief, maintaining a numerous people in obedience (more) by wile and address (than by force); always moving from one region to another and making incursions into the neighbouring provinces. Having employed every means to gain his confidence and draw him (to the camp), he at length succeeded in circumventing him; and, on the chieftain's arrival, he seized upon him and sent him off to a castle, (where he remained in confinement). Maḥmūd's insidious policy was then directed against his prisoner's partisans, and, having consulted the principal officers of his empire on the measures to be taken with regard to them, some gave their opinion that they should be drowned in the Jayhūn (the Oxus), whilst others advised him to cut off their thumbs and thus preclude them from the possibility of drawing the bow and wielding arms; various plans were proposed, but they finally agreed on the propriety of transporting them across the Jayhūn and dispersing them throughout the province of Khurāsān, where they should be constrained to pay the tax (al-kharāj) to government. This advice was adopted, and the Saljūqs continued for some time to hold a submissive and peaceful line of conduct. This encouraged the collectors of the revenue to oppress them, to seize on their wealth and flocks, and to grind them down by their extortions and tyranny; the consequence was, that two thousand tents or (families) emigrated to Kirmān. The amīr Abu 'l-Fawāris Bahā al-Dawlah, the son of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, who then ruled over that country, received them with kindness and arrayed their chief in robes of honour; he even resolved on taking them into his service, but ten days had scarcely elapsed when he died. The fugitives immediately hastened their departure through dread of the Daylamites who inhabited that country, and, having proceeded to Iṣbahān, which was then under the rule of 'Alā al-Dawlah Abū Ja'far Ibn Kākūyah, they encamped outside the city. This prince wished to employ them in his service, but, having received a letter from the sulṭān Maḥmūd, ordering him to attack them and seize on their property, he proceeded to obey, and a combat ensued which cost many lives to both parties. The survivors set out for Adharbā'ijān, and those who had remained in Khurāsān retired to a mountain near Khuswārizm. The sulṭān Maḥmūd sent an army against them which pursued them through these deserts during the space of nearly two years; he then took the field himself and followed them with unremitting activity till they were completely dispersed. On the death of Maḥmūd, his son and successor Mas'ūd found himself under the necessity of strengthening his army, and wrote to the Saljūqids in Adharbā'ijān, inviting them to come to his assistance. One thousand horsemen having joined him, he took them into his pay and led them towards Khurāsān. At the request of his new allies, he wrote to the remnant of the Saljūqids whom his father had dispersed, and having obtained from them the promise of obedience, he granted them an amnesty, and reinstated them, on their arrival, in all the privileges which his father had conceded to them at first. Mas'ūd then passed into India to appease the troubles which had broken out there, and the Saljūqids took advantage of his absence to resume their disorderly conduct and ravage the country. During the course of these events, the history of which would lead us to far, the sultān Ṭugh̃rulkbek and his brother Dāwūd had remained in Transoxiana and encountered Malik Shāh, the sovereign of Bukhārā, where they lost a great number of their partisans in a desperate conflict. This defeat forced them to retire among their people in Khurāsān and to write to Mas'ūd, imploring mercy and requesting to be taken into his service. To this prayer Mas'ūd replied by imprisoning their messengers and sending an army against the Saljūqs in Khurāsān. A bloody battle ensued, subsequently to which they obtained their pardon on giving proofs of their complete submission to his authority and engaging to conquer the province of Khuwārizm. Mas'ūd then tranquillised their hearts and set at liberty the ambassadors sent from Transoxiana, they requested him to abate the rigour of the confinement in which their chief had lingered from the time of his arrestation by the sultān Maḥmūd. In pursuance of their desire, Mas'ūd caused the prisoner to be removed from the castle and taken, bound in chains, to Balkh. The captive prince then asked permission to write to his nephews, Ṭugh̃rulkbek and Dāwūd and, having obtained Mas'ūd's consent, he opened a correspondence with these chiefs. The consequence was that Ṭugh̃rulkbek and Dāwūd assembled all their people and marched with a large army into Khurāsān. They had then contests, too numerous to be related, with the officers who commanded in that country and with the lieutenants whom Mas'ūd had established in its cities. The result of this expedition was a complete triumph for the Saljūqids. The first city of which they gained possession was Tūs, (or Ray, according to another statement), having effected its conquest in the year 429 (A. C. 1037-8), and, in the month of Ramaḍān of the same year (June-July, A. C. 1038) they took Naysābūr, one of the capitals of Khurāsān. The sultān Ṭugh̃rulkbek was the chief of this people, and to him alone pertained the sovereign authority. His brother Dāwūd, the conqueror of Balkh, was the father of Alp Arslān, a prince whose life we shall give. At the commencement of their victorious career, (the two brothers) acknowledged the authority of Mas'ūd, and offered up the prayer for him as their sovereign, but, when they had shared their widely extended conquests (they withheld this homage) and Mas'ūd retired into the province of Ghaznah. Their power became so great that the imān (khalif) al-Qā'im bi-Amr Allāh sent an embassy to them, and the person whom he selected for this mission was the qādī Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥabīb al-Māwardī, the author of the Ḥāwī (No. 403). (On this occasion, al-Māwardī) exhorted them to fear God, to govern their subjects with justice and mildness, and to extend their beneficence to the people<sup>1</sup>. Ṭugh̃rūlbek was mild and generous; every Friday, at the regular hours,* he attended the five prayers (in the mosque); he fasted every Monday and Thursday; wrought numerous works of charity; founded mosques, and used to say: "I should be ashamed to appear before God, were I to build for myself a dwelling and not erect a mosque beside it." The following is one of his honourable deeds, enregistered by history: He sent the sharīf Nāṣir Ibn Ismā'il on an embassy to the queen of the Greeks (Theodora), who was an unbeliever; and the sharīf asked her for permission to preside at the prayer of Friday in the mosque at Constantinople. Having obtained this authorisation, he said the prayer and pronounced the khutbah in the name of the imān al-Qā'im. This circumstance gave great offence to the ambassador of al-Mustanṣir the Fatimid sovereign of Egypt, who happened to be present, and it was one of the principal causes which led to the rupture between the Egyptians and the Greeks. When Ṭugh̃rūlbek had effected his conquests and obtained possession of 'Irāq and Baghdād, he sent to the imān al-Qā'im and asked his daughter in marriage. This demand caused the khalif great vexation; and, as he wished it to be withdrawn, frequent messages passed between him and the sultān. This fact is mentioned in the Shudhūr<sup>2</sup> under the year 453 (A. C. 1061.) Finding it impossible to withhold his consent,

---

1 'Imād al-Dīn al-Isbahānī speaks of two envoys: one called Abū Bakr al-Tūsī, and the other Abū Muḥammad Hibat Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Māmūn. He does not notice the mission of al-Māwardī. In some of the manuscripts of Ibn Khallikān, the following passage is inserted before that which begins by the words: He exported them: Then he (Ṭugh̃rūlbek) got possession of Baghdād and 'Irāq on the 6th Ramaḍān A. H. 447 (29th Nov., A.C. 1055).

2 The Shudhūr al-'Uqūd is an historical work composed by Abū 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī. His life will be found in No. 345 of this work.

* The addition of 'Fri' by de Slane is an error; it is simply 'day'—Ed.

al-Qa'im yielded at last, and the marriage contract was ratified outside the gates of Tabriz. Ṭuḡhrulbek then proceeded to Baghdād, in the year 455 (A. C. 1063), and, on his arrival, he sent for his bride, (to whom) he transmitted a present of one hundred thousand dīnārs, under the designation of money for the removal of the (princess') furniture. On the eve of Monday, the 15th of Šafar, she was borne in state to the royal palace, where her husband awaited her, and, having taken her seat on a throne covered with cloth of gold, she received his visit. On appearing before her, he kissed the ground, but did not remove the veil from her face in that interview; having then offered her a quantity of presents magnificent beyond description, he kissed the ground again, remained for some time in a respectful posture, and retired, manifesting the utmost delight at his reception. The events which marked the course of the Saljūq dynasty are very numerous, and have occupied the attention of many historians<sup>1</sup>; these writers have composed works on the subject, including every detail, and my sole motive in giving the preceding sketch was, to point out the origin of their power and expose the real circumstances of their early history, for the satisfaction of those who might desire such information. Ṭuḡhrulbek died at Ray on Friday, the 18th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 455 (14th September, A. C. 1063)*, aged seventy years. His body was carried to Marw and interred near the tomb of his brother Dāwūd. We shall have occasion to speak of Dāwūd in the life of his son Alp Arslān. Ibn al-Hamadhānī (No. 167, note) says, in his history, that he was buried in a funeral chapel at Ray, and al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) makes the same statement in that article of his Dhayl (or supplement) which he has devoted to the life of the sultān Sinjar. His wazīr

---

1 The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī composed a work on the subject which was remodelled by al-Bundarī. See MSS, fonds st. Germain, No. 327 and ancient fonds No. 767. Ibn al-Aṭḥir gives copious information respecting them in his Kāmil, and Mirkhond in his Rawḍat al-Šafa. This section of Mirkhond's work was published, with a German translation, by Professor Vullers, at Giessen, in 1838.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives 8th of Ramaḍān (5 September). This appears to be correct, since the day also corroborates. On the 18th it was Monday or Sunday as calculated by de Slane.

Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr al-Kundurī*, a person whose life shall be given (in this work), states that Ṭugh̃r̃ulbek once said: "When in K̃h̃urāsān, I dreamed that I was raised up to heaven in a cloud which prevented me from seeing, but I smelt a sweet perfume and I heard a voice exclaim: 'Thou art near unto the throne of the Creator, may His power be glorified! ask what thou needest; it shall be granted.' On hearing these words, I said within myself; 'I ask Thee for length of life;' and a voice answered: 'Thou shalt have seventy years.' I replied: 'O Lord! that sufficeth me not;' and it said; 'For thee are seventy years.'" This anecdote is mentioned by our shaykh Ibn al-Aṭhīr (No. 435), in his history. When Ṭugh̃r̃ulbek was at the point of death, he said: "I am like unto a sheep; its legs were tied that it might be shorn of its wool, and it thought that it was tied for slaughter; it therefore struggled, and, when let loose, it rejoiced; then, it was tied for slaughter, and thinking that it was for the shearing of its wool, it remained quiet and was killed. Now, this sickness which hath come upon me is the binding of my legs for slaughter." The daughter of al-Qā'im remained with him about six months: she died on the 6th of Muḥarram, A. H. 496 (20th Oct., A. C. 1102). As Ṭugh̃r̃ulbek left no male children, his kingdom devolved to his nephew Alp Arslān. Ṭugh̃r̃ulbek is a Turkish compound name: the Turks employ the word juḡr̃ul to designate a species of bird (falcon) well known in that country, and it is used also as a proper name for men; bek signifies commander (amīr). The words سلجوق and دقاق must be pronounced Saljūq and Duqāq. (Jayhūn) is the name of the great river which separates K̃h̃uwārizm and K̃h̃urāsān from Buk̃h̃ārā, Samarqand, and that country: all the region on the (Buk̃h̃ārā) side of the river is called the country beyond the river (mā wara al-nahr)<sup>1</sup>. It is one of those rivers of Paradise which are mentioned in the Tradition, where it is said that four rivers flow out of it; two of them manifest, and two hidden; the manifest being the Nile and the Euphrates, and the hidden, the Jayhūn and the Sayhūn. The Sayhūn is situated at a fifteen days' journey beyond the Jayhūn, near the country of the Turks. Though these rivers are very large and wide, they freeze over in winter, so that travellers can cross them with their beasts of burden; they remain frozen about three months. These observations, though foreign to our purpose, have some connection with the article in which we are here engaged, and discourse will run into digressions: besides, those readers who dwell in other countries and are ignorant of the position in which these localities lie, will find in the remarks here given the information which they are naturally led to expect.

<sup>1</sup> Transoxiana, a word of modern invention, is well adapted to express the meaning of Māwarā al-nahr.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives al-Kindī—Ed.

665 ALP ARSLĀN AL-SALJŪQĪ.

Abū Shujā' Muḥammad, the son of Chegribek* Dāwūd, the son of Mikāyīl, the son of Saljūq, the son of Duqāq, surnamed 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Alp Arslān (the arm of the empire, the hero lion), was the nephew of Ṭuḡhrubek. In the life of that sultān (No. 664), we have mentioned some facts connected with the history of Dāwūd Alp Arslān's father. When Ṭuḡhrubek was drawing near his end, he nominated as his successor, Sulaymān, the son of Dāwūd and brother of Alp Arslān, having been led to make this choice by the influence of Sulaymān's mother, who was then with him. Sulaymān assumed the supreme command, but, having to sustain a war with his brother Alp Arslān and his uncle Shihāb al-Dawlah Qutulmish, who revolted against him, he was unable to establish his authority. Alp Arslān having gained the victory, took possession of the empire, and, became formidable by his power, he increased his possessions by conquests which his uncle Ṭuḡhrubek had never been able to achieve. In his expedition to Syria, he laid siege to Aleppo, which was at that time under the rule of Maḥmūd Ibn Naṣr Ibn Ṣāliḥ Ibn Mirdās al-Kilābī; negotiations being opened between the two parties, Alp Arslān declared that Maḥmūd should come and tread on his carpet (do him homage) if he wished for peace. Maḥmūd therefore went by night with his mother to the tent of Alp Arslān, who received them with great kindness, arrayed them in robes of honour, sent them back to their city, and then decamped. Al-Māmūnī (No. 455, note) says in his History: "It is said that neither in ancient nor in Islāmic times, did any Turkish king, prior to Alp Arslān, cross the Euphrates." On his return, he resolved to march into the country of the Turks, and, having assembled an army of at least two hundred thousand horse, he threw a bridge across the Jayhūn (Oxus) and spent a month in getting his troops over the river. He then followed, and on the 6th of the first Rabi', A. H. 465 (20th November, A. C. 1072), he prepared a grand feast in a village called Farbar, the citadel of which was situated on the bank of the Jayhūn, and commanded by an officer called Yūsuf al-Khuwārizmī. This person was led the same day, bound with cords, into Alp Arslān's presence, and accused of some misconduct relative to the citadel. When he was brought near, the monarch ordered four stakes to be driven into the ground and that the prisoner, after having been attached to them by the arms and legs, should be tortured and put to death. On hearing this sentence, Yūsuf exclaimed: "Is it for a man like me that such a punishment is reserved?" Alp Arslān, being incensed at these words, seized his bow and, fitting an arrow to it, he ordered the prisoner to be unbound, meaning to display his skill in archery, an accomplishment in which he took great pride. Having missed his aim, he rose from the throne in which he was seated, but he stumbled on getting down and fell on his face; Yūsuf instantly sprung forward and plunged a dagger into his side, but was immediately killed by an Armenian tent-pitcher, who struck him on the head with a mallet. Alp Arslān was carried to another tent, and, having sent for his wazīr Nizām al-Mulk (No. 171), he gave him his dying injunction and recommended him to his son Malik Shāh, whom he designated as successor to the throne. He expired on Saturday, the tenth of 1 Or, according to Ibn al-Athīr and his epitomizer Abu 'l-Fedā: "In-famous wretch (ya muḥannatūh)!, is it for a man like me, etc.

---

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives Ji'arbek an Arabicised form of the Turkish name—Ed.

---

the month* above mentioned. He was born in the year 424 (A. C. 1032-3). His reign lasted nine years and some months. His body was transported to Marw and interred near the tombs of his father Dāwūd and his uncle Tughrulbek. Although Baghdād was included in his empire, he never entered nor saw that city. It was he who built the mausoleum which covers the tomb of Abū Ḥanifah. He erected also a college at Baghdād, on which he spent large sums. It is stated in the Zubdat al-Tawarikh<sup>1</sup>, that he received his mortal wound on Saturday, the 30th of the first Rabi', A. H. 465 (14 December, A. C. 1072), and that he survived three days; God knows best (whether this statement be truer than the other). We have already spoken of his father (Dāwūd) and mentioned that he was sovereign of Balkh; he died in that city in the month of Rajab, A. H. 451 (August-September, A. C. 1059). His body was carried to Marw and interred there. Some say that Dāwūd died at Marw. According to another statement he died in the month of Šafar, A. H. 452 (March-April, A. C. 1060), and was interred in the college which he had founded at Marw. We have already spoken of his son Tutuṣh (No. 119). Alp Arslān is a Turkish word signifying the hero lion; alp means hero, and arslān, lion. Shihāb al-Dawlah Qutulmish, the son of Isrā'il, the son of Saljūq, was the father of Sulaymān Ibn Qut'lmish, the ancestor of the dynasty which governs Asia Minor (Rūm) to this day. He possessed a number of fortresses and castles, such as Gurdkūh (in Zābulistān), and others in Persian 'Irāq. He revolted against his nephew Alp Arslān and encountered him in battle near Ray. When the conflict ended, Qutulmish was found dead, but the cause of his death remained unknown. This took place in the month of Muḥarram, A. H. 456 (January, A. C. 1064). It was said that he died of fright, and this circumstance gave great vexation to Alp Arslān.

---

1 (The cream of histories). Ḥājji Khalifah indicates three works bearing this title; all of them were composed subsequently to the time of our author.

* 24 November, A.C. 1072—Ed.

666 MUḤAMMAD IBN MALIK SHĀH AI-SALJŪQI

Abū Shujā' Muḥammad, the son of Malik Shāh, the son of Alp Arslān (see the preceding article), was surnamed Ghiyāth al-Dīn (succour of religion). We omit the remainder of his genealogy, as it has been already given in the article on his grandfather (No. 665). On the death of Malik Shāh, the empire was divided between his three sons, Barkyāruq (No. 107), Sinjar (No. 260), and Muḥammad: the two latter were sons of the same mother, and little notice was taken of them whilst Brakyāruq reigned; the fact being that he was sultān and they were only his subordinates. Dissensions having sprung up between Muḥammad and Barkyāruq, the former proceeded to Baghdād with his brother Sinjar, and the imām al-Mustazhir bi-Allāh arrayed them in robes of honour. Muḥammad had previously requested that the Commander of the Faithful would grant a solemn reception to his brother Sinjar and himself. The khalīf consented to his desire, and, having held a sitting to receive them in the Saloon of the Crown (qubbat al-Tāj), in the presence of all his officers and their followers, he took his seat on the throne, with the Prophet's mantle on his shoulders, the turban on his head, the sceptre placed before him, and Sayf al-Dawlah Ṣadaqah Ibn Mazyad (No. 276), the lord of al-Ḥillah, standing on the right of the throne. He then arrayed Muḥammad in seven pelisses, according to the custom followed with respect to sultāns, and, having put the collar round his neck, the crown on his head, and the bracelets on his arms, he knotted a standard for him with his own hand, suspended two swords from his shoulder, and presented him with five horses fully caparisoned. He clothed Sinjar in the same number of pelisses. The customary khutbah was then said in the great mosque of Baghdād, and Muḥammad was named in it as sultān; the khutbah for Barkyāruq had been suppressed for motives which it is needless to explain. Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadāni (No. 167) states, in his History, that this took place in A. H. 495 (A. C. 1101-2). The author of the History of the Saljūqids says that the khutbah was said at Baghdād in Muḥammad's name, for the first time, on the 17th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 492 (4th November, A. C. 1099), and other writers agree with him in this point. Al-Hamadānī adds : A singular circumstance occurred : the preacher in the mosque of the palace (al-Qaṣr) at Baghdād, was saying the khuṭbah, and having come to the place in which the prayer was made for the sultān Barkyāruq, he substituted unintentionally for this name the name of the suṭān Muḥammad. On this, the partisans of Barkyāruq came forward and blamed bitterly the line of conduct held by the court of Baghdād (al-Diḡān al-'Azīz). The preacher was deprived of his place and his son nominated to succeed him. A very few days after, the khuṭbah was authorised to be said for the sultān Muḥammad, and the occurrence itself proved to be an omen of the honour which he was about to receive. Barkyāruq was unwell at the time, and had gone down to Wāsiṭ : but, having afterwards strengthened his authority and augmented his army, he gave battle to his brother, near Ray, and routed his troops. The history of these events would lead us, however, too far<sup>1</sup>. Muḥammad was the bravest and boldest of the Saljūq Sultāns ; he shone preeminent by his valiant deeds, his virtuous conduct, his universal justice, his charity to the indigent and the orphan, his wars with the followers of Ismā'ilism and his close attention to the welfare of his subjects. Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) mentions, in his History of Arbela, that Muḥammad arrived in that city on the 9th of the first Rabi' A. H. 498 (November, A. C. 1104)*, and that he left it for Moṣul on the 12th of the same month. He then adds that he found in a book the following passage : "The imām Abū Hāmid al-Ghazzālī (No. 562) said, in an address to the sultān Muḥammad, the son of Malik Shāh : 'Sultān of the universe ! the children of Adam form two classes ; one of them heedless (of their salvation), who fix their eyes on the spectacle of worldly prosperity, who cling to the hope of a long life and who reflect not on the moment in which they shall breathe their last ; the other is the class of the wise, who keep their eyes fixed on their dying hour, who reflect on what they shall become, on the manner in which they may quit the world in preserving their faith unaltered, on the worldly goods which they shall take with them into their tombs, and on those which they shall leave behind them as an affliction and a source of woe to their enemies.' " On the death of Barkyāruq, the sultān Muḥammad became sole master of the empire; no rival remained to resist him and his reign was a course of uninterrupted prosperity. He died, after a long illness, on Thursday, the 24th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 511 (19th April, A. C. 1118), at Iṣbahān, aged thirty-seven years, four months, and six days. He was interred in the great college which he had founded in that city for the followers of the Ḥanafite sect. It surpasses every establishment of the same kind in Iṣbahān. When he lost all hopes of recovery, he sent for his son Maḥmūd, and, having kissed him, they both wept together; he then told him to go out and take his seat on the imperial throne and look into public affairs. On this, Maḥmūd observed that it was an unlucky day; meaning that the stars had declared it such. "True," replied Muḥammad, "it is unlucky for thy father, but lucky for thee, since it makes thee a sultān". Maḥmūd then went out and took his seat on the throne, with the crown on his head and the bracelets on his arms. None of the Saljūq kings left such a quantity of treasure, wealth, horses, and other valuable objects as he; it would be too long to make an enumeration of what he possessed. We shall give the life of his father. The imām al-Muqtafi li-amr Allāh married Fāṭimah, the sultān Muḥammad's daughter, in the year 531 (A. C. 1136-7) The wazīr Sharaf al-Dīn Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Tīrād al-Zaynabī (No. 650, note) acted as his proxy on that occasion. Her brother Mas'ūd was present at the ratification of the contract. Three years later, she was conducted in pomp to the palace of the khalīf. It is said that she could read and write. In political matters she displayed the justest views. She inhabited (the palace called) Dargāh Khātūn (the hall of the princess), and she died under his (the Khalīf's) guardianship<sup>1</sup> on Saturday, the 22nd of the latter Rabi', A. H. 542 (21st September, A. C. 1147). She was interred at al-Ruṣāfah.

<sup>1</sup> See Abu 'l-Feda, Price's Retrospect, and Vuller's Mirkhond.

* 29 November.—Ed.

1 That is to say, she was still residing with the Khalīf and had not been divorced.

667 AL-MALIK AL-'ĀDIL, THE BROTHER OF ŞALĀḤ AL-DĪN

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Abi 'l-Shukr Ayyūb Ibn Shādi Ibn Marwān, surnamed al-Malik al-'Ādil Sayf al-Dīn (the just king, the sword of religion) was brother to the sultān Şalāḥ al-Dīn. We have already spoken of his father (No. 104), and shall speak of his brother in the letter Y. Al-Malik al-'Ādil entered Egypt at the same time as his brother and his uncle Asad al-Dīn Shirkūh (No. 272), and he used to relate that, when on the point of setting out, he wanted a wallet for the road and asked one from his father. "My father gave me one," said he, "and addressed me thus: 'O Abū Bakr! when you get possession of Egypt, return it to me filled with gold.' On his arrival in Egypt, he asked me for the wallet, on which I went and filled with black dirhams<sup>1</sup>, placing some pieces of gold on the top. I presented it to him and he at first thought it was gold, but, on turning it down, the silver pieces dropped out: 'Ah, Abū Bakr!' said he, 'thou hast learned from the Egyptians how to pass off false money.' " The Sultān Şalāḥ al-Dīn having established his authority in Egypt, he left al-Malik al-'Ādil as his lieutenant in that country on proceeding to Syria, and he then applied to him for money when he had to pay his troops or defray other expenses. I saw in one of al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil's (No. 349) epistles that, on one occasion, a delay having occurred in forwarding a convoy (of specie), the sultān ordered 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī to write to al-Malik al-'Ādil, and insist on his sending it off immediately; he even went so far as to say: "Let him send us a convoy of our own money or else of his." When al-Malik al-'Ādil received the letter and read this passage, he was highly displeased and wrote to al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil, complaining of the sultān. On this, al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil drew up an answer to " 'Imād al-Dīn's letter, and, in this document, he inserted the following passage: "As to his lordship's words: let him send us a convoy of our own money or else of his; I answer that it cannot be considered as the demand of a master for a necessary provision, but rather as the addition made by a secretary in order to give a cadence to the phrase : how many offensive expressions ! how many rude words have been employed merely to dispel the languor of the pen and fill up the hiatus of discourse ! It is on your humble servant that falls the responsibility of this pointed expression, of which, O what reticence escaped from the tongue of the pen ! Your humble servant was present when those strokes of incitation were heard, and, with respect to the audacity of 'Imād al-Dīn, that the cry of the falcon gives audacity to the kites.<sup>1</sup> Adieu." When the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn took possession of Aleppo, in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 579 (May-June, A.C. 1183), as we have already stated in our article on 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī<sup>2</sup>, he gave (the government of) that city to his son al-Malik al-Zāhir Ghāzī (No. 497), but he afterwards took it from him and bestowed it on al-Malik al-'Ādil, who proceeded thither the same year, and occupied the castle on Friday, the 22nd of Ramaḍān. * By a subsequent arrangement made with his brother Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, al-Malik al-'Ādil gave up the city to al-Malik al-Zāhir Ghāzī, and left the place on the eve of Saturday, the 24th of the first Rabi', A.H. 582 (June, A.C. 1186).† He then received from the sultān the fortress of al-Karak, and he subsequently passed from the command of one province to that of another, not only during the lifetime of his brother, but after his death. The history of his proceedings with al-Malik al-Afḍal, al-Malik al-'Aziz and al-Malik al-Zāhir is so well known that we need not enter into details<sup>3</sup>. It may suffice to state that he finally obtained possession of

<sup>1</sup> Black dirhams mean silver pieces of base alloy; the moneta nigra of the middle ages. Gold pieces alloyed with silver are called white dinārs.

---

1 The original text of this last phrase is so very obscure and ambiguous, that I may probably have missed its real meaning. If the translation be correct, the idea meant to be conveyed is equivalent to the following : the haughty tone of the sovereign encouraged the secretary 'Imād al-Dīn to employ insolent language. It must be acknowledged that the whole passage is singularly difficult, though not more so than most of the other official papers drawn up by al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil and 'Imād al-Dīn ; they strove to outdo each other in what was considered fine in writing, and, for the sake of farfetched allusions, expressed in well turned rhythmical phrases, they never hesitated to sacrifice sense to sound.

2 See No. 230.

3 See No. 461.

* 6 January, A.C. 1184.—Ed.

† 12 June.—Ed.

Egypt, and that, having made his entry into Cairo the 16th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 596 (2nd February, A.C. 1200), he fully established his authority in that country. In the biographical notice on Ḍiyā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Aṭḥir al-Jazarī<sup>1</sup>, which Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī has inserted in his History of Arbela, we read as follows: "And I found in his (Ḍiyā al-Dīn's) handwriting that the khuṭbah was said in Old and New Cairo for al-Malik al-'Ādil Abū Bakr Ibn Ayyūb, on Friday, the 21st of Shawwāl, A.H. 596 (5th August, A.C. 1200), and that it was said for him in Aleppo on Friday, the 11th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 598 (9th March, A.C. 1202)." Having obtained possession of Syria also and of al-Sharqiyah (the East Mesopotamia), success attended all his projects, and, in the year 612 (A.C. 1215-6), he became master of Yaman, to which country he dispatched (as governor) his grandson al-Malik al-Mas'ūd (the fortunate prince) Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Yūsuf, the son of al-Malik al-Kāmil, and generally known by the appellation of Aṭṣis. His son al-Malik al-Awḥad Najm al-Dīn (the unequalled prince, the star of the religion). Ayyub governed as his lieutenant the city and districts of Mayyāfāriqīn and, in the year 604 (A.C. 1207-8), he took possession of Khalāṭ<sup>2</sup> and Armenia. His kingdom thus received a great extension. Al-Malik al-'Ādil having assured the tranquil exercise of his power in all these states, divided them between his sons: al-Malik al-Kāmil received Egypt for his share, al-Malik al-Mu'azzam obtained Syria, al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf got al-Sharqiyah, and al-Malik al-Awḥad retained the countries which we have already indicated. He (al-'Ādil) was a powerful monarch, displaying great foresight and information, having well profited by the lesson of experience; virtuous in his conduct, always animated with the best intentions and gifted with consummate prudence; he was resolute in his undertakings, holy in his life, attentive to fulfil the duty of prayer at the regular hours, careful in following the example of the pious who directed their conduct by that of the prophet, and remarkably partial to the learned (in the law). It is not therefore astonishing that Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzi

1 His life is given by our author.

2 See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals. year 604.

(No. 574) should have composed and dedicated to this sovereign the (metaphysical) work entitled Tāsīs al-Taqdīs (confirmatio sanctificationis), which he sent to him from Khurāsān. We may conclude his history by stating that he was highly fortunate in every way: no other monarch ever left sons so illustrious, so brave, so learned, and so highminded as his; nations acknowledged their sway, and the finest kingdoms of the earth formed their empire. When the poet Ibn 'Unayn celebrated the praises of al-Malik al-'Ādil in the qaṣīdah of which we have already given a fragment (No. 658) and which rhymes in r he introduced into it the following eulogium on that prince's sons:

"He has sons, one of whom, in every land, leads an army against the foe; each, by the brightness of his forehead, seems a moon, but, when in combat, a lion; he presses forward to the fight, but, when the bright (swords) dispel (the darkness of) the dust and disclose to view the captured (maidens) of the haram, he retires. 'Tis a family pure in origin, excellent in race, copious in liberality, pleasing to behold. Their steeds scorn to drink from a stream unless its waters be encrimsoned by the blood of battles. They hasten with delight to the fire of combat, but they are not capable of hastening to the fire of hospitality<sup>1</sup>.

How many the exquisite qaṣīdahs which poets have composed on the members of this family! but I shall only notice the foregoing piece, because it applies to them all. The same poem contains the following passage in praise of al-Malik al-'Ādil; the author has displayed in it superior ability:

"(He is) the just (al-'Ādil), the king (al-malik), whose titles in every region ennoble the pulpits (from which they are proclaimed). In every land, his unsullied justice has formed a paradise watered by the heavenly stream of his liberality. So just is he that the wolf passes the night in the torments of hunger, although the brown gazelle is before his eyes. No believer in the direction (the true religion) can be troubled by a doubt respecting the excellence of Abū Bakr<sup>1</sup>. He is a sword of which the surface has been polished by glory, and of which the metal denotes the excellent temper<sup>2</sup>. His praise is not borrowed (metaphoric), neither are the wonders, of his prowess a forged narration. He is as far above former kings in merit as the Pleiades are above the earth. In his good qualities we find written all that books relate of Persian and Grecian kings. When the sagest minds are troubled with terror, the firmness of this king is only augmented. Strong of heart, his attacks and his intrepidity, in the tumult of battle, would appal the lions of al-Sha'rā<sup>3</sup>. (His is) the tongue which can almost declare what shall come to pass tomorrow, and that with a promptitude which dispenses him from reflecting: (his) the prudence which surpasses and disconcerts the prudence of others; his, the judgment and resolution which shame those of Alexander. His generosity leads him to pardon the gravest offences, and his noble pride turns him from obscene discourse. You need not listen when the history of other kings is read; (hear his;) in the belly of the wild ass is every sort of game<sup>4</sup>."

---

1 In the life of Ibn 'Ammār, No. 643 is a verse in which the same idea is expressed.

It is certainly an exquisite poem, to say the least of it. When al-Malik al-'Ādil had divided his states between his sons, he used to visit them, and kept thus removing from one kingdom to another. His general practice was, to spend the summer in Syria on account of the fruit, the snow and the cool water which are readily procured in that country, and he passed the winter in Egypt on account of its mild temperature in that season, and the absence of cold. He lived in all the enjoyments of life, and his appetite for food was most extraordinary; it is said that he used to eat up a roast lamb at a meal, and, in the gratification of his passion for the sex, his indulgences were equally great. In a word, he was permitted to partake of all the pleasures this world can afford. His birth took place at Damascus, in the month of 1 This verse applies equally to al-Malik al-'Ādil, whose name was Abū Bakr, and to the first Khalif.

2 Literally: et cujus indicat praestans origo substantiam. The poet meant to say: et cujus indicat praestantem originem substantia, we find frequent examples of such inversions. See de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tom. II, p. 399.

3 See No. 459, note on al-Sha'rā.

4 That is: the flesh of the wild ass has the taste of every sort of game. It is a common proverb. See Freytag's Maidani, tom. II, p. 316.

Muḥarram, A.H. 540 (June-July, A.C. 1145), or 538, by another account. He died on the 7th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 615 (31st August, A.C. 1218), at 'Āliqīn. The next day, his body was transported to Damascus and interred in the Castle, whence it was afterwards removed to the college bearing his name, and deposited in the mausoleum by the road-side. His tomb is the edifice which passengers remark through the trellis-work (which is set up) there. 'Āliqīn is the name of a village outside Damascus. The death of al-Malik al-'Ādil occurred at the epoch of the landing of the Franks (the crusaders) in Syria<sup>1</sup>. Their first operation being to march against him, he set out to meet them and proceeded to the vicinity of Damascus, that he might equip his troops and make the other necessary preparations, but, on reaching 'Āliqīn, he expired. The whole body of the invaders then abandoned their project against Syria and passed into Egypt. This brought on the celebrated war of Damietta. The date of this war is given in the life of Yaḥyā Ibn Maṣṣūr, surnamed Ibn al-Jarrāḥ<sup>2</sup>. Aṭsīs is a Turkish compound word signifying nameless: it is related that, as none of al-Malik al-Kāmil's children lived to grow up, a Turk who was present at his levee said, on the birth of al-Malik al-Mas'ūd: "People in our country have the custom of naming a child Aṭsīs when none of his children survive." Al-Kāmil then gave this name to his son. The people pronounce it Aqsīs, with a q (ق), but the former is the right pronunciation; so, at least, I have been informed. I have since found the precise date of the cession of Aleppo: 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī evacuated its castle on Thursday, the 22nd of Ṣafar, and Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn occupied it on Monday, the 26th of the same month.

668 AL-MALIK AL-KĀMIL, THE SON OF AL-'ĀDIL

Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Muḥammad, surnamed al-Malik al-Kāmil Nāṣir al-Dīn (the perfect prince, champion of the faith), was the son of 1 This invasion of the Franks is what is generally denominated the sixth crusade.

2 His life will be found in this work. Damietta was taken in A.H. 616 (A.C. 1219).

al-Malik al-'Ādil. We have already mentioned something of his history in the life of his father ; see the preceding article. When the Franks (the crusaders) arrived at Damietta, (A.C. 1218) al-Malik al-Kāmil had just assumed the supreme authority. 'Imād al-Dīn Aḥmad Ibn al-Maṣḥṭūb (No. 74) and a great number of other grandees were then with him ; but they joined the party of al-Malik al-Fā'iz Sābiq al-Dīn Ibrāhīm, the brother of al-Malik al-Kāmil, in consequence of a plan concerted with the former of these princes. Though al-Kāmil had discovered from some circumstances of their conduct that they meant to depose him and confide the sultānship to his brother, and though their intention had been divulged, he felt obliged to keep on good terms with them on account of the presence of an enemy in the country, and he acted towards them with great longanimity, it being then impossible to have recourse to expostulation and discussion. He continued to pursue this line of conduct till the arrival of his brother al-Malik al-Mu'aẓẓam, the lord of Damascus (No. 490). This was on Thursday, the 19th Dhū 'l-Qa'dah. A.H. 615 (6th February, A.C. 1219). In a secret conference with this prince, he disclosed matters to him and designated Ibn al-Maṣḥṭūb as the ringleader of the band. Some days afterwards, he (al-Mu'aẓẓam) proceeded, unexpectedly, to Ibn al-Maṣḥṭūb's tent and, having called him out, he expressed the desire of conversing with him in private. Ibn al-Maṣḥṭūb immediately mounted on horseback and rode off with him, unaccompanied. Al-Mu'aẓẓam had previously selected some men on whom he could rely and give them directions to follow. He then entered into conversation with Ibn al-Maṣḥṭūb, and continued to keep his attention engaged, whilst he gradually drew him off from the camp. He then said : " 'Imād al-Dīn ! this country is yours, but we wish you to give it up to us." Having then furnished him with a sum for his necessary expenses, he told the detachment (which had now come up) to take charge of him and conduct him out of the desert. Ibn al-Maṣḥṭūb, being alone and unable to resist, was obliged to submit. Al-Mu'aẓẓam then returned to his brother and informed him of what had passed ; having then recourse to another stratagem in order to send al-Fā'iz out of the country, he despatched him off to Moṣul for the purpose of bringing up reinforcements from that city and Mesopotamia. Al-Fā'iz died on reaching the city of Sinjār. These two individuals being thus removed out of the way, the generals who had conspired with them abandoned their projects and acknowledged, though much against their will, the authority of al-Malik al-Kāmil. The Damietta business then came on, but this is a subject on which we need not expatiate. The Franks, on obtaining possession of Damietta, marched out with the intention of reaching Old and New Cairo, and they encamped at the extremity of the isle on which Damietta is situated, the Muslims having already occupied the village of al-Manṣūrah, on the other side of the river. This river is the Ushmūm (branch of the Nile). Almighty God, by His favour and generous bounty, granted the victory to the Muslims, and, on the eve of Friday, the seventh of Rajab, A.H. 618 (27th August, A.C. 1221), the Franks abandoned their position. A peace being concluded between the two parties, on the 11th of the same month, the enemy evacuated the country in the month of Sha'bān (September-October) of that year. They had passed forty months and seventeen days in the land of Islāmism, part of the time in Syria, and the rest in Egypt, but God averted their evil designs; praise be unto Him for so doing! For the particulars of this event, we refer the reader to our notice on Yaḥyā Ibn Jarrāḥ. When al-Malik al-Kāmil was delivered from the uneasiness which the presence of the Franks had given him, he found leisure to think of the amīrs who had endeavoured to subvert his authority; and, having expelled them from Egypt, he broke up and dispersed their party. On entering Cairo, he took steps for restoring the prosperity of the country, and proceeded to the recovery of the taxes from all the quarters in which they were due. Al-Malik al-Kāmil was a powerful monarch and left an honourable reputation; he loved the men of learning (the doctors of the law) and, being a strict observer of the doctrines of the sunnah, (the authentic record of Muḥammad's acts and sayings) he adhered with zeal to the orthodox belief; he liked the society of talented men; in all his undertakings he evinced great foresight, never taking an unreasonable measure, and avoiding equally the extremes of parsimony and prodigality. Every Thursday, a number of the learned went to pass the evening with him, and he took a share in their discussions, questioning them on the obscure points of the different sciences, and treating them as if he was one of themselves. He frequently quoted the following verses which he much admired :

"Before you were mistress of my heart, you never turned away from the sad and afflicted ; (but now you do so !) and though you occupy a secure position (in my heart), I still hope to conquer (your disdain)."

He founded at Cairo a school for Traditions (dār ḥadīth) and established a considerable waqf<sup>1</sup> for its support ; he built also a large dome over the tomb of al-Shāfi'ī, and, having interred his mother near that imām's grave, he went to an immense expense in leading to it the waters of the Nile by a canal of great length. When al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Dāwūd succeeded to the government of Syria on the death of his father al-Malik al-Mu'azzam, (his uncle), al-Malik al-Kāmil, who was brother to the deceased prince, set out from Egypt with the intention of taking Damascus. Being joined by his brother al-Malik al-Ashraf Muẓaffar al-Dīn Mūsā, a prince whose life we shall give, they occupied Damascus towards the beginning of Shā'bān, A.H. 626 (June-July, A.C. 1229), after some proceedings too long to be related. Al-Kāmil then gave Damascus up to his brother al-Ashraf and received in return the cities of Ḥarrān, Edessa, Sarūj, al-Raqqah, and Rās 'Ayn, in Mesopotamia. On the 9th of Ramaḍān*, the same year, he set out to visit his new acquisitions, and, in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 626 (Aug.-Sept., A.C. 1229), as I was passing through Ḥarrān, I found him established there with the Egyptian army. Jalāl al-Dīn Khuwārizm Shāh was at that time besieging Khalāt, which city belonged to al-Malik al-Ashraf. Al-Kāmil then returned to Egypt, and in the year 629 (A.C. 1231-2) he set out at the head of a large army and took Āmid, Ḥiṣn Kayfā, and other cities, in the same part (of Mesopotamia) from al-Malik al-Mas'ūd Rukn al-Dīn Mawdūd, the son of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Maḥmūd, the son of Nūr al-Dīn Muḥammad, the son of Fakhr al-Dīn Qarā Arslān, the son of Rukn al-Dawlah

<sup>1</sup> See No. 21, note on waqf.

* 1 August, A.C. 1229.—Ed.

Dāwūd, the son of Nūr al-Dawlah Sukmān, the son of Urtuq. We have already spoken of Urtuq, the ancestor of this dynasty (No. 77). I learned from a native of Āmid, a well informed man that Āmid was surrendered to al-Malik al-Kāmil on the 19th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah of that year (October, A.C. 1232)*. On the 20th of the same month, his son, al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, entered into that city and, on the first day of Muḥarram†, in the following year, al-Kāmil entered also. Al-Malik al-Ashraf having died in A.H. 635 (A.C. 1237), and designated for successor his brother al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Ismā'il, the son of al-Malik al-'Ādil, (the other brother) al-Malik al-Kāmil took the field and occupied Damascus, after concluding a treaty of peace with al-Šāliḥ. He achieved this conquest on the 9th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 635 (28th December, A.C. 1237), and permitted his rival to retain possession of the town and district of Ba'labak, Buṣrā, the Arḍ al-Sawād<sup>1</sup>, and other places in the same country. Having established his authority in al-Šarqiyah (Mesopotamia), Āmid, and the neighbouring places, he left his son al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Ayyūb to rule there as his lieutenant and he appointed his youngest son, al-Malik al-'Ādil Sayf al-Dīn Abū Bakr, to govern Egypt in the same capacity. We have already mentioned, in the life of al-Malik al-'Ādil, that that prince sent to Yaman al-Malik al-Mas'ūd, the eldest son of al-alik al-Kāmil. Al-Mas'ud then occupied Makkah and united under his sway the provinces of Yaman and Ḥijāz. He left Egypt for his destination on Monday, the 17th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 611 (20th January, A.C. 1215); he entered Makkah on the third of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah (6th March), the same year, and the khutbah was then said there in his name; having performed the pilgrimage, he set out for Zabīd and took possession of that capital the first of Muḥarram, A.H. 612 (2nd May, A.C. 1215). In the month of the latter Rabi', A.H. 620 (May-June, A.C. 1223), he took Makkah from 1 This Sawād must not be confounded with the Sawād of 'Irāq. According to the author of the Marāṣid, it is situated in the Balqā, the province to the south-east of the Jordan, and was called Sawād (black) on account of the colour of its stones.

* 6 October.—Ed.

† 18 October, A.C. 1232.—Ed.

the sharīf Ḥasan Ibn Qatādah al-Ḥasanī<sup>1</sup>. Thus was extended the empire of al-Malik al-Kāmil. I was informed by a person who heard the khūṭbah pronounced at Makkah, on Friday, that the orator, on coming to the prayer for al-Malik al-Kāmil, pronounced these words : "(May the divine blessing be on him who is) lord of Makkah and its pious inhabitants<sup>2</sup>, of Yaman and Zabīd, of Egypt and Ṣa'id, of Syria and its heroes, of Mesopotamia and its sons, the sultān of the two qiblahs (Makkah and Jerusalem), the lord of the two 'alāmahs<sup>3</sup>, the servants of the two holy and noble cities (Makkah and Madīnah), Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Muḥammad al-Malik al-Kāmil Nāṣir al-Dīn (the perfect king, the defender of the faith), the friend of the Commander of the Faithful!" But these digressions lead us from our subject. In the year 633 (A.C. 1235-6), I saw him (al-Malik al-Kāmil) at Damascus on his return from the East, after having delivered the cities of that country from the hands of 'Alā al-Dīn Kayqubād Ibn Kaykhusrū Ibn Qilij Arslān Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Qilij Arslān Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Qutulmish Ibn Isrāyīl Ibn Saljūq Ibn Duqāq, the Saljūqid, lord of Asia minor (Rūm). The history of this important event would lead us, however, too far. Al-Kāmil had then in his train upwards of ten kings, one of whom was his brother al-Malik al-Ashraf. He continued in the height of power and authority till his death. Having fallen ill soon after he had taken possession of Damascus, he ceased riding out, and, during his indisposition, he frequently repeated the following lines :

"Tell me, my dear friends ! what may be the taste of sleep, for I am ill at ease<sup>4</sup>."

His sickness continuing, he died on the afternoon of Wednesday, the 21st of Rajab, A.H. 635 (8th March, A.C. 1238), and his

1 Ibn Khaldūn gives a notice on the Qatādah family in his universal history; MS. No. 2402 C, fol. 46v.

2 This passage is in rhyming prose, and it is for that reason, probably, that Ibn Khallikān gives it.

3 See No. 457. Al-Malik al-Kāmil had probably two 'alāmahs, one as sultān of Egypt and the other as sultān of Syria and the East.

4 Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn, who quotes this and other passages of Ibn Khallikān in his notice on al-Malik al-Kāmil (Nujūm, year 615), reads the last words of this verse فاني نسيت (for I have forgotten it). This is probably the true reading.

corpse was interred the following day, in the citadel of Damascus. I was in that city at the time, and was present at the cry raised in the great mosque of Damascus on the Saturday following; his death having been kept secret till then and not announced (the day before) Friday, at the hour of public prayer<sup>1</sup>. When the hour of prayer drew near, a herald stood up on the throne which is before the pulpit, and, having implored God's mercy on al-Malik al-Kāmil, invoked the divine favour on his son al-Malik al-'Ādil, lord of Egypt. I was there present, and the people uttered one general exclamation: they suspected that the king had died, but they did not acquire the certitude of the fact till then. His brother's son, al-Malik al-Jawād Muẓaffar al-Dīn (the generous prince, triumphant in his religion) Yūnus Ibn Shams al-Dīn Mawdūd al-Malik al-'Ādil, was then installed at Damascus as vicegerent of the sultānship and lieutenant of al-Malik al-'Ādil Ibn al-Malik al-Kāmil, sovereign of Egypt. This nomination resulted from a unanimous decision taken by those amīrs who happened to be present in Damascus. A turbah (mausoleum) was erected for the reception of the corpse, and this edifice communicates, by a trellissed window, with the great mosque. Al-Malik al-Kāmil was born on the 25th of the first Rabi', A.H. 576 (August, A.C. 1180)*; so at least I have found it written in the handwriting of a person who had been engaged in historical researches. Al-Malik al-Mas'ūd, the son of al-Malik al-'Ādil and sovereign of Yaman, died at Makkah on the 13th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 626 (9th April, A.C. 1227); he was born A.H. 597 (A.C. 1200-1). There was then at Makkah a Kurd from the town of Arbela, a man of great holiness and called the shaykh Ṣadiq (or Ṣiddiq) Ibn Badr Ibn Janāh<sup>2</sup>, who was making a devotional residence in the neighbourhood of the temple. When al-Malik al-Mas'ūd was on the point of death, he gave directions that none of his own money should be employed for the expenses of his funeral, and that his body should be delivered to the shaykh Ṣaḍīq, to be buried by him as he thought proper. On Mas'ūd's death, the shaykh shrouded the corpse in a cloak (izār) which he himself had worn for many years in his repeated pilgrimages and visits to the 'Umrah<sup>1</sup>, and had it buried as well as he could afford, giving it a poor man's funeral. Mas'ūd had also directed that no edifice should be raised over his grave and that he should be interred by the side of the cemetery near Makkah called al-Ma'lā<sup>2</sup>, in a tomb bearing the following inscription: "This is the tomb of one who stands in need of the mercy of Almighty God, Yūsuf*, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Abū Bakr, the son of Ayyūb." A dome was afterwards erected over the grave by his freedman Ṣārim al-Dīn Qā'imāz al-Mas'ūdī, who was afterwards governor of Cairo<sup>3</sup>. When al-Malik al-Kāmil was informed of what Ṣaḍīq had done, he sent him a letter of thanks, and the shaykh said, on receiving it; "I do not deserve thanks for what I have done; a poor man asked me to take charge of him, and I merely fulfilled a duty incumbent on every individual when I lent my services and buried the dead." It was then suggested to him, that he should write an answer to al-Malik al-Kāmil, but he replied: "I have nothing to ask of him." Al-Kāmil had told him to ask for whatever he required, but the Shaykh did not return an answer. All these circumstances were related to me by an eye-

1 The reading which I adopt is لأنهم اخذوا يوم الجمعة وقت الصلاة. Some of the MSS. offer other readings which are manifestly false.

2 The Shaykh Ṣadiq belonged to the tribe of the ḡlamaydī Kurds. He died at Makkah, A.H. 639 (A.C. 1241-2) and was interred in the Ma'lā (see note 2, p. 122). Al-Rāzī has inserted a short notice on Ṣadiq in the Biographical History of Makkah. See MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale No. 721, fol. 30 verso.

* 19 August. Ed.

---

1 The 'Umrah is a small chapel at the distance of an hour and a half or two hours from Makkah. Every pilgrim is required to visit it. See d'Ohsson's Tab. gen. de l'emp. Oth. tome III. p. 238, and Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia. vol. I, pages 176 and 322.

2 In the Marāṣid al-Ittīlā' and al-Azraqī's description of Makkah, this name is written الملا. See Burckhardt's description of it in his Travels in Arabia, vol. I. p. 226. It now forms a quarter of the city.

3 Ṣārim al-Dīn Qā'imāz al-Mas'ūdī acted with great cruelty and tyranny when governor of Cairo. In the month of Dhū 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 664 (September, A.C. 1266), he was stabbed to the heart, in the court of justice, by a person who meant to assassinate the sulṭān's lieutenant, the amīr 'Izz al-Dīn al-Mujallī.—(Al-Maqrīzī's Khīṭaṭ, chapter entitled سويقة السمعي).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives Aṭṣis.—Ed.

witness, who knew well what he was saying ; but God knows best ! Al-Malik al-ʿĀdil, the son of al-Malik al-Kāmil, continued to govern the empire till Friday, the 8th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 637 (31st May, A. C. 1240) ; when his own amīrs arrested him outside of Bilbays, and sent for his brother al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb. Previously to this, al-Šāliḥ had made an arrangement with al-Malik al-Jawād, by which he was to receive Damascus in exchange for Sinjār and ʿĀnah, and, in the beginning of the month of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 636 (January, A. C. 1239), he went and took possession of Damascus. Some time after, al-Malik al-Šāliḥ ʿImād al-Dīn Ismāʿīl, uncle to al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb and lord of Baʿlabak concerted a plan with al-Malik al-Mujāhid Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh, the son of Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad, the son of Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh (No. 272), lord of Emessa, for the purpose of seizing Damascus, and al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb having left that city for Egypt, with the intention of dethroning his brother al-Malik al-ʿĀdil, these two princes burst into Damascus with their troops. This event, which caused a profound sensation, took place on Tuesday, the 27th of Šafar, A. H. 637 (28th Sept. A. C. 1239), whilst Najm al-Dīn was stopping at Nāblus. The soldiers of al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb then returned home to their families in Damascus and left their chief at Nāblus with a few of his pages and followers. Al-Malik al-Nāṣir, the son of al-Malik al-Muʿazzam, and lord of al-Karak, arrived there soon after, and, having arrested al-Šāliḥ on the eve of Saturday, the 22nd of the first Rabiʿ,* the same year, he sent him into confinement at Karak. On the eve of Saturday, however, the 27th of Ranaḍān† following he set his prisoner at liberty. The details of these events would be too long to relate<sup>1</sup>. Al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn and al-Malik al-Nāṣir Dāwūd having then united their forces at Nāblus, al-Malik al-ʿĀdil was arrested, as has been already said. His amīrs sent off immediately for al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, and that prince, accompanied by al-Malik al-Nāṣir, having joined them, they entered Cairo on the second <sup>1</sup> See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 637.

* 22 October, A.C. 1239.—Ed.

† 21 April, A.C. 1240.—Ed.

hour of Sunday, the 27th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 637 (19th June, A. C. 1240). I was residing in Cairo at the time. His brother al-Malik al-Ādil was placed in a litter and brought into the city under a strong guard, and taken, by the road outside the city to the citadel, where he remained a prisoner in the imperial palace. Al-Malik al-Šāliḥ then extended the sway of justice over all his subjects; he treated the people with kindness, distributed alms, and repaired the mosques which had fallen into ruin. The history of his proceedings would form a long narration. On Monday, the 8th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 643 (1st October, A. C. 1245), he took Damascus from his uncle al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Ismā'il, but left him in possession of Ba'labak. In the year 644, he returned to Syria and entered Damascus on the 19th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah (28th March, A. C. 1247). He then went back to Egypt, but, in the year 646, he set out thither again, and, having arrived at Damascus in the beginning of the month of Sha'bān (November, A. C. 1248), he sent an army to besiege Emessa, which city had been taken from its sovereign, al-Malik al-Ashraf, by al-Malik al-Nāṣir, lord of Aleppo. He returned to Egypt in the beginning of the year 647 (April-May, A. C. 1249), being unwell at the time, and he stopped at Ushmūm to await the coming of the Franks. This people arrived on Friday, the 20th of Ṣafar, the same year (4th June, A. C. 1249), and, on Saturday, having occupied the island on which Damietta is situated, they took possession of that city and established themselves there, on Sunday, the third day. (This conquest they easily effected), as the garrison and all the inhabitants had fled and abandoned it. Al-Malik al-Šāliḥ then left Ushmūm for al-Manṣūrah, and his illness was at its height when he arrived. He remained there till his death, which occurred on Monday, the 15th of Sha'bān (22nd November, A. C. 1249). His corpse was borne to the New Castle, in the island<sup>1</sup>, and

1 The author means the island of al-Rawḍah, near Cairo. Al-Maqrizī has a chapter on this island and its castle, in the Khiṭaṭ. He agrees with Ibn Khalikān in stating that the corpse of al-Malik al-Šāliḥ was deposited there. The Castle of the island, called also Qal'at al-Rawḍah, Qal'at al-Miqyās (castle of the Nilometer), and al-Qal'at al-Šāliḥiyah was an immense fortified palace, embellished with colonnades, plantations, and all the ornaments which art could bestow. It was founded by al-Šāliḥ and destroyed by the mamlūk sulṭāns.

deposited there in the mosque. During nearly three months, his death was kept secret, and the khutbah continued to be said in his name till the arrival of his son al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Tūrān Shāh from Ḥiṣn Kayfā. This prince arrived at al-Manṣūrah by the road which passes through the desert. It was only then that they published al-Ṣāliḥ's death and that the khutbah was said in the name of his son. A mausoleum was afterwards built close to the college which he had founded at Cairo, and his body was transported thither in the month of Rajab, A. H. 648. He was born on the 24th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 603 (26th January, A. C. 1207); so I saw it written in the handwriting of his father, but I found stated elsewhere that his birth took place on the eve of Thursday, the fifth* of the latter Jumādā, and a third account says: On the 4th of Muḥarram, A. H. 604† Ward al-Munā (gratification of wishes), his mother, was a mulatto of a tawry complexion. Al-Malik al-'Ādil was born in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A. H. 617 (Jan.-Feb. A. C. 1221), at al-Manṣūrah, where, his father had stationed to observe the enemy in Damietta. He died in prison on Monday, the 12th of Shawwāl, A. H. 645 (9th Feb., A. C. 1248), in the Castle of Cairo, and was interred in the mausoleum of Shams al-Dawlah situated outside the Gate of Succour (Bab al-Naṣr). I indicate these events in a summary-manner; were I to enter into details, I should be led too far, particularly as my object is concision; I may add, however, that I was present when the greater part of them took place. Al-'Ādil left a child, a little boy, called al-Malik al-Mughīth; he remained in the Castle till his cousin al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Tūrān Shāh sent from al-Manṣūrah at where he had just arrived, and removed him to the fortress of al-Shawbik. On the catastrophe<sup>1</sup> which befell al-Mu'azzam, the guardian of the fortress of al-Karak sent to al-Shawbik for al-Malik al-Mughīth and remitted to him the 1 This catastrophe was the assassination of al-Mu'azzam by his own officers. See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 648, tom. IV. pages 511 and 517.

---

* 'Abd al-Ēamīd gives 15th (18th January) which appears to be more correct since the day tallies, otherwise it does not tally and it would be Sunday according to Mahler's calculation.—Ed.

† 31 July A.C. 1207.—Ed.

possession of these two places and the neighbouring country. He is still reigning there<sup>1</sup>. He continued in possession of that place till A. H. 661 (A. C. 1262-3), when al-Malik al-Zāhir Rukn al-Dīn Bibars, having halted in al-Ghawr (the valley of the Jordan), wrote to him to give up the fortress and promised to concede him great advantages as an equivalent. Having bound himself by oath (to act honourably), he induced al-Mughīth to come to his camp at al-Tūr (Tabor), in the province of al-Ghawr. It is said that Bibars purposely expressed the oath in equivocal terms, as he had not the intention of fulfilling it. Immediately on al-Mughīth's arrival, he arrested him and sent him a prisoner to the Castle of the Mountain at Old Cairo. From that moment, nothing more was heard of him<sup>2</sup>. He left a son called al-'Azīz Fakhr al-Dīn 'Uthmān; this prince, who was then a mere boy, received an appointment as amīr from al-Malik al-Zāhir and continued in his service till the conquest of Antioch, in Ramaḍān, A. H. 666 (May-June, A. C. 1268). He subsequently left Syria and proceeded to Egypt; but, on his arrival, al-Zāhir arrested him and sent him to the Castle of the Mountain, where he is still in confinement. Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam Tūrān Shāh died on Monday, the 27th of Muḥarram, 648 (1st May, A. C. 1250).

669 IBN AL-ZAYYĀT THE WAZIR

Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Abī Ḥamzah Abbān, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Zayyāt (son of the oilman), was wazīr to al-Mu'taṣim. His grandfather, Abbān, was a native of al-Daskarah<sup>3</sup>, a village in the district of Jubbul, and carried oil from the environs of that place to Baḥdād; but his own aspiring soul raised him, as we shall see,

1 What follows is evidently a subsequent addition, and is not to be found in most of the MSS. It was known, however, to al-Yāfi'i, who gives an abridgment of it in his Mir'at, year 635.

2 Abu 'l-Feda gives a much more satisfactory account of al-Mughīth's fall in his Annals, year 661.

3 The village of al-Daskarah was situated in the province of Baḥdād.

from the obscurity of a station so humble. His literary acquirements were of the most brilliant description, and his talents of the highest orders; he was an able philologist, an eloquent (writer), and a learned grammarian. Maymūn Ibn Hārūn the kātib relates that, when Abū 'Uthmān al-Māzinī (No. 115) arrived at Baghdād, in the reign of al-Mu'taṣim, his pupils and the persons who attended his lectures entered into the depths of grammatical disquisition, and, when any doubtful point set them at variance, Abū 'Uthmān would tell them to send and consult the young kātib, meaning the (Muhammad Ibn) 'Abd al-Malik here mentioned. This they did, and Abū 'Uthmān, to whom they communicated his answers, always acknowledged their correctness and coincided in opinion with him who made them. Di'bil Ibn 'Ali al-Khuzā'i (No. 213) makes mention of Ibn al-Zayyāt in his classified list of the poets (Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā), and he is spoken of also by Abū 'Abd Allāh Hārūn Ibn al-Munajjim in his kitāb al-Bārī. The latter writer, whose life will be found in this work, quotes also numerous fragment of his poetry. In the beginning of his career, Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik was one of the common *kātib*s (or clerks in the service of the state), and it happened that al-Mu'taṣim, having received a letter from one of his governors, ordered his wazīr Aḥmad Ibn 'Ammār Ibn Shādhī*<sup>1</sup> to read it aloud. In this letter the writer spoke of

---

1 "Aḥmad Ibn 'Ammār Ibn Shādhī,* a native of al-Madhār, (المذار), a town near Baṣrah, see al-Idrīsī's Geography), removed from that place to Baṣrah, where he purchased large estates and augmented his fortune. He followed the profession of a miller. Having gone up to Baghdād, his wealth became yet more ample, and it is said that he gave away, every day, one hundred dīnārs in alms. Having been described to al-Mu'ta'im by al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān (No. 505) as a man of strict integrity, that Khalīf raised him to the wazīrate when he deposed al-Faḍl. Ibn 'Ammār held this post for some time, but a letter having arrived to al-Mu'taṣim in which the writer spoke of the fertility of the country and mentioned that there was a great abundance of kald, the Khalīf asked his wazīr what the word meant. Ibn 'Ammār, being totally devoid of the literary information requisite for a wazīr, did not know what to say, and al-Mu'ta'im then ordered one of his followers, and favourites, Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt, to be brought in. Having proposed al-kalā (forage), and al-Mu'taṣim asked Ibn 'Ammār what the word al-kalā meant. The wazīr replied that he did not know; for he possessed, in fact, but a very slight acquaintance with philology. On this, al-Mu'taṣim exclaimed: "An illiterate khalif (is well fitted) with a low born wazīr!" Al-Mu'taṣim himself possessed but little instruction in (reading and) writing. He then ordered the attendants to bring in the first kātib they could find in the antechamber, and Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik was introduced. "What is the meaning of al-kalā?" said the khalif. "Al-kalā," replied Ibn al-Zayyāt, "in its general acceptation, signifies grass; if it is fresh, it is called al-kalā, and if dry, al-ḥaṣḥiṣh." He then enumerated the different sorts of herbage, and al-Mu'taṣim having thus discovered his merit, raised him to the post of wazīr, with full juridical and executive authority. We have already mentioned, in the life of the qāḍī Aḥmad Ibn Abī duwād al-Iyādi (No. 31), what passed between him and Ibn al-Zayyāt. Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Bimāristānī relates that Abū Ḥaḥṣ al-Kirmānī, the kātib (or secretary) of 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah (No. 482), wrote the following note to Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik: "To come to our subject: thou art one of those who water when they plant, and who edify the structure when they lay its foundations, so that the building raised on these foundations is completed and the fruit produced by these plantations affords an ample crop. But the edifice which thou hast erected in my love is now tottering and on the brink of ruin; the plantation which thou hast formed in my heart suffers from drought and is on the point of being parched up; hasten therefore to repair the edifice which thou hast founded, and to water what thou hast planted." Al-Bimāristānī adds that, having spoken of this letter to Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Aṭawī, the latter to him the same question. Ibn al-Zayyāt replied: 'Herbage just sprouting up is called al-Baql: when it grows a little longer, it is called al-kalā. and, when it is dry, they give it the name of al-ḥaṣḥiṣh. On this, al-Mu'taṣim said to Ibn 'Ammār; "Take you the inspection of the government offices, and this man will read to me the letters which I receive; ! He afterwards honourably dismissed Ibn 'Ammār from the place of wazīr, and conferred it on Ibn al-Zayyāt." (Al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah).

(Continued on page 128)

* 'Abd al-Ḥalīm adds : al-Baṣrī—Ed.

(Continued from page 127)

immediately expressed the same thought in a verse which he designed as a eulogium on Muḥammad, the son of 'Imrān, the son of Mūsā, the son of Yaḥyā, the son of Khālid, the son of Barmak ; I must observe, however, that I have since found the (first) three verses in ('Alī Ibn Ḥamzah) al-Iṣbahānī's edition of Abū Nuwās's poetical works (No. 162) :

"The generous Barmakides learned beneficence and taught it to the human race ; when they planted, they watered, and they never destroyed the edifice which they founded ; when they conferred favours on mankind, they clothed their bounties in a raiment which endured for ever. You once gave me to drink from the cup of your love ; why do you now present me the cup of your cruelty ? You allayed my apprehensions by kindness : know you not that your estrangement will arouse them ?"

The same idea is also expressed in (two verses which we have inserted in) the life of 'Abd al-Muḥsin al-Ṣūrī (No. 381). Ibn al-Zayyāt composed some graceful poems, such as the following :

"Hearken to me, O men ! and abstain from casting glances at the fair. Although love begins by exciting joy, it has death for its end. My friends said to me : 'Cease to watch the Pleiades ; sleep, for the wing of night is turned black.' And I replied : 'Has my heart then so far recovered, that it can distinguish between night and morning ?'"

I found in the handwriting of (a person who was evidently) a man of instruction, the following piece which is there given as Ibn al-Zayyāt's :

"(She was) a tyrant as long as I knew her ; an oppressor, yet may I never be delivered from her ! She makes (me) hope to gain her love, yet she refuses when I ask. When my tears betrayed the passion I concealed, she said : 'Though he should weep all his life, with tears of blood, I should not have compassion on him.' How often did I control my angry feelings and suppress my indignation ! how often was I weary of life, and yet I never felt weary of love."

The Khaṭīb (No. 33) relates, in his History of Baghdād that Ibn al-Zayyāt loved a slave-girl who was a professional musician, and his mind was so greatly troubled on learning that she had been sold to a native of Khurāsān and taken away, that his friends feared for his reason. He then pronounced these lines :

"How long the nights of the afflicted lover ! How long his watching of the Pleiades in the darkness ! What now remains for my garments to cover, in me who am consumed with passion, and whose body now appears as slender as the letter alif ? When Jacob exclaimed : 'Alas !' (ya asafā)<sup>1</sup> in his affliction, he did so for the length of the sorrow (al-asaf) which he had undergone. Let him who wishes to see a man who died of love, turn towards al-Zayyāt and observe."

In (Ibn al-Munajjim's) Kitāh al-Bārī we find an elegy composed by Ibn al-Zayyāt on his slave-girl, who died leaving a son eight years old. He thus expresses his sorrow for her loss and his pity for the child :

"Who has seen the child deprived of his mother ? sleep is far from him and his eyes pour forth their tears. He sees every mother, but his own, conversing with her child under the shades of night, but he lies in his solitary bed, holding converse with the sorrows of a heart in constant agitation. Suppose me able, in my strength of mind, to bear her loss with patience ; yet who can give patience to a boy but eight years old ? his force is weak ; he knows not that patience is a merit (in the eyes of God), and in his misfortune, he cannot take example by the conduct of (grown up) men."

Ibn al-Zayyāt left a diwān of elegantly written letters. Al-Buhturī has celebrated his praises in the qaṣīdah rhyming in d wherein he extols his penmanship and eloquence. Towards the end of this poem he says :

"I see all mankind, the commanders and the commanded, united in the praise. The learned appreciate thy talents in the sciences. and. on their word, the ignorant acknowledge thy merit."

<sup>1</sup> Qur'ān, sūrah 12, verse 84.

Abū Taimmām (No. 143) and many other contemporary poets praised him in their verses. There exists a number of fragments by Ibrāhīm Ibn al-‘Abbās al-Ṣūlī (No. 10) in which that writer attacks him; such, for instance, as the following:

“I had a friend near whom, when I reminded him (of my distress), I found such shelter as can be given by a chief, justly proud and lofty in his glory. But the vicissitudes of time passed between me and him, and they left us, one a tyrant and the other an implorer of assistance. In counting on Muḥammad as a support through life, I resembled him who sought to extinguish the fire by blowing on it.

Forced by the approach of affliction, I called on you to succour me; but in your hatred, you stirred up the fire of misfortune to consume me. In calling on you when danger threatens, I resemble the woman who begged assistance from the inhabitants of the tombs. I said to her, when she multiplied reproaches: ‘Alas! what can I do? my honourable feelings injure my success! ‘Where are then the noble princes?’ said she—‘Ask me not,’ I replied, ‘they are dead.’ ‘How did that happen?’—‘Because the khalif has taken an oilman for his wazir.’

Abū Ja‘far, now in the height of power! fear a reverse of fortune, and rein in, for a time, thy pride in its career. If you possess to-day the object of thy hopes, think that, to-morrow, my hopes may be crowned like thine. If, in visiting Muḥammad, I sometimes met with a repulse, yet I have often avoided him of my own accord. Am I not placed under an obligation to a man like Muḥammad when he spares me the necessity of being grateful for his favours.

Fortune hath procured thee wealth, and, once poor, thou art become rich. But wealth hath disclosed the vile qualities which lay concealed under the robe of thy poverty.”

Al-Ṣūlī attacks him in other passages besides these, but illustrious men have always been the object of praise and vituperation.

1 The poet's wife or mistress reproached him with not gaining money by celebrating the praises of great, and he replied that his honourable feelings prevented him from extolling the unworthy.

tion. Ibn al-Zayyāt composed a satire of ninety verses against the qādī Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād, to which the latter replied by the two following lines :

"A satire of ninety verses is less to the purpose than its meaning condensed into a single verse: How much the state requires a shower of rain to wash away that filthy stain of oil!"

The author of the Iqd (No. 45) attributes these last verses to 'Alī Ibn al-Jahm (No. 437), but the author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī gives them as Ibn Abī Duwād's.

*[When Ibn al-Zayyāt heard of this epigram, he replied :

"You defiled the state with your pitch, and nothing could clean it till we rubbed it with our oil!."

To make this allusion intelligible, it is necessary to observe that Abū Duwād's grandfather sold pitch at-Başrah.] On the death of al-Mu'taṣim and the accession of his son al-Wāḥiq Hārūn, Ibn al-Zayyāt pronounced the following verses :

"When they returned after depositing the best of the dead in the best of tombs, I said : 'God can never repair the misfortune which the people suffer in losing one like thee, but by giving them (a prince like) Harūn.'"

Al-wāḥiq, in his father's lifetime, had conceived a violent hatred against Ibn al-Zayyāt, but, when he heard these verses, he confirmed him in the possession of all the authority which he had exercised during the reign of al-Mu'taṣim. He had even sworn by a most solemn oath<sup>2</sup> that, on his accession, he would cast the wazīr down from the height of his power ; but, having ordered the *kātib*s, after he had assumed the supreme command, to draw up a notice relative to the ceremonies to be observed at his

1 These verses have been already given, with some variation, in the life of Ibn Abī Duwād ; see No. 31.

2 According to the author of the al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah he vowed to make a pilgrimage to Makkah, to manumit all his slaves, and bestow large sums in alms, in case he did not wreak vengeance on Ibn al-Zayyāt.

* ! ] Abd al-Ḥamīd omitted this passage—Ed.

inauguration, he was dissatisfied with the draughts which they submitted to his examination, and the only one which met his approval was that which Ibn al-Zayyāt wrote out subsequently to their failure. This document he ordered to be adopted for the model of all the copies of the notice, and he proceeded to expiate the breach of his vow according to the legal formalities. "Money," said he, "can be replaced, and so can the sum given to redeem a broken vow, but we can have no equivalent for the empire or for such a man as Ibn al-Zayyāt." Al-Mutawakkil, the successor of al-Wāṭḥiq, bore a violent rancour towards the wazīr, and, on the fortieth day after his accession, he gratified his animosity by putting him under arrest and confiscating his property. The motive which led him to this act of vengeance was that, on the death of his brother, al-Wāṭḥiq, Muḥammad Ibn al-Zayyāt had proposed to raise the deceased khalif's son to the throne, whilst the qāḍī Ibn Abī Duwād recommended that al-Mutawakkil should be chosen. To accomplish his purpose, the qāḍī displayed the utmost activity, and he carried his zeal so far that he placed, with his own hands, the turban on al-Mutawakkil's head and the Prophet's mantle on his shoulders, after which, he kissed him on the forehead. Under the reign of al-Wāṭḥiq, whenever al-Mutawakkil went to see the wazīr, the latter received him with a frowning look, and accosted him in the rudest terms; hoping, by this line of conduct, to ingratiate himself yet more with his sovereign. Al-Mutawakkil's hatred was excited by this treatment, and if, on his accession to power, he abstained for a time from venting his anger on Ibn al-Zayyāt, it was only to allay his apprehensions and prevent him from concealing his money. In order, therefore, to inspire him with a false security, he chose him for wazīr, whilst he complacently listened to the suggestions of the qāḍī Ibn Abī Duwād, who pushed him on to vengeance. When he at length arrested Ibn al-Zayyāt and put him to death in the manner which we shall relate lower down, he could only discover, of all his wazīr's possessions, farms, and treasures, property to the value of one hundred thousand dinārs. He then repented of what he had done, and finding no one capable of replacing him, he said to Ibn Abī Duwād: "You inspired me with vain hopes, and incensed me against a man whom I shall never be able to replace." When Ibn al-Zayyāt was wazīr, he caused a large lantern<sup>1</sup> to be framed of iron and fastened with nails, the sharp points of which projected inwards, like needles. In this machine he used to torture the officers of the civil administration and the other persons from whom he meant to extort money: as often as the victim turned round or moved from the intensity of his sufferings, the nails entered into his body and put him to excruciating pain. Ibn al-Zayyāt was the first who ever imagined such an instrument of torture. When the sufferer cried out to him: "O wazīr! have compassion on me!" he used to answer: "Compassion is mere weakness of character." It happened however that, when he was himself imprisoned by al-Mutawakkil, that khalif ordered him to be chained in irons of thirty pounds weight and put into the same lantern. To his cry of: "O Commander of the faithful! have compassion on me!" he answered in the words so often addressed by the wazīr to other sufferers: "Compassion is mere weakness of character<sup>2</sup>". Whilst undergoing these torments, Ibn al-Zayyāt asked for ink and paper, and wrote as follows:

"Such is the way of earthly things: from day to day, they fleet on and pass away as visions seen in sleep. Cease repining! such events are the vicissitudes which fortune transmits from man to man."

These lines he sent to al-Mutawakkil, who was prevented by business from attending to them, but, the next morning, he read them and gave orders to deliver the wazīr. When they came to take him out, they found him dead. This was in A.H. 223. He had passed forty days in the lantern. His arrest took place on the 8th of Šafar, of that year (September, A.C. 847)*. After his death, the following lines were found written with charcoal on the side of the lantern, in his own hand:

1 The word is tannūr: it appears from M. de Sacy's life of al-Ḥākim, Exposé de l'Histoire des Druzes, page CCCLXV, that these lanterns were sometimes of enormous size.

2 The author of the al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah states positively that Ibn al-Zayyāt was tyrannical, overbearing hard-hearted, and inhuman. He alludes also to the story of the lantern.

* 23rd September.—Ed.

"Let him who knows where sleep is to be found, direct towards it one who longs for it; may God have mercy on the compassionate man who will lead sleep to my eyes! I wake, but he sleeps by whom I am despised."

Aḥmad al-Aḥwal relates as follows: "When Ibn al-Zayyāt was arrested, I contrived to gain admittance, and, finding him heavily ironed, I said. 'I am deeply grieved at what I see;' on which he pronounced these words:

"Ask the dwellings of the tribe who changed their aspect and destoryed the traces of their existence? 'Tis Fortune; when she favours most, her favours turn to afflictions. The world is like a fleeting shadow; let us praise God! 'twas thus He predestined it to be."

When he was put in the lantern, his slave said to him: "Thou art come, my lord, to this, and hast not left a single man (inclined by gratitude) to speak thy praise." To this he answered: "Of what use to the Barmakides was their beneficence?" The slave replied: "It makes you think of them now." Ibn al-Zayyāt acknowledged the truth of his words.

670 IBN AL-'AMĪD THE KĀTĪB

Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Abī 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad the kātib, surnamed Ibn al-'Amīd (the son of al-'Amīd), was wazīr to Rukn al-Dawlah Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn Buwayh al-Daylamī, the father of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah (No. 168 and No. 507). The title of al-'Amīd (the column) had been given to his father by the people of Khurāsān, in attributing to this word an intensive signification, according to their custom<sup>1</sup>. His father

1 It is well known that the regular diminutive form fu'ayl (فُعَيْل) assumes, in some cases, an intensive signification; thus 'umayd (a little column, a pilaster) may bear the signification of a large column. This circumstance induced me to suppose that the name of this wazīr should be pronounced 'umayd, and M. de Sacy was so deeply impressed with the same opinion that, in translating the

(Continued on page 136)

was a man of merit and displayed considerable abilities as an epistolary writer and a philologist. Ibn al-'Amīd succeeded Abū 'Alī 'l-Qummī as wazīr, in the year 328 (A. C. 939-40). He possessed a moderate degree of information in astronomy and the philosophical sciences, but, in philology and epistolary composition he surpassed all his contemporaries, and was (therefore) called the second Jāhiz (No. 481). (As a wazīr) he exercised unbounded authority and great influence. Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) received the surname of al-Ṣāhib (the companion) from the fact of his being the constant companion and follower of Ibn al-'Amīd. The abilities of Ibn al-'Amīd as an epistolary writer were of the highest order, and al-Tha'ālibī (No. 356) said, on this subject, in his Yatīmah, that epistolary writing began with 'Abd al-Ḥamīd (No. 380) and finished with Ibn al-'Amīd. The Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād having made a journey to Baghdād, was asked by Ibn al-'Amīd, on his return, how he found that city :

(Continued from page 135)

passage to which the present note refers, he wrote : "Il avait reçu ce surnom d'après l'usage ou sont les habitants de Khurasan, d'employer les diminutifs comme un signe d'estime et de considération." (Chrestomathie, t. II, p. 58.) He then adds : "Ceci prouve qu'on doit prononcer Omaïd et non pas 'Amīd.'" I must however observe that, in the Arabic text of the passage (which I have translated literally), the equivalent of this word diminutifs does not exist ; and, to prove that the name should be pronounced 'Amīd', not 'Umayd', I shall refer to the versified proverb : Epistolary writing commenced with 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, and ended with Ibn al-'Amīd. I shall also refer to the diwān of al-Mutanabbī ; in all the manuscripts, the poems addressed to this wazīr are entitled al-'Amīdiyyāt, with the vowel points clearly marked, and in these pieces, the word العمد is invariably pointed so as to be read al-'Amīd. M. de Sacy has therefore misunderstood the observation of Ibn Khalikān, but his error was almost inevitable, owing to the vagueness of our author's expression. I believe that Ibn Khalikān meant to say that the people of Khurāsān give to the form fa'il فاعل an intensive signification, and this we know is an irregularity. The commentators of the Qur'ān and all the grammarians who explain the words Bism Allāh al-Raḥmān al-Raḥīm (In the name of God, the Merciful, the Clement!) attribute to Raḥīm, in consequence of its form (fa'il), a much less comprehensive signification than to the word Raḥmān. It is therefore an established principle of Arabic grammar that the form a'il expresses less than fa'lān and some other forms. But it appears that in Khurāsān it was considered to express more and to be really the intensive form, and this is what our author intended to say.

"Baghdād," replied the Šāhib, "holds the same place amongst other cities as your lordship (al-ustād) amongst other men." It must be here observed that Ibn al-'Amīd was addressed by the title of al-ustād. This wazīr was an able ruler and administered the empire with firmness and talent: the most celebrated poets repaired to his court from distant countries and recited poems of the highest beauty in his praise. Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Mtuanabbī (No. 49) went to see him at Arrajān and eulogized him in a number of qaṣīdahs, one of them beginning thus:

"Be patient or impatient under suffering, thy passion will still appear; thy tears may flow or not, 'twill still be seen that thou art weeping."

In this poem he manages the transition to his subject in the following manner:

"To Arjān, my rapid steeds! such is my firm resolution, which leaves the spears (of all opposers) broken behind it. Had I acted as you (my slothful steeds) desired, your troop had never cloven the clouds of dust (but stayed at home in idleness). Hasten to Abu 'l-Faql! to him whose aspect relieves me from my vow! no richer ocean in pearls (virtues) is ever visited by man<sup>1</sup>. The human race gave their opinion (fatwā) that his aspect (would release me from the vow of visiting the ocean), and God forbid that I should be restrained or should abstain (from its fulfilment)! I have formed a bracelet for the hand which first waves to announce Ibn al-'Amīd, and for the first servant who (at his sight) cries (with exultation) Allāh Akbar (God is great)!"

The same poem contains the following passage:

"Who will tell the Arabs of the desert that, on leaving them, I saw (in one man) Aristotle and Alexander? They sacrificed for my table their camels ten months pregnant, but he gave me hospitality who sacrifices bags of gold for his guest. I then heard a deep student in the books of Ptolemy, who ruled with sovereign power, and who enjoyed, with equal pleasure, the life of the desert and of the town; (united in him) I met all the men of talent (of ancient days); God seems to have restored us their persons and their times; they were first drawn up in order, like sums for calculation; then came the amount, because you (O learned wazir!) came the last!."

---

<sup>1</sup> Humidity and generosity are synonymous in Arabic poetry. To call a generous patron an ocean is the highest praise a poet can bestow.

This is one of the most exquisite qaṣīdahs ever composed. Ibn al-Hamadḥānī says, in the 'Uyūn al-Siyar'<sup>2</sup>, that Ibn al-'Amīd rewarded the poet with three thousand dinārs. In this piece, al-Mutanabbī gives but one r to Arrajān, although it should have two, according to al-Jawharī (No. 9, note) in his Ṣaḥāḥ, al-Ḥāzimi (No. 599) in his Mā ittafaq lafẓu wa ifīraq musammahu (or synonyms), and Ibn al-Jawālīqī<sup>3</sup> in his Mughrib. We have already spoken of this qaṣīdah in the life of Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt (No. 130), and mentioned that it was composed in honour of this wazir when the author was in Egypt; al-Mutanabbī, however, being dissatisfied with his conduct, did not recite it to him, but, having gone to Fārs, he changed it to the address of Ibn al-'Amīd. Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Nubātah al-Sa'dī (No. 361) went to see Ibn al-'Amīd at Ray, and praised him in a poem commencing thus:

"(I suffer from) the pains of desire and remembrance, from the ardour of burning sighs; deprived of sleep, tears gush from my eyes. Alas! how many anxious thoughts has my heart concealed! The intoxication of youth has passed away, but its hurtful effects still remain: I am too old to gain the love of youthful maidens, and yet I cannot behold them with indifference. How happy were the nights and mornings in which I visited the court of al-Ruṣāfah<sup>4</sup>, when my youth, inebriated with delight, swept the ground with its robe of pride. I then made my

1 In these verses he means to say that Ibn al-'Amīd united in himself the talents of all the great men of former times, and that he, coming last, represented the sum total of which they were the items.

2 The 'Uyūn al-Siyar' appears, from the short account of it given by Ḥajjī Khalīfah, to be a collection of anecdotes or poems. He places al-Hamadḥānī's death in 521 (A.C. 1127).

3 His life will be found in this work.

4 The poet probably means the town of Ruṣāfah. See No. 1272, note.

ipigrimage to the stone of al-Šarāt<sup>1</sup> and my residence<sup>2</sup> in its shady bowers : the abodes of pleasure were my abodes, and the dwelling of joy was mine."

In the same piece he says :

"Life has no longer any charms for me unless I spend it in passing the wine-cup around, whilst I encourage the musicians to emulate the strains of the turtle-dove ; and then, let Ibn al-'Amīd appear, the torrent of his beneficence shames the rain-cloud and arrests its copious showers. The character of that generous prince is formed of the purest molten gold ; his gifts flow copious as the ocean-waves, and his renown diffuses around the perfumes of the gilliflower and the 'arār ; he scatters his gifts like the comfits scattered at a marriage feast ; he keeps so closely the secrets of a friend that his bosom is like the night in which no moon appears."

In the same poem, we remark also the following verses :

"Lofty enterprises are achieved by lofty minds, and to Abu 'l-Faḍl I sent on their nocturnal journey the inspirations of my heart."

The poet waited vainly<sup>3</sup> in expectation of a recompense for this piece, and he at length followed it up by another poem and then by a letter which, though he arrived at court in a most destitute condition, only served to confirm Ibn al-'Amīd in his indifference. He finally succeeded in entering into the wazīr's presence on a day in which he held a levee for the reception of the grandees and the chiefs of the civil administration ; posting himself then before him, he pointed at him and said : "O ra'īs ! I have followed thee as closely as thy shadow ; I have abased myself before thee as humbly as thy shoe, and I have swallowed the burning food of absence (from home) in expectation of thy gift ;

1 See No. 129, note. The poet seems to have compared Ibn al-'Amīd to the sacred stone of Makkah, but the meaning of the verse is doubtful.

2 Residence ; in the original i'timār (to perform the visit to the 'umrah) See note on 'Umrah No. 668.

3 I read علي instead of علي.

yet by Allāh ! I do not feel my disappointment, but I dread the sneers of foes ; people who gave me good advice, yet I distrusted them ; who spoke me truly, yet I suspected their sincerity. With what a face can I now meet them, and what pretext can I now oppose to them ? I have received for eulogium after eulogium, for prose after verse, nothing else but bitter regret and sickening misery. If success have a mark to make it known, where is that mark and what is it ? Those whom thou enviest for the praises which they received were formed of the same clay as thyself ; those whom satire covered with dishonour were like thee ; forward them and surpass the highest of them in exaltation, the brightest of them in lustre, the noblest in station !” Astonished and confounded at this address, Ibn al-‘Amīd remained silent with his eyes fixed on the ground ; but at length, he raised up his head and replied : “Time is too short to permit thee to solicit favours in a lengthened discourse, or to allow me to offer a long apology ; and were we to accord to each other what we are led to bestow, we should only be obliged to recommence the same acts which give us mutual satisfaction.” On this, Ibn Nubātah said : O ra’is ! these (verses) are the utterance of a heart which hath long concealed its thoughts, and of a tongue which hath been long silent ; and, moreover, the rich man who defers (his generosity) is a despicable character.” These words roused the anger of Ibn al-‘Amīd, and he exclaimed : “By Allāh ! I did not deserve this reproach from any of God’s creatures ; for even less than I quarrelled with (my father) al-‘Amīd, so that we were led to mutual ill will<sup>1</sup> and unceasing discussion. But thou art not one of those to whom I owe an obligation and whose humours I must support, neither art thou one of my dependents for whom I may have indulgence ; nay, a part of that with which thou hast dinned my ears would provoke the spleen of the sage and overcome the firmest patience. And besides, I did not invite thee hither by letter, I did not send for thee by a messenger, I did not ask thee to praise me, I did not impose on thee the task of extolling

---

<sup>1</sup> The words قري عاتم mean : a supper of hospitality for which the guest must wait long, before he gets it. Such a supper is a proof of the ill will of the host. In this phrase, the expression appears to be taken figuratively.

me." To this, Ibn Nubātah replied: " 'Tis true, O ra'is! thou didst not invite me hither by letter, thou didst not send for me by a messenger, thou didst not ask me to praise thee, and thou didst not impose on me the task of extolling thee; but, in as much as thou wert seated in the midst of thy court, surrounded with all thy splendour (as if) to say: 'Let no one give me any other title than that of ra'is (chief), let no creature dispute my sovereign orders, for I, the kātib of Rukn al-Dawlah, am the head of the courtiers, the lord of the metropolis, the supporter of the welfare of the kindgom,' that circumstance alone appeared to be for me a sufficient invitation, although thou didst not invite me verbally." On hearing these words, Ibn al-'Amīd sprang from his seat in a passion and hastened into the vestibule of the palace whence he gained his chamber: the assembly broke up in confusion, and Ibn al-Nubātah was heard to say as he was crossing the vestibule: "By Allāh! it were better to eat dust and walk on burning coals than to endure this; God's curse upon literature since patrons despise it and those who cultivate it are its dupes!" The next morning, when Ibn al-'Amīd's anger had passed over and his self-possession had returned, he caused search to be made for the poet with the intention of offering him excuses and removing from his mind the disagreeable impressions left by what had passed; but none could discover whither he had gone<sup>2</sup>. The whole occurrence was a constant subject of regret for Ibn al-'Amīd, up to the time of his death. I have since found this poem and the conversation at the wazīr's levee attributed to a different person from Ibn Nubātah, and on looking for the qaṣidah in that poet's diwān, I could not find it. At a later period, on perusing Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī's Kitāb al-Wazlrayn<sup>3</sup>, I found this poem attributed to Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Razzāq Ibn al-Ḥusayn, a native of Baghdād, a philologist, a logician, and a poet, generally known by the appellation of Ibn Abi 'l-Thiyāb,*

1 I read باسا.

2 Literally: But it was as if he had sunk into the hearing and the sight of the earth; that is: as if he had sunk into the earth. No reasonable explanation has ever been given of this expression.

3 Ibn Khālikān speaks of this work at the end of the present article.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Siyāb.—Ed.

and that the discourse at the levee was held by Ibn Mamūyah*, a poet and a native of al-Karkh. The kātib Abu 'l-Faraj Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad enjoyed great favour in the sight of his sovereign Rukn al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh and held a high rank in his esteem, but he did not receive from Ibn al-'Amīd the respect to which he was entitled. At different times, he complained to him of his behaviour, but finding his remonstrances unsuccessful, he wrote to him these lines :

"What avail your riches if they render you arrogant to the poor? How often, when you came in, have we stood up, and, when we went in, you stirred as if to rise, but did not finish (the movement). When I withdrew, you never said: 'Let his horse be brought to the door'; as I said when you withdrew. If you possess science, what do you know which is not known by others. You are not mounted on the back of the empire, and we are not placed below thee, at its feet. We also held commandments like you and were deposed as you may be, but we were never haughty nor proud. We are equal in all things. Persevere in a reasonable line of conduct, or else give up your place."

The Sāhib Ibn 'Abbād composed a great number of poems in praise of Ibn al-'Amīd, and, being in Iṣbahān when the latter went there on a visit, he wrote to him the following lines :

"They said: 'Your (long expected) spring<sup>1</sup> has come.' 'Good news!' I exclaimed, 'if true; is it spring the brother of winter, or spring the brother of generosity? 'Tis that spring,' they replied, 'whose gifts secure the indigent from poverty.'—'Tis then,' said I, 'the ra'is Ibn al-'Amīd?' They answered: 'Yes.' "

Ibn al-'Amīd expressed his high admiration of the following verses :

"She came, fearing (discovery), to the curtain of the door which was closed between us, and at which the slave-girls already stood. She listened to my poetry, whilst her heart was touched by the inspiration of my qaṣīdahs. And whenever she heard a tender though she heaved a sight sufficient to burst her necklaces."

<sup>1</sup> Spring; in Arabic al-Rabī'. The poet means to quibble on this word which is also employed as a proper name.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Mawtah.—Ed.

Ibn al-'Amīd left some poetry, but the only piece of his which pleased me and seemed worthy of insertion, is the following, taken from Ibn al-Šābī's<sup>1</sup> Kitāb al-Wuzarā (book of wazīrs).

"I remarked on my face a hair which still remained black, and my eyes took pleasure at the sight; and I said to the white hairs, when their aspect struck it with affright: 'I conjure you to pity its loneliness. Seldom does a black female remain in a place when her husband's other wife is a white'".

The amīr Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Mikālī<sup>2</sup> gives the following verses as his in the Kitāb al-Muntaḥil:

"Choose your friends among strangers, and take not your near relations into favour; relations are like scorpions or even more noxious."

Ibn al-'Amīd died in the month of Šafar,—some say, of Muḥarram,—A.H. 360 (December, A.C. 970), at Ray, but Abu 'l-Ḥasan Hilāl Ibn al-Muḥassin Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Šābī states, in his Kitāb al-Wuzarā, that he died A.H. 359. God knows best! Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Amīd was visited alternately by attacks of gout and colic; when one of these disorders left him, it delivered him over to the other. Being asked which of the two was the more painful, he answered: "When the gout attacks me, I feel as if I had in my joints a ravenous beast, devouring me, mouthful by mouthful; and when the colic visits me, I would willingly change it for the gout." It is said that, seeing one day a labourer in a garden eating bread, with onions and milk, and making a hearty meal, he exclaimed: "I wish I was like that labourer, able to eat my fill of whatever I liked." I may here say, in the words of Ibrāhīm al-Šābī, Hilāl's grandfather (No. 14), in his Kitāb

1 The life of Hilāl Ibn al-Šābī will be found in this work.

2 Al-Ṭha'ālībī gives, in his Yatimah, MS. No. 1370, a great number of passages, in prose and verse, composed by the amīr Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad al-Mikālī, the most distinguished of all the members of the Mikāl family. Two other persons of the same family were eulogised by Ibn Durayd (see No. 611).

al-Tāji : * "Such is human life ; it is seldom free from trouble." I read, in a collection of anecdotes, that some time after the death of Ibn al-'Amīd, the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād passed by his door, and remarking that the vestibule, which used to be crowded with people, was completely empty, he recited these lines :

"Tell me, thou abode ! why art thou covered with sadness ? where are the ushers and the door curtain ? Where is he before whom adversity fled ? He is now earth enclosed in earth. Say without fear or shame : 'My master is dead, and sadness hath overwhelmed me.'"

I have since observed that al-'Utbi, in his Kitāb al-Yamīn<sup>1</sup>, attributes these words to Abu 'l-Abbās al-Ḍabbī<sup>2</sup> ; "but," says he, "some state that they were composed by Abū Bakr al-Khuwārizmī, on passing by the door of the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād." This cannot, however, be true, for al-Khuwārizmī died before the Ṣāhib, as we have observed in his life (No. 638). Similar to this is an anecdote related by 'Alī Ibn Sulaymān : "I saw," says he, "the ruins of a large palace at Ray, of which nothing remained but the door-way, and on that was written :

"Wonder at the vicissitudes of fortune, and be instructed ; this dwelling is a striking example of such changes : I once saw it filled with a crowd of princes<sup>3</sup>, and lights shining in every part of it : but solitude is now its only inhabitant : O how desolate the house when the master is gone !"

---

1 The work called al-Yamīn, or Tārīkh al-'Utbi is written in a very pompous style and contains the history of the Ghaznawid Sulṭān Yamīn al-Dawlah Maḥmūd Ibn Subuktīn, whose life will be found in this work. The author, whose name was Abu 'l-Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār al-'Utbi, was a contemporary of that prince and brought down his history to the year 428 (A.C. 1036-37). M. de Sacy has given an analysis of this work in the fourth volume of the Notices et Extraits:

2 Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Ḍabbī, a favorite of the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād, acted as his lieutenant and succeeded him on his death. (Yatimah, No. 1370, fol. 3.7, where numerous passages of his prose writings and poetical compositions are given.)

3 I read زاهیه بالوکی with one of the manuscripts.

* 'Abd al-Ḥmid gives : Tārīkh.—Ed.

On the death of Ibn al-'Amīd, his son Dhu 'l-Kifāyatayn<sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Alī replaced him in the wazīrate by the choice of their sovereign Rukn al-Dawlah. Dhu 'l-Kifāyatayn was a prince of great authority, eminent for his abilities, talents, and beneficence: it was to him that al-Mutanabbī addressed the five lines rhyming in d which are to be found in that poet's diwān, and form part of the eulogium composed by him on Ibn al-'Amīd. It is not necessary, however, to insert them. Al-Tha'ālibī speaks of him in the Yatīmah, in the article on Ibn al-'Amīd, and he gives there the following note in which Dhu 'l-Kifāyatayn requests a friend to send him some wine without letting his father, Ibn al-'Amīd, perceive it: "May God prolong your lordship's existence! I have hastened to pass this night in enjoyment, as if to take advantage of the moment when the eye of adversity slumbers; I have seized on one of the opportunities which life offers, to form with my companions a part of the band of the pleiades, and, if you do not aid us to maintain our rank in that choir by sending us some wine, we shall be (sad) like the daughters of the hearse<sup>2</sup>. Adieu." Al-Tha'ālibī gives also some pieces of verse composed by the author of this letter. Abu 'l-Faṭḥ continued to fill the office of wazīr up to the death of Rukn al-Dawlah (No. 168), and the accession of Muwayyad al-Dawlah that prince's son. He was again chosen as wazīr by the new monarch, but he held this post for a very short time. A profound jealousy subsisted between him and the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād, and it is said that the latter was the person who turned Muwayyad al-Dawlah's heart against him. That prince began by expressing his disapproval of Dhu 'l-Kifāyatayn's conduct and testifying the aversion which he had conceived for him, till at length, in the year 366, he cast him into prison. There still exist some pieces composed by Dhu 'l-Kifāyatayn during his confinement, and in these, he describes his miserable situation. Al-Tha'ālibī says that he lost all his wealth, and that they tortured him by cutting off

1 This surname signifies : possessor of the double capacity. The author of the Yatīmah, MS. No. 370, fol. 270, gives numerous extracts from his writings.

2 The daughters of the hearse (Banāt Na'sh) is the name given by the Arabs to the constellation of Ursa Major.

his nose and plucking his beard. Another writer states that one of his hands was cut off also, and perceiving that his case was hopeless and escape impossible, even were he to surrender up all he possessed, he tore open the breast of his robe, and taking out of it a paper containing a list of all the wealth and hidden treasures which he and his father had collected, he cast it into the fire. When he saw it entirely consumed, he said to the man who had him in custody; "Execute thy orders, for, by Allāh! not a single dirham of our money shall fall into the hands of thy master." He was then put to the torture and kept in suffering till he died. His arrest took place on Sunday, the 8th of the latter Rabi', A.H. 366 (4th December, A.C. 976)*. He was born in 307 (A.C. 919-20). At the time of the expedition, in the year 355 (A.C. 966), when the Khurāsānids returned from Ray after the grave event which occurred there, and when God had delivered (the country) from their perversity<sup>1</sup>, the ra'is Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Amid commenced the construction of an immense wall around the palace of his sovereign. This induced the army inspector to observe that such an undertaking reminded him of the common saying: post crepitum ventris stringere podicem; on which Ibn al-'Amid replied: "And that also is useful to prevent another from escaping." This answer was considered excellent. Ibn al-'Amid was appointed to office A.H. 337 (A.C. 248-9). In allusion to (the death of Abu 'l-Faḥḥ), one of his friends said:

---

1 "In the year 355, an army of more than ten thousand men marched from Khurāsān against the Greeks" (who had penetrated into Mesopotamia and Syria, where they laid siege to Antioch; see Abu 'l-Fedā's Annals), "and reached Ray. On their arrival Rukn al-Dawlah furnished them with provisions in abundance, but one day, those warriors mounted their horses, and proceeding to the dwelling of Rukn al-Dawlah's captains, they slew all the Daylamites whom they met and pillaged the palace of Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Amid the wazir of Rukn al-Dawlah. Ibn al-'Amid succeeded however, in defeating them and putting them to flight. They retired by the Ādhraḥā'iḥān road, with the loss of fifteen hundred men, and, having subsequently reached Moṣul, they entered Syria and encountered the Greeks." (Al-Dhahabī's Tārīkh al-Islām, MS. No. 646, fol. 237.)

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives 18, but then the day must have been Wednesday and not Sunday.—Ed.

"Family of al-'Amīd and family of Barmak! what has befallen you? your friends are few, and your supporters intimidated. Fortune took you for its favourites, but it then thought fit (to change its mind); fortune is certainly deceitful and treacherous!"

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, the son of Ibn al-'Amīd had the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād for successor; see the life of the latter (No. 93). He frequently repeated the following lines, some time before he lost his life:

"Men entered the world before us, and they departed from it, leaving it to us; we sojourned therein as they did, but we shall leave it to our successors."

The following piece is attributed to Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, the son of Ibn al-'Amīd:

"The delators who watched my conduct asked me how I loved her? and I answered: 'With a passion neither inadequate nor excessive'. Had I not mistrusted them, I should have spoken the truth and said: 'My passion for her surpasses all that lovers ever felt.' How often have my brethren asked me why I was so sad? And I replied: 'You see my malady, yet you ask me what is the matter!'"

Abū Ḥayyān 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Tawḥīdī, a native of Baghdād, composed a work entitled: Mathālib al-Wazīryn (the disgraceful acts of the two wazīrs) in which he inserted all the circumstances which could tend to the dishonour of Ibn al-'Amīd and the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād; he attacked them violently in this production, enumerating their faults, stripping them of all the renown which they had acquired by their talents and generosity, displaying the utmost prejudice against them and treating them with great injustice. This book is one of those which bring ill luck<sup>1</sup>; no person ever had it in his possession without suffering a reverse fortune, as I myself have experienced, and as others, on whose words I can place reliance, have experienced also. This Abū Ḥayyān was a man of talent and an author: he composed some works of great repute such as the Kitāb al-Imtīnā' wa 'l-Muwānasah (aversion and attachment) in two volumes; the Kitāb al-Baṣā'ir wa 'l-Dhakhā'ir (guiding marks and treasures); the Kitāb al-Ṣaḍīq wa 'l-Ṣadāqah (the friend and friendship), in one volume; the Kitāb al-Maqā'isāt (mutual comparisons), in one volume; the Mathālib al-Wazīrayn, in one volume, etc. This writer was still alive in the year 400 (A.C. 1009-10), as we learn from his own words in the Kitāb al-Ṣaḍīq wa 'l-Ṣadāqah. I have not found the word Tawḥīd noticed by any of the authors who have composed treatises on patronymics, not even by al-Sam'ānī; but it is said that Abū Ḥayyān's father sold tawḥīd at Baghdād, and that this tawḥīd is a species of date produced in 'Irāq. It is this signification which some commentators of al-Mutanabbī's poems assign to the following verse:

---

<sup>1</sup> Such is the meaning of the word محذور, in this case. It occurs also with a nearly similar signification in Abd-Allatif's Relation de l' Egypte, see M. de Sacy's translation of that work, page 250.

"They draw from my mouth draughts which are sweeter than the profession of God's unity (al-tawḥīd)."

671 IBN MUQLAH

Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan* Ibn Muqlah the celebrated kātib, commenced his career as administrator and revenue-collector in one of the districts of Fārs. He successively occupied various situations till he was at length appointed wazīr by al-Muqtadir bi-Allāh, who invested him with this office on the 16th of the first Rabi', A. H. 316 (May, A. C. 928) †. The same khalif arrested him on Wednesday, the 16th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 318 (June, A. C. 930) ‡, extorted from him a large sum of money, and banished him into the province of Fārs. The imām al-Qāhir bi-Allāh (al-Muqtadir's successor) sent a messenger to bring him back from that country, and appointed him to act as * 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: al-Ḥusayn.—Ed.

† 9 May.—Ed.

‡ 16 June.—Ed.

his lieutenant. On the morning of the Day of Sacrifice, A. H. 320 (December, A. C. 932)*, Ibn Muqlah returned from Fārs, and being invested with the pelisse of office, he continued to hold the post of wazīr till the month of Shā'bān in the following year. At that time, he withdrew into concealment on receiving information that the khalif suspected him of having taken an active part in the revolt excited by 'Alī Ibn Baliq (No. 467, note). Al-Rāḍī bi-Allah, who succeeded to the khalifate on the 6th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 322 (24th April, A. C. 934), chose him for wazīr, three days after his accession. Al-Muẓaffar Ibn Yāqūt, who had acquired the absolute direction of al-Rāḍī's affairs, conceived a dislike for the wazīr Abū 'Alī and concerted a plot with the pages of the chambers<sup>1</sup> for the purpose of seizing on him when he entered the palace; assuring them that such a proceeding would meet with no opposition from the khalif and that it would in all probability give him great pleasure. It happened therefore that, when the wazīr entered the vestibule of the palace, Ibn Yāqūt and the pages seized on him and sent him in to al-Rāḍī whom they acquainted with the circumstance; enumerating, at the same time, a number of crimes which they attributed to their prisoner and which forced them to take so decided a measure. The khalif returned an answer in which he gave his approval to their conduct. This occurred on Monday, the 16th of the first Jumādā, A. H. 324 (April, A. C. 936)†. They then agreed that the wazīrship should be confided to 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn 'Isā Ibn Dāwūd Ibn al-Jarrāh<sup>2</sup>, and al-Rāḍī, in consequence, invested him with that

1 The pages of the chambers (al-Ḡhilmān al-Ḥujariyah) formed a numerous body of youths who received their education at the court of the 'Abbāsīd khalifs and were afterwards employed in their service; see No. 462. Under the Fātimīd in Egypt, a similar institution existed, the members of which were designated under the title of the youths of the chambers (Ṣibyān al-Ḥujar); see No. 460; and, under the mamlūk sultāns, we perceive the existence of a seminary nearly identical, the al-Ṣibyān al-Ḥujariyah; see M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, t. I. p. 156. An establishment of the same kind is that of the Itch Oghlans (the youths of the interior) at Constantinople.

2 Speaking of this wazīr, the author of the al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah says: "When al-Rāḍī arrested Ibn Muqlah, he sent for 'Alī Ibn 'Isā Ibn al-Jarrāh
(Continued on page 150)

* 12 December.—Ed.

† 11 April.—Ed.

office and delivered over to him Abū 'Alī Ibn Muqlah. 'Abd al-Rahman caused his prisoner to be scourged with whips, and having put him to the rack and inflicted on him various other tortures, he extorted his signature to a promissory note of one million of dinārs (£ 460,000). Ibn Muqlah then obtained his liberty, and retired to his house, where he remained for some time unemployed. Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Rā'iq having then revolted against the khalīfate, and usurped the supreme authority, al-Rāqī sent to the insurgent chief and propitiated his favour by entrusting him with the government of the empire and creating him amīr al-umarā'<sup>1</sup>. He granted him also the administration of the revenue (kharāj) and of all the landed estates belonging to the khalīfate, besides which, he caused the public prayer (khutbah) to be said in his name from all the pulpits of the empire. Ibn Rā'iq having thus attained the height of power and influence, exerted his authority uncontrolled, and seized on the possessions and landed property of Ibn Muqlah and his son Abu 'l-Husayn. Ibn Muqlah then waited on Ibn Rā'iq and his secretary, and requested, in the humblest manner, the restitution of his estates. Being unable to obtain any thing from them but vague promises, he decided on employing against Ibn Rā'iq every possible means of intrigue, and wrote to the khalīf advising his arrestation; engaging, at the same time, in case his advice was followed and that he himself was appointed wazīr, to force from Ibn Rā'iq the sum of three millions of dinārs. The letter containing this communication was in the handwriting of 'Alī Ibn Hārūn al-Munajjim (No. 444). Al-Rāqī appeared inclined to give his consent to this proposal, and having then encouraged Ibn Muqlah in his expectations, he entered into a correspondence with him, and numerous letters passed between them. Ibn and offered him the wazīrship. 'Alī refused accepting, and recommended his brother 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn 'Isā to be chosen. The khalīf followed his advice, but, in a short time, affairs got embroiled and the new wazīr offered his dismissal. This led to his arrest. During his administration he did nothing worthy of remembrance."

---

(Continued from page 149)

<sup>1</sup> Amīr al-umarā' (amīr over the amīrs, or commander in ch'ef) this post, the highest in the khalīfate, was created for Ibn Rā'iq.

Muqlah finally obtained from al-Rāḍī the full assurance of his cooperation, and it was agreed on between them both that he should proceed secretly to the khalif's palace and remain there till their plan was put in execution. He then cast a horoscope which indicated the eve of the last day of the month of Ramaḍān as a propitious moment for quitting his house and riding to the palace, because the moon is then (concealed) under the rays of the sun, and such epochs are favourable for engaging in affairs requiring secrecy. On arriving at the palace, he was detained in a chamber and refused admittance to al-Rāḍī. The next morning, the khalif sent a messenger to Ibn Rā'iq informing him of what had occurred, and stating that this was a stratagem devised by himself for the purpose of getting Ibn Muqlah into his power. Frequent communications, in writing, then passed between them both, and, on the 14th of Shawwāl, A. H. 326 (August, A. C. 938)*, al-Rāḍī made known to the public the designs of Ibn Muqlah, and, drawing him from confinement, he confronted him with Ibn Rā'iq's chamberlain and some of the military chiefs. As Ibn Rā'iq had expressed the wish that Ibn Muqlah should be punished by the amputation of the hand with which he had written the horoscope (just mentioned), the declarations of the persons present at this confrontation were no sooner terminated, than the (executioners) cut off his right hand and took him back to prison. Al-Rāḍī then repented of what had been done, and sent doctors to attend him and heal his wound. Such was the result of the imprecation which Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Shanbūdh, the Qur'ān-reader, pronounced against Ibn Muqlah, as we have already related (No. 602), and it was certainly an extraordinary coincidence. Abu 'l-Ḥasan Thābit Ibn Sinān Ibn Thābit Ibn Qurrā (No. 125, note), one of the physicians who attended him, relates as follows: "I went to see him when he was in that state, and he asked me news of his son Abu 'l-Ḥusayn; I informed him that he was concealed in a place of safety, and these words gave him great comfort. He then began to lament and weep for the loss of his hand: 'With that hand,' said he, 'I laboured in the service of the khalif's and twice transcribed the Qur'ān;

---

* 14 August.--Ed.

yet they cut it off as if it had been the hand of a thief!' I endeavoured to console him, saying that it would be the last of his afflictions and that no other mutilation would befall him. To this he replied by the following verse :

"When a part of thee perisheth, weep for the loss of another part ; for one part is near unto another."

He at length recovered, and sent from his prison a message to al-Rāḍī, promising him a large sum and requesting to be appointed wazīr ; he added that the amputation of his hand could be no obstacle to his nomination. He had contrived, in fact, to write with a pen by fastening it to the stump of his arm. When Bajkam al-Turkī (No. 182, note), who was one of Ibn Rā'iq's partisans approached Baghdād, Ibn Rā'iq ordered the prisoner's tongue to be cut out. After a protracted confinement, Ibn Muqlah was attacked by diarrhea, and having no person to attend him, he was forced to draw water from the well for his own use ; this he effected by seizing the rope successively with his left hand and his teeth. He composed some poems in which he described his miserable fate and deplored the loss of his hand ; in these pieces, one of which we here give, he complained of the ingratitude which he had experienced in return for his fidelity :

"(To act thus) I was not weary of existence, but I trusted to their good faith and lost my right hand. To obtain wordly rank, I sold to them my spiritual welfare, and they deprived me of one and of the other. I used all my efforts to preserve their lives, but mine they did not preserve. After the loss of my right hand, there is no pleasure in life ; my right hand is gone ! depart thou also, O my soul !"

The following lines are attributed to him :

"I cringe not when pinched by misfortune, neither am I haughty when it spares me. I am fire when blown upon by the deep-drawn sighs of envy ; I am a gentle stream with my friends."

It was from th's passage that Sibī Ibn al-Ta'āwīḍhī (No. 654) borrowed the thought which he has thus expressed in one of his qaṣīdahs :

"Seek not to gain my love by (affected) scorn ; I am stubborn when roughly used. Kindness finds me like limpid water ; severity, like the hardest rock."

It was of this wazīr that a poet said :

"They say that dismissal from office is the infirmity (menstrua) to which noble characters are subject ; may God curse it for a hateful thing ! but the wazīr Abū 'Alī is one of those who expect no longer such an infirmity<sup>1</sup>."

According to al-Tha'ālibī (No. 356), in his Yatīmah, the following verses were composed by Ibn Muqlah :

"When I see a man in an exalted station mounted on the pinnacle of thoughtless pride, I say within myself ; 'Favours must be appreciated at their just value ; what a service he has rendered me in taking that place (of danger) ! '"

Ibn Muqlah continued in this miserable state till his death, which took place on Sunday, the 10th of Shawwāl, A.H. 328 (19th July, A.C. 940). His corpse was buried in the prison where he died, but, after some time, it was disinterred and delivered up to his family. He was born in Baghdād, on the afternoon of Thursday, the 20th of Shawwāl, A.H. 272 (March, A.C. 886)*. We have already mentioned in the life of Ibn al-Bawwāb (No. 432) that it was he who derived the present system (of writing) from the written characters used by the people of Kūfah and that he gave it its actual form : I mean to say, either he or his brother, because there exists a difference of opinion on this subject. I have observed also that Ibn al-Bawwāb followed the path marked out by Ibn Muqlah and ameliorated his system.<sup>2</sup> Ibn Muqlah uttered some sayings which are still preserved and employed ; such, for 1 Qur'ān, sūrah 65, verse 4. The poet means to say that the wazīr need never apprehend being deprived of his place ; a very unfortunate prediction, as we have just seen.

---

2 The characters introduced by Ibn Muqlah are what we call Sharqi, or Oriental ; they are merely a slight alteration of the so called Maghribi or Occidental which were in use before the promulgation of Islāmism.

* 31 March.—Ed.

instance, are the following: "When I love, I risk death; and when I hate, I inflict it." "When pleased, I favour; when displeased, I punish." "I like him who cultivates poetry for self instruction, not for lucre, and him who practises music for pleasure, not for gain." He has expressed a great number of fine ideas both in prose and verse. The poet Ibn al-Rūmi (No. 438) eulogised Ibn Muqlah, and one of the ideas which he expressed respecting him is the following:

"If the pen be master of the sword, (the sword) before which the necks are humbled and to whose edge the nations are obedient: (recollect) that death also, death which nought can resist, follows (from) words traced by the pen (of fate). 'Tis thus that God hath decreed, from the time in which pens were first made; (he decreed) that swords, from the moment they received their edge, should be servants to the pen."

Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muqlah, the wazīr's brother, was an accomplished and eminent kātib. It was really he who invented that handsome written character. His birth took place on Wednesday, at daybreak, the 30th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 278 (January, A.C. 892)*, and his death, in the month of he latter Rabi', A.H. 338 (October, A.C. 949). As fort Ibn Rā'iq, the ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416) states, in his History of Damascus, that he arrived there in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H: 357 (Sept.-Oct., A.C., 939),<sup>1</sup> and that the imām al-Muttaqī † appointed him governor of that city in the place of Badr Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Ikhshidī, whom he had expelled. Ibn Rā'iq then set out for Egypt and had an encounter with Muḥammad Ibn Tūghj (No. 663), the sovereign of that country. Being defeated in this engagement, he returned to Damascus, whence he proceeded to Baghdād. He was assassinated at Moṣul, A.H. 330 (A.C. 941-2). It is said that he fell by the hand of Nāṣir al-Dawlah al-Ḥasan Ibn Ḥamdān (No. 167).

1 According to Ibn al-Aṭhir, the city of Damascus fell into the hands of Ibn Rā'iq in the year 328; and al-Muttaqī was proclaimed khalif in 329.

* 5 January.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Muqtafī.—Ed.

672 IBN BAQIYAH THE WAZIR

Abu 'l-Ṭāhir Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad* Ibn Baqiyah Ibn 'Alī, surnamed Nāṣir al-Dawlah (assister of the empire) and wazīr to 'Izz al-Dawlah Bakḥtiyār (No. 106), the son of Mu'izz Ibn al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, was an eminent ra'īs<sup>1</sup>, a powerful wazīr and a generous patron. We have already spoken of him in our notice on 'Izz al-Dawlah and mentioned that the wax-chandler, being asked what quantity of wax-lights was allotted by that sovereign to his own service, replied :

"The allowance of wax-lights which this prince furnished to him was two thousand pounds weight every month." Now, wax lights being an object of little necessity, it may be conceived from this single circumstance how great must have been the quantity of things more essential and more requisite with which (the khalif) was provided. Ibn Baqiyah was a native of Awānā<sup>†2</sup> a place (in the province) of Baghdād. In the commencement of his career, he was appointed superintendent of the kitchen by Mu'izz al-Dawlah, and then passed successively through other posts connected with the service of that sovereign. On the death of his master and the accession of 'Izz al-Dawlah, his situation became still more prosperous, having merited the favour of the new monarch by the zeal which he had displayed in the service of his father. Possessing a pleasing address and a generous disposition, he advanced to more elevated situations, and, on Monday, the 7th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 362 (September, A.C. 973)‡, he received from 'Izz al-Dawlah his appointment to the place of wazīr. At a later period 'Izz al-Dawlah was led to arrest him for reasons too long to be fully related : we may, however, state, in

---

1 The word ra'īs (chief) is usually employed by our author to designate a person holding a high rank in the civil administration.

2 "Awānā is a village on the Tigris, surrounded by trees and gardens. It lies at ten parasangs above "Baḡdād, and is situated opposite to Akbara, from which it is separated by the river". (Marāṣid.)

* 'Abd al-Hamid omits this name in the text but mentions it in marginal note on the authority of Ibn al-Jawzi.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Hamid gives Wānā.—Ed.

‡ 8 September.—Ed.

summary manner, that Ibn Baqiyah pushed him to wage war against his cousin 'Aḍud al-Dawlah (No. 507), and, in the battle which ensued at al-Ahwāz, the troops of 'Izz al-Dawlah were defeated. The prince attributed this disaster to the counsels of his wazīr. In allusion to this circumstance, Abū Ḡhassān, a physician of Baṣrah, said :

"He remained fifty days at al-Ahwāz, directing the empire to its ruin. He embarked in an affair which began by blindness, proceeded through misfortune, and ended in disgrace."

His arrest took place on Monday, the 16th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 366 (August, A.C. 977)*, at Wāsiṭ. Being then deprived of his sight by the application of a red-hot plate of metal, he confined himself thenceforward to his house. When in the exercise of the wazīrship, he grievously offended 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh by some sarcasms which came to that prince's ears ; and particularly, in designating him by the name of Abū Bakr al-Ḡhudadī. This Abū Bakr was a man with blue eyes and a face mottled with red, who sc'd cat's meat (ghudad) at Baghdād and who resembled 'Aḍud al-Dawlah very much. The wazīr applied this nickname to him with the intention of gaining increased favour with his own sovereign, 'Izz al-Dawlah, who bore a deep enmity to 'Aḍud al-Dawlah, his cousin. When 'Aḍud al-Dawlah took possession of Baghdad, on the death of 'Izz al-Dawlah, he sent for Ibn Baqiyah and caused him to be trampled to death by elephants, after which he gave orders that the body should be fastened on a cross and exposed to public view before the 'Aḍudian hospital (No. 507) in that city. This happened on Friday, the 6th of Shawwāl, A.H. 367 (17th May, A.C. 978). Ibn al-Hamadānī says, in his 'Uyūn al-Siyar : "When 'Izz al-Dawlah Bakhtiyār conferred the place of wazīr on Ibn Baqiyah, who had formerly been chief of the kitchen, the people said ; min al-ghidārāh ila 'l-wizārāh (from the dish to the wazīrship), but all his defects were thrown into the shade by his generosity. In the space of twenty days, he distributed twenty thousand robes of honour." "I saw him one night at a drinking party," says Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābī (No. 14), "and, (during the festivity, he changed frequently his outer dress, according to custom :) every time he put on a new pelisse, he bestowed it on one or other of the persons present, so that he gave away, in that sitting, upwards of two hundred pelisses. A female musician then said to him: 'Lord of wazirs! there must be wasps in these robes to prevent you from keeping them on your body! He laughed at this conceit, and ordered her a present of a casket of jewels." Ibn Baqiyah was the first wazir who ever bore two titles, the imām (khalif) al-Muṭī' li-Allāh having given him that of al-Nāṣiḥ (the sound adviser), and his son al-Ṭā'i that of Nāṣir al-Dawlah. During the war which was carried on between the two cousins, 'Izz al-Dawlah and 'Aḍud al-Dawlah, the former seized on Ibn Baqiyah and, having deprived him of sight, delivered him over to 'Aḍud al-Dawlah. That prince caused him to be paraded about with a clock (burnus) over his head, and then ordered him to be cast to the elephants. Those animals killed him, and his body was exposed on a cross at the gate called Bāb al-Ṭāq, near his own house<sup>1</sup>. He had passed his fiftieth year. On his crucifixion, an 'adl<sup>2</sup> of Baghdād, called Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Ya'qūb al-Anbārī, deplored his fate in the following lines :

* It should be 17 of Dhu 'l-Hijjah (6 August).—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : al-Uḍḍi.—Ed.

"Exalted during life and after death, thou art, in truth, a prodigy ! the crowd standing around thee seems like those bands of visitors who courted thy liberality in the days of thy donations. Erect as thou art among them, thou appearest like a preacher, and they stand all erect, as if to pray. Thy arms are openly extended towards them, as thou wert wont to extend them when bestowing thy gifts. The bosom of the earth being too narrow, after thy death, to contain such glory as thine, they gave thee the sky for a tomb and the robe of the air for a winding sheet. Thy importance was so deeply impressed on people's minds that thou passest even now thy nights closely watched by faithful guards. By night, torches are lighted around thee, and such also was the case in the days of thy life. Thou art mounted on the steed which Zayd once rode in former years<sup>1</sup>. Such an advantage is a consolation, as it delivers thee from the envy of thy foes. I never saw a tree, before this, enabled to sustain all that was generous. Thou wert hurtful to adversity (in warding off its strokes from others) ; it therefore sprang upon thee and thou hast fallen a victim to its wrath. 'Twas thy custom to heal the wounds inflicted by misfortune ; it therefore turned against thee to take vengeance ; and time converted thy beneficence towards us into a crime. Thou wert an emblem of happiness for mankind, but, on thy departure, they were scattered by calamities. For thee my heart burneth with a hidden thirst which can only be assuaged by flowing tears. Were I able to perform my duty towards thee and acknowledge all my deep obligations, I should fill the earth with poems in thy praise and recite my lamentations alternately with the cries of the female mourners : but I am forced to withhold myself from thee, lest I should be taken for a criminal. Thou hast not a tomb on which I need implore the blessed rains to fall ; for thou art set up as a target to the impetuous gushing of the showers. On thee be the salutation of the All-Merciful ! may his blessings never cease to descend upon thee, morning and evening !"

<sup>1</sup> This account disagrees with that which has been just given.

<sup>2</sup> The 'adl' is (a sort of public notary ; see) the qāḍī's assistant, and acts as a public notary, see No. 29, note.

The body of Ibn Baqiyah remained on the cross till the death of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah ; it was then taken down and buried at the spot where it had been exposed. The following verses were recited on his death by Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Anbārī, the author of the piece just given :

"They inflicted on thee no dishonour when they fixed thee on a cross ; they only committed a crime of which they afterwards repented. They then felt that they had acted wrong, and exposed to public view (one who was) a beacon of authority. They took thee down, and in interring thee, they buried a mountain (of noble qualities) ; and with that mountain they entombed noble worth and generosity. Though thou hast disappeared, thy liberality remains unforgotten ; yet how many the dead who are thought of no longer ! Mankind share the (duty of) repeating thy praises, as thou used, unceasingly, to share thy wealth amongst them."

<sup>1</sup> In page 159 Ibn Khallikān informs us who this Zayd was.

The ḥafīz Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416) says, in his History of Damascus, that Abu 'l-Ḥasan, on composing the first of these elegies, that which rhymes in t, copied it out and threw it into one of the streets of Baghdād. It fell into the hands of the literati, who passed it one to another, till 'Aḍud al-Dawlah was at length informed of its existence. He caused it to be recited in his presence, and (struck with admiration at its beauty) he exclaimed: "O that I were the person crucified; not he! let that man be brought to me." During a whole year strict search was made for the author, and the Ṣāḥib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93), who was then at Ray, being informed of the circumstance, wrote out a letter of protection in favour of the poet. When Abu 'l-Ḥasan heard of this, he went to the court of the Ṣāḥib and was asked by him if it was he who had composed these verses? He replied in the affirmative, on which the Ṣāḥib expressed the desire to hear them from his own mouth. When Abu 'l-Ḥasan came to the verse: I never saw a tree, before this, to sustain all that was generous, the Ṣāḥib rose up and embraced him, kissing him on the lips; he then sent him to 'Aḍud al-Dawlah. On appearing before 'Aḍud al-Dawlah, that prince said to him: "What motive could have induced thee to compose an elegy on the death of my enemy?" Abu 'l-Ḥasan replied: "Former obligations and favours granted long since; my heart therefore overflowed with sorrow, and I lamented his fate." There were wax lights burning, at the time, before the prince, and this led him to say to the poet: "Canst thou recollect any verses on wax lights? and to this the other answered by reciting the following line:

"The wax lights, showing their ends tipped with fire, seem like the fingers of thy trembling foes, humbly stretched forth to implore thy mercy!."

On hearing these verses, 'Aḍud al-Dawlah clothed him in a pelisse of honour and bestowed on him a horse and a bag of money. So far Ibn 'Asākir. I may here observe that the person to whom allusion is made in the verse: Thou art mounted on the steed which Zayd once rode in former years, was Abū 'l-Ḥasan Zāyid the son of 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidin (No. 397) Ibn al-Ḥusayn,

1 This simile is by no means obvious.

Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib; he came forward in A.H. 122 (A.C. 740), and summoned the people to espouse his cause. This occurred in the reign of Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, and Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafī, governor of the two 'Irāqs, despatched al-'Abbās al-Murri with an army against the insurgent chief. Zayd was struck by an arrow shot by one of Murri's soldiers, and he died of his wound. His body was fastened to a cross and set up in the Kunāsah<sup>1</sup> of Kūfah, but his head was carried to the different cities of the empire and there exposed. Ibn Qāni' (No. 149, note) says: "This took place at Kūfah, in the month of Ṣafar, A.H. 121 (Jan.-Feb., A.C. 739)". Some say, in Ṣafar, A.H. 122. Zayd was then forty-two years of age. (Hishām) Ibn al-Kalbī mentions, in his Jamharat al-Nisab, that Zayd Ibn 'Alī was struck by an arrow in the forehead, towards the close of the day, and that his partisans carried him off. They then sent for a surgeon, but, when the arrow was extracted, the patient breathed his last. Abū 'Umar al-Kindī (No. 159, note) states, in his Kitāb Umarā Miṣr (history of the amīrs of Egypt), that, on Sunday, the 10th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 122 (12th May, A.C. 740), Abū 'l-Ḥakam Ibn Abi 'l-Abyaḍ al-Anasī<sup>2</sup> arrived at Old Cairo, in the quality of khayyib (preacher), bringing with him the head of Zayd Ibn 'Alī, and the people assembled at the mosque to hear him. It is this Zayd to whom the mausoleum is dedicated which is situated between Old Cairo and Birkah Qārūn, near the mosque of Ibn Ṭulūn. It is said, I know not with what certainty, that his head is interred there. His son Yaḥyā, lost his life in the year 125 (A.C. 742-3); his history is well-known<sup>3</sup>. He was slain at Juzjān (in the neighbourhood of

1 The author of the Marāsid mentions Kunāsah as a well-known place in Kūfah. It perhaps received this name because the sweepings and rubbish of the city were deposited there.

2 Abū 'l-Abyaḍ al-Anasī was one of the Ṭabī'is and particularly renowned for the number of military expeditions in which he bore a share. He died A.H. 87 (A.C. 706). (Nujūm). I can discover no information respecting his son.

3 For a full history of Zayd and his son Yaḥyā see the 'Uyūn al-Tawārikh', MS. No. 638, fol. 176, vol. III and al-Nuwayrī, MS. No. 702, fol. 73 verso et seq. Yaḥyā, the son of Zayd, effected his escape into Khurāsān on the death of his father, but was arrested there by the governor Naṣr Ibn Sayyār (No. 347)

(Continued on page 161)

Balkh), by Salim Ibn Aḥwar* al-Māzinī. Some say that he fell by the hand of Jahm Ibn Ṣafwān, the commander of the troops employed to guard the frontier<sup>1</sup>. All learned men agree that the like of this qaṣidah was never composed. Abū Tammām (No. 145) has inserted in the poem which he composed in honour of al-Mu'taṣim, a passage relating to persons crucified. This piece was written by him on the crucifixion of Ifshīn<sup>2</sup> Khayḍhar Ibn Kāwūs, the khalif's general in chief, and on that of Bābak<sup>3</sup> and Māzyār<sup>4</sup> in the year 226 (A.C. 840-1). Their history is well-known. We here give the passage from Abū Tammām's qaṣidah :

"The fever of my heart was cooled when Bābek became the neighbour of Māzyār; he now makes the second with him under the vault of heaven, but he was not like the second of two, when they were both in the cave<sup>5</sup>. They seem to have stood aside that they might conceal some secret news from the curious inquirers. Their clothing is black, and the hands of the samūm<sup>6</sup> might be supposed to have woven for them a vest of pitch. Morning and

(Continued from page 160)

He was subsequently liberated by order of the Khalif Walid Ibn Yazīd, but was massacred, with all his companions, by a body of troops which Naṣr sent after him.

1 In Arabic : Ṣāhib al-Ḥamiyah (الحميد).

2 See No. 31, note and 259, note. The true pronunciation of his name is Ifshīn.

3 See d'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale, under the word Bābek.

4 Māzyār Ibn Qārūn Ibn Zayd, governor of Tabaristān, revolted against al-Mu'taṣim, A.H. 224 (A.C. 839). He was taken prisoner by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir and put to death by order of the khalif. (Ibn al-Aṭhīr gives a long account of Māzyār's revolt in his Annals).

5 That is : He was not a holy man, favoured with the divine assistance, like Muḥammad. The poet alludes to the passage of the Qur'ān sūrah 9, verse 40, where it is said, speaking of the departure of Muḥammad from Makkah and of his hiding in the cavern of mount Ṭhawr with Abū Bakr : "If ye assist not the Prophet, verily God will assist him, as He assisted him formerly, when the unbelievers drove him (out of Makkah), the second of two : when they were both in the cave."

6 The samūm is the burning and poisonous wind which travellers generally call simoom. The true pronunciation of this word may be represented by sinoom, pronouncing the diphthong in the English manner.

* Abd al-Ḥamid gives : Aḥwaz.—Ed.

evening they ride on slender steeds, brought out for them from the stables of the carpenters. They stir not from their place, and yet the spectator might suppose them to be always on a journey."

Alluding particularly to Afshin, he says :

"They gaze at him on the top of his tree, as if they were watching for the new moon on the night which ends the fast (of Ramaḍān)."

This qaṣīdah is remarkable for its high-sounding style. Afshin or Ifsh'n, for so this name may be pronounced, was the surname given to Khaidhar Ibn Kāwūs. I have here fixed the orthography of Khaidhar, because it is often read as if it were Haydar. The Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Anbārī above mentioned composed the following lines on new beans :

"Studs of emeralds in cases of pearl, and enclosed in pods shaped like nail parings ; spring has arrayed them in a garment of two colours, white and green."

The Khafīf (No. 33) speaks of Ibn al-Anbārī, in his History of Baghdād, and observes that he composed but little poetry.

673 FAKHR AL-MULK THE WAZIR

Abū Ghālīb Muḥammad Ibn Khālaf, surnamed Fakhr al-Mulk (glory of the empire), was successively wazīr to Bahā al-Dawlah Abū Naṣr, (the son of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh), and to his son Sulṭān al-Dawlah Abū Shujā' Fannākhusrū. With the exception of Abu 'l-Faḍl Ibn al-'Amīd (No. 670) and of the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93), Fakhr al-Mulk was certainly the greatest wazīr ever employed in the service of the Buwyhid dynasty. His family belonged to Wāsiṭ, and his father followed the profession of a money-changer. Possessing a large fortune, he gave an ample career to his generous disposition, and the accomplishments of his mind were equalled only by his beneficence. Poets of the highest reputation visited his court and extolled his merit in qaṣīdahs of exquisite beauty, and Abū Naṣr 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Nubātah (No. 361) celebrated his praises in some beautiful poems, one of which, rhyming in n, contains the following passage :

"Every man who aspires to eminence has rivals, but Fakhr al-Mulk remains without an equal : alight at his residence and make known to him thy wishes : I answer for their fulfilment."

I have been informed by a literary man that, after the publication of this qaṣīdah, a certain poet composed a piece of verse in honour of Fakhr al-Mulk, and not receiving a recompense equal to his expectations, he went to Ibn Nubātah and said : "It was you who encouraged me, and I should not have eulogised him, had I not trusted to the engagement which you took (that my expectations should be fulfilled). Pay me therefore the value of my qaṣīdah." Ibn Nubātah satisfied, out of his own purse, the demand of the poet, and Fakhr al-Mulk, on being informed of his generous conduct, sent him a large sum of money as a present. Another poet who sung the praises of this wazīr was al-Mihyār Ibn Marzawayh, a kātib whose life shall be given (No. 728). He composed in his honour the qaṣīdah rhyming in r, which contains this passage :

"When my heart feels a slight relief (from cares) I inquire if grief be dead and if joy has returned to life, or if misfortune fears to assault me because I fled from it to the protection of Fakhr al-Mulk."

The poems written in praise of Fakhr al-Mulk are very numerous. It was for this wazīr that the accountant Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Karkhī<sup>1</sup> composed his treatise on algebra, entitled al-Fakhrī (the Fakhrīyan), and his arithmetical work, the Kāfi (sufficient). I read in a certain compilation that an elderly man having presented to Fakhr al-Mulk a memorial in which he accused another person of a capital crime, the wazīr perused it and wrote these words on the back of the paper :

<sup>1</sup> Abū Bakr al-Karkhī was wazīr to Bahā al-Dīn and bore the surname of Fakhr al-Dīn. His Fakhrī is a full and highly valuable treatise. (My deceased friend, Mr. Woepeke, published an analysis of it under the title of Extrait du Fakhrī. Paris, 1853.

"Delation is vile, even though well founded ; and if you meant it as a counsel, your failure therein is greater than your success. God forbid that (the accusation made by) a man dishonoured against a respectable person should be received ! and were you not protected by your grey hairs, I would inflict on you the punishment which you invoke on others, and thus prevent persons like you from acting in the same manner. Hide this disgraceful (passion of calumny) and fear Him from Whose knowledge nothing is hidden. Adieu."—Abū Maṣṣūr al-Tha'ālībī (No. 356) has inserted the following lines in his Yatīmah as the production of al-Aṣṣṣraf, Fakhr al-Mulk's son :

"The splendid train passed by me, but I saw not there (him who in beauty was as) the moon among the stars. Say to the amīr of the troops : 'Tell me, sir ! what hinders the lord of beauty from riding on ?'"

Numerous anecdotes are related illustrative of Fakhr al-Mulk's noble character. He continued in the enjoyment of rank, power, and honours till he incurred the displeasure of his sovereign, Sulṭān al-Dawlah and, being imprisoned by his orders, he was executed some time after, at the foot of the mountain which is near al-Ahwāz. His death occurred on Saturday, the 27th of the first Rabī', A.H. 407 (3rd September, A.C. 1017)* His corpse was interred on the spot, but so carelessly, that it was torn up and devoured by dogs. His bones were then restored to the tomb, and, on the following year, they were removed, through the intercession of a friend, and buried in a funeral chapel which stands there. Abū 'Abd Allāh Aḥmad Ibn al-Qādisī (No. 125, note), says, in his history of the wazīrs (Akhbār al-Wuzarā) ; "The wazīr Fakhr al-Mulk was guilty of a negligence in the discharge of his duty, and he received a speedy chastisement. One of his favourites had killed a man out of malice, and the wife of the person murdered applied to the wazīr for redress. He paid no attention to her complaint, and one night, as he went to pay a devotional visit to the funeral chapel near the gate called Bāb al-Tin, she met him there and said ; 'O Fakhr al-Mulk ! the request which I addressed to you, imploring for vengeance, and to which you paid no attention, that request I have referred to Almighty God, and I am now expecting the announcement of His decision !' The wazīr being then called into the sultān's tent, was arrested by his orders. 'Now,' said he, 'there is no doubt but that God's decision has been pronounced on the woman's complaint.' When the sultān rose to retire, they led off the wazīr, and conducted him to another tent after seizing on his wealth, treasures, and equipages, and imprisoning his sons and companions. He was then executed on the date"—above mentioned. "His confiscated wealth amounted to six hundred and thirty thousand dinārs, (£ 300.000), besides a vast quantity of furniture. It is even said that one million two hundred thousand dinārs, in specie, were found in his possession." The sharīf al-Murtaḍā (No. 418) composed an elegy on his death, but, as I neglected to make extracts from it, I am unable to quote any part of it here. May He be exalted, the Being subtle and All-knowing, Who worketh what He pleaseth ! Fakhr al-Mulk was born at Wāsiṭ on Thursday, the 22nd of the latter Rabi', A.H. 354 (27th April, A.C. 965).

---

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : Saturday and according to another version Tuesday.—Ed.

674 FAKHR AL-DAWLAH IBN JAHĪR THE WAZĪR

Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn Jahīr, surnamed Fakhr al-Dawlah (glory of the empire) Muwayyad al-Dīn (strengthened in religion), was a member of the tribe of Tha'labah and a native of Moṣul. Gifted with judgement, intelligence, foresight, and aptitude for business, he left Moṣul for reasons too long to be related, and obtained the place of director in chief (nāzīr) in the board of public administration (diwān) at Aleppo. Having lost this situation, he proceeded to Āmid, where he remained some time unemployed, but he had at length sufficient interest to procure from the amīr Naṣr al-Dawlah Aḥmad Ibn Marwān al-Kurdi (No. 72), lord of Mayyāfāriqin and Diyār Bakr, his nomination to the post of wazīr<sup>1</sup>. He continued to govern with absolute authority till the death of his master Naṣr al-Dawlah and the accession of Nizām al-Dīn, that prince's son. Being then admitted into the favour of the new sovereign, who treated him with the highest marks of honour, he brought the affairs of the empire into order and re-established the administration of the state on the same plan as it had been under the reign of Naṣr al-Dawlah. Having subsequently conceived the project of removing to Baghdād, he directed his measures towards that object, and, opening a correspondence with the imām (khālif) al-Qā'im bi-amr Allāh, he never ceased intriguing and lavishing money till Ibn Tīrād al-Zaynabī<sup>2</sup>, the naqīb al-nuqabā<sup>3</sup>, came to him and entered into arrangement. The preliminaries being terminated to his entire satisfaction, he left the city with the (ostensible) intention of bidding farewell to his visitor, but (instead of returning) he continued his route towards Baghdād. (Nizām al-Dīn) Ibn Marwān immediately sent after him to bring him back, but his efforts were unsuccessful. On arriving at Baghdād, Fakhr al-Dawlah replaced Abu 'l-Ghanā'im Ibn Dārist (No. 650, note) in the wazīrship, A.H. 454 (A.C. 1062), and he continued to fill this office during the lifetime of al-Qā'im. Under al-Muqtadi bi-amr Allāh, al-Qā'im's (grand) son and successor, he remained in place two years longer, but, on the Day of 'Arafah

---

1 "Fakhr al-Dawlah Abn Naṣr Muḥammad Ibd Muḥammad Ibn Jahīr was a native of Moṣul. He entered into the service of the concubine of Qirwāsh (No. 137, note), and then into that of Barakah, the sister of Qirwāsh. He was sent by the latter with presents to the king of the Greeks, and, on his return, he passed into the service of Quraysh Ibn Badrān (No. 647). Discovering that his master had the intention of casting him into prison, he took refuge under the protection of another member of the 'Uqayl family and then passed to Aleppo, where he became wazīr to Mu'izz al-Dawlah Abū Thumāl Ibn Ṣāliḥ. He afterwards removed to Malāṭiyah, where he met Naṣir (read Naṣr) al-Dawlah Ibn Marwān, who chose him for wazīr." (Ibn Khaldūn, MS. n° d'entree 2405, fol. 145).

2 We must read Tīrād, or suppose that Ibn Tīrād was the family name. Ibn Tīrād al-Zaynabī did not obtain the place of naqīb al-nuqabā till A.H. 491 (No. 650, note), whereas Fakhr al-Mulk received the visit here spoken of in the year 454.

3 See note 650.

(the 9th of Dhul-Hijjah), he was deposed by the khalif in pursuance of the counsels of the wazir Nizām al-Mulk (No. 171), and Ibn Dārist was reinstated in the vacant place. 'Amīd al-Dawlah Sharaf al-Dīn (column of the empire, nobleness of religion) Abū Maṣṣūr Muḥammad, the son of Fakhr al-Dawlah, he acted as his father's lieutenant in the wazirship, but on the removal of his parent from office, he went to the court of Nizām al-Mulk, the wazir of Malik Shah Ibn Alp Arslān the Saljūq, and having conciliated his favour, he continued with him in high credit, for some time, and then returned to Baghdād, where he occupied the place formerly held by his father. In the year 476 (A.C. 1083-4), Fakhr al-Dawlah accepted the invitation of the sultān Malik Shah and visited the court of that sovereign, where he received his nomination to the government of Diyār Bakr. He proceeded to that province, accompanied by the amīr Urtuq Ibn Aksab (No. 77), lord of Hulwān, and a numerous troop of Turkomāns, Kurds, and amīrs. Soon after his arrival, the city of 'Āmid fell into the power of his son Abū'l-Qāsim Za'im al-Ru'asā (leader of the chiefs), after sustaining a severe siege, and three months later, he himself took the city of Mayyāfāriqīn from Nāṣir al-Dawlah Abū'l-Muẓaffar Maṣṣūr, the son of Nizām al-Dīn and seized on the treasures of the Marwānid dynasty. This took place in the year 479 (A.C. 1086)<sup>1</sup>. We may here notice a prediction with which this event coincided in a singular manner. An astrologer went to Naṣr al-Dawlah Ibn Marwān and foretold to him, among other things, that a man of whom he had been the benefactor would attack the kingdom and take it from his (Naṣr al-Dawlah's) children. The prince, after some moments' reflexion, raised his head, and, looking at Fakhr al-Dawlah he said: "If these words be true, this shaykh is the man!" He then turned towards him and recommended his children to his care. Things fell out as was foretold; Fakhr al-Dawlah having invaded the country and taken its cities, as we have already related, but the details would lead us too far<sup>2</sup>. This Wazir was a ra'is of the greatest influence: his family produced a number of wazīrs and ra'īs whose praises were celebrated by eminent poets. When Fakhr al-Dawlah (Ibn Jahīr) was raised to the wazīrship, the poet Abū Maṣṣūr 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan, generally known by the appellation of Ṣurr Durr (No. 449), addressed to him from Wāsiṭ the celebrated qaṣīdah which begins thus:

1 Abū'l-Feda and Ibn Khaldūn (MS. No. 2402, f. 145 verso) place the fall of the Marwānid dynasty of Diyār Bakr in the year 478.

2 Ibn Khaldūn, loc. laud., has consecrated a chapter to the Marwānids.

"To satisfy the longing of a heart which will never recover from the seductions (of love), and the longing of a soul whose slightest wishes remain ungratified, we stopped in ranks at the (deserted) mansions,—dwellings which appeared like volumes cast on earth whilst we presented the aspect of their written lines. My friend then said, as the gazelle passed by: 'Is that the object of thy love?' and I replied: 'One like to it; but, if its neck and eyes resemble those of my beloved, it differs from her in the back and in the breast.' Strange that she should avoid a person with whom she is familiar, whilst the most timid of animals foregoes its fears and approaches near us! But the gazelles of 'Āmir<sup>1</sup> know well that lovers who visit them are the falcons (which they have to dread). Was it not sufficient for these dwellings that their suns (youths) have tormented our hearts? why then should their moons (maidens) have assisted to afflict us? We turned away through fear of their females; why then should their males call us to combat? By Allāh! I know not whether, on the morning those females looked at us, their glances were arrows or cups (of intoxication) which they passed around! If they were arrows, where was their rushing sound? If wine (cups), where was their joy? O my two companions! permit me to approach the wine they offer, for before this, I was permitted to approach even to them<sup>2</sup>. Suppose that they shun the lover whom they dread, what am I but the mere shadow (of a lover) which visits them (in their dreams). You two have told me that no paradise exists on earth; but do I not here behold the large eyed maids of paradise seated upon the pillions of these camels? Think not that my heart is free; my bosom is its prison, and there it remains a captive (unable to follow my

1 A mountain near Makkah. By gazelles are meant maidens.

2 Literally: to their curtains, or chambers.

beloved). 'Tis difficult for lovers to assuage their ardent thirst<sup>1</sup> when the source at which they try to quench it is the lips of the fair. Acacia-tree of these reserved grounds! tell me by what means you gained her favour so that you were kissed by her lips<sup>2</sup>?"

In the eulogistic part of the same poem, the poet says :

"Thou hast restored to the body of the wazīrship its soul (in occupying that post again), at a time when no hopes were entertained of its being ever raised to life and revived. For a season it remained in a state of impurity with another man, but now is the time of its cleanness and purity<sup>3</sup>. It is but just that it should be given to him who deserved it, and that he who lent it should take it back again. When a handsome female is matched to a man beneath her, prudence recommends a divorce. "

The same poet recited to him the following poem on his restoration to the wazīrship, in the month of Šafar, A.H. 461 (December, A. C. 1068), by the khalif al-Muqtadī<sup>4</sup>. This was previous to the departure of (Ibn Jahūr) for the court of the sultān Malik Shāh :

"Justice has been rendered to (you who were) its source ; and you, of all mankind, deserved it best. You were like the sword, drawn from its scabbard to be sheathed again. The hand of its master brandished it to try its edge, and its brightness dispensed him from putting its sharpness to the test. How noble the post of wazīr ! it maintains its efficacy, only when confided to competent hands. From the moment you left it, it was impelled towards you with a desire strong as that of the aged man for the restoration of his youth. Men like you are exposed (to the strokes

1 Literally : It is difficult for bewildered beings, kept from water during five days, to drink at the source, etc. The epithets are here figurative ; being properly applied to camels.

2 The thorn of the acacia is used as a toothpick.

3 This metaphorical language refers, in its primitive acceptation, to the periodical infirmity of females.

4 There is here an anachronism : al-Muqtadī did not become khalif till A.H. 467.

of) envy, but it is impossible to strike the thunderer in his cloud. Many desire that place, but who dare expel the lion from his den? The sire of many whelps rends with teeth and claws the man who presses him too closely in his covert. Hast thou ever seen or heard of one who arrays himself in the skin cast off by the serpent ?<sup>1</sup>".

In the same piece we remark the following passage:

"On seeing the (wazīrship) become his field (of action), they received the conviction that to his eagle alone belonged (the empire of) the air. The moon is expected to appear again after its disappearance, when the month is ended, and never do men despair of the sun's rising again, although he may be enveloped in the shades of night. How sweet is home! and sweeter is it yet for him who returns from a distant land! How often has a man's return conducted him to a perpetual sojourning; so that, coming back, he remains at home for ever. Were pearls to draw near to the merchant, the diver would not prosper; were they to remain for ever in their shells, they had never been valued as ornaments for crowns<sup>2</sup>. No pearl of the sea, no coral can be had, but by traversing the dangers of its waters".

This qaṣīdah being of great length, we shall confine ourselves to these extracts. In the life of Sābūr Ibn Ardāshīr (No. 238), we have given three verses addressed to him by Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābi (No. 14), in which he congratulates him on his restoration to the wazīrship; nothing of the kind has ever been composed to equal them. Another poet who celebrated the praise of Ibn Jahir was the general (al-qā'id) Abū 'l-Riḍā al-Faḍl Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn al-Ẓarīf* al-Fāriqi (native of Mayyāfāriqīn), who composed on him the celebrated piece of verse rhyming in ḥ (ح). We give it here:

"O you who speak in verse! I give you good counsel, but I am never so unfortunate as when I give advice: time has removed (from the world) all the generous men, and thereby

1 The poet means; Behold in Ibn Jahir a man arrayed in terrors equal to those of the serpent.

2 Literally: Crowns had never been taken into their account.

* 'Abd al-ḥamīd gives Ẓarīf.—Ed.

hangs a tale long to relate. You extol for beauty and comeliness the ugliest faces to be seen, and you seek for liberality in a man whose soul was formed in the mould of avarice; hence you lose your pains, for your praises are falsehood. Spare your verses, for, in such attempts, I never saw the hopes of any man even by accident successful. If you doubt my words prove me a liar by citing a single patron who has acted generously; with the exception of that wazīr whose rule offers a series of noble acts to charm the ear of time."

Fakhr al-Dawlah (Ibn Jahīr) was born at Moṣul in the year 398 (A.C. 1007-8); he died there in the month of Rajab—some say of Muḥarram—A.H. 483 (Sept., A.C. 1090), and was interred at Tall Tawbah (No. 167, note), a hill opposite to Moṣul and separated from it by the river (Tigris). In the year 482 (A.C. 1089-90), he returned to Diyār Rabi'ah as viceroy to Malik Shāh, and, in the month of Ramaḍān, he commenced his campaign by occupying Naṣībīn: he subsequently took possession of Moṣul, Siniār, al-Raḥabah, al-Khābūr, and Diyār Rabi'ah, and prayers (the khutbah) were then offered up for him, from the pulpits, as lieutenant of the sulṭān. From that time, he continued to reside at Moṣul till his death. As for his son 'Amīd al-Dawlah (see beginning of the notice) he is spoken of in these terms by Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamaḍhānī, in his historical work: "He acquired a wide renown by his gravity, dignity, integrity, and wisdom; he served (in a civil capacity) under three khalīfs, and acted as wazīr to two of them. The pensions which he enjoyed and the presents received by him were immense. Niẓām al-Mulk always spoke of him in terms of the highest respect, and looked upon him as a man of the greatest ability and intelligence; he took his advice on every affair of importance and preferred it to that of the most prudent and distinguished members of the council. The chief defect to be found in him was his advanced age. His words, of which he was very sparing, were treasured up in the memory (of his hearers), and a verbal application to him was equivalent to the accomplishment of the speaker's wishes. One of his remarkable sayings was that which he addressed to the son of the shaykh and imām Abū Naṣr Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh (No. 374): 'Study and be diligent or you will become a 'dyer (ṣabbāgh) without (the necessity of deriving that epithet from) a father.' " The wazīr Nizām al-Mulk gave his daughter Zubaydah in marriage to Ibn Jahīr, who was at that time out of place, and this alliance procured his re-appointment to the wazīrship. In allusion to this circumstance, the sharīf Abū Ya'lā Ibn al-Habbāriyah (No. 650) composed the following lines :

"Say to the wazīr without being deterred by the gravity of his aspect, though he appear grand and exalted in his station: 'Were it not for the daughter of the shaykh, you had not been appointed wazīr a second time ; thank then the thing<sup>1</sup> which created thee lord-wazīr.' "

I read the following anecdote in the handwriting of Usāmah Ibn Munqidh (No. 81), who states that the poet al-Sābiq Ibn Abī Mahzūl al-Ma'arri (No. 650, note), related as follows :- "Having gone to 'Irāq. I joined Ibn al-Habbāriyah and he said to me one day : 'Let us go and pay our respects to the wazīr Ibn Jahīr.' This wazīr had been just restored to power. When we presented ourselves before him, Ibn al-Habbāriyah handed him a small piece of paper. Ibn Jahīr read its contents, and I perceived his countenance change and express displeasure. We immediately left the hall of audience, and I asked my companion what was in the paper? He replied that we could expect nothing better than to have our heads cut off<sup>2</sup>. These words filled me with trouble and apprehension: 'I am a stranger here,' said I ; 'I have kept your company for the last few days only, and yet you seek my death !' To this he merely replied: 'what has happened has happened !' We then went to the door with the intention of going out, but the porter prevented us, saying that he had received orders to stop us. On this I exclaimed: 'I am a stranger here, from Syria, and the wazīr does not know me; the person whom he wants is this man.' The porter merely replied : 'It is useless to talk; thou shalt not go out.' I then felt certain that my last hour was come. The company had nearly all departed when a page came to the door with a paper containing fifty dinārs, and said (in his master's name):

1 The Arabic word here employed designates the female sexual organ.

2 Literally : The best moment (for us) strikes off my head and thine.

'We have already given thanks; give thou also thanks.'<sup>1</sup> We then went off and he (Ibn al-Habbāriyah) then handed me ten of these dīnārs, and I asked him what was in the paper? He replied by reciting to me"—the two verses just mentioned—"and I swore that I would keep company with him no longer." 'Amīd al-Dawlah (the son of Ibn Jahīr) left some poetry which (Imād al-Dīn) has inserted in the (Kharidah), but it is by no means satisfactory. Ibn al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) speaks of him in his Dhayl, and a great number of contemporary poets have celebrated his praises. It was in his honour that Šurr-Durr composed the celebrated qaṣīdah rhyming in 'ayn, which begins thus :

"When the caravan took their leave, (we saw the object of thy love, and) thy excuse (for loving) was evident; all the passions of our souls were borne off in those palanquins. Wherever their camels direct their course, thither thou turnest thy eyes; dost thou see full moons (fair maids) arising in every valley? In the caravan which departed from the grounds of the tribe is a gazelle (maiden) for whom my heart is a pasturage and my eyes a watering-place. From the regions of her beauty we are debarred access, and, to protect her from all eyes, a veil is her guardian. She mistook the nets (the ties of love) for huntresses and yielded to fear; therefore she broke every tie. The protector of her path knew not that, when discourse with her was forbidden, I spoke with my fingers, and that, when she sent her image to visit my couch and salute me (in my dreams), I heard with my eyes."

This is a long qaṣīdah of great brilliancy. The verse: She mistook the nets for huntresses, etc., bears some resemblance to the words of Ibn al-Khammārah, a Spanish poet :

"Why ask news of sleep from these eyes which, for so long a time, knew it not; it came seldom, and those nights were rare. When the bird of sleep thought my eyes a nest, it saw the eyelashes and yielded to fear, mistaking them for nets."

As I have not been able to discover the date of Ibn al-Khammārah's death, so as to determine the age in which he lived, I know not if one of these poets has copied the other. It may be, however, that both fell upon the same thought, and that neither of them borrowed it from the other. 'Amid al-Dawlah was deposed from the wazīrship and imprisoned in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 492 (July-August, A. C. 1099), and he died, the same year, in the month of Shawwāl. The poet Abu 'l-Karam Ibn al-'Allāf addressed to him the following lines :

---

<sup>1</sup> This is an allusion to the words in the last verse.

"Without our eulogiums, the deeds of the good would not be distinguished from those of the wicked. Thinkest thou, because thou art hidden from our eyes, that thou art sheltered from our tongues ?"

His wife, the daughter of Nizām al-Mulk, died in the month of Sha'bān, A.H. 470 (February-March, A.C. 1078). Her marriage took place in the year 462 (1069-70). Šurr-Durr composed on Za'im al-Ru'wasā Abu 'l-Qāsim, the son of Fakhr al-Dawlah, the poem rhying in qāf (ق) which commences thus :

"Tears visit my eyes by day, and sleeplessness by night ; between them both, how can sight escape ?"

It is an exquisite poem, full of originality and highly celebrated, but it is needless to lengthen this article by inserting it. Za'im al-Ruwasā Abu 'l-Qāsim was appointed to the wazīrship under the imām (khal'f) al-Mustazhir bi-Allāh, in the month of Sha'bān, A.H. 496 (May-June, A.C. 1103) ; he then received the surname of Nizām al-Dīn (maintainer of religion). The word ~~جهر~~ must be pronounced Jahr, al-Sam'ānī being mistaken when he says that it should be pronounced Juhayr. They say of a man that he is jahr and that he displays the quality called jahārah when he has an agreeable countenance. They say also of a man's voice that it is jahir when it sounds clear and loud.

675 AL-RÜDHRAWARI

Abū Shujā' Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm, surnamed Zahīr al-Dīn (champion of religion) al-Rūdhrawārī, was born at al-Ahwāz, but his family belonged to Rūdhrawār. Having studied jurisprudence under the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī (No. 5) and cultivated the belles-lettres, he was appointed wazīr to the imām (khalīf) al-Muqtadī bi-amr Allāh, on the deposition of 'Amīd al-Dawlah Ibn Jahīr. We have spoken of this person in the life of his father Fakhr al-Dawlah, see the preceding article. Al-Rūdhrawārī's nomination took place in the year 476 (A.C. 1083-4), and he was dismissed from office on Thursday, the 19th of Šafar, A.H. 484 (April, A.C. 1091)*. 'Amīd al-Dawlah was then reinstated in the wazīrship. When al-Rūdhrawārī read the ordinance (tawqī') of the khalīf proclaiming his deposition, he recited the following verse :

"He entered into office without an enemy ; he retired without a friend."

The Friday following, he proceeded on foot from his house to the mosque, and the people flocked about him, offering up prayers for his welfare and all anxious to take him by the hand. In consequence of this occurrence, he received orders to remain at home and not to appear in public. Being then exiled to Rūdhrawār, the ancient seat of his family, he resided there for some time and, in the year 487 (A.C. 1094), he undertook the pilgrimage to Makkah. On reaching the vicinity of al-Rabadhah<sup>1</sup>, the caravan which he accompanied was attacked by the Arabs of the desert, and not one of the travellers escaped except himself. Having performed the pilgrimage, he went to make a devotional residence in the City of the Apostle (Madīnah), and remained there till his death. He expired on the 15th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 488 (June, A.C. 1095)† ; and was interred in the Baqī' cemetery, under the dome which covers the tomb of Ibrāhīm, the Prophet's son. He was born in the year 437 (A.C. 1045-6). The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions him in the Khariḍah, and speaks of him in these terms : "The age in which he lived was the happiest of ages, and the time in which he existed the most prosperous of times. None of the wazīrs had ever displayed such zeal as he for the service of

1 See No. 391, note.

* 10 April.—Ed.

† 22 June.—Ed.

religion and the observance of the law. In all affairs connected with religion he was strict and severe, but, in temporal matters, easy and indulgent. Never did he incur the slightest reprehension for remissness in his duty towards God." He then adds : "Ibn al-Hamadānī has spoken of him in the Mudhayyal (Appendix)<sup>1</sup> : 'His days,' says he, 'were the most fortunate of days for the two empires<sup>2</sup> the most happy for the people, the most complete for the security, prosperity, and welfare of the country ; no misfortune came to trouble those (days), no terror to alloy them. Under his administration, the khalifate recovered that respect and veneration which it received in former times. As a penman and an orator, he was the most accomplished of men.'" The hāfiẓ Ibn al-Sam'ānī says of him in his Supplement : "He drew his renown from a fund of consummate merit, vast intelligence, dignified conduct, and unerring foresight. He left some poems pervaded by a strain of natural tenderness. Adversity having given him a moral lesson, he was deposed from the wazīrship and obliged to confine himself to his house, but he subsequently removed from Baghdād and took up his abode at Madīnah, in the neighbourhood and under the protection of the Prophet's tomb. He remained in that city till his death. I went to visit his tomb which is near that of Ibrāhīm, the son of our Prophet, in the Baqī' cemetery." Farther on, he says : "I have been informed by a person on whose word I can rely, that Abū Shujā', on the approach of death and on the point of departing from this world, was carried to the mosque of the Prophet, and being placed near the enclosure which surrounds the tomb, he wept and said : 'O Prophet of God ! Almighty God has said : But if they, after they have injured their own souls, come unto thee and ask pardon of God, and the Apostle ask pardon for them, they shall surely find God easy to be reconciled and merciful<sup>3</sup>. Now I have come unto thee acknowledging my faults and transgressions, and hoping for thy intercession'. He here wept again

---

1 The title of this work sufficiently implies that it was a continuation of some biographical or historical treatise. It is not noticed by Hājji Khalīfah.

2 Probably the Salūjqid empire and that of the khalifate.

3 Qur'an, sūrah 4, verse 67.

* 'Abd al-Hamid gives : Dhayl.—Ed.

and returned to his house, where he died the same day." His poetical productions have been collected into a dīwān and are very fine. Here are some extracts from it :

"I shall punish my eyes, heedless whether they shed tears or drop blood ; and I shall forego the pleasure of sleep till it become for my eyelids a thing forbidden. My eyes cast me into the nets of temptation, and, had they not looked (on beauty), I should have remained a pious Muslim. They shed my blood<sup>1</sup>, yet they shed not their tears ; 'twas they which commenced (to transgress) and are therefore more culpable (than I).

Though I love thee, I seem insensible, but this heart of mine is filled with pain and anguish. Think not that I have forgotten thee ; a man may appear in health and yet be unwell.

Must the best part of my life and yours pass away without our meeting ? that would be a severe infliction ! but if deceitful fortune ever grant me to meet you, then, despite my poverty, I shall be happy."

Al-Rūdhawarī drew up a continuation to Abū 'Alī Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Miskawayh's (No. 192) Taj̄rīb al-Umam, the celebrated historical work which is in every body's hands. Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadānī says in his History : "Arrayed in piety, a supporter of religion, a patron and kind protector of pious men, a chastiser of perversity, he displayed virtues which remind me of the equity of the just. He never went out of his house without transcribing a portion of the Qur'ān and reading part of that sacred volume ; he paid the legal alms-tax on all his real property, such as goods, estates, and fiefs. He gave large charities in secret : having one day received a note mentioning that, in such a house, in the street of the Pitch-seller (Darb al-Qayyār)* there was a woman with four orphan children, naked and hungry, he called for one of his followers and said : 'Go, clothe that family and give them to eat.' He then took off his clothes, and having sworn not to put them on nor warm himself till the messenger returned and informed him that his orders had been executed, he waited, trembling with cold, till that person came back. His charities were immense." Rūdhrawārī means belonging to Rūdhrawār (روذراور) a town in the neighbourhood of Hamadhān.

<sup>1</sup> That is : my eyes exposed my heart to the wounds inflicted by beauty.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : al-Qubbār.--Ed.

676 AL-'AMĪD AL-KUNDURĪ

Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed 'Amīd al-Mulk (column of the empire) al-Kundurī, was one of the most eminent men of the age for beneficence, liberality, acuteness of mind, and abilities as a kātib. Having been chosen for wazīr by the Saljūq sultān Tuḡhrulbek, he rose to the highest rank in the service of that monarch and administered the state with uncontrolled authority<sup>1</sup>. He was the first who filled the place of wazīr under this dynasty, and, had he no other merit<sup>2</sup> but that of his intimacy with the imām al-Ḥaramayn 'Abd al-Malik al-Juwaynī (No. 353), the Shāfi'-ite doctor and author of the Nihāyat al-Maṣṭab (that alone would have sufficed for his reputation). It is al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) who mentions the fact in the notice on the imām which he has inserted in his Supplement. After enlarging on the character of this doctor and noticing the journeys which he undertook to different countries, he says: "And, having gone to Baghdād, he became a companion of Abū Naṣr al-'Amīd al-Kundurī and accompanied in his (official) circuits through the empire; he met also at his court the most eminent jurisconsults (of the country) and attained great skill in controversy by the conflict<sup>3</sup> of his genius with theirs in learned discussions. He then

1 Literally: and to none of his colleagues (it pertained to bandy) words with him.

2 I read with one of the MSS. ولولم يكن له منقبه الاصعبه الخ. The corresponding member of the phrase is لکناء, it has disappeared from the text in consequence of the additional observations inscribed afterwards by the author, and which made him lose sight of this word, which is indispensable.

3 Or more literally: by the rubbing يحتك.

got into reputation." I must here observe that al-Sam'āni's words are in contradiction with the statement of our shaykh, Ibn al-Athīr (No. 435), in his History. This writer says, under the year 456 (A.C. 1064): "The wazīr (al-'Amīd al-Kundurī) displayed a violent prejudice against the Shāfi'ite sect and frequently inveighed against (its founder) the imām al-Shāfi'; to such lengths was he carried by the spirit of party, that, having obtained permission from the sultān Alp Arslān to have curses pronounced against the Rafīdīs (the Shi'ites) from the pulpits of Khurāsān, he caused the Ash'arites (No. 404) to be included in the same malediction<sup>1</sup>. This proceeding gave such scandal to the imāms of Khurāsān, that some of them, including Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī (No. 369) and the Imām al-Haramayn al-Juwaynī left the country. The latter then passed four years at Makkah, teaching (jurisprudence) and giving opinions as a muftī, on points of law. It was for this reason that he received his surname<sup>2</sup>. When Nizām al-Mulk (No. 171) came into power, he recalled the emigrants and treated them with marked honour and kindness. It is said that, at a later period, al-Kundurī repented of his invectives against al-Shāfi', if this be true, 'tis so much the better for himself." The praises of 'Amīd al-Mulk al-Kundurī were celebrated by numerous poets who came to visit his court, and the greatest masters of the age in the art of verse, such as Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī 'i-Bākhārī (No. 450) and the ra'īs Abū Maṣṣūr 'Alī Ṣurr-Durr (No. 449), extolled him in their poems. The latter composed in his honour the following qaṣīdah rhyming in n :

"Is (disdain) the reward which all (my) fellow men receive for their love ? or rather, is this the nature of the large-eyed gazelles (maidens) ? Relate to me the history of those who fell victims to

---

1 The Ash'arites were the scholastics of the Musulmān religion. It was from them that our scholastics of the middle ages learned, indirectly, the method of demonstrating the dogmas of the faith by means of principles drawn from human reason. They followed, in general the doctrines of Aristotle. Most of them belonged to the sect or school of divinity and law ; which had been founded by the imām al-Shāfi'. In their belief, they were perfectly orthodox.

love; the afflicted live only in their sympathy for other's woes. You may conceal from me their fate through apprehension; but (every lover) knows the fate of the 'Udhrite and of Majnūn<sup>1</sup>. Mounted on their camels—but let me avoid long comparison,—yet I shall say that theirs were charms which ravished every soul and every eye. Gracefully bending their taper waists, they said in sportive mood to the zephyr: 'Does the willow bear branches as pliant as ours?' Behind those lips is a source of which the pebbles are pearls (teeth) hidden from view; is it honey which is contained between them or rather intoxicating wine<sup>2</sup>? (Companion of my journey!) you cast your eyes to the right and left, over these paths, but even were you gifted with the sharp sight of Zarqā al-Yamāmah<sup>3</sup>, (you could distinguish nothing, for even) she never saw a living cloud darting its lightnings over Jīrūn<sup>4</sup>. You complain of the long and weary nights, but I am deprived of sleep by the shades which the dark locks and ringlets of my mistress spread around. A censor rebuked me for my passion, but I replied: 'Be not so prompt! those tears are my own and so are my sighs. If they avail me not (to gain her heart), what will avail me the vigour of youth and the intercession of my twenty years?' (But come, my heart!) be not cast down by the blame of thy censor; thou art not the first which, though resolute, yielded to temptation. Can I require from strangers that they conform to my wishes, whilst my heart within my bosom obeys me not? My devotion to their gazelles (maidens) was not exacted from me; by what right then should they exact from me pledges (of fidelity)? For a moment I feared that my heart would fly and join them, but I forced it to give bail. I can support every affliction except dishonour; contempt is the torture of noble minds. As grains of dust pain my eyes, so also does the sight

---

1 By the 'Udhrite he means the poet Jamīl; see No. 138. For Majnūn, see d'Herbelot's Bibliothèque Orientale, art. Megnoun, and M. de Sacy's Anthologie grammaticale, p. 150.

2 Literally: Are not the houses of the bee arranged within these lips, or else do they contain a shop for wine.

3 See M. De Sacy's Chrestomathie, tome II, p. 446.

4 The poet here compares to flashes of lightning the glances shot from the eyes of his mistress. Jīrūn is a village outside Damascus.

of men who, devoid (of virtue), notwithstanding their wealth and (the precepts of) religion, only resemble the human race in being formed of a (yet more) fetid clay ; whose looks are ill-omened and whose aspect defiles, so that, after seeing them, I must cleanse my eyes and exhaust all their waters to make them pure. If they count their treasures, there they surpass me ; but if they enumerate their virtues, I am their superior. Let not the environs rejoice in the disappointment of my hopes ; the moon does not round its orb till it has appeared like a palm-leaf in thinness. Yet this noisy road (of human life) speeds forward the camel (of my worldly course), and this ocean impels before it the ship laden (with my hopes). And, when the abode of 'Amīd al-Mulk is adorned by victory, we exclaim : 'A happy omen !' When the resolution of that prince spurs on his generous steeds, they hasten forward with their brilliant riders of bold and lofty bearing. Seldom did I see his shining forehead but mine compelled me to fall prostrate before him. Men's eyes perceive on his throne and on his saddle, the lion in his den, and the moon which dispels the darkness. His beneficence extends to all mankind, and he receives the thanks of the rich accompanied by the blessings of the poor. When they direct their attacks towards his (generosity), they exclaim (struck with his prompt liberality) : Are these sums given from his bounty or paid to us as a debt ? Had he lived in ancient times, riches would have complained of his tyranny and appealed to Qārūn<sup>1</sup>. The treasures of his wealth are free to every man ; then ask him only for the treasures of his learning. To obtain favours at his court, asking is superfluous, and the reward of services is never granted with regret. I swore to meet all the virtues, knowing well that, in seeing him, I should fulfil my oath. He sways the state and abandons not his intentions through fear, neither does he exchange courage for feebleness. Like the sword, the marks of his splendour appear on his blade (exterior), and his sharpness in his well-protected edge (acuteness of mind). His glory bears to witness that the substance of his person is musk, whilst that of other men's is clay."

1 Qārūn, the Korah of the Bible (Numb. xvi). possessed immense riches, if we are to believe the legend given in the Qur'ān, sūrah 28. verse 76 et seq.

He recited this qaṣīdah to 'Amīd al-Mulk on the arrival of the latter at 'Irāq, where he appeared on the throne of the wazīrate and in the height of his exalted rank. I have given the whole of this excellent and exquisite poem, with the exception of three verses which did not please me. A number of poets have composed imitations of it in the same rhyme and measure, Ibn al-T'āwīdhī, (No. 654) for instance, whose qaṣīdah begins thus ;

"If thy custom, when in love, resembles mine, stop thy camels at the two sand-hills of Yabrin.<sup>1</sup>"

This poem, which displays extraordinary talent, was composed in praise of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who was then in Syria, and the author sent it to him from 'Irāq. Did I not wish to avoid prolixity, I should give it here. I have (since) inserted it in my notice on Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Ayyūb, and there the reader will find it. Ibn al-Mu'allim (No. 655) imitated it also in a qaṣīdah beginning thus :

"Why does the camel-rider stop at Yabrin ? Is not his heart free from the pains inflicted by the large-eyed gazelles ?"

This also is a good poem, and I have given a part of it in the life of the author. Al-Ablah (No. 653) also composed a piece in imitation of it ; but, on the whole, Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī's is the only one which comes near it. These remarks have led us away from our subject, but discourse naturally runs into digressions which we cannot help inserting. 'Amīd al-Mulk continued in high power and credit during the reign of Tugh̃r̃ulbek ; on the death of that sovereign, his nephew and successor Alp Arslān confirmed the wazīr in his post and conferred on him a higher rank and additional honours. Some time afterwards, this monarch resolved on contracting an alliance with Kh̃ũwārizm Shāh, and sent al-'Amīd to demand for him that prince's daughter in marriage. The wazīr's enemies then spread the report that he had asked her hand for himself, and this news having reached his ears, he conceived so serious an apprehension of his master's displeasure, that he shaved off his beard and eradicated from his body every attribute of manhood. By this act he saved his life. Some say that he was castrated by the sultān's orders. In allusion to this, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Bāḳharzī composed the following lines :

---

<sup>1</sup> Yabrin is a sandy region in the south-east of Arabia.

"They say that, in your absence, the sultān deprived that rampant station of every mark of virility. I replied : 'Be silent ! he is now increased in virility since the removal of his testicles. Every male scorns that any part of him should be called female<sup>1</sup> and he therefore cut them away by the roots.' "

This idea is singularly original. In the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 456 (Dec.-Jan., A.C. 1063-4), Alp Arslān dismissed him from office, for motives too long to relate, and confided the wazīrship to Nizām al-Mulk Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan al-Ṭūsī (No. 171). He afterwards imprisoned 'Amīd al-Mulk in the palace of the governor ('amid) of Khurāsān, whence, at a later period, he was removed to Marw al-Rūd and confined in a house, a closet of which was allotted to his only daughter and the other members of his family. On discovering that his death had been resolved on, he went into the closet and, having bid a last farewell to his relatives, he took with him a shroud (which he kept ready prepared) ; he then locked the door of the closet, and having performed his ablutions and offered up a prayer of two rak'ahs, he gave one hundred Naysābūrian dīnārs to the executioner and said to him : "What I require of you is, that you shroud my corpse in this cloth, which I washed in the (holy) waters of (the well) Ḥammām, and that you say to the wazīr Nizām al-Mulk : You have acted wrong in teaching the Turks to put to death their wazīrs and the chiefs of the civil administration ; he that digs a pit shall fall into it ; he that traces out and acts by an evil line of conduct shall bear the sin of it and the sins of all those who follow his example." He then yielded with resignation to the sealed decree of God, and was executed on Sunday, the 16th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, A.H. 456 (29th November, A.C. 1064) ; being then aged upwards of forty years. In allusion to this event, the poet al-Bāḳharzī composed the following lines in which he addresses Alp Arslān :

---

1 Unḥiyāni, the Arabic term for testicles, is the dual of unḥā, a word which signifies female.

"Thy uncle took him into favour, and, raising him to honours, he gave him a spacious residence in (the edifice of) the empire. Every prince in thy family did justice to his servants; (thy uncle) therefore bestowed on him prosperity, and thou hast bestowed on him paradise."

It is worthy of remark that his testicles were buried in Khuwārizm, his blood was shed at Marw al-Rūd, his body was interred at Kundur, his native village, his skull and brain at Naysābūr, and his scrotum was stuffed with straw and sent to Nizām al-Mulk, at Kirmān, where it was committed to the earth. What a lesson for those who are capable of reflection, that a man who was the first ra'īs of his time should meet with such a fate! Kundurī means belonging to Kundur, a village in Turaythīth, a district in the neighbourhood of Naysābūr which has produced a number of eminent men, some of them remarkable for learning.

677 THE WAZĪR JAMĀL AL-DĪN AL-JAWĀD AL-IṢBAHĀNĪ

Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Maṣṣūr al-Iṣbahānī, surnamed Jamāl al-Dīn (beauty of religion) and generally known by the appellation of al-Jawād (the bountiful), was wazīr to the sovereign of Moṣul. His grandfather Abū Maṣṣūr was one of the persons employed in the hunting establishment of the sultān Malik Shāh Ibn Alp Arslān as keepers of the lynxes. His father, 'Alī, received good education, and being ambitious of distinction, he rose to several high offices in the state and contracted matrimonial alliances with families of the first rank. Jamāl al-Dīn was educated under his parent's tuition, and, having obtained a situation in the service of the sultān Maḥmūd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Malik Shāh, as member of the military inspection office, he gave great satisfaction by his conduct and the abilities which he displayed in that post. When the atābek Zinkī Ibn 'Āq Sunqur (No. 229) obtained the sovereignty of Moṣul and the neighbouring country, he took Jamāl al-Dīn into his service and honoured him with his particular favour. Having then proceeded with him to Moṣul, he conferred on him the government of Naṣībīn, and, in consequence of the able manner with which he filled the duties of this office, he augmented his jurisdiction by the addition of al-Raḥabah. Here the talents and integrity of Jamāl al-Dīn appeared conspicuous, and having been admitted into the intimacy of his sovereign and received into the number of his boon companions, he was appointed by him controller (mushrif) of the entire principality and authorised to act with unlimited power. Dīyā al-Dīn Abū Sa'īd Bahrām Ibn al-Khiḍr al-Kafratūthī, whom the atābik Zinkī had chosen for wazīr in the year 528 (A.C. 1133-4), having died in office, on the fifth of Sha'bān, A.H. 536 (March, A.C. 1142)*, Abū 'l-Riḍā Ibn Ṣadaqah was appointed to succeed him and Jamāl al-Dīn continued to occupy his former post. The amiable disposition of Jamāl al-Dīn, and his conversation, equally elegant and amusing, gave such pleasure to the atābik Zinkī, that he admitted him into the number of his boon companions; and in the latter part of his reign he confided to him the presidency of the diwān (board of administration). Jamāl al-Dīn thus acquired great wealth, but, during the lifetime of Zinkī, he neither displayed the generosity and beneficence nor any other of the qualities (for which he was afterwards distinguished). When the atābik Zinkī met with his death at the siege of Qal'at Ja'bar (A.H. 541, A.C. 1146), part of the troops attempted to slay the wazīr and plunder his wealth; they attacked his tent and shot arrows against it, but were repulsed by some of the amīrs who took his defence. Having then led the army back to Moṣul, he was confirmed in the wazīrship by Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī (No. 495), the son of the atābik Zinkī, who entrusted to him and Zayn al-Dīn 'Alī Ibn Baktikin the entire administration of the empire. Of Zayn al-Dīn we have already spoken in the life of his son, Muẓaffar al-Dīn, lord of Arbela (No. 522). From that moment, the wazīr displayed the generous dispositions of his heart; he gave away with open hand, and he continued lavishing his wealth and spending immense sums till his reputation for beneficence was so universally established, that he became known by the name of Jamāl al-Dīn al-Jawād

* 5 March.—Ed.

(the bountiful). A number of poets celebrated his praises, and one of them. Muḥammad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Ṣaghīr* al-Qaysarānī (No. 651), went and recited in his presence the celebrated qaṣīdah which begins by this verse :

"Blessing on those (fair) gazelles in the western borders of al-Zawrā<sup>1</sup> who quenched their thirst with the life's water of our hearts !"

Amongst the numerous monuments which he left of his beneficence, we may mention the aqueduct by which water was brought from a great distance to 'Arafāt during the days of the pilgrimage, the stairs leading from the foot to the summit of that mountain<sup>2</sup>, the wall around Madīnah, and the reparations of the mosque of the Prophet. Every year he sent to Makkah and Madīnah money and clothing sufficient for the wants of the poor and destitute during the next twelve months : he had a special register-office for the persons to whom he granted pensions or who applied for pecuniary assistance. So various were his deeds of beneficence that, during a famine which afflicted Moṣul, he spent all he possessed in alleviating the misery of the people. His iqṭā' (grant from government) consisted in the tenth part of the produce of the soil, such being the usual allowance to wazīrs under the Saljūq government. One of his intendants related that, having gone to see the wazīr one day, he handed him his baqyār<sup>3</sup> and told him to sell it and give the money to those who were in need. The intendant observed to him that he had only two baqyārs remaining, that and the one which was on his head, so that, if he wished to change (his head-dress), he would not then have another

1 A number of places in Arabia bear the name of al-Zawrā (Inflexa, Incurva). It is also one of the names of the river Tigris, and is poetically used to designate the city of Baḡhdād.

2 These stairs are still in existence. See Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, vol. II, p. 41.

3 Meninski gives, on the authority of Castell, the following explanation of this word, which he indicates as Persian : Tapeti non villosi genus, nigrum, ex pills comelinis. In the passage of Ibn Kḥallikān, it evidently denotes a sort of covering for the head ; perhaps a shawl. See, however M. Dozy's vetements des Arabes. p. 87.

* This name is omitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

to put on. To this the wazīr replied : "The times are hard, as you see, and perhaps I may not again find a moment so favourable as the present for doing an act of charity ; as for the baqyār, I can easily find something to supply its place." The intendant then withdrew and, having sold the baqyār, he distributed the money to the poor. A great number of similar anecdotes are related of Jamāl al-Dīn. He continued in office till the death of his master Ghāzī in A.H. 544 (A.C. 1149), and on the accession of that prince's brother, Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd he acquired great influence over the new sovereign. After some time however, Mawdūd judged his iqṭā' too great, and, being weary of the preponderance which he had acquired in the administration, he arrested him in the month of Rajab, A.H. 558 (May-June, A.C. 1163). In the history of Zayn al-Dīn, lord of Arbela, will be found a short account of al-Jawād's arrest and his imprisonment in the citadel of Moṣul<sup>1</sup>. He died in confinement on one of the last ten days of Ramaḍān—some say, of Shahbān—A.H. 559 (August, A.C. 1164), and was interred at Moṣul. When the funeral service was said over his corpse, crowds of poor persons, widows, and orphans attended the ceremony and made the air resound with their lamentations. The following year, his body was conveyed to Makkah and borne in procession around the Ka'bah, after having been taken to the top of Mount 'Arafāt on the night during which the pilgrims station there<sup>2</sup>. Every day that they remained at Makkah, they carried his body round the Ka'bah at different times. On the day of its arrival at that city, crowds assembled about it, weeping and lamenting. It is said that the like of such a day was never witnessed at Makkah. There was a man appointed to accompany the corpse and proclaim the noble deeds and virtues of the deceased at every sacred spot which the pilgrims are accustomed to visit : when they arrived at the Ka'bah, that man stood forward and said :

1 An account of Jamāl al-Dīn al-Jawād's fall will be found in 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī's History of the Atābeks ; MS of the Bibliothèque imperiale, ancient fonds, No. 818, p. 266.

2 Station (waqfah) ; see Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, vol. II, p. 46.

"O Ka'bah of Islāmism ! he who cometh here to visit thee was a ka'bah (centre) of beneficence. Thou art visited once a year, but not a day passed without his receiving visits (from the needy)."

The corpse was then borne to Madinah and interred in the Baqī' cemetery, after having been brought into the city and carried, a number of times, around the enclosure of the Prophet's tomb. On this occasion the same person pronounced these lines :

"His bier was borne on men's shoulders, but how often did they bear (the load) his gifts ! When he passes by the valley, its sands speak his praise, and when he passes by the assembled people, the widows bewail his loss."

These verses are taken from a qaṣīdah which shall be noticed in the life of Muqallad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Munqidh al-Shayzārī*. Jalāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the son of Jamāl al-Dīn al-Jawād, was an accomplished scholar, a man of merit, eloquent and liberal. I have seen the dlwān (collection) of his epistles, in which species of composition he displayed great talent. This collection was made by Majd al-Dīn Abu 'l-Sa'ādāt al-Mubārak, surnamed Ibn al-Aṭhīr al-Jazarī (No. 526), the author of the Jāmi' al-Uṣūl. He entitled it : Kitāb al-Jawāhir wa 'l-La'ālī min al-Imlā il-Mawlawī 'l-Wazīr 'l-Jalāl al-Dīn. Majd al-Dīn commenced life as private secretary to Jalāl al-Dīn, being employed not only to write down, under his dictation the epistles and other productions of his mind, but to sign (official papers) in his name. He alludes to this circumstance towards the beginning of the book, and praises him in the highest terms, extolling him above all preceding writers for the elegance of his style. He speaks also of an epistolary correspondence carried on between Jalāl al-Dīn and Ḥayṣ-Bayṣ (No. 241) ; some of these letters he gives, and I should insert part of them here were I not afraid of being led too far. I shall only notice one, because it is very short ; it was composed by Ḥayṣ-Bayṣ in the name of a man greatly in debt : "(Thy) generosity is flourishing, thy renown wide-spread ; to succour against misfortune is the noblest support (of a generous man's reputation), and to assist the afflicted (is his) richest treasure. Adieu." Jalāl al-Dīn was wazīr to Sayf al-Dīn Qhāzī (No. 496), the son of Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd. He died A.H. 574 (A.C. 1178-9) at Dunaysar, and his body was taken to Moṣul and thence to Madīnah, where it was interred in the funeral chapel of his father Jamāl al-Dīn al-Jawād. Dunaysar is a city in Mesopotamia, between Naṣībīn and Rās 'Ayn; merchants resort thither from all quarters, as it is situated at a point where the roads of that country meet. Hence it derives its name; Dunaysar being a Persian compound word altered from Dunyāsar (the world's head); it being the custom of the Persians to place the consequent before the antecedent when in the relation of the genitive case. Sar means head in Persian. Kafratūḥl means belonging to Kafratūḥā<sup>1</sup>, a village in Mesopotamia, between Rās 'Ayn and Dārā.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : Shirāzi, but he observes in the footnote that it should be Shayzari.—Ed.

678 THE KĀTIB 'IMĀD AL-DĪN AL-ISBAHĀNĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ṣafī al-Dīn Abi 'l-Faraj Muḥammad Ibn Nafīs al-Dīn Abi 'l-Rajā Hāmid Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn Maḥmūd Ibn Hibat Allāh, known by the appellation of Aluh<sup>2</sup>, and surnamed 'Imād al-Dīn (pillar of religion) al-Kātib al-Iṣbahānī (the scribe of Iṣbahān) was distinguished by the appellation of Ibn Akḥi 'l-'Azīz (the nephew of 'Azīz al-Dīn). We have already spoken of his uncle (No. 76) under the letter hamzah. 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect; he studied the law, for some time, at the Nizāmiyāh college (No. 374) and mastered the science of polemic divinity and the various branches of polite literature. His poems and epistles are so well known that we need not enlarge on the subject. Having passed his first years in Iṣbahān, he removed to Baghdād while yet a boy and took lessons in jurisprudence from the shaykh Abū

1 According to Abu 'l-Fedā, this name is pronounced Kafratūḥā.

2 This appears to have been the family name. Its meaning is given by our author at the end of the article.

Manṣūr Sa'īd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Razzāz*<sup>1</sup> a professor of the Nizāmiyah college. He learned Traditions in the same city from Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Abd al-Salām, Abū Manṣūr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Jirūn, Abū 'l-Makārim al-Mubārak Ibn 'Alī al-Samarqandī, Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ashqar, and other masters. Having resided there till he completed his education and attained a great proficiency in erudition, he courted the patronage of the wazīr 'Awn al-Dīn Yahyā Ibn Hubayrah<sup>2</sup> who was then at Baghdād, and obtained from him the inspectorship (of the administration in the province) of Baṣrah. Some time after, he received his appointment to the same post in Wāsiṭ, and thenceforward he continued removing from one place to another, during the remainder of his life. After the death of 'Awn al-Dīn (in A. H. 560 (A. C. 1165), the band of his followers and of all connected with him was dissolved; some had to encounter the strokes of adversity, and 'Imād al-Dīn remained for a time in poverty and misery<sup>3</sup>. He then proceeded to Damascus, where he arrived in the month of Shā'bān, A. H. 562 (May-June, A. C. 1167), and obtained an introduction to the qāḍī Kamāl al-Dīn Abū 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn al-Shahruzūrī (No. 572) who, at that time, acted as chief magistrate and governor of the city in the name of the sulṭān al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn Abū 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd<sup>4</sup> the son of the Atābik Zinkī. Happening, then, to discuss a question of controversy in the presence of the qāḍī on a day in which he received company, 'Imād al-Dīn was recognised by the grand amir Najm al-Dīn Abū Shukr Ayyūb (No. 104), the father of the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who had known his uncle al-'Aziz

1 Abū Manṣūr Sa'īd Ibn Muḥammad al-Razzāz (the rice merchant), an Imām and chief president of the Shāfi'ite sect at Baghdād, studied jurisprudence under Abū Sa'd al-Mutawallī (No. 340), Abū Bakr al-Shāshī (No. 563), al-Kiyā al-Harrāsī (No. 405), and As'ad al-Mihani (No. 86). He was, for some time, professor in the Nizāmiyah College. Born A. H. 462 (A. C. 1069-70); died in Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 539 (May-June, A. C. 1145). (Tabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn.)

2 The life of the wazīr 'Awn al-Dīn Ibn Hubayrah is given by our author.

3 Literally : A miserable life and a waking eye.

4 His life will be found in this work.

* 'Abd al-Iḥāmīd gives : al-Wazzān.—Ed.

at the castle of Tikrīt. From that moment, Najm-al-Dīn treated him with the kindest attention and granted him such marks of honour as placed him on a rank with the most eminent and the most distinguished. Through his means, 'Imād al-Dīn became known to the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, who was then at Damascus, and obtained an opportunity of celebrating the praises of that prince. 'Imād al-Dīn mentions all these particulars in his work entitled al-Barq al-Shāmī, and he there gives the qaṣīdah which he composed in honour of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. The qāḍī Kamāl al-Dīn then extolled his merit and capacity in the presence of the Ṣultān Nūr al-Dīn and recommended him as a person perfectly well qualified to draw up the state correspondence (kitābat al-Inshā). "I hesitated" says 'Imād al-Dīn, "engaging in an occupation which lay completely out of my profession and for which I had no previous experience;" but it is nevertheless certain that he possessed all the talents requisite for this office, only he had not yet applied them. At first, he was afraid of undertaking the duties of such a place, but he had no sooner commenced than every difficulty disappeared, and the ability with which he filled it remains well established by the originality of his productions. He drew up epistles equally well in Persian and in Arabic. A close and intimate friendship was then formed between him and Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. Having risen into high favour with Nūr al-Dīn, he became the depository of that prince's secrets, and was sent by him on a mission to the court of the imām al-Mustanjid at Baghdād. On his return, he was appointed by Nūr al-Dīn to a professorship in the college now called after him al-'Imādiyah. This nomination took place in the month of Rajab, A. H. 567 (Feb.-March, A. C. 1172). The following year, Nūr al-Dīn conferred on him the presidency of the council of state (bishrāf al-dīwān). 'Imād al-Dīn's prosperity continued untroubled till the death of his sovereign A. H. 569. (A. C. 1174), and the accession of his son al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Ismā'il. This prince, who was quite a boy, allowed himself to be circumvented and governed by some individuals who bore a deep enmity to 'Imād al-Dīn, and the latter was forced by their encroachments and threats to give up all his places and depart for Baghdād. On arriving at Moṣul, he had a severe illness, and learning that the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn had left Egypt with the intention of occupying Damascus, he gave up his journey to 'Irāq and resolved on returning to that city. Having left Moṣul on the 4th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 570 (1st December, A.C. 1174), he took the road which leads across the desert, and arrived at Damascus on the eighth of the following month, whilst Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn was encamped outside of Aleppo. He then set out to pay his respect to that prince who had already taken possession of Emessa since the month of Ṣha'bān, and, being admitted into his presence, he recited to him a qasīdāh in which he displayed great elevation of mind. From that time, he continued to follow the court, journeying when the sulṭān journeyed and stopping when he stopped. A considerable period elapsed before he could obtain a situation, and, during that time, he attended the levees of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and recited eulogiums to him on every opportunity, alluding occasionally to their former acquaintance. Having at length succeeded in entering the sulṭān's service, he became the secretary, and obtained the confidence, of his master. The high favour which he now enjoyed placed him on a level with the most eminent men at court, and enabled him to assume the state and attribution of a wazīr and to engage in that career. As for al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil (No. 349), he was generally absent from court, being wholly engaged in directing the administration of Egypt, whilst 'Imād al-Dīn, whom the sulṭān had now chosen as the depository of his most secret thoughts, never left the imperial presence, but accompanied his sovereign to Syria and the other provinces of the empire. It was he who composed the al-Sirr al-Maktūm<sup>1</sup>. He wrote also a number of useful works, such as the Khariḍat al-Qaṣr wa Jarīdat al-'Aṣr (the vergin of the palace and palm-branch of the age,) designed by him as a continuation to Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Sa'd al-Ḥaḍiri's Zīnat al-Dahr (No. 242) (which work was meant as a continuation of al-Bākhārzi's Dumyat al-Qaṣr (No. 450), which was written as a continuation to al-Tha'ālībī's Yatīmat al-Dahr (No. 356). Al-Tha'ālībī meant his work to serve as a continuation to Hārūn Ibn 'Alī 'l-Munajjim's Kitāb al-Bārī: we shall give the life of this author. The Khariḍah of 'Imād al-Dīn contains an account of the poets who flourished between the years 500 (A. C. 1106) and 572 (A. C. 1176); it includes, with the exception of a few obscure individuals, all the poets of 'Irāq, Syria, Mesopotamia, Egypt, and Maghrib<sup>1</sup>, and attests the great abilities of the author. It forms ten volumes<sup>2</sup>. His work, al-Barq al-Shāmī (the Syrian Lightning), in seven volumes, is devoted to historical subjects. The author commences with the history of his own life and gives an account of his journey from 'Irāq to Syria, and of what happened to him when in the service of the sultān Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd. He then relates, by what means he got attached to the service of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, and notices some of the conquests achieved in Syria. He entitled this useful book the Syrian Lightning, because the hours he spent in those days resembled the lightning flash in the pleasure which they gave<sup>3</sup> and the rapidity with which they passed away. His al-Faṭḥ al-Qussī fi'l-Faṭḥ al-Qudsī (the Kossian<sup>4</sup> elucidation on the conquest of Jerusalem), forms two volumes and contains an account of the manner in which Jerusalem was taken (from the Crusaders<sup>5</sup>). His Sayl ala 'l-Dhayl (torrent after the train, or after the rain) was designed by him as a supplement to the work which Ibn al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) composed as a continuation (or supplement, Dhayl) to the Khaṭīb's (No. 33) History of Baghdād. So, at least, I heard said, but, having met with the work, I found it to be a continuation of the Kharīdat al-Qaṣr. In his Nuṣrat al-Fiṭrah wa 'Uṣrat al-Fiṭrah* [succour against languor

<sup>1</sup> The work entitled al-Sirr al-Maktūm (the hidden secret) treats of judicial astrology.

1 Maghrib (the west) here designates North Africa, Spain, and Sicily.

2 An incomplete copy of this work, made up with volumes belonging to different sets, is preserved in the Bibliothèque impériale. Our author is mistaken in saying that the Kharīdah contains notices on those poets only who lived subsequently to A.H. 500. The work is merely a collection of poetical extracts to which the compiler has joined observations written in his usual pretentious style and of very little real importance. A fact or a date is seldom to be met within these phrases which are all pomp and glitter, alliteration and affectation.

3 See No. 191, note.

4 See No. 307, note on Quss.

5 Several copies of this work are preserved in the Bibliothèque impériale; a very old and well written one belongs to the Supplement of the same library.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives al-Qa'rah. Ed.

and asylum for the human race (?)], he relates the history of the Saljūq dynasty<sup>1</sup>. He left also a diwān (collection) of epistles, and another of poems, in four volumes. In these qaṣīduhs, he displays a lofty mind. Another diwān of his, a small one, is composed entirely of quatrains (dubayt). Numerous interesting letters and conversations passed between him and al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil: it is related that, meeting him one day on horseback, he said: "Proceed, and may thy horse never stumble with thee (Sir fulā kabūbik al-Faras)!" to which the qāḍi replied "May the glory of 'Imād al-Dīn endure (Dām 'ala al-'Imād)!" These phrases may be equally read backwards and forwards<sup>2</sup>. They were one day riding in the suit of the sulṭān and their attention being attracted by the clouds of dust raised by the numerous horsemen and covering all the field, 'Imād al-Dīn recited to him extempore the following lines:

"The dust is raised by the horses' hoofs (al-Sanābik); the sky is darkened by it, but it receives light from the brightness of thy presence (anāra bihi al-sanābik). O fortune! spare me 'Abd al-Raḥīm<sup>3</sup>, and I shall not fear the touch of thy fangs (massa nābik)."

In these three verses he has hit on a beautiful play of words. Al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil having set out from Egypt in the year 574 (A. C. 1178-9), to perform the pilgrimage, he took shipping on his way, and 'Imād al-Dīn addressed him the following letter: "Happiness to the Ḥijr and to al-Ḥajūn<sup>4</sup> from the possessor of caution and

1 This work, of which a copy exists in the Bibliothèque impériale fonds St. Germain, No. 327, is written in 'Imād al-Dīn's swollen and extravagant style. Its tone has been softened by the imām al-Faṭḥ Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Bundārī al-Iṣbahānī, who entitled his work; Zubdat al-Nuṣrah wa Nuḥbat al-'Uṣrah (cream of the Nuṣrah and extract of the 'Uṣrah. See MS of the Bibliothèque impériale, No. 761A.

2 In transcribing them, I have put in italics the vowels which are not represented in the Arabic writing.

3 This was al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil's real name.

4 Ḥajūn is a hill near Makkah. The ḥijr is a semicircular area on the west side of the Ka'bah, and enclosed by a wall called ḥaṭīm. See Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, vol. I, p. 252.

intelligence<sup>1</sup>, from him whose glory reaches the stars and whose presence enlightens the darkness ! (Happiness) to the assembly at the Ka'bah from (him who is) the pivot (ka'b) of generosity, and to the sacred offerings from one who points out the true path ! (Happiness) to the noble station (of Abrahām) from that noble presence, and to the ḥatīm<sup>2</sup> from him who breaketh the back of poverty. When he appears, he seems a pyramid in the sacred territory, and a bird hovering around him who draws the Zamzam waters ; on sea, he is a sea (of generosity) ; on land, beneficence itself. Quss has now returned to his 'Ukāẓ<sup>3</sup> and Qays has come back with his Traditionists. Admire a ka'bah visited by one who is a ka'bah (centre or source) of bounty and munificence ; (admire) a qiblah<sup>4</sup> towards which advances one who is the central point of (universal) favour and regard. Farewell." This note is composed with singular art and ingenuity, but the writer is evidently mistaken when he speaks of Qays and his Traditionists ; he should have said Anas with his Traditionists in accordance with the well-known saying : Anas (master) of the Traditionists (Anas al-Ḥuffāz)<sup>5</sup>. They were four brothers, each bearing a different surname. Their history I should give here were I not afraid of lengthening this notice and being led away from my subject. On the death of the wazīr 'Awn al-Dīn Ibn Hubayrah, the government of the khālīfate (al-dīwān al-'azīz, the majestic board) arrested a number of his followers and, amongst them, 'Imād al-Dīn, because he was then acting as his deputy at Wāsiṭ. In the month of Shā'bān, A. H. 560 (June-July, A. C. 1165), 'Imād al-Dīn addressed from his prison a qaṣīdah, containing the following lines, to 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn 'Aḍud al-Dīn

---

1 This piece derives its sole merit from the numerous quibbles and puns with which it is filled. Such futilities being of no interest to the ordinary reader, I abstain from indicating them and confine myself to the task of rendering intelligible 'Imād al-Dīn's obscurities of style.

2 See note on Hajūn above.

3 See No. 307, note.

4 The Ka'bah is the name of the temple at Makkah. For qiblah see No. 16, note.

5 The celebrated Traditionist Anas Ibn Mālīk had for disciples four of his sons : al-Naḍr النضر 'Abd Allāh, Mūsā and Malik. A very considerable number of Traditions are given on his authority.

Ibn Ra'is al-Ruwasā, who was then acting as mayor of the palace (ustād al-dār) to the khalif al-Mustanjid :

"Say to the imām : 'Wherefore the imprisonment of your client (walī) ? let your kindness be shown to me who always served you faithfully. When the cloud withheld its showers (wall), did not his father, by his prayers, set them free ?'

(On hearing these lines, the khalif) ordered him to be set at liberty. They contain an original thought and an allusion to the history of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb and al-'Abbās, the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib and the uncle of the Prophet. Under the khalifate of 'Umar, a drought prevailed which threatened the earth with sterility, and he went out accompanied by people to pray for rain. Having taken his station, he pronounced these words : "Almighty God ! when we suffered from drought we used to solicit Thy assistance through Thy favour for our Prophet, but, to-day we implore it through Thy favour for the uncle of our Prophet ; grant us rain." And rain was granted. The word walī, in the verses just given, signifies the rain which comes after the wasmi, or first rains of spring ; it is called walī (follower) because it follows the wasmi ; and the wasmi is so called because it marks (wasamah) the surface of the earth with plants. It is the adjective formed from wasm (mark). Al-Mutanabbī has employed both terms in the following verse :

"Will that gazelle (maiden) grant me the favour of a renewed affection, the first rains (wasmi) of whose kindness were never followed by a second shower (walī) ? "

He means that her first visit was not followed by a second. 'Imād al-Dīn continued to hold the place of secretary and maintain his high rank at court till the death of the sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn A.H. 589 (A.C. 1193). This event reduced him to ruin and deprived him of all his influence. Finding every door shut against him, he withdrew to his house and remained there, occupied in the composition of his works. He mentions something of this in the beginning of his al-Barq al-Shāmi. In the life of Ibn al-Ta'āwidhī (No. 654) we have noticed the epistle and qaṣīdah in which he requested from 'Imād al-Dīn the gift of a furred cloak, and we have spoken of the answer returned to both documents. 'Imād al-Dīn was born at Iṣbahān on Monday, the 2nd of the latter Jumādā—some say of Shā'bān—A.H. 519 (6th July, A.C. 1125), and he died at Damascus, on Monday, the first of Ramaḍān, A.H. 597 (5th June, A.C. 1201). He was interred in the cemetery of the Ṣūfis, outside the gate called Bāb al-Naṣr. A person who held an eminent rank in the administration and who remained with him during his last illness, informed me that, whenever a visitor came to see him, 'Imād al-Dīn recited the following lines :

"I am a guest at your dwelling ; where, O where is the host ? My acquaintances know me no longer, and those whom I knew are dead !"

Aluh is a Persian word signifying eagle ; 'uqāb, in Arabic. It is said that no male eagles exist ; all being females which are impregnated by a bird of another species. Some say that they are impregnated by the fox. This is certainly marvellous. Ibn 'Unayn (No. 658) the poet has the following line in a satire directed against a person called Ibn Sidah :

"Thou art a mere eagle ; we know who thy mother was but none knows who was thy father."

This alludes to the opinion of which we have just spoken, but God alone knows whether it be true or false".

679 ABŪ NAṢR AL-FĀRĀBĪ

Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṭarkhān Ibn Awzalagh al-Fārābī the Turk, a celebrated physician and author of various works on logic, music, and other sciences, was the greatest philosopher among the Muslims. None of them ever reached in the philosophical sciences the same rank as he, and it was by the study of his writings and the imitation of his style that Avicenna

(No. 184) attained proficiency and rendered his own works so useful. Al-Fārābī passed his youth in Fārāb, the place of his birth, and then set out to travel. After various peregrinations, he visited Baghdād, where he arrived well acquainted with Turkish and some other languages, but wholly ignorant of Arabic. Having then commenced learning the latter language, he mastered it completely and devoted his mind to the philosophical sciences. On arriving at Baghdād, he found the celebrated philosopher Abū Bishr Mattā Ibn Yūnus<sup>1</sup>, who was then far advanced in age, teaching logic in that city and possessing the very highest reputation: every day crowds of pupils attended the lectures in which he explained Aristotle's treatise on that subject, and al-Fārābī filled seventy volumes with the observations which he wrote down from the lips of so able a master. (Mattā) stood unrivalled in that art; in his writings, he shone by precision of style and subtlety of elucidation, and he aimed at simplifying his meaning by developments and annotations. It was therefore said by an able logician that the abilities which Abū Naṣr al-Fārābī displayed in rendering the most abstract ideas intelligible and expressing them in the simplest words, could only be attributed to the tuition of Abū Bishr (Mattā). Al-Fārābī attended his lessons, and always took his station among the crowd of students who surrounded the learned professor. Having thus passed a considerable time, he removed to Ḥarrān, where he met Yūḥannā Ibn Khaylān<sup>2</sup>, a Christian and an able philosopher, from whom he learned some particular applications of the art of logic. He then returned to Baghdād and studied the philosophical sciences. Having mastered all Aristotle's works, he acquired a great facility in comprehending the ideas and the scope of that author's writings. It is related that the following note was found inscribed, in Abū Naṣr al-Fārābī's handwriting, on a copy of Aristotle's treatise on the soul:

1 Abū Bishr Mattā Ibn Yūnus (Mathew the son of Jonas), a Christian and a native of Baghdād, held a high reputation as a logician and as a teacher of that science. He died at Baghdād under the Khalīfate of al-Rāḍī, (A.H. 322-329, A.C. 934-941). He composed a commentary on the Isagoge of Porphyry and a number of other works, the titles of which are given in al-Zūzanī's Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥukamā.

2 In the MS. of the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥukamā, this name is written جبلاد (Jablād).

"I have read over this book two hundred times." It is related also that he said; "I read over the philosopher Aristotle's Physics<sup>1</sup> forty times, and I feel that I ought to read it over again." It is stated that, having been asked whether he or Aristotle was the more learned in this branch of science, he replied: "Had I lived in his time, I should have been the chief of his disciples." Abu 'l-Qāsim Sā'id Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Sā'id al-Qurṭubī mentions him in his Ṭabaqāt, or classified list of philosophers<sup>2</sup>, and says: "Al-Fārābī, the philosopher of the Muslims in reality, learned the art of logic from Yūḥannā Ibn Kḥaylān, who died at Madīnat al-Salām (Baghdād) in the reign of al-Muqtadir; he then excelled all the people of Islāmism and surpassed them by his real acquirements in that science; he explained its obscurities, revealed its mysteries, facilitated its comprehension and furnished every requisite for its intelligence, in works remarkable for precision of style and subtlety of elucidation; noticing in them what al-Kindī (No. 143, note), and others had neglected, such as the art of analysis (taḥlīl) and the modes of conveying instruction<sup>3</sup>. In these treatises he elucidated in plain terms the five main principles<sup>4</sup> of logic, indicating the manner of employing them with advantage and the operation of

1 The Arabic title is al-Sama' al-Ṭabī'i, a literal translation of the Greek (Auscultatio physica).

2 Ḥājī Kḥalīfah entitles this work Ṣawān al-Ḥukm fī Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥukamā. The author, Abu 'l-Qāsim Sā'id Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sā'id al-Taḥlībī was born al-Almeria in the year 420 (A. C. 1029), but his family belonged to Cordova. He was appointed qāḍī of Toledo by al-Māmūn Yahyā (Ibn Ismā'il) Ibn ḥu 'l-Nūn, and he continued to fill this office till his death. This event occurred in the month of Ṣḥawwāl, A. H. 462 (July-Aug., A. C. 1070). (Ibn Bashkuwāl's Ṣīlat).

3 The original text has انحاء التعامل (mathematical processes). The same passage occurs in the life of al-Fārābī, given by al-Zūzanī in his Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥukamā, but there we read انحاء التعلم, which is a well known expression and is probably the right reading.

4 The MSS. read مبادئ, but the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥukamā has طرق. If the writer meant the five predicables, why did he not employ the الفاظ which is the usual term?

reasoning (sūrat al-qiyās) to each of them. His writings on this subject are therefore highly satisfactory and possess the utmost merit. He afterwards composed a noble work in which he enumerated the sciences and indicated the object of each; this treatise, the like of which had never before been composed and the plan of which had never been adopted by any other author, is an indispensable guide to students in the sciences." Ibn Šā'id then proceeds to mention some of his works and the subjects of which they treat<sup>1</sup>. Abū Naṣr continued, at Baghdād, to labour in the acquisition of this science till he attained in it a conspicuous rank and surpassed all his contemporaries. It forms the subject of most of his work. He then set out for Damascus, but did not stop there, having turned his steps towards Egypt. He mentions in his work, entitled al-Siyāsat al-Madaniyah (administration of the city, i. e., political economy) that he commenced it at Baghdād and finished it in Egypt. Having then returned to Damascus, he settled there and met with a kind reception from the reigning sultān, Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān (No. 456)<sup>2</sup>. I read in a miscellany that, when Abū Naṣr went to Sayf al-Dawlah's levee, which was a point of union for all persons distinguished by their acquirements in any of the sciences, he appeared in his usual attire, which was that of the Turks<sup>3</sup>. Sayf al-Dawlah having invited him to sit down, he said; (Shall I sit down) where I am, or where thou art? Sayf al-Dawlah replied: "Where thou art;" on which Abū Naṣr stepped over the shoulders of the persons (seated on the floor), till he reached the prince's throne and sat down so close to him that he forced him out of his place<sup>4</sup>. Sayf al-Dawlah had some mamlūks standing behind

1 Al-Zūzanī, or rather al-Qāḍī al-Akrām Ibn al-Qifī whose work he abridged, has given a life of al-Fārābī in his Ṭabaqāt Ḥukamā, which life is evidently extracted from that composed by the qāḍī Šā'id al-Qurubī. The list of works alluded to by Ibn Khalikān fills more than a page in the Ṭabaqāt.

2 Sayf al-Dawlah took possession of Damascus in the year 334 (A.C. 946).

3 According to al-Zūzanī, he wore the šūfi dress.

4 Had Sayf al-Dawlah answered: Where I am, Abū Naṣr would have sat down without quitting the place where he stood. Having designated that place by the words where I am, and Sayf al-Dawlah's by the words where thou art, he pretended that these terms had the same acceptation when uttered by the prince. To be logically exact, Sayf al-Dawlah's answer should have been: Sit down on the floor where thou art now standing.

him, with whom he was accustomed to hold private communications in a particular language known to very few persons. On this occasion, he said to them. "This shaykh has grossly offended against politeness; I shall now propose him some questions, and, if he does not reply to them in a satisfactory manner, turn him into ridicule." Abū Naṣr immediately answered, in the same language: "Consider of it, O amīr! for every proceeding is appreciated according to its result." These words filled Sayf al-Dawlah with astonishment: "How!" said he, "you know this language?"—"Yes," replied Abū Naṣr, "I know upwards of seventy!" From that moment, the prince conceived a high opinion of him. Abū Naṣr then began to converse with the learned men of the company on all the different sciences, and he continued to harangue till he reduced them to silence and had the whole discourse to himself. They had even commenced writing down his (learned) observations when Sayf al-Dawlah dismissed them and remained alone with the philosopher. "Would you like to eat anything?" said he. "No." "Or to drink?" "No." "Or to hear (music)?"—"Yes". The prince then ordered some of the most eminent performers of instrumental music to be brought in, but not one of them could touch his instrument without exciting Abū Naṣr's disapprobation. "Have you any skill in this art,?" said Sayf al-Dawlah. "I have," replied the other and drawing a case from beneath his waistband, he opened it and produced a lute. Having turned it, he began to play and cast all the company in a fit of laughter. He then undid the strings and, having tuned it in another manner, he played again and drew tears from their eyes. Mounting it a third time, in a different key, he played and set them all asleep, even the door-keepers, on which he took the opportunity of retiring and left them in that state. It is stated that instrument called the qānūn<sup>2</sup> was of his invention and that he was the first who mounted it in its present form. Al-Fārābī led a solitary life and never went into company; during his residence at Damascus, he passed the greater part of his time near the borders of some rivulet or in a shady

1 I avow that I consider all this narration as a fiction.

2 The Qārūn is a sort of dulcimer. Mr. Lane has given a figure of it in his Modern Egyptians.

garden; there he composed his works and received the visits of his pupils. He wrote most of his works on loose leaves and very few in quires, for which reason nearly all his productions assume the form of detached chapters and notes; some of them exist only in fragments or unfinished. He was the most indifferent of men for the things of this world; he never gave himself the least trouble to acquire a livelihood or possess a habitation. Sayf al-Dawlah settled on him a daily pension of four dirhams (two shillings) out of the public treasury; this moderate sum being the amount to which al-Fārābī had limited his demand. He continued to live with the same frugality up to the moment of his death. He died at Damascus, A.H. 339 (A.C. 950-1), aged upwards of eighty years, and the funera! service was said over his body by Sayf al-Dawlah accompanied by four officers of the court. He was interred in the cemetery outside the gate called Bāb al-Ṣaghīr.<sup>1</sup> Mattā Ibn Yūnus died at Baghdād under the khalīfate of al-Rāḍī; so, at least, it is stated by Ibn Ṣā'id al-Qurtubī, in his classified list (Ṭabaqāt) of physicians<sup>2</sup>. I found in a miscellany the following verses attributed to al-Fārābī, but have no proof of their authenticity:

"Quit, O brother! the place of the frivolous and frequent the place of heavenly truths. This (earthly) dwelling is not for us a lasting abode; no human being on earth can avert (the stroke of fate). This man envies that one, even for (things which endure) less than (the time for uttering) the shortest words. What are we but a drop of sperm on which various fortunes have descended? fortunes always ready to depart! The circuit of the heavens is our fittest place; why therefore so much eagerness for its central point (the earth)?"

In the Khariḍah I found these verses attributed to the shaykh Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Fāriqī, an inhabitant of Baghdād whom 'Imād al-Dīn, the author of that work, says that he met on Friday the 18th of Rajab, A.H. 561 (May, A.C. 1166),* and 1 M. Munk's Me'langes de philosophie juive et arabe (Paris, 1859, in 8°) contains a very good article on Farāb and another on al-Kindī.

2 Al-Zūzani makes the same statement.

* 20 May.—Ed.

that he died a few years later, Awzalagh is a Turkish name. Fārābī means belonging to Fārāb, the modern Uṭrār (اوارار); this city lies beyond al-Shāsh and near the city of Balāsāghūn. All its inhabitants follow the doctrines of the imām al-Shāfi<sup>1</sup>. It is one of the capital cities of the Turkish nation, and was called the Inner Fārāb (Fārāb al-Dākhilah) to distinguish it from the Outer Fārāb (Fārāb al-Khārijah) which is situated on the border of the province of Fārs. Balāsāghūn is a town on the Turkish frontier, beyond the river Sayhūn (No. 664) and lying near Kāshghar. Kāshghar is a large city, situated, it is said, within the limits of the Chinese empire (al-Ṣīn).

680 ABŪ BAKR AL-RĀZĪ (RIASES)

Abū Bakr Muḥammṣd Ibn Zakariyā al-Rāzī (native of Ray) was a celebrated physician. Ibn Juljul<sup>1</sup> says, in his History of the Physicians: "He (al-Rāzī) directed the hospital at Ray and afterwards, under the khalīfate of al-Muktafi the hospital at Baghdād. In his youth, he played on the lute and cultivated vocal music, but, on reaching the age of manhood, he renounced these occupations, saying that music proceeding from between mustaches and a beard had no charms to recommend it. Having then applied himself to the study of medicine and philosophy, he read the works on these subjects with the attention of a man who seeks to follow the author's reasonings step by step; and he thus acquired a perfect acquaintance with the depths of these sciences and appropriated to himself whatever truths were contained in the treatises which he perused. He then commenced attending the sick and composed a great number of books on medicine." Another writer says; "He was the ablest physician of that age and the most distinguished; a perfect master of the art of medicine, skilled in its practice and thoroughly grounded in its principles and rules. Pupils travelled from distant countries to receive the benefit of his tuition. He composed a number of useful works on medicine, such as the ʿĪwāl (comprehensive), a large treatise in about thirty volumes, which remains a standard authority for physicians and to which they refer in every doubtful case. His Jāmiʿ (collector) is also a large and useful work, and his Kitāb al-Aqḡāb<sup>1</sup> is a voluminous production." His abridged treatise on medicine, the Kitāb al-Manṣūri, is a work of great repute, and though of small extent, is highly appreciated; in this treatise, he combines theory with practice and furnishes essential information for persons of all classes<sup>2</sup>. He composed it for Abū Sālīḥ Manṣūr Ibn Nūḥ Ibn Naṣr Ibn Ismāʿīl Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Asad Ibn Sāmān, one of the Sāmānid kings, and for this reason, he entitled his book al-Manṣūri (the Manṣūriyan). Besides these works, he composed many others all of them indispensable (to physicians). One of his sayings was; "When you can cure by a regimen, avoid having recourse to medicine; and when you can effect a cure with a simple medicine, avoid employing a compound one." He said again: "With a learned physician and an obedient patient, sickness soon disappears." And again: "Treat an incipient malady with remedies which will not prostrate the strength." Till the end of his life, he continued at the head of his profession. He began the study of medicine at an advanced age, being then, it is said, upwards of forty years old. Towards the close of a long life, he lost his sight, and he died A.H. 311 (A.C. 923-4). He studied medicine under the physician Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Rabn* al-Ṭabarī<sup>3</sup>, the author of the Firdaws al-Ḥikmah and

<sup>1</sup> Abū Dāwūd Sulaymān Ibn Ḥassān, surnamed Ibn Juljul, was physician to Hishām al-Muwayyad bi-Allāh, the Umayyad sovereign of Spain. Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah's notice on this physician will be found in M. de Sacy's Abd Allatif, p. 495.

1 In Arabic كتاب الاقطاب. The right pronunciation and the meaning of this title are unknown to me.

2 An article on Abū Bakr al-Rāzī will be found in M. Wustenfeld's Geschichte der Arabischen Aerzte (history of the Arabian physicians).

3 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Rabn al-Ṭabarī, an able physician, belonged to a Jewish family and was a native of Ṭabaristān. Having been forced by the troubled state of his native country to take refuge in Ray, he had there Abū Bakr al-Rāzī for disciple. He then proceeded to Sarra-man-ra'ā and composed his work entitled Firdaws al-Ḥikmah (garden of knowledge). He had been

(Continued on page 205)

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Zayn.—Ed.

other useful works. Al-Ṭabarī was at first a Christian (a Jew), but he subsequently embraced Islāmism. We have already (No. 48) explained the meaning of the word Rāzī (native of Ray). As for the Sāmānīd kings, they were sultāns of Transoxiana and Khurāsān and one of the best dynasties which ever ruled. The reigning monarch was styled the Sultān of the Sultāns, and this title came to be considered as the real name of the sovereign. They were distinguished by their justice, piety, and learning. This dynasty was overthrown by Maḥmūd Ibn Subuktīkīn, a sultān whose life we shall give (in this work, No. 686). The Sāmānīds reigned during one hundred and two years, six months and ten days. Abū Šāliḥ Maṣṣūr, the prince mentioned in this article, died in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 365 (June, A.C. 976); he was a boy when al-Rāzī drew up the Maṣṣūrī for his instruction. Since writing the above, I have seen a copy of this work bearing on the title-page an inscription, stating, that it was composed for and named after Abū Šāliḥ al-Maṣṣūr Ibn Ishāq Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Nūḥ, prince of Kirmān and Khurāsān, and a descendant of Bahrām Kūsh*. God knows best which of these statements is true. Ibn Juljul relates also, in his History, that al-Rāzī composed for the same al-Maṣṣūr a treatise establishing the certainty of alchemy, and set out from Baghdād to present it to him. Al-Maṣṣūr testified great satisfaction on examining the work and, having rewarded the author with the secretary to Māzyār (No. 627, note), and afterwards made his profession of Islāmism to the Khalīf al-Mu'tasim. He then proceeded to the court (of Baghdād) and became one of al-Mutawakkil's boon companions. The word Rabn (ربن), Rābīn (رابین) and al-Rabb (الرب) are names given by the Jews to the chief doctors of their law. (Tārīkh al-Hukamā, pp. 160, 195). Rabn is therefore the equivalent of Rabbi. There can be no doubt respecting the orthography of this word, as the author of the dictionary here cited, places Rabn after Rizq Allāh and before the chapter of names beginning with Z. In some Arabic MSS. this word is erroneously written Zayn (زين).

(Continued from page 204)

1 In the MSS. the word Kūsh is written کوش or کوس Mikḥond and Abu 'l-Fedā write this name جوبین Tchupin or Jūbīn. Ibn Kullikān may have perhaps written کوبین.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, gives : Jūr (Gor).—Ed.

sum of one thousand dinārs, he said to him: "I wish you to produce the thing of which you speak in this book." "That is a task," replied al-Rāzī, "for the execution of which ample funds are necessary, as also various implements and aromatics of genuine quality; and all this must be done according to the rules of art, so that the whole operation is one of great difficulty." "All the implements you require," said al-Manṣūr, "shall be furnished to you, with every object necessary for the operation; so that you may produce (the substance) mentioned in your book." Perceiving the prince to be in earnest, al-Rāzī hesitated to undertake the task and declared his inability to perform it. On this, al-Manṣūr said: "I should never have thought a philosopher capable of deliberate falsehood in a work represented by him as a scientific treatise, and which will engage people's hearts in a labour from which they can draw no advantage. I have given you one thousand dinārs as a reward for this visit and the trouble which you have taken, but I shall assuredly punish you for committing a deliberate falsehood!" He then struck him on the head with a whip and sent him off to Baghdād with a stock of provisions for the journey. That stroke caused a descent of humour into al-Rāzī's eyes, but he would not permit them to be lanced, declaring that he had seen enough of the world. Abū Muḥammad Nūḥ Ibn Naṣr, the father of (Manṣūr), died in the month of latter Rabi' A.H. 343 (August, A.C. 954). Abu 'l-Ḥasan Naṣr Ibn Ismā'il, his grandfather, died in the month of Rajab, A. H. 331 (March-April, A.C. 943), and his great-grand father Abū Ibrāhīm Ismā'il Ibn Aḥmad, on the eve of Tuesday, the 14th of Ṣafar, A.H. 295 (24th November, A.C. 907) at Bukhārā: he was born, A.H. 234 (A.C. 848-9), at Farghānah. Abū Ibrāhīm took pleasure in writing down Traditions, and honoured men of learning. Aḥmad Ibn Asad Ibn Sāmān died at Farghānah in the year 250 (A.C. 864). These observations are foreign to our subject, but we were led into them by the drift of this discourse: they furnish also some important information.<sup>2</sup>

1 Literally—For considering falsehood as licit على تحليل الكذب لـ.

2 A new and much improved edition of al-Rāzī's treatise on the small-pox and measles was published in London, 1848, with a very carefully made translation and instructive notes, by Dr. Greenhill.

681 MUḤAMMAD IBN MŪSĀ IBN SHĀKIR

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā Ibn Shākir was one of the three brothers after whom the art of engineering was called the contrivances of the sons of Mūsā (ḥiṣāl banī Mūsā): Muḥammad, Aḥmad, and al-Ḥasan, these three brothers being celebrated for their talents in that line. Animated with the noble ambition of learning the sciences of the ancients and acquiring their books, they laboured to effect this object and sent persons to bring them books from the country of the Greeks<sup>1</sup>. By the offer of ample rewards, they drew translators from distant countries, and they thus made known the marvels of science. Geometry, engineering, the movements (of the heavenly bodies)<sup>2</sup>, music, and astrology were the principal subjects to which they turned their attention but these were only a small number (of their acquirements). They composed on engineering an original and curious work, filled with every sort of curious information. I met with a copy of it, in one volume, and found it to be an excellent and highly instructive production. A thing which they, the first in Islāmic times, brought from theory into practice<sup>3</sup> (was the measurement of the earth); for, although, astronomical observers in ancient times, anterior to the promulgation of Islāmism, had executed the operation, yet no statement exists to prove that it had been attempted by any person of this religion, except by themselves. (The khalif) al-Māmūn had a strong predilection for the sciences of the ancients and a great desire of putting their exactness to the test: having read in their productions, that the circumference of the globe is twenty-four thousand miles, or eight thousand parasangs, (three miles make a parasang,) and that, if one end of a cord were placed at any point on the surface of the earth and the cord passed round the earth till the two ends met, that cord would be twenty-four thousand miles long, he wished to prove the truth of this assertion and asked the sons of Mūsā what was their opinion. They replied that the fact was certain, and he then said:

---

1 Or : from Asia Minor (Bilād al-Rūm).

2 The term ḥarakat is the equivalent of ḥarakat al-nujūm.

3 Literally : De potestate in actum ; an Acistotelian expression.

"I wish you to employ the means indicated by the ancients, so that we may see whether it be correct or not." On this, they inquired in what country a level plain could be found, and, being informed that the desert of Sinjār was perfectly level, as also the country about Kūfah, they took with them a number of persons on whose veracity and skill in this art al-Māmūn placed reliance, and set out for Sinjār. On arriving in the plain just mentioned, they stopped at a spot where they took the altitude of the north pole by means of certain instruments, and drove a picket into the place where the observation was made. To this picket they fastened a long cord and walked directly towards the north, avoiding, as much as possible, any deviation to the right or to the left. When the cord was run out, they set up another picket, and tied to it a cord, after which they walked towards the north as before. They continued the same operation till they came to a place where they observed the altitude of the pole and found it to surpass by one degree the altitude observed at the first station. Having already obtained the length of the intermediate space by means of the cords, they found the distance to be sixty-six miles and two thirds. From this they learned that every degree of the sphere corresponded to a space of sixty-six miles and two thirds on the surface of the earth. They then returned to the place where they had driven in the first picket, and, having fastened a cord to this picket, they went directly towards the south, operating as they had previously done when going towards the north; that is, setting up pickets and fastening cords. When the cords employed in the operation directed towards the north were again run out, they took the altitude of the pole and found it one degree less than the altitude first observed. Their calculation was thus verified and (the result of) their undertaking confirmed. Persons acquainted with astronomy will understand this. It is well known that the number of degrees in the zodiac is three hundred and sixty: for the zodiac is divided into twelve signs, and each sign into thirty degrees. There are therefore three hundred and sixty degrees in all, and, if this sum be multiplied by sixty-six and two thirds, the number of miles in a degree, we obtain twenty-four thousand miles, or eight thousand parasangs (for the circumference of the earth). This is certain and indubitable. When the sons of Mūsā returned to al-Māmūn and informed him of what they had done (he perceived that the result) corresponded with what he had read in the books of the ancients relative to the deductions of that people, and, wishing to verify the fact elsewhere, he sent them to the land of Kūfah, where they operated as they had done at Sinjār. The two calculations agreeing, al-Māmūn acknowledged the truth of what the ancients had written on that subject. This is the passage to which I referred in the life of Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā al-Ṣūlī, where I said (No. 622): Were I not apprehensive of extending this article to too great a length, I should render this evident. The sons of Mūsā were the authors of various extraordinary inventions some of which I should notice, did I not wish to avoid prolixity.<sup>1</sup> Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā died in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 259 (January, A.C. 873).

682 MUḤAMMAD IBN JĀBIR AL-BATTĀNĪ (ALBATEGNIUS)

Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Jābir Ibn Sinān, a native of Harrān and an inhabitant of al-Raqqah, surnamed al-Battānī, was a famous calculator and astronomer, and the author of (the astronomical work entitled) the Ṣābean Table (al-Zij al-Ṣābi). He executed many curious (astronomical) operations and made correct observations. His observations were commenced in the year A.H. 264 (A. C. 877-8), and he continued them till the year A.H. 306 (A. C. 918-9). In his table, he marked the position occupied by the fixed stars in the year A.H. 299 (A. C. 911-2). He was the paragon of the age in the art which he cultivated, and his operations furnish a proof of his great talents and extensive information. He died in the year 317 (A. C. 929-30), at a place called Qaṣr al-Ḥaḍr (the fortress of al-Ḥaḍr) on his return from Baghdād. I know not if he professed the doctrines of Islāmism; his name, however, indicates that he was a Muslim.<sup>1</sup> He made two editions of his Zīj, the second of which is better than the first. His other works are: the Ma'rifat Maqālī' al-Burūj (knowledge of the rising-places of the zodiacal signs) in the interval between the quarters of the sphere<sup>2</sup>; a treatise on the quantity of the conjunctions (fī Miqdar al-Iṭṭisālāt) a treatise in which he explained the four quarters of the sphere; a treatise on the appreciation of the quantity of the conjunctions; an explanation of Ptolemy's Quadripartitum<sup>3</sup> etc. Battānī, or according to Abū Muḥammad Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Akfānī<sup>4</sup>. Bittānī, means belonging to Battān or Bittān, a place in the province of Ḥarrān. Al-Ḥaḍr is an ancient city near Tikrit, and situated in the desert between the Tigris and the Euphrates<sup>5</sup>. Al-Sāṭirūn الساترون the lord of al-Ḥaḍr, was besieged by Ardashīr Ibn Bābak, the first (Sāsānid) king of Persia, who took the city and put him to death. Alluding to this event, Ḥārithah Ibn Ḥajjāj, better known by the appellation of Abū Duwād al-Iyādī<sup>6</sup>, said:

<sup>1</sup> Our author would have done better to suppress some of his poetical citations and give us more information about the inventions of Banī Mūsā. He had before him documents which we have not.

"I see that death has descended from al-Ḥaḍr upon the lord of its people, al-Ṣatirūn. The vicissitudes of time have overthrown him, after his possessing a kingdom, prosperity, and pearls hidden (from sight)".

1 The ancestors of al-Battānī were Sābeans and he was probably so himself.

2 This is perhaps a treatise on the mode of calculating the horizontal amplitude of the signs of the Zodiac for every latitude. Such a work would be useful for the history of spherical trigonometry.

3 The Arabic title is Arba' Maqālāt (four discourses). Ptolemy's treatise on judicial astrology entitled Tetrabiblion was first translated by Ibrāhīm Ibn al-alt whose translation was reviewed and corrected by Ḥunayn Ibn Isḥāq.

4 Ibn Khalikān speaks of al-Akfānī in No. 108 of this work. According to the author of the Nujūm, he died A.H. 523 (A.C. 1129).

5 In the Memoirs of the Geographical Society, vols. IX and XI, will be found an account of present state of al-Ḥaḍr. It was the capital of the celebrated al-Zabbā. See Rasmussen's Additamenta ad hist. ar. p. 2.

6 For the history of Abū Duwād see M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'Histoire des Arabes, t. 11, pp. 112, 113.

Some attribute these verses to Ḥanẓalah Ibn Sharqī.<sup>1</sup> 'Adī Ibn Zayd al-'Ibādī<sup>2</sup> also mentions this place in the following verse;

"And the brother of al-Ḥaḍr, when he built that place, and when the Tigris and al-Khābūr<sup>3</sup> paid him tribute."

The name of al-Ḥaḍr frequently occurs in poems. According to a statement repeated by Ibn Hishām (No. 355) in his Sīrat al-Rasūl, it was Sāpūr Dhu 'l-Aktāf who besieged al-Ḥaḍr; but this is an error. Ṣāṭirūn is a Syrian word signifying king; the real name of al-Ṣāṭirūn was Ḍayzan ذيزن Ibn Mu'āwiyah. Ḍayzan was an idol adored in the times of ignorance (anterior to the promulgation of Islāmism) and its name was given to different men. Al-Ṣāṭirūn belonged to the tribe of Quḍā'ah and was one of the provincial kings (No. 622). When these princes met with the design of waging war against the other kings, they chose al-Ṣāṭirūn for their chief on account of his power. Ardashīr besieged him during four years without being able to subdue him.

Al-Ṣāṭirūn had a daughter of extreme beauty called Naḍīrah نضيره the same of whom a poet said :

"Al-Ḥaḍr, al-Mirbā', and the bank of al-Tharthār<sup>4</sup> are deprived of the presence of Naḍīrah."

The custom of the people there was, that, when a female had her periodical indisposition, they lodged her in the suburb. Naḍīrah, being unwell, was lodged in the suburb of al-Ḥaḍr, and, looking out one day, she saw Ardashīr, who was a very handsome man, and fell in love with him. She then sent to him, offering to open the fortress and admit him, provided he married her. Having made her conditions, (she betrayed the city) and Ardashīr

1 See M. Caussin's Essai, tome 1. p. 330. et-seq.

2 See No. 85, note.

3 Al-Khābūr, a river of Mesopotamia, falls into the Euphrates at al-Qarqisiyah.

4 The river al-Tharthār passes near al-Ḥaḍr and falls into the 'Tigris.

fulfilled his promise. (Authors) differ as to the means which she pointed out to Ardashīr, so that he was enabled to take the fortress. Al-Ṭabarī says that she directed him to a talisman which was kept there : the people knew that he could not take the place till he found a grey pigeon, which, after its legs had been stained with the menstrua of a blue-eyed virgin, would alight, when let loose, on the wall of the fortress ; the talisman would then fall and the fortress be taken. Ardashīr did so, and devastated the fortress after giving it up to pillage, and exterminating the inhabitants. He then departed with Naḍīrah, and married her. It happened afterwards that, one night, as she was unable to sleep and turned from side to side in the bed, Sābūr<sup>1</sup> asked her what prevented her from sleeping ? She replied: "I never yet, since the first moment of my existence, slept in a rougher bed than this; I feel something annoy me." Sābūr ordered the bed to be changed, but she was unable to sleep, and the next morning she complained of her side. On examination, a myrtle leaf was found adhering to a fold of the skin, from which it had brought blood. Astonished at the circumstance, Sābūr asked her if it was that which had kept her awake ? She replied in the affirmative. "How then," said he, "did your father bring you up ?" "He spread me a bed of satin, and clothed me in silk, and fed me with marrow and cream, and the honey of virgin bees, and he gave me pure wine to drink." "The same return which you made your father for his kindness," replied Sābūr, "would be made much more readily to me". He then ordered her to be tied by the hair to the tail of a horse, which galloped off with her and killed her. The ruins of al-Ḥaḍr are still in existence with the remains of various edifices, but, since that time, it has never been inhabited. This is a long narration and I insert it only on account of its singularity. I read in another historical work, that al-Battānī went to Baghdād, whence he set out again and died on his way, at the fortress of al-Ḥaḍr, in the year already mentioned. Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī (No. 763) says in his Mushtarik : "The fortress of al-Ḥaḍr is in the neighbourhood of Sāmarrāh, the city erected by al-Mu'taṣim" God knows best !

<sup>1</sup> The author meant to write Ardashīr. He commits the same fault lower down.

683 ABU 'I-WAFĀ AL-BŪZJĀNĪ

Abu 'I-Wafā Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Ismā'īl Ibn al-'Abbās al-Būzjānī, the celebrated calculator, was one of the most distinguished masters in the science of geometry, and he deduced from it certain corollaries which had till then remained undiscovered. Our shaykh, the very learned Kamāl al-Dīn Abu 'I-Faṭḥ Mūsā Ibn Yūnus<sup>1</sup>, (may God be merciful to him!) was deeply skilled in that branch of knowledge and he highly extolled Abu 'I-Wafā's works, taking them as guides in most of his investigations and citing the author's words as a conclusive authority. He possessed a number of Abu 'I-Wafā's books. Abu 'I-Wafā composed a good and useful treatise on the manner of finding the length of the chords of arcs (fī Istikhrāj al-Awtār)<sup>2</sup>. He was born on Wednesday, the first of Ramaḍān, A.H. 328 (10th June, A.C. 940); at Būzjān, and he died A.H. 387 (A.C. 997)<sup>3</sup>. Būzjān is a small town of Kḥurāsān, between Herāt and Naysābūr. Abu 'I-Wafā visited 'Irāq in the year 348 (A.C. 959-60). I found the date of his birth, as given above, in the Kitāb al-Fihrist, by Abu 'I-Faraj Ibn al-Nadīm (No. 273), but that writer does not mention the year of his death. I therefore left it in blank when drawing up this article, hoping to find it later; as it was my main object in this work, as I have already said in the preface, to mark the dates on which distinguished individuals died. I afterwards found the year of

---

1 His life will be found in this work.

2 The Bibliothèque imperiale possesses an almagest attributed to Abu 'I-Wafā. In the Tārīkh al-Jukamā we find the following list of his works: the Manāzil (stations), a good arithmetical treatise; an explanation of al-Kḥuwārizmī's treatise on algebra; an explanation of the work of Diophantus on algebra; an explanation of Ibn Yaḥyā's work on algebra; the Mudkḥil or introduction to arithmetic; the Kitāb al-Barāhīn fī 'I-Qaḍāyā fī mā ista'malahu Diofantos fī kitābih (proofs of the rules employed by Diophantus in his work), the Kitāb Istikhrāj mabalagh al-Ka'b bi-mel māl wa mā yatarakkab minhā (the obtaining of the amount of the cube by a double multiplication, and of the other combination effected by that operation), an almagest, a treatise on the use of the sexagesimal table.

3 Abu 'I-Wafā continued to reside in Baḡhdād till his death. He died in the month of Rajab, A. H. 388 (June-July, A. C. 998) (Tārīkh al-Jukamā).

his death in the historical work of our shaykh Ibn al-Athīr (No. 435), and I inserted it here. Upwards of twenty years elapsed from the time in which I commenced this biographical work before I discovered the date of Abu 'l-Wafā's death.

684 JĀR ALLĀH AL-ZAMAKHSHARĪ

Abu 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd Ibn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar al-Khuwārizmī al-Zamakhsharī, the great master (imām) in the sciences of Qur'ānic interpretation, the Traditions, grammar, philology, and rhetoric, was incontrovertibly the first imām of the age in which he lived, and he attracted students from all quarters by his lessons in various branches of knowledge<sup>1</sup>. He learned grammar from Abū Muḍar Maṣṣūr. Al-Zamakhsharī was the author of those admirable works, the Kashshāf (revealer), a production the like of which had never before appeared on the interpretation of the Qur'ān, the Muḥājāt bi 'l-Masā'il al-Naḥwīyah (questions on points of grammar); the al-Mufrad wa 'l-Murakkab [the simple and compound (expression)] in the Arabic language<sup>2</sup>; the Fā'iqa (surpassing), on the interpretation of the Traditions; the Asās al-Balāghah (principles of eloquence), a philological work; the Rabī' al-Abrār (the vernal season of the just)<sup>3</sup>; the Fuṣūṣ al-Aḥbār (the signet-stones of histories)<sup>4</sup>; the Mutashābih Asmā al-Ruwāt (names of historical traditionists which are liable to be confounded with others); the al-Naṣā'ih al-Kibār (the great book of counsels); the al-Naṣā'ih al-Ṣiḡhār (the lesser book of counsels); the Ḍallat al-Nāshid (the stray camel of the seeker); the al-Shā'iq fi 'Ilm-al-Farā'id (the

1 Literally : and the saddle-bags were tied (on, to go) unto him on account of his branches (of science). The tying on of saddle bags is a very usual expression.

2 This is a very vague title ; it may signify ; 1st., the simple and compound propositions ; 2dly, the second simple and compound numerals (see de Sacy's grammar, second edition, tom I. p. 417) ; 3dly, the simple and compound proper names,

3 Some copies of this work are in the Bibliothèque imperiale. It is a large collection of anecdotes, classed according to their subjects.

4 Perhaps historical facts and anecdotes which leave a lasting impression on the mind.

instructor in the science of inheritance-shares); the Mufaṣṣal fī al-Naḥṣ [drawn up in sections (faṣl)], a treatise on grammar<sup>1</sup>, the al-Muḥrad wa 'l-Muwallaf (simple and compound terms), a grammatical treatise; the Anmūdḥaj (specimen), a treatise on grammar (See de Sacy's Anthologie grammaticale); the Ru'ūs al-Masā'il (leading questions), on jurisprudence; an explanation of the verses cited in the grammar of Sibawayh (No. 479); the Mustaqṣl (profound investigator), treating of the proverbs of the desert Arabs; the Ṣamīm al-'Arabiyah (the genius of the Arabic language); the Sawā'ir al-Amthāl (current proverbs); the Diwān al-Tamaththul* (collection of similes); the Shaqā'iq al-Nu'mān [anemonies, being a treatise on the merits of (Abū Ḥanīfah) al-Nu'mān]; the Shāfi 'l-'Ayyimin Kalām al-Shāfi'i (the remedy of hesitation in speech, taken from the sayings of al-Shāfi'i); the Qisṭās (balance), on prosody; the Mu'jam al-Ḥudūd (lexicon of definitions); the Minhāj (highway), a treatise on the fundamentals (of theology); the Muqaddamat al-Adab (introduction to philological sciences); a diwān of epistles; a diwān of poetry; the al-Risālat al-Nāṣiḥah (epistle of good advice); Amālī (dictations) on various branches of science, etc. He commenced the composition of his Mufaṣṣal on the first of Ramaḍān, A.H. 513 (December, A.C. 1119)† and he finished it on the first of Muḥarram, A.H. 515 (March, A.C. 1121)‡. Previously to this he had travelled to Makkah and resided there for some time, whence he derived the title of Jār Allāh (neighbour or client of God), and he was designated by this appellation as by a proper name. I heard a certain shaykh say that al-Zamakhshari had lost one of his feet, and that he walked with a crutch<sup>2</sup>. He lost it in Khuwārizm, where he

1 I have discovered two copies of this excellent grammatical treatise in the Bibliothèque impériale. The Arabic text has since been printed at Christiana, in 1859, by Mr. Broch.

2 Or perhaps: With a wooden leg. The word جلون has been already rendered by crutch in No. 233, but it does not occur in our dictionaries.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Tamthīl, which appears to be more correct reading.—Ed.

† 6 December.—Ed.

‡ 22 March.—Ed.

happened to be travelling; having encountered on his way a heavy storm of snow joined to an intense frost, his foot fell off. He carried with him a certificate attested by a great number of persons who knew the fact to be true; this he did lest those who were not acquainted with the real nature of the accident which had befallen him, might suppose that his foot had been cut off in punishment of some crime. The snow and frost frequently affect the extremities of the body in those regions and cause them to fall off. This is particularly the case in Khuwārizm, the cold being excessive in that country. I myself have seen numbers who lost the extremities of their body from that very cause; therefore the persons who have never witnessed such things should not consider them as improbable. I read in a historical work composed by a writer of later times, that, when al-Zamakhshari went to Baghdād, he had an interview with the Ḥanafite doctor al-Dāmaghānī<sup>1</sup>, who asked him how he lost his foot. To this question al-Zamakhshari replied: "Through an imprecation uttered by my mother: when a child, I caught a sparrow and tied a string to its leg; it escaped, however, into a hole, and, in trying to draw it out, I pulled its foot off with the string. My mother was so deeply grieved at this that she exclaimed; 'May God cut off the foot of that wretch<sup>2</sup> as he has cut off the foot of the sparrow!' When I reached the age at which students set out on their travels, I proceeded to Bukhārā in pursuit of knowledge, and broke my leg by a fall off the animal which I was riding. The results of this accident were so grave, that amputation became necessary." Almighty God best knows which of these statements is true! Al-Zamakhshari publicly professed the doctrines of the Mu'tazelites, and it is related that whenever he went to see any of his acquaintances, he used to have himself announced by the door-keeper as Abu 'l-Qāsim the

---

1 Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Dāmaghānī, a jurisconsult of the Ḥanafite sect, acted for some time as Qāḍī of al-Karakh (the suburb of Baghdād). Having resigned his office, he cast aside the 'aylasān, (doctor's hood or scarf and entered into the service of the khalīf as chamberlain (hājib). He was of a noble and generous character, and an able statesman. He died A.H. 518 (A.C. 1124-5). (Nujūm.)

2 The word عبد, the superlative of عبد is frequently employed with the sense of accursed wretch.

Mu'tazilite. When he first composed his Kashshāf, he commenced the introduction of it with these words : Praise be unto God Who hath created the Qur'ān<sup>1</sup>, and on being told that, if he let the passage stand so, the public would reject his book and no one would wish to procure it, he altered the phrase thus : Praise be unto God Who hath established (Ja'ala) the Qur'ān ; the verb to establish, bearing with them (the Mu'tazilites), the signification of to create. The examination of this point would lead us, however, too far. In a great number of copies I have read Praise be unto God who hath sent down (anzala) the Qur'ān, but this is a correction made by other persons, not by the author. The hāfiẓ Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad al-Silafī (No. 43) addressed a letter from Alexandria to al-Zamakhsharī, who was then making a devotional residence at Makkah, requesting from him a licence to teach his works and that information which he had gathered from al-Zamakhsharī's own lips. The latter returned an unsatisfactory reply, and, the following year, al-Silafī wrote to him by a pilgrim, renewing his application, and requesting a licence in the most pressing manner. Towards the conclusion of his letter, he said : "Let not (your reverence), and may God continue to favour you, place me under the necessity of renewing my application ; for the distance is great, and already, last year, you answered in a manner which did not satisfy my wishes. In acceding to my request, you will lay me under deep obligation."<sup>2</sup> I shall here give a part of al-Zamakhsharī's reply, and were I not unwilling to lengthen this article, I would give both the request and the answer : "I, amongst the illustrious learned, am like a dim star amongst the luminaries of the heavens ; like a cloud devoid of water compared with the clouds of morning which cover the plains and the hills with their fertilizing showers ; like the race-horse distanced by his competitors ; like the kite among the nobler birds. To entitle a man the very learned ('allāmah) is like placing the points on the 'alāmah'<sup>3</sup>. Learning is a city which none can 1 According to the orthodox Muslim doctrine, the Qur'ān is the created or eternal word of God. The Mu'tazilites taught the contrary.

2 Literally : and to him (to you) in return for that (may there be) an ample recompense.

3 To understand this, it must be recollected that certain official papers must receive the sultān's 'alāmah' before they can be considered as valid. The enter but by knowledge acquired from books or oral transmission : these are its two gates, and at either I should appear with a very slight stock of acquirements, and (in that place) my shadow (appearance) would be even less than that of a pebble (in the plain). As for the knowledge I have acquired from oral transmission, I derive it from a low and shallow source<sup>1</sup>, and it is unsupported by the authority of men versed in erudition or illustrious for talent : as for the knowledge I have acquired from books, it is a mere pool, not deep enough to reach the mouth ; a slight drop, insufficient to wet the lips." Further on he says, mentioning at the same time the pieces of poetry composed in his praise by poets and men of talent ; pieces which it is unnecessary to reproduce : "Let not the words of such a one or of such a one respecting me lead thee into delusion, for that proceeded from their being deceived by the varnished exterior (of my reputation) and from their ignorance of my foul interior ; and perhaps they might have been led into error by the good services which they saw me render to the true believers, by my extreme condescension for those who sought instruction, by my disinterested conduct towards them, by the kindness and the favours which I bestowed upon them, by my independent spirit which scorned worldly cares, by my attending to my own concerns and avoiding to meddle in those of others. I may have thus appeared a great man in their eyes, and they, being mistaken as to my real worth, attributed to me (virtues) which I had not the slightest right to claim. In saying this, I do not mean to depreciate my real merit and act according to the saying of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (No. 148) who observed, in allusion to Abū Bakr's addressing (the Muslims) in these words : I have become

(Continued from page 217)

'alāmah consists in a short phrase or motto written in large characters on the document. As each prince has a particular 'alāmah which he never changes, every person knows it familiarly and can read it at first sight, even though the diacritical points, so essential in Arabic writing, be omitted, as is usually the case. Al-Zamakḥsharī here means to say that 'alāmah (the very learned) is as vain an addition to a man's name as the points are to an 'alāmah ; if the man be really learned, every one knows it, and the title is needless. Al-Silafī had evidently styled him the very learned in the address of the letter ; and this title al-Zamakḥsharī, with affected modesty, disclaims.

<sup>1</sup> Literally : it is recent in origin and inferior in authority.

your chief, but I am not the best of you<sup>1</sup>, that it was the duty of the true believer to depreciate his own merits. (This is by no means my case); I only tell the truth to one who inquires into my character and my acquirements in oral and written learning, who desires to know the masters whom I met and under whom I studied, and to appreciate the extent of my learning and the limits of my talent. I have therefore acquainted him with my real character, communicated to him the secret which I kept concealed, displayed to him all my hidden defects, and told him of my origin and rise<sup>2</sup>. The place of my birth is an obscure village in Khuwārizm, called Zamakhshar; and I heard my father, to whom God be merciful! say: 'An Arab of the desert who happened to pass by, asked the name of this place and of its chief man; having received for answer, Zamakhshar and al-Ridād, he observed that there was no good either in sharr (evil) or radd (repulse) and would not go near it. I was born in the month of Rajab, 467. To God all praise is due; may the divine blessing be on Muḥammad, his family, and his Companions<sup>3</sup>!' Such was the termination of this certificate in which al-Zamakhshari expatiated widely without returning a positive answer to al-Silafi's request<sup>4</sup>. I do not know if he gave him a licence at a later period. In traditional information, one person only intervened between me and al-Zamakhshari: he had given a licence to Zaynab, the daughter of al-Sha'ri, and I received one from her, as I have already mentioned (No. 235). Amongst the verses of al-Zamakhshari which are in general circulation, we may notice the following:

1 Abū Bakr's address to the Muslims in Kosegarten's Ṭaharī, part I, p. 21.

2 Literally: of my seed and of my tree.

3 M. Hamaker has given the text of Ibn Khallikān's notice on al-Zamakhshari, with a Latin translation and learned notes, in his Specimen Catalogi MSS., Luyd. Bat. In some cases he appears to me to have adopted false readings and the manner in which he has rendered this letter is by no means satisfactory.

4 Ibn Khallikān should have informed us what impression this singular letter left on al-Silafi's mind. Al-Zamakhshari, in a tone of the deepest modesty, affects to disclaim every title to learning and renown, whilst he very adroitly enumerates his own good qualities and cites all the poems composed in his honour. I suspect that this ironical production imposed equally upon the simplicity of al-Silafi and of our author.

speaking of them, al-Sam'ānī (No. 370), who mentions the author in his Supplement, says: "The following lines were dictated to me from memory, at Samarkand, by Aḥmad Ibn Maḥmūd al-Khūwārizmī who stated that they had been recited to him at Khūwārizm by al-Zamakḥsharī as his own":

"Tell Su'dā that we want her not; and that she need not borrow the large eyes of the gazelles (to tempt us still). For we now bound our desires to one whose eyes are narrow<sup>1</sup>, and God will reward those who bound their desires. She (whom I love) is fair<sup>2</sup> and scornful; but I have never yet found, in this world, pure enjoyment, unmixed with pain. Never shall I forget the time when I courted her near the meadow, on the bank of the lake which received the waterfall: 'Bring me a rose.' Said I meaning the rose of her cheeks; but she understood me not and answered: 'Wait for me; in the twinkling of an eye I will bring it.' 'Nay,' I replied, 'I cannot wait.' 'There is no rose here,' said she, 'except these cheeks,' ' 'Tis well,' said I, 'what you have there will do.' "

In an elegy on the death of Abū Muḍar Maṣṣūr, the (grammarian) above-mentioned, he said:

"She said: 'What pearls (tears) are those which fall in two lines from your eyes?' I replied: 'These are the pearls (maxims) with which Abū Muḍar filled my ears and which now fall from my eyes.' "

This is similar to the following, by the qāḍī Abū Bakr al-Aṭṭāṣī (No. 62): as they were contemporaries, I am unable to say which of them borrowed the thought from the other:

"I wept merely on hearing the news of their departure whispered to me by one who bade me adieu. Those (tears) are the pearls which they deposited in my ears, and which I now pour forth from my eyes."

1 This perhaps means: one who closes her eyes as if to sleep.

2 Here all the pronouns and adjectives which refer to the beloved are in the masculine gender. Throughout Islāmism, from India to Spain, an extreme corruption of morals prevailed among the higher classes, the doctors of the law and the poets. Al-Zamakḥsharī himself appears to have followed the current.*

* This baseless accusation indicates the prejudice of the translator.—Ed.

These verses are taken from a long and brilliant qaṣīdah. The following piece, attributed to al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil (No. 349), contains a similar idea :

"Bestow not on me a second glance ; the first sufficed to repay my love. I have words of yours treasured in my heart ; never shall I deny the treasure which love confided to my care. Receive now in drops from my eyes those treasures which you deposited in my ears."

Amongst the passages by other poets which he cited in the Kashshāf, he introduces the following, in his commentary on these words of the sūrah of the Cow : God is not ashamed to propose any parable whatsoever ; a gnat, or an object surpassing it (littleness) ; (Qur'ān, Surah 2, verse 24).

"O thou who seest the gnat spread its wings in the darkness of the gloomy night, who observest the veins in its neck and the marrow in those slender bones,—pardon a servant who hath repented of the faults committed in his youth."

A man of talent who recited these lines to me in Aleppo, told me that al-Zamkhasharī had given directions that they should be inscribed on his own tomb. The same person then recited to me the verses which follow, and informed me that the author designed them for his own epitaph :

"Almighty God ! here in the bosom of the earth, I have become Thy guest ; and the rights of the guest are acknowledged by every generous host. As a gift of hospitality bestow on me the pardon of my sins ; the gift is great, but great is Thy hospitality."

A friend of mine mentioned to me that he found the following lines inscribed, at Sawākin, on the tomb of 'Aziz al-Dawlah Rihān, the prince of that island :

"Know, O men ! that death hindered me from obtaining the object of my hopes. Let that man who hath the power of acting before the arrival of death, fear the Lord. I am not the only person brought to this state ; all shall be brought to the same state as mine."

Al-Zamak<sup>h</sup>sharī was born on Wednesday, the 27th of Rajab, A.H. 467 (18th March, A.C. 1075), at Zamak<sup>h</sup>shar, and he died on the 9th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 538 (13th June, A.C. 1144), at Jurjāniyah, in Khuwārizm, subsequently to his return from Makkah. An elegy composed on his death contained the following line :

"The land of Makkah drops tears from its eyes through grief for the departure of Jār Allāh Maḥmūd."

Zamak<sup>h</sup>shar is a large village in Khuwārizm. Jurjāniyah is the capital of Khuwārizm; Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī says, in his Kitāb al-Buldān : "This city is called Kurkānj in the language of the inhabitants, but this name has been arabicized into Jurjāniyah. It is situated on the bank of the Jayḥūn (Oxus).<sup>1</sup> "

685 ABŪ ṬĀLIB AL-QĀDĪ AL-IṢBAHĀNĪ

Abū Ṭālib Maḥmūd Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi 'l-Rajā al-Tamīmī al-Iṣbahānī (a member of the tribe of Tamīm and a native of Iṣbahān), generally known by the appellation of al-Qāḍī and the author of a Ṭariqah, or system of controversy, studied jurisprudence under Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā the martyr (No. 565). He excelled in controversy and composed on that art a ta'liqah (No. 311) which attested his eminent talent, his skill in the investigation of truth, and his superiority over nearly all his rivals. This work, in which he combined (the principles of) jurisprudence with (their) demonstration, became the text book of professors in their lessons on controversy and those who did not refer to it were only prevented from doing so by the inability of their mind to seize on its subtle reasonings. Great numbers studied with profit under his tuition, and he obtained the reputation of being a most able doctor. He possessed the highest abilities as a preacher and was versed in many sciences. He taught for some time at Iṣbahān, and died in the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 585 (Nov.-Dec., A. C. 1189).

1 A complete and elegant edition of al-Zamak<sup>h</sup>sharī's Kashshāf, accompanied with the Qur'ānic text, has been printed at Calcutta, in 1856, by Mr. Nassau Lees. It forms two large volumes in quarto.

686 MAḤMŪD IBN SUBUKTIKĪN

Abu 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd, the son of Nāṣir al-Dawlah Abū Maṣṣūr Subuktikīn, bore, at first, the surname of Sayf al-Dawlah (sword of the empire), but, on being nominated to the sulṭānate, after the death of his father, by the imām (khalif) al-Qādir bi-Allāh, he received from him the titles of Yamīn al-Dawlah (right hand of the empire) and Amīn al-Millāh (the trusty friend of the faith). It was by these appellations that he continued to be known. His father Subuktikīn arrived at Bukhārā in the reign of Nūḥ Ibn Maṣṣūr, one of those Sāmānid kings of whom we have spoken in the life of Abū Bakr Muḥammad al-Rāzī the physician (No. 680), to which city he had accompanied Abū Ishāq Albtikīn<sup>1</sup>, in the quality of grand chamberlain. As he was the main director of all Albtikīn's affairs, his intelligence and decision of character led the great officers of the empire to prognosticate his future elevation. When Abū Ishāq went to replace his father as governor of Ghaznah, the amīr Subuktikīn accompanied him as commander of his troops and grand chamberlain. Abū Ishāq died soon after his arrival, and as none of his relations were capable of replacing him, the people felt the necessity of choosing a ruler. After some debates, they agreed to confer the command on Subuktikīn, and, having engaged their fealty towards him they acknowledged his authority. When his power was solidly established, he began to make hostile inroads on the frontiers of India, and he took a great number of fortresses in that country. Numerous combats, too long to relate, were fought between him and the Hindūs, and a short period sufficed to increase the extent of his empire, form a mighty army, replenish his coffers, and fill every soul with the terror of his name. One of his conquests was the territory of Bust, and amongst the prisoners who then fell into his power was Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Bustī, the poet of whom we have already spoken (No. 445), and who was then secretary to Bāi Tūz*<sup>2</sup>, the king of that country.

1 Who was general of the armies of Khurāsān, according to the historian al-'Utbi, in his Yamīn.

2 Or Pa'i Tūz according the MS. of al-'Utbi.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives Abū Nūr.—Ed.

Al-Bustī entered into the service of Subuktikīn and became his prime minister and confident; but the history of these events would lead us too far. The amīr Subuktikīn at length fell sick at Balkh, to which city he had proceeded from Tūs, and, feeling a longing desire of again seeing Ghāznah, he set out for that place, ill as he was, and died on the way, in the month of Sha'bān, A. H. 387 (Augu.-Sept., A. C. 997). His body was placed in a coffin and carried to Ghāznah. A number of contemporary poets composed elegies on his death, and the following lines were pronounced on the same subject by his kātib Abu 'l-Faṭḥ al-Bustī:

"On the death of Nāṣir al-Dīn wa 'l-Dawlah (the champion of religion and of the state), I said: 'May the Lord receive him with honour! The empire which he founded threatens ruin; it is thus, that the day of judgement will arrive (unforeseen)!'"

Some time after his death, a man of talent passed by the palace, and perceiving it much dilapidated, pronounced these lines:

"On thee, solitary dwelling! may God bestow his benediction! thou hast unconsciously awakened in my bosom feelings of love long dormant. A month ago, I saw thee quite new; alas! I did not think that the vicissitudes of time could ruin these abodes within a month!"

The amīr Subuktikīn nominated for successor his son Ismā'īl and recommended to his protection his other sons and the rest of his family. The grand chamberlains and the principal generals of the army having embraced the cause of the new monarch and acknowledged his authority, he took his seat on the throne of the sultānate, issued his mandates and examined the state of the public treasury. Whilst Ismā'īl was thus exercising his power at Ghāznah, his brother, the sultān Maḥmūd, wrote to him from Balkh in Khurāsān, on receiving intelligence of his father's death. In this document, which was drawn up in a very conciliatory style, he said: "My father appointed you his successor and preferred you to myself, because I did not happen to be near him when he died; had I been there, he would not have done so. It is therefore our interest to share in his wealth between as an inheritance and that you remain at Ghaznah, where you are, whilst I govern Khurāsān. In this agreement we shall find our mutual advantage and frustrate the hopes of our enemies. On the contrary, if the public discover that dissensions have arisen between us, their respect for us will be diminished." Ismā'il refused acceding to this proposal, and, being of a weak and easy temper, he yielded to the turbulence of the soldiery and emptied his treasuries to satisfy their exorbitant demands. Maḥmūd then set out for Hirāt and wrote again to his brother, but his efforts only served to augment Ismā'il's false security. Having succeeded in obtaining the support of his uncle Dighrājuq and of his brother Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Naṣr Ibn Subuktikīn, who was then governing the province of Bust and who hastened to obey his orders and follow him, he felt that with these allies he could boldly undertake to attack his brother Ismā'il in Ghaznah. Having laid siege to the city at the head of an immense army, he carried it after a severe conflict. Ismā'il, being forced to take refuge in the citadel, appealed to the clemency of his brother Maḥmūd, and, having obtained his pardon, he surrendered to the conqueror and delivered up the keys of his treasures. The sultān Maḥmūd then proceeded to Balkh after leaving some experienced officers as his lieutenants at Ghaznah. Subsequently to this conquest, he had a friendly interview with his brother Ismā'il, and said to him : "What would you have done to me, had I fallen into your power ?" The captive prince being then excited by wine, replied with his usual sincerity : "I should have sent you to a castle and provided you abundantly with whatever you required ; with a dwelling, pages, female slaves, and sufficient means for your support." Maḥmūd immediately resolved on treating him in the same manner; and, having sent him off to a fortress, he ordered the governor to furnish the prisoner with whatever he desired. When the sultān Maḥmūd had fully established his authority, he encountered in battle and defeated some of the lieutenants whom the Sāmānid sultān of Transoxiana had established in different parts of Khurāsān. The province of Khuwārizm was thus detached from the Sāmānid empire in the year 389 (A. C. 999), and passed under the domination of Maḥmūd. His power being now consolidated, the imām (Khalif) al-Qādir bi-Allāh sent him the imperial robe and conferred on him the titles mentioned in the commencement of this article. Seated on the throne of the empire with the amirs of Khurāsān drawn up in a double line before him to pay him homage and testify their respect, Maḥmūd authorised them to sit down after having given public audience. He then engaged with them in friendly conversation and bestowed on each of them and on his pages, the officers of his court, his favourites and his servants, an incredible quantity of pelisses and valuable presents. The whole authority being now in his hands, and the provinces of the empire being completely united under his sway, he imposed on himself the duty of making every year an expedition into India. In the year 393 (A. C. 1002-3), he obtained possession of Sijistān, without striking a blow; the generals and governors who commanded there having consented to acknowledge his authority. He still continued to pursue his conquests in India, and he carried his arms into regions which the banner of Islāmism had never yet reached, and where no sūrah nor verse of the Qur'ān had ever been chanted before. Having purified that country from the filth of polytheism, he built in it numerous mosques and places of prayer; but the history of these proceedings would lead us too far. On achieving the conquest of India, he wrote to the court (al-Dīwān al-'Aẓīz) of Baghdād a letter in which he enumerated the cities of that country which God had subdued by means of his arms, and mentioned that he had broken the idol called Sūmnāt* : "According to the Hindūs," said he, "this idol giveth life, inflicteth death, worketh what it willeth, and decideth what it pleaseth : if it fell inclined, it cureth every malady, and it sometimes happens, to their eternal misery, that sick pilgrims on visiting it are cured by the goodness of the air and by exercise; this increaseth their delusion, and crowds come to it on foot and on horse back from distant countries; if they obtain not the healing of their maladies, they attribute it to their sins, and say; 'He that does not serve him faithfully, meriteth not from him an answer.' They believe in transmigration, and pretend that the souls, on quitting the bodies, assemble near this idol, and are born again in whatever bodiest it pleaseth. They believe also that the ebb and flow of the sea are the signs by which that element adores it. In consequence of these opinions, they go in pilgrimage to it from distant countries and from every deep valley<sup>1</sup>: they offer it presents of the highest value, and there is not in the countries of India and Sind, even in the farthest borders and in those regions where a different religion is professed, a king or a subject who hath not offered to this idol the most precious portion of his wealth, hence, the wagfs<sup>2</sup> settled on it consist of ten thousand well-known villages of those countries, and its treasury is filled with all kinds of riches. It was served by one thousand Brahmins; three hundred barbers were there to shave the heads and beards of the pilgrims on their arrival; three hundred youths and five hundred females sang and danced at its gate, and each individual of these classes received a fixed sum out of the wagfs settled on the idol." The Muslim army was separated from the fortress containing this false divinity by a desert of thirty days' journey, notorious for want of water and the difficulty of its roads, which are always covered by the sands. The sulṭān Maḥmūd having selected thirty thousand horsemen out of his numerous army and spent immense sums on their equipment, marched with them against the fortress, which they found to be strongly fortified. After a siege of three days, they carried it and entered into the house of the idol. Around its throne, they remarked a great number of other idols, some of them in gold and others ornamented with every variety of precious stones. According to the Hindus these were angels. The Muslims burned the idol, and found in its ears upwards of thirty rings. Maḥmūd asked the people the meaning of those rings, and was informed that each of them represented one thousand years of adoration; believing, as they did, in the eternity of the world, they pretended that their idol had been worshipped during more than thirty thousand years, and that a ring was placed in its ear at the expiration of each thousand years' worship. The details on this subject would lead us however too far. Our shaykh Ibn al-Aṭṭār (No. 435) states in his History, under the year 414. that a king of one of the fortresses in India

* The Egyptian edition gives : Sūsnān : which is a mistake.—Ed.

---

1 Qur'ān, sūrah 23, verse 28.

2 See No. 21, note.

made him (Maḥmūd) a great number of presents, one of which was a bird in the form of a dove, the eyes of which watered when poisoned food was served at table. This water, on flowing out, changed into stone, which, when rubbed and applied to the widest wounds, healed them up. The learned Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār al-'Utḡī composed on the life of Maḥmūd a celebrated work, called al-Yamīnī<sup>1</sup>. Towards the commencement of this history he says "He reigned over the East and its two extremities ; over the bosom of the universe and its two arms, and that, for the purpose of ranging the fourth climate, with the contiguous portions of the third and the fifth, under the rule of his empire ; of getting its ample kingdoms, and extended states into the grasp of his possession ; of reducing its amīrs and grandees with royal titles under his sway as tributaries ; of making them take refuge from the strokes of fortune under the shade of his empire and his government ; of humbling the monarchs of the earth before his might ; of filling them with the dread of his majesty ; of making them apprehend the suddenness of his attacks, though distant their abodes, and despite the intervention of mountains and valleys ; of forcing the Hindūs to hide in the bosom of the earth at the mention of his name, and of making them shudder before the blasts coming from his country ; for, from the time of his quitting the cradle and leaving the breast, from the moment that speech undid the knot of his tongue and that he could express his thoughts without the aid of signs, he had occupied his tongue with prayer and with the Qur'ān, enflamed his soul with the love of the sword and the spear, extended his ambition towards the highest aims, and fixed his wishes on the governing of the universe. With his companions, his sports were serious, his toils incessant : grieving over that of which he had no knowledge till he knew it well, sad before difficulties till he smoothed them by main force." <sup>2</sup>

---

1 See No. 670, note on Yamīnī, where in some copies, the title of al-'Utḡī's work is incorrectly transcribed al-Yamanī. The Bibliothèque impériale possesses two ancient and excellent MSS. of the Yamīnī. It is with shreds and scraps of this work that Ibn Khallikān has composed the greater part of the present article.

2 This is not an unfair specimen of al-'Utḡī's inflated style. The whole book is written in the same strain.

The Imām al-Ḥaramayn (No. 353) mentions, in his work entitled Mughīth al-Khalq fī Ikhtiyār il-Aḥaqq (assister of Gods creatures in the selection of what is fittest), that the sultān Maḥmūd followed the rite of the Imām Abū Ḥanīfah, and being zealously devoted to the science of the Traditions, the shaykhs used to teach them in his presence and explain to him their meaning when required. Perceiving that the greater part of those sayings agreed (in their prescriptions) with the doctrines of the imām al-Shāfi'i (No. 532), he conceived doubts (respecting the excellence of the rite which he professed and convoked in Marw a meeting of Shāfi'ite and Ḥanafite jurisconsults for the purpose of obtaining their opinion on the relative superiority of these two systems. The jurisconsults agreed that a prayer of two rak'ahs should be said in the presence of the sultān, first according to the rite of al-Shāfi'i and then according to the rite of Abū Ḥanīfah, so that he might examine and reflect, and choose that which was the better. These prayers were said by al-qaffāl al-Marwazī (No. 309), who commenced by a complete purification and the fulfilment of all the conditions requisite (for the validity of the prayer), such as the purification, the sutrah<sup>1</sup>, and the turning towards the qiblah; he then proceeded with the main points (arkān), the postures (hiyat), the consecrated usages (sunan) the acts prescribed by decorum (ādāb), and those imposed as obligations farā'id accomplishing them all fully and perfectly; this being the only manner of prayer authorised by al-Shāfi'i. He then commenced a prayer of two rak'ahs such as was allowed by Abū Ḥanīfah, and, having clothed himself in the curried skin of a dog<sup>2</sup>, and daubed one fourth of his body with an impure matter<sup>3</sup>, he made an ablution with date wine<sup>4</sup>, (being in the

1 The sutrah means any thing put up before one engaged in prayer to prevent others from intruding on his devotion: it may be a stone, a pillow, a spear, a sabre, a lamp, etc.

2 According to the Ḥanafite doctrine, the tanned skin of every animal, except the hog, is pure. See d'Ohsson's. tome. II, p. 32).

3 The excrements of every animal not fit for food invalidate the prayer, if they cover more than one fourth of the body, or of the dress, or of the oratory. (Ḥanafite doctrine, in d'Ohsson, t. II, p. 9).

4 The expressed juice of every plant and fruit is impure, except the juice of the date (nabīdh), says Abū Ḥanīfah. A tradition on this matter is set forth in the Mishkāṭ al-Maṣābiḥ, translation of Matthews, vol. 1, page 108.

heart of summer and in the desert, he was soon surrounded by flies and gnats); this ablution being performed in the contrary way<sup>1</sup>, he turned towards the qiblah and began the prayer without having manifested the intention of doing so whilst making the purification<sup>2</sup>, he then pronounced the takbir in Persian, after which he read this verse of the Qur'ān in Persian; du bargak sabz<sup>3</sup>, and stooped his head to the ground twice, like a cock picking up corn<sup>4</sup>, without leaving any interval between these motions and without making the prostration; he next pronounced the profession of faith (tashahhud) and finished by breaking wind backwards<sup>5</sup>, without even marking the intention of pronouncing the salutation. "Such," said he, "O sultān! is Abū Ḥanīfah's mode of prayer". The prince replied: "If it be not so, I shall put you to death, for no religious man would authorise such a prayer." The Ḥanafite doctors denied it to be their master's, on which al-Qaffāl ordered Abū Ḥanīfah's books to be brought in,

---

1 The regular mode of making the ablution will be found in d'Ohsson, tome. II, p. 14.

2 See on the niyah or intention what d'Ohsson says in his Tub. gen. t. II, p. 75.

3 These words mean two green leaves. They are a very inadequate translation of the word ملءا متان which alone forms the 64th verse of the 55th sūrah of the Qur'ān. The final k of bargak I suppose to be the sign of the diminutive. In the Ḥanafite law-books, it is laid down that at least three verses of the Qur'ān should be recited during the prayer. Perhaps Abū Ḥanīfah may have said that three words of it sufficed. The Shāfi'ites do not admit the validity of the prayer in which the passages of the Qur'ān are pronounced in any other language than Arabic.

4 This is however condemned by Muḥammad (see Matthews' Mishkāṭ, vol. I, p. 186) and by the Ḥanafites themselves (see d' Ohsson, tome. II, p. 89).

5 Had the prayer not been already finished, this alone would have rendered it invalid. In the Naẓm al-Jumʿān, a treatise on the Ḥanafite sect by Ibn Duqmāq, MS. of the Bibliothèque impériale No. 741, fol. 136, will be found a refutation of this anecdote. The author attributes to the Shāfi'ites the ridiculous form of prayer which gave such scandal to the sultān, who, says he, was induced by their unfair conduct to become a Ḥanafite. He mentions there that Yamin al-Dawlah composed a treatise on Ḥanafite jurisprudence, entitled Kitāb al-Tarīd, a work which bear a high reputation in Ghaznah, India, and Sind. Ibn Duqmāq's refutation does not appear to me conclusive. The MS. in question is written in the hand writing of the author.

and the sultān directed a Christian scribe to read aloud the system of each imām. It was then found that the mode of prayer as represented by al-Qaffāl was really authorised by Abū Ḥanīfah; and the sultān abandoned the Ḥanafite rite for that of al-Shāfi'i. So far the Imām al-Ḥaramayn. The sultān Maḥmūd was distinguished for his meritorious acts and the virtue of his conduct. His birth took place on the 9th of Muḥarram, A. H. 361 (November, A. C. 971)*, and he died in the month of the second Rabi' or on the 11th of Ṣafar†, A. H. 421 (April, A. C. 1030), at Ghaznah. Some place his death in the year 422. His son Muḥammad, whom he had designated for successor, then mounted the throne, and united in his favour the vows of all classes by a prodigal distribution of donations. When he had established his power, he received a letter from his brother Abū Sa'id Mas'ūd, who happened to be absent when their father died and had then set out from Naysābūr. The courage of Mas'ūd and his highly dignified bearing gained him the hearts of the people and, as he pretended that the imām al-Qādir bi-Allāh had invested him with the government of Khurāsān and conferred on him the title of al-Nāsir li-Dīn Allāh (the champion of God's religion) with the pelisse, the collar, and the bracelets, he succeeded in forming a strong party, whilst his brother neglected the administration of the state and plunged into a life of pleasure. The troops having at length resolved on dethroning him and transferring the supreme authority to Mas'ūd, they arrested Muḥammad and imprisoned him in a fortress. The amīr Mas'ūd, having thus obtained possession of the kingdom, had numerous encounters, too long to relate, with the Saljūqids. In the life of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād we have related the dream concerning Mas'ūd<sup>1</sup>, and to that article we refer the reader. He was slain in the year 430 (A. C. 1038-9)<sup>2</sup>, and his empire fell into the possession of the Saljūqids. Of these events we have already given a sketch in the life of Tughrul Bek, the Saljūqid (No. 664). and related Mas'ūd's conduct

1 This anecdote is not to be found in any of our MSS.

2 In 432, according to Abu 'l-Feda and Ibn al-Athīr.

* 1 November.—Ed.

† 18 February.—Ed.

towards them, with the manner in which they conquered the empire. Pronounce Subuktikīn. The words du bargak sabz signify two (small) green leaves, and this is the meaning of the word mudhāmmatāni which occurs in the Qur'ān<sup>1</sup>.

687 MAḤMŪD THE SALJŪQID

Abu 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Malik Shāh Ibn Alp Arslān al-Saljūqī, surnamed Mughith al-Dīn (assister of religion), was one of the most illustrious monarchs of the Saljūq dynasty. We have already spoken of his father (No. 666) and some of his relatives, and, in the sequel, we shall notice his grandfather and other members of the same family. In the life of al-'Azīz ('Azīz al-Dīn) Abū Naṣr Aḥmad Ibn Ḥāmid al-Iṣbahānī (No. 76), the uncle of the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 678), we have indicated some facts concerning him. Abu 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd obtained the sultānate on the death of his father, and, on Friday, the 23rd of Muḥarram, A.H. 512 (May, A.C. 1118)*, in the khalīfate of al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh, prayers were offered up for him in the city of Baghdād, according to the custom of that court in its proceedings with the Saljūq monarchs. He was then at the age of puberty, full of liveliness and intelligence, and well versed in Arabic; he knew by heart a great quantity of poetry and proverbs; in history and biography he displayed considerable acquirements and he manifested a strong predilection for men of learning and virtue. The poet Ḥayṣ-Bayṣ (No. 241) went from 'Irāq for the purpose of seeing him, and celebrated his praises in the well-known qaṣīdah rhyming in d, which begins thus:

“Unsaddle the camels, now emaciated and submissive to the rein, and let them feed; long has been thy nocturnal march, and the deserts complain under the heavy tread of thy caravan. O you who travel by night ! fear no longer sterility or danger ; (here) the shrubs are tender and the sultān is Maḥmūd. By the awe which he inspires, extremes, as I told, are united ; and, in the narrow path leading to the fountain, the sheep and the wolf walk together."

---

<sup>1</sup> Mudhāmmatāni signifies two gardens of a dark green colour.

* 17 May.—Ed.

For this long and brilliant poem he received from the sultān an ample recompense. Maḥmūd married successively the two daughters of his uncle, the sultān Sinjar (No. 260), as we have already mentioned in the life of al-'Aziz al-Iṣbahānī. Towards the end of his reign the empire was much enfeebled and its revenues were so greatly reduced that, one day, being unable to furnish the necessary funds to the brewer, he ordered some of the (empty) treasure-chests to be given him, that he might sell them and purchase what he required. A short time before his death, Maḥmūd went to Baghdād, and on his return, he fell sick on the way. His malady having increased in violence, he died on Thursday, the 15th of Shawwāl, A.H. 525 (10th September, A.C. 1131). Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqī<sup>1</sup> states, in his History, that he died on the 15th of Shawwāl, A.H. 524*, at the gate of Iṣbahān. He was buried in that city and had for successor his brother Tuḡhrul Bek. This prince died A.H. 527, and his brother Mas'ūd succeeded to the throne. We shall give his life. Muḥammad Shāh, the son of Maḥmūd Ibn Muḥammad, was the same who besieged Baghdād with Zayn al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Baktīn, the prince of Arbela, in the year 552 (A.C. 1157), or 553, according to the statement made by our shaykh Ibn al-Athīr (No. 435), in his lesser historical work, entitled (al-Atābiki)<sup>2</sup>. Muḥammad Shāh died in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A.H. 554 (Dec.-Jan., A.C. 1159-60). We have marked the date of Zayn al-Dīn's death in our article on his son Muẓaffar al-Dīn, prince of Arbela (No. 522). Muḥammad Shāh died outside the walls of Hamadān : he was born in the month of the latter Rabi' A.H. 522 (April, A.C. 1128).

1 See farther on in the life of Mas'ūd al-Saljūqī.

2 This is a history of the Atābeks of Moḥul.

* 21 September, A.C. 1130. —Ed.

688 AL-MALIK AL-'ĀDIL NŪR AL-DĪN

Abu 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd, surnamed al-Malik al-'Ādil (the just prince) Nūr al-Dīn (light of religion), was the son of 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī (No. 229), the son of Āq-Sunqur (No. 99). On the death of his father at the siege of Qala't Ja'bar, he was serving under his orders, and Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Ayyūb al-Yaghīsānī* having then passed into his service, he marched with the Syrian army to Aleppo and occupied that city the same year, while his brother Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī (No. 495) took possession of the city and province of Moṣul. On the third of Ṣafar. A.H. 549 (April, A.C. 1154)†, Nūr al-Dīn laid seige to Damascus, which was then under the rule of Mujīr al-Dīn Abū Sa'īd Aybik‡, the son of Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad, the son of Tāj al-Mulūk Būrī, the son of Ṣahīr al-Dīn Ṭuḡtikīn, the atābek of the prince Duqāq¹, the son of Tutuṣh, and, on Sunday, the 9th of the same month§, he occupied the city and gave Emessa to Mujīr al-Dīn Aybik in exchange. He subsequently deprived Aybik of Emessa and bestowed on him the town of Bālis.|| Aybik removed thither, and after residing there for some time, he proceeded to Baghdād, in the reign of the imām al-Muqtafī (li-Amr Allāh), and obtained from that khalīf a pension for his support. The atābek Mu'īn al-Dīn (Aner) Ibn 'Abd Allāh was an enfranchised slave of Ṭuḡtikīn, Aybik's great-grandfather. Nūr al-Dīn then subdued the other cities of Syria, such as Ḥamāt and Ba'lbek, of which he re-edified the walls, and he occupied the places intervening between those two capitals and Manbij of which he also obtained possession. He took besides a number of fortresses on the frontiers of Asia Minor, such as Mar'ash and Bahasrā, the former in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah A. H. 568 (June-July, A.C. 1173), and the latter in Dhu 'l-Hijjah of the same year (July-Aug.) Towards the end of the month of Ramaḍān, A.H. 559 (August, A.C. 1164), he had reduced

1 Such is the correct pronunciation of this name, which has been incorrectly transcribed Daqāq in the life of Tutuṣh. (See No. 119.)

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : Yaḥsānī.—Ed.

† 19 April.—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : Urtuq.—Ed.

§ 25 April.—Ed.

|| Nābulis, according to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

Hārim, in the country (under the domination) of the Franks and taken besides upwards of fifty fortresses, amongst which were 'Azāz and Bāniyās. He then sent Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh (No. 272) three times into Egypt, and in the third, the sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn was established as lieutenant in that country, and had Nūr al-Dīn's name struck on the coinage and pronounced in the public prayer (khuṭbah). Of this event we need not enter into further particulars, as we give a fuller account of it in our notice on the sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn. Nūr al-Dīn was a just monarch, pious and devout, a strict observer of the law, partial to virtuous men, a firm champion in the cause of God, and indefatigable in works of charity. He built colleges in all the great cities of Syria, such as Damascus, Aleppo, Ḥamāt, Emessa, Ba'lbek, Manbij, and al-Raḥabah, as we have already stated in the life of Shāraf al-Dīn Ibn Abī 'Uṣrūn (No. 313): in Moṣul he erected the mosque (called after him) al-Jāmi' al-Nūri; in Ḥamāt, another, the same which stands on the bank of the Orontes; in Edessa, another; in Manbij, another; and in Damascus, an hospital and a Tradition school (dār al-Ḥadīth). His merits, monuments, and glorious deeds surpass description. On account of the proximity of their respective states, a number of letters and conferences passed between him and Abu 'l-Ḥasan Sinān Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed Rāshid al-Dīn, lord of the Ismā'īlian fortresses, chief of the Bāṭīnites of Syria, and the person from whom the Sinānian sect took its name. At one time, Nūr al-Dīn was under the necessity of writing him a threatening letter, to which he received the following answer, in verse and prose:

"O you who threaten us with the stroke of the sword! may my power never rise again if once overthrown by you! A pigeon dares to threaten the hawk! the hyenas of the desert are roused against the lions! You stop the mouth of the serpent with your finger; let the pain which has befallen your finger suffice you.

We have examined your letter in sum and in detail, and have appreciated in word and in deed the dangers with which it threatens us. Admire the fly buzzing in the ear of the elephant! and the gnat which is counted as an emblem (of littleness)!<sup>1</sup> Already before you, other people have held a similar discourse, but we hurled destruction upon them, and they had none to assist them! Do you mean to oppose the truth and uphold falsehood? They who act perversely shall know the fate which awaits them! As for your words, that you will cut off my head and tear my fortresses from the firm mountains which sustain them, know that these are delusive thoughts, vain imaginations; for the substance is not destroyed by the disparition of its accidents, neither is the soul dissolved by the maladies of the body. How wide the difference between strong and weak, between noble and vile! But, to return to things external and sensible from things internal and intellectual, we shall say that we have an example in the blessed Prophet, by whom were pronounced these words: 'Never was a prophet afflicted as I have been; and you will know what befel his race, his family, and followers. Circumstances have not changed; things are not altered; and praise be unto God in the beginning and the end! in as much as we are the oppressed, not the oppressors; the offended, not the offenders; but, when the truth cometh, falsehood disappears, for falsehood fleeteth away! You well know our external state, the character of our men, the sort of food for which they long, and for which they offer themselves to the abyss of death. Say: wish then for death if you speak true. But they will never wish for it on account of what their hands have already wrought, and God well knoweth the perverse<sup>1</sup>. In a common and current proverb it is said: Is a goose to be threatened with (being cast into) the river? Prepare therefore a tunic against misfortune and cloak against affliction; for evils of your own doing shall prevail against you; you shall feel convinced that they proceeded from yourself, and you were like the animal which scraped with its hoof till it found its death<sup>2</sup>, and like him who cut off his nose with his own hand. To effect this will not be difficult for God." I transcribed this epistle from a copy in 1 Qur'an, sūrah 2, verses 87, 88. The words, five lines higher up, but when truth cometh, etc. are taken from the same book, sūrah 17, verse 83.

<sup>1</sup> Qur'an, sūrah 2, verse 24.

2 An Arab caught a gazelle and sought an instrument to kill it. The animal, in struggling, scraped up the sand with its foot and laid bare a knife; with this the Arab put it to death. See Freytag's Maydānī, tom. II. p. 359.

the handwriting of al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil (No. 349), but, in another copy of the same document, I found the following additional passage: "When you have read our letter, expect to see us and be prepared; read also the commencement of the Bee and the end of Ṣād!" The truth is that this letter was addressed to the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Ayyūb. In other copies, I found the following verse joined to those given above:

"Let men beware of an event dreadful by its terrors, an event which I never heard that any dare await."

Another time, when a coldness arose between them, Sinān. wrote him the following lines:

"By our means you obtained this empire, so that your house was rooted in it, and its columns were exalted; yet you shoot at us an arrow fashioned by ourselves; it grew in our own plantations, and with us it received its point.

Of Nūr al-Dīn's conduct we shall only say, that it was adorned by many meritorious deeds. His birth took place on Sunday, the 17th of Shawwāl, A.H. 511 (11th February, A.C. 1118); at the hour of sunrise, and he died of a quinsy, on Wednesday, the 11th of Shawwāl, A.H. 569 (15th May, A.C. 1174), in the citadel of Damascus. His physicians advised blood-letting, but he refused, and such was the awe which he inspired, that none dared to expostulate with him. He was buried in the apartment of the citadel which served him as a sitting-room and a bed-chamber. His corpse was subsequently removed to the mausoleum erected in the college which he had founded near the entrance of the Sūq al-Khawwāṣīn (the hāzār to the workers in palm-leaves). I heard a number of the Damascus people say that prayers offered up at his tomb received their fulfilment, and having wished to prove the fact, I found it to be true. * [Our shaykh 'Izz al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī

1 The Bee, the 16th sūrah of the Qur'ān, begins thus: "The sentence of God will surely come to be executed" and Ṣād, the 38th sūrah, concludes with these words: "And ye shall surely know what is delivered therein to be true, after a season."

* [ From: "Our shaykh" to "others" is omitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamīd—Ed.

Ibn al-Athīr (No. 435) says, in his great historical work the Kāmil under the year 558, that Nūr al-Dīn having encamped, that year, in al-Buqay'ah (the little plain) at the foot of Ḥiṣn al-Akrād<sup>1</sup>, with the intention of besieging that fortress and then marching against Tripoli, a great number of Franks assembled and attacked him one day, unexpectedly, without giving the Muslims sufficient time to prepare for the encounter. His troops were put to flight, but he succeeded in making his escape. This combat is generally designated as the Combat of al-Buqay'ah. Having halted at the lake of Qadas, near Emessa, at the distance of about four parasangs from the Franks, he sent to Aleppo and other cities for large sums of money, which enabled him to recruit his army. He then returned against the enemy and fully avenged his defeat. One of his companions having, at that time, observed to him that he might advantageously apply to his own use, under the present circumstances, the numerous pensions, alms, and gifts, allowed to the jurisconsults, the ṣūfis and the Qur'ān readers, he flew into a violent passion, and said: "By Allāh! I expect assistance from them and no others! It is through the feeble among you that you receive sustenance and aid."<sup>2</sup> How could I possibly suspend the donations given to people who combat for me with arrows which miss not the mark, even when I am sleeping in my bed? and that for the purpose of bestowing them on persons who combat for me with arrows which sometimes strike and sometimes miss! Those people have a right to a share out of the public treasury; how then could I legally transfer that share to others? ] Nūr al-Dīn was of a tawny complexion, a lofty stature, and a handsome countenance; he had no hair on any part of his face except the chin. He had designated as successor his son al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ 'Imād al-Dīn Ismā'il, a boy eleven years old, who in consequence succeeded to the supreme authority on his death, and removed from Damascus to Aleppo. He entered the citadel of that place on Friday, the first of Muḥarram, A.H. 570 (Aug.,

---

1 Ḥiṣn al-Akrād (the Castle of the Kurds) was situated on a peak of Mount Lebanon, half-way between Tripoli and Emessa.

2 This is one of Muḥammad's sayings. D'Ohrsson has quoted it in his Tab. gen. de l'Emp. Oth., t. II., page 242.

A.C. 1174)*, and the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn then left Egypt and occupied Damascus and the other cities of Syria. Al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ retained Aleppo only, and he continued to reside there till his death. This event took place on Friday, the 25th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 577 (6th October, A.C. 1181)†. It is said that he had not yet attained his twentieth year. His illness‡ commenced on the 9th of Rajab, and, on the first day of the first Jumādā, he was (had been ?) attacked by an inflammation in the bowels. His death created a profound sensation and general regret, on account of his beneficence and his virtues. He was interred in the Station (al-Maqām) within the citadel, but his body was afterwards removed to the ribāṭ (monastery) bearing his name and situated at the foot of the citadel. This ribāṭ bears a high reputation in Aleppo. Mujir al-Dīn Aybik died, A.H. 564 (A.C. 1168-9, in Baghdād, and was interred in his own house; so I found it written among some rough notes in my own handwriting; but God knows if the indication be correct. He was born at Ba'lbek on Friday, the 8th of Sha'bān, A.H. 534 (29th March, A.C. 1140).

689 MARWĀN IBN ABĪ ḤAḤṢAH

Abu 'l-Simṭ, or Abu 'l-Hindām, Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaḥṣah Sulaymān Ibn Yahyā Ibn Abī Ḥaḥṣah Yazid, a celebrated poet, was the grandson of Abū Ḥaḥṣah, a mawla of Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam Ibn Abi 'l-'Āṣi the Umayyad. Abū Ḥaḥṣah's master granted him his freedom on the Day of the House<sup>1</sup> to

---

1 By the Day of the House (Yawm al-Dār) is meant the day in which the khalīf 'Uṭḥmān was murdered. He had shut himself up in his house and sustained a siege of fifty or sixty days, but the insurgents finally broke in and put him to death. Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam, with al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, the sons of 'Alī, assisted by a body of slaves, fought in 'Uṭḥmān's defence, but their efforts were unavailing. The injudicious counsels of Marwān, who had great influence over 'Uṭḥmān, mainly contributed to this revolt.

* 2 August.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives 25 Rajab, 4 December, as the date of his death; this appears to be correct.

‡ قولنج means colic pain.—Ed.

recompense him for the courage which he displayed on that occasion. It is said that Abū Ḥafṣah was a Jewish physician, and that he made his profession of Islāmism to 'Uṭhmān Ibn 'Affān, or, by another account, to Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam. The people of Madīnah say, however, that he was a mawlā to al-Samaw'al Ibn 'Ādiyah, the Jew so famous for his good faith, and whose conduct with respect to Amro 'l-Qays Ibn Iḥujr, the well-known poet, acquired him such celebrity<sup>1</sup>. They state also that Abū Ḥafṣah was made prisoner, when a boy, at the capture of Iṣṭakḥar, and that 'Uṭhmān Ibn 'Affān, who purchased him, gave him as a present to Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam. Marwān Ibn Abi Ḥafṣah, the poet of whom we are about to speak, was a native of al-Yamāmah (in Arabia). Having proceeded to Baghdād, he celebrated the praises of (the khalifs) al-Mahdī and Hārūn al-Rashīd, and conciliated the favour of the latter by satirizing the descendants of 'Alī. He was a good poet, and ranked with the first and the ablest masters in that art. Abu 'l-'Abbās 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz (No. 316) mentions him in the Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā and says: "The best piece uttered by Marwān is his brilliant qaṣīdah, rhyming in / (al-Lāmiyah), composed by him in honour of Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah al-Shaybānī<sup>2</sup>; by this production he surpassed all the poets of his time. It is said that he received from Ma'an, in recompense, an incalculable sum of money and that none of the former poets ever gained so much by their art as he. On one occasion, he was presented, by a certain khalif, with three hundred thousand pieces of silver for a single verse." His qaṣīdah, the Lāmiyah, contains upwards of sixty verses, and, were it not so long, I should insert it here. I cannot, however, omit the following extract from the eulogistic portion of the poem:

"In the day of battle, the sons of Maṣar<sup>3</sup> are like lions (protecting) their whelps in the valley of Khaffān<sup>4</sup>. It is they who defend their clients, and their clients (live as secure from danger) as if

1 See Rasmussen's Addimenta ad Hist. Ar. p. 14 Abu 'l-Feda, Hist. Anteislamica, p. 135, and Freitag's Maidani, t. II, p. 828, and M. Courssin de Perceval's Essai sur l'Histoire des Arabes.

2 His life will be found in his work.

3 Maṣar was one of Ma'an's ancestors.

4 Khaffān, a place near Kūfah, was noted for being infested by lions.

they were lodged among the stars. (Ma'an) avoids pronouncing the word 'no'; when he is asked a favour, 'no' seems to be for him a word forbidden. We confound his conduct in the day of battle with his conduct in the day of beneficence<sup>1</sup>, so that we know not which is the fairer: is it the day of his overflowing liberality? is it the day of his prowess? Nay, each of them is brilliant and glorious! Noble princes they are in Islāmic times; and their oldest progenitors had no rivals in the ancient days of paganism. They are the people who execute when they promise, who answer when called on, and who give in abundance when they bestow. The bravest warriors cannot achieve such deeds as theirs<sup>2</sup>, even though they displayed the greatest firmness under the vicissitudes of fortune. Three (chiefs they are) whose foreheads are equal to the mountains (in majesty), and whose prudence would outweigh them."

This is certainly (lawful magic)<sup>3</sup>, exquisite both in style and thought! the author really deserves to be ranked not only above the poets his contemporaries, but above many others besides. His eulogiums on Ma'an, and the elegies which he composed on his death, abound with striking ideas. Of these pieces we shall give specimens in the life of Ma'an. Ibn al-Mu'tazz states also that the following anecdote was related by Shurāḥīl, the son of Ma'an: "I met Yaḥya Ibn Khālīd the Barnakide, on the road to Makkah, whither he was going to perform the pilgrimage with the qādī Abū Yūsuf al-Ḥanafī<sup>4</sup>. He was borne in a qubbah<sup>5</sup>, being seated in one side of it, and Abū Yūsuf in the other. I was riding by the side of the qubbah when a well-dressed Arab of the tribe of Asad came forward and recited to Yaḥyā a piece of verse. One line of the poem excited Yaḥyā's animadversion, and he exclaimed: 'Did I not forbid thee, man! to employ a verse such 1 Literally: his two days are so like each other that we confound them.

2 Literally: the doers cannot do their deeds.

3 Poetry is called by the Arabs lawful magic.

4 His life is given in this work.

5 The vehicle here called a Qubbah (dome, cupola, alcove) consisted apparently of two seats, one on each side of a camel, and both seats under the same canopy.

as that?' He then added: 'O brother of the sons of Asad! when thou utterest verses, let them be like the verses of him who said: In the day of battle, the sons of Maṣar, etc., repeating the Lāmiyah just mentioned. The qāḍī Abū Yūsuf expressed great admiration on hearing the verses, and said to Yaḥyā: 'Tell me, Abu 'l-Faḍl, who was the author of that piece.' Yaḥyā replied: 'It was composed by Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah in praise of the father of the youth now riding by the side of our qubbah'. I was then mounted on a spirited horse which belonged to me, and Abū Yūsuf gazed at me and said: 'Who art thou, young man? May God favour thee and prolong thy life!' I replied: 'I am Shurāḥīl, the son of Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah al-Shaybānī.' And I declare, by Allāh! that I never felt such pleasure and satisfaction as at that moment." It is related that a son of Marwān Ibn Ḥaṣṣah went to visit Shurāḥīl, the son of Ma'an, and recited to him these lines:

"Shurāḥīl, son of Ma'an! son of Zā'idah! most generous of men, Arabs or foreigners! Thy father gave mine wealth enough for his subsistence: give me as much as thy father gave to mine. My father never stopped in a country where thy father was, but he received from his a talent (qinṭār) of gold."

Shurāḥīl immediately bestowed on him a talent of gold. An anecdote similar to the foregoing is related of Abū Mulaykah Jarwal Ibn Aws, generally known by the appellation of al-Ḥuṭayyah (No. 91, note), this celebrated poet having been imprisoned by (the Khalif) 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb for the virulence of his tongue and his propensity to satire, he addressed the following lines to 'Umar from the place of his confinement:

"What wilt thou say to the famished nestlings in the parched and barren Dhū Marakh?<sup>2</sup> Thou hast cast their purveyor into a dungeon; have pity! and the blessing of God be upon thee. O 'Umar! Thou art the imām to whom the people, on the death of its master, confided the keys of authority<sup>3</sup>. When they raised

1 In this verse we must read شراحيل بن to obtain the measure.

2 Literally: to the nestlings with red crops in the waterless and treeless Dhū Marakh.

3 Literally: of prohibitions.

thee to that post, it was not for thy own advantage, but for theirs."

'Umar then set him free, on condition that he would abstain from satire, and al-Ḥuṭayyah said to him; "Commander of the faithful! give me a letter for 'Alqamah Ibn 'Ulāṭḥah,<sup>1</sup> since thou hast hindered me from gaining a livelihood by my verses." 'Alqamah, a man celebrated for his beneficence, was then residing in the province of Ḥawrān: Ibn al-Kalbī<sup>2</sup> says, in his Jamharat al-Nisab: 'Alqamah was the son of 'Ulāṭḥah Ibn 'Awf Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Ja'far Ibn Kilāb Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'sa'ah Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Bakr Ibn Hawāzin. His ancestor Rabi'ah Ibn Ja'far was surnamed al-Aḥwaṣ (narrow eye) on account of the smallness of his eyes. 'Alqamah had been appointed governor of Ḥawrān by 'Umar<sup>3</sup>, and he died there." 'Umar refused to grant al-Ḥuṭayyah's request, but a person having said to him: "Commander of the Faithful! it can do you no harm to give him a letter; 'Alqamah is not one of your provincial governors, that you should fear to incur censure<sup>4</sup>. Consider that this is a Muslim who requests a recommendation from you to 'Alqamah." 'Umar having then written a letter conformable to al-Ḥuṭayyah's wishes, the poet set off with it, but found, on his arrival, that 'Alqamah was dead, and met the people returning from the funeral. Seeing 'Alqamah's son among them, he went up to him and recited these lines:

"O how excellent that man of the family of Ja'far whom yester-even in Ḥawrān (death) entangled in its toils! Whilst thou livest, I shall not be weary of my life; wert thou to die, life were joyless for me; and, if I meet thee in good health, a few days only separate me from riches."

'Alqamah's son here said to him: "How much dost thou think that my father would have given thee, hadst thou found him

1 See for the history of this Arab chieftain, M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes.

2 The life of Hishām Ibn al-Kalbī will be found in No. 755.

3 This is in direct contradiction with what follows, unless we suppose his nomination to have taken place subsequently to the anecdote here related.

4 Rigid Muslims might have blamed him for causing 'Alqamah to spend the public money on al-Ḥuṭayyah.

alive?"—"One hundred female camels", replied the poet, "each of them followed by a young one". The other bestowed on him the expected present. I found the two last verses in the diwān of Ziyād Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Jābir, surnamed al-Nābiḡḡah al-Dhub-yānī<sup>1</sup>; they occur in an elegy composed by him on the death of al-Nu'mān Ibn Abī Shamir al-Ḡḥassānī<sup>2</sup>. The adventures of Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah and the anecdotes told of him are very numerous, but it is needless to dilate on the subject. His birth took place in the year 105 (A. C. 723-4), and his death in A. H. 181 (A. C. 797)—some say, 182—at Baghdād. He was interred in the cemetery of Naṣr Ibn Mālik al-Khuzā'ī. His grandson, Marwān al-Aṣḡhar (the younger) Abu 'l-Simṭ the son of Abu 'l-Junūb, the son of Marwān al-Akbar (the elder), him of whom we have just spoken, was one of the most celebrated and eminent poets of his time. Al-Mubarrad (No. 610), in his kāmil, gives a short notice on 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the son of Ḥassān Ibn Thābit<sup>3</sup>, in which he says: "It is related that 'Abd al-Raḥmān, having been stung by a wasp, went crying to his father, who asked what was the matter. He replied: 'I have been stung by a flying thing, dressed, as it were, in a double cloak of striped cloth.' 'By Allāh!' exclaimed the father, 'thou hast there pronounced a verse'." He then adds: "The family which had the greatest skill in poetry was that of Ḥassān, for it produced six persons, in succession, all of them poets; these were: Sa'id, his father 'Abd āl-Raḥmān, his father Ḥassān, his father Thābit, his father al-Mundhir, and his father Ḥizām*. After them came the family of Abū Ḥaṣṣah, the members

1 For a notice on this ancient poet, see M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie, tome II, p. 412.

2 This is the twenty-fifth person in Pococke's list of the Ḡḥassanid kings. The poems of al-Nābiḡḡah to which these verses belong is to be found in the Diwān of the Six Poets. It is there given as an elegy on the death of al-Nu'mān Ibn Ḥarith Ibn Abī Shamir al-Ḡḥassānī.

3 Ḥassān Ibn Thābit was one of the poets who espoused the cause of Muḥammad. His son 'Abd al-Raḥmān lived under Mu'āwiyah, and used to address complimentary poems to Ramlah, the daughter of that Khalīf. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was inferior in talent to his father.

4 The Arabic words uttered by the child do not appear to form a verse, as they cannot be scanned by any metrical scale.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives Ḥarām.—Ed.

of which inherited a talent for poetry, from father to son. Yaḥyā, the son of Abū Ḥafṣah (the elder), was surnamed Abū Jamīl; his mother, Ṭaḥyā*? was the daughter of Maymūn, or, according to another statement, of al-Nābiḡah al-Ja'dī (No. 187, note); and to this circumstance is attributed the transmission of a faculty for poetry into the family of Abū Ḥafṣah. All these persons could touch the point of their nose with their tongue, and this denotes a talent for speaking with elegance and precision." God knows how far that may be true!

690 MUSLIM IBN AL-ḤAJJĀJ

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjaj† Ibn Muslim [Ibn Ward Ibn Qūsād<sup>1</sup>] al-Qūshayrī, a native of Naysābūr and the author of the Ṣaḥīḥ<sup>2</sup>, was a most eminent ḥafīz and a highly distinguished traditionist. He travelled (in pursuit of learning) to Ḥijāz, 'Irāq, Syria, and Egypt, and heard Traditions delivered by Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā al-Naysābūrī<sup>3</sup>, Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19), Iṣḥāq Ibn Rāḥwayh (No. 82), 'Abd Allāh Ibn Maslamah al-Qa'nabī (No. 304), and other great masters. He visited Baghdād more than once, and the people of that city delivered Traditions on his authority. He went there for the last time in the year 259 (A. C. 872-3). Al-Tirmidhī (No. 587) was one of those who taught Traditions on his authority; and, as a trustworthy Traditionist, he bore the highest character. Muḥammad Ibn al-Māsarjisi

1 One of the MSS. reads Qūshād and another Qūshyār.

2 The Ṣaḥīḥ (true, authentic) is a title by which is designated each of the six great collections of Traditions. To distinguish them, the name of the author is added after the word Ṣaḥīḥ.

3 Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā Ibn Yahya Ibn Bakr al-Ḥanzalī al-Tamīmī, a native of Naysābūr distinguished for his piety and mortified life, was considered as the first Traditionist and ḥafīz of that age in Khurāsān. He died A.H. 226 (A.C. 840-1) (Al-Nujūm al-Zāhirah; Mir'āt al-Zamān).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives Ḥayyā.—Ed.

† Two names are omitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamid. Ibn Ḥajar did not trace his genealogy further.—Ed.

states that he heard Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj say<sup>1</sup>: "I drew up this authentic musnad<sup>2</sup> (al-Musnad al-Ṣaḥīḥ) out of three hundred thousand Traditions (which I) heard (with my own ears)." "There is not under the expanse of heaven," said the ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Alī al-Naysābūrī<sup>3</sup>, "a more authentic work on the science of Traditions than that of Muslim." Al-Khaṭīb al-Baḡhdādī (No. 33) mentions that Muslim defended al-Bukhārī (No. 543) so strenuously that the intimacy between himself and Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā al-Dḥuhlī<sup>4</sup> was broken off. The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ya'qūb<sup>5</sup> relates (this event) thus; "When al-Bukhārī was residing at Naysābūr, Muslim went frequently to see him. A misintelligence then arose between Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā and al-Bukhārī on the subject of the pronunciation (of the Qur'ānic text)<sup>6</sup>, and Muḥammad caused a proclamation to be

1 There seems to be some mistake here; Muḥammad al-Māsarjīṣī (No. 550) was born forty-seven years after Muslim's death.

2 The meaning of the word musnad is explained in No. 82, note.

3 The Traditionist Abū 'Alī al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī al-Naysābūrī bore a high reputation for learning and piety. He inhabited Baḡhdād and died in the month of the first Jumādā. A.H. 341 (Oct., A.C. 952), aged sixty-four years. (Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāẓ.)

4 A notice on this person is given by our author at the end of the present article.

5 The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ya'qūb al-Shaybānī, a native of Naysābūr and an able Traditionist, died A.H. 344 (A.C. 955-6), aged ninety-four years. (Ḥuffāẓ.)

6 The orthodox Muslims consider the Qur'ān to be uncreated, and the eternal word of God. This opinion has been expressed by some of their doctors in the following manner: "The Qur'ān is one of the eternal attributes of His essence; it is uncreated, and consists neither of letters nor of vocal sounds." These last words are evidently directed against an opinion held by certain theologians, such as Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā, who declared that whoever pretends the Qur'ān to be created is an infidel, and whoever pretends that the act of pronouncing the Qur'ān is a created act, is also an infidel. Al-Bukhārī taught that the pronunciation of the Qur'ān (meaning its utterance by the organs of speech) is created, because, said he, it is an act of God's creature, and such acts are created (not eternal). In a work advocating the Aṣḥ'arite principle of giving a figurative interpretation to such passages of the Qur'ān as would lead to anthropomorphism if taken literally, the author, Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn made against his adversary, forbidding the people to attend his (lessons). This persecution forced al-Bukhārī to quit Naysābūr, and every person avoided him, except Muslim, who continued his visits as before. Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā being then informed that Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj had always adhered to the opinion of al-Bukhārī and did so still, notwithstanding the censures which he had incurred on that account in Ḥijāz and 'Irāq, he said, one day, at the close of his lesson: 'Whoever holds the pronunciation (of the Qur'ān) to be created, I forbid that person to attend my lessons.' Muslim immediately passed his cloak (ridā) over his turban, and standing up in the midst of the assembly, left the room. "Having then collected all the notes which he had taken at Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā's lessons, he loaded some camels with them and sent them to the latter's door. This confirmed the misunderstanding which subsisted between them, and Muslim ceased to visit him." Muslim died at Naysābūr, on Sunday evening, and was interred at Naṣrabād, outside Naysābūr on Monday, the 25th some says the 24th—of Rajab, A.H. 261 (5th May A.C. 875), aged fifty-five years. So I found it written in some book, or other but I never met with his age or the date of his birth specified by any of the ḥāfiẓes, though they all agree that he was born subsequently to the year 200. Our shaykh Taqī al-Dīn Abū 'Amr 'Uthmān, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (No. 386), mentioned the date of his birth, which, to the best of my recollection, was in the year 202. I have since examined Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ's statement and find the date to be 206 (A. C. 821-2); he gives it after the Kitāb 'Ulamā al-Amṣār (history of the doctors of the great cities), a work composed by the Ḥākim Ibn al-Bayyī' al-Naysābūrī (No. 589). I met with the book from which he took this indication, and obtained the very copy which he made use of; it had belonged to him, and was sold, with his other property, after his death. It then fell into my possession. Here al-Mu'alim, has a long discussion on the foregoing question. His work is entitled Najm al-Muṭtadī wa Rajm al-Mu'tadī. See MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale, Supplement No. 200. It may be here observed that this MS. has been corrected by the author. The question of the pronunciation of the Qur'an is technically called maṣālat al-lafẓ.

(Continued on page 247)

---

(Continued from page 246)

is what the author says; "Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj al-Naysābūrī died on the 25th of Rajab, A.H. 261, aged fifty-five years." His birth must have therefore taken place in 206. We have already explained the word Qushayrī in our article on 'Abd al-Karīm al-Qushayrī (No. 369), the author of the Epistle and need not, therefore, repeat our words. As for the Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā, mentioned above, his names were Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khālīd Ibn Fāris Ibn Dhūwayb al-Dhūhlī (الذهلي) al-Naysābūrī (belonging to the tribe of Dhul, and a native of Naysābūr). He was highly distinguished as a ḥāfiẓ, and Traditions were given on his authority by al-Bukhārī, Muslim, Abū Dawūd (No. 254), al-Tirmidhī, and Ibn Mājah al-Qazwīnī (No. 588). He was a sure and trustworthy Traditionist. The coolness which subsisted between him and al-Bukhārī originated from the following circumstance: when the latter arrived at Naysābūr, Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā quarrelled with him about the creation of the pronunciation. As al-Bukhārī had already learned Traditions from him, he could not avoid giving them on his authority; this he does in about thirty places of his book, in the chapters on fasting, medicine, burials, and enfranchisement, but without giving his name in full; he merely says: I was told by Muḥammad or by Muḥammad the son of 'Abd Allāh, thus naming him after his grandfather, or by Muḥammad the son of Khālīd after his great-grandfather. Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā died, A.H. 252 (A.C. 886), some say, 257 or 258.

691 QUṬB AL-DĪN AL-NAYSĀBŪRĪ

Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Mas'ūd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Ṭāhir al-Naysābūrī al-Turayhī (الطريحي), a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect and surnamed Quṭb al-Dīn (axis of religion), studied jurisprudence at Naysābūr and at Marw, under the first masters in these cities. He learned Traditions from a number of teachers and met with the ustād (master) Abū Naṣr al-Qushayrī (No. 369). He gave lessons in the Nizāniyah college of Naysābūr as the substitute of Abu 'l-Ma'ālī 'l-Juwaynī (No. 353), he had studied the Qur'ān and polite literature under his own father. Having visited Baghḍād, he delivered pious exhortations there, and discussed, with great ability, various questions (of jurisprudence). In the year 540 (A. C. 1145-6), he went to Damascus and preached there with great effect; he taught also in the Mujāhidiyah college, and afterwards, in the western corner<sup>1</sup> of the great mosque, on the death of the doctor Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh al-Miṣṣiṣi<sup>2</sup>. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn 'Asākir (No. 416) mentions him in the History of Damascus. Having then proceeded to Aleppo, Quṭb al-Dīn professed for some time in the two colleges founded there by Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd (No. 459) and Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh (No. 272). He subsequently went to profess at Hamadān, whence he returned to Damascus and resumed his lessons in the Western Corner. He delivered Traditions also and became president of the Shāfi'ite community. He was conspicuous for learning, virtue, and piety. His summary of jurisprudence, the Hādī (director) is a useful treatise, and every maxim which it contains having already served as the basis of a legal decision. He drew up for the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn an 'aqidah (exposition of the Muslim creed) containing every necessary information on religious matters, and this work (the sultān) taught his children, so that it was impressed on their youthful mind. Bahā al-Dīn (Yūsuf) Ibn Shaddād<sup>3</sup> says in his life of that prince<sup>4</sup>: "I saw him"—meaning the sultān—"holding

1 In Arabic, al-Zāwiyat al-Gharbiyah. These words should perhaps be rendered by the western cloister.

2 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Qawī al-Miṣṣiṣi (native of Miṣṣiṣah), a descendant of al-Aṣḥ'arī (No. 404) and a follower of his doctrines, was born A.H. 448 (A.C. 1056). "He was a jurisconsult of the highest authority," says Ibn al-Sam'ānī (No. 370), "versed in dogmatic and scholastic theology, pious, virtuous, intelligent, and condescending. He studied under the great shaykhs of Syria." Amongst his masters was al-Khaṭīb al-Baḡḍādī (No. 33). He travelled to Baḡḍād, Iṣbahān, and al-Anbār, after which he settled at Damascus and professed in the Ḡhazzāliyah college (No. 562). Some waqfs (No. 21, note) were founded by him for pious uses, and he carefully avoided frequenting men in power. He died at Damascus, in the month of the first Rabi', A.H. 542 (August, A.C. 1147), and was interred at the Lesser Gate (al-Bab al-Saghīr),—(Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn.)

3 His life will be found in No. 815.

4 See Schulten's Vita et res gesta Saladin, p. 4.

the book whilst his children repeated to him the contents from memory." Qutb al-Dīn was a man of great humility, careless in his dress, and a despiser of ceremony. His birth took place on the 13th of Rajab, A. H. 505 (January, A.C. 1112)*, and he died at Damascus on the 30th of Ramaḍān, A. H. 578 (27th January, A. C. 1183). The funeral prayer was said over him on the Day of the Festival (the 1st of the following month), which fell on a Friday. He was interred in the cemetery established by himself at the west end of Damascus, near that of the Ṣūfis. I visited his tomb more than once. His father belonged to Turayhith. Of this place we have already spoken in the life of 'Amid al-Mulk al-Kundurī (No. 676); it is situated in the district of Naysābūr. One of his disciples mentioned that he heard the shaykh Qutb al-Dīn recite these verses as the composition of some other person:

"They say that love is a fire in the bosom; they lie! fire blazes, and dies out. Love is a firebrand touched by moisture: it dieth not, neither doth it blaze up."

692 THE SHARĪF ABŪ JA'FAR MAS'ŪD AL-BAYĀDĪ

The sharīf Abū Ja'far Mas'ūd al-Bayāḍī was the son of 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn al-Muḥassin Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Abd al-Razzāq, so I found the genealogy of this celebrated poet written out in the handwriting of a very accurate ḥāfiẓ: but, at the head of his collected poetical works, I perceive it set forth as follows: Abū Ja'far Mas'ūd Ibn al-Muḥassin Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās (No. 43, note) Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib Ibn Hāshim, member of the tribe of Quraysh and of the family of Hāshim. This sharīf was one of the good poets of later times, and his poetical works, which form a small volume, overflow with tenderness. His dīwān contains very few eulogistic pieces. One of the best poems in it is 'he qaṣīdah rhyming in q (ق) which begins thus :

* 15 January.—Ed.

"If thy tears flowed not on the departure of the caravan, notwithstanding the passion which filled thy heart, such conduct in thee was sheer dissimulation. Retain not the water of thy eyelids, O thou who hast been smitten with love ! that water is for thy wounds a balm. Avoid the company of the censorious ; their intentions are not pure, although they reprove with seeming compassion. Blessings on the days which are past ; those days of which the branches flourished in a foliage ( of pleasure ), when eyes were our narcissus-flowers<sup>1</sup>, cheeks our blowing roses, and lips the cup from which we sipped intoxication. At the Zawrā of al-'Irāq<sup>2</sup> we then held frequent marts, and there love's delights found a rapid sale. If my eyes weep blood through my longing for that time, ( wonder not ! ) a time such as that may well be longed for. Those youths by whose aspect alone the taste of such love<sup>3</sup> is rendered sweet, bear in their hands lances ( slender as ) their bodies and tipped with points ( of steel blue as ) their eyes. They spread ravage through all hearts with their glances, and their captives can never hope for freedom. For them, the tears of others are sweet ; so they torment their captive till his eyes overflow. 'Tis said that they have vowed to shed my blood, as the fittest libation for the day on which we separate."

The following piece of his used to be sung to music :

"How has the herbage of love been parched up ( in my heart ), although watered by my eyes ? If men can be freed from the bondage of love, behold me its captive ! If beauty be bound to do charity, let it behold in me a beggar."

By the same author :

"O happy night when the full moon ( the beloved ) embraced me without fear or apprehension, till the morning dawned ! her

1 See vol. I, Introduction.

2 The poet means Baghdād.

3 Of such love ; literally ; amoris pulchrorum. From verses such as these we may appreciate the corruption which pervaded Muslim civilisation ; and a qāḍī, a custos morum, to quote them with approbation.

words were pearls, and their brilliancy replaced the light of the stars; her face replaced the moon. Whilst I allowed my ears and eyes to revel in her charms, behold! I received warning that day-break had come. The only fault of that (night) was its shortness; but what fault could it have more hateful? To render it longer I would have furnished it with darkness even out of the dark spot of my heart and the pupil of my eye."

In this last verse the poet had in view the following, by Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46) :

"He would wish that the darkness of night was prolonged for himself, by the addition of the black of his heart and of his eye."

The rest of his poetry is in the same style. We have quoted two verses of al-Bayāḍī's in the life of Şurr-Durr (No. 449). He died at Baghdād on Tuesday, the 16th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 468 (21st June, A. C. 1076), and was buried in the cemetery at the Abrez Gate. He was called Al-Bayāḍī (the man in white), because one of his ancestors appeared in a white dress at the levee of a khalif, where the rest of the company, who were all 'Abbāsids, were dressed in (the family colour) black. The khalif asked who was the man in white? and the name stuck to him so closely, that by it he and his descendants became generally known. Ibn al-Jawzi (No. 345) says, in his Kitāb al-Alqāb (book of surnames) that the person to whom this happened was Muḥammad Ibn 'Isā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib; a member of the 'Abbāsīd family, and I read in the handwriting of Usāmah Ibn Munqidh (No. 81) that the khalif who asked the questions was al-Rāḍī bi-Allāh. God best knows who is in the right!

693 MAS'ŪD AL-SALJŪQĪ

Abu 'l-Faḥ Mas'ūd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Malik Shāh Ibn Alp Arslān al-Saljūqī, surnamed Ghiyāth al-Dīn (defence of the faith), was one of the most illustrious of the Saljūq kings. We have already spoken of his father (No. 666) of his brother Maḥmūd (No. 687), and of other persons belonging to the same family. In the year 505 (A.C. 1111-2), Mas'ūd was entrusted, by his father to the care of the amīr Mawdūd [Ibn Altūtikīn,]* whom he appointed lord of Moṣul on condition of bringing up the young prince. Mawdūd being slain, two years later, at Damascus, Mas'ūd was confided by his father to the amīr Āq-Sunqur al-Bursuqī (No. 100), and subsequently to Jūsh Bek, atābek of Moṣul. His brother Maḥmūd having succeeded to the throne on the death of their father, Jūsh Bek encouraged his ward to revolt against the new monarch and aspire to the sulṭānship; nor did he remit his efforts till he induced Mas'ūd to levy a large body of troops and march against his brother. The two armies encountered near Hamadān, in the month of the first Rabī', A. H. 514 (June, A. C. 1120), and Maḥmūd gained the victory. In this engagement, the ustād Abū Ismā'il al-Ṭughrā'i (No. 191) lost his life. After some vicissitudes, fortune at length declared for Mas'ūd, and he obtained the sulṭānship in the year 528 A. H. (A.C. 1133-4). On arriving in Baghdād, he chose for wazīr Sharaf al-Dīn Anūshirwān Ibn Khālīd al-Qāshānī (see the life of al-Ḥarirī, No. 510), who had served the khalif al-Mustarshid in the same capacity. Mas'ūd was just, affable, and highminded; he shared his empire among his partisans, and retained nothing for himself but the mere title of sulṭān; yet, with all his condescension, none ever dared to resist his power without incurring a defeat. He put to death not only a great number of the most powerful amīrs, but also the khalifs al-Mustarshid and al-Rāshid. Previously to his accession, Mas'ūd had been on ill terms with al-Mustarshid, and he had no sooner mounted the throne than the lieutenants whom he established in 'Irāq commenced encroachments on the possessions of that khalif. The breach was thus widened between them, and al-Mustarshid at length equipped an army and took the field. Mas'ūd, who was then at Hamadān, assembled a large body of troops and marched against him. The two armies met near Hamadān, but that of the khalif was defeated, and he himself with the principal officers of his court were taken prisoners. The sultān led his captive in triumph through the cities of Āḍharbā'ijān, and al-Mustarshid finally lost his life, near Marāghah, in the manner we have related; see our notice on Dubays Ibn Ṣadaqah (No. 212) * Mas'ūd deposed also the khalif al-Rāshid and appointed al-Muqtafi (li-amr Allāh) to succeed him. This event is well known.† He then gave himself up to pleasure and to every sort of enjoyment, being confident that the fortune which had hitherto attended him would always be subservient to his will; but, being attacked by vomiting fits and mental derangement, he expired at Hamdān, on the 11th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 547 (13th Sept., A. C. 1152); or, according to some, on Wednesday, the 29th† day of that month. He was interred in the college built by the eunuch (al-Khādim) Jamāl al-Dīn Iqbāl. Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqī says, in his History, that he saw the sultān Mas'ūd in Baghdād, A.H. 547<sup>2</sup>, and that he then set out for Hamadān and died outside the walls of that city. His corpse was borne to Iṣbahān. We have spoken of this sultān in the life of Dubays Ibn Ṣadaqah, lord of al-Ḥillah. He was born on Friday, the third of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, A. H. 502 (4th June, A. C. 1109). On his accession to the sultānship, he had to sustain a conflict with his uncle Sinjar, and, on Friday, the 12th of Ṣafar, A. H. 527 (23rd Dec., A. C. 1132) he obtained that his name should be inserted, after that of his uncle, in the public prayer khutbah offered up at Baghdād.

* This name is omitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

694 MAS'ŪD IBN MAWDŪD

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, surnamed also Abu 'l-Muẓaffar, Mas'ūd, the atābek and lord of Moṣul, was the son of Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd, the son of 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, the son of Āq Sunqur. He bore

1 See Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, year 530. This historian's name should be pronounced Abu 'l Fida.

2 From this we learn that Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqī, the Author of the history of Mayyāfāriqīn, was living in A.H. 547 (A.C. 1152).

* This sentence is omitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

† 'Abī al-Ḥamid gives : 22nd of latter Jumādā (24 September).—Ed.

the title of 'Izz, al-Dīn (glory of religion). We have already spoken of his grandfather (No. 229), his great-grandfather (No. 99), his son Nūr al-Dīn Arslān Shāh (No. 79), and other members of the family. Farther on, we shall give a notice on his father. When his father Mawdūd died. Ghāzī (No. 496), the eldest son, succeeded to the throne. His other sons were Mas'ūd and 'Imād al-dīn Zinkī, lord of Sinjār (No. 230). 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd held the post of commander in chief of the troops, in the lifetime of his brother Ghāzī. When the sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn left Egypt, on the death of al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd (No. 688), and laid siege to Aleppo after occupying Damascus, Ghāzī was filled with apprehension: he felt that the power of the sulṭān had now become immense and that he would acquire the sovereign authority, were he allowed to take possession of Syria. He therefore equipped a large army, and, having placed it under the orders of his brother 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, he sent it to combat Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and expel him from the country. When this intelligence reached Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn he set out from Aleppo on the first of Rajab, A.H. 570 (Jan. A.C. 1175),* and proceeded to Emessa. He then took the citadel of Emessa, having already occupied the city itself, on the first of the first Jumādā of that year (Nov.).† when marching from Damascus to Aleppo. 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd then arrived at Aleppo for the ostensible purpose of giving assistance to his cousin al-Malik al-Ṣālīḥ, Ismā'īl, the son of Nūr al-Dīn, who was then lord of that city, but his real motive was to prevent Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn from extending his domination over the whole country. Having been joined by the troops of Aleppo 'Izz al-Dīn continued his march, at the head of a numerous army, and reached Qurūn (near) Ḥamāt, whither Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn had already advanced to meet him. As the latter wished to come to an amicable arrangement, he opened a correspondence, with his adversaries, but all his efforts were useless. The two princes imagined that they might attain, by risking a battle, the principal object which they had in view, but fate leads to things which none can foresee. Both parties having come to an engagement, the army of 'Izz al-Dīn was defeated, and a number of his * 26 January.—Ed.

† 28 November, A.C. 1174.—Ed.

principal officers were taken prisoners, but afterwards received their liberty from the sultān. This celebrated encounter took place on Sunday, the 19th of Ramaḍān (April, A.C. 1175).* Having routed his enemies, the sultān marched against Aleppo and encamped, for the second time, under its walls. Al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Ismā'il then obtained peace, on condition of leaving to Šalāḥ al-Dīn the towns of al-Ma'arraḥ, Kafriṭāb, and Bārīn. Šalāḥ al-Dīn then raised the siege. The history of these events would lead us too far, but the remainder of 'Izz al-Dīn's proceedings will be found related in the life of his brother Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī. On the death of the prince just named, 'Izz al-Dīn succeeded to the throne. [In the year 577 (A.C. 1181)] al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Ismā'il, who was then on the point of death, bequeathed the kingdom of Aleppo to his cousin 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, and caused the amirs and soldiers to swear allegiance to that prince. When this intelligence reached 'Izz al-Dīn, he hastened to Aleppo, lest Šalāḥ al-Dīn should occupy it before him. Having arrived there on the 20th of Shā'bān, A.H. 577 (end of December, A.C. 1181) †, he went up to the castle and took possession of all the treasures and valuable objects deposited in that edifice. On the fifth of Shawwāl, ‡ the same year, he married the mother of al-Malik al-Šāliḥ, and remained in the city till the 16th of that month. Finding then his inability to retain the command of Syria and Moṣul, apprehensive also of the dangers to which he was exposed by the vicinity of Šalāḥ al-Dīn, and fatigued by the obsessions of the amirs whose exorbitant demands for additional pay he was unable to satisfy, he departed from Aleppo, leaving there his son Muẓaffar al-Dīn to act as his lieutenant, and with him Muẓaffar al-Dīn, the son of Zayn al-Dīn, lord of Arbela (No. 522). 'Izz al-Dīn, who was then entirely controlled by Mujāhid al-Dīn Qāyimāz al-Zaynī (No 515), proceeded to al-Raqqah, where he was received by his brother 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī, lord of Sinjār. Having agreed with him on exchanging the government of Aleppo for that of Sinjār, a mutual oath was taken to that effect, and each sent agents to receive * 13 April.—Ed.

† 29 December.—Ed.

‡ 11 February, A.C. 1182.—Ed.

possession of their new acquisitions. On the 13th of Muḥarram, A.H. 578 (May, A.C. 1182)*, 'Imād al-Dīn entered the castle of Aleppo. Previously to this a treaty of peace had been concluded between 'Izz al-Dīn, his cousin (al-Malik) al-Ṣāliḥ and (the sultān) Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, by the intervention of Qilij Arslān, the sovereign of al-Rūm (Asia Minor). The sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn then set out for Egypt, after leaving his nephew 'Izz al-Dīn Farrūkh Shāh, the son of Shāhanshāh, to govern Damascus in his absence; but on learning the death of al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ and the arrangements which had subsequently taken place, he returned to Syria and entered Damascus on the 17th of Ṣafar, A.H. 578 (June, A.C. 1182)†. Being then informed that 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd had sent an ambassador to the Franks, and that the object of this mission was to induce them to march against himself, he broke the treaty, and, indignant at the treason which he had thus discovered, he resolved on marching against Aleppo and Moṣul. 'Imād al-Dīn, the lord of Aleppo, had no sooner received intelligence of the preparations made by Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, than he sent to warn his brother, the governor of Moṣul, and request from him a reinforcement. The sultān (Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn) having left Damascus, halted under the walls of Aleppo on the 12th of the first Jumādā, A.H. 578 (September, A.C. 1182)‡; but, after occupying this position during three days, he departed on the 21st of the same month. Soon after this, it happened that the lord of Ḥarrān, Muẓaffar al-Dīn (the son of Zayn al-Dīn, lord of Arbela), who was then in the service of the sovereign of Moṣul, and apprehended violence from 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, lord of Moṣul, and from Mujāhid al-Dīn Qāyimāz al-Zaynī, crossed the Euphrates and placed himself under the protection of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. The sultān, to whom he represented the facility with which he might subdue Mesopotamia resolved on invading that province, and having passed the Euphrates, he took the cities of Edessa, al-Raqqah, Naṣībīn, and Sarūj. He then appointed a resident agent in the province of al-Khābūr and conceded it in fief; after which, he set out with

---

* 19 May.—Ed.

† 22 June.—Ed.

‡ 2 September.—Ed.

the intention of laying siege to Moṣul, and encamped under its walls, on Thursday, the 11th of Rajab, 578 (November, A.C. 1182).* After some days, he perceived that no result could be obtained from besieging so large a city, and that the only means of taking it was to reduce the fortresses in its environs and in the neighbouring districts, and thus weaken the garrison in lapse of time. He in consequence departed, and having taken position against Sinjār on the 16th of Sha'bān.† the same year, he occupied the city on the 2nd of Ramaḍān (December)‡ and gave it to his nephew al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Taqī al-Dīn 'Umar (No. 476). Not to enter into long details, we shall merely state that he returned to Syria, and reached Ḥarrān in the commencement of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, the same year. Towards the beginning of the month of the first Rabi' A.H. 581 (June, A.C. 1185), he appeared again before Moṣul and laid siege to the city. The mother of 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, accompanied by the daughter of Nūr al-Dīn Arslān Shāh and a number of females belonging to the Atābek family, then went forth and requested him to enter into a treaty and consent to a peace. The sultān, imagining that 'Izz al-Dīn had sent the princess on this mission because he had not the means of defending the city, refused compliance and sent her back disappointed, offering at the same time pretexts to excuse his conduct. But of this he had afterwards reason to repent, for the people of Moṣul being indignant at his rejecting the prayer of 'Izz al-Dīn's mother and of the females who accompanied her, strained every nerve to make a vigorous defence. He continued to besiege the city till he learned the death of Shāh Armin Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Sukmān al-Quṭbīṣ; lord of Khalāt, and the accession of that prince's mamlūk, Biktīmūr, to the supreme authority. This officer, finding himself exposed to the ambition of the neighbouring princes, and discovering that they had resolved to attack him, sent to Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, offering to deliver the city into his hands on condition of receiving a suitable return. The death of Shāh Armin took place on Thursday, the 9th of the latter Rabi', * 11 November.—Ed.

† 15 December.—Ed.

‡ 30 December.—Ed.

§ 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : al-Qibṭi. - Ed.

A.H. 581 (July, A.C. 1185)* and, on the 20th of the same month, the sultān departed from Moṣul and directed his march towards Khalāt. Muẓaffar al-Dīn, afterwards lord of Arbela, but then lord of Ḥarrān, accompanied the vanguard with Nāṣir al-Dīn Muḥammad, the son of Asad al-Dīn Shīrkūh and cousin of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. Having halted at a village called at Ṭawānah,† and situated in the neighbourhood Khalāt, they sent envoys to Biktīmūr for the purpose of settling the conditions of the treaty. When the envoys arrived, Shams al-Dīn Bihliwān Ibn Ildukuzī, lord of Adḥarbā'ijān, Arrān. and Persian 'Irāq, had already approached, with the design of besieging the city, but Biktīmūr having caused him to be informed that he would deliver up Khalāt to the sultān if he (Bihliwān) did not withdraw his troops, the latter complied, and made peace on receiving Biktīmūr's daughter in marriage. Biktīmūr then sent to the sultān, retracting his promise of delivering up Khalāt and offering some excuses. The sultān was then laying siege to Mayyāfāriqīn and had attacked it with great vigour. Quṭb al-Dīn 'Il Ghāzī Ibn Albīṭ Ibn Kirtāsh Ibn Ghāzī Ibn Urtuq, the lord of this city, had left it, on dying, to his son Ḥusām al-Dīn Bulūq Arslān, a mere boy: and this circumstance had encouraged Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn to undertake its siege. On the 29th of the first Jumādā (August, A.H. 1185),‡ he succeeded, by means of a stratagem, in deciding the garrison to capitulate and surrender the place. Having then given up the hope of getting Khalāt into his possession, he returned to Moṣul for the third time, and encamped at some distance from it, at a place called Kafr Zammār. He remained there a considerable time, and the weather being intensely hot, he was attacked by a malady which brought him to the verge of death, and, on the first of

I I follow the orthography of the autographic MS. of Abu 'l-Fida's Annals.

* 11 July.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd: al-Ṭawābah.—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Ildhukuri in his original edition (1845) M. de Slane says: "The MSS. of Ibn Khallikān have الذکر in place of الذكر.—Ed.

§ 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Allī Kirmās.—Ed.

|| 28 August.—Ed.

Shawwāl (December),* he decamped for Ḥarrān. When 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd heard of the sultān's illness and learned that his heart was inclined to clement measures, he profited by so favourable an opportunity and despatched to Ḥarrān the qādī Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shadād, a person whose life we shall give, accompanied by Bahā al-Dīn al-Rabīb. On their arrival, they asked for and obtained peace; the sultān himself, who had now recovered, ratifying the treaty by an oath. This took place on the 9th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah (March, A.C. 1186),† and Ṣalāh al-Dīn never swerved from that engagement as long as he lived. 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd being delivered from his apprehensions by the departure of the sultān from Syria, continued to enjoy peace and tranquillity till his death. He died of diarrhea on the 27th of Sha'bān, A.H. 589 (28th August, A.C. 1193). A large college was founded and endowed by him at Moṣul for doctors of the Shāfi'ite and Ḥanafite sects. He was interred in a mausoleum erected within the walls of this establishment. I have seen the college and mausoleum, and was greatly struck with their beauty. Opposite to this college, and separate from it by a large open space, stands the college founded by his son Nūr al-Dīn Arslān Shāh. On the death of 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, his son Nūr al-Dīn Arslān Shāh (No. 79) succeeded to the throne. Nūr al-Dīn had two sons, al-Malik al-Qāhir 'Izz al-Dīn Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Mas'ūd and al-Malik al-Manṣūr 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī. When on the point of death, he divided his states between them and gave to al-Malik al-Qāhir, who was the elder, the city and province of Moṣul; the younger, 'Imād al-Dīn, received Shūsh,‡ al-'Aqr, and the neighbouring districts. Al-Malik al-Qāhir was born at Moṣul in the year 590 (A.C. 1194), and he died there, suddenly, on the eve of Monday, the 26th of the latter Rabi' A.H. 615 (22nd July, A.C. 1218). He also had erected a college and was interred within its precincts. As for 'Imād al-Dīn, he took possession of Qal'at al-'Imādiyyah, on the death of his brother al-Malik al-Qāhir, but it was subsequently taken from him. It is one of the finest fortresses in Jabal al-Hakkāriyah, a mountain in the territory of * 26 December, A.C. 1185.—Ed.

---

† 3 March.—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : al-'Inādiyyah.—Ed.

Moşul. He took also and lost a number of other castles in the vicinity. Having married the daughter of Muẓaffar al-Dīn, lord of Arbela, he removed to that city and resided there for some time. As we dwelt in his neighbourhood, we remarked that he was an extremely handsome man. Muẓaffar al-Dīn then arrested him for a motive too long to explain here, and sent him to al-Malik al-Ashraf, the son of al-Malik al-ʿĀdil, at Sinjār. We shall again speak of al-Ashraf. Having received his liberty from this prince, he returned to Arbela and obtained from Muẓaffar al-Dīn the city and district of Shahrūzūr in exchange for al-ʿAqr. He removed thither and made it his residence during the rest of his life. He died A.H. 630 (A.C. 1232-3), his son and successor died soon after. Bahliwān Ibn ʿIldukūz died towards the end of Dhu'l-Hijjah, A.H. 581 (March, A.C. 1186). His father Shams al-Dīn ʿIldukūz the atābek died at Naqjawān, towards the end of the latter Rabi'. A.H. 570 (November, A.C. 1174), and was interred in that city. He had been atābek (guardian) to the Ṣaljūq sultān Arslān Shāh Ibn Tughrūlbek Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Malik Shāh al-Saljūqī. About a month after the death of ʿIldukūz, Bahliwān's father (A.H. 571, A.C. 1175), Arslān Shāh died at Hamadān and was interred there. Quzul, (another) son of ʿIldukūz, lost his life in the beginning of Shābān, A.H. 587 (Aug., A.C. 1191); he was a powerful prince.

695 MUṬARRIF IBN MĀZIN AL-ṢANʿĀNĪ

Abū Ayyub Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin, a member, by adoption, of the tribe of Kinānah, or of the tribe of Qays, according to another statement, was a native of Ṣanʿā in Yaman and held the post of Qāḍī in that city. He delivered Traditions on the authority of ʿAbd al-Malik Ibn ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz Ibn Jurayj (No. 350) and a great number of other masters. The imām al-Shāfiʿī (No. 532) and many other doctors cited Traditions on his authority. His exactitude as a Traditionist has been contested, and it is related that Yahyā Ibn Maʿīn<sup>1</sup> having been asked respecting his character, replied: "He is a liar." Al-Nasā'ī (No. 28) declares positively that Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin was not trustworthy, and al-Sa'dī<sup>1</sup> said: "Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin al-Ṣan'ānī's Traditions should be received with caution till his authorities be put to the test." Abū Ḥātim Muḥammad Ibn Ḥabbān al-Bustī<sup>2</sup> says; "Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin al-Kinānī, qāḍī of Yaman, delivered Traditions on the authority of Ma'mar (see Introduction) and Ibn Jurayj; al-Shāfi' and the people of 'Irāq cited Traditions on his authority. He used to relate Traditions which he never heard delivered, and repeat (as being consigned to paper) information which had never been written down, and that information he gave on the authority of persons whom he never saw. It is not therefore allowable to relate Traditions on his authority; except to men of special merit and then, only for their examination." "Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin," says Ḥājib Ibn Sulaymān, "was qāḍī of Ṣan'ā and a man of holy life." He then relates that Muṭarrif declared a man justified who, having been constrained to swear that he would commit a scandalous deed, had acted according to his oath. Abū Aḥmad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Adī 'l-Jurjānī<sup>3</sup> quotes some Traditions as given by Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin, and adds: "He delivered also some other Traditions, known only to himself, and never communicated to the persons who have handed down Traditions on his authority; and I never remarked a

<sup>1</sup> His life will be found in this work.

---

1 Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Sa'dī, the ablest doctor in the science of the Traditions whom the city of Marw ever produced, was considered as a most competent judge in these matters and looked on as a veracious and trustworthy Traditionist. Al-Dhahabī states, in his Tabaqāt al-Fuqahā, that al-Sa'dī died A.H. 302 (A.C. 914-5).

2 Abū Ḥātim Muḥammad Ibn Ḥabbān, a native of the town of Buṣṭ. in Sijistān, studied under al-Nasā'ī and other eminent masters. He was profoundly learned in jurisprudence, the Traditions medicine, astronomy, and other branches of science. He filled the post of qāḍī at Samrqand and composed a critical work in which he estimated the character and trustworthiness of those persons by whom Traditions were handed down. He died A.H. 354 (A.C. 965), aged upwards of eighty years.

3 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Adī al-Jurjānī generally known by the surname of Abū al-Qaṭṭān (القطان) composed a work on the character of the Traditionists, and entitled it the Kāmil (complete). His authority as a doctor in Traditions stood very high. He died A.H. 365 (A.C. 975-6).

suspicious text in any of his relations. Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Bayhaqī says : "Abū Sa'īd informed us that Abu 'l-'Abbās<sup>1</sup> told him that he had heard al-Rabī' (No. 221) mention that al-Shāfi'ī said: 'Amongst the judges established in different regions, there were some who made witnesses swear by the Qur'ān; and that in my opinion, is approvable. Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin told me, on an authority which I do not recollect, that Ibn al-Zubayr<sup>2</sup> ordered witnesses to be sworn on the Qur'ān." Another doctor relates as follows: "Al-Shāfi'ī said: 'I saw Muṭarrif at Ṣan'ā, and he swore witnesses on the Qur'ān;' " and a third doctor says; "al-Shāfi'ī declared that he saw Ibn Māzin, who was qādī of Ṣan'ā, swear witnesses on the Qur'ān in order to corroborate their oath". Muṭarrif died at al-Raqqah, or at Manbij, by another account, towards the close of the khalīfate of Hārūn al-Rashīd. That sovereign died on the eve of Saturday, the 3rd of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 193 (24th March, A. C. 809), at Ṭūs, he commenced his reign on Friday, the 16th of the first Rabī', A. H. 176 (15th Sept., A. C. 786). Though this Muṭarrif does not rank with those celebrated individuals whom it was necessary for me to notice, I have been induced to do so because the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī (No. 5) says, in the Muḥadḍḥab, chapter on oaths, section on claims, paragraph on corroborating the oath: "And, if he makes the person swear by the sacred volume and its contents, we know that al-Shāfi'ī related, on the authority of Muṭarrif, that Ibn al-Zubayr swore persons on the Qur'ān, 'and,' said al-Shāfi'ī, 'I saw Muṭarrif at Ṣan'ā swearing persons on the Qur'ān which is approvable.' " Now, I remarked that juriconsult inquired who this Muṭarrif could be, and so little was known of him, that our master 'Imād al-Dīn Abu 'l-Majd Ismā'il Ibn Abi 'l-Barakāt Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn Abi 'l-Riḍā Ibn Bāṭish al-Mawsilī (No. 185), the Shāfi'ite doctor, made the following gross mistake concerning him in the work which he composed on the proper names of men mentioned in the Muḥadḍḥab and on the unusual terms which occur in that work: "Muṭarrif Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-

1 By Abū Sa'īd is meant al-Isṭakhrī (see No. 150) and, by Abu 'l-'Abbās, Ibn Surayj (No. 20) (MS. ancient fonds, No. 755., f. 63 verso).

2 Perhaps 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, the anti khalīf, is meant.

Shikhkhīr," says he, "died subsequently to the year 87," meaning of the Hijrah. There, by Allāh! is a wonder: a person who died at that period, how could he possibly have been seen by al-Shāfi'ī, who was born A. H. 150, sixty three years after Muṭarrif Ibn al-Shikhkhīr's death? I know not what could have led him into this mistake and had he not mentioned the date, people might have said: "He thought that al-Shāfi'ī met with him." I had brought down my article thus far when I found, in the Annals of Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Abd al-Bāqī Ibn Qānī' (No. 149, note) that Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin died in the year 191 (A.C. 806-7), which agrees with our statement that his death took place towards the end of the khalīfate of Hārūn al-Raṣhīd. For the first part of this article, as here given, I was indebted to the kindness of the shaykh and hāfiẓ Zakī al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-'Azīm al-Mundhīrī (No. 43, note); may God prolong his days for our advantage! The Muṭarrif mentioned by 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Bāṭish, bore the surname of Abū 'Abd Allāh; he was a jurisconsult and the son of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Shikhkhīr Ibn 'Awf Ibn Ka'b Ibn Waḥdān* Ibn Ḥarīsh Ibn Ka'b Ibn Rabī'ah Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'ṣa'ah Ibn Mu'āwīyah Ibn Bakr Ibn Manṣūr Ibn 'Ikrimah Ibn Khaṣafah Ibn Qays Ibn Ghaylān† Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān al-Ḥarīshī. His father 'Abd Allāh was one of the Prophet's Companions. Muṭarrif (Ibn 'Abd Allāh) was one of the most devout and pious of men; it is related that, in a dispute with an adversary, in the mosque of Baṣrah, he raised up his hands and exclaimed: "Almighty God! I beg of thee that thou deliver me from this man before he rise from his place!" He had not finished speaking when the man fell dead to the ground. Muṭarrif was taken before the qādī, but that officer said: "He did not kill him; he only prayed against him, and God answered his prayer." From that time, people stood in awe of his imprecations. He died A. H. 87 (A. C. 706), but other dates are given, and Ibn Qānī' says 95 (A. C. 713-4). God best knows the truth!

---

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Waḥdān.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives 'Aylān. See also Ibn Khallikān's observations regarding this name at the close of No. 697.—Ed.

696 QUṬB AL-DĪN AL-MARWAZĪ

Abū Maṣṣūr al-Muẓaffar Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥusayn Ardashīr Ibn Abi Maṣṣūr al-'Abbādī, surnamed Quṭb al-Dīn (axis of religion), and distinguished by the title of al-Amīr, was a pupil-orator and a native of Marw (Marwazī). As a preacher and an exhorter to piety, he displayed great abilities and expressed his thoughts in elegant terms. This talent he continued to cultivate from his early youth till an advanced age, and he excelled in it to such a degree that his merit became proverbial. He thus came to be considered as the paragon of the age, and his surpassing merit was universally acknowledged. Having gone to Baghdād, he resided there nearly three years, and, during that time, regular sittings were held to hear him preach. His character gained him the friendship of all classes, and the imām (khalīf) al-Muqtafi li Amr Allāh took him into particular favour. Being then sent from Baghdād on a mission to the court of the sultān Sinjar Ibn Malik Shāh the Saljuqid (No. 260), he proceeded to Khurāsān, and, on his return, he was despatched on another mission to Khūzistān. He died at 'Askar Mukram on Monday, the 29th of the latter Rabi' A. H. 547 (3rd August, A. C. 1152). His corpse was carried to Baghdād and buried within the enclosure which surrounds the grave of the holy shaykh al-Junayd Ibn Muḥammad (No. 140) in the Shunīzī cemetery. He was born in Ramadān, A. H. 491 (August, A. C. 1098). He learned a great quantity of Traditions at Naysābūr from Abū 'Alī Naṣr Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn 'Uthmān al-Khushanāmī, Abu 'Abd Allāh Ismā'il, the son of the ḥāfiẓ 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisī (No. 377), and other masters. Some Traditions were given on his authority by the ḥāfiẓ Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī (No. 370), who speaks of him in these terms: "The Traditions which he heard are all genuine, but his religious principles were mistrusted. I saw something in his conduct which gave me doubts, and I met with a treatise, in his own handwriting, wherein he essays to prove that it is lawful to drink wine; God pardon him and forgive us all!" His father Abu 'l-Ḥusayn was also known by the appellation of al-Amīr; he preached with elegance and led an exemplary life. His death occurred between the year 490 and 500 (A. C. 1097-1107). 'Abbādī, means belonging to Sinj 'Abbād, a large village in the vicinity of Marw. In the province of Marw also is another large village called Sinj, the native place of the juris-consult Abū 'Alī al-Sinjī (No. 176). These two villages are quite distinct and must not be confounded ; a number of masters in this branch of knowledge (the derivation of patronymics) have already given a similar caution.

697 MUWAFFAQ AL-DĪN MUẒAFFAR

Abu 'l-'Izz Muẓaffar Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Jamā'ah Ibn Alī Ibn Shāmī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Nāhid Ibn 'Abd al-Razzāq al-'Aylānī, surnamed Muwaffaq al-Dīn (favoured in his religion), was a member of the Ḥanbalite sect, a native of Egypt, an able philologist, prosodian, and poet. He composed a short treatise on prosody, which testifies, by its excellence, the acute intelligence of the author, and he left a dīwān of charming poetry. He was a blind man, and in one of his pieces, he says :

“ ‘You are in love’ said they, ‘and yet you are blind !’ You love a dark-eyed nymph with rosy lips, yet you never saw the charms of her person ; you cannot then say that they captivated your imagination. Her image never fled round you in your dreams ; it never approached your couch ; whence then has it sent, invisible to you, an arrow into your heart ? By what means have you been enabled to describe her beauty in prose and verse ?’ I replied : ‘ In love I am like Moses ; I feel and am silent<sup>1</sup> : I love through the medium of my ears, though I never saw the figure of her whom you name.”

As one thing brings on another, these verses remind me of the following piece, composed also by a blind man :

“ A maiden said to her companions : ‘ How strange a being is that blind man ! can he love an object which he never saw ’ ?

---

1 Literally : I am Mosaic in love, by silence and comprehension. I find nothing in the Qur'ān to which this can allude : it may perhaps refer to some anecdote respecting fūsa al-Kāzīm, an imām whose life will be found in No. 719.

With tears gushing from my eyes, I replied : ' Though my eyes never saw her person, yet her image exists in my imagination.' "

This thought is similar to that which Muḥaddhab al-Dīn 'Umar Ibn Muḥammad, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Shīḥnah,* a philologer and poet of some celebrity, who was a native of Moṣul, inserted in a long qasidah composed by him in praise of the sultān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Ayyūb. The verse to which we allude is the following:

" I am a man who loved you on hearing of your virtues; the ear, like the eye, is sensible to love."

The author took this thought from a verse of the poet Baḥshār Ibn Burd (No. 110), who said :

" O my friends ! my ear is in love with a person of that tribe : the ear is sometimes enamoured previously to the eye."

The wazīr Ṣafī al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī, who was generally known by the surname of Ibn Shukr (No. 88, note) had set out from Syria with the intention of returning to Egypt, and his friends went forth to meet him as far as the station of Khashabi<sup>1</sup> near al-'Abbāsah<sup>2</sup> and Muẓaffar, the subject of this article, wrote to him the following lines to excuse himself from not having gone forth like the others :

" They said : ' We are hastening to al-Khashabi<sup>3</sup> that we who are his pensioners, may meet the wazīr; yet you, blind men ! do not set out.' I replied : ' I stay behind not through fear of fatigue, but because my heart burns, in desolation for his absence. and I dread lest that fire and al-Khashabi may come together. ' "

1 Al-Khashabi was situated on the road leading from Cairo to Syria, at the distance of three stations from Fuṣṭāṭ (Marāṣid).

2 The town of 'Abbāsah (No. 209) lay at 15 parasangs from Cairo, on the road to Syria (Marāṣid).

3 Here in the original Arabic is a fault against prosody. The poet pronounced al-Khashabi, whereas the true pronunciation, according to the Marāṣid, is al-Khashabiyy.

4 Khashabi, in Arabic, signifies any thing made of wood.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : al-Shaykh.—Ed.

This is a trite idea, but the manner in which it is here employed renews its beauty. One of his disciples told me that a person said to Muẓaffar: "I saw in one of Abu 'l-'Ala al-Ma'arri's (No. 46) compositions the following passage<sup>1</sup>, and I wish to know what is the measure and whether it be one verse only or more than one: I should also like to be informed if the verses terminate in the same rhyme or not." Muẓaffar reflected for some time and returned a satisfactory answer. On hearing these words, I said to the relator of the anecdote: "Wait a moment till I examine the passage and don't tell me Muẓaffar's answer." I then perceived that it was a majzū<sup>2</sup> branch of the rujuz measure, that the verses terminated in a consonant not followed by a vowel, that the passage consisted of four verses rhyming in l, and that it was versified in a manner which prosodians admit of. Persons unacquainted with the science of prosody would not perceive that the words form verses, because, the separation between them falls on letters which are united to those that follow. To render this evident, it is necessary to give the verses here in their proper form:

"May God favour thee! thou must come to-day to our solitary abode, so that we may renew our acquaintance with thee, O ornament of friends! for it is not a man like thee that would change or neglect an old friendship."

Prosodians quote these verses as a puzzle, not as a form of versification usually employed. Having discovered the solution of the difficulty, I submitted it to that person, and he replied: "Such was also the answer given by Muẓaffar the blind." The following anecdote was related by the shaykh Zākī al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-'Azīm Ibn 'Abd al-Qawī al-Mundhirī, the Egyptian Traditionist (No. 43, note): "The learned Muwaffaq al-Dīn Muẓaffar, the blind poet of Egypt, told me that having gone to visit al-Qāḍī 'l-Sa'id Ibn Sanā al-Mulk"—I shall give the life of this person; his real name was Hibat Allāh,—"the latter said

---

1 I omit the Arabic text of the passage, as it is to be found in the two printed editions; its meaning is given lower down.

2 In prosody, a distich is called majzū when a foot is suppressed in each hemistich.

to him: 'Learned scholar! I have composed the first hemistich of a verse, but cannot finish it, although it has occupied my mind for some days!' Muẓaffar asked to hear what he had composed, and the other recited as follows:

"(Bayāḍu 'idhārī min sawādī 'idhārīhi). The whiteness of my beard proceeds from the blackness of her ringlets."

"On hearing these words, Muẓaffar replied that he had found their completion, and recited as follows:

'(Kamā jalla nāri flhi min jullanārihi) even as the flame with which I burn for her acquired its intensity from her pomegranate-flower (her rosy cheeks).'

Al-Sa'id approved of the addition and commenced another verse on the same model, but Muẓaffar said to himself: 'I must rise and be off, or else he will make the entire piece at the expense of my wits.' " Those anecdotes have drawn us from our subject, but one word brings on another. Muẓaffar was born at Old Cairo, on the 24th of the latter Jumādā, A. H. 544 (29th Oct., A.C. 1149); and he died on Saturday morning, the 9th of Muḥarram, A. H. 623 (10th Jan., A. C. 1226). He was interred the next day, at the foot of Mount Muqaṭṭam. 'Aylānī means belonging to Qays 'Aylān, or Qays the son of 'Aylān<sup>1</sup> Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān. Those who call him Qays 'Aylān do not agree as to signification of 'Aylān; some say that it was the name of a horse belonging to Qays, who was therefore called the Qays of 'Aylān; others say that it was the name of his dog, whilst others again tell us that 'Aylān was a man who brought up Qays in his childhood. According to those who make this statement Qays was named Qays 'Aylān because there was a person contemporary with him who bore the name of Qays Kubbah (the Qays of Kubbah), which Kubbah was a horse that he possessed: therefore each of them was called after an object belonging to him, in order to distinguish him from the other. God knows best! Some state that Qays 'Aylān's real name was al-Nās, and that he was the brother of al-Yās, one of the Prophet's ancestors.

---

1 I may add that some authors write Ghaylān in place of 'Aylān.

698 MU'ĀDH IBN MUSLIM AL-HARRĀ

Abū Muslim Mu'ādh Ibn Muslim al-Harrā, a grammarian of Kūfah, was mawlā to Muḥammad Ibn Ka'b al-Qaraḏī<sup>1</sup>. Al-Kisā'i (No. 408) studied Qur'ān-reading under him and delivered some Traditions on his authority. Numerous anecdotes are told of his (al-Harrā's) Qur'ān-readings. He composed a great number of grammatical treatises, none of which were ever published. He professed Shī'ite doctrines, and left some poetry, such as grammarians may compose. The advanced age to which he lived fixed the attention of his contemporaries; he had great grand-children, but all his descendants died before him. A secretary of his relates as follows: "When I was in the service of Mu'ādh Ibn Muslim, a man one day asked him his age. He replied: sixty-three years. Two years later, the same person repeated his question and received the same answer. On this, I said to Mu'ādh: 'I have been with thee for the last one and twenty years, and every time thou hast been asked thy age, thou repliest, sixty-three years.' To this observation he merely answered: 'Wert thou to be with me one and twenty years more, thou wouldst never hear from me any other answer'<sup>2</sup>". It is related by 'Uthmān Ibn Abi Shaybah<sup>3</sup> that he saw Mu'ādh Ibn Muslim and remarked that his teeth had been secured with gold fastenings on account of his advanced age. Speaking of him, the celebrated poet Abu 'l-Sari Sahl Ibn Abi Ghālib al-Khazrajī<sup>4</sup> said:

1 Al-Qaraḏī (القرطبي) means a dealer in qaraḏ: Karaḏ is the name given to the leaves of the salam tree, a material used in tanning. According to the Nujūm, Muḥammad Ibn Ka'b al-Qaraḏī died A.H. 117 (A.C. 735) or A.H. 120. He was a Traditionist.

2 Muḥammad commenced his prophetic mission at forty and died at sixty-three, the age after which, according to the Muslims, the mental faculties begin to decline: Ibn Muslim had therefore a motive for not making himself older.

3 The ḥāfiẓ 'Uthmān Ibn Abi Shaybah, a native of Kūfah, died A.H. 239 (A.C. 853-4). He composed a commentary on the Qur'ān, and a musnad, or collection of Traditions. Thirty thousand persons are stated to have attended his lessons. (Mir'at al-Zamān.)

4 Our author speaks of this poet at the end of the present article.

"Mu'adh Ibn Muslim is a man to whose existence no limit has been fixed. Time has grown hoary with age, yet the raiment of Mu'adh's life is still new. Tell Mu'adh, when you meet him, that eternity is vexed to see him live so long. O first-born of Eve! how long wilt thou live? how long, O Lubad! wilt thou proudly sweep along in the robe of life? The tent of Adam has fallen to ruin, but thou remainest like one of its pickets. When thou hearest that the ravens are dead (of old age), thou mayest then inquire what headache and weakness of sight may be; full of health, thou stalkest about like an ostrich in thy double cloak, and art as active as fire. Thou wert a companion of Noah's; and, when grown an aged man whose sons had children, you broke in the mule, of Dhu 'l-Qarnayn. Go on then and leave us; death shall be thy end, though eternity sustain the column of thy existence."

As for the words, How long, O Lubad, etc., we may state that Lubad was the last of the eagles of Luqmān Ibn Ā'ād. This Luqmān of whom God hath spoken in His Holy Book<sup>2</sup>, was sent by his people the 'Ādites, that he might pray for rain into the sacred territory of Makkah. When the 'Ādites perished, Luqmān was given the choice of living as long as seven dun heifers<sup>3</sup> or as long as seven eagles<sup>4</sup>, each of which, when it died, was to be succeeded by another. He chose the eagles, and, having taken a young one as it came out of the shell, he reared it and it lived for eighty years. On the death of the sixth eagle, he took a seventh, called Lubad. When Lubad grew old and unable to fly, Luqmān used to say to him: "Rise (and depart), O Lubad!" On the death of Lubad, Luqmān died also. The Arabs (of the desert) make frequent allusions to Lubad in their poems: it is thus that al-Nābighah al-Dhubayānī<sup>5</sup> says:

1 A little lower down, the author tells us who, or rather what Lubad was.

2 Qur'an, sūrah 31, verse 11.

3 The right reading appears نمرات (pellets of gazelle's dung). See the Qāmūs under the word نمر, and de Sacy's Chrestomathie Ar. tome II, p. 432.

4 The word nasr signifies eagle and vulture.

5 M. de Sacy has given a notice on al-Nābighah al-Dhubayānī in his Chrestomathie, tome. II. p. 410.

"That abode has become desolate and its inhabitants have removed: it was destroyed by that agent (time) which destroyed Lubad."

Let us return to our subject. Mu'adh pronounced the following lines on the death of his sons and grandchildren :

"What can he hope for in life who has consumed, of his past existence, ninety years? The ties which bound him to them (his children) are dissolved, and time has forced him to swallow the bitterest of woes. Yet he must drink of the same pond (death) as they have done, even were his life prolonged yet more."

An intimate friendship subsisted between Mu'adh and al-Kumayt Ibn Zayd<sup>1</sup> the celebrated poet: Muḥammad Ibn Sahl, the person who published by oral transmission the poems of al-Kumayt, relates as follows: Al-Ṭirimmāh<sup>2</sup> the poet went to Khālīd Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Qasrī (No. 204), who was then at Wāsiṭ, and recited to him a poem which he had composed in his praise. Khālīd

---

1 Coumait, fils de Zayd, issu d'Adnan par Acad Ibn Khozayma, poète très-distingué, dont le prénom était Abou 'l-Moustahill المستهيل, florissait sous les Omeyyades et mourut avant l'avènement des Abbassides, auxquels il était très-attaché. Ses poésies composées en l'honneur de la famille de Hachem, et nommées pour cette raison Hachemiyyat, sont comptées parmi ses Oeuvres les plus remarquables. Pendant toute sa vie, il ne cessa de célébrer la gloire des poètes issus d'Adnan et de faire la guerre aux poètes de la race de Cahtan, excepté cependant Tirimmah, dont il était l'ami intime, malgré la différence de leur origine et de leurs opinions politiques, religieuses et littéraires. Coumait habitait Coufa, où il tint quelque temps une école d'enfants. Il a fait beaucoup de vers à la louange d'Abban, fils de Walid, de la tribu de Badjila. Coumait était né à l'épouse de la mort de Hossayn, fils d'Ally en l'année 61 de l'hégire. Il mourut sous le khalifat de Merwan Ibn Mohammad (Merwan II), en l'année 126. Il fut entermé dans un lieu voisin de Coufa, nommé mekran, qui est devenu depuis le cimetière des Benou Acad. (Aḡḥānī III, 463-471). A. Caussin de Perceval.

2 Ṭirimmāh fils de Hakim, issu de Cahtan par Tay, est un des bons poètes du premier siècle de l'islamisme. Il avait été élevé à Damas; il alla ensuite à Coufa avec les troupes syriennes, et s'établit en cette ville. Il embrassa la secte des Azareka. Il a fait des vers à la louange de Khaled, fils d'Abdallah el Kasry. Il fréquentait le poète Rouba et surtout le poète Coumait, fils de Zayd, avec lequel il était intimement lié. (Aḡḥānī III, 66.) A. Caussin de Perceval.

ordered him a present of thirty thousand dirhams, and arrayed him in two mantles of figured silk and of inestimable value. When al-Kumayt heard of the circumstance, he resolved on going to Khālīd with a poem composed in his praise, but Mu'ādh Ibn Muslim al-Harrā said to him: "Do not; You are by no means like al-Ṭirimmāh; he is the son of Khālīd's uncle, and other differences exist between you: you are a Muḍarite, and Khālīd is a Yamanite strongly prejudiced against the descendants of Muḍar; you are a Shī'ite and he is a partisan of the Umayyads; you are a native of 'Irāq and he is a Syrian." Al-Kumayt refused to take his advice and persevered in the intention of visiting Khālīd. When he arrived; the Yamanites said to Khālīd: "Al-Kumayt has come, he who attacked us in his qaṣīdah which rhymes in n, and in it glorified his people at our expense." Khālīd, in consequence, cast him into prison, observing that it was right to do so with a man who molested people by satirical attacks. Al-Mu'ādh learned with regret what had happened, and pronounced the following lines.

"I gave you good advice, but counsels which thwart the inclinations of him to whom they are addressed, are seldom well received. You acted against an advice in which you would have found your welfare, and of a sudden, between you and your hopes, misfortune intervened. The contrary of your expectations occurred to cross you, and brought with it a long share of affliction."

When al-Kumayt heard these lines, he wrote the following verse to Mu'ādh:

"You appear to me like one who adds water to the ocean; who makes a trade of bearing sand to the desert of Yabrin."

To this he added: "The judgment has fallen upon me; what resource is now left?" Mu'ādh advised him to try and escape from prison, because Khālīd would assuredly put him to death; he in consequence disguised himself in the clothes of his wife, who came to him regularly with food, and, passing himself off for her, he left the prison and took refuge with Maslamah Ibn 'Abd al-Mālik<sup>1</sup>, whose protection he implored and to whom he addressed the following lines:

<sup>1</sup> The amīr Maslamah, son of the khālīf 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, died A.H. 122 (A.C. 739-40). (Nujūm).

"I passed through (the gate) to reach you, as the arrow of Ibn Muqbil passed through (the target)<sup>1</sup>; (escaping thus) from contention and constraint. I wore the dress of a female, but underneath I bore a determined heart, (prompt to act) like the sword drawn from the scabbard<sup>2</sup>."

It was thus that he escaped from Khālīd. Mu'ādh being asked the date of his birth, replied that he was born in the reign of Yazīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, or in that of 'Abd al-Malik. Now, Yazīd succeeded to the khālifate on the death of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, in the month of Rajab, A. H. 101 (Jan.-Feb., A. C. 720), and he died in the month of Sha'bān, A. H. 105 (January, A. C. 724): his father 'Abd al-Malik succeeded to the khālifate on the death of his father Marwān, in the month of Ramaḍān, A. H. 65 (April-May, A. C. 685), and he died in the month of Shawwāl, A. H. 86 (Sept.-Oct., A. C. 705). Mu'ādh's birth lies therefore between these limits: he died A.H. 190 (A. C. 805-6), or, according to some, in the year the Barmakids were overthrown, namely, A. H. 187 (A. C. 803), and this statement is the more correct. He was surnamed Abū Muslim, but, having got a son whom he called 'Alī, he assumed the surname of Abū 'Alī. Harrā, with a long final a, means a dealer in the cloth of Hirāt and such was the trade of Mu'ādh. The poet Abu 'l-Sarī, author of the piece of verse quoted in this article, was brought up in Sijistān; he pretended to have been suckled by the genii (jinn) and to have been incorporated in that class of beings. He composed a work on the genii, their government, genealogy, and poetry, and he pretended that he had made them take the oath of fidelity to al-Amin, the son of Hārūn al-Rashīd, as successor to the throne. This obtained for him the favour of Hārūn al-Rashīd, al-Amin, and Zubaydah, al-Amin's mother, and, by his interest with them, he gained considerable wealth. He left some good poetry which he gave as having been uttered by genii, demons (shayāṭīn), and sa'ālī (female demons). Al-Rashīd once said to him, "If thou sawest what thou hast described, thou hast

1 This proverbial expression, the origin of which I do not recollect, is not noticed by al-Maydānī.

2 Literally: resembling the drawing of the blade.

seen wonders; if not, thou hast composed an instructive piece of literature." His whole history is a series of marvellous and strange anecdotes.

699 AL-MU'ĀFĀ IBN ZAKARIYĀ

The Qāḍī Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā Ibn Zakariyā Ibn Yahyā Ibn Ḥumayd Ibn Ḥammād Ibn Dāwūd al-Nahrawānī, surnamed Ibn Ṭarārā al-Jarirī, was a jurisconsult, a philologist, a poet, a learned scholar, versed in every branch of science. He held the post of qāḍī in that quarter of Baghḍād called Bāb al-Ṭāq, exercising the functions of that place as deputy to the qāḍī Ibn Ṣabr. Traditions were delivered by him on the authority of some eminent masters, such as Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Baghawī (No. 130, note), Abū Bakr Ibn Abī Dāwūd (No. 254), Yahyā Ibn Sa'id (No. 543, note), Abū Sa'id al-'Adawī, and Abū Ḥāmid Muḥammad Ibn Hārūn al-Ḥaḍramī<sup>1</sup>. One of the teachers from whom he received his philological information was Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Arafah Ibn Niṣṭawayh (No. 11), and (Traditional information) was transmitted from him to later students by Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Azharī, the qāḍī Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabari (No. 544) doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect. Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī al-Thawrī, Aḥmad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Rawḥ, and others. Aḥmad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Rawḥ relates as follows: Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā went to the house of a certain ra'īs<sup>2</sup>, and found a number, of the literati and philologists assembled there. They asked him what branch of science he felt inclined to discuss with them, and he addressed the ra'īs in these terms: "Your library contains treatises on all the branches of knowledge and of literature; will you be pleased to send your boy there and let him open the door and bring us the first book he lays his hand on; you will then examine the subject of which it treats, and that subject we shall discuss." "This," says

1 This traditionist died A.H. 321 (A.C. 933), (Nujūm.)

2 See No. 648, note, and No. 325, note. The word ra'īs now signifies captain of a vessel.

Ibn Rawḥ, "proves that Abu 'l-Faraj was acquainted with all the sciences." Abū Muḥammad al-Bāfi<sup>1</sup> used to say: "When the qāḍī Abu 'l-Faraj is present, we have with us all the sciences." He said also: "Were a man to devise one third of his property to the most learned of men, it should be delivered over to Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā." Al-Mu'āfā was a sure and trustworthy transmitter of traditional information. He composed some good poetry, and the following piece is given as his by Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī.

"Say to him who envies me: 'Do you know whom you offend by your conduct? you offend God in finding fault with what he did; for you are not pleased at what God hath bestowed upon me. My God therefore punish you in giving me an increase (of knowledge) and excluding him from every path by which knowledge may be reached.'"

The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzī (No. 5) mentions him with commendation in the Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā, and then adds these words: "Abū 'Alī 'l-Dāwūdī, the Qāḍī of our city states that the following verses were recited to him by Abu 'l-Faraj as his own:

"Shall I seek to obtain light from the cloud, or water from the mirage? I ask of vile fortune to lavish on me its favours, and I am sated with the fruit of bitterness. And yet I hope with longing desire to meet the best of men in the worst of ages<sup>2</sup>."

The following piece is by al-Mu'āfā:

"The Lord of the universe is bound to provide for me; why then should I submit myself as a slave to the world! Before I was created, he who formed me, may His name be glorified! fixed my

---

1 The manuscripts read erroneously al-Baḥrī الباهي instead of al-Bāfi البافي* Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Bāfi al-Khūwārazmī (native of the village of Bāf, in the province of Khūwārizm or Khārizm) was highly distinguished as a jurisconsult, a poet, and a literary scholar. He succeeded al-Dārakī (No. 360) as professor at Baḥḥadād, and died in the year 398 (A.C. 1007-8). (Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā, autographic manuscript belonging to the Bibliothèque impériale, No. 755, fol. 77 verso).

2 Literally: In the age of dogs.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd hives: al-Bāji.—Ed.

share of adversity and prosperity. When rich, liberality and beneficence are my companions; when poor, my companion is meekness. As I am unable to repel the favours of God, so is all my intelligence unable to attract them."

It is stated that he composed these lines in imitation of the following by 'Alī Ibn al-Jahm (No. 437):

"Be assured that idleness is not always hurtful, and that application is not always useful. Since the provision God has allotted you will reach you equally soon, be you at home or abroad, enjoy the pleasure of repose."

A singular coincidence (of names) is thus related by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī (No. 590) in his al-Jam' bayn al-Ṣaḥīḥayn: he there says: I read the following anecdote in the handwriting of Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā Ibn Zakariyā al-Nahrawānī: "I made the pilgrimage one year, and, being at Mina on one of the three days which follow the Day of the Sacrifice, I heard a person call out: 'Ho! Abu 'l-Faraj!' I said to myself: He perhaps means me; but then I reflected that many persons bore the surname of Abu 'l-Faraj, and that some other individual might be meant. When the man found that no one answered him, he called out again: 'Ho! Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā!' I was on the point of answering when I reflected that there might exist another man named al-Mu'āfā and surnamed Abu Faraj; so I said nothing, and the same person shouted out a third time: 'Ho! Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā Ibn Zakariyā al-Nahrawānī!' 'Oh!' said I to myself, there can be no doubt but that he calls me; he mentions my name, my surname, the name of my father, and the name of the town to which I belong; I therefore, answered; 'Here I am; what do you want'? He replied 'You are perhaps from al-Nahrawān in the East'? I answered that I was, on which he observed that the Nahrawān which he meant lay in the West. I was much struck with all these coincidences and I learned that there was a place in Maghrib called al-Nahrawān, quite different from the Nahrawān which is in 'Irāq!'" Abu 'l-Faraj al-Mu'āfā composed a number of instructive works on literary and other subjects. He is the author of the book entitled Al-Jalis wa 'l-Anis (the companion and friend). His birth took place on Thursday the 8th of the month of Rajab, 303 (January, A.C. 916)*, or 305 according to another statement. He died on Monday, the 18th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 390 (19th November, A.C. 1000), at Nahrawān. Ṭarārū is written with a final ā (ا) but some persons replace this letter by a (ة) Al-Jarīrī means related to Muḥammad Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī, the imām of whom we have already spoken. Abu 'l-Faraj received this surname because he had accepted and followed implicitly the religious opinions taught by al-Ṭabarī who, as we have already stated (No. 544), was a mujtahid imām and the founder of a particular sect. He had a great number of disciples, many of whom adopted his system of doctrine, and one of these was Abu 'l-Faraj. As we have already spoken of Nahrawān (No. 164), we need not repeat our observations here.

---

1 This anecdote is curious enough, but, unfortunately for its authenticity, no place of that name exists in Maġhrib.

700 AL-MU'IZZ LI-DĪN ALLĀH

Abū Tamīm Ma'add, surnamed al-Mu'izz li-Dīn Allāh (the exalter of God's religion), was the son of al-Manṣūr, the son of al-Qā'im, the son of al-Mahdī 'Ubayd Allāh. We have already spoken of his father (No. 95), of his grandfather (No. 659) and of his great grandfather (No. 332) and given a sketch of their history. Al-Mu'izz received from the people, in the lifetime of his father, the oath of fealty as heir to the throne. The oath was renewed to him after his father's death and on the date mentioned in our article on that prince. Having then taken into his hands the direction of affairs, he governed the state remarkably well. On Sunday, the 7th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah 341 (25th April, A.C. 953), he took his seat on the throne of the empire, so that the grantees and a great number of the people might do him homage. They saluted him with the title of khalif, on which he assumed the surname of al-Mu'izz, without shewing any sorrow for the death of his father.

* 18 January.—Ed.

Having then set out to visit the provinces of Ifrīqiyah and provide for their welfare and tranquillity, he subdued the rebels in these countries, chose from among his pages and followers those whose ability and intelligence he had appreciated and confided to them the government of his (towns and) districts. To each of them he furnished a numerous troop of militia and men at arms. He then placed a large army under the orders of Abu 'l-Ḥasan Jawhar, the qā'id of whom we have spoken under the letter J (No. 141) and sent him to subdue all the countries of Maghrib which had refused obedience. Jawhar went to Fez and from that to Sijilmāssah. Having taken these cities, he marched towards the ocean which environs the world, caught, some fish therein, put them into jars filled with water and sent them to al-Mu'izz. He then returned to his master, bringing with him as prisoners, in an iron cage, the sovereigns of Fez and Sijilmāssah. A full account of that expedition would be too long to relate; let it suffice to say that the qā'id did not return to al-Mu'izz until he had solidly established that prince's authority in those countries and chastised the disobedient and the refractory. (He vanquished them everywhere he met them), from the door (or capital) of Ifrīqiyah to the ocean, in the West, and from the same capital as far as the provinces of Egypt, in the East. There remained not a spot in all these regions wherein the sovereignty of al-Mu'izz had not been proclaimed; in every one of them, the Friday prayer was offered up in his name by the congregation, with the sole exception of Sibtah (Ceuta), which city remained in the possession of the Umayyad sovereigns who ruled in Spain. When al-Mu'izz was informed of the death of Kāfūr al-Ikhshīdī (No. 520), who was governor of Egypt, as we have already stated, al-Mu'izz ordered Jawhar to make preparations for marching into that country. Jawhar, before going, made an expedition towards the West, in order to settle matters there. He took with him an immense army, assembled all the Arab tribes that were to accompany him to Egypt, and collected from the Barbarians five hundred thousand dinārs of taxes which they owed for territories granted to them by government. When the winter season arrived, al-Mu'izz set out for al-Mahdiyyah and caused five hundred camel-loads of dinārs to be transported from the palaces of his forefathers to his own. On Sunday, the 27th of Muḥarram, A.H. 358 (21st Dec.

A.C. 968), Jawhar came back, bringing to al-Mu'izz troops and money, and then received the order to set out for Egypt. He took with him a great number of tribes (both Arabic and Barbar). In our article on Jawhar we have given the date of his departure and that of his arrival in Egypt, so we need not repeat them here. Al-Mu'izz spent on the army which accompanied Jawhar so great a sum of money that the donatives (in some cases) amounted to one thousand dīnārs (a man) and were never less than twenty. The soldiers being thus enriched by his gifts, laid out their money at Qayrawān and Šabrah<sup>1</sup>, in purchasing whatever they stood in need of. Jawhar departed with the army and took with him one thousand camels loaded with money and arms. The quantity of cavalry and ammunitions was immense. Dearth and pestilence had prevailed in Egypt that year and carried off, it is said, (six hundred thousand persons in the capital and the provinces. On the 15th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 358 (2nd of August, A.C. 969), al-Mu'izz received intelligence of the conquest of Egypt by his troops. Some time after, the dromedary express arrived with a dispatch containing an account of the conquest. Jawhar wrote repeatedly to al-Mu'izz, requesting him in the most pressing terms to come to Egypt, and soon after, he informed him by a courier that Egypt, Syria and Hījāz were brought into perfect order and that the prayer was offered up in his name throughout all those countries. This news gave al-Mu'izz the utmost satisfaction and, as soon as his authority was consolidated in Egypt, he set out, after naming Bulukkin Ibn Ziri Ibn Manād (No. 116) as his lieutenant governor in Ifriqiyah. He took with him an immense sum of money and a number of very influential and powerful chiefs. He started from al-Manšūriyah<sup>2</sup>, the seat of his empire, on Monday, the 21st of Shawwāl, A.H. 361 (5th August, A.C. 972) and proceeded to Sardāniyah<sup>3</sup> where he stopped in order to rally his officers,

1 Šabrah was one of the suburbs of Qayrawān.

2 The name of al-Manšūriyah was given to Šabrah by Ismā'il al-Manšūr, the third Fātimid Khalif. Al-Barqī's Description de l'Afrique septentrionale, p. 64).

3 Al-Bakrī places Sardāniyah near Jalūlā, which place is about 24 miles from Qayrawān. Sardāniyah was so called because a number of Christians, followers and all those who were to accompany him. Whilst at that station he ratified Bulukkīn's nomination, the date of which has been already given in his biographical notice. He departed thence on Thursday, the 5th of Šafar 362 (15th Nov., A.C. 972) and continued his march, halting at certain places for a few days and, at other times, proceeding with great speed. On his way, he passed through Barqah and entered Alexandria on Saturday, the 23rd Ša'bān of the same year (29th May, A.C. 973). He went in on horse-back and proceeded to the bath. Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad, qādī of Mišr (Old Cairo), accompanied by the chief men of the country waited on him (in Alexandria) and offered him their salutations. He held a sitting near the light-house, in order to receive them and, addressing to them a long speech, he said that he had come to Egypt, not for the purpose of augmenting his dominions and his wealth but of maintaining the true faith, protecting pilgrims and making war against the infidels. He declared his resolution to close his life in the exercise of good works and to act in conformity with the orders he had received from his ancestor, the Prophet (Muḥammad). He then preached to them and made a long exhortation which drew tears from some of those who were present; after which, he arrayed the qādī and other persons of the assembly in robes of honour, made each of them a present of a horse (or mule), ready harnessed, and dismissed them. Towards the end of the month of Ša'bān, he left Alexandria and, on Saturday, the 2nd of Ramaḍān (6th June, A.C. 973) he stopped at Mīnā, which is the wharf of Mišr, opposite Jizah. The qā'id Jawhar went forth to meet him and, on drawing near, dismounted (from his horse) and kissed the ground before him. The wazīr Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt, of whom we have given some account under the letter J (No. 130) had also an interview, at al-Jizah, with al-Mu'izz, who remained there three days. The army prepared for crossing the river to the wharf of Mišr, with their baggage, and, on Tuesday, the 5th of Ramaḍān,—or, by another account, on the 7th whom the Musulmāns had carried off from the site of Sardāniyah, were permitted to settle there. Another colony of the same people existed in the neighbourhood of Tūzar. (Al-Bakrī, p. 78; Ibn Khaldūn's Historie des Berbers, vol. III, p. 156, of my translation).

(Continued on page 281)

---

(Continued from page 280)

of that month, al-Mu'izz passed the Nile and proceeded to al-Qāhirah (Cairo), without entering Miṣr (Old Cairo), although the inhabitants had adorned the streets of the city, thinking he would visit it. On the other hand, the people of Cairo had made no preparations for his reception, as they supposed that he would, first of all, go to Miṣr. On arriving at Cairo, he went to the Castle and entered a hall of audience where he fell prostrate in adoration of almighty God. He then said a prayer of two rak'ahs<sup>1</sup> and dismissed the company. It was after al-Mu'izz that Cairo received the surname of al Mu'izziyah (the Muizzian), this city having been built for him by the qā'id Jawhar. On Friday, the 17th of Muḥarram 364 (7th Oct., A.C. 974), al-Mu'izz took away from Jawhar the superintendence of the government offices, the collectorship of the revenue and the direction of all other public affairs. In our article on the sharīf 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭabāṭabā (No. 317) we stated that, in a conversation with al-Mu'izz, he questioned him about his genealogy, and we gave that sovereign's answer; we mentioned also what he was bold enough to do on his return to the Castle. Al-Mu'izz was highly intelligent, resolute and lofty-minded, an accomplished scholar, and a good astronomer (or astrologer). The following piece of verse is said to be his :

"See what those eyes have wrought upon us from beneath those hoods ! They are more cutting and more piercing to the soul than daggers to the throat. Between them all I am as much fatigued as a proscrip<sup>t</sup> flying under a mid-day sun."

These lines also are said to be his :

"Beauty, rising in your forehead like a sun, looked down on roses of your cheeks, and thy loveliness, fearing that these roses might fade in that parching heat, spread over them thy hair as a shade."

This is a fine and original idea. We have already given an article on his son Tamīm (No. 122) and some specimens of his poetry. We shall speak of his (other) son, al-'Azīz Nizār, under the letter N. Al-Mu'izz was born at al-Mahdiyyah, on Monday, the 11th of Ramaḍān 319 (27th Sept, A.C. 931) ; he died at Cairo on Friday, the 15th, or as some say the 13th of the second Rabi' 365 (20th Dec., A.C. 975), or, by another account, the 7th of that month<sup>1</sup>.

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 270, note.

701 AL-MUSTANŠIR BI-ALLĀH

Abū Tamīm Ma'add, surnamed al-Mustanšir Bi-Allāh (the invoker of God's assistance), was the son of al-Zāhir li-l'zāz Dīn Allāh, the son of al-Hākīm, the son of al-'Azīz, the son of al-Mu'izz li-Dīn Allāh, him whose biography we have just given. The rest of his ancestors we have already mentioned. He was proclaimed sovereign on Sunday, the 15th of Sha'bān 427 (14th June, A.C. 1036), after the death of his father. During his reign a number of events took place the like of which never occurred in the reign of any other prince of that family, either before or after him. Such, for instance, was the affair of Abu 'l-Hārith Arslān al-Basāsiri (No. 78) who, having acquired great power and influence in Baghdād, substituted in the public prayer (khutbah)<sup>2</sup> the name of al-Mustanšir for that of the imām (and 'Abbasid khalif) al-Qā'im. This took place in the year 450 (A.C. 1058). During twelve months the khutbah was recited, in the name al-Mustanšir from all the pulpits of Baghdād. Another remarkable occurrence was the revolt of 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṣulayhī who, having become master of Yaman in the manner we have already related (No. 459) had prayers offered up for al-Mustanšir from all the pulpits of that country, immediately after the khutbah. This event is so well-known that details are unnecessary. Another extraordinary fact was that he reigned sixty years, which was more than any member of the 'Abbasid family or of his own ever did. Another strange thing was his being raised to the sovereignty at the age of seven years. Another was that, from the time his ancestor al-Mahdī obtained the supreme power till the days of al-Mu'izz,—see the preceding article,—the prayer had been always offered up in Maghrib for the Fātimids; when al-Mu'izz set out for Egypt, he appointed Bulukkin Ibn Zīrī as his lieutenant in that country, and khutbah continued to be said there as usual (for the Fātimid dynasty); but al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, of whom we shall give some account (No. 703) put a stop to the practice. This happened in the year 443 (A.C. 1051-2), during the reign of al-Mustanşir. The author of the History of Qayrawān<sup>1</sup> gives the year 435 as the date of this event; <sup>2</sup> but God knows best. In the year 439 (A.C. 1047) the names of al-Mustanşir and of his ancestors were replaced in the khutbah, at Makkah and at Madinah, by that of al-Muqtadī<sup>3</sup>, the khalif of Baghdād; but an account of this would lead us too far. Another extraordinary thing happened during al-Mustanşir's reign: a great famine, the like of which had never

<sup>1</sup> For a fuller account of the life of this sovereign consult the Vie d' el-Moezz by Quatremere (Journal asiatique de 1837), and the Histoire des Berbers, tome II, passim.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 78, note on khutbah.

1 The history of Qayrawān has been written by the following authors: 1st, Ibn al-Rāqīq, who was still living in the year 341 (A.C. 952); 2nd, Ibn al-Jazzār, who, according to the Bayyān al-Mūghrib, died in 369 (A.C. 979), or, according to Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, in 395 (A.C. 1004-5); 3rd, Ibn Raṣṣīq, who died in Sicily in the year 463 (A.C. 1070-1); 4th, Ibn Ṣhaddād the Ṣanhāiyan, who died in 501 (A.C. 1107-8); 5th, Ibn Ḥammād, whose work is cited by Ibn Khaldūn, 6th, Ibn Ṣharaf, whose history is quoted in the Bayyān; and 7th, Abū Bakr 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Mālikī, author of a biographical work, arranged in chronological order, and treating of the most remarkable jurisconsults and devotees who had appeared at Qayrawān, up to the year 356 of the Hijrah inclusively. It furnishes occasionally some good historical information. The MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale is dated 24th Rajab 727 (June, A.C. 1327), and one of those from which it was copied bore the date of 544 A.C. 1149-50).

2 Ibn Khaldūn, who gives a full account of this event, (see Histoire des Berbers, tome I, page 31st suiv.) states that it took place in the year 437, (A.C. 1045-6); but, in the second volume of the same work, page, 20, he says it happened in the year 440, and this is also the date given by the author of the Bayyān.

3 The author has here fallen into a mistake; the khalif al-Muqtadī commenced his reign A.H. 467. It was the khalif al-Qā'im whose supremacy was acknowledged in Maghrib after the revolt of al-Mu'izz the Ziride. Ibn Khaldūn, in his Histoire des Berbers, tome II, p. 21 says so positively, and the date suffices to prove that he is in the right. Ibn Khallikān has avoided this error in his life of al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, (No. 703).

been known since the days of (the patriarch) Joseph the faithful, desolated Egypt during seven years; men ate the flesh of their fellow-men and, it is said, a single cake of bread was sold for fifty pieces of gold (dinārs). As long as this calamity lasted, al-Mustanşir alone possessed a horse, and, when he rode out, the courtiers followed on foot, not having a beast to carry them. Individuals walking in the streets fell dead of hunger. Al-Mustanşir was obliged to borrow a mule for his parasol-bearer, from Ibn Hibat Allāh, president of the board of official correspondence<sup>1</sup>. - The famine rose at length to such a height that, in the year 462 (A.C. 1069-70), al-Mustanşir's mother and daughters removed to Baghdād. The inhabitants of Egypt dispersed into various countries and were scattered abroad. It continued to rage with unabated violence till Badr al-Jamālī Amīr al-Juyūsh, the father of al-Afdāl Shāhanshāh, set sail from Acre, as we have related in the life of his son (No. 266) and proceeded to Egypt where he took in hands the direction of affairs and re-established the prosperity of the country. The details of his proceedings would lead us too far. Al-Mustanşir was born on the morning of Tuesday, the 16th of the second Jumādā 420 (2nd July, A.C. 1029); he died on the eve of Thursday, the 18th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah 487 (6th Jan., A.C. 1095). I may here observe that the 18th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah is the anniversary of the Festival of Ghadīr ('Id al-Ghadīr) which is the same as that of Ghadīr Khumm (the pond of Khumm). I mention this, having heard many persons ask on what day of the month that festival took place. Khumm, situated between Makkah and Madīnah, is a place where there is a pond of water, or by another account, a morass. When the Prophet returned from Makkah, the year of the farewell<sup>2</sup>, he halted at Khumm and adopted 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib as his brother, saying: "'Alī is to me what Aaron was to Moses. Almighty God! be a friend to his friends and a foe to his foes; help those who help him and frustrate the hopes of those 1 See, for the board of correspondence or chancery office, No. 14, note on chancery.

---

2 The tenth year of the Hijrah was called the year of the farewell, because it was that in which Muḥammad made his last pilgrimage and bid adieu to Makkah.

who betray him." The Shī'ites attach great importance to this (tradition). According to Al-Ḥāzīmī (No. 599), Khumm is the name of a valley lying between Makkah and Madinah, and in the neighbourhood of al-Juḥfah<sup>1</sup>. It contains a pond near which the Prophet pronounced his invocation. This valley is notorious for the insalubrity of its air and the malignity of its fevers. We have already noticed some members of Mustanṣir's family and shall speak of others in their proper places<sup>2</sup>.

702 MA'RŪF AL-KARKHĪ

Abū Maḥfūz Ma'rūf al-Karkhī, the celebrated saint, was the son of Firūz*, or Firūzān, or 'Alī, and one of the clients of 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā, a person of whom we have already spoken (No. 398). His parents, who were Christians, delivered him over to a school-master of that persuasion, and when this man told him to say: "(God is) the third of three," he replied: "Not so! He is the Only One<sup>3</sup>". Having once received a severe beating from his master for making such an answer, he ran away and left him. His parents then said: "O! were he to come back to us we should conform to whatever religion he may have chosen." Some time after, he made his profession of Islāmism in the hands of 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā and, having returned to his parents' house, he knocked at the door. A voice (from within) said: "Who is there? He answered: Ma'rūf." "What religion does he follow?" Islāmism". His parents then became Muslims. Ma'rūf had the reputation of always obtaining from God the fulfilment of his prayers; so, in 1 See No. 145, note on Juḥfah.

2 A long notice on al-Mustanṣir, compiled from the works of various Arabic authors, was published by Quatremere in the second volume of his Memoires sur l' Egypte.

3 That means: God is the third person of the Trinity. It is a Qur'ānic expression (see sūrah 5, verse 77), but could never have been made use of by a Christian teacher. This shews that the story here related is a Muslim fabrication.

* The Arabic pronunciation of this name is Fayrūz.—Ed.

times of drought, the inhabitants of Baghdād offer up the prayer for rain at his tomb. They have also a saying that the tomb of Ma'rūf is an approved remedy for every ill. He said, one day, to his disciple Sarī al-Saqāṭī (No. 239): "When thou standest in need of God's assistance, invoke Him to grant it for my sake." "I saw, in a dream, Ma'rūf al-Karkhī;" so relates al-Sāqāṭī, "he seemed to be under the throne (of God) and the Creator, may His power be glorified! said to the angels: 'Who is that?' To which they answered: 'Thou knowest, O Lord! better than we do.' (God) replied: 'It is Ma'rūf al-Karkhī; he was intoxicated with love for me and did not recover till he met Me.'" Ma'rūf once related as follows: "One of the disciples of Dāwūd al-Ṭā'ī<sup>1</sup> said to me: 'Take care not to discontinue the act, for, by it, thou art brought near unto the favour of thy Lord.'" 'What is that act?' said I. He answered: 'Continual obedience to thy Lord and respect, with good counsel, for the Muslims.'" Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn relates that he heard his father say: "I saw, in a dream, Ma'rūf al-Karkhī, after his death, and I said to him: 'How did God treat thee?' and, he answered: 'He hath shewn mercy unto me.' 'Was it for thy self-mortification and thy devotion?' said I. 'No,' said he, 'but because I had hearkened to the exhortation of Ibn al-Sammāk (No. 603) and because I clung to poverty and consorted with the poor." Ma'rūf himself gave the following account of Ibn al-Sammāk's exhortation: "As I was passing through Kūfah, I stopped to hear a man called Ibn al-Sammāk, who was preaching to the people. In the course of his sermon he said: 'Whosoever turneth altogether from God, God will turn totally away from him; whosoever turneth his heart towards God, God will turn towards him with mercy and a look of consent to his wishes, and he who has been (devour) from time to time, God will shew him mercy on a time'! His words sunk into my heart, so I turned towards God and left every occupation except the service of my patron 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā. I related this discourse to al-Riḍā and he said: 'That exhortation is quite sufficient if thou art capable of being touched by an exhortation.'" We have already spoken of Ibn al-Sammāk among the Muḥammads. When Ma'rūf was on his death-bed, they asked him for his last injunctions and he answered : "After my death, give away my shirt in alms ; naked I came into the world and naked I wish to leave it." He passed, one day, by a water-carrier who was crying out : "God have mercy on him who drinketh ! " On this, he went up to him and took a drink, though he was at that time keeping a strict fast. Some one then said to him : "Art thou not keeping a fast ?" and he replied : "Yes, I am, but I hoped for the fulfilment of that man's prayer." The merits of Ma'rūf and the anecdotes respecting him are too numerous to be related. He died at Baghdād in the year 200 (A.C. 815-6) or, by other accounts, in 201 or 204. His tomb is in that city ; it is a well-known monument, much frequented by pious visitors. Karkhī means belonging to Karkh. Nine places bearing this name are mentioned in Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī's geographical dictionary, but the best known of them is that which is (the suburb) of Baghdād. Ma'rūf most certainly belonged to that place, though some say he was a native of the Kharkh of Juddān, which is a village in 'Irāq situated on the line which separates the government of Khaneqān from that of Shahrzūr.

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 143, note.

703 AL-MU'IZZ IBN BĀDĪS THE ZĪRIDE

Al-Mu'izz al-Ḥimyarī al-Ṣanhājī (the Ṣanhājīyan Ḥimyarite)<sup>1</sup>, sovereign of Ifrīqiyah and its maghribine dependencies, was the son of Bādīs, the son of Maṣṣūr, the son of Bulukkin, the son of Zīrī, the son of Manād. In our article on his son, the amīr Tamīm (No. 123), we have given the rest of the genealogy. Al-Ḥākim the (Fātimid) sovereign of Egypt, conferred on him the title of Sharf al-Dawlah (nobleness of the empire) and sent him a robe of honour with a diploma authorising him to take that title. This happened in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah 407 (May, A.C. 1017). Al-Mu'izz was a powerful and high-minded prince, a friend to the learned, and prodigal of gifts. In the series of sovereigns belonging to that family, he held the central place<sup>1</sup>. We have already mentioned his father and his grandfather (No. 105) and also his great grandfather (No. 116). Poets were loud in his praise, literary men courted his patronage and all who hoped for gain made his court their halting-place. The rite of Abū Ḥanifah was (at that time) more prevalent in Ifriqiyah than any other, but al-Mu'izz obliged all the people of Mauritania* to adopt that of Mālik Ibn Anas (No. 524), and thus put a stop to all contestations arising from the diversity of legal and ritual observances. Things have continued in the same state up to the present time<sup>2</sup>. In our article on Mustanşir bi-Allāh the 'Ubaydide<sup>3</sup>, we mentioned that al-Mu'izz repudiated the authority of that sovereign, suppressed his name in the khutbah and replaced it by that of al-Qā'im bi-Amr Allāh, the khalif of Baghdād. On this, al Mustanşir wrote him a long and threatening letter, in which was this passage: "Why hast thou not trod in the steps of thy forefathers, shewing us obedience and fidelity?" To which al-Mu'izz replied: "My father and my forefathers were kings of Maghrib before thy predecessors obtained possession of that country. Our family rendered them services not to be retributed by any rank which thou canst give. When people attempted to degrade them, they exalted themselves by means of their swords." He persisted in suppressing al-Mustanşir's name and, from that time up to the present day, the khutbah has never been said in Ifriqiyah for any Egyptian sovereign. Many anecdotes are told of al-Mu'izz, but his history is so well-known that we need not expatiate on the subject<sup>4</sup>. He composed a few pieces of verse, but none of them

1 Ibn al-Kalbī, Ṭabarī, Nuwayrī, and other historians assert that the Ṣanhājah, a people who form one of the oldest and purest Barbar tribes, that of Zenag (Senegal), descended from the Arabic tribe of Ḥimyar. This opinion, though deserving of attention, was not admitted by the native genealogists of the Barbar race (See Histoire des berbers, tome II, p. 2 et suiv.)

---

1 Literally: He was the central (and finest) pearl of their neck-lace.

2 The rite of Mālik is still the only one prevalent in the states of northern Africa. It is followed also in the Negro countries.

3 See No. 699 of this volume. The Fāṭimids were called 'Ubaydids by those who did not look upon them as descendants of Fā'imah, the daughter of Muhammad. This designation was given to them because their ancestor was named 'Ubayd Allāh.

4 The history of al-Mu'izz the Ziride is given by Ibn K̄aldūn in the Histoire des Berbers, tome I, p. 30 et suiv; et tome II, p. 18 et suiv.

* Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Maḡhrib.—Ed.

have fallen into my hands. He was sitting, one day, in his saloon with a number of literary men about him, and before him lay a lemon shaped like a hand and fingers<sup>1</sup>. He asked them to extemporize some verses on that subject, and Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn Rashīq al-Qayrawānī (No. 157) recited the following lines :

"A lemon, with its extremities gracefully spread out, appears before all eyes without being injured<sup>2</sup>. It seems to hold out a hand towards the Creator, invoking long life to the son of Bādīs."

Al-Mu'izz declared the verse excellent and shewed more favour to the author than to any other literary man in the assembly. He was born at al-Manṣūriyah, a place called also Ṣabrah, and forming one of the governments of Ifrīqiya<sup>3</sup>. His birth took place on Thursday, the 7th of the first Jumādā 398 (19th January, A.C. 1008). He obtained the supreme command after the death of his father Bādīs and on the day specified in our account of that prince's life<sup>4</sup>. He was solemnly inaugurated at al-Muḥammadiyah<sup>5</sup>, another of the governments of Ifrīqiya. This event took place on Saturday, the 3rd of Dhu 'l-Hijjah 406 (13th May, A.C. 1016). He died at Qayrawān on the 4th of Shā'bān 454 (13th August, A.C. 1062) of a malady he had contracted, a weakness of the liver. None of the princes of his family reigned so long as he. Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn Rashīq lamented his death in an elegy of which all the verses rhymed in k; we abstain from inserting this piece, in order to avoid prolixity. This prince had no other name but al-Mu'izz (which is however a simple title or surname). To clear up this point, I made every possible search: consulting books, learned men, natives of Mauritania and writers of annals, but could only find that he was called al-Mu'izz and that his surname was unknown. It would therefore appear that al-Mu'izz was really his

1 Lemons of this form are not uncommon in Algeria.

2 The effects of the evil eye may be averted by holding up the hand, with the fingers spread open. It is to this circumstance that the poet alludes.

3 Ṣabrah was quite contiguous to Qayrawān.

4 The inauguration of al-Mu'izz had been deferred because he was only eight years old on his father's death.

5 The town and canton of al-Muḥammadiyah lie nine miles south of Tunis.

name ; besides, we are not authorised to suppose that (in his case) it was a surname, for none of his family ever bore one. I give it therefore for his name, as I found it.

704 ABŪ 'UBAYDAH

Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar Ibn al-Muthannā, an adoptive member of the Qurayshid family of Taym and a native of Baṣrah, was an able grammarian and an accomplished scholar. He is spoken of by al-Jāhīz (No. 481) in these terms : "There was never on earth a Khārijite (dissenter) or an orthodox believer more learned in all the sciences than he." Ibn Qutaybah (No. 306) speaks of him thus in the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif : The unusual expression (of the Arabic language), the history of the (ancient) Arabs and their conflicts, were his predominant study ; yet, with all his learning, he was not always able to recite a verse without mangling it ; even in reading the Qur'ān, with the book before his eyes, he made mistakes. He detested the Arabs (of the desert) and composed a number of treatises in their dispraise. His opinions were those of the Khārijites. "Another author relates as follows : " In the year 188 (A.C. 804) he proceeded from Baṣrah to Baghdād, whither he had been called by Hārūn al-Rashīd, and explained some of his works to that prince. He taught Traditions on the authority of Hishām Ibn 'Urwah<sup>1</sup> and others ; Traditions were given on his authority by 'Alī Ibn al-Mughriah al-Aṭṭham<sup>2</sup>, Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām (No. 509) Abū 'Uṭhmān al-Māzini (No. 115), Abū Ḥatīm al-Sijistānī (No. 262) ? 'Umar Ibn Shabbah al-Numayrī (No. 466) and others". Abū 'Ubaydah related the following anecdote : "Al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' (No. 503) sent to me, at Baṣrah, the order to go and see him. So, I set out, though I had been informed of his haughtiness, Being admitted into his presence, I found him in a very long and broad saloon, (the floor

1 The life of Hishām Ibn 'Urwah will be found in this work.

2 See No. 531, note (3), and read Mughriah in place of Mughhayrah. (The error has been corrected in this edition.—Ed).

of which was) was covered with a carpet of one single piece. At the upper end of the room was a pile of mattresses, so lofty that it could not be got upon without a foot-stool, and on those mattresses al-Faḍl was seated. I said to him: 'Hail to the wazīr!' He returned my greeting, smiled on me and, bidding me draw near, he placed me on the same seat with himself. He then asked me sundry questions and showed me such affability as set me quite at ease. At his request, I recited to him the finest anteislamite poems I could recollect. 'I know most of these;' said he 'what I want is (to hear) gay verses!' I recited some to him, and, as I proceeded, he shook his sides, laughed and got into an excellent humour. A well looking man, in the dress of a kātib<sup>1</sup>, then came in, and al-Faḍl made him sit down beside me and asked him if he knew me. On his reply that he did not, he said to him: 'This is Abū 'Ubaydah, the most learned man of Baṣrah, we sent for him that we might derive some benefit from his learning.' 'May God bless you!' exclaimed the man, 'you did well!' Turning then towards me, he said: 'I have been longing to see you, as I have been asked a question which I wished to submit to you.' I replied: 'Let us hear it.' 'The (Qur'ān which is the) word of God, said he, 'contains this passage: 'the buds of which are like heads of demons<sup>2</sup>. Now, we are all aware that, in promises and threats, the comparisons which are made should refer to things already known; yet no one knows what a demon's head is like.' 'To this' I replied: 'God spoke there to the Arabs in their own style; have you not heard the verse of Imra al-Qays:

"Will he kill me? me whose bed-fellows are a sword and (arrows) pointed with azure (steel), like unto the fangs of ogres."

"Now, the Arabs never saw an ogre, but, as they stood in awe of such beings, they were often threatened with them." Al-Faḍl and the man who questioned me approved this answer, and, on that very day, I took the resolution of composing a treatise on

1 See Introduction.

2 See Qur'ān, sūrah 37, verse 63. There is, say the commentators, a thorny tree which grows in Tihāmah and bears a fruit like an almond, but extremely bitter. Its name, zaqqūm, is given, in the Qur'ān, to a tree growing in hell, the fruit of which will be the food of the damned.

the Qur'ān, in explanation of this and similar difficulties, with every necessary elucidation. On my return to Baṣrah, I drew up the work and entitled it al-Majāz (metaphors). On enquiry respecting that man, I learned that he was one of the wazīr's *kātib*s and boon companions.' Abū 'Ubaydah, having been informed that (Abū Sa'id) al-Aṣma'i (No. 354) blamed him for composing the Kitāb al-Majāz, and that he had said: "He speaks of God's Book after his own private judgement!" enquired when and where he gave lessons, and, on the day mentioned, he mounted his ass, rode up to the circle of scholars, dismounted and after saluting al-Aṣma'i, sat down and conversed with him. On finishing, he said: "Tell me, Abū Sa'id! what sort of a thing is bread?" The other answered: "It is that which you bake and eat." "There," said Abū 'Ubaydah, "you have explained the book of God after your own private judgement<sup>2</sup>, for God, may His name be exalted! has said (in repeating the words of Pharaoh's chief (baker)): 'I was bearing on my head (a load of) bread<sup>3</sup>:'" Al-Aṣma'i replied: "I said what appeared to me true and did not (mean to) explain the Qur'ān after my private judgement." On which Abū 'Ubaydah replied: "And all that I said and which you blamed me for appeared to me true, and I did not (mean to) explain the Qur'ān after my private judgement." He then rose from his place, mounted his ass and went off. Al-Bāhili, the author of the Kitāb al-Mā'ani<sup>4</sup> declared that students who went to al-Aṣma'i's lessons were purchasing pellets of dung in the pearl-market, and that, when they went to those of Abū 'Ubaydah, they purchased pearls in the dung-market. He said so because al-Aṣma'i recited with much elegance and could set off anecdotes and verses, even of the poorest kind, so as to make the very worst appear 1 Private judgment was at first allowed in explaining certain obscure passages of the Qur'ān and of the Traditions; but, after the establishment of the four orthodox rites, it was formally disapproved of by the Muslim doctors.

---

2 See No. 354.

3 Qur'ān, sūrah 12, verse 36.

4 Abū 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad al-Bāhili composed a commentary on a work in which al-Ṭaḥāwī (No. 24) explained the obscure terms and passages which occur in the Qur'ān and the Traditions. He died A.H. 321 (A.C. 933), His treatise and that of al-Ṭaḥāwī bore the same title.

good, but that little real information was to be obtained from him; whereas, Abū 'Ubaydah expressed himself badly but furnished a mass of useful knowledge. Abū 'Ubaydah never explained the verses (which he recited). Al-Mubarrad (No. 610) said: "Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī (No. 245) was an abler grammarian than al-Aṣma'ī and Abū 'Ubaydah, but these two came next to him and were near to each other; Abū 'Ubaydah was the most accomplished scholar of the day." 'Alī Ibn al-Madīnī (No. 409, note) spoke of him in the highest terms, and declared that he was a most correct transmitter of traditional literature. "Never," said he, did he give as a genuine production of the desert Arabs a piece which was not authentic. Abū 'Ubaydah and al-Aṣmā'ī were taken before Hārūn al-Raṣhīd in order that he might choose one of them for a member of his private society, and the preference was given to al-Aṣma'ī, as being better qualified for a table-companion. Abū Nuwās (No. 162) took lessons from Abū 'Ubaydah; he praised him highly and decried al-Aṣma'ī, whom he detested. When asked what he thought of al-Aṣma'ī, he replied; "A nightingale in a cage"<sup>1</sup>. Of Kh̲alaf al-Aḥmar<sup>2</sup> he said: "In him are combined all human knowledge and intelligence;" and of Abū 'Ubaydah: "A bundle of science packed up in a skin." A poem addressed by Ishāq' Ibn al-Nadīm al-Mawṣilī (No. 84) to al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' contains the following passage in praise of Abū 'Ubaydah and in dispraise of al-Aṣma'ī:

"Take Abū 'Ubaydah and treat him with favour, for in him you will find all science. Honour him therefore, prefer him, and reject the she-monkey's cub."

When Abū 'Ubaydah recited verses, he did not mark the measure and, in repeating passages of the Qur'ān or relating Traditions, he made mistakes designedly: "For," said he,

1 A nightingale in a cage is pleasing to hear, but there is nothing else good about it. Such seems to be the meaning of the remark made by Abū Nuwās.

2 See No. 245, note. The father of Kh̲alaf was enfranchised by Abū Burdah, the son of Abū Mūsā (see No. 295) and married a woman of the tribe of Māzin. According to Mr. de Hammer, in his Literaturgeschichte de Araber, vol. III, p. 550, Kh̲alaf died A.H. 180 (A.C. 796-7). Mr. Ahlwardt published at Griefswald, in 1859, one of Kh̲alaf's poems with critical notes. The title of his work is Chalef elahmar's Qasside.

"grammar brings ill luck<sup>1</sup>." He continued to compose works until he died and left nearly two hundred treatises<sup>2</sup>, of which we may name the following: the Kitāb Majāz al-Qur'ān (figurative expressions occurring in the Qur'ān), the Gharīb al-Qur'ān (unusual expressions employed in the Qur'ān), the Ma'ānī 'l-Qur'ān (rhetorical figures made use of in the Qur'ān), the Gharīb al-Ḥadīth (rare expressions occurring in the Traditions), the Kitāb al-Dibāj (silken robe), the Tāj (diadem), the Kitāb al-Ḥudūd (book of definitions), the Kitāb Khurāsān (treatise concerning Khurāsān), the Kitāb al-Khawārij al-Baḥrayn wa'l-Yamāmah (on the Khārijites of Baḥrayn and Yamāmah), the Kitāb al-Mawālī (on mawlās), the Kitāb al-Bulh (on simpletons), the Kitāb al-Difān (on guests), the Kitāb Marj Rāhiḡ (on the battle of Marj Rāhiḡ), the Kitāb al-Munāfarāt (contestations between individuals concerning the illustriousness of their respective families), the Kitāb al-Qubā'il (on the Arabian tribes), the Kitāb Khabar al-Barrād (history of al-Barrād)<sup>3</sup> the Kitāb al-Qarā'in (book of female companions, or of concomitant circumstances), the Kitāb al-Bāzī (on the falcon), the Kitāb al-Ḥamām (on turtle-doves), the Kitāb al-Ḥayyāt (on serpents), the Kitāb al-'Aqārib (on scorpions), the Kitāb al-Nawākih (on concubines), the Kitāb al-Nawāshir (on the muscles of the arm), the Kitāb Ḥuḍr al-Khayl (on the galloping of horses), the Kitāb al-A'yān (on great men?), the Kitāb Bunyān bi-Ahlihī * (on setting up house), the Kitāb Ayādi 'l-Azd (on the generous deeds of the tribe of Azd), the Kitāb al-Khayl (on horses), the Kitāb al-Ibl (on camels), the Kitāb al-Insān (on man), the Kitāb al-Zari (on corn-fields), the Kitāb al-Rahl (on the camel's saddle), the Kitāb al-Dilwi

1 This signification of the word سجدو has been already noticed in No. 670, note.

2 The purely philological character of most of the treatises mentioned in the following list has been indicated in the Introduction to the first vol. They were composed of extracts made from the poems and sententious discourses of the desert Arabs.

3 About twenty years before the promulgation of Islāmism, the tribe of Quraysh was embroiled in a war with that of Hawāzin, because al-Barrād Ibn Qays had slain 'Urwah Ibn 'Utbah. Al-Tabrizī, in his commentary on the Ḥamāsah, page 351, alludes to this event. Mr. Caussin de Perceval gives a full account of it in his Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, tome I. p. 391 et suiv.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Bayān Bāhileh (description of the Bāhilah (tribe).—Ed.

(on the leathern bucket for drawing water), the Kitāb al-Bakrah (on the pulley of draw-wells) the Kitāb al-Sarj (on the saddle), the Kitāb al-Lijām (on the bridle), the Kitāb al-Faras (on the horse), the Kitāb al-Shawārid (on animals gone astray, or on verses current through the Arabian tribes), the Kitāb al-Iḥtilām (on puberty, or on dreaming), the Kitāb maqātil al-Fursān (on combats where celebrated horsemen met their death), the Kitāb maqātil al-Ashraf (on the violent deaths of the Sharīfs or descendants of 'Alī), the Kitāb al-Shi'r wa al-Shu'arā (on poetry and poets), the Kitāb fa'ala wa af'ala (on verbs which in the fourth form have a privative signification), the Kitāb al-Ma'ḥālib (vices of the Arabs reprehended), the Kitāb Khulq al-Insān (on the human frame), the Kitāb al-Farq (on the difference between the names given to the members of the human body and these given to the same members in animals), the Kitāb al-Khuff (on the feet of camels, or on boots), the Kitāb Makkah wa 'l-Ḥaram (on Makkah and its sacred territory), the Kitāb al-Jaml wa 'l-Ṣiffīn (on the battles of the Camel and Ṣiffīn), the Kitāb Buyūtāt al-'Arab (on the tents of the Arabs),* the Kitāb al-Mulāwamāt (on mutual blame), the Kitāb al-Ghārāt (on predatory excursions), the Kitāb al-Mu'atābāt† (on mutual reproaches), the Kitāb al-Aḍḍād (on words which have each two opposite significations), the Kitāb ma'āthir al-'Arab (the memorable deeds of the Arabs), the Kitāb Ma'āthir Ghaṭafān (the noble recollections left by the tribe of Ghaṭafān), the Kitāb Ad'iyat al-'Arab (on the high pretensions of the Arabs), the Kitāb maqtal 'Uthmān (on the murder of the khalīf 'Uthmān), the Kitāb Asmā al-Khayl (on the names given to horses), the Kitāb al-'Aqqah‡ (on ungrateful children), the Kitāb quḍāt al-Baṣrah (on the qāḍīs of Baṣrah), the Kitāb Futūḥ Irminiyah (on the conquest of Armenia), the Kitāb Futūḥ al-Ahwāz (on the conquest of al-Ahwāz), the Kitāb Luṣūṣ al-'Arab (on celebrated Arab robbers), the Kitāb Akhbār al-Ḥajjāj (the history of al-Ḥajjāj), the Kitāb Qiṣṣat al-Ka'bah (the history of the Ka'bah), the Kitāb al-Ḥums min Quraysh (on the Qurayshide families called the Ḥums)<sup>1</sup>, the Kitāb

1 The word ḥums signifies heroes. It was a title assumed by the principal
(Continued on page 297)

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid dds: Kitāb al-Luḡḥāt (Lexicon).—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives these two names before Mulāwamāt.—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Kitāb al-'Iffat (on Chastity).—Ed.

*Faḍā'il al-'Arsh** (on the excellences of the throne of God), the Kitāb ma talḥano fīhi 'l-'Āmmah (on the faults of language committed by the vulgar), the Kitāb al-Sawād wa Fatḥihl (on Babylonia and its conquest), the Kitāb man shukira min al-'Ummāl wa ḥumida (on governors who have been thanked and praised), the Kitāb al-Jam'a wa 'l-Tathniyah (on the plural and the dual), the Kitāb al-Aws wa 'l-Khazraj (on the Aws and Khazraj, the two great Arab tribes of Madīnah), the Kitāb Muḥammad wa Ibrāhīm (history of Muḥammad and Ibrāhīm), the sons of 'Abd Allāh, the son of al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib, the Kitāb al-Ayyām al-Saghīr (the shorter work on celebrated battle-days), containing an account of seventy-five conflicts, the Kitāb al-Ayyām al-Kabīr (the greater work on battle-days), containing an account of one thousand two hundred conflicts, the Kitāb Ayyām Banī Māzin wa Akḥbārihim (the battle-days and history of the tribe of Māzin). He left besides other instructive works, all of which I should mention, were I not afraid of lengthening this article too much. Abū 'Ubaydah relates as follows: "When I appeared before al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī', he asked me who, of all men, was the best poet? and I answered: 'Al-Rā'ī'." "Why," said he, "do you give him the preference?" I replied. "Because he went to see Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān the Umayyad who, the very day he received him, made him a present and allowed him to depart; this circumstance al-Rā'ī described in the following verses:

(Continued from page 296)

Qurayshides and granted by them to some of the Kināniyan and Khuzā'iyan families which resided in their neighbourhood. (Ḥamāsah, page 2; Essai sur l'hist. des Arabes, t. I, p. 280).

1 For information respecting these two ināms of the Zaydiyyah sect, see de Sacy's Chrestomathie arabe, tome I, p. 3, of the second edition, and my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's History of the Berbers, tome II, page 499.

2 'Ubayd Ibn al-Ḥusayn, a member of the tribe of Numayr, which was a branch of that of 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'ṣa'ah, was eminent Arabian chief and an excellent poet. He received the surname of Al-Rā'ī (the pastor), or Rā'ī al-ibī (the camels' herdsman), because he excelled in the description of these animals. He composed poems in praise of the Umayyad Khalīf 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān and died at an advanced age. (Al-Suyūṭī's Sharḥ shawāhid al-Mughnī: Masālik al-Absār).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Kitāb al-Faḍā'il al-Faras (on the excellences of the Horse).—Ed.

'At midnight, our camels, emaciated (by a long journey), arrived panting at Sa'id's door. The next morning, they hastened off again, praising the courtyard where he had allowed them to repose; for they had obtained (for me) not a dilatory promise but a solid gift.'

On hearing this, al-Faḍl exclaimed: 'Abū 'Ubaydah! you have presented to us your request with much address.' The next morning, Abū 'Ubaydah went to the court of Hārūn al-Raṣhīd: "He gave me a present," said he, "ordered me something out of his own private treasury and dismissed me." Abū 'Ubaydah was a mawlā of the tribe of 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ma'mar al-Taymī. A man of high rank said to him: "You, who insult every one, who was your father?" to which he replied: "My father informed me that his father told him that he was a Jew of (the town of) Bājarwān;" the questioner went off immediately and left him<sup>1</sup>. Abū 'Ubaydah was of so sarcastic a humour that every one in Baṣrah who had a reputation to maintain was obliged to flatter him. He once set out for Fārs with the intention of visiting Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Hilālī who, being informed of his approach, said to his pages: "Be on your guard against Abū 'Ubaydah, for every word of his is (sharp and) cutting." A repast was served and one of the pages spilled some gravy on the skirt of Abū 'Ubaydah's cloak. "Some gravy has fallen on your cloak," said Mūsā, "but I shail give you ten others in place of it." "Nay!" replied Abū 'Ubaydah, "do not mind! your gravy can do no harm." By that he meant that there was no strength<sup>2</sup> in it. Mūsā understood the sarcasm, but held his peace. It is related that, when Abū 'Ubaydah composed his Kitāb al-Maṭhālīb, an Arab said to him: "You have insulted the whole of the Arabs;" on which he replied; "That can do you no harm, for it does not concern you;" meaning by these words that the man was not an Arab. When al-Aṣma'ī went to the mosque, he always said (to his disciples), before he entered: "Look in and see if that fellow be there;" meaning Abū 'Ubaydah, so much he dreaded

1 The wit of Abū 'Ubaydah's answer is, for the translator, quite imperceptible.

2 The word rendered here by strength means grease.

the sharpness of his tongue. When Abū 'Ubaydah died, no one attended his funeral because he had not spared, in his acrimony, either gentle or simple. He was filthy in his habits and lisped; his genealogy was unsound and his orthodoxy suspected, for he had a leaning towards the doctrines of the Khārijites. Abū Ḥātim al-Sijistānī (No. 262) related that Abū 'Ubaydah treated him with respect because he thought him to be one of the Khārijites of Sijistān. Al-Ṭhawrī (No. 248) relates the following anecdote: "I went to the mosque and found Abū 'Ubaydah sitting alone and writing with his finger on the floor. He asked me who was the author of this verse:

"I said to my soul, when it shook and trembled: Back to thy wonted mood! Strive to merit praise or else repose (in death)."

"I replied that he was Qaṭarī Ibn al-Fujā'ah (No. 519) on which he exclaimed: 'God smash your mouth! why not say: the Commander of the faithful, Abū Na'āmah<sup>1</sup>. He then requested me to sit down and never to repeat what he had just uttered. So I kept it a secret till the day of his death." This anecdote appears to me contestable, for the verse just mentioned belongs to a poem composed by 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥazraḡ al-Anṣārī al-Khazraḡī. Ḥazraḡ was his mother's name and Zayd Manāt the name of his father. No literary scholar can deny the verse to be his, the poem from which it is taken being acknowledged to be of that author's composition. Al-Mubarrad (No. 610) relates in his Kāmil that Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abī Sufyān the Umayyad said: "Let poetry be one of your chief occupations, and principal studies. The noble deeds of your forefathers are mentioned in poems, and there also you can find counsels to direct you." At the battle of al-Ḥarīr<sup>2</sup> I was on the point of running away, when these words of Ibn al-Ḥazraḡ (came to my mind and) changed my intention:

1 Our author has already mentioned, in the life of Qaṭarī, that this chief of the Khārijite sect was surnamed Abū Na'āmah and had taken the title of Commander of the Faithful.

2 The battle of Qādisiyah was fought A.H. 15 and lasted three days. The first journée was afterwards called Yawm Armāth يوم ارمات; the second Yawm Aghwāth يوم اغواث and the third Yawm Aghmā يوم اغماس or 'Amās عماس or

"I was hindered by my self-denial, by my fortitude, by the hope of purchasing glory at an easy rate (in facing dangers)<sup>1</sup> by the pleasure of encountering perils, of striking off the heads of many a valiant hero, and of saying (to my soul), every time she shook and trembled: 'Back to thy wonted mood! strive to merit praise or else repose (in death). Let me thus defend my pure renown and ward off hereafter imputations which I had well deserved<sup>2</sup> ' "

Let us return to our account of Abū 'Ubaydah: no magistrate would receive his evidence because he was suspected of an unnatural vice. Al-Aṣma'ī relates this anecdote: "I and Abū 'Ubaydah entered one day into the mosque and, behold! on the pillar at the foot of which he usually sat and at the height of nearly seven cubits, was inscribed this verse:

"God's blessing on Lot and on his people! come, Abū 'Ubaydah! say amen."

He said to me: "Aṣma'ī! rub that out." So I got on his shoulders and effaced the writing, but not before my weight made him cry out: 'You are too heavy; you are breaking my back!' I answered: 'Nothing remains (to rub out)' but the ṭ (of the word Lot).' 'That,' said he is the worst letter of the whole verse.' " According to another account, Abū 'Ubaydah, finding al-Aṣma'ī so heavy, told him to make haste. "Nothing remains now," said the other, "excepting the word Lot." On this, Abū 'Ubaydah

---

(Continued from page 299)

Ghimās غماس . On the night preceding the third day and which was called Laylat al-Harir ليلة الحرير (the night of growling, or snarling), the battle was renewed and victory finally declared in favour of the Muslims. Arabic historians and geographers are uncertain whether the names given to these three journees designated places or not. For a full account of this celebrated battle see Mr. Caussin de Perceval's Essai, etc., t. III, p. 481 et suiv., professor Kosegarten's Taberistanensis Annales, t. III, and Price's Retrospect of Mahomedan History, vol. I, p. 304.

1 As we do not possess the traditional explication of this piece, we can indicate its meaning by conjecture only.

2 This verse may perhaps signify: that I may defend the honour of virtuous women and maintain, hence-forward, an unspotted reputation.

exclaimed ; "From him let us fly.<sup>1</sup>" The person who wrote the verse was Abū Nuwās al-Ḥasan Ibn Hānī, he of whom we have already spoken (No. 162). It is related that, near the place where Abū 'Ubaydah had his sittings, were found scraps of paper containing the above mentioned verse and the following :

"For thou, I am sure, art one of their survivors (and hast been always so) since the age of puberty, though thou art now in thy ninetieth* year"

The anecdotes related of Abū 'Ubaydah are very numerous. He was born in the month of Rajab, 110 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 728), on the same night in which al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (No. 148) died. Other accounts place his birth in the year 111, 114, 118 and 119, but the date here given is the true one. The proof is that the amīr Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib<sup>2</sup> having asked him when he was born, he replied : " 'Umar Ibn Abī Rabi'ah al-Makhzūmī (No. 465), has already shaped out my answer : being asked the date of his birth, he replied : 'The night on which (the khalif) 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb died ; what excellence was then removed from the world and what worthlessness brought into it ! 'Now I was born the night of al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī's death, and (the rest of) my answer shall be the same as 'Umar Ibn Abī Rabi'ah's". In the life of this 'Umar we mentioned that these words have been attributed to al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī. Abū 'Ubaydah died at Baṣrah in the year 209 (A.C. 824-5), or according to other statements, in 211, or 210, or 213. A banana, which (Abū Ja'far) Muḥammad Ibn al-Qāsim Ibn Sahl al-Nūshijānī gave him to eat, was the cause of his death. Some time afterwards, Abu 'l-'Atāhiyah (No. 91) went to see al-Nūshijānī, who offered him a banana, on which he

---

1 I suspect that this dialogue, in Arabic, offers a number of equivocal significations, such as were comprehensible to Muslim debauchees, in Eastern countries. In that case, the insertion of the anecdote does no honour to the author nor to the generation for whom, he compiled his work.

2 Abū 'Abd Allāh Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Mu'alib held, at one time, the government of Madīnah. He was removed from his post in the year 150 (A.C. 767), by the khalif al-Manṣūr. He died at Baṣrah, but on what date is not ascertained.

* According to the verse given by 'Abd al-Ḥamid it should be rendered seventieth.—Ed.

exclaimed : "What do you mean ? Abū Ja'far ! you took away Abū 'Ubaydah's life by means of a banana and you intend to kill me in the same manner ! do you consider as lawful the murdering of learned men ? Abū 'Ubaydah must not be confounded with Abū 'Ubayd, whose names were al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām (No. 509), Ma'mar al-Muthannā<sup>1</sup>. Bājarwān, the native place of Abū 'Ubaydah's father, is a village in the district of al-Balikh, which constitutes a government in the province of al-Raqqah. It is also the name of a town situated in Shirwān, a province of Armenia and near which, it is said, lies the fountain of immortality which was discovered by al-Khidr<sup>2</sup>. I am inclined to believe that Abū 'Ubaydah belonged to this place. Some say that Bājarwān is the name of the town from the inhabitants of which Moses and al-Khidr asked hospitality<sup>3</sup>. Nūsh jān means belonging to Nūsh jān which is a village in one of the districts of Fārs.

705 MA'AN, THE SON OF ZĀ'IDAH

Abu 'l-Walīd Ma'an al-Shaybānī was the son of Zā'idah, the son of 'Abd Allāh, the son of Zā'idah, the son of Maṭar, the son of Sharik, the son of 'Amr, surnamed Al-Ṣulb ; the son of Qays, the son of Shurāḥil, the son of Hammām, the son of Murrah, the son of Dhuhl, the son of Shaybān. The rest of genealogy is well-known<sup>4</sup>. Ibn al-Kalbī<sup>5</sup> says, in his Jamharat al-Nisab : "Ma'an was the son of Zā'idah, the son of Maṭar, the son of

1 The author marks the orthography of these proper names, letter by letter. Such indications I suppress, as usual, but give the results.

2 Al-Khidr is the name by which the Muslims seem to designate the prophet Elias. According to them, he discovered the fountain of life and, having drunk of it, became immortal.

3 See Qur'ān, sūrah 18, verse 76.

4 The genealogy of Shaybān will be found in Eithorn's Monumenta antiqussimae historiae Arabum, and in Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes.

5 The life of Hishām Ibn al-Kalbī the genealogist will be found in this work.

Sharik, the son of 'Amr, the son of Qays, the son of Shurāhīl, the son of Murrah, the son of Hammām, the son of Murrah, the son of Dhuhl, the son of Shaybān, the son of Tha'labah, the son of 'Ukābah, the son of Ṣa'b, the son of 'Alī, the son of Bakr, the son of Wā'il, the son of Qāsiṭ, the son of Hinb, the son of Afṣā, the son of Du'mī, the son of Jadilah, the son of Asad, the son of Rabi'ah, the son of Nizār, the son of Ma'add, the son of 'Adnān. Ma'an was generous, brave, liberal, and beneficent, highly extolled (by poets) and much visited (by the needy). " Al- Aṣma'i related as follows : "An Arab of the desert went to see Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah and recited to him a poem in his praise. He then waited so long at the (palace) door that he was about to depart, when he saw Ma'an on the point of riding out. He immediately rose, went up to him and, seizing the bridle of the steed, he said :

"O Ma'an ! thy hands are all beneficence ; (they pour) favours on the people and (open new) ways to thy (generosity). The daughters of my uncle will know what I have obtained, when on my return, the saddle-bags shall be examined."

"Ma'an ordered five female camels, chosen from the best of his flock, to be brought out, and, having them loaded with gifts, presents and clothes, he gave them to him and said : 'Son of my brother ! return, and may God protect thee ! to the daughters of thy uncle ; when they examine the saddle-bags, they will surely find something to rejoice at.' The Arab answered : ' By the House of God ! thou hast spoken truly.' " In the life of the poet Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah (No. 689) will be found other anecdotes concerning him. Marwān was particularly devoted to him and most of his poems were in praise of this chief. Under the dynasty of the Umayyads, Ma'an rose successively from one post of authority to another, and remained attached to the service of Yazīd Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah al-Fazārī, governor of the two 'Irāqs. When the sovereignty passed into the hands of the 'Abbasids, Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr besieged Yazīd Ibn 'Umar in the city of Wāsiṭ. What occurred between them on this occasion is well known, and some account of it will be found in our article on Yazīd. Ma'an had displayed great bravery in support of Yazīd and, when this chief was put to death, he lay hid for some time, through fear of al-Manṣūr. During the period of his concealment he had a number of extraordinary adventures, one of which we here give in the words of Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah, the celebrated poet: "When Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah was governor of Yaman<sup>1</sup>, he made me the following narration: (Abū Ja'far) al-Manṣūr caused the strictest search to be made for me and offered a reward in money to whoever would bring me to him. Perquisitions were made so closely that I was obliged to alter my complexion by exposing myself to the rays of the sun; I cut off my whiskers, put on a woollen frock and, having mounted on a camel, I proceeded towards the desert, with the intention of staying there. I had just gone out by the Bāb Ḥarb, which is one of the gates of Baghdād, when a Negro, with a sword suspended in a belt from his shoulder, followed me until I had got out of the sight of the guards. He then seized my camel by the halter and, making it kneel down, he grasped me by the hand: 'What is the matter?' said I. He answered: 'Thou art he whom the Commander of the Faithful is searching for.' I replied: 'And who am I, that search should be made for me?' 'Thou art Ma'an, the son of Zā'idah,' said he. 'My good fellow! said I, 'have the fear of the Almighty before thy eyes! where is the likeness between me and Ma'an?' 'Cease denying,' said he, 'for by Allāh! I know thee better than thou knowest thyself.' Perceiving that he was in earnest, I said to him: 'Here is a jewel worth many times the sum offered by al-Manṣūr to the person who may bring me to him, take it and be not the cause of shedding my blood.' 'Hand it out,' said he. On my producing it to him, he looked at it for some time and then said: 'As for its value, thou hast told the truth, but I will not accept it before asking thee a question: if thou givest me a true answer, I shall let thee go.' 'Ask,' said I, 'All people,' said he, 'declare that thou art noted for thy generosity; tell me if thou didst ever give away at once the whole of thy fortune?' 'No,' 'Or the half?' 'No.' Or the third? 'No,' He proceeded thus till he said: 'Or the tenth?' on which I blushed and replied: 'I think I have sometimes done so.' 'Well!' said he, 'that was no great matter (for such as thee) ; now I, by Allāh ! am a simple foot-soldier, living on the pay I get from Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr ; every month, he gives me twenty dirhams<sup>1</sup>, and this jewel is worth many thousand dinārs ; here, I give it to thee back as a present for thy own sake, and on account of the generosity for which thou art noted, and in order to make thee know that there is, in the world, a man more generous than thou art. So, for the future, be not proud of thyself, but consider henceforward the gifts thou makest as trifling, and stop not in thy career of generosity'. He then threw the necklace into my lap and let go the halter of my camel. As he was turning to depart, I said to him : 'By Allāh ! thou hast disgraced me, man ! I would suffer less from the shedding of my life's blood than from what thou hast done to me. Take back what I offered thee, for I am rich enough to do without it.' He laughed and said : 'Thou intendest to make me belie my words ; now, by Allāh ! I shall not receive it nor ever take a reward for doing a good action.' He then went his way and, when I had no longer any danger to apprehend. I had search made for him and promised to whoever would bring him to me whatever reward he might ask ; but I never heard of him again ; it was as if the earth had swallowed him up.' " Ma'an, remained in concealment till the affray of al-Hāshimiyah<sup>2</sup>. On that memorable day, a band of Khurāsānids revolted against al-Manṣūr and proceeded to attack him. A combat took place between them and the partisans he had in al-Hāshimiyah, a town which (the khalif) al-Saffāḥ had built in the neighbourhood of Kūfah. Ghars al-Ni'mah Ibn al-Ṣābī (No. 125, note), says, as follows, in his work entitled Kitāb al-Hafawāt (book of faults) : "In the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah. A.H. 134 (May-June, A.C. 752), al-Saffāḥ finished the building of the town which he had founded for himself near al-Anbār", Ma'an who was lying concealed in the neighbourhood (at the time of this revolt), set out at night disguised in a turban, with a veil over his face, and, having attacked the insurgents, in the sight of al-Manṣūr, he displayed great bravery and resolution, and put them to flight.

1 When Ma'an obtained his pardon from al-Manṣūr, he was appointed by that Khalif to the government of Yaman. He was afterwards removed to the government of Āḍḥarbā'ijān (al-Makīn's Hist. Saracen, p. 103), and then transferred to the government of Sijistān.

---

1 About ten shillings.

2 See the Annals of Abulfeda, A.H. 141, and Price's Retrospect, Vol. II, p. 13.

Al-Manṣūr was no sooner delivered from danger than he said to him : "Deuce take thee ! who art thou ?" The other removed the veil from his face and answered : "Commander of the faithful ! I am he "whom thou hast been making search for ; I am Ma'an, the son of Zā'idah". Al-Manṣūr immediately granted him a free pardon, heaped upon him gifts and honours, arrayed him in a fine dress, with splendid ornaments, and received him into the number of his favourites. Some days after, Ma'an entered into the presence of al-Manṣūr who, on seeing him, said : "Teli me, Ma'an ! did you not give to Marwān Ibn Abi Ḥafṣah a reward of one hundred thousand dirhams for this verse ?

" 'Tis Ma'an, the son of Zā'idah, by whose prowess the tribe of Shaybān had fresh glory added to its glory."

Not so ! Commander of the faithful ! but I gave it to him for this passage of the same poem :

"On the day of al-Hāshimiyah, you stood boldly forth with your sword in defence of God's vicar (upan earth). You protected the spot where he stood and warded off from him the strokes of the sword and spear."

"Well answered, Ma'an !" exclaimed the khalif. Another day, he said to him : "Ma'an ! people often speak ill of your tribe ;" to which Ma'an replied :

"You will always find the illustrious exposed to envy, but never will you find detractors of the vile."

He went, one day, when advanced in age, to visit (al-Manṣūr) and (this prince) said to him . "Ma'an ! you are growing old." "Yes, Commander of the faithful ! in your service," replied Ma'an. "And yet you are still vigorous," added the khalif. "Yes, Commander of the faithful ! in attacking your enemies." "And you have still some strength remaining ?" "Yes," answered Ma'an, "and it shall be used for you." When 'Abd al-Rahmān Ibn Zayd, a pious ascetic of Baṣrah heard of this conversation, he exclaimed : "Unfortunate man ! he reserves nothing for (the service of) the Lord." The best known of Marwān's qaṣ'idahs were composed in honour of Ma'an and the finest of them is that which rhymes in / and of which I inserted a passage in the life of the former. It is rather long, as it consists of more than fifty verses ; so not to lengthen this article, I shall abstain from giving it. In another poem, he said of him :

"God has secured against fear and want him who has Ma'an for a protector in adversity. Ma'an, the son of Zā'idah ! he keeps his promises and gives the highest price to purchase fame. He considers what he bestows as so much gained, if it obtains for him lasting praise ; yet he who receives his gifts thinks them cheaply earned. He has erected for (the tribe of) Shaybān a (monument of) glory never to fall till the solid basis of Ḥaḍan shall pass away."

Ḥaḍan (حَضْن) is the name of a great mountain, situated between Najd and Tihāmah, and at a day's journey from the latter country. There is a proverb which says : He is in Najd who sees Ḥaḍan. It is frequently mentioned in poems and historical anecdotes. A person noted for the elegance of his language visited Ma'an, one day, and addressed him in these (choice) terms : "It would have been easy for me to get myself recommended to you by one whom you might find irksome ; but I preferred choosing for intercessor your own merit and making an appeal to your own generosity. If you think to place me as high in your noble favour as I have placed my hopes in your beneficence, do so. I have not been too proud to solicit your bounty ; spare therefore my honorable feelings the shame of a disappointment." Ma'an composed some good poetry, most of which is on bravery. Abū 'Abd Allāh (Hārūn) Ibn al-Munajjim (see his life in this work), speaks of him in the Kitāb al-Bārī<sup>1</sup>, and gives a number of passages taken from his poems. Such is the following, addressed to Khattāb, a nephew of 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān<sup>1</sup>, on seeing him strut about at court after having been defeated and put to flight by the Khārijites :

---

1 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, of the tribe of Azd, was appointed governor of Khurāsān by the Khālīf al-Manṣūr, in the year 140 (A. C. 757-8), according to the author of the Nujūm, or, two years later, according to Ḥamzah al-Iṣbahānī. This historian gives some account of 'Abd al-Jabbār in his Annals, p. 22 of the Arabic text.

"Why didst thou not walk so, O Khaṭṭāb! on the morning you encountered the foe? Why didst thou not stand firm when death was near? Thou wert saved by a steed, obedient to the rein and which, spurred on by thee through a cloud of dust, flew like an eagle. Thou didst leave thy companions when the spears came to their encounter, and so doth every man who is lost to honour."

The grammarian Abū 'Uthmān al-Māzinī (No. 115) relates as follows: "The commander of Ma'an's police-guard<sup>1</sup> said to me: 'I was standing behind Ma'an (who was seated in his chair of state), when he perceived a man riding (on a camel) and coming up at full speed.' 'I do not think,' said Ma'an, 'that he wants to see any one else but me. Door-keeper! let him enter.' (The stranger) came in, saluted Ma'an and said:

"God preserve thee! little is what I have; my family are numerous and I am not able to support them. Stubborn fortune hath borne me down; so, they sent me to thee and await the result."

"Ma'an, being then in one of his generous moods, made answer: 'All will be right; by Allāh I shall hasten thy return!' He then told one of his pages to bring out such and such a female camel and a thousand pieces of gold<sup>2</sup>, and all this he gave to the man, without knowing who he was." It is in these terms that the occurrence is related by the Khaṭīb (No. 33), in his history (of Baghdād). Numerous other anecdotes are told of Ma'an and of his generous deeds. Towards the end of his life, he was appointed governor of Sijistān. Having proceeded to that province, he did there many memorable acts, had numerous adventures and received frequent visits from poets. In the year 151 (A.C. 768), or 152 or 158, according to other accounts, being then in Sijistān, he had 1 The shurṭah, or police-guard, was a troop of armed horsemen, receiving regular pay and charged to maintain order in the city and punish offenders. It formed also the body-guard of the sovereign. Ibn Khaldūn furnishes information respecting the shurṭah in his Prolegomena, tome. II, p. 35, of my translation.

---

2 About five hundred pounds sterling.

workmen occupied in his palace, when some Khārijities slipped in amongst them and murdered him. He was at that moment undergoing the operation of cupping<sup>1</sup>. His nephew, Yazīd Ibn Mazyad Ibn Zā'idah, whose life we shall give went in pursuit of the assassins and slew them all in the town of al-Bust. The poets composed admirable elegies on the death of Ma'an. One of the finest and noblest of those pieces we shall here give; it is a qaṣidah composed by his own poet, Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah, and begins thus:

"Ma'an has gone his way, leaving a glorious reputation, never to perish and never to be equalled. When Ma'an received the fatal stroke, the sun seemed to have shrouded himself in darkness. Ma'an was the mountain with which (the tribe of) Nizār demolished the mountains of the foe<sup>2</sup>. Since Ma'an is gone, the frontiers, where the lances used to quench their thirst, remain without defense. 'Irāq is overspread with gloom; his misfortune, so afflicting for us all, has left to it an inheritance of disorder (and ruin). Syria trembled from side to side, when that pillar of might leant over and gave way. On the morning of his departure (from life), all the lands of Tihāmah and of Najd had nearly been removed from their places. The countries which so long flourished proudly (in his life time) are now humbled by his death. When death struck Ma'an on that day, it struck the noblest in deeds among those who were the best of men. Till Ma'an was borne to his grave<sup>3</sup>, all mankind were his children, and never did a man who sought a favour think of going to any other (patron) than Ma'an, the son of Zā'idah. He is gone who lightened all (our) burdens, and the flow of whose beneficence anticipated (our) demands. Never did bands of visitors go to see (another chief) like Ma'an; never did they discharge their baggage in another court like his. All the hands of the freest givers never equalled the right hand or the left of Ma'an. The ponds of his generosity never went dry; the buckets always ascended from them full; (ponds belonging) to a man of fair renown who considered wealth as nothing unless bestowed on all who sought for aid. O, that those who rejoiced at his death had been sacrificed to save him ! O, that his existence could be lengthened and prolonged ! His treasures consisted, not in gold but in swords of Indian steel, and ample coats of mail, a lance from al-Khatt<sup>1</sup> yellow and pliant, exhibiting flexibility and just proportion, and a store of lasting renown, and superabundant piety, by which he attained excellence."

1 Cupping was a favorite remedy with the Arabs in many cases.

2 By the word mountains, the poet means to designate the chiefs. This is a common metaphor.

3 Literally: visited the grave.

Here is another passage from the same elegy :

"He has gone his way by whose aid you hoped to see repaired the errors of fortune. I cannot stop the tears of those eyes ; they will not be controlled but flow in torrents. For thee (O Ma'an !) my entrails are parched with sadness, ardent as a brightly-flaming fire. She who perceived both my body and complexion altered and changed since she saw me last. (exclaimed) : 'Lo ! Marwān is like a sword worn thin and requiring to be brightened.' She saw a man extenuated and injured by grief, which left to him an inheritance of misery ; and I said to her : 'That which seems to you so strange in me was caused by a stroke of misfortune grievous and unforeseen. The days of time are full of changes and transport a man from one state in another.' "

The same poem contains this passage :

"After the death of Ma'an, each night (of my sadness), seems, lengthened by the addition of many others. I grieve for him as for a father ! now that my hopes have proved false and delusive ; I grieve for him as for a father ! now that the orphans are famishing and seem as if consumed by sickness ; I grieve for him as for a father ! now that our verses and he who was praised in them are lost (to us) for ever ; I grieve for him as for a father ! where are now those numerous battles which caused mothers to abort (with terror) ? Plunged in despair, we have fixed our abode in Yamāmah ; we never intend to quit it and we say : 'Whither should we go since Ma'an is dead ? presents have ceased, and are not to be replaced.' Never did battles witness a bolder warrior than thee (O Ma'an !) one more nobly-daring and more firm of heart. The khalif will call you to remembrance, but with no hostile feeling, when he is engaged in serious matters and men (of action) are wanting; neither will he forget those combats so fatal to his foes, nor that encounter in which you proved yourself (his sole) protector, when other horsemen feared to charge. The brother of Umayyah now offers you elegies, after having bestowed on you his praise. He is now settled (in a fixed abode) who, every year before, used to remain so long without quitting the saddle<sup>1</sup>. He has now discharged his baggage, through sorrow, and sworn a solemm oath never again to bind it up with a cord."

---

<sup>1</sup> Al-Khatt, a town in the province of 'Umān, was celebrated for the excellence of its lances.

This is one of the finest elegies of its class. 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz (No. 316) relates as follows, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā: 'Ja'far the Barmakid (No. 129), having received a visit from Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah, said to him 'Come now! recite part of your elegy on the death of Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah' 'Nay!' replied the poet, 'I would rather recite to you an eulogium composed by me on yourself'. 'No'; said Ja'far 'recite to me part of the elegy.' Marwān then commenced to recite:

"Till Ma'an was borne to his grave, all mankind were as his children."

'And he continued to the end of the poem. Ja'far, whose cheeks were now bedewed with tears, asked him if any of Ma'an's children or family had given him a recompense for that elegy?' Marwān replied that they had not. 'And,' said Ja'far, 'if Ma'an were alive and heard you recite it, how much, do you think, would he have given you for it?' 'May God favour the wazīr! (he would have given) four hundred pieces of gold.' 'But I,' said Ja'far, 'do not think he would have considered that sum enough for you; so, in Ma'an's name, I shall order you the double and, in my own, I shall give you as much more. Go to my treasurer and receive from him one thousand six hundred pieces of gold, before you return to (mount) your camel." In the following lines, Marwān mentioned how generously Ja'far acted in Ma'an's name:

---

1 Such appears to be the meaning of the Arabic words. Rendered literally they may signify: Remained long in attachment to the middle of the saddle; or: who was always sitting cross-legged on the saddle. Domedary-riders sit with their feet crossed and lean them on the animal's neck.

"You gave me, as a recompense coming from Ma'an's tomb, an ample portion of the wealth which you so generously bestow. That gilt, you made it immediately, O son of Yaḥyā ! to one who lamented his death, and you did not delay the payment. A generous (patron) has replaced, for us, the spirit of Ma'an, and bestowed a recompense with the most liberal hand that ever lavished gifts. Khālīd and your father Yaḥyā have erected for you, in the regions of beneficence, an edifice never to be equalled. When the hands of the Barmakid dispense wealth around, he thinks it so much gained for himself."

He then took the money and departed. Abu 'l-Faraj al-Iṣbahānī (No. 415) relates, in his Kitāb al-Aghānī, that Muḥammad al-Baydaq al-Nadīm (the boon companion) went to see Ḥārūn al-Raṣhīd and was asked by him to recite the elegy composed by Marwān on the death of Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah. He began, and had only repeated a part of it, when tears flowed from al-Raṣhīd's eyes, "and so copiously" said al-Baydaq, "that they filled a plate which was before him." It is said that Marwān, after composing this elegy, could never gain any thing by his verses, for, as often as he celebrated the praises of a khalīf or of any other person less elevated in rank, he to whom the poem was addressed would say to him: "Did you not say, in your famous elegy:

'Whither should we go, since Ma'an is dead ? presents have ceased and are not to be replaced ? ' "

So the person he meant to praise would not give him anything nor even listen to his poem. Al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabī' (No. 503) related the following anecdote: I saw Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥaṣṣah after the death of Ma'an; he entered into the presence of (the khalīf) al-Mahdī with a number of other poets, amongst whom was Salm al-Khāsir (No. 9, note) and recited to him a panegyric. 'Who art thou ?' said the khalīf. 'Thy (humble) poet, Marwān, the son of Abū Ḥaṣṣah. 'Art thou not he who said: Whither should we go since Ma'an is dead? and yet thou hast come to ask gifts from us ! presents have ceased; we have nothing for thee. Trail him out by the leg !' 'They dragged him out in that manner, but, on the following year, he contrived to gain admittance with the other poets. At that time, they were allowed to enter into the khalif's presence once a year. He then stood before him and recited the qaṣīdah which begins thus :

'A female visitor came to thee by night ; salute her fleeting image . '

We have already given part of this poem in the life of Marwān<sup>1</sup>. 'Al-Mahdī listened in silence and, as the poet proceeded, he became gradually more and more agitated, till at length he rolled on the carpet with delight. He then asked how many verses were in the poem and, on being answered : 'One hundred,' he ordered to the author a present of one hundred thousand pieces of silver." This does not tally with what we have related in the life of Marwān, but anecdotes vary according to the different channels by which they are handed down. People say that it was the first time, under the 'Abbāsīd government, that a poet received so large a sum. "Very soon after," continued Al-Faḍl, "the khalifate devolved to Ḥārūn al-Rashīd, and I saw Marwān appear in his presence with the other poets and recite to him a poem. 'Who art thou ?' said the khalif. 'I am thy poet, Marwān'. Was it not thou who said of Ma'an so and so ? (repeating the verses above given). Take him by the hand and lead him out ; we have nothing for him. Marwān again managed to be introduced and then recited a poem for which he was amply rewarded." One of the finest elegies which exists was that which al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muṭayr Ibn al-Aṣḥam al-Asadī<sup>2</sup> composed on the death of Ma'an ; and which is to be found in the Ḥamāsah<sup>3</sup>. We give it here :

1 This hemistich is in the measure called kāmil. But such is not the case with any of the verses given by our author in the life of Marwān. He seems to have confounded the piece of verse he was thinking of with that which begins thus : In the day of battle, etc.

2 Al-Ḥusayn Ibn al-Muṭayr, a member, by enfranchisement, of the tribe of Asad and a poet of some reputation, accompanied Ma'an to Yaman. One of his poems is in honour of the 'Abbāsīd khalif al-Mahdī. Some of the verses composed by him are given in the Ḥamāsah. His death is placed on or about A.H. 150 (A.C. 767), by De hammer who, in the third vol. of his Literaturgeschichte der Araber, gives, on the authority of the Kitāb al-Aghānī, some rather unsatisfactory information concerning him. Several fragments of his poems are to be found in the Ḥamāsah.

3 Ḥamāsuh. p. 425.

"Draw near, my two friends ! unto (the tomb of) Ma'an and say : 'May vernal showers water thee every morning !' Grave of Ma'an ! how art thou able to contain such beneficence as filled both land and sea ? Grave of Ma'an ! thou art the first cavity ever formed in the earth, to serve as a couch for every virtue. 'Tis too true ! thou containest beneficence itself, for beneficence is dead ; were it living, it would have rent thee as under. He is the man on whose bounty people live after his death ; thus the bed of the torrent (when dry) becomes a pasturage. With Ma'an beneficence has ended and disappeared, and the pinnacle of generous deeds has been overturned<sup>1</sup>."

In our article on the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) we have related an amusing anecdote concerning Ma'an, so, we need not repeat it here. Did I not fear being led too far, I should give a number of highly interesting stories respecting Ma'an's noble deeds. Al-Ḥawfazān Ibn Ṣharīk al-Ṣhaybānī, who was much renowned for generosity and bravery, was the brother of Maṭar Ibn Ṣharīk, one of Ma'an's ancestors. He received the name of Ḥawfazān because Qays Ibn 'Āṣim al-Minqarī (No. 74, note) gave him a ḥafz, that is a stroke in the back, with his spear, to prevent him making his escape.<sup>2</sup> His real name was Al-Ḥārith Ibn Ṣharīk. According to another account, the person who struck him in that manner was Bisṭām Ibn Qays al-Ṣhaybānī<sup>3</sup>, but the first statement is truer.

706 MUQĀTIL, THE COMMENTATOR OF THE QUR'ĀN

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān Ibn Bashīr, a member, by enfranchisement, of the tribe of Azd, and a native of Marw in 1 Literally : and the nose (the pride) of noble deeds has been cut off.

2 For Qays Ibn 'Āṣim, see No. 74, note, and the Essai of Caussin de Perceval. The adventure of Ḥawfazān is related in the Essai, tome II, p. 595.

3 Bisṭām Ibn Qays, chief of the tribe of Ṣhaybān lost his life in a combat, six or seven years after the Hijrah (A.C. 627-8). (Ḥamāsah, p. 282 and 457 ; Caussin de Perceval's Essai, tome II, pp. 593, 598, 599).

Khurāsān, drew his origin from a family of Balkh. Having removed to Baṣrah, he proceeded from thence to Baghdād and taught Traditions in that city. He is known as an interpreter of God's noble book (the Qur'ān) and as the author of a celebrated commentary. Traditions were taught to him by Mujāhid Ibn Jubayr (No. 243), ʿAṭā Ibn Abī Rabāḥ (No. 394), Abū Ishāq al-Sabīʿī (No. 477), al-Ḍaḥḥāk Ibn Muzāḥim (No. 249, note), Muḥammad Ibn Muslim al-Zuhri (No. 537) and others. Baqiyah Ibn al-Walid al-Ḥimsī<sup>1</sup> ʿAbd al-Razzāq Ibn Hammām al-Ṣanʿānī (No. 249, note), Ḥaramī Ibn ʿUmārah,<sup>2</sup> ʿAlī Ibn al-Jaʿd<sup>3</sup> and others delivered Traditions on his authority. He held a high rank among the learned. The imām Al-Shāfiʿī (No. 532) was heard to say: "All the people derived their nourishment (in knowledge) from three men; they had Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān for the interpretation of the Qur'ān, Zuhayr Ibn Abi Sulmā<sup>4</sup> for poetry, and Abū Ḥanīfah<sup>5</sup> for dogmatic theology." It is related that (the khalīf) Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr was sitting (in his palace) when a fly came and settled on him. He drove it away, but it returned to him again and again, most pertinaciously, striking him on the face and continuing to tease him. He at length lost patience and called out; "See who is (waiting) at the door;" and, being informed that Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān was there, he had him brought in and said to him: "Canst thou tell me why almighty God created flies?" Muqātil replied: "I can; it was to humble the mighty by their means<sup>6</sup>."

1 Abū Muḥammad Baqiyah Ibn al-Walid, a member of the Ḥimyarite tribe called al-Qalaʿī and surnamed al-Ḥimī (belonging to Emessa), was esteemed a good Traditionist. Born A.H. 110 (A.C. 728-9); died A.H. 197 (A.C. 812-3) (Nujūm).

2 According to the author of the Qūmūs, Ḥaramī Ibn ʿUmārah belonged to the tribe of ʿAtik (العتيك), a branch of that of Azd, and was esteemed a good Traditionist. I can find no other information respecting him.

3 ʿAlī Ibn al-Jaʿd al-Jawharī, a Traditionist and a native of Baghdād, died A.H. 230 (A.C. 844-5), aged upwards of ninety six years. (Tabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz, Nujūm).

4 This Zuhayr is the author of the Muʿallaqah. For his life see Rosenmüller's Analecta Arabica, pars secunda, and Caussin de Parceval's Essai sur l'histoire, des Arabes, tome II, p. 527, etc.

5 The life of Abū Ḥanīfah Nuʿmān will be found in this work.

6 According to an old Tradition, God punished Nimrod by sending a gnat which penetrated into his brain and gave him intolerable pain, till he died.

Al-Manṣūr did not say another word. Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī (No. 19, note) related the following anecdote : "Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān took his seat (in order to teach) and said : 'You may question me concerning whatever is beneath the throne of God!.' On which a man said to him : 'When Adam performed the pilgrimage, who shaved his head? '—'Nay !' replied Muqātil, 'such (a question) does not proceed from your own mind<sup>1</sup> but God meant to humble me for my presumption.' " Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249) relates (the same anecdote) as follows : "Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān said, one day : 'You may ask me respecting whatever is beneath the throne of God ; and a man addressed him in these terms' : 'Tell me, Abu 'l-Ḥasan ! are the intestines of ants and pismires in the fore part of the body or the back part ?' The shaykh remained silent and knew not what to answer. It seemed to me a just punishment inflicted on him." The doctors (in Traditions) differ in opinion respecting Muqātil : some declare that, as a Traditionist, he was worthy of confidence, and others accuse him of falsehood. Baqiyah Ibn al-Walīd said : "I heard Shu'bah Ibn al-Ḥajjāj (No. 207, note) questioned concerning Muqātil, and he never spoke of him but in a favourable manner." 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak (No. 300) being asked what he thought of him, replied : "We have been told that he was apt to make mistakes." It is related that the same Ibn al-Mubārak renounced (making use of) the Traditions delivered by Muqātil. Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī, being asked if Muqātil had received Traditions orally from Al-Ḍaḥḥāk Ibn Muzāḥim, replied : "No ; al-Ḍaḥḥāk died four years before Muqātil was born and Muqātil himself said : 'A gate of four years was closed between me and al-Ḍaḥḥāk.' By this, he meant to designate the gate of the city which opens the burying-ground." He said also that Muqātil never received Traditions orally from Mujāhid nor ever met the man. Aḥmad Ibn Sayyār<sup>4</sup> says : "Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān, a native

1 That is : every thing in the universe.

2 Shaving of the head is one of the obligatory rites of pilgrimage.

3 Literally : from your own knowledge.

4 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Aḥmad Ibn Sayyār al-Marwazī, the greatest Traditionist who ever taught in the city of Marw, was distinguished also for his knowledge of the law, his piety and self-mortification. Al-Bukhārī and Al-Nasā'ī have given Traditions on his authority. He died A.H. 268 (A.C. 881-2). (Nujūm.)

of Balkh, went to Marw, whence he proceeded to 'Irāq. His veracity is suspected; his Traditions should be left aside and his declarations should be rejected. Speaking of the Divine attributes, he said things which it would be sinful to repeat." Ibrāhīm Ibn Yā'qūb al-Jūzjānī<sup>1</sup> called Muqātil an audacious liar. Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Nasā'ī (No. 28) said: "Liars notorious for forging Traditions and passing them off as coming from the Prophet were four in number: Ibn Abī Yaḥyā<sup>2</sup> at Madīnah, Al-Wāqidi (No. 618) at Baghdād, Muqātil, Ibn Sulaymān in Khurāsān, and Muḥammad Ibn Sa'īd, surnamed Al-Maṣlūb, in Syria." Wak'ī Ibn al-Jarrāḥ (No. 149, note) said of Muqātil that he was a confirmed liar. Abū Bakr al-Ājurri (No. 597) said: I asked Abū Dāwūd Sulaymān Ibn al-Ash'ath (No. 254) concerning Muqātil, and he answered: "All Traditions given by him should be rejected." According to 'Umar Ibn al-Ghallās<sup>3</sup> Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān was a liar and his Traditions were to be rejected. "As for Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān, "said Al-Bukhārī (No. 543) pass him over in silence." In another place he says of him: He is just nothing at all." Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in<sup>4</sup> declared that Muqātil's Traditions were of no value, and Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal said: "As for Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān, the author of the Commentary, I should not like to cite anything on his authority." "His Traditions are to be rejected:" said Abū Ḥatim al-Rāzi<sup>5</sup>. According to Zakariyā Ibn Yaḥyā al-Sājī<sup>6</sup>, people said

1 Abu Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Yā'qūb al-Jūzjānī resided at Damascus. His authority as a Traditionist is highly appreciated. He died A.H. 259 (A.C. 872-3). (Nujūm, Huffāz).

2 Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Yaḥyā, one of the masters under whom the celebrated doctor al-Shāfi'i made his studies, is considered as a Traditionist on whom no reliance can be placed. He died A.H. 184 (A.C. 800-1). Nujūm, the Tahdhīb al-Asmā of al-Nawawī).

3 Abū Ḥafṣ 'Umar Ibn 'Alī al-Ṣayrafī, surnamed al-Ghallās. or, according to another reading, al-Qallās, was a Traditionist of great authority. He died A.H. 249 (A.C. 863-4) at Sarr-man ra'ā. (Huffāz, Nujūm).

4 The life of Yāḥyā Ibn Ma'in will be found in this work.

5 Abū Ḥatim Muḥammad Ibn Idrīs al-Ḥanzalī al-Rāzi, a Traditionist of great learning and noted for his veracity, died at Ray. his native place, A.H. 277 (A.C. 890-1). (Huffāz, Nujūm).

6 Abū Yaḥyā Zakariyā Ibn Yaḥyā al-Sājī composed an important work on the Traditions. He died A.H. 307 (A.C. 919-920), at a very advanced age. (Huffāz).

of Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān, the native of Khurāsān, that he was a liar and that his Traditions should be rejected. Abū Ḥātim Muḥammad Ibn Ḥabbān al-Bustī<sup>1</sup> said; "Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān received from the Jews and the Christians such information on Qur'ānic matters as tallied with the contents of their own (sacred) books. He was an assimilator<sup>2</sup> declaring a likeness to exist between the Lord and His creatures; besides which, he lied in his Traditions."

On the whole, a great number of opinions have been omitted concerning him, but what we have just mentioned will suffice; it has even led me away from my subject, but I wished to make known what the learned said of his character. He died at Baṣrah in the year 150 (A. C. 767-8).

707 ABU 'L-HAYJĀ SHIBL AL-DAWLAH

Abu 'l-Hayjā Muqātil Ibn 'Atiyah Ibn Muqātil al-Bakrī al-Ḥijāzī (member of the tribe of Bakr Ibn Wā'il and native of Ḥijāz), surnamed Shibl al-Dawlah (the young lion of the empire), was the son of an Arab chief. Being obliged to quit his brothers in consequence of a quarrel, he proceeded to Baghdād and then set out for Khurāsān, whence he went to Ghaznah. Having returned to Khurāsān, he devoted his service to the Wazīr Nizām al-Mulk (No. 171) and married into his family. When Nizām al-Mulk was assassinated, he composed an elegy of which we have inserted two verses in the life of that wazīr (No. 171). He then went back to Baghdād and, after remaining there some time, he formed the intention of going to Kirmān and soliciting the bounty of Nāṣir al-Dīn Mukram Ibn al-'Alā<sup>1</sup>, the wazīr of that country and a man renowned for beneficence. He therefore addressed a petition to the imām (khalif) al-Mustaẓhir bi-Allāh, requesting to be favoured with a letter of recommendation for that person. Al-Mustaẓhir wrote the following words at the top of the petition (and sent it back); "Abu 'l-Hayjā! you go very far in search of a pasture-ground; may God speed you back! from Ibn al-'Alā can be obtained satisfaction (for every wish); his path in beneficence is wide and, what he may bestow on you will make you savour with pleasure the fruit of gratitude and find sweetness in the waters of his beneficence. (Receive my) salutation." Abu 'l-Hayjā considered these lines quite sufficient, and resolved on setting out for Kirmān without any other letter of recommendation. When he arrived there, he went to the Wazīr's audience-chamber and, having obtained permission to enter, he placed before his eyes the petition (with the khalif's note inscribed on it). The wazīr, on seeing it, descended from his throne in order to show his respect for the note and for him who had written it; he then returned to his seat, after ordering a sum of one thousand dinārs to be given to Abu 'l-Hayjā. The poet then informed him that he had composed a poem in his praise and brought it with him. The wazīr told to recite it, and he began thus:

---

1 See No. 695. There is a note, which does not give sufficient information respecting certain names and surnames by which some doctors are designated in works on jurisprudence. I shall complete it here. Abu 'l-'Abbās is Ibn Surayj (No. 20); Abū Ishāq al-Marwazī (No. 3); Abū Sa'id, al-Istakhrī; (No. 150); Abū Ḥamīd, al-Isfarā'īni (No. 25); Abu 'l-Qāsim, al-Anmāfi (No. 384) and al-Dārakī (No. 360) Abu 'l-Ṭayyib al-Ṭabarī (No. 279) and Ibn Salamah or Salimah (No. 553); 'Abd Allāh, Ibn Mas'ūd, a celebrated Traditionist and one of Muḥammad's Companions; died A.H. 32 (A.C. 952-3); al-Rabī' al-Mu'ādh (No. 221) and 'Aṭā, Ibn Abi 'l-Rabāh.

2 See Sale's Preliminary discourse to his translation of the Qur'ān, section VIII.

"Let your camels measure the breadth of the desert (if you mean) to go to Ibn al-'Alā; if (you mean it) not, then (let them) not."

The wazīr, on hearing this verse, ordered the poet another thousand dinārs and when the recitation of the qaṣīdah was finished, he gave him one thousand more and had him arrayed in a robe of honour. An excellent horse being then brought out, saddled and bridled, the wazīr said: "The wish of the Commander of the faithful "shall be heard and fulfilled<sup>1</sup> he prayed God to speed you back." He then provided him with every thing necessary (for the journey), and sent him off again to Baghdād. Abu 'l-Hayjā remained but a short time in that city and then proceeded to Transoxiana, whence he returned to Khurāsān. Having stopped at Herāt, he fell in love with a woman of that place and composed a great number of poems in her praise. From thence he removed to Marw, where he settled. Towards the close of his life, he fell into a melancholy madness<sup>2</sup> and was transported to the hospital, where he died. This event took place on or about the year 505 (A. C. 1111-2). He ranked among the most accomplished literary scholars of the age. His poems are full of originality and sweetness. An epistolary correspondence, in a sportive style, was carried on between him and the learned doctor Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Zamakhsharī (No. 684). Before their first meeting, he wrote to him these lines :

1 See No. 17, where this Wazīr is surnamed Naṣr al-Dīn.*
(As already mentioned in Vol. I, No. 17 the correct surname is Nāṣir.

* (It is not necessary because every نعمون may be substituted by نعمول illustrations of which may be found in this very qaṣīdah.—Ed).

"He (Zamakhsharī) is a perfect scholar ; the flow (of his style) is (brilliant) as the radiance of the stars. Zamakhsharī has every merit ; he is the noblest production of (his birth-place) Zamakhshar. (For me) he is like the sea ; though I have not seen it, I have heard of it."

Zamakhsharī wrote to him (in reply) :

"Your verses outshine so much my own, that I have arrayed myself in a robe of envy. But why should not the (humblest) plant become a lion (i.e. flourish) when the sons of the lion<sup>*3</sup>, water it every night" ?

---

1 Literally : exalted.

2 The verb tesawdan is derived, by a strange anomaly, from sawdā (melancholy) and bears, to this day, in Syria, the signification which is here given to it.

3 The sons of the lion, in Arabic, Banu 'l-Asad. The tribe of Bakr Ibn Wā'il, to which Abu 'l-Hayjā belonged, was a branch of the Banu 'l-Asad. Al-Zamakhsharī makes a poor quibble on the signification of the name and on the double meaning of the verb istāsad.

* M. de Slane has read it banu 'l-Asad while the correct reading is bi naw al-Asad. The former reading does not conform to measure. It means : plant flourishes when it is watered every night under the (zodiac sign of) Leo.—Ed.

Abu 'l-Hayjā's detached pieces are very numerous and elegant. The wazīr above mentioned is the same we have spoken of in our article on Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm al-Ghazzī (No. 17) a celebrated poet who went to Kirmān and recited to him a qaṣidah made in his honour. This is the high-sounding poem which rhymes in ba and of which two very fine and original verses have been inserted in that article. The piece begins thus :

"To drink from the wells of (my) tears will suffice for the camels which we ride on ; to smell the odour of the soil where (my beloved) had her vernal residence, will relieve their bosoms (from the pangs of thirst). When you see the lightning flash over (the valley of) al-'Aqīq, count on no other rain but that which our eyes afford."

In the transition to the encomium the poet says :

"With camels whose proof (of excellence) is (like) that of 'Isā Ibn Maryam (Jesus, the son of Mary) when the deep and rugged defile disables the pursuer<sup>1</sup>. They seem to dance through the mirage, now floating on waves, now sinking. They look like swimming castles, as if I had transformed them thus in traversing the deserts. They perceive a well-known odour breathing from Kirmān and, in their ardour, they sport about and play. They saw (i. e. they have left) behind the horizon of Minā (many) sun-risings and settings which they now think of no more. (For they hasten) towards a glorious (prince) who received not his honour by inheritance, but who toiled to acquire them as a gain ; (towards) a prince on whom fortune looks always with smiles as on one who, in serious undertakings, has no companion but a firm resolution."

The same poem contains this passage :

"When he speaks, all ears are attentive ; when he writes, all eyes are fixed on him. Never, till I met with Mukram, did I see 1 In scanning this verse it will be perceived that the verb قَتَلَ must be pronounced as if it belonged to the second form. These camels proved their excellence by saving the lives of the fugitives who rode them and bearing them through defiles in which the pursuers were completely knocked up. They thus gave life to the fugitives as Jesus gave life to the dead. Such is the conjectural explanation of the translator.

---

a lion in his den aspiring to high renown and bestowing precious gifts. Were he not a lion, with all his generosity, he should at least be one when the finger-nails (or pens) with which he attacks have become claws."

Here is another passage of the same poem :

"Let others be honoured by poets who describe their noble qualities, we have mentioned such excellence of his as gives fresh lustre to his virtues. To him belongs exalted merit such that if it took a material form, it would become as the eye and the eye-brow of the face of time. He cast a look towards the wazīrate, then hoary (with age), and that slight glance rendered it young again. He obtained it at first without stretching forth his arm ; and he held it, at last without springing forth (to seize it)."

The rest of this splendid qaṣīdah may be appreciated after the specimens here given.

708 ḤUSĀM AL-DAWLAH AL-MUQALLAD

Abū Ḥassān al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab Ibn Rāfi' Ibn al-Muqallad Ibn Ja'far Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Muḥannā 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Burayd* Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Zayd Ibn Qays Ibn Juḥah<sup>1</sup> Ibn Ṭahfah Ibn Ḥazn Ibn 'Uqayl Ibn Ka'b Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'sa'ah Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Bakr Ibn Hawāzin ; such is the genealogy of the 'Uqaylide chief who was lord of Moṣul and bore the title of Ḥusām al-Dawlah (the glaive of the empire). His brother, Abu 'l-Dḥuwād Muḥammad, the son of al-Musayyab, was the first of the family who established his domination in Moṣul. That event took place in the year 380 (A. C. 990-1). His daughter married the Daylamite (sovereign) Abū Naṣr Bahā

1 In one manuscript, this name is writtin Ḥawthah. (The Egyptian edition gives this reading.—Ed).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : Yuzayd.—Ed.

al-Dawlah, the son of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah, the son of Buwayh<sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-D<sup>h</sup>uwād died in the year 387 (A. C. 997) and his brother Muqallad succeeded him in the government (of Moṣul). He had a cast in one of his eyes. Our professor Ibn al-Athīr (No. 435) mentions, in his Annals, that al-Muqallad's accession to power took place in the year 386; that he aspired to the throne on the death of his brother; that the 'Uqaylids refused him their support and conferred the supreme authority on his brother 'Alī, because the latter was advanced in age; that Al-Muqallad had recourse to treacherous means and continued to employ them till he obtained the command. We here present a summary of the long account which Ibn al-Athīr gives of these events. According to another author, Al-Muqallad was highly intelligent, well skilled in the arts of government and an able politician. Having augmented his kingdom by the conquest of Saqī 'l-Furāt<sup>2</sup> he obtained from the imām (Khalif) Al-Qādir bi-Allāh the title of Husām al-Dawlah, the standard (of commandment) and the pelisse of honour. This he put on at al-Anbār, and took into his service three thousand soldiers, part of them Daylamites, and the rest Turks. (The tribe of) Khafajah then yielded him obedience<sup>3</sup>. Being himself a man of talent, he was fond of literary men and composed verses. Abu 'l-Hayjā Ibn 'Imrān Ibn Shāhin relates as follows: "I once travelled on the road between Sinjār and Naṣībīn in company with Mu'tamid al-Dawlah Abu 'l-Manī'ah Qirwāsh, the son of al-Muqallad. We came to a

---

1 Bahā al-Dawlah succeeded his brother Shāraf al-Dawlah in the government of 'Irāq, A. C. 980. Eleven years later, he deposed the 'Abbāsīd Khalif al-Tā'ī li-Allāh. He died at Arrajān. A.H. 403 (A.C. 1012-3).

2 Saqī 'l-Furāt signifies the country irrigated by the Euphrates. The author of the Mārāṣīd says, under the word Furāt, that the territory of the Saqī extended from 'Ānah to Sīb. This shows it to have been situated towards the south-eastern extremity of Arabian 'Irāq.

3 The Banū Khafajah descended from Khafajah, the son of 'Amr, the son of 'Uqayl, and belonged therefore to the same family as al-Muqallad. In Ibn Khaldūn's time, a little after the middle of the fourteenth century, this numerous and powerful tribe occupied a great part of the country situated between the Euphrates and the Tigris (see the Hist. des Berbers, tome I, page 26). The Khafajah, were noted for their turbulence and love of plunder. (Abulfedae Annales), t. III, p. 20).

halting place and, some time after we had dismounted, he sent for me. I found him lodged in a neighbouring castle, which was called after al-'Abbas Ibn 'Amr al-Ghnawī. This building commanded a fine view over numerous gardens and streams of water. On going in, I found him standing and looking at something which was written on the wall. I read the inscription, which ran as follows :

'Castle of al-'Abbās Ibn 'Amr ! why did thy Ibn 'Amr quit thee ? Long didst thou defy the strokes of fortune ; how then did (ill-) fortune take thee by surprise ? Alas ! where is thy magnificence ? or rather, where is thy hospitality ? or rather, where is thy renown ? or rather, where is thy glory ? '

Underneath were inscribed these words : 'Written by 'Alī, the son of 'Abd Allāh, the son of Ḥamdān, with his own hand ; in the year 331 (A.C. 942-3).' " I may here observe that the writer of these lines was Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān (No. 456), he whose praises are celebrated in the poems of al-Mutanabbī (No. 49). "Underneath was written :

'O castle ! time hath shaken thee and abased thy glory. It hath defaced the beauty of these lines which ennoble thy solid wall. Alas ! where is their illustrious writer ? where is all his might which so well befitted thine ? . '

Below this were inscribed the following words : 'Written by Al-Ghadānfar, the son of Al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī, the son of Ḥamdān, with his own hand ; in the year 363 (A.C. 973-4)' ". The writer of this was 'Uddat al-Dawlah (Faḍl-Allāh, see No. 167) the son of Nāṣir al-Dawlah al-Ḥasan who was the brother of Sayf al-Dawlah. Lower down was written :

"O castle ! what has become of those who pitched their tents in thy court ? Time has destroyed and removed them whilst thou remainedst widely extended<sup>1</sup>. Alas ! how short was the existence of those who walked in thee so proudly, and how long has been thine. "

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally : and folded them up in consequence of thy being long spread out.

"Under these verses were inscribed the following words : 'Written by Al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab Ibn Rāfi' with his own hand ; in the year 388 (A.C. 998)' ". The writer of this note was the person whose life we are giving. Then followed these lines.

"O castle ! what has become of the noble ones who dwelt here in former times ? Thou wert coeval with them and, in long duration, hast, outlived them all. The lines traced upon thy walls renew my grief for the son of al-Musayyab. Know that I shall soon join him and that I am hastening on in his foot-steps ! "

"These verses were subscribed : 'Written by Qirwāsh, the son of al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab, with his own hand in the year 401 (A.C. 1010-1011).' I was surprised at what I saw and said to Qirwāsh : 'Was it you who wrote that ?' He replied : 'It was ; and I am thinking of having this castle thrown down, for it is an unlucky place and has sent many to their graves.' I wished him long life and three days after, we set out again on our journey, but the castle has not yet been demolished." Al-'Abbās Ibn 'Amr al-Ḡhanawī, the person above mentioned was a native of Tall Banī Sayyār, a place situated between al-Raqqah and Rās-'Ayn, in the neighbourhood of Ḥiṣn Maṣlamah, a fort which bears the name of Maṣlamah the Ḥakamīde, who was the son of (the Umayyad khalif) 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān (Ibn al-Ḥakam). (Al-'Abbās) was governor of Yamāmah and Baḥrayn when the (khalif) al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh sent him to fight the Qarmaṭs, who were then making their first appearance. He gave them battle, but was defeated and taken prisoner. Some time afterwards, he obtained his liberty and returned to join al-Mu'taḍid, at Baghdād. He arrived there on the eve of Sunday, the 12th of the month of Ramaḍān, 287 (10th Sept., A.C. 900). Abū 'Abd Allāh al-'Azīmi, of Aleppo, states in his lesser historical work<sup>1</sup>, that al-'Abbās Ibn 'Amr al-Ḡhanawī died in the year 305 (A.C. 917-8). It is a singular fact that the ten thousand men he led against the Qarmaṭs were all slain and that he alone escaped with his life. (An occurrence equally strange befel) 'Amr Ibn al-Layth the Ṣaffārid : he marched with an army of fifty thousand men against Ismā'il Ibn

<sup>1</sup> See No. 281, note.

Aḥmad (the Sāmānid who afterwards became), lord of Khurāsān, and was taken prisoner, but all his soldiers escaped. Seventy years elapsed from the time Sayf al-Dawlah wrote the above mentioned lines till Qirwāsh wrote his. In the life of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr (No. 351) we have inserted an anecdote similar to the foregoing and taken from conversation which passed between him and 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān; to it we refer the reader. One day, al-Muqallad was in the sitting-room (of his palace) at al-Anbār, with some familiar acquaintances, a young Turkish page sprung upon him and slew him. This occurred in the month of Ṣafar, 391 (January, A.C. 1001). It is stated that he was buried on the border of the Euphrates, at a place called Shifyā*<sup>1</sup> and situated between al-Anbār and Hit. Some relate that the Turk murdered him (through fanaticism) because he heard him say to a person that was taking leave of him with the intention of going on a pilgrimage (to Makkah): "When you arrive at the tomb of God's Apostle, draw near to it and say to him in my name: 'Were it not for your two Companions, I should pay you a visit?'" The sharif al-Raḍī (No. 641) composed two elegies on his death and a number of poets wrote verses on the same subject. His son, Mu'tamid al-Dawlah Abu 'l-Manī' Qirwāsh, who was absent at the time, succeeded him in the supreme command, but had to maintain a struggle for its possession against two of his uncles, one of them named Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Musayyab and the other Abu 'l-Murrah Muṣ'ab Ibn al-Musayyab. The former died in the year 392 (A.C. 1001-2) and the latter in 397. Qirwāsh then remained sole master of the principality and was delivered from the anxiety which they had given him. His possession consisted of Moṣul, Kūfah, al-Madā'in and Saqī 'l-Furāt. In the year 401 (A.C. 1010-1011) he had the khutbah offered up throughout all his states for the prosperity of al-Ḥākim, the sovereign of Egypt.

1 According to the author of the Marāṣid, the village of Shifyā was situated at seven parasangs from Wāsiṭ.

2 Abū Bakr and 'Umar, whose memory the Shī'ites detested, were buried in the mosque of Madīnah by the side of Muḥammad's grave.

* Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Shiqqā.—Ed.

whose life we shall give, but he afterwards discontinued the practice. The Ghuzz<sup>1</sup>, having penetrated into Moşul, pillaged the palace of Qirwāsh and carried off from it more than two hundred thousand dīnārs. On this, he called to his assistance Nūr al-Dawlah Abu 'l-A'azz Dubays Ibn Ṣadaqah, a chief of whom we have already spoken (No. 212), and their united forces attacked the Ghuzz, slew a great number of them and obtained the victory. Abū 'Alī Ibn (Abi'l) Shibl al-Baghdādī (No. 635) a celebrated poet, composed a qaṣidah in his praise and spoke in it of this battle. He says:

"You spared your native soil the disgrace of entombing their corpses; the only tomb they got was the vultures maw. Yet they had overrun the land and obtained all that was possible of worldly wealth. They had broken open the gate (ritāj) of the

---

1 By the Ghuzz is here meant that race of Turks which founded the Saljūq dynasty. Our author has already (No. 664), given a sketch of their early history and noticed the departure of a fraction of that people from Işbahān to Ādharbā'ijān. Ibn Khaldūn, in his Universal History, chapter on the 'Uqaylides, enables us to trace the path followed by this detachment. In the year 429 (A.C. 1037-8), they took and plundered Marāḡḡah, defeated the Hadbāniya Kurds and then stormed the city of Ray, which was occupied at that time by Ibn Kākuyah. They marched from thence to Qazwin, ravaged Armenia, and devastated Dīnawar in the year 435 (A.C. 1038-9). From Armenia they passed into the country of the Hakkarite Kurds and, in 433, they entered Diyār Bakr and took possession of Jazīrat Ibn 'Umar. Having then defeated Qirwāsh, they laid siege to Moşul, took it and commenced there again the work of plunder and massacre. The inhabitants at length took up arms and slew all the invaders whom they found in the city. The rest of the Ghuzz penetrated into Moşul, the year 435 (A.C. 1043-4) and put the inhabitants to the sword. During twelve days, the city was given up to plunder. Qirwāsh then united his forces to those of Dubays and proceeded to Moşul. The enemy retreated to Tall A'far and, in the month of Ramaḡān 435 (April, A.C. 1044) they encountered the Arabs. A desperate struggle ensued, in which the latter were victorious. They seized on the camp and baggage of the Ghuzz, who fled to Na ib n. Qirwāsh pursued them as far as that town. They then entered Diyār Bakr which they ravaged and passed from that province into Armenia and Asia minor, where they acted in a similar manner. From thence they returned to Ādharbā'ijān.

barrier which kept Gog confined, but they found, in your prowess, the might of Alexander.<sup>1</sup>"

Qirwāsh bore the surname of Majd al-Dīn (glory of religion). His mother was sister to the amir Abu 'l-Hayjā al-Hadbānī, lord of Irbel (Arbela). He was a good scholar and an elegant poet. Some of his pieces have got into general circulation; such, for instance, as that which Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Bākhārī (No. 450) has given in his Dumyat al-Qaṣr and which we reproduce here:

"Praised be adversity! it tarnishes the vile but gives polish to the noble. I was mere mass of iron when adversity forged me into a sword, and the vicissitudes of fortune gave to my edge a free career."

The same author cites the following piece as a production of Qirwāsh:

"Let those who have inherited paternal wealth be praised or reviled (I care not). As for me, I give abundant thanks to the only God, so as to draw down (upon me) an increase of favour. Mine is a bay horse, impatient when reined in, and who, in our incursions, procures for us, by his efforts, all we can hope for. Mine is the sharp sword which seems to flash undulating lightnings when drawn from the scabbard; me, the sharp and pliant spear, the point of which seems to be tipped with death itself<sup>2</sup>. By these I acquired wealth, but I granted to the liberality of my hand full power to spend it."

These verses are really fine and well turned. The following lines are said to be his:

"(That girl) habitually perfumed, using odours not every second day (but always), delicately limbed, whose skin is smooth to the touch. When the vapour of the aloes-wood ascends through the bosom of her (robe) and covers her face, it seems to me a cloud shadowing the sun."

---

1 The musulmān fables concerning Gog and Magog (Yājūj) and Mājūj) are well-known. According to these legends, Alexander the Great chastised this people and built the barrier of Darband, in order to prevent them from invading Syria and Mesopotamia.

2 Literally; as if the mother of the fates was on the wood of it.

Al-Bākhazī, in his Dumyat-al-Qaṣr, attributes the following lines to Abu 'l-Jūḥah<sup>1</sup>, a cousin of the amīr Qirwāsh:

"When they dash through the dust of the battle-field, they seem like suns (in brilliancy) and like moons (in beauty). Let fortune treat them justly or unkindly, they never withhold their gifts from those who ask. When their help is called for, in impending danger, they risk their existence and care not for their lives. When the fire of war is dying out, they light it up again with the points of their spears<sup>2</sup>"

Among the pieces of verse contained in the (Dumyat al-Qaṣr), we find an eulogium on Qirwāsh composed by al-Zāhir† al-Jazārī, and offering this very good specimen of the (rhetorical figure called) istiṭrād<sup>3</sup>

"On a night gloomy as the visage of al-Barqa'īdī, cold as his ditties and long as his horns, I travelled forth. My sleep, that of a fugitive, was troubled like the reason of Sulaymān Ibn Fahd and like his religious belief. The camel which bore me was headstrong, and dashed forward with the giddiness and folly of Ibn Jābir; till the light of morning appeared, bright as the face of Qirwāsh, and brilliant as his forehead<sup>4</sup>."

1 Or Hawṭḥah, according to another reading.

2 The author employs here the term zinād, which signifies the flint and steel, or the two pieces of wood made use of for producing fire.

3 This technical term signifies, in rhetoric, the bringing about of the transition. In the Arabic literary schools it is defined thus: Istiṭrād signifies giving to the discourse such a turn as leads necessarily to a subject which was not, as first, that of the discourse.

4 The name of Sulaymān Ibn Fahd occurs in No. 387. According to Abu 'l-Feda (Annales, tome III, p. 50), he entered into the service of al-Muqallad, the father of Qirwāsh, and was appointed intendant of the latter's demesne, as he acted most tyrannically towards the farmers, Qirwāsh had him imprisoned and subsequently put to death, A.H. 411 (A.C. 1020-1021). The same historian cites the verses of al-Jazārī, whom he designates by the surname of Ibn al-Ṭamqarām, and informs us that Barqaidī was a singer attached to the service of Qirwāsh and that Ibn Jābir was the door-keeper or chamberlain of that amīr. They were all present when the poet recited these verses.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Ḥuwayyah.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: al-Ṭāhir.—Ed.

Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn 'Unayn, a poet of whom we have already spoken (No. 658), is the author of a piece composed in the same style and directed against two jurisconsults of Damascus, one of whom was nicknamed the mule and the other the buffalo. We give it here :

"The mule and the buffalo had a dispute which made them a show for every spectator. They went forth one evening and contended, one with his horns, the other with his hoofs. They did nothing well but vociferate as if they had learned to argue from al-Murtaḍā Ibn 'Asākir. 'Twas all long talk with meaning slender as the wits of 'Abd al-Laṭīf, the speculative philosopher. These two I warrant you, have not a third to match them in stupidity except the poet Madhlawayh!."

A friend of mine told me that he spoke to Ibn 'Unayn respecting the verses composed by Al-Zāhir al-Jazarī, and praised him at the same time for having imitated them so well, but the poet assured him that he had never heard them before. God knows best ! Madhlawayh : the person who bore this surname was al-Rashīd 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Badr al-Nāblusī (native of Napluse), a well-known poet who resided at Damascus and on whom Ibn 'Unayn composed a number of (satirical) pieces. He died on the 15th of the month of Ṣafar, 619 (31st March, A. C. 1222), at Damascus, and was interred near the gate called Bāb al-Ṣaghīr. The Dumyat al-Qaṣr contains another piece of verse composed by Al-Zāhir al-Jazarī. It is so witty that I cannot refrain from giving it here :

"See what an ample share of love fell to the lot of Ibn Shibl ! he never ceased lighting desires in every bosom. For him, the women neglected their husbands, et in juventute sua, immemores uxorum ipsos reddidit maritos. Illum impubrem amaverunt mares; puberem feminac; gloria Deo ! nunquam amatoribus carebit."

Of these three verses, I have since met with the two last in an article on Abū Naṣr Ibn al-Naḥḥās al-Ḥalabī<sup>2</sup>, which is contained

1 A few lines farther on, the author gives some account of this poet.

2 Abū Naṣr Ibn al-Naḥḥās, a native of Aleppo, and a good poet, lived in the fifth century of the Hijrah, for we know that his contemporary, Ibn Sinān al-Khafājī (see 381, note), died A.H. 466 (A.C. 1073-4). ('Imād al-Dīn, in his Kharidah, ms. of the Bib. imp. ancien fonds, No. 1414, fol. 156 recto).

in the Kharidah<sup>1</sup>. The author of that work says that Abu 'l-Ṣalt<sup>2</sup> gives them in his Ḥadiqah as the production of that person, meaning Ibn al-Naḥḥās. God knows best! His (al-Zāhir's) poetry abounds in fine ideas. Let us return to our account of the amīr Qirwāsh. He was very generous, a great plunderer and a free giver, following thus the custom of the desert Arabs. It is related that they reproached him for having two sisters for wives at the same time, and that he made this reply: "Tell me what thing we ever did which was permitted by law." He said also: "I have nothing on my conscience except the death of five or six inhabitants of the desert whom I slew; as for the town's people, God makes no account of them." He had governed fifty years when a quarrel arose between him and his brother Barakah Ibn Muqallad, who resided outside the city: he fell in to his hands, in the year 441 (A. C. 1049-50), was bound in chains and cast into prison. Barakah took his place in the supreme command, assumed the title of Zu'lm al-Dawlah (the guardian of the empire) and governed for two years. He died in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 443 (April-May, A. C. 1052). His nephew and successor, Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Quraysh, was the son of Abu 'l-Faḍl Badrān and the grandson of Al-Muqallad. Badrān was lord of Naṣībīn; he died in the month of Rajab, 425 (May-June, A. C. 1034). The

---

1 See No. 679.

2 Umayyah Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Abi 'l-'alt, a Spanish Muslim, is the compiler of a poetical anthology entitled al-Ḥadiqah (the shady bower), and containing extracts from the works of his countrymen. He passed the first twenty years of his life in Seville, his native place; twenty more in Ifriqiyyah (the kingdom of Tunis), at the court on the Ṣanhājiyyan kings (the Zirids who succeeded the Faṭimids and whose dynasty furnished to Ibn Khaldūn the matter of a long chapter in his (Histoire des Berbers, tome II, p. 9 et seq) he passed twenty years more as a prisoner in the (sultān's) library at Cairo. He had been sent to that city on a mission by (al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī), the Zirid sovereign who held his court at al-Mahdiyyah, but the Egyptian sulṭān had him arrested and confined in that establishment. On leaving it, he had acquired an intimate acquaintance with the philosophical sciences and the arts of medicine and musical composition. It was he who set to music the verses contained in the book of songs composed by African authors. He died at al-Mahdiyyah in the year 560 (A. C. 1164-5), or in 568, according to another account. (Maqarrī, Vol. I, p. 530).

first thing Quraysh did was, to hold an audience and have his uncle Qirwāsh put to death in his presence. This took place in the beginning of Rajab 444. Qirwāsh was buried at Tall Tawbah, a place situated to the east of Moṣul. He was generous and brave, an elegant speaker and poet. His name Qirwāsh is a derivative noun of the form fi'wāl<sup>1</sup>; it comes from the root Qarash, which signifies, in Arabic, to gain and to collect. (The tribe of) Quraysh drew its name from the same root, because the people which composed it was engaged in commerce. (The amīr) Quraysh joined with Arslān al-Baṣāsiri (No. 78) in plundering the seat of the khalifate (Baghdād). Some time after, the imām (khalif) al-Qā'im bi-Amr-Allāh, being again enabled to govern after his own will, wrote to the sultān Ṭughhrubek (see No. 664), requesting him to treat Quraysh with indulgence. After these events, news was brought (to Baghdād) of his death, that is, of the death of Quraysh, Ibn Badrān, who was carried off by the plague, in the town off Naṣībīn, towards the beginning of the year 453 (Jan., A. C. 1061). He died at the age of fifty-one years. The command of the tribe of 'Uqayl devolved on his son, Abu 'l-Mukārim Muslim Ibn Quraysh, who was surnamed Sharaf al-Dawlah (the nobleness of the empire). After the death of the Saljūqid sultān Tughhrubek, he aspired to the possession of Baghdād, but then gave up his project. He extended his rule over Diyār Rābī'ah, Diyār Muḍar and Aleppo; he even received tribute from the country of the Greeks (Asia Minor). Having laid siege to Damascus, he was on the point of taking it when he was informed that the people of Ḥarrān had ceased to acknowledge his authority. He immediately marched against that city, attacked and took it, and massacred a great number of the inhabitants. This occurred in the year 476 (A. C. 1083-4). None of his family ever possessed so extensive a kingdom as he. Under his administration, which was remarkably good and equitable, all the roads throughout his 1 That is : the first of the three radical letters in this word must have after it the vowel i, and the second must be separated from the third by the letters waw, alif. Fi'al is derived from the root fa'al (to do) ; the divers form of which verb are employed by Arabic grammarians as types serving to represent the forms of all other verbs.

---

states were perfectly safe. Among the numerous anecdotes related of him, we may indicate the following: Ibn Ḥayyūs, the poet of whom we have already given a notice (No. 647) died in the house where Muslim resided and left a fortune of more than ten thousand dīnārs. This was taken to the treasury of Muslim who, however, ordered the sum to be remitted (to the heirs). "No" said he, "never shall it be said of me that I gave money to a poet and then through covetousness, took it back. The cash which enters into my treasury is taken from the vilest of mankind<sup>1</sup>." The whole amount of the poll-tax<sup>2</sup> was distributed by him to the descendants of Abū Tālib; none of it being reserved for his own use. It was he who repaired the walls of Moṣul: the work began on Sunday, the 3rd of Shawwāl, 474 (6th March, A. C. 1082) and was finished in six months. The anecdotes told of him are very numerous. He lost his life in a battle fought, at the gates of Antioch, between him and the Saljūqid sultān Qutlumish, sovereign of al-Rūm (Asia Minor). This occurred on the 15th of Ṣafar<sup>3</sup>, 478 (12th June, A. C. 1085). "He was then aged forty-five years and some months," so says Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Ḥamdānī in the work entitled Al-Ma'ārif al-Muta'akhkhirah (information respecting later times)<sup>4</sup>. Ibn al-Ṣābi<sup>5</sup> says, in his chronicle, that Muslim, the son of Quraysh, was born on Friday, the 23rd of Rajab 432 (28th of March, A. C. 1041). Al-Māmūnī (No. 455, note) states, in his historical work, that one of his favourite slaves attacked and strangled him in the bath; he places this event in the year 474 (A. C. 1081-2). The Saljūqid sultān Malikshāh established Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, the son of Muslim, in the government of Raḥabah, Ḥarrān, Sarūj and the territory of al-Khābūr, and gave to him in marriage his sister Zalikhā the daughter of the sultān Alp Arslān. Muslim, the son of Quraysh and the father

1 That is, from the inhabitants of towns, merchants and farmers, three classes of men whom the Arabs of the desert heartily despised.

2 This tax was imposed by the law of Muḥammad on all Christians, Jews and Sabeans.

3 One manuscript has: the 25th of Ṣafar.

4 Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Ḥamdānī, the author of the historical abridgment mentioned here, died A.H. 521 (A.C. 1127).

5 The life of Hilāl Ibn al-Ṣābi will be found in this work.

of Abū 'Abd Allāh, had imprisoned his brother, Abū Muslim Ibn Quraysh, in the castle of Sinjār and kept him there fourteen years. On the death of Muslim, his son, Muḥammad, was established in the command (of the tribe), but his family rallied round Ibrāhīm, delivered him from confinement and placed him at their head. Some time afterwards, he was shut up again, with his nephew Muḥammad, by the order of Malikshāh. On the death of that sultān, they obtained their liberty. Ibrāhīm then assembled the Arabs and attacked Tāj al-Dawlah Tutush, the Saljūqid (see No. 119), at a place called al-Muḍayya'.*<sup>1</sup> Tutush took him prisoner and afterwards put him to death. This happened in the year 486 (A.C. 1093). Another chief of the 'Uqaylids was Abu 'l-Hārith<sup>2</sup> Mahārish, the son of Al-Mujallī, the son of 'Uqayb<sup>3</sup>, the son of Qiyān<sup>3</sup>, the son of Shu'ayb, the son of al-Muqallad the elder, the son of Ja'far, the son of 'Amr, the son of al-Muhannā. He was sovereign of (the town of) al-Hadithah. When the imām al-Qā'im left Baghdād, in consequence of the affair of al-Basāsiri, he was hospitably received by Mahārish and treated, during a whole year, with the highest honour and attention. This is an event so well known that we need not give a more particular account of it.<sup>4</sup> Mahārish was constant in almsgiving and prayer, and a regular attendant at the mosque and at (religious) assemblies. He died in the month of Šafar, 499 (Oct. Nov., A. C. 1105), at the age of eighty years. May God have mercy on them all!

709 MUKHLIŠ AL-DAWLAH MUQALLAD

Abu 'l-Mutawwaj Muqallad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Munqidh al-Kināni, surnamed Mukhlīš al-Dawlah (saviour of the empire), was the father

1 In Arabic character المضيعة. This is the reading offered by the autograph manuscript of Abu 'l-Feda's Annals. The place which bore this name was a district in the neighbourhood of Moṣul.

2 According to another reading 'Ukayth.

3 According to another manuscript Qiyār.

4 In the Annals of Abu 'l-Feda, year 450, will be found an account of al-Qā'im's expulsion from Baghdād and of his reception by Mahārish.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : al-Muṣanna'.—Ed.

of the amir Sadīd al-Dawlah<sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, lord of the castle of Shayzar, him of whom we have already spoken (No. 458). He was a man of great influence and wide renown, singularly fortunate in his son and grandsons. In the article on his son we have related succinctly how the power of this family took its origin and how they obtained possession of the above-named fortress. Muqallad dwelt, with a numerous band of retainers, in the vicinity of Shayzar near the bridge called after them Jisr Banu Munqidh, and from thence they went to reside alternately at Aleppo, Ḥamāt and other places, in the vicinity of which they possessed magnificent houses and valuable estates. This was before the family got possession of the castle of Shayzar. The prince who reigned in Syria treated them with great honour and showed them the highest respect. The poets of the time used to visit them and celebrate their praises: for many illustrious chieftains, noble, high-spirited and learned, belonged to the family of Munqidh. We have already spoken of one of his (Muqallad's) great-grandsons, Usamah Ibn Murshid (No. 81). Mukhlis al-Dawlah remained in the command of his people and in the enjoyment of exalted rank till the day of his death. That event took place in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, 450 (Jan.-Feb., A. C. 1059). His corpse was borne to Kafr-Ṭāb (and there buried). I find, in the collected works of the poet Ibn Sinān al-Khafāji (No. 381, note), a passage to this effect: "And he (Ibn Sinān) recited the following elegy on his (al-Muqallad's) death, which happened in the month of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, 435." God knows which is the true date. I give here an elegy which is really a very fine production and which was composed on his death by the qāḍī Abū Ya'lā Ḥamzah Ibn 'Abd al-Razzāq Ibn Abī Ḥusayn, who recited it to Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, him whom we have mentioned above. Though it is very long, I shall insert it in full, because copies of it are rarely to be found. I never met any person who knew by heart more than a few verses of it; so, for that reason, I am induced to give it:

"How well death aims its strokes against all living beings! the moment most to be feared speeds on more quickly than the rest.

<sup>1</sup> In the article on this chief, the author entitles him Sadīd al-Mulk.

The man (hitherto) safe and unharmed, how can he be gay when the cavalry of death and its ambushes are always before him? To human existence safety is granted but for a time, yet he who is most deceived by life's illusions confides in them the most. He to whom the robe of life has been lent must strip it off; he who defers paying his debt (to nature) is forced to acquit it. The Caesars have disappeared, and their palaces availed them not; the Chosroes have been prostrated to the earth, and their citadels could not protect them. The kingdom of Solomon could not save him from death, neither did his father find protection in his coats of mail<sup>1</sup>. Nought is in the world but travellers, arriving and departing; they journey towards a place far distant from their home. The breath of man is the bridle by which fate leads him on; and the nights (of his existence) are the stage of his journey. Why did death begin by assaulting Mukhlis al-Dawlah? Why were its sudden strokes turned away from others? Death is a watering place towards which man hastens after man, and others follow in rapid succession. The people have buried a noble chief, but never shall disappear (the memory of) his virtues. May the dew and the cloud-drops water the tomb of him upon whom has been poured the earth of the grave; for it contains a cloud whose (beneficent) showers used to dispel the parching droughts, a sea of generosity whose waves flowed over all the land. The son of Naṣr, borne upon his bier, seems like a dark vernal cloud whose (expected) rains were dissipated by the winds. He (now) passes the river, and its sands extol him<sup>2</sup>; he passes by assembled people, and the widows burst into tears. His bier is borne forth on (men's) shoulder (riqāb), but often were his gifts and presents borne away by travellers (rikāb). O, thou poet, who meanest to lament his death! see what thou hast to say; for the souls of all men will be suspended in attention to thy words. Earth in thy mouth<sup>3</sup>! though knowest not what hath been committed to the

---

1 See No. 254, note.

2 This seems to mean that the sands of the river admired his beneficence as being more copious than the waters which flowed over them, or because his noble deeds were more numerous than they.

3 A well-known imprecation. It means: may you be dead and buried!

earth; thou art ignorant (of it) and he who is ignorant of a thing, underrates its importance. He was a lord (whose glory seemed) like the moon hastening towards its full; whose hands were always ready to bestow, and whose spear, to strike. He now draws floods to tears from all; so that their eyes are like his hands from the torrents which they pour forth<sup>1</sup>. Eyes! spare not your tears, but let them flow in streams for the loss of a glorious chief whose flow of gifts never knew what stinting was. When asked for money, his hands showered it around; when asked to punish oppression, his lances showered streams of blood. How often did the self-sufficient depart humbled from his presence; how often did the modest obtain from him their wishes. His were victories which destroyed each warrior who dared to face him and every rival who had courage to resist him. His guests (reposed) in a garden the shade of which was his beneficence; those who tried to rival him in glory lost their lives in the attempt. O, how short was his life! short his stay (here below), short (the days of) his generosity! short (the time he went) sword in belt<sup>2</sup>. Noble ambition was the steed<sup>3</sup> that bore him to a goal which others could never reach. He died not before obtaining his utmost wishes; he disappeared like the moon when she has passed through all her stations. How long was he accus'tomed to receive with hospitality the troops which came to ask it; and to march against them if they came as enemies. Indulgent for offenders, his sword's blade spared them and his clemency sufficed to chastise them. (In battle) he ensanguined the bushy tail of his steed, and used to make the

---

1 The poet means that the tears caused by that amir's death flowed in a torrent, copious as the gifts which he used to shower from his hand.

2 Such seems to be the meaning of this verse. Here is the literal translation: O life of him! why wert thou shortened? and why were not long his stations, or rather, his hand, or rather, his shoulder-belt?

3 The adverbial expression سلاء تروجها is not easy to be rendered. It is applied to horses of the noblest breed and denotes that their long and busy tails fill up completely the space formed by the bifurcation of the hind legs. See al-Zawzani's commentary on the fifty-eighth verse of the Mu'allaqah composed by Amro 'l-Qays. Here it signifies at full speed.

shoulders of his (horse) throw out drops of blood<sup>1</sup>. Generous steed ! how long did thy back sustain the pain inflicted by thy intrepid (ride) ; O, that it sustained it now<sup>2</sup> ! Confusion and trouble abound since the death of that sagacious man whose genius cleared up every perplexity. His conjectures never deceived him, but guided always to result from which other men were misled. May the showers of divine mercy never depart from him ! may they always descend upon him, morning and evening. May the source of mercy water every morning the grave of him who shed, every evening, upon the needy, the torrents of his gifts. God decided that the amir's might should be no longer feared, yet numerous still are his horses and his spears. Here are his young warriors whose swords, now in their scabbards, gleamed like the lightning-flash to obey his orders, and whose lances shone like lamps. O, that his arrows were to-day rustling before him, and that the bellies of his horses rumbled still, but not from fasting<sup>3</sup>. Sons of Munqidh ! be patient under your misfortune ; in him whom you have lost, both rich and poor<sup>4</sup> have received a fatal stroke. Every man is overwhelmed with grief, and, if their sorrow persists, none will be found to blame them. Whilst the hands of other men are parched up (by avarice), you, sons of Munqidh ! are meadows and groves of generosity. When a man escapes from the burden of adversity, you are his support and his refuge. Aid me to bear our loss with patience ; he who has patience for his companion is not dismayed by the departure of his friend. He (Muqallad) did not sleep (in death) till there appeared in you (his son) a man fit to succeed him, one gifted with vigilance and firm resolve<sup>5</sup>. You and he are as two opposite constellations in the sphere of glory ; one has set and the other has arisen. Your people had not charged you

1 The meaning of this verse appears to be that the tail of his horse was reddened in passing through torrents of blood and that his shoulders were bleeding from the strokes of the whip. The word rendered by bushy signifies a tail of which all the hairs are equally long.

2 The poet means evidently the pain caused by the whip.

3 The rumbling noise produced by the belly of some horses in trotting is well known.

4 Literally ; the shod and the bare footed.

5 Literally ; abundant and perfect in resolution.

with the (supreme) command, did they not know that you accomplish what you undertake. Like him, you toiled to acquire honour and, had you not toiled, his superabundant merits would have sufficed for your renown. But you did not intend rising (to power) by means of what he did; you were in the right! the actions which raise a man must be his own<sup>1</sup>. I swear by your life that, in all which has happened, I was his bridle-companion and bestowed on him my sincerest love. How could my heart be devoid of that affection whose influence has penetrated into my bosom, to remain there for ever"? ?

We have here given the whole qaṣīdah. In our article on al-Ṣāliḥ Ṭalā'i' Ibn Ruzziq (No. 283), who was wazīr of Egypt, we have spoken of an elegy composed on his death by the jurisconsult 'Umārat al-Yamani (No. 464). It is in the same measure and the same rhyme as the foregoing. I quoted only a few verses of it, because copies of 'Umārah's collected poetical works are in every one's hands; whereas, the poem I have inserted here is seldom found complete. For this reason, I gave the whole of it. Two of its verses have been already inserted in the article on Jamāl al-Dīn Abū Ja'far Muḥammad al-Iṣbahānī, wazīr of Moṣul (No. 677). Abu 'l-Mughīth Munqidh Ibn Naṣr Ibn Munqidh, the brother of Muqallad, died in the year 439 (A.C. 1047-8). An elegy was composed on his death by the learned scholar, al-Khafājī, whose names were Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id Ibn Yahyā Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Rabī' Ibn Sinān<sup>2</sup>. This celebrated poet, who was a native of Aleppo, is the author of a collection of verses. The elegy of which we speak was one of his earliest productions as he composed it when a boy. We give it here:

"Thy excellent qualities have disappeared most strangely: we had them near us, but fortune burried them away<sup>3</sup>. Their

---

1 This verse contains a grammatical quibble, as the last hemistich bears two meanings, one of which is that the subject of a verb must be put in the nominative case. Trifling allusions of this kind are quite in the Musulmān taste.

2 This is the same poet of whom mention has been made in No. 381, note.

3 Literally: but time darted its remoteness against their proximity.

departure was like that of spring, and to spring's abundant showers has succeeded the burning heat (of sorrow) in our bosoms. "

A long qaṣīdah rhyming in r, was composed by al-Kḥafājī on the death of Mukhlīṣ al-Dawlah; another, by the same author and rhyming in h, was in praise of that amir. The poet displayed in both great talent.

710 MAKKĪ THE TEACHER OF THE QUR'ĀN-READINGS

Abū Muḥammad Makkī Ibn Abī Ṭālib Ḥammūsh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Mukhtār al-Qaysī al-Muqrī (a member of the tribe of Qays, a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings and), a native of Qayrawān, passed into Spain and settled in Cordova. He was deeply read in the sciences connected with the Qur'ān and the Arabic language; his intellect was clear, his person handsome, his piety sincere and his understanding great. The numerous works composed by him on the Qur'ānic sciences are very good. He was well acquainted with the seven readings (or editions of the Qur'ān) and the signification of every various reading which they offer. His birth took place at Qayrawān on the 22nd of Sha'bān, 355 (13th August, A.C. 966) at the hour of sunrise, or a little before it, according to another account; but the Qur'ān-reader, Abū 'Amr al-Dānī<sup>1</sup> says that he was born in the year 354. Al-Makkī passed his early youth at Qayrawān, at the age of thirteen years he went to Old Cairo and frequented the schools where the teachers of youth and the professors of arithmetic gave their lessons. He then returned to Qayrawān and, in the year 374, finished learning the Qur'ān by heart, having previously terminated his studies in arithmetic and general literature. In the year 377, he proceeded to Egypt for the second time, after acquiring a complete knowledge of the readings (as taught) at Qayrawān. The same year, he made the pilgrimage which is obligatory for the followers of Islāmism, and in the beginning of the year 378, he commenced studying the readings at Old Cairo under the tuition of Abu 'l-Tayyib 'Abd al-Mun'im Ibn Ghalbūn<sup>1</sup>. During the remainder of the year and part of the next, he continued his studies under that master, and then returned to Qayrawān. As some various readings of the Qur'ān still remained for him to learn, he went to Egypt for the third time, in the year 382, and completed his task. In the following year he returned to Qayrawān, where he began to teach the readings, and he continued his lessons till the year 387. Having then proceeded to Makkah, he resided there till the end of the year 390, and made the pilgrimage four years consecutively. In 391, he returned from Makkah to Old Cairo, whence he proceeded to Qayrawān, the year following. From that city he set out for Spain and, having arrived there, in the month of Rajab, 393 (May-June, A.C. 1003), he commenced a course of lectures on the Qur'ān-readings in the principal mosque of Cordova. A great number of students profited by his lessons and acquired a competent knowledge of the Qur'ānic text; this spread his reputation through the city and obtained for him high respect. On arriving at Cordova, he stopped at the mosque of al-Nukhaylah (the little palm-tree) situated in the street called al-Zuqāqayn* (the two lanes) near the Gate of the Druggists (Bāb al-Atṭārīn) and there taught the readings. He was removed from that to the principal mosque of al-Zāhirah<sup>2</sup>, al-Muẓaffar 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Abi 'Āmir<sup>3</sup>, and continued to

---

1 Abū 'Amr 'Uṭmān Ibn Sa'id, a mawla to the Umayyad family and surnamed al-Dānī, was born at Cordova in the year 371 (A.C. 981-2). He began his studies in the year 387, set out for the East in 397, spent four months at Qayrawān, one year in old Cairo, and made the pilgrimage. He returned to Spain in the year 399, after acquiring much traditional learning from the lips of Ibn Ḡhalbūn and other great masters. The number of works composed by him is stated to be one hundred and thirty. He died in the month of Shawwāl, 444 (Jan.-Feb., A.C. 1053). Al-Dānīyah (Denid) was his usual place of residence and, for that reason, he received the surname of al-Dānī. (Al-Maqqarī).

---

1 See at the end of this article.

2 The town of al-Zāhirah was built near Cordova by al-Man ūr Ibn Abi 'Āmir. See professor Dozy's Histoire des Musulman d'Espagne, tome III, page 179.

3 Al-Muẓaffar was the son and successor of the celebrated al-Manṣūr, prime minister of Hishām al-Muwayyad, the Umayyad sovereign of Spain.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : al-Ruwāqayn (two proticoes).—Ed.

give lessons there till the power of the 'Āmirids was overthrown. (The khalif) Muḥammad al-Mahdī, the son of Hishām (Ibn al-Ḥakam) transferred him to the Outer Mosque (al-Masjid al-Khārij) of Cordova, and there, Makkī gave lessons during the whole period of the civil war. On the death of Yūnus Ibn 'Abd Allāh<sup>1</sup>, he was appointed imām and preacher of the principal mosque by Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn Jahwar<sup>2</sup>. Notwithstanding his learning and intelligence, he was hardly adequate to the duties of that place, yet he continued to fill the office of preacher till his death. Makkī was noted for his virtue, his merit, his humility and his piety; the readiness with which heaven granted whatever he prayed for gained him great celebrity, and some anecdotes of his (miraculous powers) are still preserved. One of them is thus related by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ṭarafī<sup>3</sup>, a teacher of the readings: "We had at Cordova a man of some sharpness, who had the talent of annoying the shaykh Abū Muḥammad (Makkī); he would draw near to him when he was about to preach and nod at him and take a note of every fault he made. The shaykh had a great hesitation in his speech and often stopped short. One Friday, that man came to public prayers and kept glancing his eye at the shaykh and nodding to him. Makkī and I went out together and,

1 Abu 'l-Walīd Yūnus Ibn 'Abd Allāh, surnamed Ibn al-Ṣaffār (the son of the brazier) was qādī of the community (qādī 'l-Jamā'ah), or chief qādī, of the kingdom of Cordova. He was distinguished for his piety and learning. Some treatises were composed by him on Sūfism, for which doctrine he had a great inclination. One of his works bore the title of kitāb al-Munqaṭa'in ilā Allāh (book of those who renounced the world for God), from which may be concluded that it was a history of pious ascetics. He died in the year 420 (A.C. 1037-8), aged upwards of ninety years. (Casiri's Bib. Arab, t. II. p. 148; Bughyat al-Multamis).

2 Abu 'l-Ḥazm (not Abu 'l-Ḥasan, as Ibn Khallikan writes it), Ibn Jahwar, one of the wazīrs in the service, of Hishām III, took into his hands the government of Cordova in the year 422 (A.C. 1031), on the deposition of that sovereign. He retained the supreme authority till his death, which event took place in 435 (A.C. 1043-4).

3 Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Muṭarrif al-Kinānī, a native of Cordova celebrated as a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings and generally known by the surname of al-Ṭarafī (native of Ṭariffah), was born in the year 38. (A.C. 997) he died in the month of Ṣafar, 454 (A.C. 1062). (Ṭuḥfaqāt al-Qurra).

on reaching the place where he usually gave his lessons, he bid us say amen to the prayer he was about to make. Having then raised up his hands, he exclaimed: 'Almighty God! deliver me from that man,' which words he repeated three times. We said amen to the prayer; so, the man became a cripple and never again went to the mosque." Makkī composed a great number of instructive works, such as the Hidāyah ilā Bulūgh al-Nihāyah (guidance towards the attainment of one's object), treating of the rhetorical figures employed in the noble Qur'ān, of its interpretation and of the various sciences connected with it, and forming seventy parts<sup>1</sup>; the Muntakhib al-Ḥujjah (selections from Abū 'Alī al-Fārisi's Ḥujjah)<sup>2</sup>, in thirty parts; the Tabṣirah (elucidation), on the Qur'ān-readings, in five parts and the best known of his works; the Mūjaz (abridgment) treating of the readings, in two parts; the Kitāb al-Māihūr, etc. (opinions transmitted down from Mālik (No. 524), relative to the maxims of law contained in the Qur'ān and its interpretation, in four parts, the Ri'āyah li-Tajwīd al-Qur'ān (guide to the correct recitation of the Qur'ān) in four parts; the Ikhtisār Ahkām al-Qur'ān, (abridgment of the legal decisions contained in the Qur'ān), in four parts; the Kushuf an Wujūh al-Qar'āt wa 'Ilalihā (indication of the various channels through which the different readings have been transmitted down and of the defects remarked in these channels), in twenty parts; the 'Idāh (Elucidation), on the abrogating and abrogated verses the of Qur'ān, in three parts; the Kitāb al-'Ijāz (Abridgment), on the same subject, in one part; the Kitāb al-Zāhi fi 'l-Lum'a al-Dāllat 'alā musta'malāt al-I'rāb (the blooming, being a treatise on the lights which indicate the grammatical inflexion in general use), four parts; the Tanbih (Indication) on the principles of Nāfi's,<sup>3</sup> system of Qur'ān-readings and its controverted points, two parts; the Intiṣāf

1 It is not probable that the word جزء (part) should be employed throughout this article to signify volume; it may mean quire or chapter.

2 See No. 155.

3 The life of Nāfi' will be found in this work.

(vindication), being a refutation of Abū Bakr al-Adfū'i's<sup>1</sup>, Kitāb al-Ibānah<sup>2</sup> and an indication of that author's mistakes, three parts; the Kitāb al-Risālah (Epistle) addressed to the disciples of al-Anṭākī<sup>3</sup> in order to justify the system of Warṣh<sup>4</sup> relative to the maddah, in three parts; the Ibānah (Elucidation), on the rhetorical figures of the Qur'ān, in one part; the Kitāb al-Waqf, treating of the pause to be made after the words Kallā (by no means) and balā (certainly yes) when they occur in the Qur'ān, two parts; the Kitāb al-Ikhtilāf fi 'Adad al-A'shār (on the diversity of opinions respecting the number of tenths<sup>5</sup> one part; the greater Idghām, treating of the organs of pronunciation, in one part; the Bayān al-Kabā'ir wa 'l-Ṣaghā'ir (distinction between sins and faults); in two parts; the Ikhtilāf fi 'l-Dhābiḥ (differences of opinion relative

1 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Adfū'i (native of Edfou in Upper Egypt), was a grammarian, a commentator of the Qur'ān and a teacher of its readings. He was considered as the great master of the age in these sciences. His commentary on the Qur'ān filled one hundred and twenty volumes. He died in the month of the first Rabi' 388 (March, A.C. 998), at the age of eighty-eight years. Suyūṭī, de Interpretibus Qur'ānī.

2 According to another reading Kitāb al-Imālāh (treatise on the inclination) that is, indication of the cases in which the pronunciation of the letter a inclines towards that of the letter i. The work is not mentioned by Ḥajjī Khalifah.

3 This is perhaps the same person of whom mention is made in No. 139, note.

4 The nickname of Warṣh (milk-curd) or Warṣhān (wild pigeon) was given, by the celebrated Qur'ān-reader Nāfi' to his second disciple Abū Sa'id 'Uḥmān Ibn Sa'd, a native of Egypt and a Copt by origin, or according to another account, a native of Ifriqiyah (the province of Tunis). Warṣh was born A.H. 110 (A.C. 728-9) and died A.H. 167 (A.C. 783-4). (Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrd). His system consisted in softening the pronunciation of the alif-hamzah moved by a fatḥah, when it is preceded by another letter bearing a fatḥah, and followed by a quiescent letter. According to him the words انزلهم (sūr. 2, verse 5) and ارايتكم (sūr. 6, verse 40) should be pronounced andhartahum and araytakum and not a andhartahum, ara'aytakum. The translator is indebted to professor Fleischherd for these indications.

5 This title is too vague to indicate the subject of the work, which treated, perhaps, of the number of verses, counted by tens, which are contained in the Qur'ān.

to the Victim)<sup>1</sup> a treatise on the substitution of one preposition for another, one part; the Tanzih al-Malā'ikah 'an al-Dhunūb (on the impeccability of the Angels) and their pre-eminence over the sons of Adam, in one part; a treatise on the letter i as it occurs redoubled in the Qur'ān and in ordinary discourse, in one part; a work on the opinions of the learned concerning what is meant by the terms nafs (soul) and rūh (spirit), in one part; another on the necessity of exacting a fine from him who kills game unintentionally in the sacred territory round Makkah, being a maxim of Mālikite jurisprudence, with the proofs in its favour, one part, the Mushkil Gharīb al-Qur'ān (Qur'ānical expression of rare occurrence and doubtful signification), three parts; the Bayān al-'Amal fi 'l-Ḥajj (indication of what is to be done during the pilgrimage), from the moment of putting on the pilgrim-dress till the visiting of the Prophet's tomb, one part; a treatise on the obligation of making the pilgrimage for him who has means to perform that duty, one part; the Tadhkirah (remembrancer), treating of the points on which the Qur'ān-readers disagree, one part; the Tasmiyat al-Aḥzāb (indication of the names given to the sixty equal sections of the Qur'ān), one part; selections from Ibn Waki's<sup>2</sup> Iklhwān, in two parts; a treatise on the letters which coalesce in pronunciation, two parts: the Sharḥ al-Tamām wa 'l-Waqf (explication of the difference between the full stop and the pause), in four parts; the Mushkil al-Ma'āni wa 'l-Tafsir (obscure passages and figurative expressions) found in the Qur'ān, fifteen parts; the Hijā al-Maṣāḥif (on the number of letters contained in the different editions of the Qur'ān), two parts; a miscellany entitled Al-Riyāḍ (meadows) in five parts; the Muntaqī fi 'l-Akḥbār (historical selections), in four parts, and many other treatises on the readings, on the points wherein the readers disagree, and on the sciences connected with the Qur'ān. The titles of these works I suppress, so as to avoid prolixity. Makkī died at Cordova on Saturday, the 1st of Muḥarram, at the hour of the dawn-prayer,

1 In this work the author probably discussed the question whether it was Ismā'īl or Isaac whom Abraham intended to offer up as a victim.

2 Hājji Khalifah furnishes no information respecting this author or his work.

in the year 437 (19th of July, A.C. 1045); he was interred, the next day, in the suburb, and the funeral service was said over him by his son, Abū Ṭālib Muḥammad. Abu 'l-Ṭayyib 'Abd al-Mun'im Ibn Ghalbūn, the teacher of the Qur'ān-readings of whom we have spoken, was a native of Egypt. Al-Tha'ālībī (No. 356) mentions him in the Yatīmah and says: "To his piety, his talent and his profound acquaintance with the rhetorical figures and the grammatical analysis of the Qur'ān, he joined the knowledge of other branches of science and of literature. I heard a qaṣīdah of his recited in which was the following passage:

"Let your visits be rare; if frequent, they lead to mutual dislike. See you not that rain, falling without intermission, is an affliction; and that, if it be withheld, it is prayed for with uplifted arms."

Another author says that Abū Ṭayyib Ibn Ghalbūn was born in the month of Rajab, 309 (Nov-Dec., A.C. 921), and that he died in Old Cairo on Thursday, the 7th of the first Jumādā, 389, (26th April, A.C. 999).*

711 MAKKĪ AL-ḌARĪR

Abu 'l-Ḥazm Makkī Ibn Rayyān Ibn Shabbāh Ibn Ṣālih, surnamed Ṣā'in al-Dīn (guarding the religion) al-Ḍarīr (the blind), a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings and a grammarian, was born at Mākisīn and resided at Moṣul. His father made leather carpets at Mākisīn and died poor, leaving nothing after him but a wife, a daughter and a son, this Abu 'l-Ḥazm. The widow, being unable to support them on account of her poverty, was so much afflicted that her son left her. On departing from his native place, he set out for Moṣul and there applied to the study of the Qur'ān and general literature. Having then proceeded to Baghdād, he met there the ablest professors of literature and took lessons in Qur'ān-reading from Abū Muḥammad Ibn al-Khashshāb

* In the Egyptian edition 309 is obviously a misprint for 389.

(No. 325) Ibn al-Šaffār, Ibn al-Anbārī (No. 616) and Abū Muḥammad Sa'īd Ibn al-Dahhān (No. 247). Having then returned to Moṣul, he began to give lessons and had a great number of pupils. His reputation then spread throughout the country and his renown was borne far and wide. In Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfi's (No. 528), History of Arbela he is spoken of in these terms: "To a knowledge of the philological sciences he joined (a perfect acquaintance with the passages serving as examples and) proofs of (pure) Arabic phraseology; his piety and his intelligence were universally acknowledged and all agreed respecting (the extent of) his learning and (the greatness of) his merit. He went to Baghdād and there met the ablest masters in grammar, philology and Traditions. The quantity of oral information which he transmitted down is very considerable. He set up as teacher of the Qur'ān, and was acquainted with all the branches of literature. He recited to me the following piece of his own composition" :-- Ibn al-Mustawfi had studied under him at Moṣul.

"I am weary of life and have ceased to care for it; now it treats me as a friend, and then it afflicts me<sup>1</sup>. My foes cease not to harm me, and such also is the conduct of my friends. Al-Ḥadbā was my earliest abode, but those whom I love are now dwelling in the desert of al-'Aqīq<sup>2</sup>.

Al-Ḥadbā (the knoll) is a word used to designate the city of Moṣul.

By the same :

"When a favour requires solicitation, receive it not, so that you may rise next morning with a tranquil mind<sup>3</sup>. If a favour bestowed with a single reproach be disagreeable, how much more so, if bestowed with two".

1 The poet says : afflicts me in my saliva. This expression seems to signify rendering the saliva bitter, making a man unhappy.

2 A number of valleys in Arabia bore the name of al-'Aqīq.

3 Literally : that you may be next morning with a cool eye. The coolness of the eye indicates that it has not been inflamed by weeping. It is a very usual expression. In this verse we meet a verb which must be written نضح (nudhi).

By the same :

"At thy door is a servant who desires admission ; he looks for an usher<sup>1</sup> to announce him ; being assured that thy bounty is withheld from none. If he obtain his wish, he will enter (thy door) as good fortune has done ; if not, he will retire as adversity has retired".

This thought is borrowed from the following passage, composed by another poet :

"One of thy servants stands at the door, overwhelmed with thy bounty and acknowledging his gratitude. Shall he approach thee like the favours of fortune ? Mayest thou never cease to enjoy them as long as time endures ! or shall he retire from thee as adversity has done ?"

"At the age of eight or nine years," continues Ibn al-Mustawfī, "he lost his sight. He had always a great partiality for Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arrī (No. 46) and took much delight in learning from him his poems. Such was the conformity which blindness and the love of literature had established between them that he took him for a model in the composition of his own poems". A person who had received lessons from Abu 'l-Hazm Makki relates that, in his native town, his neighbours and acquaintances called him (Mukayk) which is the diminutive of Makki<sup>2</sup>. Having subsequently gone abroad to prosecute his studies, he felt a longing to revisit the place of his birth and returned there. On learning his arrival, those of his former acquaintances who were still alive went to see him and express their happiness that so eminent a man had been born in their town. The next morning, as he was going out to take a bath, he heard a woman calling from the upper room of a house and saying to another : "Do you know who is come ? Mukayk, the son of such a woman. "By Allāh ! " he exclaimed. "never shall I step in a town where they call me Mukayk" ; and he set out immediately although he had meant to make a residence there<sup>3</sup>. He then returned to Moṣul and, towards the close of his life, he proceeded to Syria with the intention of visiting the holy temple of Jerusalem. Having executed his project, he went to Aleppo and from that to Moṣul, where he arrived in the month of Ramaḍān 603. He died there on the eve of Saturday, the 6th of Shawwāl, the same year (6th May, A. C. 1207), leaving one son, a little boy. He was interred in the plain outside the Bāb al-Maydān (Hippodrome gate), in the cemetery called after al-Mu'āfā Ibn 'Imrān (No. 111, note). His grave is near those of Abū Bakr al-Qurṭubī<sup>1</sup> and Ibn al-Dahhān, the grammarian. It is said that he died of poison given to him by the order of Nūr al-Din Arslān Shah (No. 79) the sovereign of Moṣul, who had some motive for desiring his death. The orthography of the names Rayyān and Shabbah as given above, is exact. Al-Mākisīn is a town in one of the provinces of Mesopotamia and situated on the river al-Khābūr. Though small, it resembles a city in the beauty of its edifices and houses.

1 The word rendered by usher must be written and pointed thus أُذِيَ.

2 This proves that, in the name of Makki, the k is double.

3 The correct reading is تربث.

712 MAKḤŪL AL-SHĀMĪ

Abū 'Abd Allāh Makḥūl Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Shāmī (the Syrian) was one of the captives taken at Kābul (on the first conquest of that city by the Musulmāns). * [Ibn Mākūlā (No. 414) speaks of him in the Ikmāl, under the article Shādīl, and indicates his origin: "Makḥūl," says he, "was the son of Abū Salamah Shahrāb, the son of jhīdīl, the son of Sind, the son of Shirwān, the son of Bardak, the son of Ya'qūb, the son of Kisrā." ] Ibn 'Āyishah<sup>2</sup> states that he had been enfranchised by a woman belonging to the tribe of Qays, that he was a native of Sind and that he spoke (Arabic) incorrectly. Al-Wāqidi (No. 618) says that he was a mawlā to a woman of the tribe Hudhayl; others say that he was a mawlā to Sa'id Ibn al-'Āṣī<sup>1</sup> or to the tribe of Layth, "His grandfather Shādīl*, " says the Khaṭīb (No. 33), "was a native of Hirāt† and married a daughter of a king of Kābul. He died leaving her pregnant, and she returned to her family, where she gave birth to Shahrāb,‡ who remained in Kābul, with his maternal uncles, till he had a son called Makḥūl. When Makḥūl grew up to manhood, he was carried off prisoner from that place and then passed into the possession of Sa'id Ibn al-'Āṣī, by whom he was given to a woman of the tribe of Hudhayl, from whom he received his liberty." Makḥūl was the preceptor of al-Awzā'i (No. 336) and of Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz<sup>2</sup>. "The learned men," says al-Zuhri (No. 537) "are four in number: Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyib (No. 244) at Madīnah, Al-Shā'bi (No. 296) at Kūfah, al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (No. 148) at Baṣrah and Makḥūl in Syria. There was not in that age a more clearsighted muftī than he; and he never gave an opinion on a point of law without saying; "There is no power and no might but through God! this is (the result of) private judgement, and private judgement is sometimes wrong, sometimes right." He learned traditions from Anas Ibn Mālik (No. 539, note), Wāḥilah Ibn al-Ashqa'§, Abū Hind al-Dārī|| and a number of others. Damascus was the place of his residence. He spoke

1 The life of Abū Bakr Yaḥyā al-Qurṭubī will be found in this work.

2 Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Taymī, surnamed Ibn 'Āyishah taught Traditions at Baḡhdād. He was noted for his piety, his literary information and his acquaintance with the anecdotes respecting the Arabs of the desert and their combats. His death took place in the year 228 (A.C. 842-3) (Nujūm, Kitāb al-Ma'ārif).

* [ ] 'Abd al-Ḥamid omits this passage.—Ed.

1 Sa'id Ibn al-'Āṣī Ibn Abi Uḥaybah Sa'id, descended from Umayyah, the progenitor of the Umayyad family. His birth took place soon after the Hijrah, and his death in the year 59 (A.C. 678-9). He was governor of Kūfah under the Khalīf 'Uṭṭūman. (Nujūm.)

2 Abū Muḥammad Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz of the tribe of Tanūkh, was one of the principal juriconsults and Traditionists of Syria. He died in the year 167 (A.C. 783-4). (Huffāz.)

3 Wāḥilah Ibn al-Ashqa' Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzzā emigrated from Makkah to Madīnah when the persecution began against the first Muslims. He died in the year 85 (A.C. 704). (Nujūm.)

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Sāwūl.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Harah.—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Sahrāz.—Ed.

§ 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Wā'ilah Ibn al-Asqa', Wā'ilah appears to be a mistake for Wāḥilah. See Ibn Hajar, Tahdhīb vol. X, p. 290; Vol. XI, p. 101; his father's name is Asqa'.—Ed.

|| 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Rāzī, but Ibn Hajar supports de Slane (vide Tahdhīb Vol. X, p. 291).—Ed.

with a strong foreign accent, substituting some letters for others. Nūḥ Ibn Qays<sup>1</sup> relates that a certain amīr, having asked him what free-will (al-qadar) was, received this answer: Am I awake? [a-Ṣāḥir (اساهر) anā] whereas Makhūl meant to say: Am I a conjurer? [a-Sāḥir (اساحر) anā]. He at one time declared his belief in (the doctrine of) man's free will, but afterwards abandoned that opinion. Ma'qil Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā al-Qurashī relates as follows: "I heard him address a man in these terms: mā fa'alt tilk al-hājah (الهاجة) meaning to say: ma fa'alt tilk al-hājah (العاجه) (I did not do that business); and this fault of pronunciation is very common with the natives of Sind." It is related that Abū 'Aṭā Marzūq al-Sindī, a poet of some reputation and a Mawlā of the family of Asad Ibn Khuzaymah, had the same defect in his pronunciation, and that, one evening, Ḥammād al-Rāwiyah (No. 196), Ḥammād 'Ajrād the poet (No. 197), Hammād Ibn Zibriqān<sup>2</sup> and Bakr Ibn Muṣ'ab al-Muzanī met together for the purpose of holding a conference. One of them then said: "We have here ready, in our assembly-room, every thing we may require; suppose that we send for Abū 'Aṭā al-Sindī, so that the company may be complete? They sent for him, and Ibn Zibriqān asked if any of them were inclined to entrap Abū 'Aṭā and induce him to pronounce the words jarādah (locust), zujj (the butt end of a spear) and ṣhayṭān (demon). He chose these words because Abū 'Aṭā pronounced the j like a z and the ṣh like an s. "I shall do it," replied Ḥammād al-Rāwiyah. Abū 'Aṭā entered soon after and said: Ḥayyākum Allāh (God grant you long life!), (pronouncing the first word with an ordinary h (ه) instead of the emphatic h (ح)) on which they made answer: Marhaban! Marhaban! (Welcome! Welcome!), (substituting one h for the other and thus) imitating his (vicious) pronunciation. They asked him if he had dined (ta'ashshīt)*? and he replied: "Yes I have dined (ta'assīt); but have you got any nabidh<sup>3</sup> here"? They answered that they had and,

1 Nūḥ Ibn Qays, a native of Baṭrah, died in the year 183 (A.C. 799-800) (Nuḥūm).

2 The three Ḥammāds were strongly suspected of holding infidel doctrines (zandīqiyah). The year in which the third died is not mentioned in the works consulted by the translator.

3 See No. 129, note.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: tata'ssi.—Ed.

when it was brought, he drank till he relaxed from his gravity. Ḥammād al-Rāwiyah then said to him: "Tell me, Abū 'Aṭā! have you a talent for solving riddles?" he replied: "Pretty fair" (hasan), meaning to say hasan. Ḥammād then propounded to him the following enigma of which the word is locust (jarādah):

"What is the yellow thing nicknamed Umm 'Awf, whose two little legs are like two reaping books"?

"Zarādah, replied Abū 'Aṭā. "Right!" said the other. Ḥammād then proposed this riddle, the word of which is zujj:

"What is the name of the iron fastened to the spear, somewhat below the centre of it, and which is not the head"?

"Zuzz," said Abū 'Aṭā. "You have hit upon it," said Ḥammād. He then propounded the following riddle, on a mosque near Baṣrah:

"Knowest thou a mosque belonging to the Banū Tamīm, a little beyond al-Nīl* and on this side of Banū Abbān?"

"It is Banū Sayṭān", answered Abū 'Aṭā. "Right!" said Ḥammād. They thus passed an agreeable night, conversing and carousing till morning. This Abū 'Aṭā was a good poet and an akḥrah slave, akḥrah means: having the ears slit. Some fine pieces of his are given in the Ḥamāsah<sup>1</sup> and, were I not afraid of being prolix and led away from my subject, I should insert here a number of them.—Makḥūl died in the year 118 (A. C. 736); other accounts place his death in the years 113, 116, 112 and 114. Kābul is a well known place in the province of Sind.

713 MALIK SHĀH, THE SON OF ALP ARSLĀN

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Malik Shāh, the son of Alp Arslān Muḥammad, the son of Dāwūd, the son of Mikāyil, the son of Saljūq, the son of Duqāq, bore the surname of Jalāl al-Dawlah (the magnificence of the empire). We have already spoken of his father (No. 665) and of some other members of the same family. At the time of Alp Arslān's death, his son Malik Shāh was with him, though he had never accompanied him in any previous expedition. When Alp Arslān was about to breathe his last, he nominated Malik Shāh as his successor and caused the amīrs and the troops to swear fealty to him; he ordered, at the same time, his wazīr Nizām al-Mulk Abū 'Alī al-Hasan (No. 171), to distribute the provinces of the empire between his other sons, on the condition of their acknowledging the supremacy of Malik Shāh. The directions being executed, Malik Shāh crossed the Jayhūn and returned into the province, (of Khurāsān). As we have spoken of this event (the death of Alp Arslān), we need not relate it here. On arriving in that country, Malik Shāh, being informed that his uncle *Qadard, lord of Kirmān,] had revolted against him, hastened to attack him and gave him battle near Hamadhān. [Qadard] * was defeated and being closely pursued by a detachment of Malik Shāh's troops, he fell into their hands and was brought back into the presence of his nephew. Finding that all his promises of repentance were of no avail and that the declaration of his willingness to remain imprisoned for life, provided his life were spared, obtained no reply from Malik Shāh, he sent to him a casket containing the letters of those amīrs who had pushed him to revolt. The sultān called for Nizām al-Mulk and told him to examine the contents of the casket; but the wazīr, instead of obeying his orders, threw it unopened into a brazier which happened to be at hand. As a great number of Malik Shāh's officers had written to [Qadard,]* the discovery of the casket gave them much alarm, but the burning of its contents allayed their apprehensions and secured their fidelity. This proceeding, which established the authority of the sultān, is considered as a striking example of Nizām al-Mulk's consummate prudence. Malik Shāh then ordered his uncle to be put to death and had him strangled with the string of his own bow. Having settled his power on a solid basis, he increased his empire by conquests such as had never been made by any Muslim Prince, since the time of the ancient Khalifs. * [He reduced under his sway the country beyond the Jayhūn, the territory of the Hayāṭilah (Tukhārīstān), Bāb al-Abwāb (Darband), Al-Rūm (Asia Minor), Diyār Bakr, al-Jazīrah (Mesopotamia) and Syria. The public prayer was offered up in his name from all the pulpits of Islāmism, excepting those of Maghrib (Africa and Spain);] for his dominion extended in length from Kāshghar, a city in the farthest extremity of the country inhabited by the Turks, to Bayt al-Maqdis (Jerusalem), and, in breadth, from (the vicinity of) Constantinople to the country of the Khazars<sup>1</sup> and the Indian Ocean. He was thus enabled to entrust to his Mamlūks the government of the world. The justice of his conduct ranked him among the best of kings and obtained for him the title of al-Malik al-'Ādil (the just prince). Successful in war, he laboured also with zeal in spreading (throughout his empire) the benefits of civilisation: he dug numerous canals, walled a great number of cities, built bridges and constructed ribāṭs<sup>2</sup> in the desert places. The mosque at Baghdād which is called Jāmi' al-Sulṭān, was erected by him; the building of this edifice, which added new splendour to the seat of the empire, was commenced in the month of Muḥarram, 485 (Feb-March, A. C. 1092). He spent immense sums in constructing (cāravānserāis) on the road leading to Makkah, and he suppressed all (illegal) tolls and duties<sup>3</sup> throughout his dominions. His fondness for the chase was excessive; it is stated that he had an account taken of the number of animals killed by him, with his own hand, and that it amounted to ten thousand. He therefore gave ten thousand pieces of gold in alms; but previously to that, he had slain many more of which no reckoning had been kept. "I fear," said he, "offending Almighty God by shedding the blood of animals (for pleasure and) not for food;" so ever after, when he killed a head of game, he

<sup>1</sup> In Freytag's edition of the Ḥamāsah, we find only one piece by Abū 'Aṭā.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: النيل (a mile). Al-Nīl is the name of a village, near Kūfah, between Baḥdād and Wāsiṭ.—Ed.

* [ ] 'Abd al-Ḥamīd omits it.—Ed.

1 The Khazars inhabited the country to the north of the Caspian Sea.

2 See No. 72 note.

3 The word khafārāt, here rendered by duties, signifies more exactly the sums paid by travellers for an escort or safe-conduct, when passing through a dangerous country.

* [ ] C nitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

bestowed a piece of gold in charity. Having set out from Kūfah, with the intention of accompanying the pilgrim caravan a part of the way, he passed through al-'Uzayb<sup>1</sup> and went with them as far as Wāqīṣah. As he had met a great number of wild animals on his way, he erected there a tower with the hoofs of the onagers and the horns of the deer which he killed during the journey. This took place in the year 480 (A. C. 1087-8). The tower still remains standing and is called the minaret of horns (Minārat al-Qurūn). During his reign, all the roads were safe, and places of danger no longer inspired terror; caravans travelled without an escort from the country beyond the Jayhūn to the farthest extremity of Syria, even one or two persons might undertake a journey without fear or apprehension. Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadḥānī (No. 167) relates, in his History, that the sultān Malik Shāh marched against his brother Tutuṣh, and, on passing by the funeral chapel erected at Tūs over 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā (No. 398), he entered into it with Niẓām al-Mulk. They both remained a long time in prayer, after which the sultān asked the wazīr what he had prayed for. Niẓām al-Mulk replied: "I implored God to assist you and grant you the victory over your brother." "Well!" said Malik Shāh, "that was not what I asked for; I only said: Almighty God! come to our assistance and give Thy aid to him of the two whose reign will be the more advantageous to the Musalmāns and the more profitable to the people." Farther on, al-Hamadḥānī says: "It is related that a preacher entered into his presence and made him an exhortation, in which he said, amongst other things: A certain Chosroes happened to go apart from his army and pass near a garden. He went up to the gate and asked for a drink of water. A young girl brought him out a cup filled with sugar-cane juice (cooled) with snow. Finding the draught very good, he asked how it was made, and she answered: The sugar-cane grows so well with us that we can squeeze it with our hands and press out of it this juice. Go then, said he, and bring me more. The girl obeyed (and went in) without knowing who he was, and Chosroes said to himself: I must remove those people elsewhere and take their garden for myself. Almost immediately after, the girl came out weeping and said : The intentions of our sultān are changed ! How do you know that ? said he. She replied : I used to take at random as much of that (sugar-cane) as I wanted ; but now, notwithstanding all my efforts in pressing it, I cannot obtain from it even a small part of what I got the first time. The sultān felt the truth of her words, gave up his intention and told her to go back again, saying that she would succeed. The girl obeyed and then came forth rejoicing, with an abundance of sugar-cane juice. The sultān here said to the preacher : Why do you not relate to the people how Chosroes passed by a garden and asked for a bunch of grapes just ripening. The keeper made answer : That I cannot give, for the sultān has not yet received the share to which he has a right, and it is not lawful for me to wrong him of his due. The persons present admired the talent of the sultān in matching one story with another and adducing an anecdote favourable to his own rights in reply to one which reminded him of his duties." The following anecdote is related by the same historian ; "This sultān met a native of al-Sawād (No. 485) and, seeing him weep, he asked him what was the cause of his grief. The man replied : I bought a water-melon for a few pence, the only money I had, but I was met by three Turkish pages who took it from me ; yet that (melon) was the only resource I had (for making a small gain). The sultān told him to keep silent and, as the season for early melons was just coming in he called on a tent-pitcher and said : 'I have a longing for melons ; go therefore through the camp and, if you find one, bring it here.' The man (obeyed aul) brought back a melon. The sultān asked him in whose possession he had found it and, being informed that it was such and such an amīr who had it, he caused that officer to be brought into his presence. 'Where did you get this melon' ? said he. The amīr replied ; 'It was brought to me by my pages'. 'Bring them here immediately' ; said the sultān. The amīr withdrew and, being aware of the sultān's intention with respect to them, he bade them take to flight. When he came back, he declared that he could not find them: on which the sultān turned towards the native of al-Sawād and said; 'Take this slave of mine; I give him to you because he has not delivered up the persons who took your property; now, by Allāh! if you let him go, I shall strike off your head.' The man laid hold of the amīr and led him out of the sultān's presence. He then sold him his liberty for three hundred pieces of gold and, having come back, he said: 'O Sultān! I have sold your slave for three hundred pieces of gold'. 'Are you satisfied?' said the sultān. 'I am.' 'Well, go away and good luck attend you.' The sultān's prosperity and good fortune never abandoned him<sup>2</sup>; when he entered Işbahān, Baghdād or any other city, accompanied by his followers, the number of whom was immense, a great diminution ensued in the price of provisions and other objects, so that the persons who sought to gain their livelihood furnished provisions to the troops with much profit to themselves." The same al-Hamadhānī relates that, when the sultān was at Ray a female singer was presented to him. Being struck with her beauty and charmed with her voice, he resolved to gratify his passion, but she addressed him in these terms: "Sultān of the universe! I love too well<sup>3</sup> this handsome face of mine to have it tormented hereafter in the fire of hell. A lawful act is easy to be done and one single word suffices to distinguish it from an unlawful one<sup>4</sup>." The sultān felt the truth of what she said and having sent for the qādī, he got united to her in marriage. He died, leaving her a widow. His noble deeds were numerous beyond description. It is stated by al-Hamadhānī that the Wazīr Niāẓm al-Mulk gave to the boatmen who ferried the sultān and his troops across the Jayhūn a bill payable by the revenue-collector of Antioch; so vast was the extent of the empire. The sum for ferriage amounted to eleven thousand pieces of gold (dinārs). The khalīf al-Muqtadī bi-Allah married a daughter of this sultān. The ambassador sent to ask her in marriage was the shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) the author of the Muhadhdhab and the Tanbih. Being despatched on this mission, he proceeded to Naysābūr where he found the sultān, delivered his message and succeeded in the 1 It is possible that the word مصاحبا may here signify quietly.

---

1 Al-'Uzayb is the name of a source situated at the distance of four miles from al-Qādisiyyas. (Marāṣid).

2 Literally: Were attached to his fore-lock.

3 Literally: I am jealous of.

4 The word ترو جتک (I take thee in marriage) is meant.

negotiation. "In somewhat less than four months," says al-Hamadhānī," Abū Ishāq returned. When at Naysābūr, he discussed (points of law) with the Imām al-Ḥaramayn (No. 353) and, on his departure, the Imām came out to bid him farewell and even held his stirrup till he mounted. The utmost respect was shewn to Abū Ishāq in Khurāsān; the people gathered up the dust in the footsteps of his mule and preserved it as a relic of great virtue." In the year 480 (A. C. 1087-8), the daughter of the sultān was conducted in state to the khalif, and, on the morning of the day in which the marriage was consummated, the khalif caused the sultān's troops to be brought to a banquet (simāt) which he had prepared for them and in which forty thousand manns<sup>1</sup> of sugar alone were consumed. The same year, in the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah (February, A. C. 1088), the princess bore the khalif a son to whom he gave the name of Abū 'l-Faḍl Ja'far. The city of Baghdād was splendidly adorned on this occasion; it formed part of the sultān's states, the khalif having there only a nominal authority. This was the second time the sultān visited Baghdād. He entered it for the third time in the beginning of the month of Shawwāl, 485 (Nov., A. C. 1092), and set off immediately on a hunting party, in the direction of the Dujayl<sup>2</sup>. Having then killed an antelope and eaten of its flesh, he was taken ill and had to be bled; but, as enough of blood was not drawn from him, he returned to Baghdād very unwell and none of his officers were admitted into his presence. He entered the city on the 15th of Shawwāl, 485 (18th Nov., A. C. 1092), and died the next day. He was born on the 9th of the first Jumādā, 447 (6th August, A. C. 1055). Some say that his death was caused by a poisoned tooth-pick. His funeral was conducted in the most private manner; no prayer was said over the grave, no sittings of condolence were held, no hair was cut off the tails of horses, though such a thing was customary in the case of persons such as he. One would have thought he had been snatched away bodily from the world. His corpse was borne to Iṣbahān and interred in the great college appropriated to the

1 The mann is a weight of about two pounds.

2 This river falls into the Tigris, above Baghdād.

Shāfi'ites and Ḥanafites. We shall here relate a singular circumstance: When he entered Baghdād for the third time, the khalif had two sons, one of whom was (subsequently) the imām al-Mustazhir bi-Allāh; the other, who bore the name of Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far, was the son of the sulṭān's daughter. The khalif had solemnly designated as his successor the first named of these two, because he was the elder, but the sulṭān insisted that he should revoke the nomination, declare Abu 'l-Faḍl heir to the khalifate, put him in possession of Baghdād and then remove himself to Baṣrah. The khalif felt the greatest repugnance to execute what had been required of him; he used every effort to change the sulṭān's determination and, finding all his remonstrances fruitless, he asked and obtained a delay of ten days in order to make the necessary preparations for his departure. It is related that, during these days, he kept a rigorous fast and, when he did take food, he sat upon ashes and invoked the assistance of the Almighty God against the sulṭān. That period of time had not yet elapsed when the sulṭān fell ill and died, and the khalif was thus delivered from his trouble. In the year 502 (A. C. 1108-9), the imām al-Mustazhir bi-Allāh married Khātūn al-'Ismah, the daughter of Malik Shāh. We have already spoken of this sulṭān's three sons, the princes Barkyārūq (No. 107); Sinjar (No. 260) and Muḥammad (No. 666). Having mentioned (above) where Kāshghar is situated, we need not repeat our observations. Al-Wāqīṣah is a well-known halting-place on the road to Makkah. It is called also Wāqīṣat al-Ḥarūn واقصه الحرون.

714 MANṢŪR AL-TAMĪMĪ THE JURISCONSULT

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Manṣūr Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Umar al-Tamīmī (member of the tribe of Tamīm) al-Ḍarīr (the blind), was a native of Egypt and a jurisconsult of the Shāfi'ite sect. His family belonged to Rās-'Ayn, a well known town in Mesopotamia. He acquired his knowledge of the law from the immediate disciples of al-Shāfi'ī (No. 532) and from those who had studied under them. Some good works were composed by him on the doctrines of his sect, such as the Wājib (necessary), the Musta'mal (usual practice), the Musāfir (traveller) and the Hidāyah (direction). He left also some fine poems which became popular. The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) speaks of him in the Ṭabaqāt al-Fuqahā (classified biography of the jurisconsults) and attributes to him the following piece of verse :

"Foolish people depreciate the study of the law, but it suffers no harm from their contempt. It harms not the mid-day sun that his light is not perceived by the blind."

It was from this passage that Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46) borrowed the idea which he thus expressed in a well-known Qaṣidah.

"To our eyes the stars seem very small; but the fault of littleness belongs not to the stars but to our eyes."

In another piece he (Manṣūr) says :

"I can guard against the calumniator, but not against the liar. Against him who invents what he says, my resources are small indeed."

By the same :

"A dog, despicable as he is, would be fitter for a companion than a man who contends for superiority before the time of his obtaining it has come."

It is related that, in a year of excessive drought, he suffered greatly from hunger; so, one night, he went up to the (flat) roof of his house and recited in his loudest voice the following verses :

"Help! O ye generous! you are seas (or tanks of beneficence) and we are the rivulets (which they should supply). Assistance is good in the hour of need, not when provisions are cheap."

These words were heard by his neighbours and, the next morning, he found one hundred charges of wheat deposited at his door. The anecdotes told of him are well-known. He died at Old Cairo, in the month of the first Jumādā, 306 (Oct.-Nov., A.C.

918). The shaykh Abū Ishāq (al-Shīrāzī) says, in his Tabuqāt, that his death took place before the year 320. The qāḍī Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Qudā'i (No. 558) speaks of him in the Khiṭaṭ and says: 'he drew his origin from Rās-'Ayn and inhabited Ramlah, whence he removed to Old Cairo. He resided there for some time and died, in the year 306. He was a jurisconsult of high authority, versed in every branch of knowledge and a good poet. The like of him was not to be found in Old Cairo. The qāḍī Abū 'Ubayd<sup>1</sup> professed the utmost esteem for him up to the moment of the (discussion they had on a) point of law. Abū 'Ubayd held a sitting every evening in which he examined legal questions with some persons learned in that science, but, on Fridays, he remained alone. One of these evenings he gave to Manṣūr, another to Abū Ja'far al-Taḥāwī (No. 24), a third to Muḥammad Ibn al-Rabī' al-Jīzī<sup>2</sup> a fourth to 'Affān Ibn Sulaymān, a fifth to al-Sijistānī, and a sixth to discussions with jurisconsults, and, some times, to the teaching of Traditions. One evening, during his conversation, with Manṣūr, mention was made of (the maxim according to which) the pregnant woman, divorced by three (declarations)<sup>3</sup> is entitled to alimony<sup>4</sup>. On this, Abū 'Ubayd observed: 'Some persons have pretended that, after a divorce by three (declarations), she has no right to alimony, being entitled to it only after the first and the second.' Manṣūr condemned that doctrine and declared that

---

1 Abū 'Ubayd 'Alī al-Husayn Ibn Harbawayh, a native of Baḡḡdād and a jurisconsult of the Shāfi'ite sect, acquired his knowledge of the law from some of al-Shāfi''s immediate disciples. He became deeply versed in jurisprudence, the Qur'ān-readings, the Traditions and many other sciences. The number of those who studied under him was very great. He went to Egypt, and, in the year 292 (A.C. 904-5) was appointed chief qāḍī. This place he filled during eighteen years and six months; he afterwards removed to Baḡḡdād, where he died in the year 319 (A.C. 931). The history of the Qāḍis of Egypt by Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqalānī contains a long article on Abū 'Ubayd.

2 This person was the son of al-Rabī' al-Jīzī, one of al-Shāfi''s disciples and of whom our author has already spoken (No. 222).

3 The orthodox Shāfi'ite doctrine is that no maintenance is due to a woman repudiated by irreversible divorce (that is by three declarations), unless she be pregnant. See Hamilton's Heclaya, Vol. I. p. 406.

4 The term azī (alimony, maintenance) includes food, clothes, and lodging.

whoever held it was no Muslim<sup>1</sup>. He then withdrew and acquainted Abū Ja'far al-Ṭaḥāwī with the conversation, and this doctor repeated it again to Abū 'Ubayd. The latter denied having said so, and al-Manṣūr, being informed of this, declared that he would give him the lie. The company having agreed that they should be present at this scene, met again at the qāḍī's. All being assembled, no person uttered a word till Abū 'Ubayd said : ' I do not want any one to come into my presence ! I want neither Manṣūr nor Naṣṣār nor Muntaṣir<sup>2</sup> ! a set of people whose hearts are as blind as their eyes, and who attribute to us things which we never mentioned.' On this, Manṣūr said to him: 'God well knows that you said so and so.' ' You lie !' exclaimed Abū 'Ubayd. 'God,' replied Manṣūr, 'well knows who is the liar !' He then rose up, but none would take him by the hand to lead him out except Abū Bakr Ibn al-Ḥaddād (No. 547) who did so and then helped him to mount (his mule). The mutual animosity of the two doctors increased to such a degree that Dhākā, the governor of the city, and a number of the soldiers<sup>3</sup>, with other individuals besides, took the part of Manṣūr, whilst another set of people joined in support of the qāḍī. Muḥammad Ibn al-Rābi' al-Jizī deposed that he had heard Manṣūr announce a certain (heterodox) opinion (which he mentioned) and that he gave it on the authority of al-Nazzām (No. 84, note). On this, the qāḍī declared that if a second witness made a similar declaration, he would have Manṣūr's head struck off<sup>4</sup>. Manṣūr was thus put in fear of his life and died in the month of the first Jumādā of the above year (A.H. 306). Abū 'Ubayd, being afraid of the soldiers who had taken Manṣūr's part, abstained from going to the funeral, but it was attended by the Amīr-Dhākā, Ibn Baṣṭām the land-tax collector, all the grandees, 1 Literally : Was not one of the people of the Qiblah.

---

2 These proper* names are derived from the same root and signify respectively : aided, assistant, assisted.

3 We learn from the Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn, that Manṣūr had served in the police guards, or regular troops (jund.) before he lost his sight.

4 According to the Muslim law, a fact is not proved unless two witnesses attest it. In cases of adultery, four are required.

* The last two are not proper names : Abū 'Ubayd means that he could not admit into his presence Manṣūr, his supporters).—Ed.

and a great crowd of people. Abū 'Ubayd was informed that Maṣṣūr said, on his death-bed :

"I fulfilled my destiny, but silly people, heedless and plunged in lethargy, rejoice. My sleep (of death) was a thing decreed, and short shall be the day of those who rejoice in the misfortunes of others."

When Abū 'Ubayd heard these verses, he held down his head for some time and then recited as follows<sup>1</sup> :

"Let him die even but a day before us, we shall be the (favoured) people on the day of the resurrection. Yes! we have rejoiced and delighted in (his) misfortunes and no blame to those who have rejoiced therein."

715 AL-ḤĀKIM BI-AMR ALLĀH

Abū 'Alī al-Manṣūr, surnamed al-Ḥākim bi-Amr Allāh (the executor of God's orders) and sovereign of Egypt, was the son of al-'Azīz, the son of al-Mu'izz, the son of al-Manṣūr, the son of al-Qā'im, the son of al-Mahdī<sup>2</sup>. We have spoken of his ancestors and some of his descendants; his father also we shall mention<sup>3</sup>. All these princes arrogated to themselves the title of khalif. In the month of Sha'bān, 383 (Sept-Oct., A.C. 993) al-Ḥākim was solemnly designated by his father as successor to the throne, and he assumed the supreme authority on the day of his father's death. He was prodigal of wealth and fond of shedding blood: a great number of persons holding eminent stations in the administration

1 Abū 'Ubayd's verses are in the same rhyme and measure as those of Maṣṣūr

2 For fuller information respecting al-Ḥākim, see the extract from al-Maqrīzī's Khiṭaṭ in the first volume of M. De Sacy's Chrestomathie arabe, and the Vie du khalife Hakem, in the first volume of the same author's Exposé de l'histoire des Druzes.

3 The name of al-Ḥākim's father was Niẓār al-Aziz was only his title or surname.

of the state were put to death by him in an arbitrary manner. The whole tenor of his conduct was most extraordinary, and, every moment, he promulgated new orders to which the people were obliged to conform. Thus, in the year 395 (A.C. 1004-5), he commanded that maledictions, directed against the Companions (of Muḥammad), should be inscribed on the walls of the mosques, the hāzārs and the streets; he wrote also to those who governed his provinces, ordering them to do the same; then, in the year 397, he caused these inscriptions to be torn down and forbade the practice. Soon after, he gave orders that the persons who uttered curses against the Companions should be flogged and paraded ignominiously through the streets. In the year 395, he caused all the dogs to be killed, so that not one of them was to be seen in the market-places, or in the streets or in the lanes. He forbade the sale of beer, of mulūkhiyā<sup>1</sup>, of lupin-pellets made to be eaten with that (pot-herb), of the rocket and of fish, without scales. Persons transgressing this ordinance were to be punished with the utmost severity, and some who had been convicted of selling such things were beaten with whips, paraded through the streets and then beheaded. Thus again, in the year 402, he forbade the sale of raisins, either in large or in small quantities, no matter of what kind they were; and merchants were prohibited from importing them into Egypt. A great quantity of this fruit was then collected and burned by his orders; the expense incurred in burning it amounted, it is said, to five hundred dinārs. In the same year, he forbade the sale of grapes and dispatched inspectors to al-Jazīrah<sup>2</sup> (where they remained) till a great part of the vines in that place had been cut down, thrown on the ground and trod under foot by oxen. He caused all the jars of honey which were in the stores to be collected together; and these, to the number of five thousand, were carried to the border of the Nile, where they were broken and their contents poured into the river. In this year also he gave orders that the Christians and the Jews, with the exception of their doctors<sup>1</sup>, should wear black turbans, that the Christians should place on their necks crosses one cubit in length and five raṭls (or ten pounds) in weight; the Jews were enjoined to wear on their necks logs of wood equal in weight to the crosses worn by the Christians. He forbade them to ride with embroidered saddles, and commanded that their stirrups should be of wood. They were forbidden to have a Muslim in their service, to ride on asses hired out by a Muslim and to embark in a vessel having a Muslim crew. The Christians, when they entered into a public bath, were to bear crosses on their necks and the Jews bells, in order that they might be distinguished from the Muslims. He afterwards assigned baths to the Jews and the Christians, distinct from those of the Muslims; on those of the Christians he placed crosses and, on the Jewish baths, logs of wood. This took place in the year 408 (A.C. 1017-8). The same year, he gave orders that the church known by the name of al-Qumāmāh<sup>2</sup> should be demolished, as also all the churches in Egypt; the vases belonging to them, with all the rahā's<sup>3</sup> and properties settled on them he granted to a Muslim corporation. The result was that a number of Christians embraced Islāmism. The same year, he forbade the kissing of the ground in his presence and annulled the (usual form of) prayer made for him in the khuṭbah and in the writings addressed to him. Instead of that prayer, they were ordered to employ these words; Salutation to the Commander of the faithful. In the year 404 (A.C. 1013-4) he forbade consulting the stars and practising astrology; those who professed that art he ordered to be banished from the country. In consequence of this, all the astrologers appeared before the qāḍī Malik Ibn Sa'īd, chief magistrate of Old Cairo, and bound themselves to turn (from their evil ways); the sentence of banishment was therefore revoked. The professional musicians were treated in a similar manner. The same year, in the month of Sha'bān, he gave orders that no woman should go out into the streets, either by night or by day; he forbade the shoemakers to make boots such as were worn by women, and he removed from the baths the emblems which indicated those reserved for the use of the female sex. The women remained confined to their houses till the accession of al-Ẓāhir, al-Ḥākim's son (No. 457): their captivity having lasted seven years and seven months. In the month of Shā'bān, 411 (Nov-Dec., 1020), a number of those Christians who had embraced Islāmism returned to their former creed, and al-Ḥākim gave orders that such churches of theirs as had been destroyed should be rebuilt. He restored to them also the properties settled on their churches. Upon the whole, we may say, that these were but a small portion of his strange doings and that a full account of them would lead us too far. It was for al-Ḥākim that the astronomer, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, surnamed Ibn Yūnus (No. 463), composed the very extensive work called the Ḥākimite Tables. I copied the following anecdote from a document in the handwriting of the ḥāfiẓ Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad al-Silafī (No. 43): al-Ḥākim was, one day, sitting in state when a person present recited aloud the following of the Qur'ān: No, I swear by thy Lord! they will not (perfectly) believe until they make thee judge of their controversies, and they shall not afterwards find in their own minds any hardship in what thou mayest ordain, but shall acquiesce therein with submission<sup>1</sup>. Whilst pronouncing these words, the man kept pointing at al-Ḥākim, but he had no sooner finished than a person named Ibn al-Mushajjar, who was a man of holy life, recited aloud these words from the same book: O men! a parable has been propounded wherefore hearken unto it: those whom ye invoke besides God will never be able to create a fly: although they joined together for that (purpose), and, if the fly snatch any thing away from them, they cannot recover the same

1 The mulūkhiyā is a species of mallows. The botanical name is corchorus olitorius.

2 If al-Jazīrah ٱلْجَزِيرَة, the reading of my MSS. be correct, the island of al-Rawḍah must be meant. In the extract from the Khīṭa' given by M. de Sacy we read al-Djīzah ٱلْدَجِزَة.

1 The orthography of the word here rendered by doctors is uncertain. I read حيايره a plural form of حير which word is the diminutive of حير.

2 Al-Qumāmāh القمامه means sweeping, dirt. The Musulmāns apply this name contemptuously to the church of the Resurrection (al-Qiyāmāh القيامة) at Jerusalem. The word Qumāmāh, with this signification, is sometimes employed without the article.

3 See No. 142, note.

---

<sup>1</sup> Qur'an, sūrah 4, verse 68. The object of the speaker was to have al-Ḥākim put on a level with Muḥammad, and even to induce his hearers to acknowledge the Divine nature of that prince. It is well-known that al-Ḥākim founded a sect the adepts of which acknowledged him to be an incarnation of the Divinity. See M. de Sacy's Exposé.

from it. Weak is the petitioner and (weak) the petitioned ! they have not esteemed God at His just value. Verily God is powerful and mighty<sup>1</sup>. When he had finished, al-Ḥākim changed countenance, but then ordered him one hundred dinārs and granted nothing to the other. One of Ibn al-Muḥajjar's friends then said to him ; "You know al-Ḥākim's character and are aware of his frequent prevarications : take heed lest he conceive a hatred for you and punish you later. You would then have much to suffer from him. My advice is that you get out of his sight." In consequence of this warning, Ibn al-Muḥajjar prepared for making the pilgrimage, and went off by sea, but the vessel sunk. His friend saw him afterwards in a dream and asked him in what state he was ? To this Ibn al-Muḥajjar replied : "Our captain did not stop short on the voyage ; he anchored with us at the gate of Paradise." Such was the recompense of Ibn al-Muḥajjar's pure intentions and good design. It was al-Ḥākim who erected and completed the great mosque (jāmi') at Cairo, which had been commenced by his father al-'Aziz. He built also the jāmi' Rāshidah outside of Old Cairo. It was on Monday, the seventeenth of the first Rabi', 393 (24th Jan., A.C. 1003), that the construction of the edifice was commenced. The person charged with the direction of the work was the ḥāfiẓ Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Ghanī Ibn Sa'id (No. 376) and the astronomer who fixed the position of the miḥrāb (No. 16, note) was 'Alī Ibn Yūnus. Al-Ḥākim founded a number of other mosques in the Qarāfah and elsewhere. He sent to the *jāmi'*s a quantity of Qur'āns, objects in silver, curtains and Samanid mats<sup>2</sup> to an immense amount. He was constantly doing and undoing. * [In the year 395 (A.C. 1004-5) Abū Rakwā al-Walid Ibn Hishām al-'Uṭhmānī<sup>3</sup>, a native of Spain, revolted against him and

---

1 Qur'an, sūrah 22, verse 72.

2 What sort of mats these were I cannot determine.

3 For the history of Abū Rakwah see the Exposé, p. cccxvii, and my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's History of the Berbers, tome I, p. 40. It does not appear for what reason this adventurer bore the surname of al-Uṭhmānī, unless it was his being a collateral relation of the khalif 'Uṭhmān. They both descended from Umayyah, the ancestor of Umayyad khalifs.

* [ ] From 'In the year' to 'al-Ṣābī' not in the text of Cairo edition.—Ed.

stirred up a rebellion in the neighbourhood of Barkah (in Cyrenaira). A great multitude of people embraced his cause, and he defeated a large body of troops which al-Ḥākim had sent against him; but, being at length overwhelmed by numbers, he was taken prisoner, in the year 397 (A.C. 1006-7), after having lost, it is said, about seventy thousand of his partisans on the field of battle. Being carried before al-Ḥākim, he was paraded contemptuously (through the streets) and put to death by that sovereign's order. This happened on Sunday, the 27th of the latter Jumādā of that year (19th of March, A.C. 1007). A full account of Abū Rakwā's proceedings is given by Ibn al-Sābi'.] Al-Ḥākim was born at Cairo on the eve of Thursday, the 23rd of the first Rabī' 375 (13th August, A.C. 985). He was fond of solitude and liked to ride out unaccompanied. It therefore happened that, on the eve of Monday, the 27th of Shawwāl, 411 (13th February, A.C. 1021), he went into the country outside of old Cairo and passed the whole of the night in rambling about. The next morning he was at the tomb of al-Fuqqā'ī<sup>2</sup>, and from that he proceeded with two of his footmen towards the east of Ḥulwān. One of the footmen returned back, accompanied by nine Suwaydyan Arabs<sup>3</sup>; the other arrived afterwards and stated that he had left his master in the neighbourhood of that tomb and of al-Maṣṣabah<sup>4</sup>. The people (in the service) continued, as usual, to go out and await his return, taking with them the horses used when the prince rode in state. On Thursday, the last day of the month just mentioned, they ceased going out and, on Sunday, the 2nd of Dhū 'l-Qa'dah, Muẓaffar, the bearer of the imperial parasol, went out with Hattī, the Slavonia*, Nasīm the guardian of the (door) curtain (or chamberlain) Ibn Baṣhtikīn the Turk who was

1 The life of Hilāl Ibn al-Sābi' is given in this work.

2 Al-Maqrizī states, in his Khīṭaṭ, Vol. II, p. 456 of the Bulāq edition, that the masjid, or chapel of al-Fuqqā'ī was erected by Kāfur al-Ikḥṣāhidī. The person to whom it was dedicated was the son of a brewer (fuqqā'ī) who inhabited Old Cairo; he bore the names of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan.

3 The powerful tribe of Suwayd, the source of the translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Berbers, passed afterwards into north Africa.

4 Muṣṣabah signifies a place overgrown with reeds.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: 'Taṣhtikīn.

al-Ḥākim's lance-bearer, and a number of Kitāmyan and Turkish officers. After reaching Dayr al-Quṣayr and the place called Ḥulwān, they went up into the mountain (Muqaṭṭam) and discovered, on the very summit, the grey ass, called al-Qamr (the moon) which al-Ḥākim was accustomed to ride. It still had on the saddle and bridle which he always made use of, and its fore legs had been hacked by the strokes of a sword. They retraced (backwards) the footsteps of the animal and perceived by the tracks, that one man had been walking before it and another after it. They continued following the footsteps till they came to the cistern which lies to the east of Ḥulwān. One of the officers having gone down into it, found there al-Ḥākim's clothes, which consisted in seven jubbahs (long vests). They were still buttoned and bore marks shewing they had been pierced by daggers<sup>1</sup>. These jubbahs they carried to the Castle, at Cairo, and no doubt then remained of his having been assassinated. Some foolish people, who were extravagantly attached to al-Ḥākim, continued to believe that he was still living and would certainly reappear; they would swear by the absence of al-Ḥākim! and hold very absurd discourses. Some say that it was his sister who caused him to be murdered; the particulars of their recital are, however, too long for insertion<sup>2</sup>. The orthography of the name Mushajjar is certain: Ḥulwān is the name of a pretty and most agreeable village, situated about five miles above Old Cairo. It was formerly the residence of 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam the Umayyad, when acting as governor of Egypt, in the name and under the *kh*alifate of his brother, 'Abd al-Malik. He died there, and his son, 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, was born in that place.

716 AL-'ĀMIR BI-AḤKĀM ALLĀH

Abū 'Alī al-Manṣūr the 'Ubaydite, surnamed al-'Āmir bi-Aḥkām Allāh (the commander who executes God's decrees), was 1 When al-Ḥākim was assassinated, the murderers cut off his arms; this circumstance explains how the jubbahs could have been taken off the body without being unbuttoned.

2 See M. de Sacy's Exposé, page CCCCXV.

the son of al-Musta'li, the son of al-Mustanşir, the son of al-Zāhir, the son of al-Ḥākim (see the preceding article). In the life of his father, see among the Aḥmads, under the letter A (No. 73), will be found the rest of genealogy. Al-'Āmir was proclaimed successor to the throne on the day of his father's death, and al-Afḍal Shāhanshāh, the son of Amīr al-Juyūsh (No. 266) and al-Musta'li's wazīr, took in hand the government of the empire. In the life of al-Afḍal we have related some particulars concerning al-'Āmir. When this prince grew up and was capable of judging for himself, he took al-Afḍal's life and conferred the wazīrship on al-Māmūn Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Abī Shujā' Fātik Ibn Abī 'l-Ḥusayn Mukhtār, surnamed Ibn al-Baṭā'ihī. The new wazīr excluded his sovereign from the exercise of power and acquired so foul a reputation by his tyranny, that al-'Āmir at length arrested him and confiscated all his property. This happened on the eve of Saturday, the 4th of Ramaḍān, A.H. 519 (4th Oct., A.C. 1125). He caused him to be put to death in the month of Rajab, 521 (July-August, A.C. 1127), and had his body exposed on cross outside the walls of Cairo. He executed, at the same time, five of al-Māmūn's brothers, one of whom bore the name of al-Mu'tamin. Al-'Āmir was haughty, inconsiderate and extravagant in his conduct. The anecdotes (on this subject) are well-known. Evil minded and tyrannic, he made a show of his vices and indulged openly in sports and amusements. It was under his reign and in the month of Shā'bān, 497 (May, A. C. 1104) that the Franks took the city of 'Akkā (Acre); on Monday, the 11th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 502 (12th July, A.C. 1109), they carried Tripolis of Syria by storm, plundered the houses, made the men prisoners and reduced to slavery the women and children. The wealth and property of the inhabitants, the books belonging to the college (dār al-'Ilm) and other treasures of incalculable value fell into their hands. The survivors were put to the torture and despoiled of all they possessed. The Egyptian troops sent to the relief of the city arrived when all was lost. The same year in the month of Ramaḍān (April-May, A.C. 1109) the Franks took 'Iraqah, to which they had laid seige on the 1st of Shā'bān (6th March). In this year also they took Bānyās and obtained possession of Jubayl by capitulation. On Friday, the 21st of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 511 (15th April, A.C. 1118), they took the castle of Tabnīn and, on Monday, the 22nd of the first Jumādā, 518 (7th July, A.C. 1124), they gained possession of Tyre (Ṣūr). The officer who commanded in that place held his authority under the Atābek Zahīr al Dīn Ṭughtikīn (No. 119), who then possessed Damascus and the neighbouring countries. During the three years which followed the conquest of Tyre, the Franks continued to beat money in the name of al-'Āmir, but then they discontinued the practice. On Friday, the 21st of Shawwāl, 503 (13th May, A.C. 1110), they took Bayrūt by assault and, on the 20th of the first Jumādā, 504 (4th December, A.C. 1110), they occupied Sidon (Ṣaydā). In the year 504 during the reign of al-'Āmir, or in 511, according to another account—God knows which is the true date!<sup>1</sup> Bardwīl (Baldwin), the Frank undertook an expedition into Egypt for the purpose of taking that country into his possession. On arriving at (the town of) al-Farāmā, he burned down the houses, the principal mosque and the others also. Having then set out whilst suffering under an indisposition, he died on the way, before reaching al-'Arīsh. His companions opened his body and threw away the intestines; and, to this very day, passengers cast stones on that spot. His corpse was borne to the Qumāmā<sup>2</sup> and there buried. It is from this Bardwīl that the sibkhah (or salt-marsh) of Bardwīl, situated in the midst of the sands, on the road to Syria, takes its name. It is there the stones are thrown, and people call the place the tomb of Bardwīl, though it contains nothing but his entrails. Bardwīl was sovereign of Jerusalem, Acre, Jaffa and a number of other towns on the sea-coast of Syria, and by him it was that these places were taken from the Muslims. In the same year (that is, in 505), the Mahdī Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart (No. 662) departed from Egypt, which was then under the rule of al-'Āmir. He went to Maghrib in the dress of a legist and there encountered the adventures of which we have already given the relation. Al-'Āmir was born in Cairo on Tuesday, the 13th of Muḥarram, 490 (31st December, A.C. 1096), and came to the

---

1 The true date is 511.

2 The church of the Resurrection at Jerusalem; see No. 413, note.

throne at the age of five years. When his allotted days were passed, he went forth from Cairo, early in the morning of Tuesday, the 3rd of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 524 (8th Oct., A.C. 1130), and proceeded to Old Cairo, whence he crossed the bridge and entered into the island<sup>1</sup> opposite to that city. Some persons who had plotted his death were lying there concealed with their arms ready; it being agreed among them that they should kill him as he was going up the lane through which he had to pass in order to reach the top of the hill. As he was going by them, they sprang out and fell upon him with their swords. He had then crossed the bridge and had no other escort than a few pages, courtiers, and attendants. They bore him in a boat across the Nile and brought him, still living, into Cairo. The same night he was taken to the Castle and there he died, leaving no posterity. Such was the end of the tenth in lineal descent from the Mahdi 'Ubayd Allāh, the same who, as we have already stated (No. 333), made his first appearance at Sijilmāssah. The supreme authority devolved on his cousin al-Ḥāfiz 'Abd al-Majid (see No. 382)<sup>2</sup>. Al-'Āmir's conduct was detestable: he oppressed the people, seized on their wealth and shed their blood; he committed with pleasure every excess which should be avoided and regarded forbidden enjoyments as the sweetest. The people were delighted at his death. He was of a middle size, having a remarkably clear complexion and prominent eyes; his handwriting was good, his information and intelligence were very considerable. Al-Māmūn al-Baṭā'iḥī, the wazīr of whom we have just spoken, was the same who, in the year 515 (A. C. 1121-2) built the Grey Mosque (al-jāmi' al-aqmar) in Cairo. During his wazīrship he completed the erection of the mosque of the female Elephant (Jāmi' al-Filah)* which al-Afḍal, the son of Amīr al-Juyūsh, had commenced building in the year 498 (A. C. 1104-5), and which is situated outside of Old Cairo, near the Observatory that overlooks Birkat al-Ḥabash (the pond of the Abyssinians).

---

1 This is perhaps the island of Rawḍah. One of the manuscripts has Jizah الجيزه which may be the right reading.

2 In the article on al-Ḥāfiz, his name is erroneously written 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Jāmi' al-Nīl.—Ed.

717 QUṬB AL-DĪN MAWDŪD

Quṭb al-Dīn (the axis of the faith) Mawdūd, surnamed al-A'raj (the lame) and lord of Moṣul, was the son of 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī (No. 229) the son of 'Āq Sunqur (No. 100). In the life of his brother Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmud (No. 688) lord of Syria, we have mentioned some particulars concerning him and spoken of his three sons.<sup>1</sup> One of them, Sayf al-Dīn Ghāzī (No. 496) succeeded him as sultān; the others were 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd (No. 694) and 'Imād al-Dīn Zinkī (No. 230) lord of Sinjār. In the article on Ghāzī we have given an account of Nūr al-Dīn's conduct on the death of his brother Quṭb al-Dīn and mentioned that, after having proceeded to Moṣul, he confirmed Ghāzī in the possession of that city and settled matters with all his nephews. Whilst he was on this expedition, he founded the Nūriyan Mosque (al-Jāmi' al-Nūrī) within the city of Moṣul. Every Friday, the public prayer is celebrated in this mosque, which is an edifice much noted in that city. The motive which led to its construction is thus stated by the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 678), in that part of his work, the al-Barq al-Shāmi, where he speaks of Nūr al-Dīn's arrival at Moṣul: "There was at Moṣul, in the centre of the city, an extensive ruin respecting which such rumours were current as appalled every heart, and it was generally reported that no one ever undertook to rebuild it without losing his life and failing in the attempt. Mu'in al-Dīn 'Umar al-Malā, a shaykh much renowned for the sanctity of his conduct and the austerity of his life, advised Nūr al-Dīn to buy the ruin and build a mosque with the materials. The prince spent large sums on this edifice and converted into a waqf<sup>2</sup> for its maintenance a landed estate situated in the vicinity of Moṣul." Quṭb al-Dīn obtained the sultānate of Moṣul and that region on the death of his elder brother al-Ghāzī. His conduct was exemplary and his administration just. It was under his reign that the wazīr Jamāl al-Dīn Muḥammad al-Jawād (No. 677) attained the highest consideration. He was imprisoned, as we have already mentioned,

---

1 This reference is not exact. The author probably intended to indicate the article on Mas'ūd, the son of Mawdūd, No. 674.

2 See No. 21 note on Waqf.

by that prince, who had then for prime minister and privy-counsellor the amīr Zayn al-Dīn 'Alī Kūchak, father of Muẓaffar al-Dīn, lord of Arbela (No. 522). He had there a truly able minister, a sincere adviser for his welfare and prosperity, and, moreover, an undaunted warrior, a renowned horseman. We have spoken of him also in the life of his son Muẓaffar al-Dīn. Quṭb al-Dīn continued to hold the sultānate and rule with absolute sway till the hour of his death. This event took place in the month of Shawwāl, 565 (June-July, A. C. 1170) or, as some say, on the 22nd of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah of that year (6th Sept.), Usāmah Ibn Munqidh (No. 81) states, in a little work of his containing the mention of those provincial sovereigns who were his contemporaries, that Quṭb al-Dīn died towards the end of the latter Rabi' 566; but this date cannot be exact, because Nūr al-Dīn, Quṭb al-Dīn's brother, was at Moṣul that very month; he had been encamped outside the city when messengers came to him from the khalīf, and did not enter it till after his brother's death. Quṭb al-Dīn died at Moṣul, aged somewhat more than forty years. He left a number of sons, most of whom became sovereigns in different provinces. We have already spoken of his father, his grand-father and other members of the family.

718 MUWARRIJ AL-SADŪSĪ

Abū Fayd Muwarrij Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Thaur Ibn Ḥarmalah Ibn 'Alqamah Ibn 'Amr Ibn Sadūs Ibn Shaybān Ibn Dhuhīl Ibn Tha'labah Ibn 'Akkābah al-Sadūsī was a grammarian of Baṣrah. He learned Arabic grammar from al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad (No. 208), and delivered traditions on the authority of Shu'bah Ibn al-Ḥajjājī, Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā (No. 480) and others. He used to say: "I came from the desert, unacquainted with the application of inductive reasoning to Arabic grammar; what I knew of it was merely a natural gift, and it was only at the school of Abū Zayd

---

1 See No. 208.

al-Anṣārī (No. 245), in Baṣrah, that I learned the use of induction. Al-Akhfash Sa'id Ibn Mas'adah (No. 246), having gone to see Muḥammad Ibn al-Muhallab<sup>1</sup>, was asked by him whence he came? He answered: "From the residence of the qāḍī Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham<sup>2</sup>." "What is going on there?" said Ibn al-Muhallab. The other replied: "He asked me who, of all the disciples of al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad, was the most trustworthy, the first in rank, and the most deserving of confidence (for his information); to which I answered: "Al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl<sup>3</sup>, Sibawayh (No. 479), and Muwarrij al-Sadūsi." The dominant studies of Muwarrij were philology and poetry. He left a number of works such as the Kitāb al-Anwā'<sup>4</sup>, which is a good treatise on the subject, the Kitāb Ghārib al-Qur'ān (rare expressions occurring in the Qur'ān), the Kitāb Jamāhīr al-Qabā'il (a general notice of the Arabic tribes), and the Kitāb al-Ma'ānī (book of rhetorical figures employed in the Qur'ān). He drew up also a succinct account of the genealogy of the Quraysh family; it forms a small volume and bears the title of Ḥaḍḥq Nisab Quraysh (the coraishide genealogies cleared from dross). Having accompanied al-Māmūn (the 'Abbāsīd) from 'Irāq to Khurāsān, he settled in the town of Marw, but subsequently removed to Naysābūr. During his residence there he gave lessons which were attended by even the shaykhs (or professors) of the place. He composed some poetry, and the following verses are given as his by Hārūn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā al-Munajjim<sup>5</sup> in the Kitāb al-Bārī :

"So oft have I suffered the pains of separation, that I heed them no longer; I feel no more the misfortunes which wound me by striking my family and friends. Fortune never left with me one whom I dearly prized, without intending to remove that person or to estrange her from me."

1 This person was probably the son of the Muhallab whose life is given in No. 727.

2 The life of Ibn Akṭham will be found in this work.

3 An article on al-Naḍr is given in this work.

4 This work treated probably of the twenty eight mansions of the moon.

5 The life of Ibn al-Munajjim is given in this work.

Ibn al-Munajjim here remarks that these verses were the finest ever composed to express such a thought. A similar idea is found in the following lines, composed by a modern poet :

"So oft have I been torn from my friends, that I dread no longer the pains of separation ; even though neighbours, dear to my heart, should be removed away. I have now closed my mind against despair, and my eyes can yield to sleep even on the departure of a beloved friend."

It was from (al-Sadūsi's) piece that Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī (No. 654) borrowed the idea of this verse :

"Here am I, my heart no longer afflicted at the loss of friends ! no longer rejoicing under the seductions of fortune ! "

This line is taken from a qaṣīdah in which he expresses his grief for the loss of his sight. It contains this passage wherein he alludes to his wife :

"Behold her weeping ! her who had never to complain of privations and whose nearest friends were never driven (by misfortunes) into a distant land. But now the hand of time hath wounded her in the object of her affection<sup>1</sup>, striking her with a piercing calamity, and calamities pierce (the heart). She suffers from an awful (mishap) under the like of which patience would be unbecoming and grief never disgraceful. Why blame her even if shed tears of blood for him who supported her by his toils and by travelling into distant lands. How painful for her to see me covering to the ground, without a spot in the wide-extended earth through which to roam. (She sees me) no longer able to direct the camel as it goes panting through the clouds of dust, nor to guide the sleek six-year-old<sup>2</sup> steed which prances when reigned in. I remain imprisoned in a fixed abode and pledged to suffer grief from morn to night. Here, where I dwell on earth, the sky<sup>3</sup> is 1 Literally : In the lion of her forest.

2 I read وَجَرْدًا on the authority of two manuscripts.

3 البحر is the true reading.

dark and cloudy ; my walking place is narrow, yet it is a vast plain exposed to the sun<sup>1</sup>. I am led about therein, submissive as a camel<sup>2</sup> to the halter ; I who had never been submissive, were it not for the perfidy of fortune. I am as a corpse having no grave in which to lay its side ; alas ! it is not every corpse which obtains a grave. Here am I, my heart no longer afflicted at the loss of friends ! no longer rejoicing under the seductions of fortune ! I was once an admirable spear, but now its point<sup>3</sup> is blunted, and my youth (once firm) as wood, is now (shattered) and rent asunder. Blessings on the days in which I rode uncontrolled on the steed of love ; one as I was then, would suffer no control in his love for gracefully moving (maidens)<sup>4</sup>. My youth, which I enjoyed to the utmost, is now departed ; it has been snatched away, yet the eyes of fortune retain their azure hue and sparkle still. O what nights I joyfully passed with the fair, whose glances were alternately directed towards me and turned away ! nights in which my ardour was many-fold greater than now ; I plaintively allude to them, for they will declare openly (what I have been)."

This long and high-sounding qasidah was composed in praise of the imām al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh, the khalīf of Baghdād. Al-Marzubānī (No. 621) states that he met with the following passage in the handwriting of Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās al-Yazīdī (No. 614). "Abū Fayd Muwarrij al-Sadūsī gave a robe as a present to my grand-father and was thanked by him in these terms :

"I shall express my thanks for what Muwarrij, the son of 'Amr, has bestowed, and shall offer him my best praises and my love. Illustrious is Sadūsī !<sup>5</sup> a man for whom his father, (ancestors) passionately fond of (doing) honourable deeds, procured a noble reputation ! we went to Abū Fayd, hoping to obtain a draught from the torrent of his bounty and to strike fire from that steel which was never dull and which never refused its sparks. Having quenched

1 Read ضحيان with one of the manuscripts.

2 The right reading is الجنبيه .

3 Read غراره .

4 Read الغيد* with two manuscripts.

5 Two manuscripts and the edition of Bulāq read اغر .

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : الغى .

our thirst, we parted with gifts and presents from a man who has always been praised by those who arrived to visit him and by those who went away<sup>1</sup>. He clothed me gratuitously, though I asked him not for clothing; and gifts so made are the most agreeable of all. He arrayed me in that garment, ample as it was, and, the evening I put it on, I departed strutting so proudly that I mistook<sup>2</sup> my way. It was a robe of beauty, if made use of for ornament, and a winter-dress, if one feared the severe cold. Trimmings<sup>3</sup> were seen on it of which the fringes<sup>4</sup> (shone) like the sword newly polished and just drawn from the scabbard. Whilst I live, I shall thank al-Sadūsī for his generosity and recommend (in dying), those I leave behind me<sup>5</sup> to be grateful to al-Sadūsī. "

The anecdotes concerning Muwarrij are very numerous. Ibn al-Nadīm (No. 84) states that he found a note in the handwriting of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz (No. 316) in which it was mentioned that Muwarrij al-Sadūsī was one of al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad's (No. 208) pupils and that he died in the year 195 (A.C. 810-1) and on the same day as Abū Nuwās (No. 162). This indication cannot be admitted unless we adopt the opinion of those who place the death of Abū Nuwās in that year. We have noticed the disagreement which exists on that point; but it is universally allowed that Muwarrij died in the year 195; Ibn Qutaybah (No. 306) gives that date in the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif and other authors (repeat it). In a copy of al-Sadūsī's Kitāb al-Anwā, I found the following passage; "Abū 'Alī Ismā'il Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn al-Mubārak al-Yazīdī said: 'We studied this book at Jurjān under al-Muwarrij; then, in the year 202, we went to 'Irāq (for the purpose of seeing) al-Māmūn, after which al-Muwarrij proceeded to Baṣrah where he died.'" This indication disagrees with the one just given, and God knows best

1 Literally: Always praised as to the goings out (from his pond) and the goings down (to it).

2 I read جرت .

3 Read. كاج . *

4 Here the readings of the manuscripts and the printed editions all differ. The true reading seems to be طرازها † that which I adopt.

5 For من بعدی read بعدی .

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: حيك (Knitting).—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: اطرادها packages.—Ed.

which of them is the truest. The word ḡayḡ, taken in its primitive signification designates the flower of the saffron plant or according to some, the saffron itself. Muwarrij is the active participle of the verb arraj which signifies to excite people to quarrel. We have already explained the word Sadūsī in the life of Qatādah (No. 516). Some say that Muwarrij was a nickname and that the real name (of this grammarian) was Marḡad. Al-Jawharī (No. 9, note) says, in his (dictionary, the) Ṣaḡāḡ, that the verb raḡad signifies "to arrange wares, in placing them one over the other, or side by side;" he then adds: "In the expression: 'When I left such and such a tribe, they were murḡidīn and had not yet loaded their baggage,' the word murḡidīn means arranging their effects." Ibn al-Sikkīt<sup>1</sup> says: "From thence is derived marḡad, which is the name of a man and al-Marḡad, one of the names by which the lion is designated." Al-Muwarrij himself said: "My name and my surname are of rare occurrence; the Arabs (of the desert) employ the verb arraj and arraj with the meaning of the verb harraj (to excite quarrels). ḡayḡ is the flower of the saffron-plant. The verb ḡad, with the aorist ḡad and the noun of action ḡayḡ, signifies to die, when employed in speaking of a man."

719 MŪSĀ AL-KĀZIM

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Mūsā al-Kāzim<sup>2</sup>, the son of Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, the son of Muḡammad al-Bāqir, the son of 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn, the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib, God bless them all! was one of the twelve imāms. The Khaṡib (No. 33) says, in his History of Bagḡdād: Mūsā al-Kāzim was surnamed al-'Abd al-Ṣāliḡ (the holy servant) on account of his piety and his efforts (to please God). It is related that he entered (one evening) into the mosque of God's Apostle (at Madīnah) and, just as the night was setting in, he made a prostration which lasted until morning and, during that time, he was heard to repeat, without intermission; "O Thou Who art the object of (our) fear! O Thou Whom it becometh to shew mercy! let Thy pardon be kindly granted to me whose sin is so grievous!" Mūsā was highly generous and beneficent: being informed that a man had spoken ill of him, he sent to him a purse containing one thousand dīnārs. He used to tie up in packets sums of three hundred, or four hundred, or two hundred dīnārs and distribute them in the city of Madīnah. That was his place of residence till al-Mahdī had him brought to Baghdād and shut up in a prison. (Soon after, this khalif) had a dream in which 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib, appeared to him and said: "O Muḥammad!<sup>1</sup> were ye ready, therefore, if ye had been put in authority, to commit evil in the earth, and to violate the ties of blood?"<sup>2</sup> Al-Rabī' (No. 223) related in these terms what resulted: "He sent for me at night, and that put me in great dread; I went to him and found him chanting the above-mentioned verse, and no man had a finer voice than he. He said to me: 'Bring me Mūsā, the son of Ja'far'. I did so and he embraced him, seated him by his side and said to him: 'Abu 'l-Ḥasan! I have just seen in a dream the Commander of the faithful, 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, and he has recited to me such and such a verse; give me the assurance that you will not revolt against me or against any of my children.' He answered: 'By Allāh! I am incapable of revolting.' 'You say the truth,' replied the khalif; 'give him three thousand pieces of gold and restore him to his family in Madīnah'. I arranged the affair of his (departure) that very night, lest some obstacle might turn up, and, before morning, the man was on his journey." Mūsā resided in that city (Madīnah) until the reign of Hārūn al-Rashīd. In the month of Ramaḍān, 179 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 795), Hārūn visited the 'Umrah<sup>3</sup> and, on his departure for

1 The life of Ya'qūb Ibn al-Sikkīt is given in this work.

2 Kāzim is the active participle of a verb which signifies: to restrain one's inclinations, to suppress one's anger. The Qur'ān uses it in this sense. It was given to Mūsā as a surname, by the Shī'ites, on account of his forbearance and mildness.

1 The real name of the khalif surnamed al-Mahdī (the well directed), was Muḥammad. He was the son of Abū Ja'far 'Abd Allāh, surnamed al-Manṣūr.

2 Qur'an, sūrah 47, verse 24.

3 See No. 668 note. The 'Umrah may be visited in any month of the year.

Baghdād, he took Mūsā with him and had him imprisoned for life. It is related that Hārūn, in his pilgrimage, went to visit the tomb of the Prophet, in the midst of a band of Qurayshids and some eminent members of (Arabian) tribes, and took with him Mūsā al-Kāẓim. Wishing to show how much he was superior in glory to those around them, he said (in addressing the tomb): "Salutation unto thee, O Prophet of God! unto thee who art my cousin!" On hearing this, Mūsā said (to the tomb): "Salutation unto thee, O my dear father!" Hārūn changed countenance at these words and said: "Abu 'l-Ḥasan! such glory as thine is truly to be vaunted of." End of the Kḥaṭīb's relation. Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī al-Mas'ūdī, the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī (No. 557) says, in the part of his work, the Murūj al-Dḥahab, which contains the history of Hārūn al-Rashīd: " 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mālik al-Kḥuẓa'i, the intendant of al-Rashīd's palace and chief of the police guards (Shurṭah) related as follows: 'A messenger came to me from al-Rashīd at an hour in which I never before received his visits; he pulled me out of the place where I was and would not even allow me to change my clothes. This put me in great fear. When I arrived at the palace, a servant went in before me and informed al-Rashīd of my presence. (The khalif) ordered me to be introduced, and I found him sitting up in his bed. I saluted him, but he kept silent for some time; so, my mind was much troubled and my fears greatly augmented. He at length said: ' 'Abd Allāh! do you know why I sent for you at such an hour?' I answered: 'By Allāh I do not, Commander of the faithful!' 'Know,' said he, 'that I just had a dream in which it seemed to me as if an Abyssinian came to me with a javelin in his hand and said: 'Let Mūsā, the son of Ja'far, be set at liberty this very hour, otherwise I shall slay thee with this javelin!' Do you therefore go and set him free'. I replied: 'Commander of the faithful! shall I then liberate Mūsā, the son of Ja'far, for the third time?' 'Yes' said he, 'go and set Mūsā, the son of Ja'far, at liberty; give him thirty thousand dirhams and say to him (in my name): If you would like to remain with us, you will obtain from me whatever you may desire; and if you prefer going to Madīnah, you have permission to do so.' I went to the prison in order to take him out and, when he saw me, he sprung up on his feet, thinking that I had received orders to treat him in a manner he should not like, but I said to him : 'Fear not ! he (the khalif) has ordered you to be set at liberty and told me to give you thirty thousand dirhams and to deliver you this message : if you would like remaining with us, you will obtain whatever you desire ; but, if you prefer going to Madīnah, you have free permission to do so.' I then gave him the money. set him free and said to him : 'I see something in you extraordinary (what is it ?).' He replied : 'I shall tell you : whilst I was asleep, behold ! the Apostle of God came to me and said : 'O Mūsā ! thou hast been imprisoned unjustly ; so, recite the words I am going to repeat to thee, for assuredly, thou shalt not pass all this night in prison.' I replied : 'For thee I should give up father and mother ! what must I say ?' 'Repeat these words,' said he : 'O Thou Who hearest every voice ! O Thou Who lettest no opportunity escape ! O Thou Who clothest the bones with flesh and Who wilt raise them up after death ! I invoke Thee by the holy names and by that grand and awful name which is treasured up and closely hidden ! by that name which no created being shall ever know ! O Thou Who art so mild and Whose patience is unequalled ! O Thou Whose favours never cease and cannot be numbered ! set me free !' So you see what has happened." Numerous stories and anecdotes are related of Mūsā. His birth took place at Madīnah, on a Tuesday of the year 129 (A.C. 746-747), before the break of day ; but the Khaṭīb places this event in the year 128. He died at Baghdād, on the 25th of the month of Rajab, 183 (1st Sep., A.C. 799), or in 186, according to another account. Some say that his death was caused by poison<sup>1</sup>. According to the Khaṭīb, he died in prison and was buried in the Shūnizi cemetery<sup>2</sup>, outside the dome<sup>3</sup> ; his tomb is a well-known object of pilgrimage ; over it is erected a large chapel containing an immense quantity of gold and silver lamps, with divers sorts of furniture and carpets. It is on the west side (of the river). We have already spoken of his father, his forefathers, and some of his descendants. The person

1 He was put to death secretly by order of al-Rashīd. See M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie arabe, deuxième édition, tome I, p. 6.

2 See No. 239.

3 This indication is not clear unless it means the dome which covered the tomb of Saī al-Saqāfi charged to guard him during his imprisonment was al-Sindī Ibn Shāhik (No. 129 note), ancestor of the celebrated poet Kushājim (No. 128, note).

720 KAMĀL AL-DĪN IBN MAN'AH

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Mūsā, the son of Abu 'l-Faḍl Yūnus, the son of Man'ah, the son of Mālik, the son of Muḥammad, and surnamed Kamāl al-Dīn (perfection of religion), was a doctor of the Shāfi'ite sect. He studied the law at Moṣul under his father; then, in the year 571 (A. C. 1175-6), he proceeded to Baghdād and took up his residence in the Niẓāmiyah College (No. 374) where he had for tutor the mu'id (repetiteur) al-Sadīd al-Salamāsī* (No. 569). At that time, the shaykh Riḍā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Khayr Aḥmad al-Qazwīnī, the son of Ismā'il, the son of Yūsuf, the son of Muḥammad, the son of al-'Abbās, was the professor (of law) in the college. Kamāl al-Dīn (there) studied the controverted points of jurisprudence and its fundamentals; he applied also to philological disquisitions under the direction of Kamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Barakāt 'Abd ar-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad al-Anbārī (see No. 344). Previously to that, he had studied philology at Moṣul with distinguished success, under Abū Bakr Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'dūn al-Qurṭubī, a shaykh whose life we shall give. Having then gone up (from Baghdād) to Moṣul, he resumed his studies with great assiduity and, on the death of his father, an event of which the date will be found in our article on that doctor, he replaced him as professor in the mosque which is called the Zayniyah after Zayn al-Dīn, lord of Arbela. This edifice I have myself seen; it is laid out in the manner of a college and is now called the Kamāliyah college, because Kamāl al-Dīn, he of whom we are now speaking, resided in it for a long time. When the reputation of his merit had spread abroad, jurisconsults hastened in crowds to study under him. He was profoundly versed in every branch of knowledge and knew certain sciences which are never found together in the same individual. In the mathematical sciences he was particularly distinguished. I met him at Moṣul in the month of Ramaḍān, 626 (July-August, A. C. 1229), and went frequently to see him, on account of the close and intimate friendship which existed between him and my deceased father; but I had not an opportunity of receiving lessons from him, because I could not make any stay (in that town) and was obliged to hurry off to Syria. The doctors of the time declared that he had a solid and perfect knowledge of twenty-four different sciences, one of which was the (doctrine of the Shāfi'ite) sect. In this last he was the paragon of the age. A number of Ḥanafites studied under his tuition the doctrines of their own sect, and received from him the most satisfactory solution of the problems contained in the al-Jāmi' al-Kabīr<sup>1</sup>, a work noted for its difficulties. He had a perfect acquaintance with the two systems of polemical jurisprudence, the (Shāfi'ite) which prevails in 'Irāq and the (Ḥanafite) which is taught at Bukhārā; he knew also the fundamentals of jurisprudence and those of divinity. When the works of Fakhr al-Dīn al-Rāzī (No. 574) were first brought to Moṣul, there was a great number of well-informed men in that city, but none of them, excepting Kamāl al-Dīn, was able to understand the technical language employed by the author. Having met with al-'Amīdī's (No. 577) Irshād, he solved, in a single night, all the difficulties contained in that work and then caused his pupils to read it (whilst he explained it); such at least, is the general report. He knew the philosophical science, logic (that is, the Organum of Aristotle), physics, metaphysics and medicine; he was acquainted with all the parts of mathematical

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : Salamānī, which appears to be an error.—Ed.

---

1 The Jāmi' al-Kabīr, or great collector, contains all the secondary points of law as deduced by the Ḥanafite doctors from the fundamental principles of Muslim Jurisprudence. The author, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Karkhī, native of al-Karkh, one of the suburbs of Baḡhdād, was highly respected for his learning and his piety. Born A.H. 261 (A.C. 874-5), he became so illustrious by his talents and his virtues that he was nominated chief of the Ḥanafite sect in that city. He died in the month of Shabān, A.H. 340 (January, A.C. 952). A fuller account of him is given in the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥanafiyah of al-Kafawī, MS. of the Bibliothèque impériale, supplement, no, 699, fol. 120.

science explained by Euclid, astronomy, conic sections, mean proportional (Mutawassīṭah), the Almagest, the different modes of calculation both numerical<sup>1</sup>, and algebraic, arithmetic, the system of double false position, music and mensuration. In all these sciences he was without a rival; others had a superficial knowledge of them, but none knew so well as he the abstruse doctrines and truths which they contain. In a word, one might well apply to him the words of the poet.

"In the sciences he was such that, from his knowledge of one alone, you might conclude he knew them all."

He discovered also a mode of calculating the hours of prayer<sup>2</sup> which no one had ever fallen upon before. His researches in the study of Arabic and its grammatical inflexions were so profound that he was capable of reading (without a master) the Book of Sībawayh (No. 479), the 'Idāḥ and the Takmilah of Abū 'Alī al-Fārisī (No. 155), and the Mufaṣṣal of al-Zamakhsharī (No. 684). In the interpretation of the Qur'ān, in the science of Traditions, in that which treats of the names of those men (by whom Traditions have been handed down), and in every matter connected with such subjects, he was a most able hand. He knew by heart a mass of historical relations, accounts of the combats which took place between the (ancient) Arabs, pieces of poetry and dialogues. Jews and Christians used to go and read under his tuition the Pentateuch and the Gospel; they even declared that they could find no one so capable as he of explaining these two books. He knew so perfectly each of the above mentioned branches of knowledge that one would have supposed he could not have found time to learn the others. In a word, none of his predecessors were ever known to have been acquainted with so many sciences as he. In the year 625 (A. C. 1228)<sup>3</sup>, the shaykh Athīr al-Dīn al-Mufaḍḍal al-Abharī,

1 In Arabic maṣṭūḥāt, i. e. upertae. It appears, from the great dictionary of technical terms used in the sciences of the Musulmāns, published at Calcutta under the direction of Dr. Sprenger, that the science of calculation employed in the solutions of problems form three branches, geometry, algebra and maṣṭūḥah, which, of course, must be numerical arithmetic.

2 Two manuscripts read الإوتان instead of الأوتان. If their reading be adopted it must be rendered by magic squares.

3 Two manuscript read 626.

the author of the Ta'liqah fi 'l-Khilāf (notes on controverted matters), the Zij (astronomical tables)<sup>1</sup>, and other well-known works, left Moṣul and came to Arbela where we were then residing. He took up his lodgings in the Dār al-Ḥadīth (school for traditions), and I studied under his direction some controverted points of jurisprudence. I was with him one day when an eminent legist of Baghdād, who was residing in the dār al-Ḥadīth, came in. Some time passed in an animated conversation<sup>2</sup> when mention was made of the shaykh Kamāl al-Dīn. On this, Athīr al-Dīn said (to his visitor): "When the shaykh Kamāl al-Dīn made the pilgrimage and went to Baghdād, were you there?" The other replied in the affirmative. "How", said Athīr al-Dīn, "Did the Grand Diwān (the imperial court) receive him?" "Not in a manner worthy of his desert," was the reply. "That is much to be wondered at," exclaimed Athīr al-Dīn, "for never did the like of such a shaykh enter Baghdād!" These words surprised me so much that I said to him: "Tell me, master! what makes you say so?" He answered: "My son! no one like Abū Hāmid al-Ḡhazzālī (No. 562) had ever before entered Baghdād, and I declare, by Allāh! that even he is not to be compared with the shaykh (Kamāl al-Dīn)". Notwithstanding his high reputation as a master of the sciences, Athīr al-Dīn used to sit down before him (Kamāl al-Dīn) with a book in his hand and read it to him (in order to profit by his observations); and yet, on the same day scholars would be studying works composed by himself; that I saw with my own eyes. He thus read the Almagest under his direction. The following anecdote was related to me by a jurisconsult: "I asked the shaykh Kamāl al-Dīn what rank Athīr al-Dīn might hold as a scientific man, and he answered that he did not know. 'How can that be, Sir!' said I, 'since he has been in your service for many years and still studies under you?' He replied: 'Whenever I made an observation to him, he received it (without making any mark) and merely said: 'Yes, Sir! He never entered into a discussion with me; so, I have not been able to appreciate his talents.''" There is no doubt that

1 Various readings; al-Zanj, al-Dabḥ.

2 The Arabic words may perhaps be rendered thus: We passed some time in communicating traditions one to another.

Aṭhīr al-Dīn acted in this manner through politeness and respect. He served Kamāl al-Dīn as under-tutor (mu'īd) in the Badriyah college and used to say: "I should not have left my native place and come to Moṣul, had I not formed the intention of studying under the shaykh (Kamāl al-Dīn)." One of my shaykhs (or professors) named Taqī al-Dīn 'Uṭmān Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān, and generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ (see No. 386), spoke in the highest terms of his (Kamāl al-Dīn's) extraordinary merit and declared him to be without a rival in scientific knowledge. One day, he commenced, as usual, to make his eulogy when a person present said to him: "Tell me, Sir! under whom did he study? who was his preceptor?" The other answered: "That man was created by God as an imām (model) and a master in all the branches of knowledge; so, let no one ask under whom he studied and who was his preceptor. He is too eminent to render such a question necessary." Whilst I was at Moṣul, a certain jurisconsult related to me that Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ obtained permission from him (Kamāl al-Dīn) to read secretly under his direction a part of the Logic (or Organum of Aristotle). He went to him regularly for some time but was unable to understand any thing of it; so at length (Kamāl al-Dīn) said to him; "My opinion is, doctor! that you had better renounce the study of this science." The other asked him for what reason, and received this answer: "The public look upon you as a good and pious man, and consider those who apply to this branch of knowledge as holding pernicious opinions on religious matters; you risk, therefore, losing their esteem, without even acquiring any knowledge of the science." The jurisconsult took his advice and gave up the study. Readers of this biographical notice may perhaps consider me as exalting too much the merits of this shaykh, but those of his townsmen who are capable of appreciating his talents know full well that I have not attributed to him<sup>1</sup> a quality (which he did not really possess). God preserve us from exaggerating<sup>2</sup>, and from carelessness in transmitting historical information. Abu al-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) speaks of him in his Tārīkh Irbil (History of Arbela): "He was," says he, "a most learned man well versed in every science and particularly distinguished by his acquaintance with those of the Ancients (the Greeks), such as geometry and logic. He got over the difficulties of Euclid and of the Almagest under the tuition of the shaykh Sharaf al-Dīn al-Muẓaffar Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Muẓaffar al-Ṭūsī the Qur'ān reader, the inventor of the lineal astrolabe (al-astarlab al-khaṭṭī)<sup>1</sup> which is generally known by the designation of the staff<sup>2</sup>". He says, farther on: "Questions were sent to him from Baghdād on difficult points of this science and he answered them all; he treated them as mere trifles and then gave their solution. In jurisprudence and the sciences connected with the law of Islāmism, he stood without a rival. He professed in a number of the colleges at Moṣul, and many of his pupils attained high distinction in different branches of science." Lower down, we read this passage: "He recited to me the following verses composed by himself and in which he made an appeal to the clemency of the lord of Arbela.

---

1 Read اعزته I lent him.

2 Read الغلو .

'If any land can draw lustre from him who holds it under his sway, the kingdom of the earth will derive lustre from you. May you live till the end of time and have your orders always obeyed, your zeal gratefully acknowledged and your mansuetude renowned for its equity. You have been established to (watch over and) guard this extensive country, as Joseph was established over the cities of Pharaoh.' "

I may here observe that the same verses were repeated to me at Aleppo by an acquaintance of mine. In the year 633 (A. C. 1235-1236), whilst I was at Damascus, a man of that city who possessed some skill in the mathematical sciences, met with a number of difficult problems in arithmetic, algebra, geometry and (the treatise of) Euclid. Being unable to solve them, he wrote them all down on a scroll of paper and sent them to him (Kamāl

1 I have not been able to discover any account of this astronomer, but a long technical description of the lineal astrolabe is to be found in the third part of the work in which Abu al-Ḥasan of Morocco treats of the astronomical instruments employed by the Arabs.

2 Notwithstanding the similitude of the names, I do not think that the staff of al-Ṭūsī is the same instrument which is called Jacob's staff.

al-Dīn), who was then at Moṣul. A month afterwards he received an answer in which all the obscurities were cleared up, all the difficulties explained and many indications given which it would be impossible to recapitulate. The letter concluded by these words : "Have the kindness to excuse the insufficiency of this answer ; for my genius is frozen up and my intelligence extinguished ; my mind has fallen under the sway of forgetfulness and is distracted by the events which time has brought about. The greater part of what I learned from books and of what I knew (by my own observations) is now as much forgotten by me as if I had never known it." The person who proposed the questions said to me (of this passage) : "Such (elegant) language I never heard before ; the like of it was never uttered but by those of the ancients who were perfectly well versed in these sciences, it is not the language of those who live in our time." *[The following anecdote was related to me by the shaykh 'Alam al-Dīn (the standard of the faith) Qayṣar (Caesar), the son of Abu 'l-Qāsim, the son of 'Abd al-Ḡhanī, the son of Musāfir, and surnamed Ta'āsif<sup>1</sup>. He was a native of Egypt, a jurisconsult of the Ḥanafite sect and a mathematician (riyādī). In Egypt and at Damascus he was looked upon as the great master of the age in all the mathematical sciences. Here is what he said : "I felt a great desire to meet with the shaykh Kamāl al-Dīn, from having heard that he stood without a rival in these sciences. So, I set out for Moṣul with the intention of going to see him. When I went to present him my respects, I saw that, in his looks and appearance, he resembled those ancient sages whose history I had read and of whose aspect I had formed some idea. After saluting him, I stated that I had come for the purpose of studying under him, and he asked me by what science I wished to begin. 'By (the theory of) music,' said I. 'That happens very well,' said he, 'for it is a long time since any one studied it under me and I wished to converse with some person on that science so as to renew acquaintance with it.' I then commenced (the theory of) music, after which I passed successively to other sciences, and, in about the space of six months, I went over more than forty works under his tuition. I was already acquainted with music, but wished to be enabled to say that I had studied that science under him. The problems which I did not understand he explained to me; I never met with any one capable of filling his place as a teacher." I have entered into long details for the purpose of making known the great extent of his scientific acquirements, and yet I must declare that what I have said is still too much abridged. On the death of his brothers, the shaykh 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 575), he replaced him as professor in the ('Alā'iyyah) college and, when the Qāhiriyyah college was opened, he received his nomination as director of that establishment. In the month of Dhu al-Ḥijjah, 620 (Dec.-Jan., A. C. 1223-1224) he became director of the Badriyyah college. His assiduity in professing and teaching was remarkable. One day, a number of other professors, all of them wearing the ṭaylisān<sup>1</sup> were present at his lesson and a native of Bugia (in north Africa), the grammarian 'Imād al-Dīn Abū 'Alī 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-Nūr Ibn Mākḥūkh*<sup>2</sup> Ibn Yūsuf al-Ṣanhājī al-Liznī, who happened to be there, recited extempore the following verses:

---

<sup>1</sup> This word signifies fatigues. This Ta'āsif was one of the Ṣalāh al-Dīn's military engineer. Abu 'l-Feda mentions him in his annals, year 642, and al-Maqrizī, in his History of the Mamlūk Sulṭāns, year 649.

* From : 'The following' to 'teacher' on p. 390, not included in 'Abd al-Ḥamid's Edition.—Ed.

"Kamāl al-Dīn is really perfect (kamāl) by his learning and his high desert. Vain are the efforts of those who strive to attain the rank to which he has risen. When profound investigators meet together, their only object is to listen whilst he speaks. Think not that they put on their ṭaylisāns to vex him; they wear them merely to veil their faces through modesty and (thus) acknowledge (their inferiority)."

The same 'Imād al-Dīn composed on him other verses which I here give:

"Moṣul, training her robe in high disdain of all other cities, either inhabited or in ruins, is proud of her Tigris and of her Kamāl, both of them remedies for those who are athirst (for water

1 The ṭaylisān is a light scarf of crape worn over the turban and covering the shoulders. None were entitled to wear it except persons who had taken their degrees.

2 It appears from Ibn Khaldūn's History of the Berbers, that Mākḥūkh was the name of an eminent Berber family.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Mājūj.—Ed.

or for knowledge), and for those whose intelligence is feeble. One is a flowing ocean, though its waters be fresh; the other is also an ocean, but one of knowledge."

The shaykh Kamāl al-Dīn, may God be indulgent towards him! was suspected of holding loose opinions in matters of religion, because the study of the intellectual sciences was his ruling passion, and the preoccupation of his mind with these sciences hindered him sometimes from perceiving what was passing around him. To this the same 'Imād al-Dīn made allusion in the following lines:

"I tell you seriously that the gazelle (the young beauty whom I love and) who always used to frown (upon me) has consented to meet me and become my companion. I gave her wine mixed with (the honey of) her lips, (wine) light as my verses, and light as the religious convictions of the son of Yūnus."

But we are here digressing from our subject and speaking of matters which we need not have mentioned. He (Kamāl al-Dīn) was born at Moṣul on Thursday, the 5th of Ṣafar, 551 (30th of March, A. C. 1156); he died in that city on the 14th of Ṣha'bān, 639 (17th of Feb., A. C. 1242), and was buried in the funeral chapel which bears the name of his family (the Banī Man'ah) which is situated outside the Gate of 'Irāq near the mausoleum of Anaz<sup>1</sup>. We have already spoken of his son Ṣharaf al-Dīn Aḥmad (No. 44) and of his brother 'Imād al-Dīn Muḥammad (No. 575); we shall also give the life of his father (Yūnus) under the letter Y. Whilst I was attending his lectures<sup>2</sup> at Moṣul, the idea came into my mind that, if ever God granted me a male child, I should give it the name of this (professor). In the latter part of the year above mentioned, I went to Syria where I remained ten years and then, in 632 (A. C. 1234-5), I proceeded to Egypt where, after many vicissitudes of fortune, I entered into the bonds of matrimony. My eldest son came into the world at Cairo, on Saturday morning, the 11th of Ṣafar, 651 (12th of April, A. C. 1253), and I gave him the name of Mūsā. It struck me as a singular coincidence that he was born in the same month as Kamāl al-Dīn and exactly one hundred years after him. The learned shaykh and traditionist, Zakī al-Dīn 'Abd al-'Azīz (No. 43, note), to whom I mentioned the circumstance, was as much surprised as I and expressed his astonishment by frequently exclaiming: "By Allāh! it is an extraordinary thing." The shaykh Raḍī al-Dīn al-Qazwīnī, the professor at the Niẓāmiyah college of whom we have spoken towards the beginning of this notice, died at Qazwin on the 23rd of Muḥarram, 590 (18th of Jan. A.C. 1194); he was born there in the month of Ramaḍān, 512 (Dec.-Jan., A.C. 1118-9). Were I not afraid of being too prolix, I should expatiate on the noble qualities and acts of Kamāl al-Dīn. We have already spoken of the word (Ṣanhājah) (No. 105)<sup>1</sup>. (Liznī means belonging to the tribe of Liznah)<sup>2</sup> a berber people who inhabit the neighbourhood of Bugia, in province of Ifrīqiyyah<sup>3</sup>. 'Alam al-Dīn Ta'āsīf* died at Damascus on Sunday, the 13th of Rajab, 649 (1st Oct., A.C. 1251) and was interred outside the gate called Bāb Sharqī<sup>4</sup>; his body was afterwards removed to the (cemetery outside the gate named) Bāb al-Ṣaghīr<sup>5</sup>. His birth took place in the year 574 (A.C. 1178-9), at Aṣfūn, a place situated to the west of the province of Ṣa'id (in upper Egypt)<sup>6</sup>.

1 Various readings: Anā, Ghassān, Ghiyāth.

2 Literally: whilst I was going and coming in his service.

721 MŪSĀ IBN NUṢAYR<sup>7</sup>

Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr, the conqueror of Spain, was a member by enfranchisement of the tribe of Lakhm

1 Ṣanhājah or Ṣinhājah is an Arabic corruption of the Berber name Zenag, which word I often heard pronounced during my long residence in North Africa. The tribe of Zenag came from the country which is still called after it Senegal.

2 No Berber tribe of this name is now to be found in the province of Bugia.

3 The kingdom of Ifrīqiyyah was composed of the provinces of Tunis, Tripoli, Constantina, and Bugia.

4 Bāb Sharqī is a vulgar alteration of al-Bāb al-Sharqī (the eastern gate).

5 This name, in correct Arabic, should be al-Bāb al-Ṣaghīr (the little gate).

6 Aṣfūn lies to the north of Esneh. It is built on immense mound of rubbish, at about a mile from the river.

7 Ibn 'Asākir says, in his Biographical History of Damascus, (MS. of the Āṭif Library, at Constantinople) that the name of Mūsā's father is a diminutive and must be pronounced Nuṣayr.

* 'Abd al-Hamīd gives: 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Yūsuf.—Ed.

and one of the Tābi'is. Some traditions, received from Tamīm al-Dārī (No. 305, note), were taught by him in that person's name. He was noted for prudence, generosity, bravery, and piety. No army placed under his orders ever suffered a defeat. His father Nuṣayr, was commander of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abī Sufyān's body-guard and occupied a high place in the esteem of that sovereign. When Mu'āwiyah marched against 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib, Nuṣayr abstained from going with him. Mu'āwiyah said to him (afterwards): "What prevented you coming with me? you that are under obligations to me which you have not requited?" Nuṣayr answered: "It was not possible for me to acknowledge your kindness by being ungrateful to One Who had a better right to my gratitude than you." "Who is that?" said Mu'āwiyah. "Almighty God", replied Nuṣayr. "How so? may you be bereft of your mother!"<sup>1</sup> Nuṣayr replied: "How could I inform you without being mortified and afflicted?"<sup>2</sup> Mu'āwiyah remained silent for some time, after which he exclaimed. "May God pardon my sins!" and forgive him. When 'Abd Allāh,* the son of Marwān and the brother of 'Abd al-Malik, was governor of Egypt and North Africa (Ifriqiyah), he received from his nephew, the Khalif al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, a despatch ordering him to send Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr to Ifriqiyah. This happened in the eighty-ninth year of the Hijrah (which began on the 1st Dec., A.C: 707); but the ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī (No. 590) says in his Judḥwat al Muqtabis, that Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr obtained the government of Ifriqiyah and Maghrib in the year 77 (A.C. 696-7). Mūsā proceeded thither with a body of the Jund (No. 357, note) and, being informed that a number of rebels, were assembled in the extremities of the province, he sent for his son 'Abd Allāh, who brought him back one hundred thousand prisoners<sup>3</sup>. His son Marwān, whom he then sent in another direction, brought him back one

1 Literally : No mother to you ! a very common form of imprecation.

2 He alluded evidently to Mu'āwiyah's conduct towards 'Alī.

3 Literally : Heads of prisoners. This is analogous to the English expression : So many heads of oxen.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : 'Abd al-'Azīz which is obviously the correct reading.—Ed.

hundred thousand prisoners<sup>1</sup>. "The fifth part (of the captives, that which was reserved for the khalif) amounted," said al-Layth Ibn Sa'd, "to sixty thousand." "Never," said Abū Shabīb al-Ṣadaḡī, "in Muslim times, was seen such a quantity of prisoners as that made by Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr." He (Mūsā) found the greater part of the cities in Ifriqiyah uninhabited; because they had fallen so often into the hands of the Berbers. A great drought having prevailed in the land, he ordered the people to fast, to pray and to forgive each other their offences. He then went out with them into the open country, taking with him all the (domestic) animals, after having separated them from their young ones. Then arose outcry, lamentation, and clamour. This continued till the day was half spent, when he offered up the prayer and addressed a khutbah<sup>2</sup> to the assembly. In this discourse he omitted the name of al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik and, on being asked why he did not pray for the Commander of the faithful, he answered: "In the present case, prayers are for God alone." Rain then fell in such abundance that all were enabled to quench their thirst. From that place, he proceeded against the Berbers and, in this expedition, he slew them in great numbers, took many prisoners and an immense quantity of booty. Having continued his march, he arrived in (the province of) Lower Sūs<sup>3</sup> without meeting any resistance. The rest of the Berbers, seeing what had befallen their people, asked for pardon and offered to submit. He received their proposal and, having placed a commander over them, he confided the government of the town and the province of Tangiers to his mawlā Ṭāriq Ibn Ziyād al-Berberī (the Berber) who, it is said, was an (adoptive) member of (the Arabic tribe of) al-Ṣadīf,

---

1 To complete this account, the author should have added that Mūsā himself took also one hundred thousand prisoners. This extravagant legend is given by historians on the authority of al-Layth Ibn Sa'd (see No. 523), a traditionist by no means worthy of confidence, notwithstanding the favourable character given of him by our author. Indeed, most of the historical traditions for which the authority of al-Layth is adduced by Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam and other, authors cannot sustain a critical examination, and some of them are glaring falsehoods

2 See No. 78, note.

3 The province of Sūs forms the southern extremity of Morocco.

and left him in the command of nineteen thousand Berbers, well provided with stores and arms. These men had embraced the Muslim religion and were sincerely attached to it. He left with them also a few Arabs who were charged to teach them the Qur'ān and instruct them in the duties of Islāmism. He then returned to Ifriqiyah, and there did not remain in that country any Berbers or Romans capable of resisting him. Having laid the foundations of good order, he wrote to Ṭāriq, who was then at Tangiers, ordering him to make an expedition into Spain and to take with him a body of troops consisting of Berbers and a very small number of Arabs. Ṭāriq obeyed and crossed the sea, from Ceuta to Algasiras<sup>1</sup>, a place situated in Spanish territory, and went up to the hill which is called after him the mountain of Ṭāriq (Jabal Ṭāriq, Gibraltar). He ascended the hill on Monday, the 5th Rajab, A.H. 93 (17th April, A.C. 712), taking with him twelve thousand horsemen, all of them Berbers, with the exception of twelve (Arabs). It is related that, whilst Ṭāriq was crossing the Strait in his ship, he had a dream in which he saw the Prophet and the four (first) khalifs walking upon the water until they passed him by, and the Prophet said to him: "Be of good cheer! victory awaits you; treat the Musulmāns with mildness and be faithful to your engagements." It is Ibn Bashkuwāl (No. 206) who mentions this in his History of Spain, under the letter kh. The lord of Toledo and chief sovereign of Spain was a king called Ludhriq (Roderic). When Ṭāriq ascended the mountain above-mentioned, he wrote (in these terms) to Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr: "I have done what you ordered and God rendered easy for me the entry (into this country)." Mūsā, on receiving this letter, regretted having stayed behind, for he knew well that, whatever conquests Ṭāriq might make, the honour would be for that chief and not for himself. He therefore began to assemble troops and having confided to his son 'Abd-Allāh the government of Qayrawān, he set out to overtake him (Ṭāriq), but did not come up with him till the conquest had been effected. Ludhriq had marched against (another) adversary and left as his lieutenant in the government of the kingdom a man of the name of Tudmir (Theodomir), the same after whom that part of Spain called the Province of Tudmir was (subsequently) named. This province consisted of Murcia and its dependancies, five places in all.<sup>1</sup> The Franks got possession of Murcia in the year 652 (A.C. 1254<sup>2</sup>). When Ṭāriq descended from the mountain with the troops which accompanied him, Tudmir wrote to Ludhriq, saying: "A people have entered into our land, but whether they are from heaven or from earth I know not." Ludhriq, on receiving this news, abandoned his expedition and returned, bringing with him seventy thousand horsemen and the waggons which contained his treasures and his baggage. He himself was borne on a throne placed between two mules and surmounted by a canopy adorned with pearls, rubies and emeralds. Ṭāriq being informed of his approach, stood up to address his companions and after thanking God and rendering Him due praise, he encouraged the Muslims to engage in a holy war and aspire to the glory of dying for the true faith<sup>3</sup>. He then said: "My men! whither can you fly? The sea is behind you and the enemy before you; nothing can save you but the help of God, your bravery and your steadiness. Be it known to you that you are here as badly off as orphans at a miser's table. The foe is coming against you with his troops, his arms and all his forces; you have nothing to rely on but your swords, no food to eat except what you may snatch from the hands of your enemies. If you remain some days longer in your present state of privation, without succeeding in an attempt, you will lose your energy; self-confidence will then replace the fear which fills the hearts of your adversaries and embolden them against you. Defend yourselves like men who have no assistance to expect; the inevitable result of your present state is that you must contend with this ṭāghiyah (king tyrant), who now comes against you from his strongly fortified city. But, to triumph over him is for you quite possible, if you are willing to expose yourselves to death. In

---

1 Literally: The green island, al-Jazīrat al-Khaḍrā.

1 Those five places were Murcia, Lorca, Mula, Orihuela, and Alicant.

2 This event took place in the year 658 (A.C. 1260) according to al-Maqqari. The Christian historians place the occupation of Murcia in the year 1266.

3 The discourse given here and attributed to Ṭāriq is evidently spurious.*

* This remark is uncalled for and unwarranted.—Ed.

announcing this danger to you, I have not the intention of keeping out of it myself; when I engaged you in a business such as this, wherein the lives of men are the cheapest ware, I was resolved to risk my own. Be assured that, if you resist, even for a short time (the attack which my be) the rudest, you will afterwards long enjoy the sweetest and the easiest of lives. Let not your minds be turned against me for (undertaking an expedition) in which the profits falling to your share will be much greater than mine. You know what this island<sup>1</sup> produces; large-eyed maidens, daughters of the Greeks, graceful in their bearing, covered with pearls, coral and robes interwoven with pure gold; (maidens) carefully guarded in the palaces of crowned kings. Al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik has chosen you as being quite as brave as the desert Arabs<sup>2</sup>, and has willed that you should become by marriage brothers and sons to the princes of this island; such is his confidence in your eagerness to charge with the spear and your readiness to contend, sword in hand, with the brave warriors and the horsemen. Let him obtain for his portion, by your concurrence, the recompense granted by God to those who shall exalt His word and manifest His religion in this island. All the booty is for you; none of it shall be reserved for Him or for the other Muslims. May the Almighty aid such heroes as you are, so that you may gain renown in this world and in the next. Know also that I shall be the first in doing that to which I invite you: at the joining of the two armies in battle, I shall myself charge upon the tāghiyah of the people, Ludhriq and slay him, if God permit. Charge at the same time as I; if I die after killing him, I shall (at least) have delivered you from the harm he might do you, and you will have no difficulty in finding a brave and intelligent (chief) to be a commander over you. If I perish before reaching Ludhriq, follow up what I commenced; charge you also upon him and, by taking his life, effect what is most important for the

---

1 The word jazīrah signifies, "island, peninsula." I adopt the first meaning as being more consonant to the idea which the ancient Arabs had of the Spanish peninsula; they considered it as an island detached from the African continent.

2 The fabricator of this speech was not aware that the troops of Tārik were Berbers.

conquest of this island ; your adversaries will lose all hopes in losing him." When Tāriq had finished exhorting his companions to fight bravely against the people of Ludhriq, and mentioned the ample recompence which awaited them, their hearts were set at ease, their hopes revived and (they felt already) the breeze of victory blowing upon them. "We renounce" said they, "all thoughts of doing any thing contrary to what you may decide ; go forth against the enemy ; we shall be with you and march before you." Tāriq then got on horseback ; his companions did the same, and they all advanced towards the spot where Ludhriq had halted, and which was situated in a wide plain. When the two armies were in presence, Tāriq and his men dismounted and passed the night in keeping good guard. The next morning, some delay occurred on both sides before the squadrons were placed in proper order. Ludhriq was borne on his throne, with a canopy of gold brocade over his head, to shade him from the sun. He advanced, surrounded by a forest of pennons and standards, and before him came his warriors, all in arms. Tāriq and his companions advanced also ; on their bodies were coats of mail, on their heads turbans and helmets, in their hands Arabian bows ; their swords were suspended from their shoulders and their spears placed in the rest. When Ludhriq saw them, he exclaimed : 'By God ! these are the very figures we saw in the House of Wisdom which is in our city," and his heart was invaded by terror. Let us now mention what this House of Wisdom was, and then we shall finish our account of the battle<sup>1</sup>. The Greeks (Yūnān Ioniens)<sup>2</sup>, a people renowned for wisdom, inhabited the countries of the East before, the time of Alexander. When the Persians

---

1 The Arabic historians and particularly those who were natives of the East, had very meagre and incorrect ideas respecting the conquest of Spain and the history of that country. During the first two centuries of the Hijrah, all historical information was preserved by oral tradition, and, when the task of writing down these accounts was undertaken, the greater part of them had been forgotten. To repair this loss, Musulmān historians admitted into their works fables and absurd legends such as those which Ibn Khallikan is about to give. The most satisfactory account of the conquest is that given by M. Dozy in his Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, tome II, page 31.

2 It is a needless task to point out all the absurdities of this legend.

appeared and took possession of that country, the Greeks, being forced by their encroachments to abandon their states, emigrated to the Spanish island, because it lay at one extremity of the inhabited earth. At that time, Spain had never been spoken of, nor had it ever a king worthy of note, nor a large population. The first who settled there and founded a colony was Andalus, the son of Japhets the son of Nūḥ, and from him the country drew its name. When the earth received a new population after the deluge, the inhabited part of it was, according to these philosophers, in the form of a bird: the East represented the head, the North and the South, the two feet, and the West, the tail. This last region was held in contempt because it corresponded to the vilest part of the bird. The Greeks did not think it right to destroy people by war, because warfare abounded in evil, and because it would have hindered them from cultivating the sciences, which for them, was the most important study of all. These reasons induced them to retire before the Persians and pass into Spain. On their arrival, they began to till the ground, to open canals (for irrigation), to erect castles, to plant gardens and vineyards, to build cities, to cover the land with tillage and plantations, and to propagate (domestic animals). The country then became so rich and so beautiful that the inhabitants, on observing how magnificent it was, would often say: "If the West form the tail of the bird which is represented by the inhabited portion of the earth, that bird must be a peacock; for its beauty lies in its tail." The inhabitants, being then in the enjoyment of complete welfare, took the city of Toledo for the capital of their empire and for their House of Wisdom; having chosen it because it was in the centre of the land. It appeared to them a matter of the highest importance that their city should be well fortified, in order to preserve it from the attacks of those people who might hear of its prosperity. On looking round, they could discover no people inclined to envy their comfort except such as were living in misery and indigence, and those were the Arabs and the Berbers. Fearing lest their island, which they had so well cultivated, might be attacked by them, they decided on having a talisman formed, by means, of which these two races of men might be kept away and they caused astronomical observations to be made for that purpose. But, as the Berbers were in their neighbourhood, being separated from them only by a strait of the sea, bands of those people used to pass over into Spain. The coarseness of their manners and the singularity of their aspect served to increase the aversion in which the Greeks held them, and prevented that people from forming any connexion with them, either as allies by marriage or as neighbours. This feeling took so strong a root in their minds that hatred for the Berbers seemed to be an inherent disposition of their nature. When the Berbers were aware of this hostile feeling towards them and perceived the dislike in which they were held by the people of Spain, they began to look on them with hatred and jealousy ; so that you will not now find a Spaniard who does not detest the Berbers, nor a Berber who does not hate the Spaniards. The Berbers, however, stand more in need of the Spaniards than these do of them, so many things being to be found in Spain which are not to be had in the country of the Berbers. In an island called Qādis (Cádiz), and situated in the western part of the island of Spain, was a Greek king who had an extremely handsome daughter. The renown of her beauty reached the kings of Spain, for there was a great number of them in that country ; every town or every two towns had a separate king, and all these sovereigns treated each other as equals. The Spanish kings asked her in marriage, and her father, fearing that, if he gave her to one, he should offend all the others, was uncertain what to do, and sent for his daughter (in order to consult her). Wisdom was then inherent in the character of this people, both of the males and females ; so, for that reason it was said : "Wisdom descended from heaven upon three different members of the human body ; upon the brains of the Greeks, the hands of the Chinese and the tongues of the Arabs." When she appeared before him, he said to her : "Daughter you see me in a great perplexity." "What," said she, "is the cause of it ?" He replied : "All the kings in Spain have asked you from me in marriage and, if I satisfy the wish of one, I shall give offence to all the others." "Leave the matter to me," said she, "and I shall save you from reproaches." "How will you do ?" "I shall myself require one thing, and whoever among them fulfills the condition, him I shall marry ; he that is unable to fulfill it will then have no right to be displeased with you." "What do you mean to ask for?" "I shall require that my suitor be not only a king but a sage." "There indeed," said he, "you make for yourself an excellent choice." He in consequence wrote to all the royal suitors, informing them that he had referred their demands to his daughter and that she would take no king for her husband unless he was a sage." When those who were not sages read this answer, they (kept their peace and) spoke no more of her, but two of these princes wrote, each of them declaring that he was a sage. When the king received their letters, he said to his daughter. "Things are in the same state as before; here are two kings, both of them sages, and, if I choose one, I shall offend the other." She replied: "I shall require of each of them to do a thing, and him I shall marry who accomplishes his task soonest." "What will you ask of them?" "In the island which we inhabit, we require to have mills which turn; so I shall propose to one of the kings that he make them turn by means of fresh water flowing to them from that country (beyond the strait); and I shall tell the other to make a talisman that may protect this island against the Berbers." The father approved highly of what she intended to exact, and wrote to the two kings, informing them of what his daughter had said. They both accepted the conditions; each of them chose the task which he preferred and commenced the required work. He of the mills took great blocks<sup>1</sup> of stone and adapted them one to the other, through the salt sea which separates the island of Spain from the main land (Africa). The place where he did this is known by the name of the Straits of Ceuta. The empty spaces left between the stones he filled up according to the dictates of his judgement and, by (this pier of) stones he united the (African) continent to the Spanish island. The remains of this construction are still visible in the strait which separates Ceuta from Algeziras. It is generally said by the natives of Spain that these remains are the ruins of a bridge which Alexander (the Great) constructed in order that people might be enabled to pass from Ceuta to that island; God knows best which 1 The text had خرز which signifies beads and others small objects which are ranged in lines; it designates also the vertebres of the spine. This may not, perhaps, be the true reading, but the manuscripts all agree in giving it.

---

of these accounts is the true one. When the royal sage had finished arranging the stones, he directed towards them a stream of water from an elevated spot in the mountain of the (African) continent, and confined it in a channel constructed with great solidity and, in the Spanish island, he erected mills on this canal. The king who undertook to make the talisman was delayed in his work, because he had been obliged to wait till a (favourable) observation (of the stars) indicated the proper moment to begin. He succeeded, however, in accomplishing his task, and constructed a square edifice of white stones on a sandy ground, near the sea-shore and, that it might be perfectly solid, he took care that the foundations should be dug as deep as the building itself was to be elevated above the surface of the earth. When he had raised it to the requisite height, he took copper and purified iron, mixed them well together and formed with them the image of a Berber having a long beard and his head covered with locks of hair so crispy that they stood on end. Under the arm was represented a cloak, gracefully and solidly modelled, the two ends of which were held in the left hand ; on the feet were sandals. This statue was placed on the summit of the edifice and stood on a narrow base, merely sufficient to receive the feet. This (base) rose in the air to the height of more than sixty or seventy cubits ; it diminished gradually towards the top, where its breadth was not more than a cubit. The right arm of the statue grasped in its hand a key and was stretched out towards the sea as if to say : "No thoroughfare !" This talisman had such influence that the sea opposite to it was never seen to be calm and that, whenever a Berber ship navigated therein, the key fell from the hand of the statue. The two kings who had undertaken to construct, one, the mills and, the other, the talisman, endeavoured, each of them, to finish his work before the other, because he who had soonest done would be entitled to marry (the princess). He of the mills completed his work but concealed the fact, in order, that the other might not destroy the talisman ; for he wished to possess it, the (young) woman and the mills. The morning of the day on which he learned that the talisman was completed, he let the water flow till it reached the island and turned the mills. The maker of the talisman was then on the top of the statue, polishing the face of it ; for it was gilded.

When he learned that the other had finished before him, a weakness came over him and he fell dead from the summit of the edifice. He of the mills then became possessor of the princess, the mills and the talisman<sup>1</sup>. The ancient Greek kings feared for Spain on account of the Berbers; so they all accorded in observing (the stars) for the purpose of constructing talisman at propitious moments. These talismans they placed in a marble chest which they deposited in the chamber of a house (situated) in the city of Toledo. On this chamber they placed a door and, having locked it, they left injunctions that every king of Spain should, on the death of his predecessor, add a lock to that door, for the better conservation of what was in the chamber. This custom continued till the time arrived wherein the domination of the Greeks was to be subverted and the Arabs and Berbers were to enter into Spain. Twenty-six Greek kings had already reigned from the time 'of their making the talismans in the city of Toledo, when this (fatal hour) arrived. The above-mentioned Ludhriq was the twenty-seventh of their kings. When he was seated on the throne, he said to his wazirs and his counsellors of state: "A thought has come into my mind touching this chamber which is closed by twenty-six locks; I wish to open it in order to see what it contains; for it has certainly not been made in sport." They answered: "O king! you are right in saying that it was not made in sport nor locked without a reason; but what you had best to do is, to place on it another lock in imitation of the kings, your predecessors. This custom was never neglected by your ancestors and forefathers; so, do not give it up, but follow their example." He replied, "My mind impels me to open it, and it shall be done." To this they said: "If you think it contains a treasure, estimate what you may suppose to be its value and we shall make up that sum out of our own money and give it to you; so, do not open the door lest you bring upon us something the consequence of which we cannot foresee." He persisted in his project and; as he was a man much feared, no one dared to reply to him. The locks, each of which had its key suspended to it, were opened by his orders. When the door was unclosed, nothing was seen in the chamber except a great table of gold and silver, set round with jewels and bearing this inscription: "Table of Solomon, the son of David; God's blessing upon them both!" He discovered also in the chamber of the chest of which we spoke; it had a lock on it to which was suspended a key. On opening it, he found nothing except a piece of parchment, and he observed on the sides of the chest figures of horsemen painted in colours and of a good design. They represented Arabs dressed in their cloaks of camel's hair and wearing turbans from under which their hair hung in ringlets. They were riding on Arabian horses; in their hands they bore Arabian bows; from their shoulders were suspended swords richly mounted, and their spears were in the rest. He ordered the parchment to be unfolded and therein he found written: "This chamber and this chest were locked through prudence, when they are opened, the people whose images are on the chest will enter into the island of Spain, the empire will escape from the hands of the Greeks and their wisdom shall be obliterated." This was the House of Wisdom above-mentioned. When Ludhriq heard the contents of the parchment, he repented of what he had done and felt convinced that the empire of the Greeks had drawn to an end. Very soon after, he learned the arrival of an army sent from the East by the king of the Arabs for the purpose of conquering the provinces of Spain. Here ends the account of the House of Wisdom. Let us now return to our subject and finish the history of Ludhriq and of the army commanded by Ṭāriq Ibn Ziyād. When Ṭāriq saw Ludhriq, he said to his companions: "There is the tyrant that reigns over these people; charge!" They all charged with him and dispersed the warriors who were placed before Ludhriq. Ṭāriq then got up to him, struck him on the head with his sword and slew him upon his throne. When Ludhriq's companions saw the fall of their king, the two armies attacked each other and the Muslims remained victorious. The routing of the Greeks was not confined to that spot alone, for they abandoned town after town and fortress after fortress. When Mūsā was informed of these events, he crossed over to the island with his troops and, having overtaken his mawlā Ṭāriq he said to him: "O Ṭāriq, al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik cannot give you a less recompense for your bravery than the government of Spain; so ask for it and may you well enjoy it!" Ṭāriq replied; "Amīr! I declare by Allāh that I shall not discontinue my march till I arrive at the sea which surrounds (the world) and enter into it with my horse." He meant the Northern ocean which lies under the Bināt Na'sh<sup>1</sup>. Ṭāriq continued his conquests and Mūsā accompanied him till they reached Galicia (a province situated) on the coast of the surrounding sea; then only he turned back. Al-Ḥumaydi says in his Judḥwat al-Muqtabis: "Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr was much displeased with Ṭāriq for having made a campaign without permission and cast him into prison. He was even thinking of putting him to death when he received from al-Walīd a letter by which he was ordered to set him at liberty. He obeyed and returned with him to Syria. It was in the ninety-fourth year of the Hijrah that Mūsā left Spain. He took with him the treasures found there and went to inform al-Walīd of the conquest he had effected with the aid of the Almighty. He bore off also the table of Solomon, the son of David, which, according to some historians, had been found in Toledo." The same author says: "It was made of gold and silver, and was encircled by a collar of pearls, a collar of rubies and a collar of emeralds. Its size was so great that, when it was placed on the back of a stout mule, the animal did not go far before its legs gave way." He took with him the crowns of the kings who had formerly reigned over the Greeks; each of those crowns was set with jewels; and he carried off also thirty thousand prisoners. It is related that al-Walīd had some motive for being displeased with Mūsā; so, when the latter arrived at Damascus, he let him remain exposed to the sun during a whole summer's day and kept him there till he fainted away<sup>2</sup>. We have made this article rather long, but one matter led to another and I could not interrupt the recital. I shall only state that I have given the essential, though many things are omitted. Al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik died after the arrival of Mūsā in Syria and was succeeded by his brother Sulaymān. In the year 97 of the Hijrah (A.C. 715-6),

---

1 The want of reflection evinced by our author in relating such silly fables is unpardonable.

---

1 The constellation of the Greater Bear is called by the Arabs Bindt na sh (the girls of a bier or hearse).

2 See Dozy's Histoire des Musulman d' Espagne, tome I, page 214 et seq.

or, by another account, in the year 99, Sulaymān set out on the pilgrimage, and Mūsā, whom he had taken with him, died on the way, at Wādī 'l-Qurā, or at Marr al-Zahrān<sup>1</sup>, for the statements are at variance. He was born in the nineteenth year of the Hijrah (A.C. 640), under the khalifate of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb<sup>2</sup>.

722 AL-MALIK AL-ASHRAF MUẒAFFAR AL-DĪN

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Mūsā, the son of al-Malik al-'Ādil Sayf al-Dīn Abū Bakr (see No. 667), the son of Ayyūb, was surnamed al-Malik al-Ashraf Muẓaffar al-Dīn (the most noble prince, the triumphant in religion). The first government he obtained was that of al-Ruhā (Edessa), being sent from Egypt to that city by his father in the year 598 (A.C. 1201-2). Sometime after, he received the Government of Ḥarrān in addition to what he already possessed. He was beloved by the people, fortunate (in all his proceedings) and victorious in his wars. He then encountered on the field of battle and defeated Nūr al-Dīn Arslān Shāh, lord of Moṣul (No. 79), who was one of the greatest and most illustrious princes of the age. This took place on Saturday, the 19th of Shawwāl, A.H. 600 (21st of June, A.C. 1204). The battle was fought at a place called Bayn al-Nahrayn* and situated in the province of Moṣul. The history of this event is so well known that we need not enter into any details on the subject<sup>3</sup>. After the death of his brother al-Malik al-Awḥad Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, lord of Khalāt, Mayyāfāriqīn and the neighbouring places, he took possession of his kingdom and united it to his own. †[Al-Malik al-Awḥad died on the 8th of the first Rabi', 609 (8th of August, A.C. 1212), at Malāzgiid, in the province of Khalāt, and was there interred.] He had obtained the

1 The village of Marr al-Zahrān was situated on the border of a glen near Makkah. Wādī 'l-Qurā (the glen of towns) lies half-way between Makkah and Baṣrah.

2 Fuller and more certain information respecting Mūsā will be found in M. Dozy's work, the merit of which I gratefully acknowledge.

3 See, for these events, the annals of Abu 'l-Feda and of Ibn al-Aṭṭār.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid omitted this name.—Ed.

† [ ] 'Abd al-Ḥamid omitted this sentence.—Ed.

sovereignty of Khalāt * [in the month of the first Jumādā], 604 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 1207). (Al-Ashraf), having thus enlarged his dominions, governed the people with such justice and benevolence as they had never experienced from any of his predecessors. By this conduct, he gained all hearts and acquired wide renown. In the year 606 (A.C. 1209-10), he got possession of Naṣībīn in the East<sup>1</sup>, and, * [on the fourth day of the first Jumādā of] the following year, he occupied the (town of) Sinjār, (the province of) al-Khābūr and the greater part of Mesopotamia. These places he visited from time to time and generally took up his residence at al-Raqqah, because that town was situated on the Euphrates. On the death of his paternal cousin, al-Malik al-Zāhir Ghāzī, lord of Aleppo, for the date, see Ghāzī's life (in No. 497), the sovereign of al-Rūm (Asia Minor), 'Izz al-Dīn Kaykā'ūs, son of Ghiyāth al-Dīn Kaykhusrū and grandson of Qilij Arslān, resolved on making an expedition to Aleppo. The persons who held the command in that city sent a despatch to al-Malik al-Ashraf, requesting him to come to them and protect the city. He accepted the invitation and, having gone to join them, he remained during three years at al-Yārūqiyah†<sup>2</sup>, in the outskirts of Aleppo. There is no necessity for our entering into a detailed account of the events in which the sovereign of al-Rūm, the prince al-Malik al-Ashraf and his cousin al-Malik al-Afdal, son of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and lord of Sumaisāt, were all concerned<sup>3</sup>. In the year 616 (A.C. 1219-20), when the Franks took Damietta, as we have related in the life of al-Malik al-Kāmil (No. 668), a number of the Syrian princes went to Egypt for the purpose of giving their assistance to al-Malik al-Kāmil, but al-Malik al-Ashraf stood aloof, in consequence of a misunderstanding which existed between him and the sovereign of Egypt.

1 The city of Naṣībīn, in Mesopotamia, was sometimes called Naṣībīn of the east; probably to distinguish it from a village of the same name which lay in the neighbourhood of Aleppo.

2 The name of al-Yārūqiyah was given to an extensive tract of ground in the neighbourhood of Aleppo, where Yārūq (see No. 760), a Turkoman chief, had fixed his residence.

3 See Ibn al-Athīr and Abu 'l-Fedā. I may here be allowed to observe that the latter name should be pronounced Abu 'l-Fidā.

* [ ] Omitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : al-Bārūqiyah.—Ed.

Al-Malik al-Mu'azzam 'Isā, the prince of whom we have already given a notice (No. 490), went then to see him and spared no effort till he succeeded in gaining him over and bringing him to Egypt. A few months after his arrival, the Muslims defeated the Franks, as we have already mentioned in the life of his brother al-Malik al-Kāmil, and recovered the city of Damietta. This victory was generally ascribed to the good fortune which always attended al-Ashraf. He had joined the Egyptians in the month of Muḥarram, 618 (February-March, A.C. 1221). His brother, al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Shihāb al-Dīn, whom he had left in Khalāt as his lieutenant, revolted against him; on which, he led his army to that city and, on Monday, the 12th of the latter Jumādā, 621 (1st of July, A.C. 1224), he recovered it from the usurper. On the death of al-Malik al-Mu'azzam (No. 490), al-Malik al-Nāṣir Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Dāwūd assumed the supreme command at Damascus; but his uncle, al-Malik al-Kāmil, marched against him from Egypt, with the intention of taking that city. His (other) uncle, al-Malik al-Ashraf, who was then in the East<sup>1</sup> and whose assistance he had requested, joined him at Damascus, and, having gone, some time after, to have an interview with his brother, al-Malik al-Kāmil, it was agreed upon between them that Damascus should be taken from al-Malik al-Nāṣir Dāwūd and given to al-Malik al-Ashraf; the former being allowed to retain al-Karak, al-Shawbak, Nāblus, Banyās* and the other places in the part of the country whilst the latter was to give up to al-Malik al-Kāmil (the cities of) al-Ruhā (Edessa), Ḥarrān, Sarūj, al-Raqqah and Rās-'Ayn. In consequence of this arrangement, al-Malik al-Ashraf obtained possession of Damascus towards the beginning of the month of Shā'bān<sup>2</sup> 626, (end of June, A.C. 1229), and established in it his lieutenants. Al-Malik al-Nāṣir Dāwūd departed on Friday, the 12th of Shā'bān and went to the provinces which had been left to him. Al-Malik al-Kāmil made his entry into Damascus on the 16th of that month and then returned to the place where he usually stationed, outside the city. On the 18th of Shā'bān, he entered into the citadel with his brother al-Malik al-Ashraf, and, towards the end of the month, he remitted the fortress to him according to agreement. He then set out for the purpose of inspecting the provinces in the East which had been ceded to him and of re-establishing order in these countries. I passed through Harrān at the time he was there. Al-Ashraf proceeded to Damascus and fixed his residence there, in preference to all the other cities in his states. In the month of the latter Jumādā, 626 (May, A.C. 1229), Jalāl al-Dīn Khuwārazm Shāh, who had encamped before Khalāt and blockaded it closely, took it from the lieutenants of al-Malik al-Ashraf who was then residing in Damascus, and had been prevented by reasons of a particular nature from going to deliver the place. Soon after, al-Ashraf entered into Balād al-Rūm (Asia Minor), with the consent of 'Alā al-Dīn Kayqubād, brother of 'Izz al-Dīn Kaykā'ūs and sultān of that country. The two sovereigns, having contracted a mutual alliance, decided on marching against Khuwārazm Shāh and giving him battle. The fact was that the lord of al-Rūm entertained some fears for the safety of his states as long as he should have so dangerous a neighbour. A numerous army composed of 'Alā al-Dīn's troops and of those which al-Malik al-Ashraf had drawn from Syria and the East, advanced against the common enemy. On Saturday, the 18th of Ramaḍān, 627 (31st July, A.C. 1230), they encountered the army of Khuwārazm Shāh at a place called Banī Jumān*<sup>1</sup> and situated between Khalāt and Arzangān and fought with him that famous battle in which they routed his army. Al-Malik al-Ashraf recovered Khalāt, which had been completely ruined, and then returned to Syria, whence he proceeded to Egypt. After remaining there some time with his brother al-Kāmil, he marched with that sovereign and under his orders, against the city of 'Āmid, which they took after a short siege. This was in the year 629 (A.C. 1231-2). Al-Kāmil joined this place to the states he already possessed in the East and, <sup>1</sup> The orthography of this name is doubtful: all the manuscripts differ, both those of Ibn Khullikān and those of Ibn al-Athīr. The name, without being pointed, seems to have been written, ياسى حمار but, how this group is to be pronounced, I cannot say.

1 The term East (al-Sharq) is employed in this article to designate Mesopotamia.

2 Two manuscripts read Rajab, the name of the month which precedes Shā'bān.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives Buysān.--Ed.

---

• 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : ياسى حماره Yāsi Ḥumārah.--Ed.

having installed in it his son al-Malik al-Šāliḥ Najm al-Dīn Ayyūb, the same of whom we have spoken in the life of al-Kāmil (No. 668), he placed in his service the eunuch Shams al-Dīn Šawāb,* who had been formerly a slave to al-Malik al-ʿĀdil. The two sovereigns then returned, each of them to his kingdom. Subsequently to these events †[and towards the end of the year 631 (Sept.-Oct., A.C. 1234),] was fought †[the celebrated battle of al-Darbandāt (the Passes)<sup>1</sup>] in the country of Al-Rūm, and (the consequence was that) al-Kāmil and al-Ashraf were obliged to retire with their allies and abandon their project. On their departure, the sovereign of al-Rūm's army invaded, occupied, and devastated the provinces which al-Kāmil possessed in the East. Al-Kāmil then returned to that country with al-Ashraf and the princes who followed their fortune, and recovered it from the officers whom the lord of al-Rūm had left there as his lieutenants. In the year 633 (A.C. 1235-6), al-Ashraf returned to Damascus. I was there at the time and had opportunities of seeing him and al-Kāmil, for they rode out together every day and played at mall in the great Green Hippodrome. This was in the month of Ramaḍān, and their object was to pass away time on account of the (irksomeness of the) fast. I remarked that each of them shewed to the other great respect. A coolness then grew up between them, and al-Ashraf refused to acknowledge the authority of al-Kāmil any longer. His resolution being approved of by the other princes, he concerted with the lords of al-Rūm, Aleppo, Ḥamāt, Ḥims, and the eastern countries, and they decided to take up arms against al-Kāmil. The only one who remained faithful to al-Kāmil was his nephew Dāwūd, lord of al-Karak, who proceeded to Egypt and placed himself under the orders of his uncle. The other princes had concluded their alliance, sworn fidelity to each other, and decided on taking the field, when al-Ashraf was attacked by a violent illness which carried him off. He died at Damascus, on Thursday, the 4th of Muḥarram, 635 (27th August, A.C. 1237), and was buried in the citadel. His corpse was subsequently removed to the Mausoleum which he had erected for himself at al-Kallāsah, close to the northern side of the great mosque of Damascus. He was born in the year 578 (A.C. 1182-3), at Cairo in Egypt, or; by another account, at the castle of al-Karak. In the life of his brother, al-Malik al-Mu'azzam 'Isā (No. 490), we have mentioned the dates which Sibṭ Ibn al-Jawzī assigned to the births of these princes. Shihāb al-Dīn Ghāzī, brother of al-Ashraf and lord of Mayyāfāriqīn, died at that place in the month of Rajab, 645 (November, A.C. 1247). Al-Ashraf, the principal events of whose life we have here related in a summary manner, was a generous sultān, noted for mildness, largeness of heart, and every noble quality. He was so profuse of his gifts that nothing was ever to be found in his treasury, though the kingdom he ruled over was very extensive. He was constantly in debt to merchants and other people. One day he reproached his secretary and poet, al-Kamāl<sup>1</sup> Abu 'l-Hasan 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed Ibn al-Nabīh and a native of Egypt, for having only a single pen (qalam) in his inkhorn, on which al-Kamāl recited to him extempore the following dubayt (distich):

<sup>1</sup> These are the defiles through which travellers from Syria must pass before they enter into Asia Minor.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid g res : Šawān.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamid omits [ ].—Ed.

"The noble king was right in saying; 'Your pens, O Kamāl! are few in number,' I answered: 'The grants you make require such a quantity of writing that our pens get used, must be mended and soon disappear.'"

As he was one day sitting in the room where he received his familiar society and listening to an instrument of music, he was so much pleased with him who played on it that he said: "Ask from me what thou wilt." The other replied: "I wish to obtain the government of Khalāt." Al-Ashraf granted the request and the man set off in order to take the government of the city out of the hands of the amīr who held it, a lieutenant to the sultān. This officer, whose name was Ḥusām al-Dīn 'Alī Ibn Ḥammād, and who was generally known by the surname of al-Ḥājib al-Mawṣilī (the chamberlain of Moṣul), made a compromise with the musician and paid him a large sum of money (for his relinquishment). Many anecdotes of a similar nature are related of al-Ashraf. He was favourably inclined towards men of virtue and piety, and held them, in great esteem. He built at Damascus a school for traditions (dār ḥadīth) and confided the professorship to the shaykh Taqī al-Dīn 'Uthmān Ibn al-Ṣaiāḥ, the same of whom we have already spoken (No. 386). There was at a place called al-'Aqabiyah and situated in the outskirts of Damascus a caravanserai (khān) called the Khān of Ibn al-Zanjārī. Every sort of amusement was to be found in that establishment, and the unbounded lewdness and debauchery which prevailed there surpassed description. Al-Ashraf, being told that such doings should not be tolerated in a Muslim country, ordered the caravansary to be demolished and replaced by a mosque for the building of which he got indebted to a great amount. The people named it the Mosque of Repentance (Jāmi' al-Tawbah), as if to say that the (edifice) had repented and turned to God. I feel inclined to relate here an amusing anecdote concerning the office of preacher (such as it was filled) in that mosque. An imām called al-Jamāl al-Sibtī<sup>1</sup> was attached to the college of Sitt al-Shām (No. 386) which is situated outside the city. I knew the man when he had grown old and good; for it is said that, in his youth, he played (in public) on a sort of instrument called a Chighānah (castanets). When he was advanced in age, he amended his life and frequented the society of the learned and the virtuous, so that he at length came to be looked on as a very holy man. A preacher being required for this mosque, a number of persons were named to al-Ashraf, and al-Jamāl, being well recommended, was chosen by him to occupy that post. When al-Jamāl died, his place was filled by al-'Imād al-Wāsiṭī who, though celebrated as a preacher, was suspected of drinking wine. The prince who then reigned at Damascus was (al-Malik) al-Ṣāliḥ 'Imād al-Dīn Ismā'il, son of al-'Ādil Ibn Ayyūb, and, to him the following verses were written by al-Jamāl 'Abd al-Raḥīm, surnamed Ibn Zuwaytinah al-Raḥabī :

---

<sup>1</sup> I may observe here that titles such as al-Kamāl, al-Bahā, etc., are the equivalents of Kamāl al-Dīn, 'Imād al-Dīn, Bahā al-Dīn, etc.

"Prince! the truth has been clearly explained to me and rendered evident by the mosque of Repentance, which has confided to me a mission. It spoke these words: 'Say to al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ, whom God exalt! O pillar of the faith! O thou whose reign is praised by all! how long must I remain enduring evil, annoyance, and contempt? I have a preacher from al-Wāsiṭ whose piety consists in the love of wine: his predecessor sung to the Chighānah; it is as if I had never ceased to be a khān. Restore me to my former state and let the harm it does continue.' "

1 Some of the manuscripts read al-Bastī (البستي) in place of al-Sibtī (السبتي). Bast is the name of a village in Āḍḥarbijān; Sibtī means native of Sibta, or Ceuta, a town in north Africa, near the straits of Gibraltar.

This is a clever piece in its way. Ibn al-Zuwayṭinah was sent to Egypt on a mission by the governor of Emessa, and he then repeated to me these verses and explained to me why he composed them. This occurred in one of the months of the year 647 (A.C. 1249-50). The most distinguished poets of the age celebrated the praises of al-Aṣḥraf and immortalised his glory by inserting these eulogies in their collected poetical works. Amongst them were: Sharaf al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn 'Unayn (No. 658) al-Bahā As'ad al-Sinjāri (No. 89), Rājiḥ al-Ḥillī, of whom mention has been made in the life of al-Malik al-Zāhir (No. 497), Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-Nabīh, who died in Naṣībīn of the East, A.H. 619 (A.C. 1222-3)<sup>1</sup>, at the age of about sixty years, as I have been informed at Cairo by his son-in-law, and Muḥadḥḥab al-Dīn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan<sup>2</sup> Ibn Yumn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Uṭhmān Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Ansāri, a celebrated poet, generally known by the surname of Ibn Azdaḥal*<sup>3</sup> al-Mawṣili. He (Azdaḥal) was born at Moṣul in the year 577 (A.C. 1181-2) and died at Mayyāfāriqīn in the month of Ramaḍān, 628 (July, A.C. 1231).

723 MŪSĀ IBN 'ABD AL-MALIK

Abū 'Imrān Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Hishām al-Iṣbahānī chief of the land-tax office (diwān al-Kharāj), was a ra'īs<sup>4</sup> and a

1 The poet Ibn al-Nabīh died in the year 621 (A.C. 1224), (Suyūṭī, in the Husn ab-Muḥaddarah).

2 Ibn 'Alī 'l-Iḥṣayn, according to two manuscripts.

3 Azdaḥal, according to another reading.

4 The title of ra'īs was given to the directors of the government offices.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: al-Azdaḥal.—Ed.

kātib<sup>1</sup> of superior merit. He was employed in the (civil) service under a number of khalifs and mounted gradually to a high rank in that department. During the reign of al-Mutawakkil he directed the office instituted for administrating the province of al-Sawād (Babylonia) and held also other (eminent posts). As a writer of (official) dispatches he shewed great talent and became president of the board of correspondence. We have spoken of him in the life of Abu 'l-'Aynā (No. 617), and mentioned the conversation which passed between them relative to the affair of Najāḥ Ibn Salamah. He composed some fine verses in the sentimental style. One of these pieces we give here :

"When we arrived at al-Qādisyah, the muster-place of the caravan, and when I smelt (a perfume) from the land of Ḥijāz (like) the odour of the zephyr breathing from 'Irāq, I felt assured that I and those I loved would soon be joined again and be united, and I thought with joy on that meeting as I had wept (in sorrow) at our separation. All I have now to do is to support the seven (days) which remain (for me to pass) before we can hold a long discourse and relate what we have suffered."

*[Some persons, in repeating these verses, substitute al-Tha'labiyah for al-Qādisyah. Both are halting-places in the province of Ḥijāz and on the road leading to 'Irāq. "Al-Tha'labiyah was so named after Tha'lab Ibn Dūdān Ibn Asad Ibn Khuzaymah Ibn Mudrikah Ibn al-Yās Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān." Such are the words of Ibn al-Kalbi<sup>2</sup> in his Jamharat al-Nisab.] Respecting these verses an anecdote is related, so interesting that I cannot avoid giving it here. The ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī (No. 590) has inserted it in his Judḥwat al-Muqtabis, and other historians of the western nations (Africa and Spain) have given it in their works. Here it is : Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Aṣḥkarī, a native of of Egypt, relates as follows :

"I was one of those whom the amīr Tamīm, the son of Abū Tamīm, admitted into his social parties and whom he treated

1 See Introduction,

2 The life of Hiṣḥām Ibn al-Kalbi will be given in this work.

* [ ] This passage is omitted in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd's edition.—Ed.

with the utmost familiarity." This Tamīm was the son of al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs (No. 701) and the same of whom we have spoken under the letter T (No. 123). "He sent me to Baghdād and I purchased for him a charming slave-girl, an excellent songstress. When I returned to him, he invited his familiars to a party, and I was one of the number. A curtain was then drawn (so as to conceal the girl), and he told her to sing. She (obeyed and) sang as follows :

'When the wounds of love were healed, a lightning flash glimmered feebly before his eyes ; it seemed like the fringe of a curtain extended before rugged summits and precipitous sides (of a mountain). He went to see how it appeared, but could not ; being prevented by his jailor. (The only flashes he perceived were from) the fire (of passion) contained within his bosom, and the only rain was that which fell from his eyes.' "

The author of the Kitāb al-Aghānī (No. 415) attributes these verses to the sharīf Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ṣāliḥ al-Ḥasanī. "The girl sang them so well," said al-Ashkari, "that Tamīm and all the company gesticulated with admirations. She then sang the words :

'You will be consoled for your loss in (meeting) a bounteous prince whose reign, from the beginning to the end, shall be praised (by all men). God hath directed his steps and framed his character<sup>1</sup> for deeds of generosity, (and that) from the time he was first arrayed in (infants') clothes.'

The amīr Tamīm and all present here gave signs of the greatest delight. She next sung these lines.

'To God's protection I confide a full moon (a person with a handsom face) whom I possess at Baghdād ; it rises at al-Karkh<sup>2</sup> (and appears) in a sphere formed by the veils which surround it.' "

---

1 Literally : Has inflected his sides and formed his person.

2 Karkh is a suburb of Baghdād, from which it is separated by the Tigris.

This verse is taken from a long qaṣidah the author of which was Muḥammad Ibn Zariq<sup>1</sup>, a kātib of Baghdād. The narrator continues : "The delight of the amir Tamīm was now carried to the highest pitch and he said to her : 'Ask what you will'. She replied : 'I desire for the amir good health and (God's) protection.' 'Nay,' said he, 'make a wish for yourself'. 'Amir !' said she, 'do you intend that my wish shall be fulfilled ?' 'I do', said he. 'Then,' replied the girl, 'I wish to sing that air in Baghdād.' (At these words) Tamīm changed colour, the expression of his face altered and the minds of all the company were troubled. He stood up, so did we (and the assembly separated). One of his servants then came to me and said : 'Go back ! the amir is calling for you !' I returned and, finding him sitting and waiting for me, I saluted and stood up before him. 'Woe betide you !' said he, 'do you see into what a difficulty we are brought?' 'I do, amir !' said I. 'We cannot avoid keeping our promise,' said he, 'and, in this business, I can trust to no one but you. So get ready to take her to Baghdād and, when she has sung there, bring her back'. 'Your orders are heard' said I, 'and shall be obeyed.' I then went out, made my preparations for departure and bade her to do the same. I assigned to her as a servant and travelling companion<sup>2</sup> a young negress belonging to Tamīm. A female camel, bearing a palanquin, was brought by the amir's orders. He made me get up into the palanquin and placed the girl under my direction<sup>3</sup>. We then departed for Makkah with the caravan, and when we had accomplished the duty of pilgrimage, we joined the 'Irāq caravan and set out with it. On arriving at al-Qādisiyah, the negress came to me and said : 'My mistress told me to ask you where we are.' I replied : 'We are about to halt at al-Qādisiyah ;' and she returned to inform her mistress. Immediately after, I heard her raise her voice and sing these verses. From all parts of the caravan

1 Various readings زرق. زريق

2 Literally : To be her counter-poise. The common mode of female travelling in the East is well-known. Two covered seats in wicker-work and more or less ornamented are tied together and suspended one on each side of a stout camel. The woman that sits in one counter-poses her that is in the other, and if there be only one woman, some baggage, or even a large stone, is put into the opposite seat to balance her.

3 Literally : With me.

issued a general cry of : 'Repeat it again, for the love of God !' but she did not utter another word. Some time after, we reached al-Yāsiriyyah, which station lies at about five miles from Baghdād, in the midst of one continuous forest of gardens. The travellers got down to pass the night in that place, with the intention of entering into Baghdād the next morning. When daylight appeared, lo and behold ! the negress came to me quite dismayed. I asked her what was the matter? and she answered that her mistress had disappeared. 'Woe betide thee !' said I, 'where is she gone?' By Allāh ! said the negress, 'I know not.' From that moment I was unable to discover the least trace of the fugitive<sup>1</sup>, I then proceeded to Baghdād and, after doing some business which I had there, I returned to the amir Tamīm and informed him of what had happened<sup>2</sup>. He was much shocked at the news ; his sorrow was extreme and, in his profound affliction, he ceased not to speak of her and to lament her loss." Al-Qādisiyyah is a village situated higher up (the country) than Kūfah ; near it was fought a celebrated battle, under the khalifat of 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, Al-Yāsiriyyah ; we have just mentioned where this place is and need not repeat our observations. Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm, the brother of Zayd Ibn Ibrāhīm<sup>3</sup> related that when he was appointed to the government of al-Širawān, in the place of this Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās al-Šulī, the poet of whom we have spoke, (No. 10) passed through that town and went to see him. He was on his way to Khurāsān where (*the 'Abbasid kh*alif) al-Māmūn was staying after having solemnly designated 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā (No. 398) as his successor in the khalifat. The history of this

---

1 She had no doubt given a rendezvous to her lover, before departing for the court of Tamīm.

2 This does not seem probable. An Arab, in such a case, would never appear again before his master.

3 I can discover no information respecting Zayd Ibn Ibrāhīm, though he appears to be indicated here as a well-known person. His brother Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣ'ab is, on the contrary, an historical personage : in the year 206 (A.C. 821-2) he was appointed governor of Baghdād ; he was still holding that place in the year 217 (A.C. 832), when he marched against the partisans of Bābak al-Khurramī and defeated them. He died in the year 235 (A.C. 849-50). (Nujūm, Uyūn al-Tawārikh) event is well-known. Ibrāhīm (al-Ṣūlī) had just composed a poem in which he praised al-Riḍā, extolled the merits of the posterity of 'Alī (Muḥammad's son-in-law), and declared that 'Alī's descendants had a better right to the khalifat than any others. "I found the poem so fine", said Ishāq (Ibn Ibrāhīm), "that I asked Ibrāhīm Ibn al-'Abbās (al-Ṣūlī) to write me out a copy of it. He did so, and I made him a present of one thousand dirhams<sup>1</sup>, mounted him on a (mule) and let him proceed to Khurāsān. Time passed on; al-Mutawakkil became khalif and Ibrāhīm (al-Ṣūlī) was appointed to the place which had been filled by Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. (Al-Ṣūlī), wishing to discover the means employed by Mūsā (to acquire wealth in defrauding the state), dismissed me from office and ordered an injunction to be served upon me<sup>2</sup>. I appeared in order to repel the charges, and produced arguments not to be refuted, but he would not hearken to them; he did not even pay attention to the opinions enounced by the kātibs, although he had asked their advice. During all that time, he addressed me in the most insulting language. The kātibs decided that, on one of the points in question, I should disculpate myself by oath; but I had no sooner sworn than he exclaimed: 'An oath made to the sultān (or to his officers) must appear of no value to you who are a Rāfiḍī'. On this I said to him: 'Will you allow me to approach you?' Having received his permission, I went up to him and addressed him thus: 'Your endeavours to bring about the shedding of my blood are really intolerable! I cannot be sure of my life if you write to that man, al-Mutawakkil, what I have just heard you say. I can endure all except the imputation of Rāfiḍism: the Rāfiḍī is he who pretends that 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib, surpassed al-'Abbās in excellence, and that his posterity have a better right to the khalifate than the descendants of al-'Abbās.' On this, he said: 'whom do you mean?' and I answered: 'You! I have the proof of what I say in your own handwriting.' I then spoke to him of the poem which he had composed on al-

---

1 About twenty-five or thirty pounds sterling.

2 This sort of document is here called a muwāmarah موامرة. It seems to have been a summons to pay certain sums therein specified.

Māmūn and in which he made mention of 'Alī Ibn Mūsā (al-Riḍā) and, by Allāh ! as soon as I told him of it, he remained quite confounded<sup>1</sup>. 'Bring me,' said he, 'the album in which I wrote.' 'By Allāh !' said I, 'that I shall by no means do unless you give me the positive assurance that you will not prosecute me for any of my acts, that you will burn this injunction and not examine any of my accounts.' He swore to me by an oath such as I could count on, that he would do what I asked. So the list which he had drawn up<sup>2</sup> was burned, and I handed to him the album. He placed it in his writing-desk<sup>3</sup> the proceedings against me were quashed and I withdrew." Numerous anecdotes are told of Mūsā, the subject of this notice, but I abstain from repeating them, in order to avoid prolixity. He died in the month of Shawwāl, 246 (December-January, A.C. 860-1). (Al-Sirawān) is a dependency of al-Māsabadhān (with a point on the dhāl), which is a government in the province of al-Jabal. This town was the residence of al-Mahdī, the son of Abū Ja'far (ai-Manṣūr), and the father of Hārūn al-Rashīd ; there also he died. Marwān Ibn Abi Ḥaṣṣah, the poet of whom we have already spoken (No. 689) alludes to this circumstance in the following lines :

"The noblest tomb after that of Muḥammad, the Prophet of the true direction, is a tomb at Māsabadhān. I wonder how the hands which, in the morning, filled it with earth, did not lose their fingers (as a punishment)."

Al-Sirawān, is a name common to four places, one of which is that we speak of. The term al-Jabal (الجبـال the mountain), or al-Jibāl (الجبـال the mountains), serves to designate Persian 'Irāq, a country situated between Arabian 'Irāq and Khurāsān. Its principal cities are Iṣbahan, Hamadān, al-Ray, and Zinjān.

---

1 Literally : He fell upon his hand. This is equivalent to the French expression : Les bras lui tomberent.

2 The expression here made use of is العمل المعولي. The word عمل in the language of the administration, designated a list or inventory. Ibn Khaldūn has employed it in this sense and Abu 'l-Faraj Qudāmāh also.

3 The Arabic word signifies literally a small box.

724 IBN AL-JAWĀLIQI

Abū Maṣṣūr Mawḥūb Ibn Abī Ṭāhir Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Khiḍr al-Jawālīqī, a great literary scholar, a learned philologist, and a master of all the branches of literature, was one of the honours of Baghdād, his native place. He learned philology from the khaṭīb Abū Zakariyā al-Tabrizī, whose life shall be given in the letter Y, having studied under him with great assiduity till he became highly proficient in that science. He was pious, veracious, gifted with eminent talents and a clear intellect; his handwriting was beautiful and his orthography remarkably correct. A number of instructive works were composed by him and got into wide circulation; such, for instance, as the Commentary on the Adab al-Kātib (No. 306) the Mu'arrab (or Arabicised)<sup>1</sup> which is the most extensive work ever composed on the subject, and the supplement to the Durrat al-Ḡhawwās of al-Ḥarirī, the author of the Maqāmāt (No. 510). To the treatise he gave the title of al-Takmilah fī ma Yalḥuno fīhi 'l-āmmah (the Completion treating of the incorrect expressions made use of by the vulgar). In resolving grammatical difficulties, he gave the preference to certain rules of a very singular character. He was better skilled in philology than in grammar. Pieces in his handwriting were much sought after, and people vied in outbidding each other to obtain them. He served as an imām (chaplain) to the imām (khalīf) al-Muqtaṣī bi-Allāh, and directed the five daily prayers at which that prince attended. He composed for him a short treatise on prosody. We shall here relate a scene which he had, in the presence of al-Muqtaṣī, with Hibat Allāh Ibn Ṣā'id, surnamed Ibn al-Talmīdh, a Christian physician whose life shall be given in this work. The first time he appeared before the khalīf, for the purpose of directing the prayer, he said nothing more to him, on entering, than these words: "To the Commander of the faithful salutation and the mercy of God!" On this, Ibn al-Talmīdh, who was then standing before the khalīf and who, from his long service and his intimacy with the prince, was entitled to act very familiarly, said to him (Ibn al-Jawālīqī); "Shaykh, that is not the proper manner of saluting the Commander of the Faithful." The other did not seem to mind him but turned towards the khalif and said : "The salutation I made is founded on the sunnah (or sacred traditions) relative to the Prophet ; he then repeated to him a tradition concerning the form of saluting which ought to be employed and finished by saying : "Commander of the Faithful ! if any one swears that no sort of science can enter as it should do<sup>1</sup>, into the heart of a Christian or a Jew, he will not be obliged to make an expiation for the sin of perjury ; God himself having put a seal upon their hearts<sup>2</sup>, and such a seal cannot be broken but by faith." The khalif answered : "You say true and you have done rightly." Ibn al-Talmidh, with all his talent and his copious erudition in philology (remained silent), as if a stone had been forced into his mouth<sup>3</sup>. Ibn al-Jawālīqī obtained (traditional) information from the lips of all the principal shaykhs of the age, and acquired thus a vast fund of knowledge which (in his turn), he communicated to others. A few pieces of verse have been attributed to him and the following, which I met with in a compilation (of poems) is given as his, but that is a point which I have not been able to verify :

1 This work treated, probably, of some foreign words introduced into Arabic.

"All mankind went to quench their thirst at the sweet waters of thy liberality, but I remained behind the crowd, as a thirsty bird hovers around a source and hesitates (to alight). I waited till one of the drinkers should forget to go down to the watering-place, but the number of those who arrived increased more and more."

I since found these two verses in a collection of pieces which goes under the name of Ibn al-Khashshāb see (No. 325). Abū Muḥammad Ismā'il, who was the cleverest of his sons, related as follows : "I was in the Mosque of the Castle (Jāmi' 'l-Qaṣr), after the prayer, and (sitting) in the circle of (students who surrounded) my father and who were reading (philological works)

1 The expression على الوجه seems to be the equivalent of على الوجه للإيق or على الوجه المرضي.

2 Qur'ān, sūrah 2, verse 6.

3 Literally : As if he had bridled (or bitted) with a stone.

under his direction, when a young boy stood up before him and said : 'Sir ! two verses have been recited to me and as I do not understand them, I come to recite them to you, in order that you may explain to me their meaning.' My father told him to repeat them, and the other spoke as follows :

'When the beloved arrived, (I felt as if) I was dwelling in the garden of Paradise, her absence was (for me) the fire of Hell, and scorched me with its flames. The sun is in Sagittarius and going down when she visits me not ; he is in the Twins when she comes to me.'

My father, on hearing these two verses, said to the boy : 'That, my son ! is a matter belonging to astronomy and the determination of the planetary movements ; it does not appertain to the art cultivated by literary men.' The lad went away without obtaining the information he sought for, and my father felt quite abashed at being unable to answer a (scientific) question when it was proposed to him. He stood up and made internally a vow that he would never hold his class again till he had looked into astronomy and become acquainted with the movements of the sun and the moon. He then turned his mind to that subject and, when he understood it, he resumed his lessons<sup>1</sup>. The idea contained in the verse was this : When the sun is in the last (degree) of Sagittarius, the nights have attained their greatest length, for the autumn has then come to its end, and when he is in the last (degree) of the Twins, the nights are shortened to their utmost point, and this takes place when the season of spring is just over. Therefore, the poet meant to say : When the beloved did not visit me, the night seemed to me very long, and when she came to see me, the night was very short. God knows best (if this explanation be right) ! The following verses were composed by a contemporary poet on Ibn al-Jawālīqī and al-Maghribī, the commentator of the Manāmāt<sup>2</sup>. In the Kharidah

---

1 Literally : He sat ; that is : He held his sittings.

2 The Manāmāt was a work in which 'Alī al-Kuṣhī al-Shadhīlī related the edifying dreams of certain devout ṣūfīs. Who al-Maghribī was cannot be determined with certainty.

(No. 678) they are attributed to Ḥayṣ Bayṣ (No. 241) and, in the abridgment of that work, to our ḥāfiẓ :

"I can pass over all the faults of my native place except two grievous ones which cannot be pardoned. First, al-Jawālīqī is there and gives lectures on literature ; then, al-Maghribī is there and explains dreams. The one is embarrassed<sup>1</sup> by an impediment in his speech and fatigues (us) with his detestable pronunciation<sup>2</sup>; the other, though wide-awake, is inattentive and explains (dreams) as if he were asleep."

Numerous anecdotes are told of Ibn al-Jawālīqī. He was born in the year 466 (A.C. 1073-4) ; he died at Baghdād on Sunday, the 15th of Muḥarram, 529 (5th Nov. A.C. 1134) and was interred outside the (city-gate called) Bāb Ḥarb. The funeral service was said over him previously in the Mosque of the Castle, by al-Zaynabī (No. 283) ; the qāḍī-in-chief. Jawālīqī signifies a maker and seller of sacks (juwālīq). Relative adjectives of this form are exceptions to the general rule, being derived from the plural of the noun and not from the singular. Those exceptions, when once heard, are easily remembered. Such is the adjective Anṣārī, applied to a man who was one of the Anṣārs<sup>3</sup>. The form jawālīq, employed as the plural of juwālīq, is also an exception to rules, because the long i in the plural has nothing to represent it in the singular. This word, in the singular, is juwālīq, with an u, and in the plural, jawālīq, with an a, which is in conformity with the general rule. Thus ḥulāḥīl grave, dignified, has for plural ḥalāḥīl ; 'Udāmīl ancient, in speaking of renown, takes adāmīl in the plural ; 'Urā'ir عرار chief, takes arā'ir ; 'Ulākid علاك strong in speaking of a man, has 'alākid. Many similar examples might be given. Juwālīq is an arabicised word of foreign original ; (that is evident) because the letter j (ج) and q (ق) are never to be found together in the same Arabic word.

---

1 Literally : Is a prisoner of.

2 I read يمل فضاحه with two manuscripts.

3 See No. 62.

725 AL-MUWAYYAD AL-ṬŪSĪ

The Traditionist Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Muwayyad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī al-Ṭūsī, surnamed Riḍā al-Dīn (of approved religion) belonged to a family which inhabited Ṭūs but, having fixed his residence in Naysābūr he was considered as a native of that city. No person in modern times possessed traditions of which the isnāds (see Introduction) mounted up so high as his. He met with a number of eminent doctors and received from them (traditional information). He heard the Ṣaḥīḥ of Muslim (No. 690) taught by the jurisconsult Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Faḍl al-Furāwī (see No. 596), and was the last surviving pupil of that master; the Ṣaḥīḥ of al-Bukhārī (No. 543) he heard taught by Abū Bakr Wajīh Ibn Ṭāhir Ibn Muḥammad al-Shaḥḥānī and by Abu 'l-Futūḥ 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn Shāh Ibn Aḥmad al-Shādhyaḥkī<sup>1</sup>; he heard also the text of the Muwaḥḥa (No. 525) such as had been taught orally by Abū Muṣ'ab<sup>2</sup>, with the exception of certain passages<sup>3</sup>; the professor who read it to him was Abū Muḥammad Hibat Allāh Ibn Sahl Ibn 'Umar al-Bastāmī, generally known by the surname of al-Suddī. The commentary on the noble Qur'ān, composed by Abū Ishāq al-Tha'labī (No. 30) he heard taught by Abū al-'Abbās Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṭūsī, generally known by the surname of 'Abbāsah<sup>4</sup>. He received lessons also from a number of the doctors who taught at Naysābūr, and amongst others, the jurisconsult Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn Muḥammad al-Khuwārī.* Some (traditional) information was also obtained by him from Umm al-Khayr

1 In No. 235 this name is transcribed incorrectly. (There the name is transcribed Shādhyaḥjī which is given by 'Abd al-Ḥamīd in this notice also).—Ed.

2 Abū Muṣ'ab Aḥmad Ibn Abī Bakr al-Qāsim al-Zuhri (al-Zuhayri?, an eminent jurisconsult of the Mālikite sect and Qāḍī of Madīnah, died in the month of Ramaḍān A.H. 242 (January. A.C. 857).

3 Literally: To the exclusion of what was excepted in it. The precise meaning of this expression I am unable to determine.

4 In all the manuscripts, this name is written أ.ب.ع.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: al-Juwārī.—Ed.

Fāṭimah, the daughter of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Muẓaffar Ibn Za'bal<sup>1</sup>. He taught great quantity of traditions, and students came to him from all quarters. I possess an ijāzah (see No. 108) which he wrote (and sent to me) from Khurāsān, at the request of my father, who is now deceased. (It was drawn up) in the month of the latter Jumādā, 610 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1213). I give a notice of this doctor merely on account of his great reputation and because, in his latter days, he had none to equal him (in learning). His birth took place in the year 524 (A.C. 1130); he died at Naysābūr on the eve of the twentieth day of Shawwāl, 617 (17th Dec., A.C. 1220), and was interred the next morning. The preceding article, in its present form, had been drawn up for some years, when I met with an ijāzah written by the shaykh al-Muwayyad himself, in which he thus traces up his genealogy: "Written by al-Muwayyad, the son of Muḥammad, the son of 'Alī, the son of al-Ḥasan, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Ṣāliḥ, the native of Ṭūs."

726 AL-MUWAYYAD AL-ULŪSĪ

Abū Sa'īd al-Muwayyad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Ulūsī was one of the great poets of his time. He composed a quantity of amatory and satirical pieces, eulogised in his verses a number of persons who held high offices in 'Irāq and left a diwān (or collection) of poems. Entirely devoted to the Wazīr 'Awn al-Dīn Yahyā Ibn Hubayrah<sup>2</sup>, he extolled his merits in some very fine eulogiums. [Muḥibb al-Dīn Ibn al-Najjār (No. 5) gives the following account of him in the History of Baghdād: "This poet, whose name was 'Aṭṭāf, the son of Muḥammad, the son of 'Alī, the son of Sa'īd, was generally known by appellation of al-Muwayyad (fortified by Divine grace). He was born at Ulūs, a village in the neighbourhood of al-Ḥadīthah (No. 313), was brought up at Dujayl and then went to Baghdād and filled the duties of a chāwūsh<sup>1</sup> under the reign of the imām (Khalīf) al-Mustashhid bi-Allāh. He was satirized by the poet Abu al-Faḍl<sup>2</sup> but afterwards began to make verses himself and composed so great a quantity of them that he became generally known as a poet. Eulogium and satire he much indulged in, after taking refuge in the service of the sulṭān Mas'ūd Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Malik Shāh"—of whom mention has been already made (No. 694)—"Having spoken too much and in a very improper manner of the imām al-Muqtafi and the companions of that khalīf, he was arrested and put in prison." The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī (No. 678) says of him, in the Kharīdah: His importance was exalted, his situation opulent, his poetry in high request and obtaining great success. He acquired properties and estates, enjoyed abundant wealth and lived in the best manner. But then his good fortune stumbled under him and made a fall such as could be recovered from with difficulty. He remained in the prison of the imām al-Muqtafi upwards of ten years and did not get out of it till the year 555 (A. C. 1160), on the accession of the imām al-Mustanjid to the khalāfat. I met with him at that time and observed that his sight had been dimmed by the darkness of the dungeon in which they detained him. He usually wore the military dress. He (then) travelled to Moṣul. He is the author of some good poetry in the amatory style, offering charming turns of thought and admirable specimens of versification. He often hit on the rarest of those ideas which are most original. He says, for instance, in describing the pen (qalam):

1 The orthography of this name is fixed by the Qāmūs.

2 The life of Ibn Hubayrah will be found in this work.

* There are four possible readings: Ra'bal, Ra'yal, Ra'il or Za'yal. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Ra'yal or Ra'il. The Qāmūs, however, gives the first and the fourth as names of persons; according to it Fāṭimah was the daughter of Za'bal, while Ibn Khallikān says that she was his great granddaughter.—Ed.

"A (reed) well-straightened can enrich and can destroy, in case it makes a promise and in case of threats. A qalam suffices to diminish a numerous army, even before the swords are drawn from the scabbards. It received from the thicket in which it grew

1 A door-keeper, a sergeant of police.

2 Perhaps Adu 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn al-Khāzin (see No. 61).

the beneficent quality that place communicated to its streamlets and the dreadfulness it gave to its lions."

I may here observe that I found these verses ascribed to another author, and God knows best by whom they were composed. Never was a finer idea uttered on such a subject as the pen.* The thought expressed in the third (and last) verse is borrowed from the following description of a ṭanbūr.<sup>1</sup>

"That ṭanbūr, handsome in shape, imitates, by its clear notes, (the song of) the nightingale. When its sounds, it utters loud tones, such as it had learned (from the birds) when it waved in the form of a branch. Thus it is that he who frequents the learned in his youth becomes, when he grows up, a well-informed doctor."

This is now a very trite idea, having been often employed by poets. It is thus that one of them has said :

"She came with a lute<sup>2</sup> which imitated and aided her (voice) ; see what strange things happen to a tree ! For a time, birds of various sorts sing and coo upon its branches ; then, when it is dried up, human beings sing to it. For it, time has never ceased to be noisy<sup>3</sup> birds and strings, two classes of irrational beings, have always kept it in excitation."

The same idea is thus expressed by another poet :

"The lute has enjoyed two kinds of desirable pleasure ; blessings be on the man who cut it from the tree and on him by whom it was planted ! Whilst it was green and flourishing turtledoves cooed upon it and, when dry, a female musician sang to it."

1 The ṭanbūr is a sort of lute.

2 The lute is named al-ūd in Arabic, and the same word signifies also a piece of wood. This double signification is often played upon by poets.

3 I read مصطحبا ('Abd al-Ḥamid reads مصطحبا associated).

* M. de Slane has not translated the following passage :

Some one else has said about the pen and expressed similar ideas :

"Having spots like a snake, a dreadful point, and a slander waist,

(it) disperses crowds of assembled difficulties

The horizons in the east and the west submit to its sway,

Heavens yield to it and obey

It protects the country after weaning as the lion does it while sucking from the breast."

Did I not fear being led away from my subject and falling into prolixity, I should give here many other detached passages in which the same idea is expressed. Bahā al-Dīn Zuhayr, a person of whom we have already spoken (No. 231), said, in a qaṣīdah containing an eulogy on Aqṣīs, the son of al-Malik al-Kāmil (see No. 668):

"The boards of the pulpit thrilled with pleasure at his name; they perhaps recollected the time when they were (living) branches".

Let us now give the rest of the article drawn up by 'Imād al-Dīn: "His son Muḥammad was (remarkably) intelligent and composed some good poetry. In the year 564 (A.C. 1168-9), he fled (for protection) to al-Malik al-'Ādil Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd (see No. 688) sovereign of Syria, who was then at Ṣarkhad<sup>1</sup>; but he fell sick there and, being sent off to Damascus by that sulṭān, he died on the way, at a village called Raṣḥīdah."—End of the extract.—We give here a specimen of al-Muwayyad's poetry:

"O, how the zephyr breathing from Ḥājir<sup>2</sup> was cool to that bosom (of mine) in which the ardent heats (of love) were not to be extinguished! O, how beautiful the image (of my beloved, seen by me in a dream)! by the brightness of its face it betrayed the presence of my own image (in that dream) and then concealed me with its coal-black hair. Its double belt encircled (a waist like) a pliant branch, which had been watered by showers, so that its tender (wood) was verdant and waved (with pleasure). When morning lanced the dart of separation against our union and left no sign of our interview, except a recollection which I shall retain for ever, I stopped at Ḥuzwā<sup>3</sup>, where the marks of the (beloved's presence, though still existing), had nearly disappeared, whilst every sign of my body's existence (in this world) was completely effaced. There I remained fixed (as firmly) as my fingers are fixed to my right hand, but my stopping was not like that of a miser who has lost his ring in the sand. Her disdain (wore me away and) did not leave the slightest trace of my body, not even so much ruins as might be swept away (نيسحي) by the torrent of my tears. She (made me weep till I lost my sight and) did not leave me a single eye to see with; yet the person who destroys a thing is bound to replace it. O, how I longed to see her caravan and its weary camels whilst they groaned during their nocturnal march (and followed each other closely), like my tears. The crescent of the night was then held forth in the hand of the Pleiades (and permitted me to see her); so, I embraced her till her necklace burst asunder and fell to the ground."

1 Sarkhad was a strong castle in the province of Ḥawrān.

2 This place was situated in Najd, the Arabian Arcadia.

3 Ḥuzwā also was situated in Najd.

This passage is taken from a long qaṣīdah in which the author displayed great talent and imitated both in rhyme and measure a poem composed by al-Mutanabbī for Sayf al-Dawlah Ibn Ḥamdān and commencing thus:

("The non-fulfilment of) your promise, my two friends! (afflicts me) as much as (the aspect of) this (abandoned) abode, no part of which is more painful (to contemplate) than its ruins; (you) both (promised to) second me (in weeping), and the readiest cure (for the pains of the heart) are tears shed in abundance".

In the qaṣīdah above mentioned, al-Ulūsī has inserted hemistiches taken from the poems of al-Mutanabbī, and employed them in the manner (designated by the technical term) taḍmīn<sup>1</sup>. The greater part of his poetry is good. His birth took place at Ulūs, in the year 494 (A.C. 1100-1); he passed there his early youth and died at Moṣul on Thursday, the 24th of Ramaḍān, 557 (6th Sept, A.C. 1162). Among the numerous verses composed by him in prison, we may notice the following:

"My tears were parched up by the burning (ardor which consumed my heart), when my friends departed, and I marvelled to find myself left here alone. But you know that wood, placed on the fire, lets its sap fall in drops, (weeping through sorrow) for having been separated from its leaves. I pass my nights in prison, and the pleasure I feel in thinking on you (my friends!) is equal to the joy which liberty could give me. Let the fortune which afflicts me not be shocked at the blackness of my hair ; the flames which torment my heart only serve to consolidate their colour !”.

1 By the word taḍmīn is designated the introduction of a verse or a hemistich of one poet into a piece composed by another. The passage thus quoted undergoes a change of signification which is effected by the words that precede or follow it.

He left Baghdād in the year 456 (A.C. 1064). The mention I made of the date on which al-Mustanjid was raised to the throne reminds me of a curious fact which I cannot abstain from mentioning : an eminent shaykh of 'Irāq informed me that al-Mustanjid had a dream, whilst his father al-Muqtafi was still alive, and in it he saw a figure like an angel come down from heaven and write upon his sleeve the letter kha four times. When he awoke, he sent for an interpreter of dreams, related to him what he had seen and obtained this answer : “You will be raised to the khilāfat in the year 555”<sup>2</sup>, and that was really the case. He had this dream a good while before his father's death. “Ulūs” means belonging to Ulūs which is a place situated on the Euphrates, in the neighbourhood of the Ḥadithah of 'Ānah.” Such is the observation made by 'Izz al-Dīn Ibn al-Athīr (No. 435), in correcting the mistakes of the ḥāfiẓ Ibn al-Sa'mānī (No. 370). The latter had said that Ulūs was a place on the sea-coast of Syria, near Ṭarsūs. Al-Ulūsi, having gone to Baghdād in his youth and fixed his residence there, might be considered as native of that city. Ibn al-Najjār says that we should pronounce 'Ālūs with a long A (instead of Ulūs).

727 AL-MUHALLAB IBN ABĪ ŠUFRAH

Abū Sa'īd al-Muhallab was the son of Abu Šufrah Zālim Ibn Sarrāq Ibn Šubḥ Ibn Kindī Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Adī Ibn Wā'il Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn al-'Atik Ibn al-Azd or al-Asd Ibn 'Imrān Ibn 'Amr Muzayqiyā Ibn 'Āmir Mā al-Samā Ibn Ḥārithah Ibn Imra al-Qays

1 The translator thinks he has here indicated clearly the idea which the poet meant to express. The hemistich, rendered literally, signifies: “Burning makes solid the work of the burner (al-ḥarraḍqi).”

2 The four khās are the initials of the words khilāfat, khams, khamstn, khamsmi'ah, which signify: Khilāfat, five, fifty, five-hundred.

Ibn Tha'labah Ibn Māzin Ibn al-Azd. His surnames al-Azdī, al-'Atakī, al-Baṣrī indicate that he descended from al-'Atik, member of the tribe of al-Azd, and that he was a native of Baṣrah. His father received the surname of Abū Ṣufrah (the father of Ṣufrah) because he had a daughter called Ṣufrah. "His family," says al-Wāqidī (No. 618) "inhabited Dabā'". They embraced Islāmism in the life time of God's Apostle (Muḥammad) but relapsed after his death and refused to pay the legal alms. (The khalif) Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq sent against them 'Ikrimah Ibn Abi Jahl al-Makḥzūmī. This (general) attacked them, put them to rout and slew a great number. The remainder shut themselves up in a castle which belonged to them and were there blockaded by the Musalmans. They at length surrendered to Ḥudhayfah Ibn al-Yamān and submitted their fate to his decision. He put to death one hundred members of their noblest families, reduced their children into captivity and sent them to Abū Bakr. Among them was Abū Ṣufrah, who was then a mere boy and had not attained the age of puberty. Abū Bakr granted them their liberty and told them to go wherever they pleased; on which they dispersed (in various directions) and Abū Ṣufrah was one of those who settled at Baṣrah". Ibn Qutaybah notices this account in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif and says<sup>2</sup>: "That story is false and al-Wāqidī was mistaken when he related it: Abū Ṣufrah was not one of those (captives) and was never seen by Abū Bakr. It was 'Umar Ibn Al-Khaṭṭāb whom he went to see, and he was then an elderly man, with a grey head and a grey beard; and 'Umar told him to dye them, which he did. How then could he have been a boy when Abū Bakr was reigning? Moreover, al-Muhallab, the youngest of his sons, was born two years before the Prophet's death, and some of the other sons were born more than thirty years before that event." Al-Muhallab was the bravest of men: he defended (the city of) Baṣrah against the Khārijites and had many famous encounters with them in al-Ahwāz. Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad (No. 610) has given an account of most of them in 1 See our author's observations towards the end of the article.

2 This passage is not to be found in Mr. Wustenfeld's edition of the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif.

his Kāmil, and, if his narration had not been so long and the events so unconnected, I should have given an extract from it here<sup>1</sup>. The defence of Baṣrah by al-Muhallab procured for that city the name of the Baṣrah of al-Muhallab. This chief was distinguished for his noble character and his generosity. The following anecdote is told of him : He once went to Makkah for the purpose of conversing with 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr who was then ruling over Ḥijāz, 'Irāq and the neighbouring countries under the title of khālīf. 'Abd Allāh took him apart in order to consult with him and (some time after), came in 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṣafwān, the grandson of Umayyah Ibn Khalaf Ibn Wahb and a member of the Qurayshide family called the Jumaḥ. On entering he exclaimed : "Commander of the faithful ! who is this man that has been taking up your time all day ?" "Do you not know him ?" said 'Abd Allāh. "No." replied the other. "Well !" said 'Abd Allāh, "he is the lord of the people of 'Irāq." "Can it be al-Muhallab Ibn Abī Ṣufrah ?" "It is he". Al-Muhallab then said : "Commander of the faithful ! who is this man ?" "The lord of the Quraysh" said Ibn al-Zubayr. "Can it be 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṣafwān ?"—"Just so." Ibn Qutaybah says, in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, that no reproach was ever made against al-Muhallab except for lying, and that it was he whom people designated by the words : Rāḥ yakdhib (he set out for the purpose of lying). Ibn Qutaybah then adds these words : "As for me, I shall say that, of all men, al-Muhallab was he who feared God the most, and that he was too noble, too generous to tell lies ; but he was (always) engaged in war and the Prophet has said : 'War consists in (stratagems and) deceit. He used to address the Khārijites in (equivocal) terms, saying one thing and meaning another, so as to keep them in dread, and that was why they called him the liar and said that he went about telling falsehoods. When the Prophet intended to engage in a war, he concealed his real project by giving out another." Al-Mubarrad explains, in his Kāmil, some verses in which al-Muhallab was accused of lying and what he writes is to this effect : "The poet employed the word

---

1 A very satisfactory account of the war with the Khārijites (dissenters or non-conformists) is given by M. Dozy in his Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, tome I, page 155.

liar, because al-Muhallab was versed in the law and acquainted with the tradition according to which the Prophet said : Every lie shall be written down as a lie (by the recording angels), with the exception of three : a lie told in order to reconcile two men, a lying promise made by a man to his wife, and a lie in which a man, when engaged in war, makes a promise or a threat." Al-Muhallab some times forged traditions for the purpose of strengthening the Muslim cause and weakening that of the Khārijites. There was an Azdite tribe called the Nadab, and the people of it used to say, when they saw al-Muhallab coming to them ; Al-Muhallab has set out for the purpose of lying. It was of him that one of them said :

"You would be a man perfect in every way, did you only speak the truth."

Al-Mubarrad says, towards the end of his Kāmil, in that chapter wherein he relates the war with the Khārijites and gives an account of what passed between al-Muhallab and the Azāraqites<sup>1</sup> ; "In old time stirrups were made of wood and were liable to break when the rider knocked them (against any thing) and, in that case, if he tried to strike an adversary with the sword or with the spear, he had nothing to bear upon or to support him. Al-Muhallab therefore gave orders that they should be made of iron, and he was the first who caused iron stirrups to be forged. The anecdotes told of al-Muhallab are very numerous. He passed through many vicissitudes of fortune. The last post he held was the government of Khurāsān, which province he administered in the name of al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Thaqafī (No. 144) who, at that time, ruled over the two 'Irāqs and had moreover received from 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān the governments of Khurāsān and Sijistān. Khurāsān he gave to al-Muhallab and Sijistān to 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Abī Bakrah<sup>2</sup>. Al-Muhallab went to Khurāsān

1 See Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, tome I, page 149.

2 Abū Ḥātim 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Abī Bakrah, a member of the tribe of Thaqif, the same to which al-Ḥajjāj belonged, was appointed Governor of Sijistān, A.H. 50 (A.C. 670), and removed from office three years afterwards. He was again nominated to that post by al-Ḥajjāj in the year 78 (A.C. 697-8). He died A.H. 80 (A.C. 699-700), whilst he was on an expedition into the and took possession of his government in the seventy-ninth year of the Hijrah (A.C. 698-9). He had then lost one of his eyes, in consequence of a wound he received at Samarqand when Sa'id, the son of (the khalif) 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, effected the conquest of that city. This happened under the khilāfat of Mu'āwiyah, the son of Abū Sufyān. Al-Muhallab had accompanied Sa'id in that expedition. Another person who then lost his eye was Ṭalḥah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Khalaf al-Khuzā'i, surnamed the Ṭalḥah of Ṭalḥahs (Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalḥāt) and renowned for his noble character and his generosity. It was in allusion to this accident that al-Muhallab said :

(Continued on page 434)

" Though I lost my eye, I have preserved my life, and that, thanks be to God ! will contribute to make me forget my mishap. When the cause of God is to be defended, our cavalry must endure fatigue ; and when missiles are thrown about, some eyes must be blinded."

According to another account, his eye was knocked out of its socket at the siege of Ṭālaqān. Al-Muhallab held the government of Khurāsān till the day of his death. When his last hour drew near, he chose for successor his son Yazīd, whose life we shall give later, and, in his dying injunctions, he told him how he should act and indicated the measures he should employ. He said to him, amongst other things : " My son ! choose your ḥājib (chamberlain, prime-minister) for his prudence, and your Kātib (secretary) for the elegance of his style ; a man's ḥājib is his face, and a man's Kātib his tongue." He died in the month of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, A. H. 83 (Dec.-Jan., A. C. 702-3), at Zāghūl, a village situated in the district of Marw al-Rūd, and in the province of Khurāsān. Al-Ṭabarī (No. 544) states, in his History, that al-Muhallab died in the year 72 ; * God knows if he be right. We shall discuss this point more fully in the life of his son Yazīd, and, to that article we refer the reader. The fine sayings and elegant allusions which are attributed enemy's country ; provisions failed ; the greater part of his troops died of hunger, and he expired in that disastrous campaign. He had acted for some time as a qādī at Baṣrah, and was the person who introduced the custom of chanting the Qur'ān (Nujūm, Ma'ārif.) * 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : 82.—Ed.

---

(Continued from page 433)

to him indicate the nobleness of his sentiments and show his desire to obtain an honourable reputation and merit praise. One of these sayings was: "Life is better than death, and good renown is better than life. Were I to obtain a gift (which God) never yet granted to any man, I should wish to become an ear, so that I might hear what people said of me, the day after my death." These words, according to another account, were uttered by his son Yazid; God knows best! Al-Muhallab used to say to his sons: "My dear boys! the fairest raiment you can have is that which other people (received from you and) wear. "The poet Abu Tammām al-Ṭā'i (No. 143) alludes to this saying in a letter written to a person from whom he wished to obtain the gift of a cloak and in which he said:

"Thou art he who can well understand what al-Muhallab meant when he gave recommendations about raiment."

A great number of elegies were composed on the death of al-Muhallab. In one of these pieces, the poet Nahār Ibn Tawsi'ah<sup>1</sup> said:

"Alas! that glory is departed which placed wealth within our reach. Generosity and beneficence have disappeared since we lost al-Muhallab. These two (virtues) resided constantly at Marw al-Rūd, but now they are not to be found either in the East or in the West."

Al-Muhallab left a great number of sons, all of them generous, noble-minded, beneficent and illustrious. Ibn Qutaybah says, in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif: "It is stated that three hundred sons came upon earth from the loins of al-Muhallab." We have already mentioned (No. 223) two of his (great) grand-sons, Rūḥ (Rawḥ) and Yazid, the sons of Ḥātim Ibn Qabiṣah Ibn al-Muhallab, and we shall give the life of Yazid under the letter Y. One of his most distinguished sons, Abū Fawāris al-Mughīrah, was generally entrusted by him with the command of the troops sent against the Khārijites and had with them several famous engagements, accounts of which are contained in books of history. In these expeditions he displayed great bravery, intelligence and resolution. He accompanied his father to Khurāsān, acted as his lieutenant at Marw al-Shāhjān and there he died in the year 82 (A.C. 701-2), whilst his father was yet alive. An elegy was composed on his death by Abū Amāmah Ziyād al-A'jam, otherwise called Ziyād Ibn Sulaymān<sup>1</sup>. This popular poem, which rhimes in h and begins thus, is attributed by some to the celebrated poet Ibn Jābir, a member of the tribe of 'Abd Qays :

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 517. According to the baron de Hammer, Nahār Ibn Tawsi'ah died A.H. 103 (A.C. 721-2)—(Literaturgeschichte der Araber, Vol. II, page 500).

"Say to the caravans and to the warriors setting out for battle, (say to) those who depart in the morning and those who, in the evening, hasten to arrive: Generosity and manliness are now shut up in a tomb at Marw, near the high road. On passing by, sacrifice (to its inmate) a camel of noble race and many a rapid steed. Sprinkle the blood on the sides of his tomb, for he was a shedder of blood and a slayer of victims. After the hour of noon, draw near unto his tomb and the flag of commandement (which waves over it) and invite (those who pass by), as hunters do when roasting venison<sup>2</sup>. In pursuing (the foe) and in returning (from battle) he was a father to his troops, but now, he lies (engaged as) a pledge, in a grave among the tombs. On the day his bier was borne away I saw that noble acts were disappearing with the superiority of his merits and praise-worthy deeds. All the land was shaken by his fall, so that our very hearts remained not unscathed. (They suffer even) now, for he was the noblest man that ever walked (on earth) ; he smiled at the arrows shot (against him) by the bowmen. In him every noble quality arrived at perfection, and to that he lent his aid by many a virtuous act. It is grief enough for us to see the dwelling in which he is now lodged, never to quit it till the end of time. The pulpits are empty in which he presided at the prayer ; his saddles have been removed from (the backs of) all his spirited mares and high-mettled steeds. Let it be known that, when any man's death is to be lamented, no lamentations could equal al-Mughīrah's merit. Our horses and our lances weep for al-Mughīrah, and the female mourners bewail him with cries and lamentations. Al-Mughīrah is dead, after having so often affronted swords and spears. When affairs were embroiled for (the rest of) men and led to struggles and conflicts<sup>1</sup>, he alone, that skilful (chief), unravelled the cord<sup>2</sup> by his superior intelligence. I see the destitute weeping for al-Mughīrah the beneficent, whose hands bestowed so freely. For them he was a verdant meadow, when they went forth to seek the pasture-ground of beneficence, when the flashes of every lightning-cloud (but his) had ceased to gleam. Al-Muhallab, aided by al-Mughīrah, was like him who lowered buckets into a well which was thought to be nearly dry, and having found there water in plenty, filled up the cistern with the aid of camels and machines<sup>3</sup>. If he halted in the midst of a desert, the place where his thirsty camels stationed would overflow, that day, with running water. Warfare will never have an abler man than al-Muhallab: he makes it produce its effects<sup>4</sup> by means of chosen horses, thin in the flanks, rapid in crossing plains and deserts. In the hour of grief, his cavalry rallies around him, and the sides of the horses are white with copious sweat. To this mighty prince, bearer of a diadem, his friends look up with joy, whilst the eyes of the envious are cast down before him. True standard bearer of war! when he marches against the foe, good omens are for him and bad ones (for his enemies)". This is one of the finest and most brilliant (qaṣīdahs) ever composed. It contains upwards of fifty verses and, were I not apprehensive of lengthening this article too much, I should insert the whole of it. Abū 'Alī 'l-Qālī (No. 92) speaks of it in the work which he designed as a supplement to his Amālī and examines some of the verses: "This poem," says he, "has been attributed to al-Ṣalatān al-'Abdī<sup>5</sup>, the famous poet, but, in reality, it was composed by

<sup>1</sup> See No. 274, and replace Sulaym, the incorrect reading of Suyūfi's Shawdhid, by Sulaymān, which is that our MSS. and of the Kitāb al-Aghāni.

<sup>2</sup> The true reading of the last words in this verse is doubtful.

1 Literally: And were struggled for by him who wished to open and him who wished to shut.

2 Literally: The cord was twirled by a twister.

3 The text and the meaning of these two verses is uncertain.

4 Literally: He milked its fore-teats.

5 According to Ibn Durayd, in his Kitāb al-Ishṭiqāq, this poet, whose name is written الصلتان composed satires on Jarīr (see No. 162). De Hammer states that he attacked the poet al-Farazdaq also and that his names were Kassām Ibn Khabiya. (Literaturgeschichte, Vol. II, page 341).

Ziyād al-A'jam". The second verse of it is often quoted in grammatical works, to prove that feminine nouns may be considered as masculine when they do not designate beings possessing female sexual organs<sup>1</sup>. This verse, having been cited so often, is the best known of those which form the poem. The idea expressed in the third and fourth verses was borrowed by another poet and rendered in these terms :

"Bear me, both of you, to the side of his tomb and sacrifice me there, if you have no other victim. Sprinkle my blood upon his grave ; for know this well that I owe all my blood (my life) to his beneficence."

These two verses were composed by the sharīf Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī 'l-Ḍaw, a descendant of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī, and the rector (naqīb) of the funeral chapel which is situated near that gate of Baghdād which is called Bāb al-Tin. They form part of a qaṣīdah in which he lamented the death of the naqīb al-Ṭāhir, the father of 'Ubayd Allāh. Such is the statement made by al-'Imād al-Kātib (No. 678), in his Kharidah. He mentions also that the sharīf Abū Muḥammad died at Baghdād in the year 537 (A.C. 1142-3). After reading this passage in the Kharidah, I found the same verses in the Mu'jam al-Shu'arā (Dictionary of poets), a work drawn up by al-Marzubānī (No. 621) for Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Khaythamī, surnamed Abū 'Abd Allāh, or, by other accounts, Abū 'l-'Abbās, or Abū 'l-Ḥasan. The author had a leaning towards the Shī'ite doctrines and wrote satire against al-Buḥturī<sup>2</sup>. Al-Mughīrah, the son of al-Muḥallab, tore a brocade cloak which Ziyād al-A'jam was wearing, and this circumstance induced the latter to compose the following verse :

"I declare that, in tearing the brocade, you have torn to pieces the renown of al-Muḥallab."

When al-Muḥallab heard of this, he tried to propitiate the poet and succeeded in pacifying him. Abū 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad al-Salāmī relates, in his History of the governors of 1 The verb ضمنا is the masculine of the dual ; to make it agree with the words generosity and manliness, which, in Arabic, are of the feminine gender, it should be written ضمنتا.

2 The life of the poet al-Buḥturī will be found in this work.

Khurāsān, that a person who heard this qaṣidah recited by Ziyād al-A'jam, before al-Muhallab had got any knowledge of it, went to that amīr and, having repeated it to him, obtained from him a gift of one hundred thousand pieces of silver. Ziyād al-A'jam came afterwards and recited to him the same poem, on which al-Muhallab said: "I have already heard it from another person". "That person," said the poet, "(did not compose it, he) only heard me recite it." Al-Muhallab gave him also one hundred thousand pieces of silver. This amīr left a numerous family in Khurāsān, and his posterity were designated by the name of al-Mahālibah (the Muhallabs). Al-Akhnas al-Ṭā'i, a poet cited in the Ḥamāsah, speaks of them in a poem composed by him in honour of al-Muhallab. Here are his words:

"In a year of scarcity, as I was far from my native country, I stopped to pass the winter with the family of al-Muhallab. Their benevolence, their kind enquiries, and their generosity towards me were unceasing; so it seemed to me as if they were members of my own family."

The Wazīr Abū Muḥammad al-Muhallabī, of whom we have already spoken (No. 170), was descended from al-Muhallab. At the commencement of this article, some names are mentioned which require to be explained and the orthography of which we must indicate. Muzayqiyā, with a long final a, was the surname of the 'Amr whose name occurs (in the genealogy). He was a Yamanite king and received this appellation because he put on, every day, two robes of cloth interwoven with gold, and tore them to pieces when he took them off, in the evening<sup>1</sup>. He did so because he disdained to put them on again and was unwilling that any other person should wear them. It was he who emigrated from Yaman to Syria for a motive which it would take us too long to explain<sup>2</sup>. The Anṣār, that is, the tribes of al-'Aws and al-Khazraj, were his descendants. Abū 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-Barr<sup>3</sup>,

1 The verb mazaq, whence the name of Muzayqiyā is derived, signifies to tear in pieces.

2 For the history of Muzayqiyā see M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai, etc., tome I, page 83 et seq.

3 His life will be found in the this book.

the author of the Kitāb al-Isṭil'āb says, in the little book to which he gave the title al-Qaṣd wa 'l-Umam, and which treats of Arabian and Persian genealogies: "The Kurds are descended from 'Amr Muzayqiyā. They settled in the country of the Persians and there propagated their race. Their offspring was very numerous and received the name of Kurds." A certain poet mentions this (tradition) in the following verse and he expresses the same opinion as Ibn 'Abd al-Barr:

"I assure you that the Kurds are not the children of the Persians; their ancestor was Kurd, the son of 'Amr, the son of 'Āmir."

'Āmir, the father of 'Amr (Muzayqiyā) obtained the surname of Mā al-Samā (the water of heaven) on account of his beneficence and the great services which he rendered. For this reason, he was compared to rain. Al-Mundhir al-Lakhmī, one of the kings of al-Ḥirah, was the son of a Mā al-Samā. His father's name was Imra' al-Qays, the son of* 'Amr, the son of 'Adī; his mother, Mā al-Sama, was the daughter of 'Awf, the son of Juṣham, the son of al-Namir, the son of Qāsiṭ. She was called Mā al-Samā on account of her beauty and loveliness. Dabā, with a short final a, is the name of a place situated between 'Umān and al-Baḥrayn. A band of Azdites, having settled there, was called the Azd (of) Dabā. After the dispersion of the Azdites in the manner we have related at the commencement of this article<sup>1</sup>, each of their fractions received an additional name, in order to distinguish it from the others. So, people spoke of the Azd of Dabā, the Azd of Shanu'ah, the Azd of 'Umān and the Azd of al-Sarāt, though they were all sprung from the same stock. Let no one suppose that the differences indicated by these additional names implied a difference of origin. The poet surnamed al-Najāshī, and whose names were Qays Ibn 'Amr Ibn Mālik Ibn Ḥazn Ibn, al-Ḥārith Ibn Ka'b Ibn al-Ḥārith al-Ḥārithī, has said:

"I was like a man one of whose legs was sound whilst the other was suffering from an accident of fortune. The sound leg

1 This is an oversight of the author: he probably spoke of the dispersion of the Azdites in the rough copy of his work and suppressed that account afterwards, but forgot to strike out the present passage.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid omits: The son of.—Ed.

was (the tribe of) Azd Shanū'ah, and the lame one, (the tribe of) Azd 'Umān."

When al-Muhallab routed the troops of Qaṭarī Ibn al-Fujā'ah (No. 519), he sent for Mālik Ibn Baṣhīr and said to him: "I am going to send you on a mission to al-Ḥajjāj; so, set off, for he is a man like yourself (in turn of mind)". He then sent a present after him, but it was returned with this answer: "Presents should not be given till they are deserved." Mālik pursued his journey and entered into al-Ḥajjāj's presence. "What is your name?" said al-Ḥajjāj. The other answered: "Mālik Ibn Baṣhīr<sup>1</sup>." Al-Ḥajjāj: "Possessor and good news! how did you leave al-Muhallab?" Mālik: "He has obtained what he hoped for and is safe from what he feared." Al-Ḥajjāj: "How is he for his troops?" Mālik: "Like a kind father." Al-Ḥajjāj: "And how are they pleased with him?" Mālik: "He has loaded them with kindness and sated them with justice." Al-Ḥajjāj: "How do you behave when you meet the enemy?" Mālik: "We attack with all our might, hoping to prevail over them, and they do the same with us." Al-Ḥajjāj: "What is Qaṭarī Ibn al-Fujā'ah doing?" Mālik: "He employs against us the same stratagems as we do against him." Al-Ḥajjāj: "What prevented you from pursuing him?" Mālik: "We thought it better to take a position in his rear than to pursue him." Al-Ḥajjāj: "Speak to me of al-Muhallab's sons." Mālik: "They stay, as shepherds, in the pasture ground (nabāt?), till nothing more is to be feared there, and they protect their flock till they bring it back." Al-Ḥajjāj: "Which of them is the worthiest?" Mālik: "Let their father be asked." Al-Ḥajjāj: "I insist on your answering." Mālik: "They are like a solid ring the two ends of which cannot be distinguished." Al-Ḥajjāj: "Tell me, I adjure you! did you ever take lessons in that style of speaking?" Mālik: "God makes no one acquainted with His secrets." Al-Ḥajjāj then said to those who were sitting with him: "By Allāh! that is the style of pure nature and has nothing artificial." I may here observe that these paragraphs ought to have been placed at the beginning of the article; but I gave them as they came to my mind.

<sup>1</sup> These names signify, in Arabic, possessor, son of the bearer of good news.

728 MIHYĀR AL-DAYLAMĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Mihyār Ibn Mirzawayh, a native of Daylam and secretary for the Persian language, gained high reputation as a poet. He had been a fire-worshipper but afterwards adopted the Muslim faith. It is said that he made his profession of Islāmism to the sharīf al-Raḍī, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad al-Mūsawī<sup>1</sup>, who was his professor and under whom he made his poetical studies. He had already composed a number of qaṣīdahs on the same model and rhythm as those of his master. My professor ('Izz al-Dīn) Ibn al-Aḥīr al-Jazarī (No. 435) states, in his Annals, that Mihyār's conversion to the true faith took place in the year 394 (A.C. 1003-4), and that al-Qāsim Ibn Burhān said to him: "Mihyār! by becoming a Musulmān you have (merely) passed from one corner of hell to another." "How so?" said Mihyār. Al-Qāsim replied: "Because you were formerly a fire-worshipper and now you revile the Companions of our blessed Prophet in your verses<sup>2</sup>." As a poet he surpassed all his contemporaries by the copiousness of his style. The collection of his poetical works is so ample that it fills four volumes. In his poetry he displayed great delicacy of thought and a remarkable loftiness of mind. The hāfiẓ Abū Bakr al-Khaṭīb (No. 33) speaks of him in his History of Baghdād and commends him highly: "I used to see him," says he, "go regularly, every Friday, to the great mosque called Jāme' al-Manṣūr,"—this was in Baghdād,—"and there students read his collected poetical works under his direction; but I had no opportunity of hearing his lessons." Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Bākhārī (No. 450) mentions him in the Dumyat al-Qaṣr and speaks of him in these terms: "As a poet he well fulfilled the sacred rites which excellence requires; from beneath each of his words was displayed a maiden (thought),—and there was not in any of his qaṣīdahs a single verse on which critics, in pronouncing judgement, might say: "If it had been so and so! O, that it had been so and so! The human heart was the mould in which his verses were cast, and time, harmful as it is, was incapable of harming

1 The life of Muḥammad al-Raḍī is given in No. 641.

2 Mihyār had probably embraced the Shī'ite doctrine with the intention of pleasing his patron, & so was descended from 'Alī.

them." He then gives some pieces composed by him and some verses extracted from his qasīdahs. Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Bassām<sup>1</sup> speaks of him with high commendation in the Dhakhirai Rom Treasure, (a work) treating of the noble qualities by which the people of the (Spanish) peninsula were distinguished; he gives also some specimens of his poetry and metrical compositions. One of Mihyār's best-known qasīdahs is that which begins thus:

"May a persisting rain-cloud, whose waters bear the sand even into people's dwellings, refresh and reanimate with its contents the abode which my mistress occupied at Raqmatayn<sup>2</sup>. How can I renew my intercourse with Umm Mālik, now that the places in which we reside are separated by (the country of) Zarūd<sup>3</sup> and its two mountains? My heart, though far from her, sees her with the eye of desire and is happy; but who will enable my eyes to see her in reality? How pure, good God! and yet how troubled is our mutual love! how far is she from me every morning and yet how near<sup>4</sup>! When my eyes are saddened (by her absence), I am consoled by images and likenesses (seen in my dreams and) which augment the love I bear her. I embrace each pliant branch, as if it was her waist, and I sip from the mouth of the wine-cup, as if it was her lips. (I cannot forget) the day in which that charming gazelle appeared to me; she was standing on a sand-hill and looked dismayed, like a doe which had lost its fawn in the desert, and was alarmed to the heart's core through dread of being bereaved (for ever. In that state,) its eyes acquire more beauty and the inflections of its neck more grace. The resemblance was so great that my sight, O Umm Mālik, doubted not of your being that gazelle. If you were not like her in the cheeks and in the forehead, you resembled her in (the graceful turn of) your neck; nay more! its eyes were yours. O women! you who condemn the fondness shown for the abode

1 See No. 439, note, and Journal Asiatique for Feb.-March, 1861.

2 Al-Raqmatayn was the name of a place situated on the border of a glen in the Arabian desert, on the road leading to Baṣrah. (Marāṣid). In the text of this verse we must read ملث يحيل.

3 Zarūd is the name of a place on the road leading to Makkah. (Marāṣid.)

4 The poet says she was near him because he saw her in his dreams.

of a person dearly beloved, (for a spot which is so) difficult to reach by the random efforts even of our wishes, leave the lover to (his attachment for the land of) Najd, the sole occupation of his heart. Were even Najd a valley, that heart would never go beyond it. Suppose you hinder him from seeing the beloved with his eyes, can you hinder his heart from longing to possess her? O for the night I passed at Dhāt-al-Aṭḥal (the tamarisk grove), when her image came (to visit me in a dream) and rendered that night so short! O, how dear that remembrance! O how dear! Fear (of discovery), treading in the foot-steps of love, approached<sup>1</sup> me in all its terrors; may God not diminish the length of their road! They had nearly gone astray, in the darkness of the night, but they were directed (towards us) by the brilliant lustre of the beloved's teeth."

A well-known piece of his is the following:

"The heavy rain-cloud, driven forward by the south wind, appeared in the morning and watered thee copiously, abode of Umāmah; and my heart remained at the sand-hill, in the reserved grounds of the tribe. Turn, (my friend!) towards those grounds and say to my heart: "Fare-well!" Then pursue your journey and relate a wondrous tale; say that a heart went away and left the body standing up. Say to neighbours who dwell at al-Ghaḍā: "How sweet would be the life one leads at al-Ghaḍā, were it to endure! A year has passed without the lover's having forgotten you; yet a lover's passion ceases, once he has passed a year. Loaden the zephyr with the sweet perfumes you exhale, before it receives its load from the shih and the ḥumāmāh*<sup>2</sup>, and send your images to visit me in my dreams, if you mean to permit my eye-lids to taste of sleep."

These verses are taken from a long qaṣīdah which contains many fine passages; but I shall confine myself to this extract for 1 Read تخطت. The text of this piece is corrupt and the translation often conjectural.

2 The shih is the plant called by botanists artemisia odoratissima or absinthium. The ḥumāmāh (panicum) is a sort of grass. Both those plants are common in the dry soils of Arabia and north Africa.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: ḥuzāmā (Lavender).—Ed.

the sake of brevity. One of his pieces remarkable for the delicacy of its ideas is the qaṣīdah in which are found the following verses :

"I passed a sleepless night ; does she who enjoys repose at Sal'a<sup>1</sup> possess a heart capable of pitying those who sleep not ? I implore you, by our mutual affection, you whom I love as my son ! for you are dearer to me than the son of my father<sup>2</sup> ; shed tears through affliction ; for my eyes, when I ask them to pour forth (istabraztuhā) tears, refuse to obey. Though weeping be difficult for one who is unscathed (by sorrow), yet I have never asked you to do what was not difficult ".

The same poet is the author of this fine passage on contentedness :

"You blame the miser who is sparing of his wealth ; why not be more parsimonious than he by sparing your self-respect ? Disgrace not your hand by asking ; life itself is of too little value to be asked for. I wrap myself up in the skirts of my contentedness, and pass the night thus covered and enveloped. Notwithstanding my poverty, I appear before my enemies in such attire as denotes a man of wealth and thus make them think that I am rich. When a man passes his nights in sighing, and all his hopes prove vain, let him count only on himself".

One of his qaṣīdahs contains an original thought which is thus expressed :

"When your foes see you, their souls fly from them with affright. One would think their souls were aware of your presence sooner than their eyes. When you meet a hostile squardon and wish to disperse it, you have only to declare aloud your name and surname".

The dīwān (or collected works) of this poet is so well known that we need not lengthen our article by the insertion of other fine passages. There is, however, in one of his qaṣīdahs, a verse which pleases me so much that I shall give it here :

1 Sal'a was the name of a place near Madīnah. (Marāṣīd).

2 The son of my father, that is : myself.

"The travellers who have just set out, and from whom you are now separated, have left behind them hearts which shall ever refuse to admit of consolation for their loss."

Mihyār died on Sunday, the 5th of the latter Jumādā, A.H. 428 (26th March, A.C. 1037), in the same year as the celebrated physician, the ra'is Ibn Sinā (Avicenna,—see No. 184). I read, however, in a book of annals that his death took place in the year 426; but the first date is the true one. Al-Bākhārzi speaks of his son, Abu 'l-Ḥasan, in the Dumyat al-Qaṣr, and states him to be the author of the qaṣīdah which rhymes in ḥ (ح) and in which is found this verse:

"O zephyr which breathest from Kāzimah!¹ seldom didst thou excite weeping or affliction."

But this poem, which is of considerable length, is well known to have been composed by Mihyār himself. I know not what made al-Bākhārzi fall into this mistake. مهيار and مرزويه must be pronounced Mihyār and Marzawayh. They are both Persian names and their signification is unknown to me.

---

¹ Kāzimah, a well-known place on the road leading from Baṣrah to Makkah.

APPENDIX

*[This state of affairs continued till the year A.H. 688 (A.C. 1300). Then with a change in the circumstances there came a change and the two amirs Najm al-Dīn Khidr and Badr al-Dīn Salāmash mentioned above were arrested and imprisoned in the Qal'at al-Jabal. As regards the Şālihiyan, Prince al-Malik al-Manşūr mentioned above, was heir-apparent of his father and of clear judgment; he died during his father's life-time in the month of Sha'bān, A.H. 687 (A.C. 1288). Then his father appointed his son al-Malik al-Ashraf, mentioned above, his heir-apparent. He entrusted the reigns of government to him in the month of Shawwāl, A.H. 687 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1288). He is one of the potentates noted for their aspirations, prosperity and prudence. Al-Malik al-Manşūr Qalāwūn died on one Saturday† of the month of Dhu 'l Qa'dah, A.H. 689 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 1290). He had set out to 'Akkā with an intention of waging war, but he fell ill and passed away and the army returned to its station.

His son al-Sultān al-Malik al-Ashraf, succeeded him and inherited all strongholds and towns. None was seen more prosperous, more powerful or more noble in soul or more faithful to those who attached themselves with him, among potentates than him.

In the days of al-Malik al-Manşūr, Syrian Tripoli was conquered on Tuesday 9 latter Rabi' A.H. 688 (3 May, A.C. 1289), He had stormed it himself with his armies, and took it by force. He subjected its inhabitants to slaying, capturing and pillaging. He captured all that lay in its vicinity, the fort of Jubayl, al-Bishrūn

---

* [ ] This apocryphal passage, is taken from the Egyptian edition. The editor 'Abd al-Ḥamīd has rightly observed that the authorship cannot be ascribed to Ibn Khalikān who died in A.H. 681 (A.C. 1282), while it contains information upto A.H. 690 (A.C. 1291).

The author may be unknown but the information of contemporary events as furnished in this passage is useful: it is included here as an Appendix.

† Saturday fell on 7, 14, 21 and 28 of this month, corresponding to 11, 18, 25 November and 2 December, 1290 A.C.—Ed.

and other places. The above mentioned al-Malik al-Ashraf after being in absolute power for a long time, set out for 'Akkā personally and collected his forces storming it in a day. His emergence from Egypt was the same day and all people of his regular army, volunteers and others assembled near 'Akkā. Allāh made its capture easy on Friday 17 first Jumādā, A.H. 690 (18 May, A.C. 1291); in a similar hour it was seized from the Muslims and in the same month, with the difference that it was the first. It was seized from the Muslims in the days of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn Yūsuf Ibn Ayyūb in latter Jumādā, A.H. 658 (A.C. 1260).

Al-Sultān al-Malik al-Ashraf Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn captured all its inhabitants and put all of them to sword. The Franks had done the same to Muslims in the days of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn.

Observe many coincidences in these events. It was seized from one Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn and (his name-sake) Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn recaptured it. Muslims were slain there and then infidels were slain. It was seized in the second hour of Friday 17, latter Jumādā, then Muslims recaptured it in the second hour of Friday 17, first Jumādā Glory be to Him, ordaining the affairs.

With the fall of 'Akkā the spirit of the Franks failed and those who were at Beirut and 'Illit fled away. They are two great forts and imagination cannot encompass them. The Muslims captured them with Allāh's grace and might, without fighting.

They captured Beirut and Ḥayfā and so no place remained in the hands of the Franks on the coast—no fort, no town, no village and no island but the Muslims captured all.]

INDEX

A

- Abiward, 1.
 al-Abiwardi, 1, 4, 5, 53.
 al-Ablah, 19, 21, 22, 33, 182.
 Abrahām, 195, 345.
 Abrez Gate, 252.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Ṭūsi, ('Abhāsah), 424.
 Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān, 262.
 Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri, 41, 42, 348, 360.
 Abū 'Alī al-Fārisī, 343, 385.
 Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan al-Ashkari, 414.
 Abū 'Alī al-Naysābūri, 246, 265.
 Abū 'Alī Dāwūd (Qāḍī), 276.
 Abū 'Alī al-Sinjī, 266.
 Abū 'Alī 'l-Faraj, 11n.
 Abū 'Amr al-Dīn, 340.
 Abū 'Aṭā Marzūq al-Şindi, 351, 352.
 Abu 'l-'Atāhiyāh, 301.
 Abu 'l-'Aynā, 414.
 Abū Baḥr 'Abd al-Şamad, 65.
 Abū Bakr, 45, 92, 114.
 Abū Bakr (Şiddiq), 161n, 218, 219, 326.
 Abū Bakr al-Adfu'is, 344.
 Abū Bakr al-Ājūri, 317.
 Abū Bakr al-Andalusī, 43, 70.
 Abū Bakr al-Dānī, 54, 59, 61, 68.
 Abū Bakr al-Ḡhundadī (al-'Udhri), 156.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī, 190.
 Abū Bakr al-Qurtubī, 349.
 Abū Bakr al-Şhāsī, 190n.
 Abū Bakr al-Ṭūsi, 101.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Abī Dāwūd, 275.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Muḥammad al-Malik, 284.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad, 51, 89, 91, 92, 150.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Karkhī, 163.
 Abu 'l-Barakāt, 39, 383.
 Abū Burdah Ibn Mūsā, 294.
 Abū Duwād al-Iyādī, 210.
 Abū Daūd, 248.
 Abū Faḍl Muḥammad, 135.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl, 137, 242.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Mikālī, 143.
 Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Mikālī, 143.
 Abu 'l-Farj al-Işbahāni, 312.
 Abu 'l-Faḥ, 23.
 Abu 'l-Faḥ al-Bustī, 223.
 Abu 'l-Fawāris Aḥmad, 94, 95, 97, 99.
 Abu 'l-Feda, 105, 108, 123, 125, 126, 139, 167, 231, 240, 254, 259, 305, 329, 334, 389, 406, 407.
 Abu 'l-Futūḥ 'Abd al-Wahhāb, 424.
 Abu 'l-Ḡhanā'im Ibn Dārist, 166.
 Abū Ḡhassān, 156.
 Abū Ḥafṣah, 239, 240, 244, 245.
 Abū Ḥafṣ al-Kirmānī, 128.
 Abu 'l-Ḥakam Ibn Abu 'l-Abyaḍ al-Nasib, 160.

- Abū Ḥanīfah, 106, 215, 229, 230, 231, 269, 315.
 Abū al-Ḥasan, 94, 159, 316, 380, 381, 388.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, 335.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Al-Ḥasan, 168.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Musayyabī, 326.
 Abū Ḥāshim, 65.
 Abū Ḥātim al-Rāzi, 317.
 Abū Ḥātim al-Sijistāni, 291, 299.
 Abu 'l-Hayjā al-Hadbāni, 328.
 Abu 'l-Hayjā Ibn 'Imrān, 323.
 Abū Ḥayyān al-Tawḥīdī, 141, 147, 148.
 Abu 'l-Ḥazm al-Makkī, 348.
 Abu 'l-Hind al-Dārī (Rāzi), 350.
 Abū Ishāq al-Marwazi, 318.
 Abū Ishāq al-Sābi, 170, 315.
 Abū Ishāq Shīrāzi, 263, 357, 358, 360, 361.
 Abū Ja'fār, 26, 126, 131, 302.
 Abu 'l-Jūthah (Huwayyah), 329.
 Abu 'l-Ma'ālī-l-Ḥaḍiri, 15, 36, 192.
 Abu 'l-Ma'ālī al-Juwaynī, 248.
 Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Quraysh, 331.
 Abu 'l-Mahāsin, 91, 92, 93, 120.
 Abu 'l-Mahārīsh, 334.
 Abū Maṣṣūr 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥasan, 168.
 Abū Maṣṣūr 'Alī Surdur, 179.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad, 339.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Jabbār, 59, 424.
 Abū Moḥammad al-Ḥusayn, 94, 96.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Naṣīh, 39.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Mubārak, Baghdādī, 30.
 Abū Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id, 367.
 Abū Muḥammad Ismā'il, 421.
 Abū Muḥammad Sa'id Ibn al-Dabbān, 347.
 Abū Mulaykah, 242.
 Abū Musim, 88, 274.
 Abu 'l-Moustahill, 272.
 Abu 'l-Muṭarrif, 54.
 Abu 'l-Muẓaffer Yūsuf, 112.
 Abū Na'amah, 299.
 Abū Naṣr, 200, 201.
 Abū Naṣr al-Ḥalbi, 330.
 Abū Naṣr al-Qushayrī, 248.
 Abū Nuwās, 294, 301, 378.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim, 15, 16, 72.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Azharī, 275.
 Abu 'l-Qāsin Maḥmūd, 232.
 Abu al-Qaṭṭān, 262.
 Abū Rakwā al-Walīd, 367, 368.
 Abu 'l-Riḍā (al-Qā'id) al-Fāriqi, 170.
 Abu 'l-Riḍā Ibn Ṣadaqah, 185.
 Abū Sa'id, 12, 72, 62.
 Abū Sa'id al-'Adwī, 275.
 Abū Sa'id Mas'ūd, 231.
 Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Manṣūr Ibn Ishāq, 205.

- Abū Salamah Shahrab, 349.
 Abū 'l-Ṣalt, 331.
 Abū 'l-Ṣarī' Ibn Abī Ghālib al-Khazraji, 270, 274.
 Abū Ṣhabīb al-Ṣadafī, 394.
 Abū Ṣhammir, 73.
 Abū Ṣhujā', 176.
 Abū Ṣhujā' Muḥammad Ibn Ḥegribek, 104, 107.
 Abū 'l-Simt Ibn Abū 'l-Junūd, 244.
 Abū Ṭāhir Hāshim, 15.
 Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad (Qāḍi), 281.
 Abū Ṭālib, 34, 333.
 Abū Ṭālib al-Qāḍi al-Iṣba'hāni, 222.
 Abū Ṭālib Muḥammad, 346.
 Abū Ṭālib Mikāyil, 98.
 Abū Tammām, 5, 61, 131, 161.
 Abū Yaḥyā (Ibn Ma'an), 74.
 Abū 'Ubayd 38, 362, 363.
 Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sullām, 291.
 Abū 'Ubayd Ibn Harbawayh, 361.
 Abū 'Ubaydah, 291, 292, 293, 294, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302.
 Abū 'Umar al-Kindī, 160.
 Abū 'Umar al-Māzinī, 127, 1291, 308.
 Abū 'l-Wafā al-Buzanji, 213, 214.
 Abū 'l-Walid al-Waqshī, 55.
 Abū Ya'qūb Tāshfīn, 56, 57.
 Abū Ya'lā Ibn al-Habbāriyah, 172.
 Abū 'l-Yumn Sābiq, 13.
 Abū Yazid, 46, 47.
 Abū Zakariyā, 2, 420.
 Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī, 294, 375.
 Abyssinia, 92.
 Acad Ibn Kazaynad, 272.
 Acre Jaffa, 371.
Adab al-Kātib, 420.
 Adam 108, 271, 316, 345.
 Aden, 42.
 Ādharbājān, 41, 146, 259, 30, 254, 4327, 412.
 al-Afḍal Shāhanshāh, 370.
 Afrika 58, 74, 193n, 289, 368, 390, 392, 401, 412, 414.
 Afshēen (Ifshīn), 161, 162.
 Afşūn, 392.
 Aghmāt, 60, 61, 64, 65, 68, 83.
 Mr. Ahlwradt, 294.
 Aḥmad, 97.
 Aḥmad al-Aḥwal, 135.
 Aḥmad Ibn Ali Duwād, 128, 131.
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Ali al-Thawri, 275.
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Ammān Ibn Shādhi, 127.
 Aḥmad Ibn Asad, 206.
 Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, 245, 317.
 Aḥmad Ibn Kayghaligh Abu 'l-'Abbās 29, 97.
 Abū 'l-Farj Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad, 141.
 Aḥmad Ibn Ra'ūf al-Shafī', 275.
 Aḥmad Ibn al-Rifā'i, 31.
 Aḥmad Ibn Sayyār, 316.

- al-Aḥṣā, 37.
 al-Ahwāz, 156, 164, 175, 243.
 Akbara, 155 n.
 al-Akfānī, 210.
 al-Akhfash Sa'id, 375.
 Alexander, 137, 328.
 Alexandria, 46, 77, 114, 217, 281, 328, 401.
 Aleppo, 15, 16, 78, 104, 111, 112, 115, 124, 165, 166, 192, 221, 233, 235, 238, 239, 249, 255, 256, 257, 330, 332, 335, 339, 349, 388, 407, 410.
 Alli Kirmās, 259 n.
 Algeria, 290.
 Algiers, 89.
 Algeiras, 57, 395, 401.
 Almagest, 386.
 Almeria, 69, 70, 71, 75, 81.
 al-Almerciā, 199.
 Alp Arslān, 9, 33, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 179, 182, 183, 353.
 Alphonso, 55, 56, 57.
 Alptikīn (Abū Ishāq), 223.
 al-Ameen, 274.
 Amin al-Millah, 223.
 al-Ānir bi Ahkām Allāh, 369, 370, 371, 372.
 Amro, 'I-Qays 240.
 Anas, 195.
 Anas al-Ḥuffāz, 195.
 Anas Ibn Mālik, 195 n., 350.
 Anaz Ana Ghassān Ghīyās, 391.
 al-Anbār, 249, 304, 323, 326.
 al-Anbārī Abu 'I-Ḥasan Ibn 'Umar, 157, 158, 159, 162.
Anmūdḥaj 215.
Annal, 126, 146, 161 n. 254, 264. al- Anṭākī, 344.
 Antiach, 126, 146, 357.
 Anūjūr (Abu 'I Qāsim), 94.
 Anūshirwān, 73.
 Apostle (Madinah), 175.
 Āq Sanqūar, 234, 253, 254.
 Aqsīs, 115.
 Arabia, 29, 91, 185, 186.
 Arabian 'Irāq, 419.
Arabian Nights, 67.
Arba' Maqālāt, 210n.
 Arbela, 35, 37, 39, 41, 121, 185, 187, 233, 256, 257, 259, 261, 328, 347, 374, 383, 286, 388.
 Arḍ al-Mizzah, 45.
 Arḍ al-Sawād, 119.
 Ardashīr Ibn Bābak, 210, 211, 212.
 Aristotle, 137, 198, 199, 384, 387.
 Ārmenia, 112, 302, 329.
 Arrājān, 137, 138.
 Arrān, 259.
 Arsalān, 106.
 Arsalān al-Basāsīrī, 332.
 Arsalan Shāh (Sultān), 261.
 Arwā, 74, 75.
 Arzangān, 409.
 Asad al-Dīn Shīrku, 110, 235, 249, 259.
 Al-As'ad Ibn Billīḥ, (Abu 'I-Qāsim), 72, 75.
 As'ad al-Mīhanī, 190n.

- As'ad Ibn Khuzaymah, 351.
Asās al-Balāghah, 214.
 al-Ashraf, Ibn Fakhr al-Mulk,
 164, 407, 408, 411, 412, 413.
 Asia Minor (Rūm), 106, 120,
 207, 234, 257, 327, 332,
 333, 354, 409.
 al-Aşma'i, 293, 294, 298, 300, 303.
 al-Aṭābikī, 233.
 Atābik Ṣāḥir al-Dīn Ṭuḡhtikīn,
 371.
 Aṭhīr al-Dīn al-Mufaḍḍal al-
 Abharī, 385, 386, 387.
 Aṭsīs, 112.
 Āwāna, 55.
 al-Awzā'i, 350.
 Awzalagh, 203.
 Aybik, 234.
 Ayyūb, 112.
 Azāreka, 272.
 Al-Aẓhari, 37.
 al-Azraqi's description of Mak- kah, 122.
 Aaron (Hārūn Prophet), 235.
 'Abbād, 55, 59, 60, 65, 136, 147.
 al-'Abbās, 196, 325, 418.
 al-'Abbās al-Murri, 160.
 al-'Abbās Ibn 'Amr al-Ghanavi,
 322, 325.
 Al-'Abbās Ibn-al-Ḥasan, 91.
 al-'Abbāsah, 267.
 'Abd Allāh al-Kasry, 272.
 'Abdullah Ibn Muhammad
 Adham, 56.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Bulukkīn, 58.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ḥamdān, 324.
 'Abd Allah Ibn Malik al-
Khuzu, 381.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Marwān (Abd
 al-'Azīz), 393, 395.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Maslamah, 245.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mubārak, 316.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Shikhkhīr, 264.
 'Abd Allāh (Ibn Ṭāhir), 5,
 161n.
 Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Alī 'Āmir,
 69, 70.
 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Marwān, 369.
 'Abd al-Ḥamid 1, n. 5, n.
 75, 80, 91, 92, 102, 104,
 122, 125, 132, 136, 141,
 142, 144, 148, 154, 155,
 156, 161n. 170n. 176n. 177n.
 186n. 188n., 190n, 193n, 204,
 209, 215, 223, 234, 237, 239,
 244, 245, 259, 264, 267, 276,
 289, 295, 296, 301, 322, 326,
 329, 334, 341, 350, 351, 352,
 353, 354, 368, 372, 377, 378,
 383, 389, 390, 392, 393, 406,
 407, 408, 409, 410, 413, 414,
 424.
 Abd al-Ḥaqq Ibn Ibrāhīm,
 83.
 'Abd al-Ḥusayn al-Rāzī,
 94.
 'Abd al-Jabbār Ibn 'Abd al-
 Raḥmān, 307.
 'Abd al-Karīm, 248.
 'Abd al-Laṭīf, 78, 147, 330.
 'Abd al-Majīd (Ḥāfiẓ), 372.

- 'Abd al-Malik, 64, 274, 297, 326, 369, 393.
 'Abd al-Malik al-Hamadāni, 177.
 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Abd al-Aziz, 261.
 'Abd al-Malik al-Juwayni, 178, 179.
 'Abd al-Malik Ibn 'Umayr, 325.
 Abd al-Muhsin al-Sūrī, 129.
 'Abd al-Mūmin Harglri, 89.
 'Abd al-Mūmin al-Wansharisi, 86, 87.
 'Abd al-Mūmin Ibn 'Ali 'l-Qaysi, 76, 79, 80, 89.
 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, 196.
 'Abd al-Raḥīm, 194.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 90, 128, 149, 150, 244, 262.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ḥassān Ibn Thābit, 244.
 'Abd al-Paḥmān Ibn 'Isā al-Jabrud, 149.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Zayd, 306.
 'Abd al-Razzāq Ibn Hamām, 315.
 'Adī Ibn Zayd al-Ibādī, 211.
 'Adnān, 272.
 'Aḍud al-Dawbal Ibn Buwayh, 99, 104, 156, 157, 158, 159, 323.
 'Aḍud al-Dīn. 195.
 'Aḍud al-Dīn Abu 'l Faraj, 26, 27.
 'Affān Ibn Sulaymān.
 'Alam al-Dīn (Shaykh), 389.
 'Ajūz, 91.
 'Akkah, 18, 370.
 'Alā al-Dawlah, 99, 104.
 'Alā al-Dīn Kayqubād, 409.
 'Alam al-Dīn Ta'āṣif, 392.
 'Ali (Abū 'Alī), 274.
 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭalīb, 11, 34, 35, 76, 79, 89, 240, 285, 380, 393, 418.
 'Alī Ibn al-Aṭṭham, 291.
 'Alī Ibn Baliq al-Raḍi-Bi-Allāh, 149.
 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah, 129.
 'Ali Ibn Hebat Allāh, (Abu 'l-Ḥasan), 190.
 'Alī Ibn al-Ja'd, 315.
 'Alī Ibn al-Jahm, 132, 277.
 'Ali (Ibn Manṣūr), 189.
 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad, 283.
 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Ḡharnāt (Abu 'l-Hasan), 79.
 'Alī Ibn Mūsā al-Riḍā, 286, 355, 417, 418, 419.
 'Alī Ibn Rabn (Abu al-Ṭabṛī 'l-Ḥasan), 204.
 'Ali Ibn Sulaymān, 144.
 'Ali Ibn Tirād, 10, 11.
 'Alī Ibn Yahyā, 78.
 'Alī Ibn Yoūnus (Abu 'l-Ḥasan), 366, 367.
 'Alī al-Bākhharzi (Abu'l Ḥasan), 79, 183.
 'Alī al-Kūshī al-Shādhili, 422.
 'Ali al-Madīni, 294.
 'Ali Zaynabī (Naqīb al-Nuqabā), 10.

- 'Āliqīn, 115.
 'Alqamah, 243.
 'Amīd, 118, 119, 136, 165, 167, 409.
 'Amīd al-Dawlah Sharaf al-Dīn Abū Maṣṣūr Muḥammad, 167, 171, 173, 174.
 'Anīd al-Dawlah Ibn Jāhir, 175.
 'Amīd al-Mulk Muḥammad, 33, 181, 182, 183.
 'Abū Naṣr Muḥammad (Ibn Maṣṣūr) 'Amīd al-Mulk al-Kundri, 178, 179, 250.
 al-'Amīdī's Irshād, 384.
 al-'Amīdiyāt, 136.
 'Ammān, 91.
 'Amr Ibn al-Itnābah, 299.
 'Amr Ibn al-Hayth, 325.
 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah, 128.
 'Ānah, 123, 323.
 al-'Aqabiyah, 412.
 al-'Aqīq, 32, 347.
 al-'Aqr, 260, 261.
 'Arafāt, 186, 187.
 al-'Arīsh, 47, 371.
 'Askar Mukram, 265.
 'Aṭā Ibn Abi Rabāh, 315, 318.
 'Awn al-Dīn, 190, 195.
 'Aylān (Ghaylān), 269.
 al-'Aẓīmī (Abū 'Abd-Allah), 325.
 Al-'Azīz, 367.
 'Azīz al-Dawlah Rihān, 221.
 'Azīz al-Dīn, 189, 232.
 al-'Azīz al-Iṣbahānī, 233.
 al-'Azīz Ibn al-Manṣūr, 78.
 al-'Azīz Nizār, 96, 282.
- B
- Bālbak, 161.
 Bābak al-Khurrāmī, 417.
 Bāb al-Abwāb (Darband), 354.
 Bāb al-'Aṭṭārīn, 341.
 Bāb Ḥarb, 304.
 Bāb al-Maydān, 349.
 Bāb al-Ṣaghīr, 202, 249, 330; 393.
 Bāb al-Sharqi, 392.
 Bāb al-Ṭāq, 275.
 Bāb al-Teen, 165.
 Bādīs, 290.
 Badr al-Jamālī, 285.
 Badrān, 331.
 Badriyah, 387, 390.
 Badr Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Ikhshīdī, 154.
 Bāf, 276.
 al-Bāfi (Abu Muḥammad), 276.
 al-Baghawī, 275.
 Baghdād, 8, 10, 11, 19, 21, 22, 23, 25, 26, 29, 30, 33, 38, 46, 64, 90, 94, 101, 102, 107, 108, 126, 127, 136, 137, 141, 147, 148, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 159, 166, 167, 176, 178, 186, 189, 190, 191, 198, 199, 200, 202, 203, 205, 206, 210, 212, 213, 216, 226, 232, 233, 234, 238, 240, 244, 245, 246, 249, 251, 252, 253, 254, 265, 275, 276, 282, 284, 285, 287, 288, 289, 291, 304, 308, 315, 317,

- 318, 319, 320, 325, 332, 334,
 346, 347, 349 352, 354, 357,
 358, 359, 361, 375, 580, 381,
 382, 383, 384, 386, 388, 415,
 416, 417, 420, 423.
 al-Bahā Asad al-Sinjārī, 413.
 Bahā al-Dawlah, (Abu Naṣr),
 2.
 Bahā al-Dīn, 163.
 Bahā al-Dawlah, 99, 323.
 Bahā al-Dawlāh Abū Naṣr, 162,
 382.
 Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād, 29,
 249, 260.
 Bahā al-Dīn Rabīb, 260.
 Bahar al-Dīn Zuhayr Ibn Mu-ḥammad, 71.
 Bahasnā, 234.
 al-Bāhilī, 293.
 al-Bahīrah, 87.
 Bāhluvan Ibn Ildukuz, 261.
 Bahrām Kuṣh, 205.
 Baḥrayn, 29, 35, 37, 38, 325.
 Bāi Tūz, (Abū Nur), 223.
 Bajarwān, 302.
 Bājjah, 65, 75.
 Bajjanah, 69.
 Bajjāyah, 75.
 Bajkam al-Turkī, 152.
 Bākari (Abu'l Ḥasan 'Alī), 179,
 192, 328.
 al-Bākharzī, 192.
 Bakr Ibn Muṣ'ab, 351.
 al-Bakrī, 280, 281.
 Ba'abak, 119, 123, 124, 234, 235, 239.
 Balāsāghūn, 203.
 al-Balīkh, 302.
 Bālis, 234.
 Balkh, 100, 106, 161, 224, 225,
 314, 317.
 Balqā, 119.
 Bānyās, 370.
 Bāniyaz, 235.
 Bani Jimmān, 409.
 Bānyās (Baysān), 408.
 Baqī' 176, 188.
 Baqiyah Ibn al-Walid, 315,
 316.
 Baqyār, 186, 187.
 Barakah, 368.
 Barakah Ibn Muqallad, 331.
 al-Baraki (al-Barqī), 276, 280,
 Barbar, 288.
 Bardwil (Bardwin), 371.
 al-Bāri' (Abū 'Abdullah), 11, 13.
 Bārin, 256.
 Barkyārūq, 107, 108, 109, 359.
 Barmak, 147.
 Barqah, 95, 281.
 al-Barq al-Shāmī, 191, 193, 196, 373.
 al-Barqa'īdi, 329.
 al-Barrād Ibn Qays, 295.
 al-Basā'i'rī, 334.
 al-Basāsiri, (Abu 'l-Ḥārith Aṣtāla), 283.
 Bashshār Ibn Burd, 267.
 Başrah, 34, 127, 132, 156, 190,
 264, 291, 292, 293, 298, 301,
 306, 315, 318, 350, 351, 352,
 359, 374, 375, 378, 406.
 al-Bast, 37.

- al-Bastāmi, (Abū Muḥammad Hibat Allāh), 424.
 al-Baṭā'ih, 31.
 Baṭalyaws, 57.
 Battan (Bittan), 210.
 Battāni, 210.
 Bāward, 5.
Bayan al-'Amal fi-'l Hajj, 345.
Bayān al-Kabā'ir Wa'l--Saghāir, 344.
 al-Bayhaqī, 263.
 Bayn al-Nahrayn, 406.
 Bayrūt, 371.
 Bayt al-Maqdis, 354.
 Bayyān al-Mughrib, 284.
 al-Bayyāsī (Abul-Ḥajjāj Yūsuf), 68, 69.
 Bellido, 75.
 Berber, 76, 89.
Bibliothèque Imperiale, 121.
Bibliothèque, 94, 187, 193, 194, 213, 214, 215, 384.
 Bighrājūq, 225.
 Bihliwan (Bahliwan), 261.
 Bijāyah (Bugiya) 78, 79.
 Biktimūr (Mamluk), 258, 259.
 Billitah, 75.
 Bilāl, 45.
 Bilbays, 123.
 al-Bimāristāni, (Abū 'Abd Al-lāh), 128.
Biographical History of Mak-kāh, 121.
 Birkat al-Ḥabaṣh, 372.
 Birkah Qarūn, 160.
 Biṣṭaim Ibn Qays al-Shaybānī, 314.
 Black Sea, 90.
 Broch, Mr., 215.
 Burckhardt's Travels in Arabia, 122, 186, 187, 194.
 Bughyah, 72, 78, 79, 89.
 Buqia, 78, 89, 390, 392.
Bughyat al-Multmis, 342.
 al-Buḥturi, 130.
 Bukhārā, 98, 100, 103, 206, 223, 246, 384.
 al-Bukhārī, Imam, 246, 247, 248, 316, 317.
 Būlāq, 368.
 Bulukkin Ibn Ziri, 280, 281, 284.
 al-Bundāri, 102.
 al-Buqāyah, 238.
 Burhān al-Dīn, 40.
 Bust, 223, 225, 262, 309.
 al-Bustī, 224.
 Buzjan (Abū Ḥātim) al-Bustī, 213, 262, 318.
- C
- Cahtān, 272.
 Cairo, 44, 46, 77, 112, 117, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 160, 267, 269, 281, 282, 283, 331, 340, 341, 346, 361, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 391, 411, 413.
 Calcutta, 222, 385.
 Caspian, 90, 354.
 Castell, 186.
 Castile, 55.

Caussin de pereceval's Essai,
295, 300, 302, 315.
Ceuta, 57, 58, 395.
Chalef elahmar's Qassaide, 294.
Chosroes, 355, 356.
Constantinople, 101, 149, 354,
392.
Copts, 73.
Cordova, 47, 48, 52, 53, 54, 59.
67, 72, 199, 340, 341, 342.
Coufa, 272.
Cyrenica, 368.

D

al-Ḍaḥḥak Ibn Muzāḥim, 116, 315.
Dallat al-Nashīd, 214.
Damietta, 115, 116, 117, 124,
125, 407, 408.
Damascus, 6, 18, 28, 30, 38, 39,
40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 91,
92, 93, 114, 115, 116, 118, 119,
120, 121, 123, 124, 154, 159,
180, 190, 191, 197, 200, 201,
202, 234, 235, 237, 239, 249,
250, 253, 255, 257, 317, 330,
332, 350, 371, 388, 389, 392,
405, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412.
al-Dāmghāni (Abū Ja'far Ibn
'Alī), 216.
al-Dāniyah (Denia), 340.
Darband, 328.
al-Darbandāt, 410.
Dargāh Khātūn, 109.
al-Dārikī, 318.
al-Dashkarah, 126.

David, 404, 405.
Dawal al-Islamiyah, 25.
al-Dawā'ī, 21.
Dāwūd, 100, 102, 104, 106, 410.
Dawūd al-Ṭa'ī, 287.
Dāwūd Ibn Mikāyil (Aḡud al-
Dawlāh, 104.
Dayār al-Qusayr, 369.
al-Daylamī (Abū 'Alī al-Ḥasan Ibn Buwayh), 135.
al-Daylamīyāt, 42.
Ḍayzan Ibn Mu'āwīyah, 211.
Dead sea, 91.
De. Haymmer, 294.
De l'Histoire des Druzes, 134.
De Sacy's Chrestomathic, 114,
134, 141, 297.
De Slane, 101, 350.
Denia, 70.
De Sacy's Authologic graminatic
ale, 215.
Ḍhakā, 362.
D. Herbelot, 90, 180.
Ḍhakhirah, 49, 52, 74.
Ḍhayl, 102, 173, 176, N. 193.
Ḍhu-l-Kifayatayn, (Abu l-Fath
'Alī) 145, 147.
Ḍhu 'l-Oarnayn, 271.
Ḍiū Markh, 242.
Di'bil, 42, 127.
Dinār, 138.
Dināwar, 327.
Diophantus, 213.
al-Diḡān al-'Azīz, 108, 195, 226.
Diḡān al-Tamāthul, 215.
Diyār Bakr, 167, 327, 354.
Diyār Muḡr, 332.

Diyār Rabi'ah, 171, 332.
 D'ohsson's Tale, 122, 238.
 D. Ohsson, 229, 230.
 Dozzy, 69, 341, 398, 405, 406.
 Dr. Greehill, 206.
 Dr. Sprenger, 385.
 Dubays Ibn Šadaqah, 254.
 Dujayl, 358.
Dumyat al-Qaṣr, 192, 328, 329, 330.
 Duqqāq, 234, 253.
Durrat al-Ḡhawwās, 420.
al-Duwal al-Islāmiyah, 132, 149. al-Ḍabbī, (Abul 'Abbās) 144.
 Ḍiyā al-Dīn Abū Sa'īd Bah-rām, 185.
 Ḍiyā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh, 112.

E

Edessa, 118, 235, 257, 406.
 Edfow, 344.
 Egypt, 18, 39, 41, 42, 46, 47, 77, 78, 90, 92, 97, 101, 110, 112, 114, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 123, 124, 126, 138, 147, 149, 154, 191, 192, 193, 194, 200, 235, 239, 245, 255, 257, 266, 267, 268, 279, 280, 281, 284, 285, 288, 326, 339, 341, 344, 346, 359, 361, 363, 364, 365, 369, 371, 389, 391, 392, 393, 405, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 413, 414.
 Eithhorn's Monumentenba anti Arabs, 302.
 Elias (Prophet), 302.
 Emessa, 123, 124, 234, 235, 238, 255, 413.
Epistle, 248.
 Esneh, 392.
 Euphrates, 95, 103, 105, 210, 257, 323, 326, 407.
 Europe, 73.

F

al-Faḍl Ibn al-Rabi', 291, 292, 294, 297, 298, 312, 313.
 al-Faḍl Ibn Amīr al-Juyūsh, 372.
 al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān, 127.
 al-Faḍl Shāhanshāh, 285.
Fā'iq, 214.
 Fakhr al-Dawlah Muwyyad ad-Dīn, (Abū Naṣr Muḥammad Ibn Jubir), 165.
 Fakhr al-Dawlah, 13, 49, 67, 166, 167, 168, 174.
 Fakhr al-Dīn, 24, 25, 163.
 Fakhr al-Dīn al-Raḍi, 112.
 Fakhr al-Mulk Abū Ḡhalib Ibn Khalaf, 162, 164, 165.
 al-Fakhr Ishāq, 17.
 Fakhr al-'Ulā, 67.
 Fannākhusrū, (Sultān al-Dawlah Abū Shujā') 162, 164.
 Fārāb, 202, 203.
 al-Fārābī, (Abū Naṣr) 197, 198, 199, 201, 202, 203.
 al-Farāmā, 371.
 Farber, 105.

Farghānah, 90, 92, 206.
 Al-Farghānī, 96.
 al-Fāriqī, Shaykh Muḥammad 202.
 al-Faṭḥ Ibn 'Alī Aṣbahānī, Imām, 194.
al-Faṭḥ al-Oṃssi fil faith al-
Qudsi, 193.
 Fārs, 138, 148, 149, 203, 302.
 Fātik al-Majnūn, 99.
 Fāṭimah, 96, 109, 289.
 Ferdinand, 55.
 Fez, 279.
Fi Istikhrāj al-Awṭār, 213.
Firdaws al-Ḥikmah, 204.
 Fonds st. Germain, 102.
 Fleischerd (Professor), 344.
 Frankish, 93.
 Franks, 55, 56, 58, 115, 116,
 117, 235, 370, 377, 407,
 408.
 Freytag 352.
 Freytag, Maardani, 73, 36, 114,
 240.
 Fūrhan, 97.
 al-Fuqqai, 368.
 Fuṣṭāṭ (Marāṣid), 267.
Fuṣūs al-Akhlāḥ, 214.

G

Galiccia, 405.
 German, 102.
 al-Ghaḍanfar Ibn al-Ḥasan, 324.
 Ghadir Khum, 285.
Gharīb al-Hudūd, 295.

Gharīb al-Qur'ān, 295.
Ghars al-Ni'mah, 305.
 al-Ghawr, 34, 126.
 al-Ghazālī, (Abū Ḥāmid) 76,
 108, 386,
 Ghāzī, 255.
 Ghazrah, 41, 98, 100, 223, 224,
 225, 230, 231, 318.
 Ghazzāliyah, 249.
 Ghiyāth al-Dīn, 107.
 Ghundād, 156.
 Ghuzz, 323.
 Gibraltar, 413.
 Gog and Magog, (Yājūj Mājūj),
 328.
 Granada, 58, 79.
 Greek, 19, 196.
 Grurdkūh (In Zabulistan), 108.

H

Ḥabīb, 61.
 Ḥaḍan, 307,
 al-Ḥaḍar, 210, 211.
 al-Ḥadba, 347.
 Hadbania, 327.
 al-Hakkāriyah, 260.
 Hamadān, 233, 249, 253, 254,
 261, 419.
 al-Hamadāni, 108, 138, 177,
 343, 355, 357, 358.
 Hamadhān, 353.
 Hamilton's Hedaya, 361.
 Harghah, 76, 89.
 al-Harrāsi, 76.
 al-Harth, 35.

- Hārūn al-Rashīd, 42, 90, 132, 240, 263, 264, 274, 291, 294, 298, 312, 313, 380, 381, 382.
Ḥaḍḥq Nisab Qurayshī, 375.
Ḥadiqah, 331.
 al-Ḥadiṭha, 334.
 al-Ḥaḍrami, (Abū Ḥāmid), 275.
 al-Ḥawfazān Ibn Sharik al-Shayban, 314.
 Ḥajar 37.
 al-Ḥājib al-Mawṣile, 411.
 Ḥājib Ibn Sulayman, 262.
 Ḥājji Khalifah, 79, 106, 138, 176, 199, 344, 345.
 al-Ḥajūn, 194, 195.
 Ḥākin, 272.
 al-Ḥākim, 288, 326, 353, 366, 367, 368, 369.
Ḥamāsah, 68, 298, 313, 314.
 Ḥamāt, 44, 234, 235, 255, 335, 410.
 Ḥammād 'Ajrad, 351.
 Ḥammād Ibn Rāhwayh, 351, 352.
 Ḥammād Ibn Zibriqān, 351.
 Ḥamzah, (Abu Ya'lā) 335.
 Ḥanzalah Ibn Sharq, 214.
 al-Ḥarāmāy, 92.
 Ḥarāmī Ibn 'Umrāh, 315.
 al-Ḥarīr (Qādsīyah), 299, 300.
 al-Ḥarīrī, 257, 420.
 Ḥarīṭhah Ibn Ḥajjāj, 210.
 Ḥarrah, 118, 274.
 Ḥarrān, 209, 210, 258, 259, 260, 332, 333, 338, 406, 408, 409.
 Ḥarrān Muzaḥḥar al-Dīn, 257. al-Ḥasan, 207.
 al-Ḥasan (Ibn Abī Tālib), 76, 239, 331.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Abī Tālib, (Abū 'Abd Allāh), 154.
 al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, 218, 301, 350.
 al-Ḥashīsh, 128.
 al-Ḥaṣṣān Ibn Thābit, 244.
 Ḥāwī, 204.
 Ḥawrān, 243.
 Ḥaydar, 162.
 Ḥayṣ Bayṣ, 188, 232, 423.
 al-Ḥāzīmī, 286.
 Ḥijāz, 32, 34, 41, 90, 92, 119, 245, 247, 280, 318, 414.
 Ḥijr, 194.
 al-Ḥillah, 40, 107, 254.
 al-Ḥimā, 41, 42.
 Ḥimyar, 288.
 al-Ḥīrah, 347.
 Ḥiṣn al-Akrad, 238.
 Ḥiṣn Kayfā, 118.
 Ḥiṣn Maslamah, 325.
 al-Ḥiṣnayn, 38.
 Ḥulwān, 167, 368, 369.
 al-Ḥumādī (Abū 'Abd Allāh), 277, 411.
 al-Ḥumaydī, 405.
 Ḥunayn Ibn Ishāq, 210.
 Ḥuṣām al-Dawlah al-Muqallad, 322, 323.
 Ḥuṣām al-Dīn Arsalān, 259.
 Husam al-Dīn 'Alī Ibn Ḥammad, 411.
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī, 239, 381.
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ḥamdān, 91.
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muṭayr, 313.
 al-Ḥussayn Ibn 'Ubayd, 95.
 al-Ḥuṭayyāh, 242, 243.

- Hārūn Ibn Munajjim, 192.
 Hāshim, 250.
 al-Hāshimiyah, 305, 306.
 Hatti, 368.
 Hayāṭilah, 354.
 Herbelot's (Ṭukhāristān) Bibliothèque orientale, 161n.
 Hibat Allāh, 268.
 Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Talmīdh, 420, 421.
Hidāyah ida Bulūgh al-Nehāyah, 343.
Hijā al-Maṣāḥif, 345.
 Hijrah, 264, 314, 392.
 Hilāl Ibn al-Sābī, 333.
 Hiraql (Heraclius), 92.
 Hirāt (Herāt), 213, 225, 274, 320, 350.
 Hishām al-Muwayyad, 203, 341.
 Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 160, 342.
 Hishām Ibn al-Ḥakam, 18, 49.
 Hishām Ibn Kalbī, 160, 243, 302.
 Hishām Ibn 'Urwah, 291.
Histoire des Arabs, 210.
Histoire des Musulmans d., Espagne, 69.
History of Arbela, 108, 112.
History of Atābeks, (by al-Iṣbahānī), 187.
History of Baghdād, 129, 162, 193, 379.
History of Berbers, 75, 367, 368, 390.
History of Damascus, 97, 154.
History of the Moḥammedan Dynasties in Spain, 68.
History of the Physicians, 203.
History of Qayrawān, 77.
History of Spain, 395.
 Hit, 326.
 Huesca, 69.
- I
- Ibn al-'Abbās ('Abd Allāh), 341.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, 394.
 Ibn Abī Bakr al-Andalusī, 58.
 Ibn Abī Dūwād (Qāḍī), 133.
 Ibn Abī 'l Sāj, 90, 91.
 Ibn Abī 'l-Saqr (Abu al-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Alī), 6, 8.
 Ibn Abī 'l-Thiāb, 141, 154.
 Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, 203, 224.
 Ibn Abī Yahyā, 317.
 Ibn 'Adīl Jurjānī (Abū Aḥmad), 'Adīl, 262.
 Ibn 'Āishah al-Taymī, 349.
 Ibn al-Afānī Abū Muḥammad Hibat Allah), 210.
 Ibn Akhi 'l-'Azīz, 189.
 Ibn al-'Allāf (Abu 'l-Karam), 174.
 Ibn al-'Amīd, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 162.
 Ibn 'Ammān, 127, 128.
 Ibn al-Anbārī (Abu 'l-Barakāt), 383.
 Ibn 'Asākir (Ḥāfiẓ), 97, 154, 159, 249, 392.

- Ibn al-Ash'ath (Abū Dāwūd), 317.
 Ibn al-Athīr, 112, 179, 188, 214, 227, 231, 233, 323, 406, 407, 409.
 Ibn Azdahal (ArJakhal), 413.
 Ibn al-Azraq al-Fāriqī, 233.
 Ibn Badīān, 332.
 Ibn al-Baladi, 25, 27.
 Ibn Baqiyah (the Wazir), 155, 156, 157, 158.
 Ibn Bashkuwāl, 54, 55, 199, 395.
 Ibn Bāshit:kin, 368.
 Ibn Bassām, 49, 52, 74.
 Ibn al-Basti, 26, 27.
 Ibn al-Bayyī' al-Naysabūri (Ḥakīm), 247.
 Ibn al-Bawāb, 153.
 Ibn al-Dahhān al-Faraḍī, 38, 39, 349.
 Ibn al-Dubaythī, 45.
 Ibn Duqmāq, 230.
 Ibn Durayd, 40, 143.
 Ibn al-Faḍl (Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, 424.
 Ibn al-Furāt (Abu 'l-'Abbas Aḥmad), 5.
 Ibn al-Furāt (Abu al-Faḍl Ja'far), 138, 281, 358, 359.
 Ibn Ḡhalbūn, 34.
 'Abd al-Mūmn (Ibn Ḡhalbūn Abu 'l-Ṭayyib), 341, 346.
 Ibn al-Habbā'iyah (Abu Yalā Muḥammad), 8, 9, 13, 14, 172, 173.
 Ibn al-Ḥaddād Qaysi, 70, 71.
 Ibn al-Ḥaddād (Abū Bakr), 362.
 Ibn Ḥajar, 245, 350, 361.
 Ibn Ḥajjāj, 8.
 Ibn Ḥamadānī, 102, 138, 156, 176.
 Ibn Ḥammād, 284.
 Ibn Ḥārūn al-Munajjim, 150.
 Ibn Ḥayyūs, 333.
 Ibn Ḥazm-al-Zāhiri, 49, 51.
 Ibn Hibat Allāh, 285.
 Ibn Hishām, 211.
 Ibn al-Huzayn (Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Razzāq), 141.
 Ibn Ishāq, 9.
 Ibn Jābir, 329.
 Ibn Jahwar (Abu 'l-Ḥazm), 342, 346.
 Ibn al-Jawālīq, 138.
 Ibn al-Jawālīqī, 420, 421, 422, 423.
 Ibn al-Jawzi, 21, 33, 34, 150, 252, 411.
 Ibn al-Jawzi (Abu 'l-Farj), 101.
 Ibn al-Jazzār, 284.
 Ibn Juljul, 203, 205.
 Ibn Jurayj, 262.
 Ibn Kākūyah (Abū Ja'fer), 99.
 Ibn al-Kalbi, 243, 288, 302, 414.
 Ibn Khākūyah, 327.
 Ibn Khaldūn, 75, 76, 78, 79, 87, 89, 120, 167, 284, 289, 297, 308, 323, 327, 331, 367, 368, 390, 419.

- Ibn Khallikān, 10, 11, 12, 26, 45, 54, 55, 58, 59, 61, 78, 81, 91, 94, 101, 120, 124, 136, 141, 158, 186, 200, 210, 219, 228, 259, 264, 281, 284, 342, 398, 409.
 Ibn al-Khammārah, 173.
 Ibn Khāqān, 60.
 Ibn Kharūf al-Maghribi, 29.
 Ibn al-Khashshāb, (Abū Muḥammad) 341.
 Ibn al-Khashshāb, 421.
 Ibn al-Khayyāt. (Abū 'Abd Allāh), 15.
 Ibn al-Kizani, 318.
 Ibn Mājāh al-Qazwīnī, 248.
 Ibn Makḥūl, 349.
 Ibn Māmūyah, 142.
 Ibn Marwān, 64.
 Ibn Ma'sūd, 317.
 Ibn Miskawah, (Abū 'Alī Aḥmad), 177.
 Ibn al-Mu'allim, 30, 31, 33, 35, 35, 182.
 Ibn al-Munajjim, 127, 130, 375, 376.
 Ibn Munajjim ('Abd Allāh), 307.
 Ibn Munīr, 15.
 Ibn Muqbul, 274.
 Ibn Muqlah, Abū 'Alī Muḥammad), 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154.
 Ibn Mūsā, (Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, 207, 333.
 Ibn al-Mushajjar, 366, 367, 369.
 Ibn al-Mustawfī, (Abū 'l-Barakāt) 108, 112, 347, 348, 387.
 Ibn al-Mu'tazz, 60, 240, 241, 311, 378.
 Ibn al-Nadīm al-Mawṣili, 294, 378.
 Ibn Nadīm, (Abū 'l-Farj) 213.
 Ibn al-Naḥḥas, 331.
 Ibn al-Najjar, 30.
 Ibn Naṣr, 336.
 Ibn Nubātah (Abū Nazr Abd al-Azīz), 138, 140, 141, 163.
 Ibn Qānī', 160.
 Ibn Qānī' (Abū 'l-Ḥusayn), 264.
 Ibn al-Qaysarani, 14, 18.
 Ibn al-Qiftī, (al-Qaḍi al-Akram) 78, 200.
 Ibn Qutaybah, 291, 378.
 Ibn Rā'iq, 150, 151, 152, 154.
 Ibn Ra'īs al-Ruwasā, 196.
 Ibn al-Ramqaram, 329.
 Ibn al-Raḥīq, 284.
 Ibn Rashīq, 284, 290.
 Ibn al-Razzaq, 189.
 Ibn al-Rūmī, 154.
 Ibn al-Ṣabbagh, (Abū Naṣr) 171.
 Ibn al-Sābi, 143, 305, 333, 368.
 Ibn Sa'd, 394.
 Ibn Sa'īd, 79, 200, 202.
 Ibn al-Ṣalāḥ, 247.
 Ibn Salamah (Saliimah), 318.
 Ibn Ṣalīḥ al-Ḥasanī, (Abū 'Abd Allāh), 415.
 Ibn al-Sammāk, 287.

- Ibn al-Sallamah, 59, 63, 64, 67, 68, 69.
 Ibn al-Sam'āni, 2, 5, 14, 15, 30, 173, 176, 193, 249.
 Ibn Shaddād Ṣanhājyan, 284.
 Ibn Shambūdh, 151.
 Ibn Sharaf, 284.
 Ibn Shibl al-Baghdādī, 327, 330.
 Ibn al-Shihāh, 267.
 Ibn al-Šikkīt, 379.
 Ibn Sinān, (Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ṭhābit), 151.
 Ibn Sinān al-Khafāji, 330, 335.
 Ibn Surayj, (Abu 'l-'Abbas) 263, 318.
 Ibn al-Ta'āwīdhī, 4, 22, 23, 25, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 33, 182, 196, 375.
 Ibn Ṭabāṭbā, ('Abd Allāh), 282.
 Ibn al-Ṭahir, 81, 90.
 Ibn al-Ṭīqīqa; 25.
 Ibn Ṭīrad al-Zaynabi, 166.
 Ibn Ṭūlūn, (Ahmad) 90, 160.
 Ibn Tūmart, 78, 80, 82, 83, 85, 88.
 Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 96.
 Ibn 'Unayn, 43, 44, 45.
 Ibn 'Unayn, (Sharaf al-Dīn) 40, 197.
 Ibn Wakī', 345.
 Ibn Yaḥya, 213.
 Ibn Ya'qub, 247.
 Ibn Yūnus, 391.
 Ibn al-Zanjārī, 412.
 Ibn al-Zayyāt (the Wazīr), 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 132, 133, 134, 135.
 Ibn Zubayr, 263.
 Ibn al-Zuwaytinah, 413.
 Ibrāhīm, (Abū 'Abd Allāh) 275.
 Ibrahīm, 334.
 Ibrahīm al-Ṣābi 131, 143, 417, 418.
 Ibrāham Ibn al-alt, 210.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Kayghālīgh, 97.
 Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī, 316.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Ya'qūb al-Jūzānī, 317.
 Iḍḥa, 343.
 Idrīs, 76.
 al-Idrīsī, 127.
 Ifriqiyah, 45, 46, 77, 78, 89, 279, 280, 288, 289, 290, 331, 344, 392, 393, 394, 395.
 Ifshīn, 161.
 al-Ifshīn, 93.
 al-Ikhshīd, 90, 95, 97.
 Ikhtilāf fi al-Dhabīh, 344.
 Ikhtisār Ahkām al-Qur'ān 343.
 Ikhwān (Wakī'), 345.
 Ikmāl, 349.
 Imām al-Dīn Muḥammad, 391.
 Imām al-Ḥaramayn, 229, 231.
 Imra al-Qays, 292.
 India, 41, 220, 223, 226, 227, 230.
 Indian Ocean, 354.
 Iran, 67.
 Isaac, 345.
 Iṣbahān, 5, 14, 99, 142, 189, 196, 222, 233, 249, 254, 327, 419.
 al-Iṣbahīd, 93.

- Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm. 97. 417, 418.
 Ishāq Ibn Kundaj. 90.
 Ishāq Ibn Kāhwayh, 245.
 Ismā'il. (Abū 'Abd Allāh) 265.
 Ismā'il. 345.
 Isma'il al-Qā'im, 47.
 Isma'il Ibn Aḥmad, 326.
 Isma'il Ibn Subuktikin, 224. 225.
 Iṣṭākhar, 240.
 al-Iṣṭākḥri, (Abū Sa'id), 318.
 Itaf, 47, 48.
 Iḍāḥ, 385.
 'Imād al-Dīn, 392.
 'Imād al-Dīn Iṣbahani, 8, 9n, 10, 13, 14, 19, 22, 28, 29, 30, 39, 102, 110, 111, 172, 175, 187, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 195, 196, 197, 202, 232, 234. 257, 330, 390.
 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn Baṭīsh, 264.
 'Imād al-Dīn (Kātib), 102.
 'Imād al-Dīn al-Mawli, 263.
 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn 'Abī Ūmar. 390, 391.
 'Imād al-Dīn Ibn al-Maṣḥṭub, 116.
 al-'Imād al-Wāstī, 412.
 'Imād al-Zinkī, 111, 115, 254. 255, 256, 257, 260, 373.
 al-'Imādiyyh, 191.
 'Iraq. 1, 13, 28, 34, 40, 41, 42, 76, 101, 119, 148, 172, 182, 192, 193, 213, 232, 245, 247, 253, 259, 262, 273, 277. 288, 303, 309, 317, 323, 375, 378, 384, 391, 414, 416, 419.
 'Irāqah, 370.
 'Isa Ibn Maryam, 321.
 'Izz al-Dawlah Baḳhtiar Ibn Mūizz al-Dawlah Buwayh, 155, 156, 157.
 'Izz al-Dīn. Amir, al-Mujallah, 122.
 'Izz al-Dīn, 256, 257, 258, 260, 373.
 'Izz al-Dīn Farrūkh Shāh, 257.
 'Izz al-Dīn Kaykāns, 407.
 'Izz al-Dīn Abu al-Ḥasan Abi al-Aṭḥir (Shaykh), 237.

J

- al-Jabal, 419.
 Jabalah, 97.
 Jabal al-Sūs, 76.
 Jabal al-Tāriq (Gibraltar), 395.
 al-Jadh, 34.
 Jadhīmah, 64.
 Ja'far, 243, 311, 380.
 Ja'far Ibn al-Falāḥ, 96.
 Ja'far Ibn al-Furāt, 96.
 Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān, 301.
 Ja'fr. 83, 89.
 Jāhīr (Juhayr). al-Samnāni, 174.
 al-Jahis, 291.
 Jāḥiḡ, 136.
 Jahm Ibn Ṣaṭwān, 161.
 Jalāl al-Dīn, 188.
 Jalāl al-Dīn Khwārizm Shāh, 118, 409.

Jalulā, 280.
al-Jallis wa'l-Anis, 278. al-Jamāl 'Abd al-Raḥīm, 412.
 Jamāl al-Dīn 185, 187, 373.
 Jamāl al-Dīn al-Isbahānī, 38.
 Jamāl al-Dīn Ibn Taj-al-Muluk
 Buri, 234.
 Jamāl al-Dīn al-Jawad, (Abu Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī
 al-Isbahānī), 184, 339.
 al-Jamāl al-Sibtī, (al-Bastī), 412.
al-Jam'abayn al-Ṣaḥīḥayn, 277.
Jamharah, 40.
Jamharat al-Nisab, 160, 243,
 302, 414.
 Jāmi, 204.
al-Jāmi' al-Kabīr, 384.
 al-Jāmi' al-Nūrī, 235.
 Jāmi' al-Qaṣr (mosque of castle)
 421, 423.
 Jāmi' al-Rāshidī, 367.
 Jāmi' al-Tawbah, 412.
 Jami' al-Uṣul, 188.
 Jamīl (Poet) ; 180.
 Japhets, 399.
 Jarir, 64.
 al-Jawād, 187.
 Jawhar, 95, 96, 281, 282.
 al-Jawhari, 138, 379.
 Jayḥun, 98, 103, 104, 105, 222,
 353, 354, 355, 357.
 al-Jazarī, 91.
 al-Jazīrah, (Mesopotamia) 354, 364.
 al-Jazirat al-Khadhrā, 395.
 Jazirat Ibn 'Umar, 327.
 Jiarbek, 104.

Jirun, 180.
 Jerusalem, 94, 120, 193, 349,
 365, 371.
 Jesus, 63, 93.
 Jisr Banu Munqidh, 334, 335.
 Jizah, 281.
 al-Jizah (al-Jazīrah), 364, 372.
 Jordan, 119, 125, 126.
 Joseph, 63, 285.
 Jubayli, 370.
 Jubul, 126.
Judhwar al-Muqtabis, 393, 405,
 414.
 Juff (Jaff), 90.
 al-Juḥfah, 286.
 al-Junayd Ibn Muḥammad (Shaykh), 265.
 Jurjān, 93.
 Jurjānyah, 222.
 Juzja'n, (Jurjān,) 160, 378.
 Jush Bek Alabek, 253.

K

Ka'bah, 187, 188, 195.
 al-Kabbi, 213.
 Kābul, 349, 350, 352.
 al-Kafawi, 384.
 Kafri Ṭab, 256, 335.
 Kafr Zammār, 259.
 Kāfur al-Ikhshidī, 95, 279, 368.
Kallūh wa Dimnah, 13.
 al-Kallāsah, 411.
 al-Kamāl Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, 411.
 Kamāl-al-Dīn, 21, 384, 390.
 Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-Nibsh, 413.

- Kamal, al-Dīn Abu'l Faḍl
     Ibn al-Sharṭuzūrī, 190, 191.
 Kamāl al-Dīn, Abu'l Faṭḥ
     Musa Ibn Yunus, 213, 383,
     386, 387, 388, 391, 392.
 Kamāliyah, 383.
 Kāmil al-Tawārīkh, (Ibn al-Aṭḥir) 238, 244.
 Kāmil (al-Mubarrad). 299,
     311.
 al-Karkh, 30, 123, 125, 142,
     384, 408, 410, 411, 415.
 Karkh, 216, 288, 384.
 Karkhī, (Abu'l-Ḥasan 'Ubayd
     Allāh), 384.
 Kāshgher, 203, 354, 359.
 Kashghāf, 214, 217, 221, 222.
 Kayfa, 125.
 al-Khābur, 171, 185, 211, 257,
     333, 349, 406.
 al-Khādīm Jamāl al-Dīn Iqbāl, 254.
 Khafajah Ibn 'Amr, 323.
 Khaffan, 240.
 al-Khafāji, 339, 340.
 Khalaf al-Aḥmar, 294.
 Khalaf al-Ḥasan, 49.
 Khalāṭ, 112, 118, 258, 259, 406,
     407, 408, 409, 411.
 Khālīd, Barmaki, 312.
 Khālīd, Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-
     Qaysari, 272.
 Khālīd al-Qaṣḥarī, 253, 274.
 al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad, 374, 375, 378.
 Khāniqān, 288.
 Khāqān, 92.
 Kharīdah, 8, 9N., 10, 13, 14,
     19, 28, 30, 39, 68, 173, 175,
     202, 330, 331, 422.
 Kharīdat al-Qaṣr wa Jarīdat
     al-'Aṣr, 192, 193.
 Kharkh of Juddān, 288.
 Khashabi, 267.
 al-Khāssāh, 97.
 al-Khaṭīb 129, 162, 193, 245, 249, 308, 350, 379, 381.
 al-Khatt, 310.
 Khaṭṭāb, 307, 308, 381.
 Khātūn al-'Iṣmah, 359.
 al-Khawwāshīn, 237.
 Khaydhar Ibn Kāuris, 161, 162.
 al-Khiḍr, 302.
 Khiṭāf, 124, 361.
 al-Khuwarizmi, 220.
 Khazazars, 354.
 Khum, 286.
 Khumārawayh, 90, 91.
 Khurāsān, 5, 41, 98, 99, 100, 103,
     113, 130, 135, 136, 146, 160,
     179, 183, 205, 213, 223, 224,
     225, 226, 231, 245, 265, 267,
     307, 315, 317, 318, 320, 326,
     353, 357, 375, 417, 418, 419.
 al-Kharizmi, 144.
 al-Khushanāmi, (Abn 'Alī Naṣr Aliyah), 265.
 Khuwārizm, 99, 100, 103, 184,
     215, 219, 220, 222, 225, 276.
 Khuwārizm Shāh, 182.
 Khuzistān, 265.
 al-Kia, 76.
 Kindah, 69.

- al-Kindī, 199, 202.
 Kinnānah, 261.
 Kirmān, 14, 99, 184. 205, 319.
 321, 353.
 al-Kisa'i, 38.
 Kisra (Chosroes), 92.
 Kitāb 'Ādiyāt al-'Arab, 296.
 Kitāb al-Aqdād, 296.
 Kitāb al-Aghānī, 132, 312, 313, 414.
 Kitāb Akhbār al-Ḥajjāj, 296.
 Kitāb al-Aḡāb, 252.
 Kitāb al-Anwā, 375, 378.
 Kitāb al-Aqārīb, 295.
 Kitāb al-'Aqqals (Kitāb al-'Iffat),
 296.
 Kitāb al-Asmā al-Khayl, 296.
 Kitāb al-Aḡāb, 204.
 Kitāb al-Aws wa al-Khazraj, 296.
 Kitāb al-Ayādl 'l-'Azd, 295.
 Kitāb al-'A'yān, 295.
 Kitāb al-Ayyām al-Kabīr, 297.
 Kitāb al-Ayyām al-Ṣaghīr, 297.
 Kitāb Ayyām Banī Māzin wa
 Akhbārihim, 297.
 Kitāb al-Bakrah, 296.
 Kitāb al-Bānī, 127, 192.
 Kitāb al-Bārī' 130, 307, 375.
 Kitāb al-Barāhīn, 213.
 Kitāb al-Buldān, 222.
 Kitāb al-Baṣā'ir wa 'l-Dhakā'ir, 148.
 Kitāb al-Bayān bi Ahlihī, 295.
 Kitāb al-Bāzī, 295.
 Kitāb al-Bulh, 295.
 Kitāb al-Buyat al-'Arab, 296.
 Kitāb al-Ḍifān, 295.
 Kitāb al-Dībāj, 295.
 Kitāb al-Dilvī, 295.
 Kitāb al-Faḍā'il al-'Arsh, 296.
 Kitāb al-Farq, 296.
 Kitāb al-Fars, 296.
 Kitāb al-Fa'ala wa al-Af'ala, 296.
 Kitāb al-Fihrist, 213.
 Kitāb al-Futūḥ Irmīniyah, 296.
 Kitāb al-Futūḥ al-Ahwāz, 296.
 Kitāb al-Ghārāt, 296.
 Kitāb Ghrib al-Qur'ān, 375.
 Kitāb al-Ḥajābah wa 'l-Ḥijāb, 28.
 Kitāb al-Ḥammām, 295.
 Kitāb al-Ḥasan (Ibn 'Alī), 297.
 Kitāb al-Ḥayāt, 295.
 Kitāb al-Ḥudr, al-Khayl, 295.
 Kitāb al-Ḥudūd, 295.
 Kitāb al-Ḥumīs Min Quraysh,
 296.
 Kitāb al-Imrīnā' wa 'l-Muwānasah,
 148.
 Kitāb al-Ibānah (Imulali), 344.
 Kitāb al-Ibl, 295.
 Kitāb al-Ihlām, 296.
 Kitāb al-Ijāz, 343.
 Kitāb al-Ikhtilāf fi 'Adood al-
 Ash'ār, 344.
 Kitāb al-Insān, 295.
 Kitāb al-Inshā, 191.
 Kitāb al-Jufr, 79.
 Kitāb al-Jamāhīr al-Qaba'il, 375.
 Kitāb al-Jam'a wa al-Tathnīyah,
 297.
 Kitāb al-Jamī wa 'l-Ṣiffīn, 296.
 Kitāb al-Jawāhīr wa 'l-La'ālī, 138.
 Kitāb al-Kubā, 295.

- Kitāb al-Khabar al-Barrad*, 295.
Kitāb al-Khawārij al-Baḥrayn wa'l Yamāmah, 295.
Kitāb al-Khayl, 295.
Kitāb al-Khuf, 296.
Kitāb Khulq al-Insān, 296.
Kitāb al-Khurāsān, 295.
Kitāb al-Lijan, 296.
Kitāb al-Lughāt, 296.
Kitāb Luṣūṣ al-'Arab, 296.
Kitāb al-Mu'āni, 293, 375.
Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, 291, 349, 378.
Kitāb al-Mahrib, 79, 82, 87.
Kitāb al-Majāz, al-Qur'ān, 293, 295.
Kitāb Makkah, Wa'l-Haram, 296.
Kitāb Man Shukira Min al-Ummat wa Humida, 297.
Kitāb al-Manṣūrī, 204, 205.
Kitāb al-Maqāi'sāt, 147.
Kitāb Maqṭal 'Uthmān, 296.
Kitāb al-Maqātil al-Ashrāf, 296.
Kitāb al-Maqātil al-Fursān, 296.
Kitāb al-Marj Rāhiṣ, 295.
Kitāb al-Mathālib, 296, 298.
Kitāb ma Talḥano Fīhi 'l-'Āmmah, 297.
Kitāb al-Ma'āliḥir Ghaṭfān, 296.
Kitāb al-Māthūr, 343.
Kitāb al-Mawālī, 295.
Kitāb al-Mu'ātabāt, 296.
Kitāb Muḥammad wa Ibrāhīm, 297.
Kitāb al-Mulāwamāt, 296.
Kitāb al-Munāfrāt, 295.
Kitāb al-Munqa' in ilal Allāh, 342.
Kitāb al-Muntaḥil, 143.
Kitāb al-Nawākib, 295.
Kitāb al-Nawāshir, 295.
Kitāb al-Nisab, 76.
Kitāb al-Qirrat al-Ka'bah, 296.
Kitāb al-Quḍāt al-Baṣrah, 296.
Kitāb al-Rahl, 295.
Kitāb al-Risālah, 344.
Kitāb al-Ṣadiq wa 'l Ṣadaqah, 148.
Kitāb al-Sāri, 296.
Kitāb al-Sawād wa Faṭḥihl, 297.
Kitāb al-Shi'r wa al-Shu'arā, 296.
Kitāb al-Shawārid, 296.
Kitāb al-Taj, 144, 295.
Kitāb 'Ulamā al-Amṣār, 247.
Kitāb Umarai Miṣr, 160.
Kitāb al-Waqf, 344.
Kitāb al-Wazirayn, (Abu Hayyan), 141.
Kitāb al-Wuzara, 143.
Kitāb al-Yamīnī, 144.
Kitāb al-Zāhi fī 'l Lunna al-Dāllat ala Musta' matal al-Irab, 343.
Kitāb al-Zārī, 29.
Kitāman, 369.
al-Kiya al-Harrasī, 190.
Kosegarten's Tabri staninsis Annasis, 219, 300.
Kūfah, 5, 40, 45, 94, 153, 160, 208, 209, 240, 270, 287, 305, 326, 350, 352, 355, 417.
Kumayt Ibn Zayd, 272, 273.
Kūmiyah, 80.
Kūnash, 160.

Kundur, 184.
Kurd, 121.
Kurkānj, 222.
Kushūf Wūjse al Qara'at wa 'Ilaliha, 343.
Kushājim, 383.

L

Lak̄hm, 47, 66.
Lebanon, 16.
Life of al-Ḥākim, 134.
Life of Ibn Ammār, 113.
Limlūmah, 58,
Lorca, 68, 396.
Lubna, 71.
Ludhriq (Roderic), 395, 396,
 397, 398, 403, 404.
Lulū, 90.
Lumaḥ al-Mulaḥ, 52.
Luqmān Ibn Āad, 271.
al-Lurqī, (Abu 'l-Ḥasan) 55.
al-Lurqī, (Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ja'far) 55.

M

Ma'an Ibn Zā'idah, 69, 70, 91,
 240, 241, 302, 303, 304, 306,
 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312,
 313, 314.
Ma'āni al-Qur'ān, 295.
al-Ma'arrāh, 256.
al-Madhār, 127.
Madhlawayh, 330.
Madinah, 92, 120, 176, 186, 188,
 240, 284, 285, 286, 293, 301,
 317, 326, 350, 380, 381, 382.
Maghrib (Africa Spain), 75, 80,
 89, 138, 193, 289, 290, 354, 371.

al-Maghrib al-Aqṣā, 79.
al-Maghribi, 422, 423.
al-Mahdī, 38, 75, 76, 78, 81,
 86, 240, 284, 311, 313, 342,
 380, 419.
Mahdi ('Ubayd Allah), 372.
al-Mahdiyyah, 46, 47, 77, 78, 79, 260, 279, 282, 331.
Mahler, 125.
Mahmūd (Sulṭan), 99, 100,
 104, 109, 226, 227, 228, 229,
 231, 233, 253.
Maḥmūd Ibn Muḥammad, 233.
Mahmūd Ibn Naṣr al-Kalābl, 104.
Maḥmūd Ibn Subuktikīn, 98,
 144, 205, 223, 224, 225.
Mā Ittafaq lafzu wa Ifraq
Mosammahu, 138.
Majd al-Dīn, 21.
Majd al-Dīn Abu 'l-Sa'ādat al-
Mubārak, 188, 328.
Majorka, 68.
Majnūn, 180.
Makḥūl, al-Shāmi, 349, 350, 351, 352.
al-Mokin's Hist. Sarucen, 304.
al-Makisīn, 346, 349.
Makkah, 4, 51, 76, 77, 91, 92, 119,
 120, 121, 122, 132, 139, 161,
 168, 175, 179, 186, 187, 194,
 195, 215, 217, 222, 271, 284,
 285, 286, 326, 341, 345, 350,
 354, 359, 406, 416.
Makki Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 340, 342, 343.
Makki al-Ḍarir, 346.

- Malazgird, 406.
 Mālik Ibn Anas, 195, 289, 343.
 Malik Ibn Sa'īd, 365.
 Malik Ibn Wuhayab, 81, 82.
 al-Malik al-'Ādil 41, 42, 43,
     110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115,
     116, 119, 121, 123, 124, 125,
     190, 233, 255, 354, 407, 410.
 al-Malik al-Afḍal, 111, 407.
 al-Malik al-Ashraf, 6, 45, 112,
     118, 119, 120, 124, 261, 406,
     407, 408, 409, 410.
 al-Malik al-Awḥad (Najm al-Dīn), 112, 406.
 al-Malik al-'Azīz 111, 126.
 al-Malik al-Fā'iz Sābiq al-Dīn Ibrāhīm, 116, 117.
 al-Malik al-Jawād, 121, 123.
 al-Malik al-Kāmil, 112, 115,
     116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121,
     122, 407, 408, 409, 410.
 al-Malik al-Ma'sūd, 112, 115, 118, 119, 121, 122.
 al-Malik al-Mughīth, 125.
 al-Malik al-Mu'aẓẓam, 112, 116, 118, 125, 126.
 al-Malik al-Mu'aẓẓam 'Isā, 408, 411. al-Malik al-Mu'aẓẓam (Tūrān shah), 125, 126.
 al-Malik al-Mujāhid Asad al-
     Dīn, 123.
 al-Malik al-Muẓaffar, 44, 258, 408.
 al-Malik al-Muẓaffar Yūsuf, 112, 123.
 al-Malik al-Nāṣir 45, 118, 120, 123, 124, 408.
 al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ, 123, 124, 125, 239, 257, 410, 412, 413.
 al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ Abu'l Fath Mahmūd, 118, 119.
 al-Malik al-Ṣāliḥ 'Imād al-
     Dīn Ismā'il, 119, 123, 124, 125, 191, 238, 255, 256.
 al-Malik al-Ẓāhir Rukn al-Dīn Bībars, 126.
 al-Malik al-Zāhir, 111, 125,
     407, 413.
 al-Ma'la, 122.
 Malik Shah, 9, 16, 100, 105,
     169, 171, 265, 333, 334, 352,
     353, 355, 359.
 Malik Shah Ibn Arsalān, 167,
     184.
 Mallālah, 79.
 Ma'mar, 262.
 Ma'mar al-Muḥannā, 302.
 Manbij, 234, 235, 263.
 Mamlūk, 354.
 al-Mamūn, 59, 101, 105, 207, 208, 209, 245, 333, 375, 378,
     417, 419.
 al-Manūn Yahyah (Ibn Ismā'il), 199.
 al-Mamūn al-Baṭ'āiḥī, 370, 372.
 Manamāt, 422.
 Maṣṣūr (Abū Muḍar), 214,
     220.
 Maṣṣūr al-Tamīmi, 359, 360,
     361, 362.
 al-Maṣṣūr, 46, 48, 69, 206, 301.

303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 315, 316, 362, 363, 380.

al-Manşūr Isnā'il, 45, 280.

al-Manūr Ibn Abi 'Āmir, 341.

al-Manşūrah, 117, 124, 125, 290.

al-Manşuriyah (Sabirah), 280, 290.

Manzil, 213.

al-Maqām, 239.

Maqāmat al-Ḥarīrī, 420.

Al-Maqḍisi, 2.

Ma'qil Ibn 'Abd al-A'lā al-
Qurashī, 351.

Maqqarī, 69, 331.

al-Maqqarī, 340, 396.

al-Maqrizi, 389.

al-Maqrizi's Khīṭat, 122, 124, 363, 368.

al-Maqṣabah, 368.

Marāghah, 254, 327.

al-Marāghī, (Abu'l-Najīb), 3, 4.

Mar'āsh, 234.

Marāsid, 119, 155, 160, 267, 323, 326.

Ma'rifat Muṭāli' al-Burūj, 210.

Marr al-Zahrān, 406.

Marthad, 379.

Māriyāh, 73

Ma'rūf al-Karkhī, 286, 287,
288.

Marw, 102, 106, 248, 265, 314,
315, 316, 320, 375.

Marw al-Rūd, 183, 184.

Marwān, 310, 311, 313.

Marwān, al-Aṣghar, 244.

Marwān, Ibn Abi Ḥaṣṣah, 239,
240, 241, 303, 304, 306, 309,
311, 312, 419.

Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam, 239,
240, 242, 274.

Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, 272.

Mary, 63

al-Marzubāni, 377.

al-Masabdhān, 419.

Masjid, Bani 'l-Najjār, 45.

al-Masjid al-Khārij, 342.

Maslamah Ibn 'Abd al-Malik
273, 325.

Masmūdah, 83, 89.

Mas'ūd, 99, 100, 109, 233, 253,
254, 373.

Mas'ūd Ibn Malik Shah Saljuqi, 252.

al-Mas'ūdi, (Abul Ḥasan 'Ali) 381.

Ma'sūdi, 90.

Maṭar Ibn Sharik, 314.

Mathālib, al-Wazīrayn, 147, 148.

Mattā Ibn Yūnus, 198, 202.

Māwārā al-Nahr, 103.

Mathews, 229, 230.

Mawdūd Ibn Alkutikīn, 253, 255.

Mauritaniah, 289, 290.

al-Māwardi, 101.

al-Maydāni, 274.

Maymūn Ibn Ḥārūn, 127.

Mayyāfāriqīn, 38, 112, 165,
167, 170, 406, 411, 413.

Mazyar Ibn Qarūn, 161n., 205n.

- M. Caussin, 210, 211, 240.
 M. De. Gayangos, 79.
 M. de Sacy, 78, 135, 136, 145,
 147, 180, 186, 203, 243, 244,
 363, 366, 369, 371, 382.
 M. De Slane, 259, 320.
 Memoirs of Geographical Society, 210.
 Meninski, 186.
 Merinides, 84.
 Mesopotamia, 41, 90, 92, 117,
 118, 120, 146, 193, 211, 257,
 328, 349, 359, 407, 408.
 Messiah, 93.
 M. Hamake, 219.
 al-Mihyār Ibn Marzawayh, 163.
 Milyānah, 89.
 Mikāl, 143.
 Mina, 277, 281, 321.
 Minārat al-Qur'ān, 355.
 Minhāj, 215.
 Miqabār, al-Ittisalat, 210.
 Miqrāḍ, al-'Araḍ, 40.
 Mir'āt, 126, 270.
 Mir Khond, 9n., 102, 108.
 Miṣhkāt al-Maṣābiḥ, 229, 230.
 Miṣr, 281, 282.
 al-Miṣṣiṣi, (Abu'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allah), 249.
 Modern Egvpt, 201.
 Almohades 84, 87.
 Almoravides, 84, 87.
 Morocco, 56, 57, 58, 60, 68, 80,
 81, 82, 83, 85, 86, 87, 89,
 388, 394.
 Moses (Mūsa Prophet) 285,
 302.
 Mosul, 90, 108, 116, 146, 154,
 165, 166, 171, 184, 185, 186,
 187, 191, 192, 233, 234, 235,
 253, 254, 256, 257, 258, 260,
 261, 267, 322, 323, 326, 327,
 332, 333, 334, 339, 346, 347,
 348, 349, 373, 374, 383, 384,
 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391,
 406, 413.
 Mount Lebanān, 238.
 Muādh Ibn Muslim al-Harra,
 270, 271, 272, 273, 274.
 Mu'adh Ibn Zayd, 272.
 al-Mu'āfa (Ibn 'Imrān), 349.
 Al-Mu'ofa Ibn Zakariā al-Nahrawani, 275, 349.
 Mu'allaqah, 315, 337.
 Mu'arraḥ, 420.
 al-Mu'arri (Abu 'l-'Ala), 2, 13,
 252, 268.
 Mu'āwiyah, 1, 2, 4, 5.
 Mu'awiyah, (Ibn Abū Sufyan),
 71, 244, 299, 393.
 al-Mubarrad, 244, 294, 299.
 Muḍar, 273.
 Muḍhayyal, 176.
 Mudkhil, 213.
 al-Muḍyya, 334.
 Muṣaṣṣal, 215, 385.
 Mughīrah (Mughayrah, 291).
 al-Muṣṣad wa 'l-Murakkab, 214.
 al-Muṣṣad wa 'l-Muwallaf, 215.
 Mughīth al-Dīn Maḥmūd al-Saljuqi, 232.
 Mughīth, 126.
 Mughīth al-Khalq fi Ikhtiar il-
 Ahqaq, 229.

- Muḥadḍḥab*, 263, 357.
 Muḥḍḥab al-Dīn Ibn 'Umar, 266, 413.
Muḥājāt bi 'l-Masa'il al-Naḥwi-yah, 214.
 Muḥammad (The Prophet), 41, 45, 76, 161, 219, 244, 281, 285, 318, 326, 333, 419.
 Muḥammad, 61, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 97, 107, 108, 109, 117, 129, 131, 230, 231, 238, 289, 366, 380.
 Muḥammad Aḥmad, 207.
 Muḥammad al-Badaq al-Nadīm, 312.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās, 377.
 Muḥammad (Abū 'Abd Allah) Ibn 'Abd Allah, 75.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, (Abū Ja'far), 126.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik (Abū Maṣṣūr), 190.
 Muḥammad (Ibn 'Abd al-Malik) Hamadani, 93, 107, 108, 127, 128, 171, 333, 335.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt, 127, 133.
 Muḥammad Ibn Abū Bakr, 122.
 Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad, 69, 70.
 Muḥammad (Abū Bakar) Ibn Ammār Al-Andalusi, 70.
 Muḥammad Ibn Aswad, 81.
 Muḥammad Ibn Ayyūb Al-Anṣārī, 75.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn, 287.
 Muḥammad al-Iḥṣhīd, 92, 93.
 Muḥammad (Ibn 'Imrān), 129.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Isa, 252.
 Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il, 49.
 Muḥammad Ibn Jābir al-Bat-iāni, 209.
 Muḥammad Ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabari, 278, 288.
 Muḥammad Ibn Ka'b al-Karazi, 270.
 Muḥammad Ibn Khālid, 248.
 Muḥammad (Abū Yaḥya) Ibn Ma'an, 69.
 Muḥammad Ibn Malik Shah, 108, 184.
 Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr, al-Kunduri (al-kindi), 103.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Māsarjisi, 245, 246.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Muḥallab, 375.
 Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad al-Muālim, 246.
 Muḥammad Ibn Muslim al-Zuhri, 315, 334.
 Muḥammad Ibn Mūsā, 120.
 Muḥammad Ibn Naṣr al-Qaysarāni, 186.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Qāsim al-Nuṣhiyāni, 301, 302.
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Rabī', 361, 362.
 Muḥammad Ibn Sahl, 272.
 Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id al-Maṣlūb, 317.
 Muḥammad Ibn Ṭughj, 154.
 Muḥammad (Ibn Tūmart), 76, 78, 79, 80, 89, 93, 371.

- Muḥammad Ibn Yahya, 222,
 246, 247, 248.
 Muḥammad Ibn Zāriq, 416.
 Muḥammad Shah, 233.
 al-Muḥammadiyah, 290.
 Muḥib al-Dīn, 26.
 Mu'īn al-Dīn Ibn 'Abd Allāh,
 234.
 Mu'īn al-Dīn 'Umar, 273.
 al-Mu'izz, 95, 96, 279, 280,
 281, 282, 283, 284, 289,
 290.
 al-Mu'izz li-Dīn Allāh, 278,
 280.
 Mu'izz al-Dawlah Abn Thūmal (Ibn Šāliḥ), 166.
 al-Mu'izziyah, 282.
 Mujaḥid, (Abul Jaysh) Ibn
 'Abd Allāh, 70.
 Mujahid al-Dīn Qāyimāz al-
 Zayni, 256, 257.
 Mujaḥid Ibn Jubayr, 315, 316.
 Mujaḥidiyah, 249.
 al-Mujjalli Ibn 'Uqayb (Ukayth), 334.
Mu'jam al-Ḥudūd, 215.
Mūjaz, 343.
 Mujir al-Dīn Aybik (Urtuḡli)
 234, 239.
 Mukhlīš al-Dawlah, 334, 335,
 336, 340.
 Mukrami, 321.
Mukhtalif, 5, 154.
 Mulūkḥniyā, 364.
 Mundhir Ibn Yahya, 69.
 Mūnis al-Kḥādim, 46.
 M. Munk's MeLanges, 202.
 Munqidh, 338.
Muntakhib al-Ḥijjah, 343.
Muntaqi fi l-Akḥbār, 345.
 Muntaṣir, 362.
Muqaddamāt al-Adab, 215.
 al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab,
 325, 326, 329.
 al-Muqtaḍi, 284, 357.
 al-Muqtadir, 46, 91, 92, 148,
 199.
 Muqallad Ibn Naṣr al-Shayzari,
 188, 323, 334, 335, 338, 339.
 Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān, 314,
 315, 316, 317, 318.
 Muqaṭṭam, 18, 269.
 Muqtaḍi. li Amr Allāh, 166.
 al-Muqtaḍir (Khalīf), 169.
 al-Muqtafī bi. Amr Allāh, 11,
 91, 92, 109, 203, 234, 254,
 265, 420.
 Murcia, 396.
 al-Murtaḍā, 35.
 al-Murtaḍā Ibn 'Asākir, 330.
Murūj al-Dḥahab, 381.
 Murzuban, 90.
 Mūsā, 195, 207, 209, 380, 381,
 391, 404, 405, 406.
 Mūsā al-Kāzim, 379, 380, 381,
 382.
 Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 413,
 417, 418.
 Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-
 Hilāl, 298.
 Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr, 89, 392, 393,
 394, 395, 405.
 Abn Mus'ab al-Zuhri, 424.
Mushkil Ghariḥ, al-Qur'ān, 345.

- Muṣḥkil al-Ma'āniwan Tafsīr*, 345.
Muṣṭarik, 212.
 Muslim Ibn Ḥajjāj al-Qushayri (Imām), 245, 246, 247, 248.
 Muslim Ibn Quraysh, 333, 334.
 al-Musta'li, 376.
 Mustaqṣi, 215.
 al-Mustanjid bi-Allāh, 25, 26, 191, 196.
 al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh, 101, 283, 284, 285, 286, 289.
 al-Mustarshid (Khalīf), 253, 254.
 al-Mustaẓhir, bi-Allāh, 2, 107, 174, 232, 319, 359.
 al-Mutaḍid, 50, 51, 325.
 al-Muṭ'aim, 127.
Mu'taliḥ, 5.
 Mu'tamid al-Dawlah, 323, 326.
 Al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, 47, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 63, 64, 65, 67, 68, 69, 71, 74.
 al-Mu'tamin, 370.
 al-Mutanabbī, 17, 88, 94, 97, 136, 137, 138, 145, 196, 324.
 Muṭarrif Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Shikhkhīr, 263, 264.
 Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin, 261, 262, 263, 264.
 al-Muṭarrizi, 37.
Mutaṣṣibih, Asma al-Ruwāṭ, 214.
 al-Mu'taṣim bi-Allāh 42, 69, 70, 71, 72, 74, 75, 90, 127, 128, 129, 132, 161, 205, 212.
 Al-Mu'tasim, al-Tujībī 69, 75.
 al-Mu'taṣim Ibn 'Abbād, 81.
 Al-Mu'taṣim Ibn Sumādih, 69, 75, 81.
 al-Mutawakkhil, 90, 133, 134, 205, 414, 418.
 al-Mutawallī (Abū Sa'd), 190n., al-Muṭī' lit Allāh (Khalīf), 157.
 al-Muttaqī bi-Allāh, 92, 154.
 al-Muṭṭarif al-Kinānī, 342.
 Muwaffāq, al-Dīn Muẓaffar al-Aylani, 266, 268.
 Muwaffāq Al-Dīn al-Irbili, 35, 37.
 Muwarrīj al-Saūdi, 374, 375, 377, 378, 379,
al-Muwaffā, 424.
 Muwayyad al-Dawlah, 145.
 Muwayyad al-Dīn, 165.
 al-Muwayyad Hishām, 69.
 al-Muwayyad al-'ūsī, 424.
 Muẓaffar, 30, 267, 268, 269, 368.
 Muẓaffar, al-Dīn, 185, 233, 256, 257, 259, 261.
 al-Muẓaffar Ibn Abi 'Āmir, 341.
 al-Muẓaffar Ibn Yāqūt, 149.
 M. Wustenfeld's Gesch., 204.

N

- al-Nābighah, 244, 245, 271.
 Nāblūs, 132, 234, 330, 408.
 Nadirah, 211, 212.
 al-Nadr Ibn Shumayl, 375.
Nahj al-Balāghah, 35.
 Nahrawān, 276.

- Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥya, 222, 246, 247, 248.
 Muḥammad Ibn Zāriq, 416.
 Muḥammad Shah, 233.
 al-Muḥammadiyah, 290.
 Muḥib al-Dīn, 26.
 Mu'in al-Dīn Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 234.
 Mu'in al-Dīn 'Umar, 273.
 al-Mu'izz, 95, 96, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 289, 290.
 al-Mu'izz li-Dīn Allāh, 278, 280.
 Mu'izz al-Dawlah Abū Thūmal (Ibn Ṣāliḥ), 166.
 al-Mu'izziyah, 282.
 Mujāhid, (Abul Jaysh) Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 70.
 Mujāhid al-Dīn Qāyimāz al-Zaynī, 256, 257.
 Mujāhid Ibn Jubayr, 315, 316.
 Mujāhidīyah, 249.
 al-Mujjallī Ibn 'Uqayb (Ukayth), 334.
Mu'jam al-Ḥudūd, 215.
Mūjaz, 343.
 Muḥir al-Dīn Aybik (Urtuḡl) 234, 239.
 Mukhlīṣ al-Dawlah, 334, 335, 336, 340.
 Mukram, 321.
Mukhtalif, 5, 154.
 Mulūkhniyā, 364.
 Mundhir Ibn Yaḥya, 69.
 Mūnis al-Khādīm, 46.
 M. Munk's MeLanges, 202.
 Munqidh, 338.
Muntakhib al-Ḥijjah, 343.
Muntaqī fi l-Akḥbār, 345.
 Muntaṣir, 362.
Muqaddamāt al-Adab, 215.
 al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab, 325, 326, 329.
 al-Muqtaḍī, 284, 357.
 al-Muqtadir, 46, 91, 92, 148, 199.
 Muqallad Ibn Naṣr al-Shayzari, 188, 323, 334, 335, 338, 339.
 Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318.
 Muqattam, 18, 269.
 Muqtaḍī li Amr Allāh, 166.
 al-Muqtaḍir (Khalīf), 169.
 al-Muqtaḍī bi Amr Allāh, 11, 91, 92, 109, 203, 234, 254, 265, 420.
 Murciā, 396.
 al-Murtaḍā, 35.
 al-Murtaḍā Ibn 'Asākir, 330.
Murūj al-Dḥahab, 381.
 Murzuban, 90.
 Mūsā, 195, 207, 209, 380, 381, 391, 404, 405, 406.
 Mūsā al-Kāzim, 379, 380, 381, 382.
 Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 413, 417, 418.
 Mūsā Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Hilālī, 298.
 Mūsā Ibn Nuṣayr, 89, 392, 393, 394, 395, 405.
 Abū Mus'ab al-Zuhri, 424.
Mushkil Gharrīb, al-Qur'ān, 345.

Mushkil al-Ma'āniwan Tafsir, 345.

Mushtarik, 212.

Muslim Ibn Ḥajjāj al-Qushayri (Imām), 245, 246, 247, 248.

Muslim Ibn Quraysh, 333, 334.

al-Musta'li, 376.

Mustaqṣi, 215.

al-Mustanjid bi Allāh, 25, 26, 191, 196.

al-Mustanṣir bi-Allāh, 101, 283, 284, 285, 286, 289.

al-Mustashhid (Khalif), 253, 254.

al-Mustazhir, bi-Allāh, 2, 107, 174, 232, 319, 359.

al-Mutaḍid, 50, 51, 325.

al-Mu'taim, 127.

Mu'talif, 5.

Mu'tamid al-Dawlah, 323, 326.

Al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, 47, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 63, 64, 65, 67, 68, 69, 71, 74.

al-Mu'tamin, 370.

al-Mutanabbī, 17, 88, 94, 97, 136, 137, 138, 145, 196, 324.

Muṭarrif Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Slikhkhīr, 263, 264.

Muṭarrif Ibn Māzin, 261, 262, 263, 264.

al-Muṭarrizi, 37.

Mutashābih, Asma al-Ruwāt, 214.

al-Mu'tasim bi-Allāh 42, 69, 70, 71, 72, 74, 75, 90, 127, 128, 129, 132, 161, 205, 212.

Al-Mu'tasim, al-Tujibi 69, 75.

al-Mu'tasim Ibn 'Abbād, 81.

Al-Mu'tasim Ibn Sumādh, 69, 75, 81.

al-Mutawakkhil, 90, 133, 134, 205, 414, 418.

al-Mutawallī (Abū Su'd), 190n., al-Muṭī' lit Allāh (Khalif), 157.

al-Muttaqī bi-Allāh, 92, 154.

al-Muṭṭarif al-Kināni, 342.

Muwaṭṭiq, al-Dīn Muẓaffar al-Aylani, 266, 268.

Muwaṭṭaq Al-Dīn al-Irbili, 35, 37.

Muwaṭṭij al-Saūdi, 374, 375, 377, 378, 379,

al-Muwaṭṭā, 424.

Muwayyad al-Dawlah, 145.

Muwayyad al-Dīn, 165.

al-Muwayyad Hishām, 69.

al-Muwayyad al-Ḥūsī, 424.

Muẓaffar, 30, 267, 268, 269, 368.

Muẓaffar, al-Dīn, 185, 233, 256, 257, 259, 261.

al-Muẓaffar Ibn Abi 'Āmir, 341.

al-Muẓaffar Ibn Yāqūt, 149.

M. Wustenfeld's Gesch, 204.

N

al-Nābighah, 244, 245, 271.

Nāblūs, 132, 234, 330, 408.

Nadīrah, 211, 212.

al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl, 375.

Nahj al-Balāghah, 35.

Nahrawān, 276.

- Nahr Ja'far, 35.
 Najāḥ Ibn Salamah, 414.
 al-Najāḥī, 93.
 Najd, 307, 309.
 Najm al-Dīn Abū Shukr, 190, 191.
 Najml al-Mubtadi, 247.
 Naqjawan, 261.
 Nasā, 5.
 al-Nasā'i, 262, 316, 317.
 al-Nasā'iḥ al-Kibār, 214.
 al-Nasā'iḥ al-Ṣiḡḡār, 214.
 al-Nāshī, 157.
 Naṣībīn, 171, 185, 257, 323, 327, 331, 332, 407, 413.
 Nasīm, 368.
 Nāṣir al-Dawlah Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad, 155.
 Nāṣir al-Dawlah Abu 'l-Muẓaffar Maṣṣūr, 167.
 Nāṣir al-Dawlah al-Ḥasan Ibn Ḥamadān, 154, 157, 324.
 Nāṣir al-Dīn Ibn al-'Atā, 319.
 Nāṣir al-Dīn Maḥmūd al-Quṭbi Shāh Asmi, 258, 259.
 Nāṣir al-Dīn Wa al-Dawlah, 224.
 Nāṣir Ibn Ismā'il, 101.
 al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allah, 23, 231, 375.
 Naṣr, 161. n.
 Naṣrabād, 247.
 Naṣr al-Dawlah Aḥmad Ibn Marwān al-Kūrḍī, 165, 166, 167.
 Naṣr al-Dīn, 319.
 Naṣr Ibn Malik al-Khuza, 244.
 Naṣr Ibn Sayyār, 160.
 Nassār, 362.
 Nassau hees, 222.
 Natā'ij al-Fitnah, 13.
 al-Nawawī (Imām), 317.
 Naysābūr, 184, 213, 231, 245, 246, 247, 248, 250, 265, 357, 375, 424.
 Naẓm al-Sulūk fi Wazil Muluk, 63.
 al-Nazzām, 362.
 Negrose (Zeng), 73.
 Nihāyat al-Maṭalib, 178.
 al-Nil, 352.
 Nile, 96, 118, 282, 364, 372.
 Nizām, 105.
 Nizām al-Ḥaḍratayn al-Riḍa, 10.
 Nizām al-Dīn (Ibn Marwān), 166.
 Nizam al-Dīn, 166, 167, 174.
 Nizām al-Mulk, 8, 9, 10, 167, 171, 172, 174, 179, 183, 184, 318, 353, 355, 357.
 Nizāmiyah (college), 189, 190, 248, 383, 392.
 Nizār al-'Aziz, 363.
 Nah, 14, 271.
 North Africa 79, 89.
 Noliceset Eytaitis, 144.
 Nūḥ Ibn Maṣṣūr, 223.
 Nūḥ Ibn Naṣr, (Abu Muḥammad), 206.
 Nūḥ Ibn Oays, 351.
 Nujūm, 160, 216, 349, 350.
 al-Nukhaylah, 341.
 al-Nu'mān Ibn al-Mundhir, 47.

al-Nu'mān al-Ghassanī, 244.

Nu'mān, 21.

Nu'mān al-Arak, 4.

Nuqaṭ al-'Arūs, 49.

al-Nuqayb, 91.

Nūr al-Wawlah Ibn Ṣadaqah, 327.

Nūr al-Dīn Abu'l Qāsim Ibn Atābik Zinkī, 190, 191, 193 234, 235, 237, 238, 255, 258.

Nūr al-Dīn Arsalan Shāh, 260, 349, 406.

Nūr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, 249, 373, 374.

Nūriyān Mosque, 373.

Nūshjan, 302.

Nuṣrat al-Fiṭrah Wa 'Usrat al-Fiṭrah, 193.

al-Nuwayri, 78, 87, 160, 288.

Q

Obayd Allah, 91.

Oridbuela, 396.

P

Paris, 163 n., 202 n.

Persian 'Iraq, 419.

Pharaoh, 388.

Plini, 93.

Pbiades, 87.

Prolegomena, 75.

Ptolemy, 137.

Ptolemy's Quadri Partitum, 210.

Q

Qadard, 353.

Qadas, 238.

(Qaḍi) Ṣā'id al-Qurṭubi, 200.

(Qaḍi) Abū Bakr Arrajānī, 220.

Qaḍi Abū Yoūsuf, 242.

al-Qaḍi'l Fāḍil, 110, 192, 193, 194, 221, 236.

al-Qaḍi'l Ṣā'id Ibn Sana al-Mulk, 268.

Qaḍi Ibn Sabr, 275.

al-Qadir bi-Allāh, 55, 223, 225, 231, 223.

Qāḍis (codiz), 400.

al-Qadisi, (Abū 'Abd Allah Aḥmad), 164.

al-Qadisiaya, (marāṣid), 355, 414, 416, 417.

al-Qaffāl al-Marwazī, 229, 230, 231.

al-Qāhir bi-Allāh 92, 148.

Qāhiriya, 389.

al-Qā'im al-'Ubaydī, 45, 46.

al-Qā'im bi Amr Allah, (Imām) 101, 102, 103, 166, 283, 284, 289, 332, 334.

Qairo, (old). 95, 96,

Qalā'id al-'Iqyan, 59.

Qal'at Ja'bar 185, 234.

Qal'at Rahah, 48.

al-Qāmr, 369.

Qāmūs, 315.

Qarāfah, 367.

al-Qarqisiyah, 211.

- Qārūm (Qanūn), 201.
Qaṣīdahs, 137, 138. al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām, 302.
 al-Qaṣr, 108.
 Qaṣr al-Ḥaḍr, 210.
 Qatāḍah, 379.
 Qaṭayī, 90.
 Qaṭari Ibn al-Fuja'ah, 29.
 Qayrawān, 280, 284, 290, 340, 341, 395.
 Qayṣar (Caesar), 92, 93, 389.
 Qays, 195, 261, 349.
 Qays 'Aylani, 269.
 Qays Kubbah, 269.
 Qays Ibn 'Ārim al-Minqari, 314.
 Qayssariyah, 18, 390.
 Qazwīn, 327, 392.
 Qiblah, 229, 230, 362.
 Qinnisrīn, 90.
 Qirwāsh, 166, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 331, 332.
 Qisṭās, 215.
 Quatremere, 283.
 Qubbat al-Tāj, 107.
 al-Qubbar, 177.
 al-Qud'āī (Abū 'Abd Allāh) 361.
 al-Qumāmah, 365, 371.
 al-Qummi (Abd 'Alī), 136.
Qur'ān, 55, 57, 60, 76, 83, 85, 130, 136, 151, 153, 176, 177, 214, 217, 221, 226, 228, 230, 231, 235, 236, 237, 238, 246, 247, 249, 257, 263, 266, 270, 271, 28, 293, 294, 302, 313, 340, 341, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 366, 367, 379, 380, 385, 388, 424.
 Quraysh, 250, 332.
 Quraysh Ibn Badrān, 166.
 al-Qurṭubī, (Abu Bakr Yaḥyā) 383.
 al-Qurṭubī, Abu 'l-Qasim Sa'id Ibn Aḥmad, 199.
 Qūs, 195.
 al-Qushayrī, (Abu'l-Qāsim), 179.
 Quṭbal-Dīn al-Naysābūrī, 248, 249, 250.
 Quṭb al-Dīn al-Ghāzi Ibn Albi, 259.
 Quṭb al-Dīn Mawdūd, 187, 254, 255, 373, 374.
 Quṭb al-Dīn Al-Marwazi, 265.
 Qutlūmish (Sulṭān), 333.
 Quzul, 261.

R

- al-Rabadhah, 175.
 al-Rabī', 263, 380.
Rabī al-Abrār, 214.
 Rabi'a Ibn Ja'far, 243.
 al-Raḍī, 59, 92, 97, 121, 149, 150, 151, 152, 252, 326.
 Raḍī al-Dīn al-Qazwīnī, 392.
 Rāfiḍī, 418.
 al-Rahabah, 171, 185, 235, 333.
 al-Rā'i, 29.
 Rājiḥ al-Ḥillā, 413.
 Rāmāh, 72.
 Ramlah, 92, 94, 97, 244, 361.
 al-Raqqah, 118, 209, 256, 257, 263, 302, 325, 407, 408.

Rās 'Ayn, 325, 359, 361, 408.
 al-Rashīd, 253, 254, 330.
 al-Rashīd 'Ubayd, 54.
 Rasmussen's Additamenla, 730, 240.
Rauḍah, 372.
al-Rawḍah, 124, 364.
 Ray, 100, 102, 106, 138, 143, 146, 203, 205, 317, 327, 357, 419.
 Rayyān, 349.
 al-Rāzi, 198, 202, 205, 206, 384.
 Rāzi Fakhr al-Dīn, 44.
 al-Rāzi (Abū Bakr Ibn Zakariya) 203, 204, 205, 223.
Riḡāh bi Tajwīd al-Qur'ān, 343.
 Riḡā al-Dīn al-Quzwīnī, 383.
 al-Ridād, 219.
al-Risālat al-Naṣīḥah, 215.
al-Riyāz, 345.
 Rosenmüller's Analecta Araba, 315.
 Rudhrāwar, 175, 178.
 al-Rudhrāwarī, 174, 177, 178.
 al-Rūhā (Edesa), 406, 408.
 Rukn al-Dīn Ṭuḡhrulbek, 98.
 Rukn al-Dawlah, 135, 141, 142, 145, 146.
 al-Rūm, 407, 409, 410.
 al-Rundah, 59.
 al-Ruṣāfah, 138.
Ru'ūs al-Masā'il, 215.

S

Sadīd, al-Dawlah, 335.
 al-Sadīd al-Salamāsi, 383.
 al-Saffāh, 305.
 Sa'id, 120, 244, 298, 392.
 al-Sa'id, 46, 157, 269.
 Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, 350.
 Sa'id Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān, 291.
 Sa'id Ibn al-Āṣī, 350.
 Sa'id Ibn al-Muṣayyib, 350.
 Salāmiyah, 46.
 Salīm Ibn Ahwar al-Māzīnī, 161.
 Saljāq, 108, 109, 178, 186, 193, 194, 232, 261, 327.
 Salm al-Khāsir, 312.
 Samarqand, 103, 220, 262.
al-Sam' al-Ṭabl'i, 199N.
 al-Sam'ānī, 148, 178, 179, 220, 265.
 al-Samawal Ibn 'Ādiyāh, 240. al-Sanābik, 194.
 Satarem, 49n.
 al-Saqāṭi, 382.
 Sāqī al-Furāt, 323, 326.
 Sardāniah, 280, 281.
 Sarī al-Saqāṭi, 287.
 Sāpūr ḡhul Aktāf, 211.
 Sarra-Man-Raā, (Samarrah) 90, 204.
 Saruj, 257, 333, 408.
 al-Satirun, 210, 211.
 al-Sawād, 356, 414.
 Sawād of Irāqī, 119.
Sawā'ir al-Amthāl, 215.
Sawākin, 221.
 Sayf al-Dawlah, 17, 107, 200, 201, 202, 323, 325.

Sābūr Ibn Ardāshīr, 170, 212.

- Sayf al-Dawlah, Ibn Naşîr al-Dawlah, 223.
 Sayf al-Dîn Ghâzî, 185, 234, 256, 373.
 Sayf al-Islâm Tuğhtikin, 41. 44.
 Sayhûn, 103.
 Sayl 'ala 'l-Dhayl, 193.
 Sclavonia, (Tashtikin), 368.
Scriptorum Arabum, 69.
 Seville, 47, 48, 49, 52, 58, 331.
Shabbah, 349.
 al-Sha'bi, 350.
Shâdil, 349, 350.
Shâfi'i, 118, 179, 203, 215, 229, 261, 261, 262, 263, 264, 315, 317, 359, 361.
Shâfi 'l-'Ayyimin Kalâm al-Shâfi'i, 215.
Shahrâb, 350.
 al-Shahhânî, (Abû Bakr Wajih Ibn Tahir) 424, Shahrûzûr, 261, 288.
 al-Shâhid Fi' 'Ilm al-Farâid, 214.
Shams al-Dîn Bihliwân, 259, 261.
Shams al-Dawlah, 125.
 al-Shaqâ'iq al-Nu'mân, 215.
 al-Sharât, 91.
Sharf al-Dawlah, 323, 332.
Sharif al-Dîn, Anûshîr, 253.
Sharf al-Dîn Abû Ja'far Aḥmad Tamîmî, 25.
Sharaf al-Dîn Abû 'l-Qâsib 'Alî Ibn Tirad al-Zamânî, 109.
Sharf al-Dîn Aḥmad, 391.
Sharaf al-Dîn, 'Isâ, 41.
Sharf al-Dîn, Ibn Abî 'Uşrûm, 235.
Sharf al-Dîn 'Unayn, 330.
Sharf al-Dîn Muḥammad, 413.
Sharḥ al-Tamâm wa l-waqf, 345.
 al-Sha'ri, 219.
 al-Sharîf al-'Abîd, 76.
Sharîf Abû Ja'far Mas'ûd al-Bayâḍî, 250, 252.
Sharîf Ḥasan Ibn Qatâdah, 129.
Sharîf al-Murtadâ, 165.
 al-Sharqiyah (East Mesopotamia) 112, 119.
 al-Sharrâ, 114.
 al-Shâsh, 203.
 al-Shawbak, 408.
 al-Shawbik, 125.
Shaybân, 302, 306, 307.
Shayzar, 335.
Shibil al-Dawlah (Abû 'l-Hayjâ), 318, 319, 320, 321.
Shifyah, 326.
Shihâb al-Dawlah Qutulmish, 104, 167.
Shihâb al-Dîn Ghâzî, 411.
 al-Shirâzî (Shaykh) Abn Ishâq, 175, 276.
Shirâzî (Shazarî), 188.
Shirwân, 302.
Shu'bah Ibn al-Ḥajjâj, 316, 374.
Shuḍûr Shuḍhûr al-'Uqûd, 101.
Shûnîzî, 30, 265, 382.
Shurâḥîl, 241, 242.
Shus, 260.

- Sili, 323.
 Sibawayh, 375, 385.
 Sibtah (centa), 279, 412.
 Sibṭ al-Tawḥīdī, 152.
 Sicily, 123n., 284.
 Sidon, 371.
 Sijilmāssah, 279, 372.
 Sijistān, 226, 262, 274, 299, 304, 308.
 al-Sijistānī, 361.
 al-Silafi, 217, 218, 219, 366.
 Sinān, 235, 237.
 Sind, 227, 350, 352.
 al-Sindi Ibn Shā'ikh, 383.
 Sinj 'Abbād, 265, 266.
 Sinjār, 102, 106, 117, 123, 171, 208, 209, 233, 254, 255, 258, 261, 323, 334, 359, 373.
 Sinjar, Ibn Malik Shāh, 265.
Sirat al-Mulūk al-Maghrib, 79.
Sirat al-Rasūl, 211.
al-Sirr al-Maktūm, 192.
 al-Sirawān, 417, 419.
 Sitt al-Shām, 412.
al-Siyāsat al-Madaniyah, 200.
 Sirjiāh, 141n.
 Solomon, 404, 405.
 Spain, 47, 48, 49, 52, 54, 56, 57, 58, 66, 68, 69, 70, 74, 75, 79, 81, 84, 193N. 203, 220, 279, 340, 341, 367, 395, 396, 398, 399, 400, 401, 403, 404, 405, 414.
 Subuktikīn, 223, 224, 232.
 Su'dā, 220.
 Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah, 316.
 Sulaymān, (Ibn 'Alī), 10.
 Sulaymān (Brother of Idrees), 76, 104.
 Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 405, 406.
 Sulaymān, Ibn Fahd, 329.
 Sulaymān Ibn Ḥasan (Abū Daud), 203.
 Sulaymān Ibn Qutulmish, 106.
 Sumaysāt, 407.
 al-Sumadihiyah, 69.
 Sūs, 394.
 al-Sūs, 79.
 Sūshah, 47.
 Susmān, 226.
 Suwayd, 368.
 al-Suyūṭī, 297.
 Syria, 18, 28, 33, 41, 47, 90, 91, 92, 94, 95, 96, 104, 110, 112, 114, 115, 118, 120, 126, 146, 182, 192, 193, 234, 235, 239, 245, 249, 255, 256, 257, 258, 267, 273, 280, 309, 317, 328, 335, 349, 350, 354, 355, 371, 373, 384, 391, 405, 409, 410, al-Ṣābi (Abu'l-Ḥasan), 143.
 al-Sāhi, (Abū Ishāq), 157.
 Sabrah, 280n., 290.
 Ṣād, 247n.
 Sadaqah Asadi, 13, 14, 107.
 al-Sa'dī, 262.
al-Ṣādiḥ, wa 'l-Bāghim, 13.
 Sādiq or Siddiq, (Shaykh) Ibn Badr, 121, 122.
 al-Ṣaffar (Abu'l Walid), 342.
 Ṣaḥī al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad Ibn Shukr, 267.

- Şafıyyah, 34n.
 Şahāḥ al-Ḥāzimi, 138.
 Sāhib Ibn 'Abbād, 136, 137, 142, 144, 159, 162, 314.
 Şāḥiḥ Bukhārī, 424.
 al-Şāḥiḥ, (Muslim), 245, 246, 424.
 Salāḥ al-Dīn, (Sultān), 28, 33, 38, 41, 42.
 Sulṭān, 110, 111, 112, 115, 118, 182, 191, 192, 193, 196, 234, 235, 237, 239, 249, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 267, 389.
 al-Şāliḥ Ṭalā'i' Ibn Ruzziq, 339.
 Şāliḥ Ibn Manşūr, 205, 403.
 Şamīm al-'Arabıyyah, 215.
 Şan'ā, 262, 263.
 Şanhājāb, 288.
 Şanhājıyān, 331.
 Şārim al-Dīn Qā'imāz al-Mas'ūdī, 122.
 Şawān, 410.
 Şawān, al-Ḥukam fī Ṭabaqat al-Ḥukāmah, 199.
 Şifīn, war of 71.
 Şilat, 55.
 al-Şūlī (Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Yaḥyā), 209.
 Şurr-Durr, 33, 168, 173, 174, 252.
- T
- Ta'asīf (Abū 'l-Qasim), 389.
 Tabnīn, 371.
 Tabriz, 102.
 Tabşiralı, 343.
 Tabūk, 91.
 Taḏhib, 350.
 Taḥḏıhib al-Asmā, 317.
 Tāj al-Dawlah, 334.
 'Iāj al-Dīn al-Kindi, 39.
 Tajārīb al-Umam, 177.
 Tāju 'l-Mulk Abu 'l-Ḡhanā'im, 9, 12.
 Takmilah, 385.
 al-Takmilah, 420.
 Talavesa, 55.
 Tal Bani Sayyar, 325.
 Ta'liqah fī 'l-Khilāf, 386.
 Tall A'Far, 327.
 Tall Rāhiṭ, 41, 42.
 Tall Tawbah, 332.
 Tamīm, 282, 288, 416, 417, 414, 415.
 Tamīm al-Dārmī, 393.
 Tangiers, 394, 395.
 Tanzih al-Malāikah al-Ḍḥunūb, 344.
 Taqī al-Dīn (Shaykh), 247, 412.
 Taqī al-Dīn Ibn Şalāḥ, 387.
 Tatarā, 278.
 Tārīkh al-Ḥukamā, 205n, 218.
 Tāsīs al-Taqdīs, 113.
 Tasmiyat al-Aḥzāb, 345.
 Tawānāh, 259.
 Tawfiq Ibn Muḥammad, 14.
 al-Tha'ālībī, 136, 143, 145, 153, 192, 346.
 Tha'lab Ibn Dūdān, 414.
 Tha'labah, 165.
 al-Tha'labi (Abū Ishāq), 424.

- al-Ṭha'labiyah, 414.
 al-Ṭharthār, 211.
Ṭhawr, 161n.
 al-Ṭhawrī, 299.
Ṭheodora, 101.
 Tiberias, 91.
 Tigris, 26, 155, 186, 210, 211,
 323, 358, 390, 415.
 Tihāmāh, 292, 307, 309.
 Tikīn, 91, 92, 97.
 Tikrī, 191, 210.
 Tin-Mall, 83, 85, 89.
 al-Tirmidhī, 245, 248.
 Toledo, 55, 56, 199, 399, 403,
 405.
 Transoxiana, 41, 98, 100, 103,
 225, 320.
Travel in Arabia, 122.
 Tripoli, 78, 97, 238, 370, 392.
 Tubba', 92.
 Tudmīr, 396.
 Tujibī, 75, 90, 91.
 Tumarat, 89.
 Tumin, 48.
 Tunis, 331, 344, 392.
 al-Tūr (Tabor), 126.
 Tūri, 97.
 Turkamān, 167.
 Turkān Khātūn, 91n.
 Tutush, 106, 234, 355.
 Tūzar, 281n.
 Tyre, 371.
Ṭabāqāt, 127, 200, 202.
Ṭabāqāt al-Fuqahā, 262, 276, 360.
Ṭabāqāt al-Ḥanafīyah, 384n.
Ṭabāqāt al-Qurrā, 342, 344.
Ṭabāqāt al-Shāfi'in, 249, 362.
Ṭabāqāt al-Shū'āra, 240, 311.
 al-Ṭabari, 205, 212, 318.
 al-Ṭabarī (Abu 'l-Ṭayyab), 275, 276.
 Ṭabaristān, 93.
 al-Ṭahāwī, 293, 361, 362.
 Ṭahyā (Ḥayyā), 245.
 al-Ṭā'i, 157.
 al-Ṭā'i' bi Allāh, 323.
 Ṭā'if, 4.
 Ṭalḥah, 34.
 al-Tara'fī (Abu 'Abd Allāh),
 342n.
Ṭarīqāh, 222.
 Ṭāriq Ibn Ziyād, 394, 395, 396,
 397, 398, 404, 405.
 Ṭal-irimmāh, 272, 273.
 Ṭughj Ibn Juff, 95, 106.
 al-Ṭughhrā'i (Abū Ismā'il), 253.
 Ṭughhrulbek, 100, 101, 102, 103,
 104, 178, 182, 231, 233, 332.
 Ṭughtikīn, 234.
 al-Ṭulayṭib, 55.
 Ṭuraythīth, 184, 250.
 al-Ṭurtūshī, 76.
 Ṭūs, 9, 26, 100, 224, 355, 424.
 Ṭushānah, 48.
 al-Ṭūsī (Shaykh Sharf al-Din), 388.

U

- Ughustās, 93.
 Umayyah, 311, 350, 367.
 Umayyah Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz, 331.

- Umm 'Awf, 352.
 Umm Khayr, 424.
 Umm Mawdūd, 19.
 Urtugh Ibn Aksab, 167,
 Urtuq, 119.
 Usāmah Ibn Munqidh, 172, 252,
 374.
 Usāmah Ibn Murshid, 335.
 Ushmūm, 117, 124.
 Ushmunayn, 46.
 Ushrushnah, 93 n.
 Uṭrār, 203.
 'Ubayd Allāh, (Abu l-Qasim), 60, 289.
 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Ma'mar, 298.
 'Ubayd Ibn al-Ḥusayn, 297.
 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Tughi, 94.
 'Uddat al-Dawlah, 324.
 al-'Ughayb, 33.
 'Ukāz, 195.
 'Umān, 310, n.
 'Umar, 89, 243, 326.
 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, 274, 369.
 'Umar Ibn al-Ghallās, 313.
 'Umar Ibn Khattāb, 196, 242,
 301, 326, 406, 417.
 'Umar Ibn abi Rabiyyāh, 301.
 'Umar Ibn Shabbāh al-Numayri, 291.
 'Umārat al-Yamāni, 339.
 'Umrah, 122.
 'Umayd, 135.
 'Uqayl, 332.
 'Uḥmān Ibn, Sād (Abu Sa'id), 344.
 'Uḥman Ibn 'Affān, 239, 240, 350, 367.
 'Uḥmān Ibn Abi Shaybah,
 270.
 'Unayn, 47, 112.
 'Urwah Ibn 'Utbah al-Tabrizi, 295.
 al-'Utaqi, 96.
 al-Utbi, 144, 223, 228.
 'Uyūn al-Siyar, 93, 138, 156.
 'Uyūn al-Tawārikh, 160.
 al-'Uzayb, 355.

V

- Valencia, 70.
 Vullers (Professor), 102.

W

- Wādial-Qura (Marr al-Zahrem,
 406.
 Waki' Ibn Jarrāh, 317.
 Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 393,
 394, 397, 404, 405.
 Walid Ibn Yazid, 161. n.
 al-Wansharesi, 80, 85, 86, 87, 89.
 al-Wāqidi, 317, 349.
 al-Wāqisala 355, 359.
 Wāqisat al-Ḥarūn, 359.
 al-Waqshi, (Abu 'l-Walid), 55,
 Warshān (Warshan), 344.
 Washqah, 75.
 Wāsiṭ, 162, 165, 168, 190, 272,
 303, 352, 413.

Wāṭhilah Ibn al-Aṣḥqa (Wāilah Ibn al-Asqā), 350.
Wāṭhimah Ibn Musā, 61.
al-Wāṭhiq, 132, 133.
Woepeke, 163 n.
Wujūb al-Qara'āt, 343.

Y

Yabrīn, 33, 182, 273.
al-Yāf'i, 126.
Yafisānī, 234.
Yaḥsubī (Abu Mohammad Abdullah), 55.
Yaḥya al-Muta'li, 48.
Yaḥyā al-Naysabūri, 245.
Yaḥyā Ibn Abu Ḥaṣṣah Abū
Jamīl, 245.
Yaḥyā Ibn Akhtam, 375.
Yaḥyā Ibn Jarraḥ, 117.
Yaḥyā Ibn Khālid Barmakī,
241, 242, 312.
Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in 261, 317.
Yaḥya Ibn Maṣṣūr, 115.
Yaḥyā Ibn S'aid, 275.
Yaḥyā Ibn Tamīm, 77, 78.
Yaḥyā Ibn Zayd, 160.
Yaltikin, 97.
Yamāmah, 310, 325.
Yaman, 41, 42, 92, 112, 119,
120, 121, 261, 262, 283, 304,
313.
Yamīn al-Dawlah, 223.
al-Yamīni, 228.
Yāqūt al-Ḥamavī, 212, 222,
288.
Yārūq, 407.

al-Yaruqiyah, 407.
al-Yās, 269.
Yāsi Hamārah (Bani Jumān),
409.
al-Yasiriyah, 417.
Yatimah, 136, 143, 145, 153,
192.
Yawm Aghmās, 299.
Yawm Aghhwāth, 299.
Yaum al-Tamjz, 86.
Yawm Armath, 299.
Yazīd Ibn 'Abd-al-Malik, 274.
Yazīd Ibn Hubayrah al-Fazāri, 303.
Yazīd Ibn Zā'idah, 309.
(Abū Muhammad Yaḥya) al-
Yazīdī, 38.
Yūhannā Ibn Kharylan (Jabalād), 198, 199.
Yūnus Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 342.
Younus Ibn Shams al-Dīn Mawdūd, 121.
Yūsuf al-Khuwārizmī, 105.
Yūsuf Ibn Tā'shfin, 57, 58, 60,
74, 81.
Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi,
160.

Z

al-Zabbi, 262.
Zabid, 119, 120.
Zābulistan, 106.
al-Zāhirah, 341.
al-Zātra, 53, 54.
Za'im al-Ru'asā, (Abu 'l-Qāsim)
167, 174.

- Zakariyā Ibn Yahya al-Sāji,
     317.
 Zaki al-Dīn 'Abd al-'Azīm,
     392.
 Zakī al-Dīn al-Mundhri (Shaykh
     264, 268.
 Zakhkhā, 333.
 al-Zallāqah, 57.
 Zama<sup>kh</sup>shar, 219, 222.
 al-Zama<sup>kh</sup>shari, (Jār Allāh)
     214, 215, 216, 217, 218,
     219, 220, 221, 222, 320,
     385.
 Zamzam, 183, 195.
 Zarqā Al-Yamāmah, 180.
 al-Zarwah, 186.
 Zawrā, 251.
 al-Zavriyat al-Gharbiyah, 249.
 Zayd, 157, 159, 160, 272.
 Zayd Manāt, 299.
 Zaynab, 10, 219.
 al-Zaynabi, 423.
 Zayn al-Dawlah, 331.
 Zayn al-Dīn, 37, 185, 187, 233,
     383.
 Zayn al-Dīn 'Ali K<sup>ng</sup>hak, 374
 Zayniāh, 383.
 Zenay (Seneqal), 288.
 Ziad Ibn Mu'āwiyah, 243.
 Zij, 386.
al-Zij al-Sabi, 209, 210.
Zinat al-Dahr, 92.
 Zinjān, 419.
 Zinki Ibn 'Āq Sunqur (atabek)
     184, 185.
Zubad al-Tawārikh, 106.
Zubadat al-Nusrar wa Nak-
hat al-Ussal, 194 N.
 Zubaydah, 172, 274.
 al-Zubayr, 34.
 Zuhayr, 70.
 Zuhayr Ibn Abi Sulmah, 315.
 al-Zuhri, 350.
 Zunj, 90.
 al-Zuqāqayn, 341.
 al-Zūzani, 198, 199, 200, 202, 337.
 al-Ẓāfir Muḥammad, 48.
 al-Ẓāhir, 366.
 Ẓāhir al-Dīn Ṭuḡhtikīn, 234.
 al-Ẓāhir al-Jazari (al-Ṭāhir), 329, 330, 331.

Ibn Khallikan's

WAFAYAT AL-A'YAN

WA ANBĀ' ABNA' AL-ZAMĀN

(A Biographical Dictionary)

Vol. 6

Eng. Translation
M. de Slane

Edited by
Dr. S. Moinul Haq

BASIC CONCEPTS OF THE QUR'AN

By MAULANA ABUL KALAM AZAD

Translated by DR. SYED ABDUL LATIF

Being a Resume of the views advanced by him in his Commentary of the Surat-ul-Fatiha, the opening chapter of the Qur'an

The volume sets out on a brief canvas the ideology of the Qur'an as estimated by the late Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and should serve as an illuminating Introduction to the Study of the Qur'an.

ISBN 81-7151-217-8 23x36/16 pp. 16+118 1996

Book Code No. B00075

Rs 60/-

AN ORIENTAL BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

T. W. BEALE

Thorold's Oriental Biographical Dictionary, revised and enlarged by H. G. Keene, is still the most comprehensive work of its kind. It provides detailed biographical information on the main figures in the history of the East from the fifth century A.D. to the nineteenth century.

The Dictionary is an outstanding work of scholarship and has been widely acclaimed by Orientalists, poets and historians all over the world. It is indispensable for scholars and students of the history of Muslim India, consisting as it does material gathered from Persian, Arabic, Urdu and European sources. The history of the Maratha and Rajput States and Kingdoms is also covered in full detail. Students of Muslim India's art, music and literature will find much of great interest and use in the volume.

More than 4500 entries are listed according to the English variant of each individual's name together with their Persian form in the parenthesis.

ISBN 81-7151-214-3 20x26/8 pp. 8+432 1996

Book Code No. O00018

Rs. 300/-

KITAB BHAVAN

1784, Kalan Mahal, Darya Ganj

New Delhi-110002 (India)

Phones : 3274686, 3277392-93

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Ibn Khallikan's
Wafayat al-A'yan

wa
Anbā' Abna' al-Zamān
(A Biographical Dictionary)

(M. de Slane's English Translation)

VOLUME VI

Edited by:

S. MOINUL HAQ

M.A., Ph.D.

KITAB BHAVAN

New Delhi - 110002 (India)

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers
1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj
New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set
ISBN 81-7151-176-7 (Vol. VI)

First Published in India      1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan
1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj
New Delhi-110002

Printed in India at:

Johar Offset Printers
Maujpur, Ghonda
Delhi-110053

NOTE ON transliteration

ا = a	د = d
ب = b	ت = t
ع = t	ز = z
ث = th	ع = ' (silent)
ج = j	غ = gh
ح = h	ف = f
خ = kh	ق = q
د = d	ك = k
ذ = dh	ل = l
ر = r	م = m
ز = z	ن = n
س = s	و = u; w; aw
ش = sh	ه = h
ص = s	ي = i; y; ay

Long vowels : ā, ī, ū

Short vowels: a, i, u

CONTENTS

No.		PAGE
729	Nāfi', the Mawlā of Ibn 'Umar	1
730	Nāfi', the Qur'ān-Reader	2
731	Al-Muṭarrizī, the Philologist	4
732	Al-'Aziz al-'Ubaydi	6
733	Naṣr al-Klubzāruzzī	11
734	Naṣr al-Numayrī	18
735	Ibn Qalāqis	20
736	Ḍiyā al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhīr	24
737	Al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl	34
738	The Imām Abū Ḥanīfah	41
739	The Qāḍīs of the Nu'mān family	52
740	Al-Sayyidah Nafisah	63
741	Ibn al-Shajari	64
742	Al-Badī' al-Aṣṭurlābi	69
*743	Ibn al-Qaṭṭān the Poet	73
744	Al-Qāḍī al-Sa'īd Ibn Sanā al-Mulk	81
745	Hibat Allāh al-Būṣīrī	86
746	Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Talmīdh	88
747	Hārūn Ibn 'Alī 'l-Munajjim	98
748	Hishām Ibn 'Urwah	100
749	Hishām Ibn al-Kalbī	102
750	Hishām al-Ḍarīr, the Grammarian	106
751	Al-Farazdaq, the Poet	107
752	Hilāl al-Ṣābī	126
753	Al-Haytham Ibn 'Adī	132
754	Wāṣil Ibn 'Aṭā	143
755	Wathīmah Ibn Mūsā	148
756	Al-Buḥturi, the Poet	159
757	Al-Walid Ibn Ṭarīf	173

CONTENTS

No.		PAGE
758	Wahb Ibn Munabbih	177
759	The Qāḍi Abu 'l-Bakhtari	179
760	Yārūq al-Turkumānī	185
761	Yāqūt al-Mawṣili, the Penman	187
762	Yāqūt al-Rūmī, the Poet	190
763	Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī	196
764	Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in	213
765	Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā	218
766	Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham	223
767	Yaḥyā Ibn Mu'ādh	246
*768	Yaḥyā Ibn Mandah	249
*769	Ibn Sa'dūn al-Qurṭubī	252
770	Yaḥyā Ibn Ya'mar	254
771	Al-Farrā, the grammarian	258
772	Abū Muḥammad al-Yazīdī	266
773	Al-Tibrizī	275
774	Ibn Mu'ṭī al-Zawāwī	283
775	Yaḥyā Ibn al-Munajjim	283
776	Abū Bakar Ibn Baqī	288
777	Mu'in al-Dīn al-Ḥaṣkafī	292
778	Yaḥyā Ibn Tamīm al-Ṣanhājī	297
779	Yaḥyā the Barmakid	306
	INDEX	319

* Serial numbers misprinted in the text.

IBN KHALLIKAN'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

729 NĀFI', THE MAWLĀ OF IBN 'UMAR

Abū 'Abd Allāh Nāfi', the mawlā (or freedman) of Ibn 'Umar (No. 243, note.) was a native of Daylam. He (was taken prisoner and) came into the possession of Ibn 'Umar in one of the latter's campaigns. As a Tābi'i he held the first rank, and, as a traditionist, he had for teachers his patron (Ibn 'Umar), and Abū Sa'id al-Khudrī (No. 396, note). Traditions were delivered on his authority (by his disciples) al-Zuhri (No. 590, note), Ayyūb al-Sakhtiyānī (No. 539, note), and Mālik Ibn Anas (No. 524). He had a high reputation as an exact traditionist and ranked among those trustworthy narrators whose accounts were eagerly listened to, carefully collected and taken as rules of conduct. The greater part of the Traditions delivered by Ibn 'Umar repose on the authority of Nāfi's statements. Mālik said: "When I heard Nāfi' deliver a Tradition on the authority of Ibn 'Umar, I had not the least wish of hearing the same Tradition from any one else." A saying current among the learned in the science of Traditions is: A relation made by al-Shāfi'i on the authority of Mālik, and by him on the authority of Nāfi', and by him on the authority of Ibn 'Umar (such a series) is really the golden chain; so exalted is the merit of each of these narrators. The shaykh Abū Ishāq al-Shīrāzī (No. 5) relates the following anecdote in that chapter of his Muḥaddithah which treats of marriage feasts and scrambling for sweetmeats; he gives it in the words of Nāfi', himself: "I was walking with 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar, and he heard the sound of a 1 His father's name is not well ascertained; it was either Hurmuz or Kāwūs. (Al-Nawawī, in his Tahdhīb).

---

shepherd's pipe. On this, he stopped his ears with his fingers and went off the high road. Every now and then, he would say to me : Do you hear it still, Nafi' ? and when I at length answered that I did not, he removed his fingers from his ears and returned to the high-road. He then said to me : 'It was thus I saw the Prophet act (on a similar occasion)'." This tradition presents a difficulty which gave rise to a discussion among the doctors of the law; it is this : "Why did Ibn 'Umar stop his ears so as not to hear the sound of the pipe and yet, instead of ordering his client Nafi' to do the same, he authorised him to listen, in as much, as he asked him, every moment, if the sound had ceased or not ?" The solution given of this difficulty was that Nafi', being at that time a mere boy, and not responsible (for a breach of the law), it was not necessary to forbid him to listen. This answer gave rise to another question namely : "It is perfectly certain that a declaration made by a boy is not receivable (in law) ; why then did Ibn 'Umar put his trust in Nafi''s declaration touching the cessation of the sound?" this tradition, as handed down to us, serves, to strengthen the argument of those who assert that traditional information delivered by a boy is receivable. This matter formed the subject of a famous controversy, an account of which would be misplaced here. Numerous anecdotes are told concerning Nafi'. He died in the year 117 (A.C 735-6); or, according to some, in the year 120.

730 NĀFI', THE QUR'ĀN-READER

Abū Ruwaym Nāfi', the son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abi Nu'aym and a mawlā of Ja'wanah Ibn Sha'ūb al-Shijā'i, was a native of Madinah and one of the seven principal Qur'ān-readers. He was the imām<sup>1</sup> of the people of Madinah ; they conformed to his manner of reading and adopted the readings he preferred. He belonged to the third class (or generation) after the Companions of Muḥammad and filled the office of muḥtasib (No. 150, note). His humour was facetious<sup>1</sup> and his complexion dark, extremely dark. Ibn Abī Uways stated as follows: "Mālik (No. 525) told me that he read (the Qur'ān) under Nāfi' 's tuition. Al-Aṣma'i (No. 354) relates that Nāfi' said to him; "I drew my origin from (a family of) Iṣbahān". It is thus that al-Aṣma'i's statement is reporduced by Abū Nu'aym (No. 32) in the History of Iṣbahān. He (Nāfi') had read (the Qur'ān) under the direction of Abū Maymūnah a mawlā of Umm Salamah, one of the Prophet's wives. He had two pupils who transmitted to posterity his method of Qur'ān-reading; one of them was Warṣh (No. 710, note) and the other Qunbul* (No. 305). We have already mentioned them both under the letter 'ayn.<sup>2</sup> Nāfi' died at Madīnah in the year 169 (A.C. 785-6). This event has been placed under the year 159 and other dates, but the first mentioned is the true one. There are doubts about his surname whether it was Abu 'l-Ḥasan, or Abū 'Abd Allāh, or 'Abd al-Raḥmān, or Abū Nu'aym. The word جونه (ja'wanah) served originally to designate a little, short man; it was afterwards employed as a proper name for men, whether they were short or not. The Ja'wanah here spoken of was a confederate ally of Ḥamzah, the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, or, by another account, of al-'Abbās, the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. A third statement represents him as a confederate of the Hāshimīd family. The word شعوب (sha'ūb) was employed primitively to express the idea of death, شجعي (shija'i) signifies belonging to the tribe of 'Shija', which is a branch of the Banū Āmir Ibn Layth. Al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) has neglected mentioning this patronymic (in his Anṣāb).

1 The word imām designates the person who presides at the public prayer ; but, in the present case, it appears to signify oracle, a person whose opinions were of the highest authority. See the Annals of Abu 'l-Fidā, Vol. II, page 58.

1 The true reading is فيه دعاية; see Abu 'l-Fidā's Annals, Vol. II, p. 58, and Ṭabāqāt al-Qurrā, MS. of the Bibliothèque imperiale, ancien fonds, No. 642, fol. 25 verso. We read there وكان صاحب دعاية و طيب اخلاق "He (Nāfi') was full of gaiety and good humour".

2 The author is here mistaken: the article to which he alludes (No. 305) contains a short passage on Qunbul, but does not make any mention of Warṣh.

* Qunbul transmitted on the authority of Nāfi' and not Ibn Kathīr. Qālūn transmitted from Nāfi'. The Egyptian edition gives the correct name.—Ed.

731 AL-MUṬARRIZĪ, THE PHILOLOGER

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Nāṣir Ibn Abi 'l-Mukārim 'Abd al-Sayyid Ibn 'Alī al-Muṭarrizī was a native of Khuwārizm, a legist of the sect (or school) of Abū Ḥanīfah (No. 738) a grammarian and a philologist. He possessed a perfect knowledge of grammar, philology, poetry and all the branches of literature. He studied in his native town under his father and Abu 'l-Muwayyad al-Muwaffaq Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Makkī, (a native of Makkah and) the (ablest) preacher in Khuwārizm. He had, besides, other preceptors. Traditions were taught to him by a number of masters, one of whom was Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi Sa'd al-Tājir (the merchant). He gained a perfect acquaintance with that science, became a head-man among the Mu'tazilites<sup>1</sup> and preached openly the doctrines of that sect. In the secondary points of Muslim law, he followed the system of Abū Ḥanīfah. He expressed his thoughts with elegance and displayed great talent as a jurisconsult. We owe to him a number of instructive works such as the Commentary on the Stations (Maqāmāt) of al-Ḥarīrī, a treatise which, notwithstanding its concision, affords all the information that can be desired. In his Kitāb al-Mughrib (the furnisher of curious information) he treats of the strange and uncommon terms employed in the language of the jurisconsults. This work is for the Ḥanafites what the work of al-Azhārī (No. 613) is for the Shāfi'ites. In it the author shewed that he was not unequal to his task, having assembled there every information that could be wished for. **[His Mu'rib (exact indicator) was intended as a commentary on the Mughrib: it is a large work, but rarely to be found. He drew up also a philological treatise entitled the Iqtinā' (sufficiency), and made an abridgment of the same work. His other productions were an abridgment of the Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq<sup>2</sup>, the Miṣbāḥ*

1 The Mu'tazilites endeavoured to conciliate faith with reason, religion with philosophy.

2 The Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq (corrector of discourse) is a philological work composed by Ibn al-Sikkīt, a celebrated grammarian whose life will be found among the Ya'qūbs.

*[ ] From "His" to "etc" on p. 5 is omitted by 'Abd al-Ḥamid—Ed.

(flambeau) treating of grammar, the well-known Muqaddimah (introduction) to the study of grammar, etc.] Students derived great profit from his oral instruction and from his works. In the year 601 (A.C. 1204-5) he entered Baghdād, as a Makkah pilgrim and, as he held the opinions of the Mu'tazilites, he had frequent controversies with the doctors of that city. He gave there lessons in philology and acquired a great reputation, extended fame and wide renown. He composed some poetry, such as the following verses, in which assonances are introduced with great art<sup>1</sup> :

"(He is) a fire-box of beneficence, the abundant sparks of which never fail, and a laurel of the hills possessing noble qualities which are never blighted. Precious is the pearl of his glory, copious the flow of his gifts."

In another piece he says :

I should blush to acquire fame were I only to be considered as a frequenter of damsels and an amateur of songs."

He said also :

"Fortune was blind to my just rights, and that was really as bad as if al-Zarqā simulated blindness.<sup>2</sup> If you refuse to acknowledge my merit, its voice is sufficiently loud to advertise those who have ears to hear."

He composed a great deal of poetry and in it he made frequent use of assonances. His birth took place in Khuwārizm, in the month of Rajab, 538 (Jan.-Feb., A.C. 1144); so he was really, as has been remarked, the successor of al-Zarqā khshari, who died in that year and in the same place (No. 684). Al-Muṭarrizī died on Tuesday, the 21st of the first Jumādā, 610 (8th Oct., A.C. 1213), in Khuwārizm. More than three hundred elegies, some in Arabic and some in Persian, were composed on his death. Muṭarrizī means a person who embroiders stuffs and ornaments them with 1 Those assonances disappear, of course, in the translation.

---

2 This must refer to Zarqā al-Yamāmah (the blue-eyed maid of al-Yamāmah), who was celebrated for her piercing sight and of whom many fables are related. See, the Essai, etc., of M. 'Caussin de Perceval, tom. I, p. 100.

stripes. I do not know whether this surname was given to him because he himself was an embroiderer or because one of his ancestors had practised that art. His professor, al-Muwaffaq Ibn Aḥmad, the preacher above-mentioned, died in Khuwārizm on the 11th of Ṣafar, 568 (2nd October, A.C. 1172).

732 AL-'AZİZ AL-'UBAYDĪ

Abu 'l-Manṣūr Nizār al-'Ubaydī (the Fāṭimid), entitled al-'Aziz bi-Allāh (august by the grace of God), was the son of al-Mu'izz, son of al-Manṣūr, son of al-Qā'im, son of al-Mahdī, and sovereign of Egypt and Maghrib. We have already spoken of his father (No. 700), his ancestors, his son and his grandchildren. He was publicly declared successor to the throne on Thursday, the 4th of the latter Rabi', 365 (11th Dec., A.C. 975), and he assumed the supreme authority on the death of his father, which event took place on Friday, the 11th of the same month. A different date has been given, as we have remarked in the article on al-Mu'izz. When al-Mu'izz breathed his last, his death was kept secret, till his son, al-'Aziz, was proclaimed khalif. The new sovereign was generous, brave and inclined to forgiveness, even with the power of punishing. His conduct towards Iftikīn al-Turki (No. 507), the mamlūk of Mu'izz al-Dawlah, is well-known: when he got him into his power, he pardoned him and, though the war he had to wage against him cost a heavy sum, he abstained from chastising him. As we have already given a short account of Iftikīn's proceedings in the life of 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, we need not repeat it here. The anecdote (as we have said), is well-known and proves the mildness and clemency of al-'Aziz. The amīr al-Mukhtār al-Musabbiḥi (No. 687) states, in his History, that al-'Aziz was he who founded the jāmi' (great mosque) situated near the gate of Cairo called Bāb al-Futūḥ. The foundations were dug and the building was commenced in the month of Ramaḍān, 380 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 990). Farther on, he says: "The Qaṣr al-Baḥr (the palace on the river-side), an edifice the like of which had never been raised either in the East or in the West, was built at Cairo in his reign, as also the Qaṣr al-Dḥahab (the golden palace), the great mosque in (the cemetery of) al-Qarāfah and the castles (or palaces) at 'Ayn Shams<sup>1</sup>. He had reddish hair, his eyes were large and dark blue, his shoulders broad. Kind in disposition and condescending, he disliked to shed blood. Being a good judge of horses and falcons, he was passionately fond of the chase and particularly of lion-hunting; he was, besides, a connaissanceur in jewellery and furniture; to this we may add that he was a man of talent, and skilled in literature." Abū Maṣṣūr al-Ṭha'ālībī (No. 356) mentions him in the Yutimah and gives a piece of verse which he composed on a day of public festivity in which he had put all his family into mourning on account of the death of one of his children. Here is the passage:

"We, the descendants of al-Muṣṭafā (the chosen one, Muḥammad), undergo afflictions which none among us can survive except those who are able to master their grief. Strange that we, of all mankind, must suffer from misfortune! the first of our family had his trials and so also has the last! The people here before us are all rejoicing at their festival; but festivals, for us, are days of mourning."

Here the same author introduces a long paragraph after which he adds these words: "I heard the shaykh Abū 'l-Ṭayyib relate as follows: The 'Marwānīd' (Umayyad) who reigned in Spain received from Nizār, the sovereign of Egypt, an insulting and satirical letter to which he replied in these terms: 'You satirize us because you have heard of us; had we ever heard of you, we should make you a reply.' Nizār felt the severity of this retort and abstained from answering." Abū 'l-Ḥasan al-Rawḥī says, in his work entitled Ṭuhfat al-Zurafā fi Tūrikh al-Khulafā (gift for the ingenious, being a history of the Khalifs)<sup>2</sup>, that this correspondence passed between al-'Azīz and al-Ḥākim al-Mustanṣir, the son of 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir and Marwānīd sovereign of Spain. According to him, al-Mustanṣir was the author of the insulting

1 The ruins of 'Ayn Shams (Heliopolis) lie at half a day's journey N.E. of Cairo.

2 This work is not noticed by Ḥājji Khaliḥah.

letter and al-'Azīz replied to it in the terms above mentioned ; God knows best ! In our article on al-Mahdī, Nizār's grandfather (No. 332) we have spoken of the genealogy which this family gave for theirs and of the attacks directed against it. The great majority of those who are versed in that branch of study do not consider this genealogy to be true, and we have related, in the life of Ibn Ṭabāṭabā (No. 317) the conversation which passed, on the subject, between that sharīf and al-Mu'izz, the father of al-'Azīz. The belief in its falsity spread among the public and was generally adopted. Al-'Azīz, in the commencement of his reign, went up into the pulpit, one Friday (to pronounce the usual Khuṭbah or invocation), and found in it a leaf of paper on which were inscribed these lines :

"We have heard a doubtful genealogy proclaimed from the pulpit of the mosque ; if what you say be true, name your ancestors up to the fifth degree. If you wish to prove your assertion, give us, for your genealogy, one which may be as certain as that of al-Ṭā'i' : If not, leave your pedigree in the shade and enter with us into the great family which includes all mankind. The most ambitious vainly desire to have a genealogy like that of the sons of Hāshim (the 'Abbāsids)."

The author of these verses said; give us, for your genealogy etc., because the occurrence took place in the reign of al-Ṭā'i' li-Allāh, the Khalīf of Baghdād. Another day, al-'Azīz mounted into the pulpit and found there a piece of paper on which was written :

"We have borne with oppression and with tyranny, but not with infidelity nor folly. If you have the gift of knowing what is hidden, tell us the name of him who wrote this note."

He who composed these lines was led to do so because they (the Fāṭimid sovereigns) pretended to possess the knowledge of every thing hidden from man ; the anecdotes told of them, on this subject, are well-known. Abu 'l-Raqa'maq Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Anṭākī (No. 53) composed, in praise of al-'Azīz, a qaṣīdah of which the eulogistic part is remarkably well turned. The kingdom of this sovereign surpassed in extent that of his father ; (his generals) conquered for him Emessa, Ḥamāt, Aleppo, Shayzar and, in the month of Muḥarram, 382 (March-April, A.C. 992), the khuṭbah was pronounced for him, at Moṣul, by Abū Duwād Muḥammad Ibn al-Musayyab al-'Uqaylī, the brother of al-Muqallad Ibn al-Musayyab (No. 708) and the sovereign of that city and its territory. The name of al-'Aziz was there inscribed on the coinage and the standards; the khuṭbah was said for him (even) in Yamen. He continued to enjoy his greatness till the year 386; having then set out for Syria, he was taken ill at Bilbays, in one of the last ten days of the month of Rajab (August, A.C. 996). His indisposition sometimes augmented and sometimes diminished; on Sunday, the 25th of Ramaḍān, he got on horseback, at Bilbays, and rode to the bath, from which he proceeded to the lodgings occupied by the ustād Abu'l-Futūḥ Barjawān (No. 109), the same who was the keeper of his treasury at al-Qaṣr (the citadel of Cairo). He stopped there and, on the next morning, Monday, he felt his sufferings increase, and their violence continued till Tuesday morning. His disorder was the stone accompanied with pains in the bowels. He then sent for the qādī, Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān<sup>1</sup> and Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Ammār the Kitānian, surnamed Amin al-Dawlah (the warden of the empire). This officer was the first native of Maghrib who bore an honorary title<sup>2</sup>. He was the shaykh and commander of the Kitānian troops. Al-'Aziz, having recommended to the care of these officers the interests of his son al-Ḥākim (No. 715), sent for the latter and conversed with him on the same subject. Though his illness continued to increase, he remained in the bath and, on quitting it, he expired. This took place on Tuesday, the 28th of Ramaḍān, 386 (14th Oct., A.C. 996), in the interval between the two after-noon prayers. Such is the account given by al-Musabbiḥī. According to the author of the history of Qayrawān, the physician prescribed to al-'Aziz a portion, to be taken on entering into the bath, but it was wrongly made up and the prince died on drinking it. His death was not kept secret, even for single hour, and his son, al-Ḥākim, was immediately established in his place. On the morning of Wednesday when the inhabitants of Cairo heard of this event, they went forth from the city to meet the new sovereign. He made his entry with standards and banners waving before him, whilst the umbrella (of state) was borne over his head by Raydān al-Ṣaqlabī, the same who is mentioned in our article on Barjawān. Al-Ḥākim entered the Qaṣr a little before sunset, preceded by a litter in which was borne the body of his father and out of which the two feet of the corpse protruded. When the litter was taken into the Qaṣr, the body was washed by the qādī Ibn al-Nu'mān and then buried in a chamber of the Qaṣr, near the tomb of al-Mu'izz, the father of the deceased. The interment took place towards nightfall. On Thursday morning, the last of the month, perfect order reigned every where and proclamations were made throughout the country to the effect that no new charges or obligations should be imposed upon the people, that their lives and fortunes were under the protection of God and that whoever attempted to deprive them of either, might be lawfully slain and his property given up to pillage. The birth of al-'Aziz took place on Thursday, the 14th of Muḥarram, 344 (11th May, A.C. 995), at al-Mahdiyyah in the province of Ifriqiyah. Al-Farghānī (No. 76, note.) states, in his lesser historical work, that al-'Aziz bi-Aliāh was born on the eve of Sunday, the 11th of Muḥarram of that year. Al-Mukhtār al-Musabbiḥī relates as follows: "In a conversation which I had with al-Ḥākim, we happened to speak of the death of al-'Aziz, on which he said to me: 'O Mukhtār! my father sent for me before he breathed his last, and I found him with nothing on his body but rags and bandages.' I kissed him, and he pressed me to his bosom, exclaiming: 'How I grieve for thee, beloved of my heart!', and tears flowed from his eyes. He then said: 'Go, my master! and play, for I am very well.' I obeyed and began to amuse myself with such sports as are usual with boys, and soon after, God took him to himself. Barjawān then hastened to me and, seeing me on the top of a sycamore tree, he exclaimed: 'Come down, my boy! may God protect you and us all!' When I descended, he placed on my head the turban adorned with jewels, kissed the ground before me and said: 'Hail to Commander of the faithful, with the mercy of God and His blessings!' He then led me out in that attire and shewed me to the people, who all kissed the ground before me and saluted me with the title of khalif! The history of al-'Aziz offers abundance of matter, but we aim at concision.

1 Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān was born at Qayrawān, A.H. 346 (A.C. 956), and was taken to Cairo by his father, who accompanied al-Mu'izz to Egypt. Al-'Aziz appointed him chief qādī of all Egypt, of Makkah and Mad nah and of the military colonies (jund) in Syria. He chose him also to preside at the public prayer, and nominated him director of the mint and intendant of weights and measures. Ibn al Nu'man filled those offices during fourteen years and died on the fourth of Ṣfar A.H. 389 (January, A.C. 999). many members of his family occupied high judicial situations. (Hist. of the 'Adīs of Cairo, MS. of the Bibl. imp. No. 691. This manuscript was written for the use of the author and bears his corrections).

2 This is an error: Bulukīn the Zīride received from al-Mu'izz, the father of al-'Aziz, the title of Sayf al-Dawlah (sword of the empire).

733 NAṢR AL-KHUBZĀRUZZI

Abu'l-Qāsim Naṣr Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Naṣr Ibn Māmūn, generally known by the surname of Khubzāruzzī (the rice-bread baker), was a native of Baṣrah. This distinguished poet had never received any education and could neither read nor write. He baked rice-bread in a shop situated at the Mirbad of Baṣrah, and he used to recite (there) verses of his own composition, all of them amatory. People crowded about him for the pleasure of hearing his poems and admiring the talent of one whose state was so humble. The poet Abu'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far, surnamed Ibn Lankak al-Baṣrī<sup>1</sup>, was then in the highest reputation, and yet he often visited Naṣr's shop for the purpose of hearing him, and took such an interest in him that he made a collection (dīwān) of his poetical works. Naṣr had already been to Baghdād and resided there a long time. The Khatīb (No. 33) speaks of him in his historical work and informs us that people went to read (and study) this dīwān under the author's tuition and several pieces of verse were learned from him and given as his by al-Mu'āfā Ibn Zakariyā al-Jarīrī (No. 699), 1 Al-Tha'ālibī, in his Yatīmah, gives some passages from Ibn Lankak's poems and praises the author highly for his talent. He informs us that Ibn Lankak was considered as the most accomplished literary scholar of Baṣrah.

---

Aḥmad Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥātim al-Nūshari and a number of others whose names he mentions. Al-Tha'ālibī (No. 356) speaks of him in the Yatimah and cites a number of pieces composed by him, such as the following :

"My two friends ! did you ever see or hear of any one more generous than a sovereign who went to visit his slave ! (Yet 'twas thus my beloved) came, without having promised, and said to me : I esteem you too much to let your heart remain in suspense, awaiting the fulfilment of a promise. Then, between me and her, the star of union revolved in the sphere of happy omen and felicity ; now, it presided over the kissing of the narcissus of the eye<sup>1</sup>, and then, over the biting of the apple of the cheek."

By the same :

"Has not the love I bear you caused me sufficient pain without your beginning to sport (with my feelings) and to laugh ? Your mockery is more galling to me than what I have already suffered ! I should not care being sent to hell, were it not for the taunts (طعن) of Mālik (the angel who guards it)."

By the same :

"Many were those who, though absent, kept their promises towards us : but there were some who, though present, disdained (to fulfil their engagements). They turned away and then turned towards (us) ; they shewed an inclination for us, and then repelled us ; they first acted as friends and then as foes. But blame them not for transgressing (against us) ; did they not transgress, they would have no reason to ask pardon".

Here is another of his pieces :

"A friend begins by visiting another, either to drink wine (with him) or to bear the lute touched (عرف) by a female musician. Then he visits his friend, either to confide to him his sorrows or to complain of the rigours of fortune".

<sup>1</sup> See Vol. I. Introduction.

* Abd al-Hamid gives : ط slap, throwing, etc.—Ed.

In another piece he says :

"How much have I suffered from thy saying this and that ; from thy wavering promises and long delays. A week passes over and a month, whilst I expect thee, morning and evening. If I miss obtaining kind treatment from you, I shall act with exemplary patience. Love increases by regular gradation, but thus also does it disappear. Take care ! think not thyself safe from the visissitudes of fortune ; she attacks the powerful and leaves them abased. Methinks I see the beauty of thy face receive from (approaching) wrinkles the order to depart<sup>1</sup>, and that, in thy fickleness, thou exchangest light for darkness ; a very bad exchange ! (People, then, on seeing thy figure, would never) think it had once been as slender as a wand and (that thy swelling forms had been like) rounded sand-hills. When that happens, he whom thou hast not favoured will rejoice in thy misfortune, but he who obtained thy favours will still be for thee a friend."

By the same :

"I looked at the moon and the face of my beloved ; and, to my sight, they seemed two moons. Such was my embarrassment that I could not distinguish the human moon from the moon of night. Were it not for the two cheeks which I kissed and the blackness of the hair which charmed me, I should have taken the moon for the beloved and the beloved for the moon. But one sometimes disappears and the other remains always (with us) and what disappears cannot be compared to what remains."

Aḥmad Ibn Maṣṣūr al-Nūsharī states that al-Khubzāruzzī recited to him the following lines, as being of his own composition :

"The beloved passed the night with me as a boon companion ; ebriety had tinged her cheeks and, when the morning appeared, languor<sup>2</sup> began to tinge her eyes. My eyes then lent their sleep

1 For obvious reasons I give the signification of wrinkles to the word "لحيد". The expression al-raḥilah! al-raḥilah! means : get ready to start !

2 I read, with one of the MSS. النمار. For the signification of this word see De Sacy's Īḥariri, p. 537. l. 20.

to hers and obtained, in return, the pleasure of gazing on her charms. Thanks be to fortune: how well it favours me (in my plans) against her!"

The Khaṭīb states, in his history of Baghdād, that Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Akfānī of Baṣrah made the following relation: "I went out, one holy day vacation, with my uncle Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Akfānī the poet, and we had with us Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ibn Lankak, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Mufajja' and Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Sabbāk.* I, though a boy, accompanied them. They walked on til they came to the place where Naṣr al-Khubzārūzī was and found him making bread for a set (of people who were waiting), We sat down in his (shop), wished him a happy holy day and asked him how he was getting on. He had just lighted some dry palm-leaves under the oven and had put on so much fuel that (my companions) were inconvenienced by the smoke. As we found the smoke to augment, we all rose up (to depart), on which Naṣr said to Ibn Lankak: 'When shall I see you again? Abu 'l-Ḥusayn!' The other replied: 'When my clothes are soiled.'" He had put on that day new clothes, as white and as clean as could possibly be, because he wished to appear well dressed during the festival. We then went to the street of the Banī Samurāh and, when we reached the house of Aḥmad Ibn al-Muthannā, Ibn Lankak sat down there and said: 'My friends! the station we made at Naṣr's cannot fail offering him a subject on which he will have something to say; I wish to anticipate him; bring me an inkhorn.' He then wrote these lines:

"I have in my heart so great a love for Naṣr that I surpass therein all my companions. When we went to him, he fumigated us, in guise of incense, with dry leaves which tinged our clothes with smoke. I rose in haste, thinking he meant, by that, to drive us away; and he said: 'When shall I see you again? Abu 'l-Ḥusayn!' to which I answered: 'When my clothes are soiled.'

These lines he sent to Naṣr, who immediately dictated an answer to them. We read his reply, which was expressed in these terms:

---

* Abd al-Ḥamid gives: al-Simāk.—Ed.

"On Abu 'l-Husayn I bestowed my sincerest love, and he mocked me with sweet words. When he came, his clothes were as (white as) the hair of old age, but (with me,) they became dark like the hair of a youth. I thought that, when he sat down with me, he was going to a wedding, and I therefore generously perfumed his garments, saying: 'When shall I see you again? Abu 'l-Husayn! He replied: 'when my clothes are soiled'. If the dislike of dirtiness<sup>1</sup> be meritorious, why did the Legatee receive the surname of dustyface<sup>2</sup>?'".

The Khālidites, Abū Bakr Muḥammad and Abū 'Uthmān Sa'id (No. 456), relate, in the work called al-Hadāyā wa 'l-Tuḥaf (offerings and gifts), that al-Kl<sub>ubzāruzzī</sub> sent to Ibn Yazdād, the governor of Baṣrah, a signet-stone and, with it, the following note:

"Were many times the double of what I sent you laid at your feet, it would make as little appearance as the presents offered by Balqis (the queen of Sabā) to Solomon. But I do it only to try you: if you are pleased with it, we shall know evidently that you are pleased with me."

Mentioning one thing brings on another: I found in the same work an amusing anecdote which I am induced to insert here. There was at Iṣbahān a man remarkable for his wealth, his munificence and the nobleness of his character. His name was Sīmāk Ibn al-Nu'mān. A female musician of that city, whose name was Umm 'Amr and who was distinguished for her talent and her merit, inspired him with a violent passion; and his infatuation for her became so great that he bestowed on her a number of farms and sent her a mule loaded with the deeds by which he transferred to her these estates. This gave rise to much talk among the public and excited great astonishment. There was then in Iṣbahān a man of heavy apprehension and remarkable for dulness, who was in love with another female musician. When he heard of what had passed, he imagined, through his ignorance and his feeble intelligence, that Simāk had merely given to Umm 'Amr a quantity of (parchment) skins with nothing written on them and that presents of such a kind were always well received and had a great effect on the person to whom they were sent. He therefore purchased enough of skins to load two mules, so that his gift might be doubly as great as Simāk's, and sent them to her beloved. When she received them and learned what it meant, she was filled with anger against her admirer and wrote him a severe letter in which she declared that she would never speak to him again. In this missive she inserted the following lines which she had got a poet to compose for her :

1 The true reading is التبرج.

2 According to the Shi'ites, Muḥammad appointed 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib to be his successor; whence they gave to the latter the surname of al-Waṣī (the legatee). Abū Turāb (the father of dust, dusty face) was the nickname by which Muḥammad designated 'Alī on account of his piety and frequent prostrations.

"The person who revolts against you will never submit to you again. I declare that your wish to gain my affection shall always be vain. You have brought disgrace on the whole class of lovers by the vileness of your act. Tell me ! who would be capable of sending skins to his mistress except you ? I suppose that, in doing so, you meant to imitate Simāk. But he sent to Umm 'Amr farms with their title-deeds, and you sent me things which stunk as if you had made use of them to wipe your mouth. Why should I consent to have you near me ? blockhead that you are ! I have no wish to see you except I were to cut up those skins (into straps and wear them out) upon your shoulders."

I transcribe here another anecdote which I found in the same work : Al-Labbādī the poet set out from one of the towns of Āḍharbā'ijān for another. He was mounted on an excellent colt belonging to himself. A great sterility had prevailed in the country during that year. On the road, he met with a young man, riding on an ass. Let us give the remainder of the story in al-Labbādī's own words : "I found that he had received a good education and could recite poems ; he was, besides, light-hearted, prompt at repartee and skilled in argument. We travelled together the rest of the day and, in the evening, we arrived at a khān (caravansarā'i) situated on the road. I asked from the master of it if he could give us anything to eat. and he declared that he had nothing remaining in his establishment. I talked with him for some time and cajoled him so well that he at length brought me two cakes of bread, one of which I reserved for myself, and the other I gave to my fellow-traveller. The uneasiness I felt for my colt, lest it should pass the night without feeding, was greater than what I felt for myself; so I asked the master of the khān if he had any barley. He replied that he had not a single grain. I told him to go and look for some and that I should pay him for his trouble. He went out and, after remaining a long time absent, he returned and informed me that he had discovered two makkūk's (quarts) of it, but that the owner had sworn, under the penalty of divorcing his wife, that he would not let them go for less than a hundred dirhams (fifty shillings). On this I said: "Since there is an oath made to divorce, discussion is useless; here are fifty dirhams; go and bring me one makkūk." He did so, and I gave to my colt, after which, I resumed my conversation with the young man, whose ass was standing (in the court) with nothing to eat. My companion remained some time with downcast eyes and then said: "Listen, may God favour you! to some verses which have just come to my mind." "Let us have them," said I, and he recited as follows:

"My verses, Sir! are much inferior to yours, for my poetic talent does not come up even to your skill in prose. In what I have recited, I merely displayed before you what was, in reality, a single drop compared to your ocean. You conversed with me familiarly, raised my spirits and treated me kindly; you paid attention to my state before thinking of your own. I now wish to ask a favour which, if you grant it, will render me your encomiast and your grateful servant for ever: I have partaken of your hospitality; let my ass share in that of your colt."

I laughed and excused myself for having neglected the animal: so, I purchased for it the other makkūk, at the price of fifty dirhams." But, after all, we have digressed from our subject. The anecdotes and stories related of Naṣr are very numerous. He died, A.H. 317 (A.C. 929-30), but this date is suspicious, for the Kḥaṭīb states, in his History, that Aḥmad Ibn Maṣṣūr al-Nūḡharī, the same of whom we have already spoken, learned from him

(some pieces of verse) in the year 325. The word aruzzi, forming the latter part of the surname Khūbzaruzzi, varies in its pronunciation, because it comes from a root which has six different forms, namely : uruzz (rice) aruzz, urz, uruz, ruzz and runz. Naṣr received the surname because he practised the trade of a rice-bread baker, as we have already stated towards the commencement of this notice. Lankak is a Persian word and the diminutive of the adjective lank (lame). The Persians form their diminutives by adding the letter k to the end of the word. Mirbad is the name of a well-known public place in Baṣrah. The word itself signified any place where camels and other animals are shut up, but it became a proper name, applied to the place in Baṣrah.

734 NAṢR AL-NUMAYRĪ

Abu 'l-Murhaf Naṣr, a celebrated blind poet, was the son of Maṣnūr Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Jawshan* Ibn Maṣnūr† Ibn Ḥumayd Ibn Ithāl Ibn Wazar‡ Ibn 'Aṭṭāf Ibn Biṣhr Ibn Jandal Ibn 'Ubayd al-Rā'i Ibn Ḥuṣayn Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Jandal Ibn Qaṭan Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Numayr Ibn 'Āmir Ibn Ṣa'sa'ah Ibn Mu'āwiyah Ibn Bakr Ibn Hawāzin Ibn Maṣnūr Ibn 'Ikrimah Ibn Khaṣafah Ibn Qays 'Aylān Ibn Muḍar Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān. When a boy, he went (from al-Raqqah) to Baghdād and there he continued to reside up to the day of his death. He learned the Qur'ān by heart, studied the system of jurisprudence drawn up by Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19) and heard traditions delivered by the qāḍi Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Bāqī al-Anṣārī. Abu 'l-Barakāt 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn al-Mubārak al-Anmāfi<sup>1</sup>, Abu 'l-Faḍl

<sup>1</sup> The ḥafīẓ Abū 'l-Barakāt 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Anmāfi was a native of Baḥdād. He died in the month of Muḥarram 538 (July-August. A.C. 1143).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives Jawshan.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd omits this name.—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Ward.—Ed.

Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir<sup>1</sup> and other masters. His literary studies were made under Abū Maṣṣūr al-Jawālīqī (No. 724). He (composed and) recited poems in which he eulogized the khalīfs, the wazīrs and the grandees; he taught traditions and led a life of devotion and self-mortification. His poetry, of which there exists a collection, has all a good tendency. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 678) cites some of his verses in the Kharidah and assigns to him the genealogy which we have given above. "It was from his lips," said he, "that I learned it". The 'Ubayd al-Rā'ī<sup>2</sup> who is mentioned in that list was the celebrated poet whose diwān we possess and who waged such a war of satires against Jarīr (No. 127). Abū Murhaf (Naṣr) lost his sight from the small-pox, at the age of fourteen years. 'Imād al-Dīn cites the following extract from one of his poems :

"Think you that, after our union, now dissolved, we shall ever meet again, and that I shall no longer have to apprehend the fearful vicissitudes of Fortune? (Think you) that after our mutual estrangement, (the aspect of) our camping-spots and pasture grounds in Najd will again assuage (my grief)? I well remember the time, now past and gone, when we were all closely united at Ayman al-Ālamīn! I have been unable to suppress the flow of my tears; tears obey not the (lover's) will when he suffers from passionate desire. My heart impels me towards (the beloved) Khansā, but, between us, a vast extent (of desert) intervenes. Of things which I dread, that which my heart fears the most is the sight of the lightning when it flashes over the land of Najd<sup>3</sup>. Long separation from my friends has loaded me with a burden which I am unable to support."

His poetry is remarkable for delicacy of thought and elegance of style. When at Baghdād he remained exclusively attached to 'Awn al-Dīn Yaḥyā Ibn Hubayrah, a wazīr whose life we shall give, and composed poems in his praise. He was born at al-Ruqqah, on Tuesday evening, the 13th of the latter Jumādā, 501 (29th Jan., A.C. 1108); he died at Baghdād on Tuesday, the 28th of the latter Rabī', 588 (13th May, A.C. 1192) and was interred (outside) the gate called Bāb Ḥarb. Numayrī is a patronymic referring to the Numayr Ibn 'Āmir whose name is mentioned towards the beginning of this article. The other names are sufficiently known (to dispense us from indicating their orthography).

1 The ḥafīẓ Abū 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir al-Salamī, an inhabitant of Baghdād and one of the greatest traditionists of 'Irāq, died in the month of Shahbān, 550 (Oct., A.C. 1155).

2 For this poet see de Sacy's Anthologie grammaticale, pp. 134, 452.

3 This perhaps means; because it draws my attention towards that country and awakens painful recollections.

735 IBN QALĀQIS

Abu 'l-Futūḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Makhlūf Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Qawī Ibn Qalāqis al-Lakhmi al-Azhari al-Iskandarānī (an Arab of the tribe of Lakhm, a descendant of al-Azhar and a native of Alexandria), bore the title of al-Qāḍī 'l-A'azz (the worshipful qāḍī) and was noted as a poet. In that art, he displayed great ability, talent and genius. He has so little beard that his face was quite bare and, for that reason, verses were composed against him, which I abstain from mentioning on account of their indelicacy. He was a constant companion of the ghaykh Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī (No. 43) and profited greatly by his intercourse with that eminent ḥāfiẓ. The collection of his poetical works contains some pieces in which he makes brilliant eulogiums of his friend, Abū Ṭāhir who, on his side, spoke of him frequently in the highest terms and emulated with him in the career of mutual praise. Ibn Qalāqis went to pay his court to al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil 'Abd al-Raḥīm (No. 349), taking with him a qaṣīdah in which the name of that wazīr was introduced so as to form the rhyme of one of the verses. The piece is of the highest beauty and begins thus<sup>1</sup> :

<sup>1</sup> These verses are so intricate in their construction, so full of verbal quibbles and obscure allusions, that it is hardly possible to make them perfectly intelligible in another language.

"What harm would it do that gazelle (nymph, maiden) were she not to leave (us), and were (she to hear) one wounded (lover) condole with another? (What harm) to one whose society is a paradise, were she not to see him whom she rejected suffering from (torments like those of) hell? As long as I courted her, (that slender waist, like to) a pliant branch in a garden enfeebled my body (by the passion it inspired me), so that I became (a mere breath, like) the zephyr (of that garden). She, with the beauty-spot (raqīm) on her cheek, slumbers, neglectful of (her) sleepless (lover); but sleep was always most suitable for those who had Raqīm<sup>1</sup>. Why should a gazelle (maiden) not remain (şaram) (with us)? Have I not heard (grammarians say), as (an example of) relation: 'The gazelle of the desert (şarīm)<sup>2</sup>. How often did a censor continue (her reproaches) as long as night endured; a being (bahīmah) with whom I passed in conviviality many a gloomy (bahīm) night! I allowed her to anger me uncontrolled, for a man should be mild when angered by his fellow-creature. I said to her, when she passed all bounds and whilst my heart was in grievous torture; 'Excuse a heart which, through an effect of love, wanders, like a poet, in every valley<sup>3</sup>. How often (did I long for) that wine of which her mouth was the cup and of which the smell could not suffice me but the taste! I tried to absorb it from her lips and said: 'This is really the liquor of Paradise<sup>4</sup>' She opened her mouth, in smiling, and disclosed (teeth like) the white flowers of the hill, or like pearls ranged on a necklace; or (as if) she had received with approbation the (poem now) received by al-Fāḍil 'Abd al-Raḥīm."

Ibn Qalāqis frequently removed from one country to another and, alluding to his fondness for travelling, he used to say:

---

1 According to some commentators, the Raqīm of the Qur'ān is the name given to the dog of the Seven Sleepers. See Qur'ān, sūrah 18, verse 8.

2 It is very possible that the translator has missed the meaning of this verse.

3 Qur'ān, sūrah 26, verse 225.

4 Literally: Zamzam and al-Ḥaḍīm; that is, the sacred well and the enclosure of the Temple, at Makkah.

"Men are numerous (اكثر لکن), but I am destined to keep company with sailors only and with camel-drivers."

Towards the close of his life, he went to the city of Aden, in Yaman and sung the praises of Abu 'l-Faraj Yāsir, the son of Abu 'l-Nadā Bilāl Ibn Jarir al-Muḥammadi and wazīr to Muḥammad and Abu 'l-Sa'ūd, the sons of 'Imrān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Dā'i* Sabā Ibn Abi 'l-Sa'ūd Ibn Zuray' Ibn al-'Abbās al-Yāmīṭ, sovereigns of that county<sup>1</sup>. He was generously treated by Yāsir and, having obtained from him gifts sufficiently ample to make him a rich man, he took ship and departed. The vessel was wrecked on the island of al-Nāmūs, near Dahlak, and every thing he had with him went to the bottom. This occurred on Friday, the 5th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 563 (11th August, A.C. 1168). He returned to his patron in a state of nudity and recited to him the poem which begins thus:

"When we departed, generosity called us back, and we returned to thy residence; returning (from evil ways) is highly meritorious."

This is an excellent qaṣīdah, as that single verse is sufficient to prove. He then recited to him another poem in which he spoke of his shipwreck; it begins by these lines:

"Travel, if you wish to acquire real worth, it is by travelling that the crescent becomes a full-moon. Water, whilst it runs, acquires good qualities; when it settles, it becomes corrupt. It is by removing (from their place) that precious pearls pass from the sea to the necks (of the fair). You who relate the history of Yāsir, without knowing by experience his real merit! read, if you know how, in the nobleness of his visage, the (open) volume of expectations (fulfilled). Kiss the fingers of his right hand and say: 'Hail to thee who art an ocean (of generosity)!' But I mistake, God pardon me! in comparing him to the ocean; he enriched me and it reduced me to indigence. I have found that the one always flows, and that the other (flows and) ebbs."

<sup>1</sup> That is or Aden and its territory.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: al-Rā'i.—Ed.

'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: al-Nāml.—Ed.

It is a long qaṣīdah and displays all the excellence of the author's talent. The idea in the second verse is borrowed from an expression employed by Badī' al-Zamān, the author of the Maqāmāt, who inserted it in the beginning of an epistle of which we have spoken in his life (No. 51) and in which he says: "When water has long remained at rest, its noxious qualities appear." The idea of the third verse is borrowed from a piece composed by Ṣurr Durr (No. 449), in which the author says:

"Let your stirrups rattle across the deserts, and leave to maidens the shelter of their curtains. Those who always remain at home are like the inhabitants of the tomb. Did not pearls quit their dwelling-place, they had never mounted from the sea to the necks (of the fair)."

The following verses, composed by him on a black slave-girl, offer a very original idea:

"I know a negress who is really (worth) a white; near her, the (white) camphor is jealous of the (black) musk. She is like the pupil of the eye: people think it black, but it is all (pure) light."

The good (pieces composed by) Ibn Qalāqīs are very numerous. He was born in the frontier city of Alexandria, on Wednesday, the 4th of the latter Rabi', 532 (20th Dec., A.C. 1137), and died at 'Aydhab on the 3rd of Ṣhawwāl, 567 (29th May, A.C. 1172). In the month of Ṣha'bān, 563 (May-June, A.C. 1168), he arrived in Sicily and, two years later, he visited Yaman. When in Sicily, he got acquainted with a chief (qā'id) named Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Ḥajar<sup>1</sup> by whom he was generously treated and for whom he composed a very good work entitled: Al-Zahr al-Bāsim fī awṣāf Abī 'l-Qāsim (the smiling flower, treating of the qualities of Abu 'l-Qāsim). When he left Sicily, with the intention of returning to Egypt, the winter season had set in and the winds drove his ship back to that island. He then wrote to Abu 'l-Qāsim a letter in which he said:

"The winter weather hindered me from arriving at my native place with the ambassador. The winds, which drove me back, came just as I should have wished, although I did not desire them. The ass sometimes stumbles, but that is often through the will of him who hired it out."

<sup>1</sup> This shows that, in Sicily, under William II, the third Norman king, some Muslim chiefs still held a high position.

There was then in Sicily an ambassador sent there by the sovereign of Egypt. When he took ship to return, Ibn Qalāqis accompanied him, and they were driven back by a storm to the place they sailed from. Ibn Qalāqis then composed the verses here mentioned. The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn mentions, in the Kharidah, under the article entitled Ibn Qalāqis, the treatise of which we have spoken above, and gives there some good extracts from that poet's works. Qalāqis is the plural of qulqās (colocasias), a word of which the meaning is well known. 'Aydhāb is a small town situated on the (western) shore of the sea of Jiddah (the Red sea). The vessels of Egypt sail from thence for Hijāz (with the travellers who arrive at 'Aydhāb) by the road of Qūs. The passage across the sea generally takes a (day and a) night. From Jiddah (or Juddah) to Makkah there is one day's journey. At Jiddah is still to be seen the tomb of Eve, our first mother, which is an object of pilgrimage. Yāsir was put to death by Shams-al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh (No. 432) when that prince invaded Yaman<sup>1</sup>.

736 ḌIYĀ AL-DĪN IBN AL-ATHĪR

Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn Abī 'l-Karam Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Abd al-Wāḥid al-Shaybānī, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Athīr al-Jazarī and the title of Ḍiyā al-Dīn (the light of religion), was born at Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar<sup>2</sup> and passed there his early youth. In the month of Rajab, 579 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1183) he accompanied his father to <sup>1</sup> In the year 569 (A.C. 1173-4), when Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh took the city of Aden, the wazīr Yāsir was the governor of the place. The historians who speak of this event make no mention of the two princes in whose name he governed.

<sup>2</sup> See No. 432, 526.

Moşul and there he made his studies. Having then mastered the sciences (connected with law and religion), learned by heart the Qur'ān, picked up a great quantity of traditions concerning the Prophet and acquired a fair knowledge of grammar, philology and rhetoric; he learned also such a number of poems that he said, towards the beginning of his work entitled Al-Waṣṣi 'l-Marqūm (the flowered silken tissue): "I learned by heart an immense quantity of ancient and modern poetry, but, afterwards, I limited my studies to the poems of the two members of the tribe of Ṭay, Ḥabīb Ibn Aws," he means Abū Tammām (No. 143),—"and Abū 'Ubādah al-Buḥturi,<sup>1</sup> as also to those composed by Abū 'l-Ṭayyib al-Mutanabbī (No. 49). I committed to memory all the poetical works of these three authors and often studied them through during a number of years, till I obtained the faculty of expressing correctly my ideas and succeeded in acquiring such habits of application as became for me a (second) nature." My sole motive in giving this passage is to shew how essential it is for a scribe who is engaged to draw up epistles (official dispatches) that he should closely apply to the decomposing of poetry (into prose) and make that practice the main basis of his art. Diyā al-Dīn, having thus obtained possession of all the qualifications (requisite for a secretary of state), proceeded to the court of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn (Saladin), in the month of the first Rabī', 587 (April, A.C. 1191) and, in the month of the latter Jumādā of the same year (June-July,) he was attached to the service of that sultān by al-Qāḍi 'l-Fāḍil (No. 349). He continued with Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn till the month of Shawwāl of that year (Oct.-Nov.), when al-Malik al-Afḍal Nūr al-Dīn 'Alī (No. 461), the son of Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, asked permission from his father to take him (Ḍiyā al-Dīn) into his service. The sultān gave the latter his choice of remaining where he was or of passing into the service of the prince, and told him at the same time, that the pension (ma'lūm) already granted to him should be (in each case regularly) continued. Diyā al-Dīn decided on going with al-Afḍal, who was then a young man, and was appointed by that prince to the post of wazīr. Under such a patron, his circumstances became greatly improved. Al-Malik al-Afḍal, having obtained for himself the kingdom of Damascus, on the death of his father, Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn, chose Ḍiyā al-Dīn for his grand-wazir. All public affairs were then referred to the latter's direction and, in every circumstance, the highest confidence was placed in his ability. When Damascus was taken from al-Aḡḡal, that prince removed to Ṣarkḡhad, as we have already stated in his life, and as Ḍiyā al-Dīn had been on bad terms with the inhabitants of the former place, they now resolved on putting him to death; but the chamberlain, Maḡḡsin Ibn 'Ajam, got him out of danger by locking him up in a trunk and carrying him secretly out of the city. Ḍiyā al-Dīn then went to join his master and afterwards accompanied him to Egypt, whither that prince had been called in order to act as the nā ib (lieutenant) of his nephew, al-Malik al-Manṣūr. We have spoken of these events in our article on al-Aḡḡal, and that dispenses us from repeating our account of them here. Al-Malik al-'Āḡḡil having proceeded to Egypt (No. 461), took that country from his nephew al-Aḡḡal, who received in exchange the government of al-Ṣarḡqiyah ('Irāḡ and Mesopotamia) and set out for that province. Ḍiyā al-Dīn did not follow in the train of attendants, because he was afraid of being assassinated by a band of fellows who were waiting for him. He afterwards succeeded in leaving the city under a disguise, and he has given an account of his evasion in a long letter the text of which may be found in the work (dīwān) which contains his epistolary correspondence. He stayed away for some time from his master al-Malik al-'Āḡḡil and did not return to his service till that prince had established his authority in Sumaysāt. He then remained with him till the month of Ḍḡu 'l-Qa'dah 607 (April-May, A. C. 1211), when he passed into the service of al-Malik al-Zāḡir ḡḡāzī (No. 497), sovereign of Aleppo and al-Aḡḡal's brother. Soon after, he left his new master, in a moment of anger, and returned to Moṣul, but, being unable to make his way there, he proceeded to Arbela, where he was equally unsuccessful. From that he went to Sinjār and then, again, to Moṣul. Having decided on fixing his residence there, he got employed by the governor of that city as a writer of dispatches. This prince, whose name was Na r al-Dīn Maḡmūd, and who was the son of al-Malik al-Qāḡir 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, the son of Nūr al-Dīn

<sup>1</sup> His life will be found in this work.

Arsilān Shāh (No. 79), had then for atābek (guardian) the amīr Abu 'l-Faḍā'il al-Nūrī. This took place in the year 618 (A. C. 1221). I went more than ten times from Arbela to Moṣul, where Ḍiyā al-Dīn was residing, and tried to get introduced to him; because I knew that he had been the intimate friend of my father and I wished to study something under his tuition. I did not, however, succeed in my project. I subsequently left al-Sharqiyah and went to Syria, where I resided about ten years, and then proceeded to Egypt. Ḍiyā al-Dīn was still living at that time. I afterwards received at Cairo the news of his death. He composed a number of works which prove the eminence of his talent. That which bears the title of Al-Mathal al-Sā'ir fī adab al-Kātib wa'l Shā'ir (the Current Proverb, treating of the literary information requisite for prose-writers and poets) forms two volumes and attests the great abilities of the author. In it, he enters into full details and omits which a writer of epistles should know. When he finished it, he read it in public, and allowed it to be written down under his dictation. A copy of it having reached Baghdād, the jurisconsult 'Izz al-Dīn, who was also a man of letters, undertook to criticise it, to refute the author and to point out his errors. The names of this doctor were Abū Ḥāmid 'Abd al-Ḥamīd Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Abi 'l-Ḥadīd al-Madā'inī. He collected his strictures into a volume to which he gave the title of Al-Falak al-Dā'ir 'ala 'l-Mathal al-Sā'ir (the Revolving Sphere, directed against the Current Proverb). When the work was finished, he sent it to his brother, Muwaffaq al-Dīn Abu 'l Ma'ālī Aḥmad, called also al-Qāsim, and received from him a written answer containing these lines:

"Sir! you have made on the Current Proverb (a book called) the Revolving sphere. It is really a revolving sphere which will render your name as well known as a current proverb."

Izz al-Dīn (the author of that refutation) was born at al-Madā'in on Saturday, the 1st of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 586 (30th December, A. C. 1190) and died at Baghdād in the year 655 (A. C. 1257). His brother, Muwaffaq al-Dīn, died at Baghdād in 656 (A. C. 1258), very soon after the taking of that city by the Tartars. Both of them were jurisconsults, men of letters and of talent. They left some good poetry. Muwaffaq al-Dīn was born in the latter Jumādā (May-June,) or, according to another statement, in the first Rabī' (Feb.-March), A. H. 590 (A. C. 1194), at al-Mada'in. (Ḍiyā al-Dīn, the subject of this notice), is the author of the book entitled Al-Waṣṣḥi 'l-Marqūm fī ḥall al-Manzūm (the flowered silken tissue, treating of (the advantage resulting from) the decomposing of poetry (into prose). This treatise, though concise, is very fine and instructive. He composed also the Kitāb al-Ma'āni 'l-Mukhlṭara'ah (the book of original ideas), in which he treats of the art of prose composition. This is also an excellent work. Another production of his is a selection of poems from the works of Abū Tammām, Abū 'Ubadah al-Buḥturi, Dīk al-Jinn (No. 359) and Abū 'l-Ṭayyib al-Mutanabbī. It forms one large volume and may be learned by heart with great advantage (to the student). Abū 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) says, in his (biographical) History of Arbela : "I found the following verses inscribed, in the hand-writing of Ḍiyā al Dīn, at the end of the book which contains his selection (of poetry).

"Employ this treasure really precious ; for it is a selection made by a man of prudence and of judgment, to whom all elegancies of style were obedient and who took, at an early age, the right road to poetry."

He left also a dīwān of epistles, filling a number of volumes, and out of which a choice of letters has been made, forming one volume. An epistle, which he addressed to his sovereign, after having made a journey in the rainy season and during an intense cold, announces to him that the writer had left his service and contains the following passage ; "The rain-cloud pitched its tent over the (land) and let its skirts fall down upon it ; making every halting-place detestable and changing every hill into a pond. It trenched the soil with furrows, and converted every (valley-) side into the bank of a river. Methought it wished to rival in copiousness with the bountiful hand of our sovereign and to excel it in the persistance of the torrents which it poured forth. But your humble servant prays God to pardon him for making a comparaison so totally devoid of appropriateness ; he well knows the difference between that (cloud) which fills the valleys with its waters and that (hand) which over whelms the assembly with its beneficence. The plant producing flowers which the (ardent heats of) summer may cause to disappear, or fruit which is consumed by autumn, must not be compared to a prince (whose hand) produces riches sufficient to second (تغوث) his generous intentions and enables the flocks to graze during spring and summer in a fertile pasture-ground. Then (your servant) pursued his journey, suffering from the land and its mud, from the sky and its rain. It (the sky) was (like thy hand) liberal to excess ; it continued its donations unremittingly till it fatigued (those who received them) ; it was so prodigal that its bounty became irksome ; and your humble servant now dreads the glittering of swords much less than the flashes of the lightning. During the fall of these showers, he continued battling (against them), and suffered affliction from the intensity of their chillness. Receive my salutation ! ” When my friend Ḥusām al-Dīn Isā* 'l-Ḥājirī (No. 493) heard the passage in which the writer speaks of suffering affliction from the intensity of cold, he greatly admired the thought and expressed it again in the following terms :

“How painfully cool the water of her lips ! I shall complain of its poignancy (even) to those who blame me (for loving her).”

The person who casts his eyes on this verse may probably desire to know rest of the poem, and, as the piece is short, I think there will be no harm in giving it. Here it is :

“Between the sands of al-Jaz'a and the river of al-'Aqīq dwells a person whose (charms) her lover can never forget. He gathered the plunder of the bee (honey) off the lips of (that maiden) whose motions are so graceful and whose teeth so bright. If her forehead were not a paradise, it would not have produced those charming curls'. How painfully cool the water of her lips'. I shall complain of its poignancy (even) to those who censure me. Strange that in (our mutual) love, she who is my friend should act

1 The translator has purposely avoided giving the literal meaning of this verse. In all the piece he has substituted the feminine pronoun for the masculine.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid adds: Ibn Sanjār Ibn Bahrām known as al-Ḥājirī.—Ed.

towards me like an enemy ! Let my life be the ransom of that gazelle whose slender waist works the same effect as the pliant lance.<sup>1</sup>"

In our article on al-Nafīs al-Qutrusī (No. 65) we have inserted a piece rhyming in k and containing a verse which offers a similar thought. It is this :

"O mouth of the beloved ! thou didst consume my heart when I tasted of thy coolness."

But the idea itself originated with Ibn al-Ta'āwidi (No. 654), who said, in the well-known qasidah which rhymes in n.

"A (liquor) cool and chill from her lips, lights up the ardour (of love), and her languishing eyes kindle desire."

One of ʿIyā al-Dīn's dispatches, written in the name of his sovereign to the Grand Dīwān (al-Dīwān al-'Azīz, the court of the khalīf of Baghdād), contains the following passage : "His (the khalīf's) dynasty smiles sweetly, though it derives its name from al-'Abbās (the frowner). 'It is the best dynasty which was ever produced unto (the eye of) time, and thus also its subjects are the best people ever produced unto mortals. For its livery was chosen the colour of youth<sup>2</sup>, which augured that the dynasty would never fall into decrepitude and that it would always continue to enjoy the purest gifts of Fortune, the never-fading love (of the people) and their unceasing affection. The thought here expressed for the first time has for its author the humble servant of the dynasty, one always devoted to its colours ; never, till now, was it traced on paper by a pen, and never yet did it revolve with other original ideas in the human mind." I must, however, declare that ʿIyā al-Dīn was wrong in attributing to himself the discovery of this idea, for Ibn al-Ta'āwidi had already expressed it in a poem rhyming in s and containing the praises of the imām (khalīf) al-Nāṣir li-Dīn Allāh Abu 'l-Abbās Aḥmad. He recited it to that prince on the 1st of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 575 (29th March, A. C. 1180),

---

1 The effect which the poet means is wounding the heart.

2 Black is the colour of youth, because, at that age, the hair is dark.

the day of his instalment on the throne of the khalifate. It begins thus :

“(The wine) was carried round the company by a cup-bearer graceful and slender) as the pliant branch of the Arāk tree.”

That part of it where the poet brings on the transition offers the passage to which we allude and which we give here :

“Alas ! the day has brightened up my night (i.e. hoariness has rendered white my black hair) ; never again shall I enjoy the gloomy night of youth ! A time came which changed the tint of my hair and interposed between me and joyful sports. The young girls, on seeing my white hair, turn away and say : ‘Black is best of raiments ; why should it not have the preference, since it is the livery of the sons of al-‘Abbās ? ’ ”

Ḍiyā al-Dīn certainly added to the idea, but it was Ibn al-Ta‘āwidi who opened the gate and cleared the way ; so the other had no difficulty in following the road. A letter in which Ḍiyā al-Dīn announces the defeat of the infidels (the crusaders?) contains the following description of those who were stripped (by the victors) : “They were stripped and, in exchange for their garments, they obtained a raiment of blood. They appeared in the form of naked men, yet their attire was that of people who are dressed. How quickly was sewn for them scarlet clothing ; and yet it made no folds upon them and had no need of buttons !<sup>1</sup>. They received not this dress till I-lāmism had put on the livery of victory always to endure. (Their dress) was woven by the cutting blades of lances, not by the skill of the artisan ; and those who were to wear it had only to wait till the swords entered into the heads and the necks, and till the spear, straight as the letter alif, encountered the coats of mail<sup>2</sup>.” The idea expressed in the beginning of the passage just mentioned is borrowed from this verse of al-Buḥturi :

---

1 The true reading is ولم يزرر.

2 Literally : till the stroke of the spear joined the letter alif to the lām. The group lām-alif (s) is well known to Arabic student. But here the alif means a spear as straight as an alif, and the word lām means : coats of mail.

"They were stripped but the blood, shining on their bodies with a scarlet hue, made them appear as if they were clothed."

Ḍiyā al-Dīn has given a description of Egypt in a long epistle which contains a passage on the swelling of the Nile. The idea which he there enounces and the terms in which he expresses it are quite novel, having never occurred to any other person. Here is what he says: "Sweet in its waters, like the gatherings of the bee; red in its face, so I knew it had slain sterility." I have since discovered that this highly beautiful thought was borrowed from an Arab (of the desert) who composed a piece of verse which I here give:

"Pity a heart ever appalled by the lightnings of the cloud, as that cloud passes towards the mountain or over the valley. When its uncovered face appeared red through the murky night, (I knew full well) that it had murdered sleep."

Ḍiyā al-Dīn was quite right in taking this idea for himself; having employed it very skilfully in the passage before us. The same thought is found in a verse composed by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz (No. 316) on a maiden who had sore eyes:

People said: Her eyes complain (of what they suffer), and I replied: That ailment comes from having slain so many (lovers); their redness is the blood of her victims, and blood on the edge of a weapon is an excellent witness (against one who is accused)."

The epistles of Ḍiyā al-Dīn abound, in beauties. He used to contend with al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil in this species of composition: when the latter drew up an epistle, he endited another on the same subject. They kept up a correspondence, one with the other, and had frequent conferences (on literary matters). He had no great talent for poetry, and, as a proof, I may cite the following verse:

"Three things give joy: a cup, a bowl and a goblet. When the wine-skin is pierced for them, it is pierced for (the dispelling of) care."

He often recited the following verses of 'Umārat al-Yamanī:

"This heart (of mine) was sufficiently enamoured to obey the call of those (friends) who were setting out for a distant land, and not call (on me to detain it). It was certainly a false idea of mine to suppose that, after their departure, it would still remain within my ribs."

His productions abound in beauties, but we have spoken long enough on the subject. Ibn al-Mustawfī mentions him, with high commendation, in the History of Arbela. "He arrived at Arbela," says this author, "in the month of the first Rabi', 611 (July-August, A.C. 1214). He was born in al-Jazīrah (upper Mesopotamia) in the month of Shā'bān, 558 (July-August, A.C. 1163) and he died in one of the two months of Jumādā, 637 (Dec.-Jan., A.C. 1239-40) at Baghdād, whither he had been sent on a mission by the sovereign of Moṣul. The funeral service was said over him the next morning, in the mosque of the citadel (Jāmi' al-Qaṣr) and he was buried near the mausoleum of Mūsā Ibn Ja'far (No. 719), which monument is situated in the Quraysh cemetery, on the west bank (of the Tigris)." Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Najjār (No. 5, note) states, in his History of Baghdād, that Ḍiyā al-Dīn's death took place on Monday, the 29th of the latter Rabi' (28th November), of the above mentioned year (1239); and this writer must have known the fact better than any other person, because he cultivated specially this branch of knowledge (biography) and because he (Ḍiyā al-Dīn) died among them (the inhabitants of Baghdād). We have already spoken of his two brothers Majd al-Dīn Abu 'l-Sa'ādāt al-Mubārak (No. 526), and 'Izz al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī (No. 435). All three were men of talent, merit and eminence, and each of them composed some instructive works. Ḍiyā al-Dīn had a son of great abilities, who wrote very well both in prose and in verse, and composed a number of works, such as compilations, etc. I met with one of these treatises; the author had drawn it up for al-Malik al-Aṣḥraf (No. 722), the son of al-Malik al-'Ādil Ibn Ayyūb, and, in it, he displayed the highest talent. It contained a great quantity of pieces in prose and verse, composed by himself, and a number of his father's epistles. He was born at Moṣul in the month of Ramaḍān, 585 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1189), and he died there on Monday morning, the 8th of the first Jumādā, 622 (18th May, A.C. 1225). His name was Muḥammad and his title al-Sharaf (i.e. Sharaf al-Dīn, nobleness of religion).

737 AL-NAḌR IBN SHUMAYL

Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Naḍr, the son of Shumayl, the son of Kharashah, the son of Yazīd, the son of Kulthūm, the son of 'Abdah, the son of Zuhayr al-Sakb, the poet, the son of 'Urwah, the son of Ḥalimah, the son of Ḥujr, the son of Khuzā'i, the son of Māzin, the son of Mālik. the son of 'Amr, the son of Tamīm, was surnamed al-Tamīmī al-Māzinī. This grammarian, who was a native of Baṣrah, possessed extensive information in various branches of knowledge. He was veracious and trustworthy (as a traditionist), a perfect master of Arabic jurisprudence and poetry, well acquainted with (the accounts handed down concerning) the battle-days of the (ancient) Arabs, and a relator of traditions (respecting Muḥammad). He was one of al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad's pupils (No. 208). Abū 'Uhaydah (No. 704) mentions him in the Kitāb mathālib ahl al-Baṣrah (treatise on the ignoble acts of the people of Baṣrah) and relates as follows: "Al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl, when at Baṣrah, fell into straitened circumstances and left the place, with the intention of going to Khurāsān. The people of Baṣrah, to the number of about three thousand persons, escorted him out of the city; and not a man of them but was either a traditionist, or a grammarian, or a philologist, or a prosodian, or a historian. When he reached the Mirbad (No. 734) he sat down and said: 'People of Baṣrah! it is painful for me to quit you and, by Allāh! if I could have found there every day a handful of potherbs, I would not have left you'. Not one of the assembly offered to provide him with the pittance he required. Having arrived in Khurāsān, he settled at Marw and acquired great wealth." In our article on 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Mālikī (No. 375) will be found a similar discourse, pronounced by that qāḍī on leaving Baghdād. Al-Naḍr heard traditions from (the lips of) Hishām Ibn 'Urwah<sup>2</sup>, Ismā'il Ibn Abī Khālid<sup>3</sup>, Ḥumayd al-Ṭawil*

1 The Arabic word is Kiljah. It designates a weight of nearly four pounds.

2 The life of Hishām is given in this work.

3 Ismā'il Ibn Abī Khālid Hurmz, one of the Ṭablīs, or disciples of Muḥammad's Companions, was a traditionist of the highest authority. He died A.H. 145 (A.C. 762-3).

* M. de Slane gives Ḥamīd.—Ed.

(No. 80, note), 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Awn<sup>1</sup>, Hishām Ibn Ḥassān<sup>2</sup> and other Ṭābi'is (disciples of Muḥammad's Companions). Traditions were given on his authority by Yahyā Ibn Ma'in<sup>3</sup>, 'Alī Ibn al-Madini<sup>4</sup>, and other Imāms who had an opportunity of meeting him. He visited Naysābūr more than once, resided there for some time and taught (traditions) to the inhabitants. Some curious stories and anecdotes are related of what passed between him and al-Māmūn, the son of Hārūn al-Rashid, to whose social parties, at Marw, he was frequently admitted. Al-Hariri (No. 510) has inserted one of them in his Durra al-Ghawwās, where he says: "Some people employ the expression: (such a thing is) a plug (sadād) to keep out poverty, but they make a mistake, because the correct pronunciation is sidād. It is stated in the histories of (celebrated) grammarians, that al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl gained eighty thousand dirhams (two thousand pounds sterling) by teaching the right pronunciation of the word." He then gives the anecdote and commences by an isnād<sup>5</sup> which reaches up to Muḥammad Ibn Fāḍih* al-Ahwāzī who related as follows: "Al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl said to me: I used to attend al-Māmūn's evening parties and, one evening, I went there in a patched cloak. He (remarked this and) said: 'What is the meaning of such slovenliness? how dare you appear before the Commander of the faithful in so shabby a dress? I answered: 'Commander of the faithful! I am a feeble old man, and the heat in Marw is very great; so I wear this dress to keep myself cool! 'Not so!' replied the khalif, you are really a sloven.' We then got up a conversation<sup>6</sup> in which he brought on the subject of women

1 The traditionist 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Awn al-Baṣrī al-Muzanī died A.H. 151 (A.C. 768).

2 Hishām Ibn Ḥassān al-Azdi al-Baṣrī; this traditionist died A.H. 146 (A.C. 763-4).

3 The life of Ibn Ma'in will be found in this work.

4 In No. 103, mention has been made of this celebrated doctor. It is said that he was partisan of the doctrines professed by the Ṣhi'ites.

5 See vol. I, Introductions.

6 The text may also signify: We then began to repeat traditions.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Nāṣīb.—Ed.

and said : Hushaym<sup>1</sup> informed me that Mujalid*<sup>2</sup> had mentioned to him that al-Sha'bi (No. 296) had told him that he heard Ibn 'Abbās (No. 43, note) relate as follows : The Apostle of God said : When a man marries a woman for her piety and beauty, that is a stopper (sidād) to keep out poverty. In relating this tradition, the khalif gave to the word sidād the pronunciation of sadād. On this I said : 'Commander of the faithful !' Hushaym would have spoken truly, had he said : It was related to me by 'Awf Ibn Abi Jamilah<sup>3</sup>, on the authority of al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib, that the Apostle of God had spoken thus : When a man marries a woman for her piety and beauty, she is a stopper (sidād) to keep out poverty. Al-Māmūn was then reclining on a sofa, but, on hearing my words, he sat up and asked me why I said sidād. I replied : 'Because sadād, in this tradition, is a fault.' 'Do you mean to say,' said he, 'that I have made the fault ?' I answered : 'I do not ; but Hushaym made it, for he was a very incorrect speaker (lahāna), and the Commander of the faithful followed what he said.' He then asked me what was the difference between the two words, and I answered : Sadād means the good direction and the right road, in speaking of religion, but sidād means whatever suffices to support life, and everything which serves as a stoppage to another. 'Do the 'Arabs (of the desert) know this distinction ?' said he. 'They do,' said I ; 'here, for instance, is a verse by al-'Arjī (No. 115, note) :

"They allowed me to perish and what a man have they left to perish ! (one who could have served them well) in a day of terror or in the defence (sidād) of a breach."

"On this al-Māmūn exclaimed : 'God's curse on fellows who have no education !' He then remained with down-cast eyes, till

1 See No. 84, note.

2 Mujālid Ibn Sa'īd al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī learned traditions from some of the Tābi'is. He taught them to other traditionists, but his authority is considered by all the doctors as feeble. He died A.H. 134 (A.C. 751-2). al-Nawawī's Tahdhīb.

3 'Awf Ibn Abi Jamilah, surnamed al-A'rābī (the Arab of the desert), bore a fair reputation as a traditionist. He died A.H. 146 (A.C. 763-4), or 147.

* M. de Slane gives : Khalid, but gives correct name in the note.—Ed.

at length he said : 'What property (māl) do you possess ?' I replied : 'I have, at Marw, a little piece of land, and its feeble drainings (produce) I drink (alaṣubbuḥā) and suck up'. 'Shall I add', said he, 'to what you have'. I answered : 'Of that I stand greatly in need.' He then took a piece of paper and wrote on it I knew not what. Where he had done, he said : 'When you make use of the verb atrabā (to cover with earth or with wealth), how do you say ?' I replied : 'Otribhu (cover him with earth)'. 'Then' said he, 'how do you designate 'he person so covered ?' I answered : 'He is mutrab.' 'And', continued he, 'if you made use of (the verb derived from) ṭin (clay) how would you say in the imperative ?' To this I answered : 'ṭinhu (lute or cement him).' 'And', said he, 'the person thus cemented, how would you designate him ?' I should employ (the participle) maṭṭin. On this, he said : 'Better and better ! page ! earth him and cement him.' He then recited the evening prayer at the head of the assembly and, when he had finished, he said to his attendant : 'Take (this letter) and conduct him to al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl (No. 504). When al-Faḍl read the paper, he said to me : "Tell me, Naḍr ! why has the Commander of the faithful ordered you fifty thousand dirhams ?' I informed him of what had passed and disguised nothing. 'Then', said he, 'you reproved the Commander of the faithful for making a fault of pronunciation. 'Not so', said I, 'the fault was made by Hushaym, who was noted for his incorrect pronunciation, and the Commander of the faithful repeated his saying exactly, so as is always practised with the sayings of legists and relators of historical facts.' Al-Faḍl then ordered me thirty thousand dirhams, so that I gained eighty thousand by teaching the right pronunciation of a single syllable." The verse given as an example in the preceding recital was composed by 'Abd Allāh, the son of 'Amr and the grand-son of (the khalif) 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān. He was celebrated as a poet and had received the surname of al-'Arjī. Here is the piece to which it belongs :

"They have allowed to me to perish, and what a man have they left to perish ! (one who could have served them well) in a day of terror or in the defense of a breach ! (one so) firm in desperate conflicts when the lance of death was levelled at his throat ! I am dragged every day through assembled multitudes ; O God ! what oppression and violence I undergo ! (Now I am) as if I had never been the noblest pearl of their assemblies and as if I did not belong to the family of 'Amr. Perhaps the sovereign Lord, who hearkens to the prayers of his petitioners, may deliver me from bondage ; then people shall know my gratitude ; those who loved me I shall requite with honours, and those who hated me shall feel my indignation."

The reason of his composing these verses was, that when Muḥammad Ibn Hishām Ibn Ismā'il al-Makhzūmī, (the khalif) Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Mālik's maternal uncle was governor of Makkah, he cast al-'Arjī into prison ; (meaning thus) to avenge the honour of his mother al-Jidā,* who belonged to the family of al-Ḥārith Ibn Ka'b and on whom the poet had composed some amatory verses. It was not through love that al-'Arjī had done so, but merely to bring her son to shame. He remained in prison nine years and died there, after having been beaten with whips by al-Makhzūmī's order and paraded ignominiously through the market-places. He composed these verses when in prison. But we have digressed from our subject, so, let us return to it, and complete our account of al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl. Another anecdote concerning him is related by al-Ḥariri, in the Durrat al-Ghawwās, towards the beginning of the work ; he says : "Some people, when speaking to a sick man, make use of the expression : May God remove (masah, مسح) your ailment ! It is related that al-Naḍr Ibn Shumayl, being unwell, received visits of condolence from a number of people, and one of them, surnamed Abū Ṣālih, addressed him in the above-mentioned terms. Al-Naḍr replied : 'Do not say masah with a sīn (س) but say maṣṣah with a ṣād (ص) which word signifies to remove, to disperse. Have you not heard this verse of al-A'ṣhā (No. 115, note.):

'As often as the wine frothed in the (cup), the froth went off and disappeared (maṣṣah) ?'

"The man answered : 'Sīn may be sometimes employed instead of ṣād, as takes place in the words sirāt (road) and saqar (hell).' To this al-Naḍr replied : Then your name is Abū Ṣālih<sup>1</sup>.

1 صالح means holy and صالح - one who discharges his excrements.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : al-Jayda.—Ed.

Another anecdote of similar cast is related of a literary man who maintained, in the presence of the wazīr Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt (No. 462) that it was allowable to substitute the ṣīn for the ṣād in every case. On this, the wazīr said to him: 'In reading this verse (Qur'ān) Ṣūrah 13, verse 23): The gardens of eternal abode, into which they shall enter, with those of their ancestors, wives and offspring who were virtuous (ṣalāh); do you pronounce this word with a ṣād or ṣīn? The man blushed with confusion and uttered not a word". End of al-Ḥarīrī's remarks. I may here state that the ablest philologists allow the substitution of ṣād for ṣīn in every word wherein the ṣīn is followed, as an observation made by the translator, by one of these four letters ṭa (ط) kha (خ) ghayn (غ) and qāf (ق). You may therefore say ṣirāt for sirāt sakḥkhara lakum for sakḥkhara lakum, maṣḥhabah for maṣḥhabah, ṣayqal for sayqal. Take these as examples of a general rule. In the philological works which I have consulted I never met with any observation to the contrary, except in the Ṣaḥāḥ of al-Jawharī (No. 9, note), under the root مدغ where the author says; "Quṭrub Muḥammad, Ibn al-Mustanīr (No. 609) mentions that the family of Bal-'Anbar (Ibn al-'Anbar), a branch of the tribe of Tamīm, change the ṣīn into ṣād when it is followed by any one of these four letters: ṭa (ط) qāf (ق) ghayn (غ) kha (خ), no matter if one, or two, or three letters intervene. They say ṣirāt for sirāt, baṣṭah for baṣṭah, ṣayqal for sayqal, ṣaraqt for saraqt, maṣḥhabah for maṣḥhabah, miṣdagha for misdagha, sakḥkhara lakum for sakḥkhara lakum, and sakḥab for sakḥab." End of al-Jawharī's remarks on this subject.<sup>1</sup> Numerous anecdotes might be related of al-Naḍr, but concision is to be preferred. He left a great number of works one of which was on the subject of species? (al-Ajnās) and similar to the Gharīb;<sup>2</sup> he entitled it kitāb al-Ṣifāt (book of descriptions). According to 'Alī Ibn al-

1 The examples given here are most of them taken from the Qur'an, the correct reading of which is a matter of the highest importance with the Musulmāns. The ṣīn or ṣād is our s; the ṣād, or ṣod is an emphatic ṣ with a dull sound and gives to the following vowel a shade of that pronunciation which is special to the vowel o.

2 This is probably the philological work compiled by Abū 'Amr al-Ḥaybānī (No. 83) and entitled Gharīb al-Musannaf.

kūfil, the first volume treated of the human frame, beneficence, generosity and the qualities of women; the second volume treated of tents, dwellings, mountains and valleys; the third was wholly devoted to camels; the fourth to sheep, birds, the sun and moon, rivers, the various kinds of milk, truffles (of the desert), wells, cisterns, well-ropes, buckets and descriptions of wine; the fifth contained (passages of poems respecting) corn-fields, the vine, grapes, the names of potherbs and of trees, winds, clouds and rain. His other works were the Kitāb al-Ṣilāḥ (on weapons), the Kitāb khilq al-Faras (on the frame of the horse), the Kitāb al-Anwā (on the lunar mansions), the Kitāb al-Ma'ānī (on rhetorical figures?), the Kitāb Ghārīb al-Ḥadīth (on unusual words occurring in the Traditions), the Kitāb al-Masādir (on verbal nouns?), the Kitāb al-Mudkḥil, meant as an introduction to (the study of) al-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad's (No. 208) Kitāb al-'Ayn. Al-Naḍr died on the last day of Dhu'l-Ḥijjah, 204 (16th June, A.C. 820);—some say, on the first day of that month, and some place his death in the year 203. He died at Marw, a town of Khurasān, which was also his birth-place. He was brought up at Baṣrah and received, for that reason, the surname of al-Baṣrī. Naḍr, Shumayl, Kharashamah, Kulthūm, Abādah and al-Sakb, are to be pronounced as here indicated. (The poet Zuhayr) received the surname of al-Sakb for having composed the following verse.

Through the tent glittered a lightning-flash wide-spreading (uskūb).

Palimah has for vowels an a and an i. Ibn al-Jawzī says in his Kitāb al-Alqāb (book of surnames), in the article Sakb: "That person's real name was Zuhayr, the son of 'Urwah, the son of Julhumah." God knows best which of us is in the right! Julhumah, as here written, designated originally the side of the valley called Julhumah or Jalhamah,* and then became a proper name for men. Hujr takes a u for its vowel. Khuzā'i (as a proper name) is similar to the ethnic adjective (which signifies belonging to the tribe of Khuzā'ah). The remainder of the names (in the genealogy) are so well known that it is needless to fix their orthography.

1 According to the author of the Nujūm, a person named 'Alī Ibn Ghannām al-Kūfī died in the year 228 (A.C. 842-43).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Jalbah.—Ed.

738 THE IMĀM ABŪ ḤANĪFAH.

The imām and jurisconsult, Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān, the son of Thābit, the son of Zūṭā, the son of Māh, was a native of Kūfah and a client, by enfranchisement, to the tribe of Taym Allāh Ibn Ḥa'labah. He belonged to the same family as Ḥamzah al-Zayyāt (No. 199) and was a dealer in silk thread. His grandfather, Zūṭā was a native of Kābul, or, as some say, an inhabitant of Bābil; but, according to other accounts, he was a native of al-Anbār, or al-Nasā, or of Tirmidh. It was he who was enslaved (by the Muslim conquerors), and afterwards obtained his liberty. His son, Thābit, was born a Musulmān. Ismā'il, the son of Ḥammād and the grandson of Abū Ḥanīfah, made the following statement: "I am Ismā'il, the son of Ḥammād, the son of al-Nu'mān, the son of Thābit, the son of al-Nu'mān, the son of al-Marzubān who belonged to a noble family of Persia. God never laid upon us the yoke of slavery. My grandfather was born in the year 80 (A. C. 699-700). 'Alī (the son-in-law of Muḥammad), to whom Thābit went when a boy, invoked upon him and his posterity the benediction of God; and we hope that, on 'Alī's account, the Almighty will continue to grant us that favour! Al-Nu'mān, the son of al-Marzubān and the father of Thābit, was he who, on the day of the autumnal equinox (Mihrijān), presented the almond cake to 'Alī, who said: 'May our Mihrijān be every day like this!'" So it is related by the Kḥaṭīb (No. 33) in his History (of Baghdād), but God only knows (if the statement be true). Abū Ḥanīfah was born so far back that he might have met with four of the Prophet's Companions,—namely: Anas Ibn Mālik (No. 539, note) 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi Awfā<sup>2</sup>, who resided at Kūfah, Sahl Ibn Sa'd

1 This anecdote appears to have been preserved on account of the strange manner in which 'Alī pronounced the Persian word Mihrijān. It is reproduced in the Nazm al-Jumān, a work written by Ibn Dukmāk and containing a long and most interesting notice on Abū Ḥanīfah, with a chronological account of the doctors who professed his system of Jurisprudence. See MS. of the Bib. Imp., ancient fonds. no. 741, fol. 22.

2 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abi Awfā 'Alqamah al-Aslamī, one of the Musulmāns who emigrated to Madīnah, at the time of the persecution, took a share in al-Sā'idī<sup>1</sup> at Madīnah, and Abu 'l-Ṭufayl 'Āmir Ibn Wāṭih<sup>2</sup>, at Makkah, but he never saw them nor obtained from any of them Traditions respecting the Prophet. His disciples, however, say that he met with a number of the Companions and delivered traditional information on their authority; but, for doctors learned in the science of Traditions, this statement does not appear well supported. The Khaṭīb says, in his History of Baghdād, that Abū Ḥanifah saw Anas Ibn Mālik, that he took lessons in Jurisprudence from Ḥammād Ibn Abī Sulaymān<sup>3</sup>, and that he heard Traditions delivered by 'Aṭā Ibn Abī Rabāḥ (No. 394), Abū Ishāq al-Sabī'ī (No. 477), Muḥārib Ibn Dithār<sup>4</sup>, al-Haytham Ibn Ḥabīb al-Ṣarrāf, Muḥammad Ibn al-Munkadīr (No. 352, note) Nāfi' (No. 729) the mawla of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar, Hishām Ibn 'Urwah<sup>5</sup> and Sammāk Ibn Ḥarb<sup>6</sup>. He says also that Traditions were taught on his authority by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak (No. 300), Waki' Ibn al-Jarrāḥ (No. 149, note) the qāḍī Abū Yūsuf (No. 797), Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Shaybānī (No. 541) and other doctors. He was a learned man and a practiser (of good works), remarkable for self-denial, piety, devotion and the fear of God; humble in spirit and constant in his acts of submission to the Almighty. (The khalīf) Al-Manṣūr had him brought from Kūfah to Baghdād the war against the Bani 'l-Nadīr and the Bani Qurayzah. On the death of Muḥammad, he removed from that city to Kūfah, where he died, A.H. 86 (A.C. 705). Some Traditions have been handed down on his authority. (Nujūm; al-Nawawī's Tahdhīb al-Asmā).

(Continued on page 42.)

(Continued from page 41)

1 Saḥl Ibn Sa'd al-Sa'idī, a native of Madīnah, was about fifteen years of age when Muḥammad died. He himself died at Madīnah, A.H. 84 (A.C. 703).

2 Abū Ṭufayl 'Āmir Ibn Wāṭih al-Layḥī died A.H. 100 (A.C. 718-9). (Nujūm).

3 Abū Ismā'il Ḥammād Ibn Abī Sulaymān Muslim, a client of Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī and a native of Kūfah, possessed a good knowledge of Jurisprudence. He died A.H. 120 (A.C. 738). (Huffāz).

4 Abu 'l-Mu'tarrāf Muḥārib Ibn Dithār al-Sadūsī, a Tabi'ī and a native of Kūfah, died A.H. 121 (A.C. 739).

5 The life of Hishām Ibn 'Urwah will be found in this work.

6 Sammāk Ibn Ḥarb al-Dihli (الذهلي) died A.H. 123 (A.C. 740-1), (Nujūm).

in order to appoint him as qādī, but Abū Ḥanīfah refused to act. Al-Manṣūr then swore that he should act ; the other swore that he would not ; the khalif repeated his oath, and so did Abū Ḥanīfah. Oh this, the chamberlain. al-Rabī' Ibn Yūnus (No. 223) said (to the latter) : "Do you not perceive that the Commander of the faithful has made an oath !" Abū Ḥanīfah replied : "The Commander of the faithful has ampler means than I for expiating an oath not fulfilled!" As he persisted in refusing, the khalif sent him to prison. According to a popular relation, he (the khalif?)* passed a number of days as a counter of bricks in order to expiate his oath ; but this story does not repose on good authority. Here is al-Rabī's statement : "I saw al-Manṣūr enter into a discussion with Abū Ḥanīfah relatively to the affair of the qāḍiship ; and he (Abū Ḥanīfah) addressed him in these terms : 'keep the dread of the Lord before your eyes and choose no man for the service of those confided to your care except one who fears God. By Allāh ! I am not assured of (your) good will ; how then can I be assured against (your) anger ? If I happen to judge of this matter differently from you, you may perhaps threaten to have me drowned in the Euphrates, unless I accept the office of judge ; (even in that case) I should prefer being drowned. You have (a multitude of) dependants who require to be respected on your account ; and, for such a task, I am not fitted.' The khalif answered and said : 'You lie ! you are fitted for it !' Abū Ḥanīfah replied : 'You have now decided in my favour and against yourself ; is it lawful for you to nominate a liar as a qādī over those whom God has confided to your care ?' " The Khaṭīb gives other accounts of this affair and says : "When al-Manṣūr had finished the building of his city (Baghdād), he took up his residence there, and (his son) al-Mahdī fixed his abode (in the quarter) on the east side (of the river). (Al-Mahdī) having built the mosque at al-Ruṣāfah sent for Abū Ḥanīfah and asked him to act as a qādī in that place. The other refused, and al-Mahdī said to him : 'If you do not accept, I shall have you flogged till you consent.' Abū Ḥanīfah accepted and set in judgment for two days, but no one went to him. On

1 See No. 24, note.

* 'He' stands for Imām Abū Ḥanīfah, and not for the Khalifah.—Ed.

the third day, a coppersmith appeared before him with another man and said : 'This man owes me two dirhams and four dāniqs (one shilling and a penny) for a brass drinking-cup (and he will not pay me).' Abū Ḥanīfah said to the other : 'Fear God and reflect on what the coppersmith has said.' (The defendant) replied : 'He has no claim upon me'. The plaintiff being asked what he had to say, answered : 'Let the man swear to the truth of his declaration.' Abū Ḥanīfah then bade the defendant repeat these words : By God! by Him Who is the only God! When he saw the man on the point of pronouncing them and taking the oath, he interrupted him, passed his hand into his sleeve, opened his purse and, taking out two dirhams of full weight, he said to the coppersmith. 'Take these two pieces as the price of your cup. The man examined the money and consented to accept it. Two days later, Abū Ḥanīfah was taken ill and, six days after, he died." Yazīd Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah al-Fazārī<sup>1</sup>, when amīr over the two Irāqs, wished to appoint Abū Ḥanīfah to the place of qāḍī at Kūfah, whilst Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, the last of the Umayyad sovereigns, was still reigning and, on his refusal, he inflicted on him one hundred and ten strokes of a whip; ten every day. Finding, however, that Abū Ḥanīfah persisted in his resolution, he set him at liberty. When Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal spoke of this occurrence, he would shed tears and invoke God's mercy on Abū Ḥanīfah. This took place subsequently to the beating which he (Ibn Ḥanbal) had received for refusing to declare that the Qur'ān was created. Ismā'il Ibn Ḥammād (No. 195), the grandson of Abū Ḥanīfah, related as follows : "I passed (one day), through the Kunāsah with my father and, seeing him begin to shed tears, I said to him : 'My dear father! what makes you weep?' He replied: 'My dear son! in this place Ibn Hubayrah inflicted on my father ten strokes of a whip every day, for ten days, in order to force him to accept the office of qāḍī; but he would not.' " The Kunāsah is an open place at Kūfah. Abū Ḥanīfah was a handsome man, an agreeable companion, strictly honourable and full of kindness for his brethren. He was of a middle size, or, by another account, rather tall, and his complexion inclined to tawny. No man spoke more elegantly

1 The life of Ibn Hubayrah will be found in this work.

then he, nor with a sweeter tone of voice. The Khaṭīb states, in his History of Bagh Jād, that Abū Ḥanīfah dreamt that he was digging open the tomb of the Prophet, and sent to consult Ibn Sirīn (No. 539), who returned this answer: "The person who had this dream will lay open a science never before discovered." Al-Shāfi'i (No. 532) relates as follows: "Mālik (No. 524), being asked if he ever saw Abū Ḥanīfah, replied: 'I did. He was a man of such talent that, if he spoke of this pillar and undertook to demonstrate that it was of gold, he would do so, and adduce good proofs.' " Ḥarmalah Ibn Yaḥyā (No. 147) relates that al-Shāfi'i said: "There are five men on whom people must rely for the nourishment of their minds: he who wishes to become learned in Jurisprudence must have recourse to Abū Ḥanīfah";—Abū Ḥanīfah was then considered as one of the highest authorities in Jurisprudence;—"he who desires to become skilled in poetry must apply to Zuhayr Ibn Abī Sulmā<sup>1</sup>: he who would like to become well acquainted with the history of the Muslim conquests must obtain his information from Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq (No. 580); he who wishes to become deeply learned in grammar, must have recourse to al-Kisā'i (No. 408), and he who seeks to be acquainted with the interpretation of the Qur'ān must apply to Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān (No. 706)" This anecdote is related by the Khaṭīb, in his History. "In my opinion," says Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in<sup>2</sup>, "Ḥanzah (No. 199) is the only man for the Qur'ān-readings and Abū Ḥanīfah the only man for Jurisprudence; and I find that every one agrees with me on this point." Ja'far Ibn Rabi'ah said: "I attended (the lessons of) Abū Ḥanīfah during five years, and I never met a man who would remain silent as long as he; but, when he was questioned concerning (a point of) Jurisprudence, he would launch out into a flux of words, copious as a torrent; and, when he discoursed, I remarked that he spoke (sometimes) in an under tone and (sometimes) in a loud one. In the art of drawing conclusions from analogies (qiyās) he was a master of the highest rank." 'Alī

1 Zuhayr Ibn Abī Sulmā was the author of one of the Mu'allaqahs. For his history, see Mr. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'Hist. des Arabes, tome II, p. 527.

2 The life of Ibn Ma'in will be found in this work.

Ibn' Āṣim<sup>1</sup> relates as follows: "I went to visit Abū Ḥanifah and found with him a barber<sup>2</sup> who was about to shorten his hair. He said to the man: 'Cut away those parts only which are turning white.' The other replied: Do not insist (on that).' 'Why not?' said Abū Ḥanifah. 'Because', said the barber, 'that will increase their whiteness'. 'Well', said Abū Ḥanifah, cut away those parts which are black; that may perhaps increase their blackness'. When I related this conversation to Sharik (No. 270), he laughed and said: 'If ever Abū Ḥanifah gave up his system of qiyās, he did so with this barber.'<sup>3</sup> The following relation was made by 'Abd Allāh Ibn Rajā: "Abū Ḥanifah had for a neighbour, in Kūfah, a shoemaker who worked the whole day and came home, at night-fall, with a piece of meat which he boiled, or a fish which he fried. He would then set to drinking and, when the liquor got into his head, he would begin to sing. The words which he sang were always those:

'They allowed me to perish, and what a man have they left to perish! (one who could have served them well) in a day of terror or in the defence of a breach!'

He would remain drinking and repeating this verse till overcome by sleep. Abū Ḥanifah, being accustomed to pass his nights in prayer, heard constantly the din of that man's singing. Having perceived, after some time, that the noise had discontinued, he inquired for the man and was informed that he had been taken up by the guard and put into prison. The next morning, when he had finished the prayer of day-break, he got on his mule, went to the amīr's (the chief of the police?) and asked admittance. The amīr gave orders to introduce him without letting him dismount till he could set his foot on the carpet (which covered the hall). He then seated him in the place of honour, shewed him every mark of attention and asked him what he required. Abū Ḥanifah answered: 'I have for my neighbour a shoemaker and, some nights

1 The ḥāfiẓ 'Alī Ibn 'Āṣim Ibn Ṣuhayb died A.H. 201 (A.C. 816-7). (Nujum).

2 Literally: with a cupper (or barber-surgeon).

3 Because he employed the word perhaps and did not draw an absolute conclusion.

ago, he was taken up by the guard. Will the amīr have the kindness to order that he be set at liberty?' 'I will let him out', replied the amīr, 'not only him but all the persons arrested from that night till this day!'. He then gave orders for their immediate liberation. Abū Ḥanīfah rode off, and the shoemaker followed him on foot. On dismounting, he went over to him and said: 'Well, my good fellow! did I allow you to perish?'. The other answered: 'Oh the contrary; you, preserved me and fulfilled the duty of a good neighbour; may God reward you.' He then abandoned his evil ways and never returned to them again". Ibn al-Mubārak related this anecdote: "I met with Abū Ḥanīfah on the road to Makkah. He had caused the flesh of a fat young camel to be roasted for his companions and, as they wished to eat it with vinegar and could find no dish into which they might pour it out, they were very much embarrassed. I then saw him make a shallow hole in the sand, spread over it the (sufrah or leathern hide in which the provisions are packed up) and pour the vinegar into the concavity. Being thus enabled to eat their roast-meat with vinegar they said to him: 'All you do is well done'. He replied: 'Address your thanks to God, for it was on your account that He, out of His bounty, sent me this inspiration.' " The same Ibn Mu'ārik related that he once said to Sufyān al-Thawrī (No. 248) "Abū 'Abd Allāh! I never saw a man less given to backbiting than Abū Ḥanīfah; never did I hear him speak ill of the absent." Sufyān replied: "By Allāh! he is too wise to allow that his good qualities should be overcome by another quality which would destroy them". Abu Yūsuf<sup>3</sup> related as follows: "Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr sent for Abū Ḥanīfah, on which the chamberlain al-Rabī', who bore great ill-will towards the latter, said: 'Commander of the faithful! this Abū Ḥanīfah maintains an opinion contrary to that which was held by Ibn 'Abbās, your ancestor, who said that when

1 This anecdote is incorrectly given; the author of the Naẓm al-Jumān relates it in a much more satisfactory manner. According to him, the magistrate asked the prisoner's name, and, on Abū Ḥanīfah's saying that he did not know, he declared that he should set at liberty all those who had been arrested on the night which Abū Ḥanīfah mentioned.

2 This was an allusion to the words of the song.

3 Probably the Ḥanafite doctor whose life is given in No. 797.

a man takes an oath and puts restrictions to it, one or two days after, his restrictions are valid. Now Abū Ḥanīfah teaches that restrictions are not valid unless enounced simultaneously with the oath. On hearing this, Abū Ḥanīfah said : 'Commander of the faithful ! al-Rabī now asserts that the oath of fidelity towards you, which was taken by your troops, may not be binding.' 'How so !' (said the khālif). 'Because,' answered Abū Ḥanīfah, when they went back to their dwellings, they might have made such restrictions as rendered the oath null'. Al-Manṣūr laughed and said to al-Rabī : 'I advise you to avoid hereafter attacking Abū Ḥanīfah'. When the latter retired, al-Rabī said to him : 'You meant to bring about the shedding of my blood.' No,' replied Abū Ḥanīfah, 'but you meant to bring about the shedding of mine, and I saved not only myself but you ! Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī bore great ill-will to Abū Ḥanīfah, a fact of which the latter was well aware ; one day, on seeing him enter into al-Manṣūr's presence-chamber, where there was a numerous assembly, he said to himself : "I shall have his life taken this very day. He then turned towards him and said : 'Tell me, Abū Ḥanīfah ! if a man be ordered by the Cammander of the faithful to behead another man without knowing anything about his conduct, is it lawful for him to obey ?'" Abū Ḥanīfah answered : "Tell me Abu 'l-'Abbās ! does Commander of the faithful order what is right or what is wrong ?" The other replied : "He orders what is right." "Well", said Abū-Ḥanīfah, "let right be done and no questions asked." He then said to those who were near him : "That man thought to have me cast into bonds, but I shackled him". Yazīd Ibn al-Kumayt relates the following anecdote : "Abū Ḥanīfah stood in great awe of the Lord, and, one night, the mu'adhhdhin, 'Alī, Ibn al-Ḥasan, recited to us the chapter of the Earthquake (Qur'ān, sūrah 99), after finishing the 'ashā prayer', and Abū Ḥanīfah was behind him. When the congregation withdrew, I looked and saw Abū Ḥanīfah seated on the floor, in profound meditation and uttering deep sighs. So I said : 'I shall go away, for he minds me not.' On departing, I left the lamp burning, and in it was very little oil. The next morning after daybreak, I returned back and found him standing, with his hand clutched on his beard and saying: 'O Thou who givest a reward even for an atom's weight of good-works! O Thou who punishest, even for an atom's weight of evil-deeds! protect Thy servant, al-Nu'mān, from the fire (of Hell) and deliver him from the evil which conducts thereto! Permit him to enter into the greatness of Thy mercy!' I then pronounced the call to prayer, whilst the lamp was still burning and he standing. When I went in, he asked me if I came to take away the lamp. I answered: 'I have just made the call to morning prayer.' On this, he told me not to speak of what I had seen and made a prayer of two rak'ahs<sup>1</sup>. He then remained seated, till the public prayer began, and he joined in it, that morning without having made any ablution since the preceding evening<sup>2</sup>." Asad Ibn 'Amr<sup>3</sup> states that, according to accounts handed down respecting Abū Ḥanīfah, he always said the morning prayer without making any other ablution than that of the prayer on the previous evening; "and this", said he, "continued during forty years". He spent the night in reciting the whole of the Qur'ān, whilst making a single rak'ah, and his sobbings were so loud that the neighbours would pray God to have pity on him. It has been handed down that, in the place where he died, he had recited the entire Qur'ān seven thousand times. Ismā'il, the son of Ḥammād and the grandson of Abū Ḥanīfah, relates that he heard his father say: "When my father died, we asked al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Umārah to take charge of washing the corpse, which he did. When he had finished, he exclaimed: 'May God have mercy on you and pardon your sins! you never, for thirty years back, took a morning's meal, and never, for forty years back, did you pillow your head on your right hand during the night! you have (outdone and) fatigued those who strive to follow your example, and brought down disgrace upon the Qur'ān-readers.'" The anecdotes told of Abū Ḥanīfah's merit and of his decisions are very numerous; the Khaṭīb has inserted many of them in his History (of Baghdād) but, to those, he has subjoined others which it would have been fitter

---

1 See No. 257, note.

1 See No. 270.

2 Ablution is necessary before morning prayer, if the person slept, even for a moment, during the night.

3 The jurisconsult Asad Ibn 'Amr al-Bajall died A.H. 190 (A.C. 805-6). (Nujum).

for him to omit and not to notice : for no doubt can be entertained respecting the sincere religious convictions, the piety and the discretion of an imām such as he. Never was anything reproached to him but his insufficient acquaintance with Arabic grammar. As an example of his faults in that line, they tell us that the grammarian and Qur'ān-reader, Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā (No. 480) asked him, one day if the slaying of a man with a heavy object necessitated retaliation or not, and received an answer in the negative, conformably to Abū Ḥanīfah's own system of Jurisprudence and in opposition to the system established by al-Shāfi'i. Abū 'Amr then said to him : "What say you if a man slay another with a stone shot from a ballista ?" and he replied : "Not even if he slew him with (a stroke of) Abā Qubays!" which is the name of the mountain overhanging Makkah. To palliate this fault of his<sup>1</sup>, it was said that he spoke so conformably to the doctrine of those who teach that the six words of the language which are (usually) declined by a change of letters<sup>2</sup> and which are abūh (his father), akhūh (his brother), hamūh (his brother-in-law), fūh (his mouth), hanūha (her matrix) and (dhū in the expression) dhū māl (possessing wealth, should take the alif (a) in the nominative, the genitive, and the accusative cases. In proof of their opinion they cited this verse (of an ancient poet) :

"Her father and the father of her father<sup>3</sup> attained to the highest point of excellence."

This is one of the provincialisms peculiar to the inhabitants of Kūfah and, as Abū Ḥanīfah belonged to that city, he conformed to its dialect. This digression has led us from our subject, but discourse is liable to deviations and one matter brings on another. Abū Ḥanīfah was born A.H. 80 (A.C. 699-700; other accounts give the years 70 and 61, but the first date is the surest. He died in the month of Rajab (August), or of Shā'bān, according to another statement, and in the year 150 (A.C. 767). Some say 151 or 153 and on the 14th of the month of Rajab, but

1 He should have said Abī (in the genitive case).

2 Example : Nom. Abū, Gen. and Dat. Abi Ac. Abā.

3 Abā abāhā is used here for Abā abihā.

the date given first is right. He died in the prison at Baghdād, having been confined there in order that he might consent to fill the place of qāḍī, and that he would not do. This is the more authentic account, for some say that he did not die in confinement. According to another relation his death took place on the day of al-Shāfi'i's birth. He was buried in the Khayzurān cemetery, and his tomb, which is a well-known monument, is much frequented by pious visitors. Zūfā is a Nabaṭean name. Kābul is a place of great note, in India. It has produced a number of remarkable men, some of them distinguished for learning, and all of them bearing the surname of al-Kābull. As for Bābil and al-Anbār, these names are so well-known that it is needless to mark their pronunciation. Sharaf al-Muik Abū Sa'd Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr al-Khuwārazmī who was secretary of state under the reign of the Saljūq sultān, Malik Shāh, erected a chapel and dome over the tomb of Abū Ḥanīfah and, close to it, he built a large college for the instruction of students in Ḥanafite law. When the work was finished, he rode out to inspect it with a numerous retinue of men high in office. Whilst he was there, the sharif Abū Ja'far Maṣ'ūd, the same who was generally known by the surname of al-Bayāḍī (No. 692) went up to him and recited to him extempore these lines :

"Saw you not how science remained disconnected, till it was embodied by him who is now hidden in this tomb. Thus also was this spot of earth : it remained sterile, till the generosity of his excellence Abū Sa'd gave it new life."

For this impromptu the poet received an ample reward. Abū Sa'd built also a college at Marw and a number of ribāṭs (No. 72, note) and caravānsērās in the deserts. He was noted for the great number of his charitable foundations. Towards the close of his life, he left the service of the state and confined himself to his house, but was then frequently applied to for advice on public affairs. He died in the month of Muḥarram, 494 (Nov-Dec., A.C. 1100) at Iṣbahān. Abū Ḥanīfah's mausoleum and the dome over it were erected by Abū Sa'd in the year 459 (A.C. 1066-7). I stated (No. 665), in the life of Alp Arslān, the father of the sultān * Afḡhānistān was not a separate country in those days.

Malik Shāh, that it was he (Alp Arslān) who erected the mausoleum over the grave of Abū Ḥanīfah, and so I found it recorded in a historical work; but I do not now recollect from what book I took my information. I discovered afterwards that the person who built the chapel and the dome was Abu Sa'd; but it is probable that he only presided over its erection as being Alp-Arslān's representative, a very usual thing with sovereigns and their lieutenants. It was for this reason that the construction of the monument was attributed to Alp Arslān during that sovereign's life-time. This is indicated by the date of the construction, which falls within the reign of that sovereign and by the fact that Abū Sa'd was then acting as his secretary of state. Abū Sa'd remained in office after accession of Malik Shāh. Those observations I make for the purpose of reconciling the two statements.

739 THE QĀDĪS OF THE NU'MĀN FAMILY

Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān Ibn Abī 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥayyūn was a doctor highly distinguished for his talents. The amīr al-Mukhtār al-Musabbihī mentions him in his historical work and says: "He was a man noted for learning, for skill in Jurisprudence, for piety and for talents not to be surpassed. He composed a number of works, one of which was the Kitāb Ikhtilāf Uṣūl al-Madhāhib (treatise on the differences which exist between the fundamental principles of the various systems of Jurisprudence). He at first followed the doctrine of Mālik, but then passed over to the sect of the Imāmiyahs (the Fāṭimids), and drew up a work entitled Kitāb ibtidā al-Da'wah li'l 'Ubaydiyyīn (on the origin of the mission got up in favour of the Fāṭimids). He composed also two treatises on Jurisprudence, the one bearing the title of Kitāb al-Akhhār (book of information), and the other Kitāb al-Intiṣār (the vindicator). Ibn Zūlāq (No. 159) has an article, in his history of the qādīs of Egypt, on Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the son of Nu'mān we are here speaking of, and there we read a passage to this effect: "His father, the qādī al-Nu'mān Ibn Muḥammad, was a man of the highest abilities, deeply versed in the Qur'ān, fully acquainted with the meaning of the expressions contained in that book, skilled in the systems of Jurisprudence, well informed respecting the conflicting opinions entertained by the legists, learned in Arabic philology, in poetry of the higher class, in the history of the battle days of the people (the ancient Arabs), and distinguished for intelligence and equity. He composed for that family (the Fāṭimids) some volumes containing thousands of leaves; they were drawn up with great talent and in a style remarkable for the beauty of its cadences and rhymes. He composed also a good work on the meritorious and disgraceful acts (committed by the Arabian tribes), and wrote a number of refutations addressed to those who contested his opinions. One of these treatises was directed against Abū Ḥanīfah (the imām), another against Mālik and al-Shāfi'ī and another against Ibn Surayj (No. 20). In his work entitled Ikhṭilāf al-Fuqahā (differences of opinion between the doctors), he takes the defence of the People of the House (the Fāṭimids). To a poem of his, treating of Jurisprudence, he gave the title of al-Muntakhab (choice selection). He was attached to the service of al-Mu'izz Abū Tamīm Ma'add Ibn al-Manṣūr,"—(a sovereign whom we have already noticed)—"and, when that prince set out from Ifrīqiyah for Egypt, he accompanied him. He did not long survive (the journey), his death having taken place in Old Cairo, on the first of Rajab, 363 (28th March, A.C. 974)." Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Farḡhānī states, in his History of the qā'id Jawhar (Vol. I, p. 340) that he died on the eve of Friday, the last day of the second Jumāda, in the year just mentioned, and that the funeral prayer was said over him by al-Mu'izz. Ibn Zūlāq speaks of him after mentioning the death of al-Mu'izz, when he gives the names of that sovereign's children and of the qādīs who acted by his appointment. He there says: "And his qādī, the one who came with him from Maghrib, was Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān, the son of Muḥammad the missionary<sup>1</sup>. On arriving at Old Cairo, he (al-Mu'izz) found that Jawhar had established there provisionally as qādī a native of Baghdād named Abū Ṭāhir al-Dhuhli, and this appointment he confirmed." Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, Abū Ḥanīfah's father, lived to an advanced age. When four years old, he could recite many curious pieces which he had learned by heart. He died in the month of Rajab, 351 (August, A.C. 962), aged one hundred and four years, and was buried near the Bāb Salām, one of the gates of Qayrawān. The funeral service was said over him by his son.

<sup>1</sup> See No. 542, note.

Abū Ḥanīfah left a number of sons who distinguished themselves by their talents and rose to high places under government. (One of them,) Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī was appointed by al-Mu'izz to act as the associate of Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad in the post of qāḍī and chief magistrate. This Abū Ṭāhir was the son of Aḥmad, the son of 'Abd Allāh, the son of Naṣr, the son of Bujayr, the son of Ṣāliḥ, the son of Usāmah al-Dhuhlī. The two continued to act with joint authority till the death of al-Mu'izz and the accession of al-'Azīz Nizār, that prince's son. The new sovereign confided to the qāḍī Abū 'l-Ḥasan the administration of the two (principal) mosques and the direction of the mint, but the magisterial authority was shared by them both till the qāḍī Abū Ṭāhir had a derangement of humours which paralyzed one of his sides and rendered him incapable of moving from one place to another without being carried. On the 1st of Ṣafar, 366 (29th Sept. A.C. 976), al-'Azīz proceeded on horseback to the island which lies between Old Cairo and Jīzah. Abū Ṭāhir, accompanied by his assessors, was borne the gate of the Ṣan'ā' and, being presented to the prince, requested him to take into consideration the state of weakness to which he was reduced and allow him to employ, as his substitute, his own son Abū 'l-'Alā. It is related that al-'Azīz said, on seeing him so much emaciated: "Nothing remains to be done with that man but to make qadīd of him.<sup>2</sup>" Two days later,

1 The naval arsenal (dār al-ṣan'a) situated in the island of Rūḍah was called the Ṣan'ā, by abbreviation. See Maqrīzī's kḥiṭāṭ, or topographical description of Cairo, edition of Pūlāq, Vol. II, p. 178.

2 Qadīd is the name given to long stripes of flesh salted and dried in the sun. Al-'Azīz's words are equivalent to the expression: he is only fit to make cat's-meat of. The prince did not like Abū Ṭāhir and paid no attention to his request.

the prince nominated to the exclusive possession of the qāḍīship of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the son of al-Nu'mān. Abu 'l-Ḥasan then rode to the great mosque of Cairo and caused his diploma to be read there to the public ; and from thence he proceeded to the Jāmi' al-Atīq (the ancient mosque) at old Cairo and presided at the same ceremony. The person who read the diploma was his brother, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān. By this document he was empowered to act as (supreme) qāḍī over all the provinces of Egypt, Syria, Makkah, Madinah, Maghrib and the other countries belonging to al-'Aziz ; it authorized him, besides, to act as (chief) preacher, (chief) imām, inspector of the gold and silver coinage and controller of weights and measures. He then returned to his house, accompanied by a crowd of people, no one thinking it proper to stay away. The qāḍī Abū Ṭāhir, being always unwell, was obliged to keep to his room, and there he taught Traditions to the numerous scholars who went to visit him. This continued till the end of the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 367 (9th July, A.C. 978), when he died. He had then attained the age of eighty-eight years, and had held the post of qāḍī for sixteen years, and seventeen days. He was authorized, during that period, to revise the judgments (pronounced in the courts of law), but he could never fill this duty in a satisfactory manner. He had acted for some time as a magistrate in that suburb of Baghdād which lies on the east bank (of the Tigris) ; but he subsequently removed to Egypt. The qāḍī Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī then chose for deputy his own brother, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, and placed under his jurisdiction (the towns of) Damietta, Tinnīs, al-Faramā and (the country of) al-Jifār. Abū 'Abd Allāh proceeded to those places and, having installed deputies in them, he returned back. Soon after, in the year 367, al-'Aziz set out for Syria, and Abu 'l-Ḥasan, who accompanied him left his brother Abū 'Abd Allāh to act as judge in his place. Abu 'l-Ḥasan was well versed in a number of sciences ; besides his knowledge of the duties incumbent on a qāḍī and of the grave and dignified manner in which they should be filled, he was well acquainted with Jurisprudence, Arabic philology, polite literature, poetry and the stories of the battle-days (of the ancient Arabs). He was also a good poet and held a high rank in the art of verse. One of his pieces is given by al-Tha'ālībī (No. 356) in the Yatīmat al-Dahr, and runs as follows :

"I have such a friend that poverty never attains me, once his eyes fall upon my wants. He gives (me) wealth, satisfies (my wishes) and obliges me neither to kiss his hand nor his foot. He took charge of my interests when I neglected them, and minded my affairs when I heeded them not."

Al-Tha'ālībī gives also as his, the following piece in which the same idea is expressed :

"I have a friend, full of courtesy ; friendship like his is a title of honour. He shews me more regard than need be shown, and feels obliged to do more than is necessary. If his good qualities were appreciated at their full value, gold, compared with them, would be worthless."

The following verses are also given as his by Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Bākhārī (No. 450), in the Dumayt al-Qaṣr, and are also to be found in the biographical article which Ibn Zulfāq has devoted to him (al-Nu'mān) in the History of the qāḍīs of Egypt ; they are perfectly well turned :

"At 'Arafāt<sup>1</sup> I made the acquaintance of a maid whose beauty stole from me (the merit of) my good works. When I put on the pilgrim's dress, she forbade sleep to visit my eyes, and, with her glances, she laid waste my reserved park (my heart). When she hurried along (from 'Arafāt) with the other pilgrims tears hurried in emulation from my eyelids. She placed a burning coal on my heart when she walked towards the spot where they cast the pebbles. This soul of mine did not obtain its wish ; so I feared, when at al-Khayf, that the hour of my death was at hand".

Abu 'l-Ḥasan continued to fulfil the duties of a qāḍī and to remain in high favour with al-'Aziz, till he caught a fever whilst presiding, in the mosque, over the court of justice. He rose up immediately and returned to his house, where he expired after an illness of fourteen days. His death took place on Monday, the 6th of Rajab, 374 (3rd Dec., A. C. 984). The next morning, he was borne on a bier into the presence of al-'Aziz who was then (with the army) encamped in the plain of al-Jubb, near the place which is now known by the name of al-Birkah (the pond)<sup>1</sup>. The bier was then deposited in the mosque called Masjid al-Bir wa 'l-Jummayzah (the mosque of the well and the sycamore fig-tree). Al-'Aziz left the camp and went to say the funeral prayer over the corpse, which was then carried back and buried in the house of the deceased, situated in the Ḥamrā. Three places in old Cairo had received this name because the Europeans used to lodge there<sup>2</sup>. Al-'Aziz then dispatched to Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, Abu 'l-Ḥasan's brother, a message worded in these terms: "The place of qāḍī is yours; we shall never allow it to pass out of your family". Abu 'l-Ḥasan had remained in office during nine years, five months and four days. He was born in Maghrib, in the month of the first Rabi', 329 (Dec.-Jan., A. C. 940-1). Old Cairo remained for eighteen days without a qāḍī to arrange its affairs, and that because Abū 'Abd Allāh was unwell. When his malady abated, he rode in a palanquin to the camp of al-'Aziz. This was on Thursday, the 22nd of Rajab. The next day, Friday, he went from that to the Jāmi' al-Atiq after having received from al-'Aziz his appointment to the qāḍīship, with a pelisse of honour and the sword (of office) suspended from his shoulder. Being much enfeebled by sickness, he was unable to get down from the palanquin and enter into the mosque; so he proceeded to his own house, and his son, accompanied by a band of his kinsmen, went to the mosque and read the diploma as soon as the Friday prayer was ended. The document was similar to that which had been drawn up for Abu 'l-Ḥasan and granted to the new qāḍī the same powers as his brother had received before. In the month of Dhu

---

<sup>1</sup> This piece is full of verbal quibbles and clever allusions to the ceremonies of the pilgrimage and the places near Makkah where these ceremonies are accomplished.

1 See M. De Sacy's Chrestomathie arabe, t. I. p. 187, of the second edition.

2 The adjective ḥamrā (rubra) served to designate such persons as had a clear complexion.

'l-Qa'dah 374 (March-April, A.C. 985), Muḥammad appointed his son Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Aziz to act as his deputy in Alexandria. This was done by the order of al-'Aziz, who then arrayed Abu 'l-Qāsim in a robe of honour. On Friday, the 1st of the first Jumādā, 375 (19th September, A.C. 985), the qādī Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān married his son Abu 'l-Qāsim to the daughter of the qāid Jawhar. The marriage-act was signed at the levee of Al-'Aziz, and none were present except the officers of the court. The dowry settled (by the bridegroom) on the bride was three thousand pieces of gold and the kitāb<sup>1</sup> (consisted of) a single robe of one uniform colour. When al-Mu'izz, the father of al-'Aziz, was in Maghrib, he ordered the qādī Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān to have an astrolabe made in silver and to place a trust-worthy person beside the workman (lest he should embezzle some of the metal). He chose his son, Muḥammad, for that purpose and, when the astrolabe was finished, he carried it to al-Mu'izz. "Whom did you place beside the workman?" said the prince. "My son Muḥammad," was the reply. "He shall be qādī of Egypt!" exclaimed al-Mu'izz, and so it happened. The fact was that al-Mu'izz having always entertained hopes of getting that country into his possession, was induced to utter these words, and his good fortune, seconded by destiny, effected for him what he wished. The qādī Muḥammad related the following anecdote: "When I was a boy, in Maghrib, al-Mu'izz would say to his son al-'Aziz, every time he saw me: There is your (future) qādī." Muḥammad was well acquainted with the (leading) maxims of Jurisprudence and a great number of sciences; he was an accomplished scholar and could recite, with much elegance, narrations, poems and stories respecting the battle-days (of the Arabs). He composed also some poetry, and one of his pieces is as follows:

"Thou who resemblest the moon of heaven, when she is seven (days old), and five (more) and two! Thou whose grace is the perfection of beauty ! Thou hast preoccupied my heart and kept sleep from my eyes. Can I hope to obtain from you any favour, or must I return back with the boots of Ḥunayn<sup>1</sup> ? My enemies deride me for loving thee and say : 'There you are still with empty hands !' Be kind to me or take my life, thou hast the power to do one or the other."

1 The word kitāb means a book or a written document. It is evidently employed here as a law-term, but, as such, it is not to be found in the works on orthodox Jurisprudence. It may perhaps belong to the system of law professed by the Shī'ites and signify the jihāz (in French, trousseau) given to the bride.

The following piece was sent to him in a letter by 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ja'farī, a native of Samarqand :

"All other qādis have found their equals in renown, but Abū 'Abd Allāh is without a rival. He is unequalled in noble qualities admirable in honourable deeds, great and illustrious. In renown, splendid ; in resolution, firm ; (brilliant) like the flashing of the polished sword. In judging causes, he has right reason for a sworn companion ; when he bestows, the abundant rain cloud is merely his precursor. Were we to examine the sentences pronounced by him, we should be let to declare that he was assisted by (the angel) Gabriel. When he mounts into the pulpit, he is really a Quss<sup>2</sup> ; when he is present at assemblies, he is truly a Khalil<sup>3</sup>."

1 This proverb means : much disappointed. It has been explained in three or four different manners, one of them as follows : A desert Arab, mounted on his camel, entered into a town, went to the Bāzār and bargained for a pair of boots. Not being able to conclude with the maker, whose name was Ḥunayn, he flew into a passion, gave him foul names and then, having made his other purchases, he got upon his camel, left the town and took the road leading to his tent. The boot-maker was so highly offended at the Arab's insulting language that he resolved on being revenged. Taking up the boots, he ran to the road by which the Arab had to pass and threw one of them on the ground. A mile or two farther on, he threw down the other and hid himself. The Arab saw the first boot as he was riding along and said : "There is one of the boots of Ḥunayn ; if the other was with it, I should dismount and pick it up." About half an hour after, he perceived the other boot and regretted not having picked up the first ; so he got off his camel, not wishing to fatigue it too much, and having fettered it with a cord, picked up the boot which was lying there and ran back to take up the other. As soon as i.e. disappeared, Ḥunayn went off with the camel and the baggage. When the Arab returned, his camel was missing ; so he went home on foot. Being asked what he had brought back, he replied "The boots of Ḥunayn."

2 See No. 62, note.

3 The person here ment was probably al-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad, See No. 208.

To this the qāḍī Muḥammad returned, in writing, the following answer :

"We have read in your poem charming things, such as a most refined genius only could produce. Its lines are as a delightful garden, diffusing around the penetrating odour of musk. When they are recited, their fragrance perfumes not only our dwellings but the very street. We long to see you, and you long to visit us. Send us, every day, verses like those ; for you are capable of every generous deed."

The following passages are extracted from Ibn Zūlāq's History of the qāḍīs of Egypt : We never saw any qāḍī in Old Cairo, acquire so much influence as Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān, and, as far as we have learned, the like was never seen in 'Irāq. He well deserved that great authority on account of his learning, his integrity, his self command, the equity of his judgments and the awe (which he inspired). In the month of Muḥarram, 383 (Feb.-March, A.C. 993), he authorised his son, Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Aziz, to act as his deputy in Old and New Cairo and to fulfil the duties of a judge, uninterruptedly, every day. Before that, he himself gave audiences on Mondays and Thursdays only. Abu 'l-Qāsim commenced immediately to hear causes, to judge and to enregister acts. He (Muḥammad) had at first confided this place to his nephew, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn al-Nu'mān, but, on the 10th of the first Jumādā. 377 (7th Sept., A.C. 987), he replaced him by his own son, Abu 'l-Qāsim, whom he authorised to act on Mondays and Thursdays only. The qāḍī Muḥammad had risen so highly in the favour of al-'Aziz that, in the year 385, on the festival of the Sacrifice (5th Jan., A.C. 996), he was allowed by that sovereign to go up with him into the pulpit. When al-'Aziz died, it was the qāḍī Muḥammad who washed the corpse (previously to interment). Al-Ḥākim (No. 715), the son and successor of al-'Aziz, confirmed Muḥammad in his place, raised him to higher honours and augmented his authority. From the moment that the qāḍī acquired such favour at court and such influence in the state, he was frequently unwell and, being a constant sufferer from gout and colic, he was often laid up. The ustād Barjawān (No. 109), high in rank though he was, went very often to visit him. The illness of the qāḍī continued to increase and, on the eve of Tuesday, the 4th of Ṣafar 389 (25th January, A.C. 999), he expired, immediately after the last evening prayer. Al-Ḥākīm rode to the house of the deceased, at Cairo and, having there repeated the funeral prayer over the corpse, he presided at the interment, after which, he returned to his palace. The qāḍī Muḥammad was born in Maghrib on Sunday, the 3rd of Ṣafar, 340 (11th July, A.C. 951). His palace was given by al-Ḥākīm to one of the courtiers. On Wednesday, the 9th of Ramaḍān (August, A.C. 999),* the body was removed to the qāḍī's private house in Old Cairo and, on the eve of Friday, the 10th, it was borne to the Qarāfah cemetery and deposited in the tomb which contained the bodies of his father and brother. After the death of Abu 'Abd Allāh Muḥammād, Cairo remained more than a month without a qāḍī. Al-Ḥākīm then appointed to that office Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn al-Nu'mān, and the same whom his uncle Muḥammad had authorised to act as his substitute and whom he afterwards replaced by his own son Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Azīz. Al-Ḥusayn's nomination took place on the 6th of the first Rabi' 389 (25th February, A.C. 999). He remained in office till Thursday, the 16th of Ramaḍān, 394 (7th July, A.C. 1004), when his place was given to his cousin, Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Azīz, the son of the above-mentioned Muḥammad. Some time after, al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn al-Nu'mān, was beheaded by al-Ḥākīm's order, and that for reasons too long to relate<sup>1</sup>. This occurred on Sunday, the 6th of Muḥarram, 395 (23rd October, A.C. 1004). He was 1 A sum of twenty thousand pieces of gold came into the possession of al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Nu'mān who, being a qāḍī, acted as guardian and depositary of all property left by persons who died. The son of the deceased claimed it from him and received part of the sum by instalments. On asking for the rest, he was told by the Qāḍī that he was paid up and that no more remained. Al-Ḥākīm, to whom the heir addressed a complaint, had the Qāḍī brought before him and the account-book (diwān) of the tribunal examined. This inquest proved that a large sum remained due. The qāḍī acknowledged his guilt, indemnified the heir and begged for pardon. Al-Ḥākīm deprived him of his place and sent him to prison, where he was beheaded, about a year afterwards, in A.H. 397 (A.C. 1006). History of the Qāḍīs of Cairo; MS. of the Bibl. Imp., ancien fonds, No. 690).

* 24 August.—Ed.

executed in the cell where he was confined, and his body was consumed by fire. Abu 'l-Qāsim then became qādī with undivided authority, and was chosen, besides by al-Ḥākim, to preside at the court of grievances<sup>1</sup>. He thus united in his attributions the functions of the two officers, a thing which never before happened to any member of his family. Al-Ḥākim then treated him with such favour that, on the day of the breaking of the Fast (the 1st of the month of Shawwāl), he permitted him to go up with him into the pulpit, immediately after the general-in-chief of the army. The same honour was accorded to him on the festival of the Sacrifice (the 10th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah). In judging causes, he displayed great firmness of character and treated with extreme severity such of the grandees as dared to resist him. He even arrested many of them and did not allow them to leave the court till they had fulfilled their engagements. He continued to fill all the magisterial duties which al-Ḥākim had confided to him : but, on Friday, the 16th of Rajab, 398 (27th March, A.C. 1008), he was removed from office by that prince and replaced by Abu 'l-Ḥasan Mālik Ibn Sa'id Ibn Mālik al-Fāriqī. It was thus that the office of qādī passed out of the family of al-Nu'mān. Some time after, al-Ḥākim ordered (some of) his Turkish soldiers to kill, not only Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Aziz, but the general Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn, the son of Jawhar and Abū 'Ali Ismā'il, the brother of the qādī Faḍl Ibn Sālih. They were all sabred, at the same moment, and that for reasons too long to relate. This happened on Friday, the 22nd of the latter Jumādā, 401 (31st January, A.C. 1011); the mercy of God be upon them ! Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Aziz was born on Monday, the 1st of the first Rabi', 354 (7th March, A.C. 965). Abū Maṣṣūr Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad al-Farḡhānī al-Miṣrī states, in his historical work, that he (the qādī Abū Ṭāhir) was well noted for reciting from memory a great number of pieces and for the agreeableness of his society : with his elders, he behaved like an elderly man, with the middle-aged men, like one who had reached that period of life, and, with young men, he acted as a youth. His death took place on the eve of the 30th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 367 (9th July, A.C. 978).

<sup>1</sup> See No. 141, note.

740 AL-SAYYIDAH NAFISAH

Al-Sayyidah<sup>1</sup> Nafisah was the daughter of Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan, the son of Zayd, the son of al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib. She arrived in Old Cairo with her husband Ishāq, the son of Ja'far al-Ṣādiq. According to another account, she went there with her father, al-Ḥasan, whose tomb, it is said, may be seen in Old Cairo, but is not generally known. He had been governor of Madīnah in the name of (the khalif) Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr and had held that post during five years when he incurred this sovereign's displeasure and was dismissed from office. All his property was confiscated and he himself shut up in the prison at Baghdād and detained there till the death of al-Manṣūr. Al-Mahdī having then come to the throne, gave him his liberty and restored to him all that had been taken from him. Al-Ḥasan afterwards remained with him and when that prince set out to make the pilgrimage, he followed in his train, but died on reaching al-Ḥājir, A.H. 168 (A.C. 784-5), at the age of eighty-five years. Al-Ḥājir is at five miles from Madīnah. "According to another statement he died at Baghdād and was interred in the cemetery of al-Khayzurān; but the fact is that he died at al-Ḥājir". So says the Khaṭīb in his History of Baghdād, but God knows best the truth. Nafisah was a woman noted for her piety and the holiness of her life. It is related that the imām al-Shāfi'ī, when he arrived in Old Cairo, for the date, see his life (No. 532), went to visit her and learned some Traditions from her. The people of Cairo had the highest esteem for her, and the veneration in which she was held subsists up to the present day. When al-Shāfi'ī died, his corpse was brought into her house, and she there said over it the funeral prayer. The spot on which that house stood is now occupied by Nafisah's mausoleum. She continued to dwell there during the remainder of her life. Her death took place in the month of Ramadān, 208 (Jan.-Feb., A.C. 824). When she expired, her husband, al-Mu'tamin Ishāq, the son of 'Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, resolved on transporting the body to Madīnah but, at the request of the inhabitants of Cairo, he consented to leave it with them. The place where she was buried now bears her name; lies between Old and New Cairo, in the neighbourhood of the other mausoleums. This place was then called the Darb al-Sabā' (Lion street), but the street fell into ruin and nothing now remains there except her funeral chapel and her tomb. This tomb has a great reputation, experience having shewn that prayers said near it are fulfilled.

1 The word Sayyidah signifies mistress and is sometimes employed, as here, to distinguish certain females remarkable for the holiness of their lives. It is now pronounced Sidah, Sittā or sitt, and bears the meaning of madam.

741 *IBN AL-SHAJARI

The sharīf Abu 'l Sa'ādāt Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥamzah, a descendant of al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Tālib) was a native of Baghdād and bore the surname of Ibn al-Shajari. He held the highest rank as a grammarian and a philologist, was well acquainted with the poetry of the Arabs, the accounts of their battle-days and the occurrences which happened in these conflicts. Perfect in accomplishments, and full of literary information, he composed some works on (Arabic) philology, one of which, entitled Kitāb al-Amālī (Book of Dictations), is much more extensive and useful than the others. He dictated its contents in eighty-four sittings. This treatise contains a mass of information and a great variety of philological observations. He concluded it by the addition of another sitting in which he treated of nothing else but some verses of al-Mutanabbi's (No. 49), indicated the different manners in which they were explained by the commentators and added such observations as occurred to himself. It is a very instructive work. When he finished dictating it, he received the visit of Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, surnamed Ibn al-Khashshāb (No. 325) who expressed to him the wish of hearing the work dictated and, by his refusal, he incurred the enmity of that author, who then attacked a great number of the opinions enounced in the work and declared them to be erroneous. Ibn al-Shajari, having met with this refutation, wrote a reply to it and pointed out the mistakes into which his adversary had fallen. This treatise, forming one volume, appeared * In M. de Slane's edition 11 notices under letter a precede notice under y. In Egyptian edition the order is reverse.—Ed.

under the title of al-Intisār (the vindication) and, though very short, contained much useful information. He dictated it to the persons who attended his lectures. Another work of his entitled the Hamāsah and drawn up on the model of the Hamāsah composed by Abū Tammām al-Tā'i (No. 143) is really original and very good; he displayed in it great talent. A number of grammatical works were composed by him and also a treatise on synonyms. He published a commentary on the Lum'a of Ibn Jinnī (No. 387) and another on the al-Taṣrīf al-Mulūki (of the same author).<sup>1</sup> He spoke with great elegance, in a sweet expressive and simple style. He read over some Traditions under the direction of the great masters of that day, such as Abū 'l-Hasan al-Mubārak Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār al-Sayrafī, Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id Ibn Binḥān* the kātib and others. The ḥāfiz Ibn al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) mentions him in the Dhayl (supplement) and says: "I studied Traditions under him at the house of the wazīr Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn ʿIṣrād al-Zaynabī<sup>2</sup>, and I wrote down some pieces of poetry under his dictation (when he taught) at the College. I afterwards went and read over, under his tuition, a portion of the Amāli (dictations) composed by the grammarian Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab (No. 42)". The grammarian Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Anbārī (No. 344) says, in his Manāqib al-Uḍabā (the merits of literary men): The learned doctor Abu 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd al-Zamakhsharī (No. 684), having gone to Baghdād, in one of his (frequent) journeys, with the intention of making the pilgrimage, went to visit our master Ibn al-Shajarī, and I accompanied him. When they met, Ibn al-Shajarī addressed him in this verse of al-Mutanabbī's:

"Before we met him, we thought the accouts given of him were exaggerated; but, when we met, expericnce shewed us that we had underrated them."

1 This title appears to signify the imperial treatise on grammatical inflections.

2 The sharif Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn ʿIṣrād al-Zaynabī, wazīr to the 'Abbasid Khalīfs al-Mustarshid and al-Muqtafi, was noted for his talents and his generosity. Having been removed from office, he passed the remainder of his days in poverty and died in the reign of the last mentioned Khalīf. (al-Fakhri).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Shihāb.—Ed.

He then recited him following lines :

"In questioning the (returning) car vans, I obtained the fairest accounts of Ja'far Ibn Falāh ; and, by Allāh ! when we met, I found that my ears had not heard any thing to equal what I witnessed with my eyes."

I have already mentioned these verses in the life of Ja'far Ibn Falāh ; (No. 134) and stated that they were composed by Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Hānī al-Andalusī (No. 642), but they have been attributed to other poets. 'To this compliment, al-Zamak~~h~~sharī made the following reply : 'It is related of the Prophet that, on receiving the visit of Zayd al-Khayl<sup>1</sup>, he said to him : 'O Zayd ! before the promulgation of Islāmism, I never heard a favourable account given of a man without perceiving, after the introduction of Islāmism, that he was inferior to his reputation. Thou art the only exception.' We then withdrew," said Ibn al-Anbārī, "and were much struck by the sharīf's quoting verses to express his feelings and by al-Zamak~~h~~sharī's quoting a tradition, one who did not belong to the Arabic race". This anecdote is not given in Ibn al-Anbārī's words, but it contains their substance. I did not take it from the book itself, but became acquainted with it long ago and kept it in my recollection. I mention this lest such persons as may read the book should suppose that I am careless in my quotations, when they perceive the difference between the two manners in which the anecdote is related. Abu 'l-Sa'ādāt (Ibn al-Shajari) was the naqīb (or syndic) of those 'Alides who resided in (the suburb of) al-Karkh. He acted there as the lieutenant of his father ('Alī) al-Ṭāhir. He composed some good poetry, such as the qaṣīdah in which he eulogizes the wazīr Nizām al-Dīn Abū Naṣr al-Muẓaffar Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Jahīr<sup>2</sup>, and which begins thus :

"Here is (the source of) al-Sudayrah and the pond full to overflowing. (Here you formerly met the beloved) so follow my advice and suppress the feelings of your heart Tell me, lotus-tree of the valley ! Thou whose fragrance widely diffused would suffice to guide towards thee the nocturnal traveller, if he lost his way. The happy days which a fond lover once passed under thy shade, will they return to him again before his death? How unjust was that fawn (maiden) in refusing even a glance (of her eye) to one who was borne down by love, and in treating his prayers with disdain. Remote is the place where I might meet her ; she is far away. and yet she is near, for she dwells within my bosom. (She is like) a slender twig which bends before the zephyr and bears on its top a moon (visage) surrounded with impending darkness (her hair). When the glances of other eyes partook in the contemplation of her charms, these eyes of (mine, who am) a benighted traveller, obtained not, from that source, a single refreshing draught. We passed near (the valley of) al-Aqiq and, at the sight of those meadows and pasture grounds in which the gazelles were roaming, our passion was renewed. We wept. on reaching those shady groves ; yet, how often have flowing tears betrayed the secret of the lover ! Years of drought have laid bare the remains of her abode, and the (projecting) ruins, now abandoned, appear like camels drawing water from the wells. Look there, my two companions ! may your lives be long, and may showers protracted and lasting like the flow of the evening rain-cloud refresh your dwellings ! Are those handsome statues which appear before our eyes? or are they a flock of does ? or else maidens amplis natibus praeditae? Are those the eyes of gazelles which look on us through the veils? Are they human cheeks and noses which we see? When they turned towards us, they left not a member of our body unscathed ; even the ravenous beasts had compassion on it. How can this heart (of mine) hope for delivery from the bondage of love and from misery, if she who wounds it ever soothes and flatters? Were a draught of water from (the spring of) Dārij (near which my beloved resided.) to moisten the soil (of my heart) the germs of affliction would make on it no impression".

1 For an account of this celebrated chieftain, see M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes.

2 Nizām al-Dīn Abū Naṣr al-Muẓaffar Ibn Jahīr acted as wazīr to the Khalīf al-Muqtadī li-amr Allāh. Two other wazīrs bore the surname of Ibn Jahīr ; see No. 674.

Here the poet introduces the eulogy (of his patron). This part I abstain from inserting, lest I should be led too far, and, besides, my object, in admitting the extract which precedes. was to give the reader an idea of Ibn al-Shajari's poetical style.

Here is another piece by the same author ;

"Can love remain concealed when our tears bear witness to its existence? Can the lover who gainsays the reports of jealous spies persist in denying (the truth)? How long will you continue to wear out your eyes with weeping, you who know that Labid fixed a term to the shedding of tears? Though my (stature, formerly as strait as a) wand is now bent by old age, I still possess fortitude and energy sufficient to bear up under afflictions.

This passage contains an allusion to a thought expressed in the following lines by Labid Ibn Rabi'ah al-'Amiri ;

"My two daughters wished their father to live for ever ; is he then of another race than Rabi'ah and Muḍar? Arise (my girls) and proclaim all you know (of my merits), but do not tear your faces nor cut off your hair. Say he was a man who never abandoned his friend, who never broke a promise and who never deceived. Continue thus for a year, then the salutation of peace be upon you! The person who weeps a whole year is justified (in not continuing)".

It was to these verses that Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'i alluded when he said :

"My friends departed and I wept for their loss during a year; then I ceased, according to the precept of Labid".

A certain degree of jealousy, such as usually, reigns between men of talent, existed between Abu 'l-Sa'ādāt (Ibn al-Shajari) and Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn Aḥmed Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥakīnā* al-Harimī<sup>2</sup>, a native of Baghdād and a celebrated poet. This is the same person whose name is mentioned in our life of al-Hariri, the author of the Maqāmāt (No. 510). When he (Ibn Ḥakīnā) read the poems of his rival, he addressed to him the following lines :

1 This Labid is the author of the Mu'allaqah ; see M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai, etc., tome II, page 487. His life, by the author of the Kitāb al-Aḥḥānī, has been given by M. de Sacy in the same volume which contains the Arabic text of Kalilah and Dimnah.

2 See No 746, note

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : Jakīnā.—Ed.

"I declare, sir! in the name of Him Who should prevent you from composing verses which stupefy the understanding! that you have nothing in common with your ancestor (Muḥammad) except your incapacity for poetry."

The anecdotes related of Ibn al-Shajari are very numerous, but we prefer being concise. He was born in the month of Ramaḍān, 450 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1058), and died on Thursday, the 26th of Ramaḍān, 542 (18th February, A.C. 1148). The next morning, he was buried in his house situated in al-Karkh (the suburb) of Baghdād. Shajari is an adjective derived from Shajarah which is the name of a village in the dependencies of Madīnah. The word Shajarah is also employed as the name of a man; the Arabs of the desert gave it this application and their example was followed by others. A great number of persons, some of them men of learning, bore the surname of al-Shajari. I do not know whether our poet derived his from the name of the village or from that of one of his ancestors who might have borne the name of al-Shajarah. We have spoken of al-Karkh in the life of Ma'rūf al-Karkhī (No. 702).

742 AL-BADĪ' AL-AṢṬURLĀBĪ

Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh, the son of al-Ḥusayn, the son of Yūsuf, or of Aḥmad, according to another statement, and surnamed al-Badī' al-Aṣṭurlābī (the admirable the maker of astrolabes), was a celebrated poet and an accomplished scholar. As a maker of astronomical instruments, he was considered to be the ablest man of the age. In that art, he possessed consummate skill, and by it he gained a large fortune, under the Khalifate of al-Mustashid. When he died, he left no one capable of replacing him in his profession. Abu 'l-Ma'ālī 'l-Hazirī (No. 242) speaks of him in the Zinat al-Dahr, and 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī (No. 678) mentions him in the Kharidah. Both authors praise him highly and (the latter) gives some pieces of verse composed by him, one of which is the following:

"I offer presents to (my patron at) his noble levee, but what I offer I received from his beneficence. The clouds, in shedding their rains upon the sea, place it under no obligation : from it they received their waters."

None of his verses has obtained such currency as these two, but they have been attributed to another author. The following piece is given as his :

' When (his cheeks) acquired the redness of blood<sup>1</sup> and put on the sable hue of the 'idhār<sup>2</sup>, darkness settled upon them and my heap was still measuring<sup>3</sup>".

In the Zinat al-Dahr, these two lines are given as his, but I read elsewhere that they were composed by Abū Muḥammad Ibn Hakinā<sup>4</sup>, the same of whom we have spoken in the life of Ibn al-Shajari (No. 741). The expression my heap was still measuring is particular to the inhabitants of Baghdād and signifies, with them, to struggle without being able to escape. The word kārah (heap) is employed by them in speaking of flour and is equivalent to the word jumlah (mass, heap), made use of in Egypt. Here is another piece of his composition :

"Dixerunt: Amavisti (ephebum) levi gena praeditum, sed fama est illum barbatum (nikrish) fieri.* I replied: The young peacock is never so handsome as when he is fully fledged."

Nikrish is a foreign (a Persian) word, formed of nik rish, which signify a handsome beard. It is an established practice with the Persians to invert the order of words with are in annexation<sup>5</sup>. He was extremely licentious, and admitted into his poetry such indelicate ideas as led him to employ the most obscene terms. It is for this reason that I insert here so few of his verses, though

1 Literally : of death.

2 See the Introduction to the first volume.

3 This proverbial expression is explained, a few lines farther on.

4 Here and elsewhere all the manuscripts and the editions read Ḥakinā. 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives : Jakināt. This appears to be right reading and is that given in the Kharidah.—Ed.

5 They place the adjective before the substantive, which is contrary to the Arabic system.

* English version : The people reproached me saying : you were to love a beardless person, but yours has grown beard.

they are very numerous and were collected by himself into a diwān. He took also the poems of Ibn Ḥajjāj (No. 186) and arranged them under one hundred and forty-one heads, according to their different subjects. This collection, to which he joined an appendix, received from him the title of Durrat al-Tāj fī sh'ir Ibn Ḥajjāj (the pearl of the diadem, treating of the poems of Ibn Ḥajjāj). He was full of grace in every thing he did. He died of a hemiplegy in the year 534 (A.C. 1139-40), and was interred in the cemetery called the Wardiyah the rose-garden, which lies on the eastern side of (the river at) Baghdād. Aṣṭurlābi is derived from aṣṭurlāb, the name of a well-known instrument (the astrolabe). Kūshyār Ibn Labbān Ibn Bāshahrī of Jilān*<sup>1</sup>, the author of the Kitāb al-Zij (a set of astronomical tables) says, in his treatise on the use of the astrolabe, that astrolāb is a Greek word and signifies the balance of the sun. I heard a learned doctor say that lāb is the name of the sun in the language of the Greeks, so that the word aṣṭurlāb is composed of (the Arabic word) aṣṭur (lines), joined to lāb, and signifies the lines of the sun; indicating thus the lines traced upon the instrument. It is said that the inventor was Ptolemy, the author of the Almegisti, who was led to that discovery in the following manner: as he was taking a ride with an armillary sphere in his hands, he let it fall, and the animal on which he was riding trod upon it and broke (or flattened) it, so that it received the shape of an astrolabe. The great masters in the mathematical sciences thought till then, that the image (or representation) of the sphere could only be traced on a mass of a globular form, but Ptolemy then perceived that it could be reproduced upon a surface forming

1 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Kūshyār Ibn Labbān Ibn Bāshahrī, a native of Jilān in Persia, composed astronomical and astrological works, of which the most important were evidently the tables in which he gave the mean positions of the planets, conformably to the era of the Persians, that of Yazdigird. According to Hājī Khalifah, in his Bibliographical Dictionary, article زيج كوشيار, the observations on which these tables were founded were made by Kūshyār in the year 459 (A.C. 1066-7), but, under title of مدخل في علم النجوم he states that this latter work was drawn up in the year 357 (A.C. 968) M. Reinaud, in his introduction to the French translation of Abu 'l-Feda's Geography, says that Kūshyār lived in the latter half of the eleventh century (from A.H. 442 to 494).

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Jalabī.—Ed.

the half of a circumference, and that such an instrument would furnish the same results as were given by the armillary sphere. No one ever preceded him in this discovery; yet (neither he) nor any of the ancients supposed that it was possible to represent the image of the sphere upon a line (a flat rule). So they continued to employ the armillary sphere and the astrolabe till the shaykh Sharaf al-Dīn al-Tūsī,—the same of whom we have spoken in the life of Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn Yūnus<sup>1</sup> and who was that person's preceptor in mathematics,—conceived the idea of a line (or rule) which would furnish all the results that the armillary sphere and the astrolabe could give. He called it the staff and wrote an elegant treatise on the subject. In some points, he committed mistakes which were rectified by the above mentioned Kamāl al-Dīn. Al-Tūsī was the first who produced this instrument; none of the ancients having ever known it. The result was that the form (or configuration of the sphere), which had been at first represented by means of a globe, that is, a solid having length, breadth and thickness, and which had then been delineated on a surface, which has only length and breadth, without thickness, was now marked on a line (a rule) having length only and neither breadth nor thickness. There remains only to reduce this representation to a point; but it is impossible to conceive how that can be done, since a point is neither a solid, nor a surface, nor a line, but only the extremity (or limit) of a line, in the same manner as the line is the extremity of the surface, and the surface of the solid. The point being indivisible, it is impossible to conceive how any thing can be delineated upon it. These observations are foreign to our subject, but they furnish some information which it is better to know than not.<sup>2</sup> Besides, we were led into them by the turn which our discourse had taken.

1 In the life of Ibn Yūnus (No. 663), the name of Sharaf al-Dīn al-Tūsī does not occur, neither is the title of Kamāl al-Dīn given to Ibn Yūnus. These indications, written, probably, by the author, on the margin of his own copy, are not to be found in our manuscripts. It is hardly necessary to observe that Sharaf al-Dīn al-Tūsī must not be confounded with the celebrated astronomer, Na'ir al-Dīn al-Tūsī who died in the latter half of the seventh century of the Hijrah.

2 Our author, like all muslimāns of that epoch, knew nothing of Greek and not much of astronomy. Here, he evidently speaks of matters which he did not well understand.

643 IBN AL-QAṬṬĀN, THE POET

Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn Ya'qūb Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Sālim, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Qaṭṭān (the son of the cotton-spinner), was a poet of great celebrity and a native of Baghdād. We have already spoken of him and given some of his verses in our articles on Ḥayṣ Bayṣ (?) (No. 244) and Ibn al-Sawādī (No. 485). He learned Traditions from a number of masters and taught them to some disciples. He was excessively licentious and dissolute, full of humour and pleasantry, pertinacious in flattering and in satirizing the proud and haughty. The witty sayings attributed to this poet and the anecdotes related of him are very numerous and amusing. His poetry has been collected into a diwān. Abū Ša'd al-Sam'ānī (No. 371) mentions him in the Kitāb al-Dhayl and adds: "As a poet, he merited praise, his verses being fine and delicately turned; but, with him, satire predominated so much that he was dreaded for the virulence of his tongue and feared as a detractor (ṭhallāb)." Farther on, he says: "I wrote down two Traditions under his dictation, and no more; I also committed to paper some pieces of verse composed by him and which he recited to me." The ḥāfiẓ al-Silafī (No. 43) speaks, in these terms, of Abū 'Abd Ailāh al-Faḍl, the father of Ibn al-Qaṭṭān: "He belonged to a family of traditionists. I asked him the date of his birth and he told me that he was born on the eve of Friday, the 14th of Rajab, 418 (20th August, A.C. 1027)." According to Abū Ghālib Shujā' Ibn Fāris al-Dhuhli, he died on Wednesday, the 23rd of the latter Rabi' 498 (12th January, A.C. 1105), and was buried in the cemetery called al-Karkhl. 'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī (No. 678) speaks of him (Ibn al-Qaṭṭān) in the Kharidah. "His wit," says this writer, and the graces of his style were universally acknowledged. There exists a diwān of his poetry, the greater part of which is good. In his verses, he bantered a number of eminent men and exposed their faults. No one escaped from his attacks, neither the khalif, at Baghdād, nor any other person. A learned doctor spoke to me of him in these terms: I was a boy and too young to learn any thing from his lips, but I saw him sitting in a place apart from others.

He was then a druggist at Baghdād, and I heard people say : 'That is Ibn al-Faḍl, the satirist.' He learned Traditions from his own father and some other teachers, amongst whom were Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Bāqilānī, Abū 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Jirūn al-Amin, Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṭalḥah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Uṭhmān al-Bighālī al-Karkhī. He had frequent skirmishes with Ḥayṣ Bayṣ, one of which is thus related : Ḥayṣ Bayṣ went out, one night, from the palace of the wazīr Sharaf al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ḥasan (read al-Qāsim) 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād al-Zaynabī (No 741, note) and a young dog barked at him. As he had a sword suspended from his shoulder, he struck it with the point<sup>1</sup> of the blade and killed it. Ibn al-Faḍl (Ibn al-Qaṣṣān) being told of this, drew up a piece of verse in which he inserted two lines composed by an 'Arab of the desert, who, being informed that his son had been slain by his (the 'Arab's) brother, went to take vengeance of the murderer, but then threw away his sword and uttered the verses of which we speak." They are to be found in the first section of the Ḥamāsah<sup>2</sup>. "Ibn al-Faḍl inscribed his poem on a piece of paper which he then tied to the neck of a bitch having a number of puppies, and charged a man to drive her and young ones up to the wazīr's door. She appeared there like a suppliant ; the paper was taken off her neck and presented to the wazīr, who found in it these lines :

"People of Baghdād ! Know that Ḥayṣ Bayṣ has done a deed which now covers him with shame, throughout the town. It was he, the coward, who, to shew off his bravery, assailed a young whelp which had neither strength to attack nor force to resist. He has no money, so he cannot pay the price of blood ; he is not equal in value to his victim, so he cannot suffice to undergo the law of retaliation. Therefore (I,) curly hair, recited these lines, after referring the vengeance of little-gray's blood to Him Who is the sole, the eternal. Then, to give my heart relief and consolation, I said : One of my hands struck me without intending it ; each of them could supply the place of the other : one is truly my brother when I call him by his name ; the other is my son."

1 Literally : which the heel.

2 See Freytag's Ḥamāsah, page 100.

The idea expressed in the third verse (beginning with : He has no money) is borrowed from this verse of another poet :

"They are a people who esteem themselves so vilely, that, when one of their party commits a crime, they think that, by the law of retaliation (not one of them but) all must suffer the penalty of death."

This is one of the verses given in the Ḥamāsah<sup>1</sup> it will be found in the quire which begins by the words بشار<sup>2</sup>, and to that work we refer the reader. The insertion (of the two verses) is cleverly done ; I never heard any thing so good, notwithstanding the great number of pieces into which poets have introduced verses composed by others. The only exception I shall make concerns a piece which was recited to me by the shaykh Muḥadḍhab al-Dīn Abū Ṭālib Muḥammad, better known by the surname of Ibn al-Khaymī ; the same of whom we have spoken in the life of Tāj al-Dīn al-Kindī (No. 233). He informed me that, when he was at Damascus, the sultān ordered the beard of a person in his service to be shaved off before the eye of the public. A part of it was already retrenched when some one interceded for the man and obtained for him the permission to retain the rest. He (Ibn al-Khaymī) composed on this subject the following piece, in which he designated the person indirectly, without mentioning his name :

"I went to visit a son of Adam who, as I was informed, had all his beard shaved off, after receiving a bastinado. Finding that only the half had been removed I congratulated him on his being allowed to retain the rest. He rose up, half-choked with weeping and recited to me two verses which had not been composed in (a spirit of) lying and falsity : When a band of fellows come to shave off your beard, throw away your clothes so that they may not impede your flight. When (friends) come to you, saying : 'You have still the half ;' answer : 'The best of the halves is that which is gone !'"

The two last verses are given in that section of the Ḥamāsah which contains the satires on women<sup>3</sup> but (Ibn al-Khaymī)

1 See Ḥamāsah, page 121.

2 Here, the author, by a singular inadvertance, refers to a page or a quire of his own manuscript.

3 See Ḥamāsah, page 817.

altered the first of them ; in its original form it ran thus :

"Marry not an old woman, though they bring her to you ; but throw off your clothes so that they may not impede your flight."

(One year), in the month of Ramaḍān, the poet Ḥayṣ Bayṣ and Ibn al-Faḍl were at a grand supper given by the wazīr. Ibn al-Faḍl took up a roasted qaṭāh<sup>1</sup> and offered it to his companion, who immediately turned towards the wazīr and exclaimed: "My lord ! this man has insulted me." "How so?" said the wazīr. "Because he has made an allusion to the (well-known) verse :

'(The tribe of) Tamīm follows the path of vileness, and therein is better directed than the qaṭā (towards its nest). If they trod in the path of honour, they would surely go astray.' "

We have already observed (No. 241), that Ḥayṣ Bayṣ belonged to the tribe of Tamīm. This verse is taken from a picce composed by al-Ṭirimmaḥ Ibn Ḥakīm, the poet<sup>2</sup>; and is followed by these lines :

"Night is dispelled by day, but the ignominy of Tamīm will never be dispelled. If they saw a flea riding on a louse and galloping down to charge their line of battle, they would turn their backs (and run away)."

Ibn al-Faḍl entered, one day, into the palace of the wazīr al-Zaynabī and, finding Ḥayṣ Bayṣ with him, he said : "I have just composed two verses which could not possibly be augmented by a third, so completely do they indicate the idea I meant to express." "Let us hear them," said the wazīr. The poet recited as follows :

"An image came (in a dream) to visit (me) which was as sparing (of visits) as she who sent it (was sparing of her favours); neither did it embrace me nor kiss me, so as to alleviate my pain. Its visits are only to aid me in abstaining from sleep, for it drives it away and then departs."

1 A species of grouse.

2 This poet lived in the first century of Islāmism.

The wazīr turned towards Ḥayṣ Bayṣ and said : "What think you of that pretention ?" and received this answer : "Let the author repeat them, and the wazīr shall hear the third verse." Ibn al-Faḍl recited the verses again by the wazīr's order ; Ḥayṣ Bayṣ remained silent for a moment and then came out with this line :

"(The beloved) knew not that I employed sleep as a snare to catch (a sight of) her image, when I found that all other snares (remained without effect and) fatigued my waking hours."

The wazīr acknowledged that Ḥayṣ Bayṣ had well fulfilled his promise. I was told that a modern [poet ?] whom I cannot now designate, being unable to discover who he was, took this very idea and versified it remarkably well ; he expressed it thus :

"You who (by your beauty) render jealous the sun and the moon ! (tell me) who will console the enslaved lover whom you treated so cruelly, whilst you said that (not you, but) fate alone was to be blamed. I declare by the vitality of my love, that, if I sleep, it is not because I have forgotten you, but for the purpose of catching (a glimpse of) your image (in my dreams). Regret not the visits which your image made me whilst I slumbered ; it was really as coy (and as disdainful) as yourself."

I have since discovered that the author of this piece was Abu 'l-'Alā Ibn Abi 'l-Nadā al-Ma'rūf. When he (Ibn al-Faḍl) directed against the qāḍī 'l-Quḍāt Jalāl al-Dīn al-Zaynabī that satirical poem of which we have spoken in the life of Ibn al-Sawādī (No. 485) and which we should give here, were it not so long, the qāḍī ordered one of his servants to bring the poet before him, and, when he was led in, he boxed his ears and sent him to prison. The poet remained in confinement so long that he wrote to Majd al-Dīn Ibn al-Šāhib, the Khalif's major-domo, a letter containing the following verses :

"Majd al-Dīn ! I ask for shelter under your protection and complain to you of such ill treatment as I am unable to support. Some people have brought against me an absurd accusation and transmitted it to the worshipful qāḍī. A brutal prosecutor dragged me by the sleeve and by the collar before the seat of justice. Every stroke of the (qāḍī's) slipper made me bend my head, till my heart was ready to faint away. Even before the accuser had produced his proofs, I received such slaps on the face as prevented me from knowing where I was. Suppose that false accusation to be true, and tell me, master ! if the prisoner should remain in confinement after having paid the full penalty of his fault ?"

When he got out of prison, he composed these lines :

"He who struck me on the face thought he dishonoured me and did me harm ; but his prison has not altered my sentiments, neither have his buffets injured<sup>1</sup> my ears."

Some verses rhyming in m and directed against Ḥayṣ Bayṣ have been already given in his life with the answer to them. When al-Zaynabī, he of whom we have spoken, was raised to the wazīrate, Ibn al-Faḍl went to see him and entered into the hall of audience, which was crowded with men of high rank who had come to congratulate the wazīr on his nomination. Having gone up to him, he wished him every happiness and, to show his joy and delight, he began to dance about. The wazīr, on seeing this, said to one of his confidants : "God confound that old fellow ! his dancing reminds me of the common proverb : Skip for the ape when the time of his (prosperity) is arrived. "The poet himself put this idea into verse and transmitted to one of the grandees a written copy of the piece<sup>2</sup>.* He composed also a qasidah rhyming

1 Literally : softened.

2 Here Ibn Khallikān inserts the piece. It contains eleven verses, some of which offer expressions and allusions belonging, apparently, to the corrupt popular dialect of Baḥḍād. The third of these verses is incorrectly given in the manuscripts and the two printed editions, so that its meaning is not evident. The other verses, taken separately, are sufficiently intelligible, but when they are all taken together, the general thought which should pervade the piece cannot be perceived. I therefore do not attempt translating them.

* [The translation of the portion omitted by de Slane is given here :

"O Kamāl al-Dīn ! he who is a dignified person,

A chief who will redeem me of sins which can fill a whole world.

Take my words which is an information soon to be known.

in r, in which he defamed, one way or other, a great number of the grandees. In this poem he said :

"Tikrit is out of our reach and, in our ignorance, we go to take Tirmidh from Sinjar!"

The same poem contained the well-known verse :

"Genealogies traced up to al-'Abbās are now so frail (and so ill-supported) that they may be compared to pot-herbs."

A literary man of my friends recited to me the following verses as having been composed by Ibn al-Faḍl :

"His generosity put an end to the war between me and Fortune ; for one verse of eulogium, he bestowed on me gifts enough to fill my house."

He went, one day, to the house of the wazīr Ibn Hubayrah,<sup>2</sup> and found with him the syndic of the sharifs, who was generally looked on as a great miser. This was in Ramaḍān, (the month of fasting), and the weather was very hot. The wazīr said to him : "Where have you been ?" He replied : "In the kitchen of his

---

(Continued from page 78)

Whenever I said that 'My people belonged to Baḡhdād, they pretended to belong to Emessa'.

There is nothing except the curtain which is lifted, and the door is plastered.

The covers over their head are the hawks.

The windows, belvederes and horses dance.

I am a monkey and wag my tail before a dog.

I dance before every one whom time applauds.

Trial, from which there is relief, is of no avail to Ḍhu 'l-Nūn.

When I hear the call, it brings me relief."

Some one else has recited the following :

"When you notice a mean person attaining high position by luck,

Listen to him, obey and respect him because of his position.

We have heard that one day Kistrā (the emperor of Persia) said to his interpreter :

When time makes a beast rule, then dance to the tune of monkey in his time."—Ed.]

1 The allusion to these cities I cannot understand.

2 The life of Ibn Hubayrah will be found in this work.

worship the sharif." "Wretch that you are !" exclaimed the wazir, "what were you doing in a kitchen, now that we are in the month of Ramaḍān ?" He answered : "By the life of your Lordship ! I was breaking the heat." The wazir smiled, all the persons present laughed out and the syndic remained quite confounded. The expression to break the heat in such a place is particular to the people of that city (Baghḍād) and signifies to choose a cool place for taking one's afternoon nap. Another day, he went to the dwelling of a great man and, being refused admittance, was much offended. He then saw servants bring out meat and give it to their master's hounds, on which he observed that his lordship wished not to incur to common imprecation God's curse on the tree which shelters not its own people. Another day, as he was sitting down to dinner with his wife, he told her to uncover her head. When she did so, he repeated these words of the Qur'ān : Say, God is one. She asked him what was the matter and received this answer ; "When a woman uncovers her head, the angels do not remain present and, when that verse of the Qur'ān is pronounced, the demons take to flight. Now, I do not like being at table with a crowd (zaḥmah) about me". The anecdotes told of him are very numerous. He was born in the year 477 (A.C. 1084-5), but al-Sam'ānī (No. 371) says as follows : "I asked him the date of his birth and he replied that he was born on the morning of Friday, the 7th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, 478 (26th march, A.C. 1086)." He died at Baghḍād, on Saturday, the 28th of Ramaḍān, 558 (30th August, A.C. 1163) and was buried in the cemetery called* al-Karkhī. According to al-Sam'ānī, he died on the festival day of the breaking of the Fast, (the 1st Shawwāl/2nd September). Did I not prefer being concise, I should relate a great number of the laughable anecdotes which are told of him, for, in the chapter (of jokes and pleasantry), he held a noted place. One of the verses above mentioned and which rhyme in d, contains the word بوا (bawā), which signifies the equivalent. Thus, they say : "The blood of this man shall be equivalent of (i.e. shall answer for) the blood of that man." The word جده (Ja'dah), which (signifies curly-haired and which) occurs in the same piece, * Ma'ruf should be substituted for called.—Ed, is the proper name of a bitch ; so I was informed, but I have found nothing of the kind in philological works. Persons versed in philology say only this of it : Ābū Ja'dah (the father of Ja'dah) is a name given to the wolf : Ja'dah serves to designate the sheep. The wolf was so called because he likes sheep so much."

744 AL-QĀDĪ AL-SA'ĪD IBN SANĀ AL-MULK

Al-Qādi al-Sa'īd (the fortunate qādi) Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh, the son of al-Qādi al-Rashīd (the well directed qādi) Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far, the son of al-Mu'tamid Sanā al-Mulk (the lustre of the empire) Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, the son of Hibat Allāh, the son of Muḥammad al-Sa'dī, was a celebrated Egyptian poet and the author of that diwān which contains such elegant pieces of verse and such exquisite morsels of poetry. He was one of those men high in office who obtained general notice by their merit and their talent. He learned Traditions from the ḥāfiẓ Abū Tāhir al-Silafī (No. 43). To the eminent rank and the ease which he enjoyed were joined the abundant favours of fortune and an ample share of wordly prosperity. The book of Animals, composed by al-Jāhīẓ (No. 481) was abridged by him and published under the quaint title of Rūh al-Ḥaywān (the spirit of animals). He left also a diwān filled with poems of that species which goes under the name of al-muwashshahāt (roundelays), and entitled Dār al-Ṭirāz (the house or store of embroidery), and another consisting of extracts from the epistolary correspondence which passed between him and al-Qādi 'l-Faḍl (No. 349) and containing elegant ideas of all sorts. Some of the great poets of that age formed a society at Old Cairo and held sittings during which they conversed and discoursed in a manner which was highly pleasing to hear. Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn 'Unayn (No. 658) having then visited Cairo, was received by them with great honour and invited to their parties. As they all agreed in leading a pleasant life, they exclaimed, on learning his arrival : "Here is the poet of Syria !" and, on that occasion, they held assemblies during which their discourses were taken down in writing. Were I not apprehensive of being led away too far, I should give some of them here. A qasīdah, composed by him (al-Qāḍi al-Sa'īd) in honour of al-Qāḍi 'I-Fāḍil, contains two elegant verses which I give here :

"Were the jeweller to see the pearls of her mouth, he would take them for gems of the rarest kind. If any one say that her figure is like a willo-wand, tell him to take care lest her figure should overhear your words (and chastise you)."

Here is another piece of his :

"No branch can represent the slighthness of thy figure ; no gazelle (is so graceful as thee). Let others unite in their form every charm ; their beauty is surpassed by thine. O thou whose smiling lips always display to us a row of beads, each of them a real pearl ! my censurer asked me if I had no ears (for good advice) and I asked him if he had no eyes (to see thee)."

The following amorous ditty was composed by him on a blind girl :

"My sun (is in her face ;) it was never hidden but by her hair and has never suffered an eclipse but in its eyes. The sword (of her glances) is sheathed, but she wounds without it by means of her eyelids. In looking on her, I see a (blind) mole in (the body of) a gazelle, and the eyes of (the blind) Jacob in (the head of the handsome) Joseph."

The verses which follow were composed by him on a lad who had been whipped and then sent to prison :

"I should give my life to redeem him who was scourged, not for being in fault but for the purpose of making that slender branch open its rose-buds<sup>1</sup>. They put him into prison only to save his beauty from the stroke of the evil eye, and they said to him : 'You resemble Joseph in beauty ; resemble him again by entering into prison'".

---

<sup>1</sup> That seems to mean : making his body red.

The next verses are taken from another of his pieces ;

"I ceased to love her, not through lassitude, but for a motive which forced me to say: I leave you. She wished a third to be associated in our intimacy, but in my heart is still that article of belief which forbids me (the sin of) association!"

By the same :

"O thou whose neck is bared of every ornament except its beauty! on thy account I bared my heart (of every sentiment) except affliction (for thy cruelty). On the thread of my eyelids are strung the pearls of my tears ; wilt thou have for thy neck a collar which will cost thee nothing ? Fear me not ! for I am as feeble and as languid as the zephyr ; and the zephyr need not be feared by the willow-branch (of thy figure)."

The idea expressed in this last verse is borrowed from the following line composed by Ibn Qalāqis and already given in his biographical notice ( No. 735) :

"As long as I courted her, (she) that pliant branch in a garden, enfeebled my body, so that I am become the zephyr".

As a specimen of his style in prose we may cite a passage of a letter written by him, it is said, to al-Qāḍi 'I-Fāḍil, relatively to the Nile which, in that year, had not attained its usual height and did not produce an inundation. Here is the passage: "As for the water (of the Nile), the places where it might draw from are gone dry ; its fingers are cut off (the digits of the nilometer are useless) ; the pillar (in that edifice) must make its ablution with dust, if it intend to offer up a prayer for rain, and the scale is so feeble (and thirsty) that it thinks it has got the dropsy". This is one of the finest turns of expression which were ever employed to indicate the Nile's inability (to overflow its banks). There was in Old Cairo a poet called Abū Makārim Hibat Allāh Ibn Wazīr Ibn Muqallad, the kātib. Al-Qāḍi 'I-Sa'id, being informed that a satire had been composed on him by this person, had him brought into his presence and, after inflicting on him a corporal chastisement, addressed him in abusive language. A well-known poet, named Nashū al-Mulk Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Mufarraǵ and surnamed Ibn al-Munajjim al-Ma'arri* (whose family belonged to Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān, but) who was born and who died in Egypt, was induced by this circumstance to indite the following lines and send them to the qāḍī :

1 In Muslim theology, association signifies admitting the doctrine of polytheism or that of the trinity.

"Say to al-Sa'id, whose prosperity may God maintain ! Why did you treat so unjustly our worthy friend, Ibn Wazir ? You avenged yourself sufficiently by striking him on the face ; why then did you insult him after ? In doing so, you returned insult for insult, but you paid him moreover, with blows for interest ; yet the law does not allow usury. If you say that your insults did him no hurt ; then, by Allāh ! your blows did not hurt him either".

Al-Qāḍī 'l-Sa'id composed a qaṣīdah in praise of Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh (No. 124) the brother of the sultān Ṣalāh al-Dīn (Saladin) and began it thus :

"I am indifferent for none except for my turbaned friend<sup>1</sup> : I have renounced nothing except a blameworthy life".

When this piece appeared, a number of the Cairo poets leagued against him and having declared that such a manner of opening a poem was detestable, they attacked him in satires. On this occasion, Ibn al-Dharawī (or al-Darawī)†, the same person of whom we have spoken in the life of Sayf al-Dawlah al-Mubārak Ibn Munqidh (No. 527), wrote to him the following lines :

"Relate to al-Sa'id these words of one who admires his productions so full of charms : 'How admirable is your clever and perspicuous poem ! yet our poets cannot taste its novelties. They blame the idea of being indifferent for a friend : yet, if al-Ṭā'i

1 I suppose that, by these words, the poet designated his mistress.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : al-Ma'arri (the western) belonging to western part of Africa.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : The latter.—Ed

(No. 143) saw such a tissue of verses as yours, he would become (your ardent) partisan' ”.

Numerous anecdotes are told of this qāḍī. He died at Cairo, on one of the first ten days of the month of Ramaḍān 608 (between the 6th and the 16th of February, A.C. 1212). The Kātib ('Imād al-Dīn (see No. 678) speaks of him in the Kharīdah and says: "On the 18th of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, in the year 70.—"that is, in the year 570,"—(10th June, A.C. 1175), I was with al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil in his tent at Marj al-Dalhamiyah,<sup>1</sup> when he showed me a qaṣīdah which al-Sa'id had sent to him from Cairo, and he informed me that the author had not yet attained his twentieth year. I was much struck with the elegance of its versification". He ('Imād al-Dīn) then gives the poem; it begins thus:

"Separation (from thee) has condemned my heart to be the constant companion of sorrow; thy departure has effected a firm accord between my eyes and tears".

If we admit the above mentioned indication, al-Qāḍī 'l-Sa'id was born towards the year 550 (A.C. 1115-6). 'Imād al-Dīn then says, after inserting the qaṣīdah. "He"—meaning al-Sa'id—"came to Syria in the month of Ramaḍān, 571, being then in the service of al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil; and I found him to be a marvel for intelligence. He has reached the goal in the career of prose and of verse; the exquisite (genius) of the Arabic language has delivered to him a standard with its right hand, and he obtained from the affability of al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil a most favourable reception. The clay of his intelligence has been moulded by nature on (the wheel of) sagacity, and I have every hope that his rank in the (literary) art will be exalted highly; that, if his days be prolonged, he will obtain knowledge enough to satisfy his utmost wishes, and that, when his merit will be disengaged from (the admixture of) puerility, reflection will, with him, be watered by the fountain of knowledge, so that it may render abundant fruits and produce for him collars such as all would wish to possess". I may here add that Ja'far, the father of al-Qāḍi 'l-Sa'id, died towards the middle of Ramaḍān, 580 (December, A.C. 1184). I have since found in the handwriting of a friend who took interest in these matters that his death occurred on Tuesday, the 5th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 592 (30th Oct., A.C. 1196), and that he was born towards the middle of Shawwāl, 525 (Sept., A.C. 1131). The poet and kātib Abu 'l-Makārim Hibat Allāh Ibn Wazir Ibn Muqallad, he whose name occurs in this article, is spoken of by 'Imād al-Dīn, who says, in his Kharīdah: "I went to Old Cairo in the year 576* (A.C. 1180-1) and having enquired after him, was told that he was dead."

1 The sultān Salāḥ al-Dīn invaded Syria, A.H. 570, took Damascus and other cities and blockaded Aleppo. The Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil accompanied him. The place called Marj al-Dalhamiyah was probably in the neighbourhood of Aleppo.

745 HIBAT ALLĀH AL-BŪṢĪRĪ

Abu 'l-Qāsim, surnamed also Abu 'l-Karam Hibat Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn Thābit Ibn Hāshim Ibn Ghālīb Ibn Thābit al-Anṣārī al-Khazraji, came of a family which inhabited al-Munastir, but was born in Egypt and there he resided. Al-Būṣīrī is the appellation by which he is generally known.<sup>1</sup> This kātib was well versed in (Arabic) literature; he knew also by heart a number of pieces which had been transmitted down from the ancients and taught some Traditions known only to himself. He thus formed an intermediate link in the chain by which the doctors who came after him were connected with those of ancient times, and, in the latter part of his life, he held (as a traditionist) a rank in which he had no equal. The system of Qur'ān reading followed by the ḥāfiẓ al-Silaṭī (No. 43) and Ibrāhīm Ibn Ḥātim al-Asadī was taught to him by Abū Ṣādiq Muṣṣid Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn al-Qāsim al-Madīnī (a native of Madinah and) imām of the Jā'mi' al-'Atīq (the ancient mosque in Old Cairo. Al-Buṣīrī was the last person who ever taught Traditions received orally from the above mentioned Abū Ṣādiq, from Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Umar, the Qur'ān reader of Moṣul and from Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Barakāt Ibn Hilāl al-Sa'idī, the grammarian. He delivered also some Traditions on the authority of Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Sulṭān Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Musallam al-Maqdisī, and was the last survivor of all those who taught Traditions which they had learned from the lips of that doctor. People came from (distant) countries to hear him, and obtained from him a great quantity of information. His grandfather, Mas'ūd, had removed from al-Munastīr to Būṣīr, where he took up his residence, but, when his great abilities became known to the Egyptian government, he was called down to Old Cairo and appointed to draw up the official papers in the Correspondence office. His son 'Alī, the father of Abu 'l-Qāsim who is the subject of this article, was born in Old Cairo, in which city the family resided and had got into notice. Abu 'l-Qāsim bore the surname of Sayyid al-Ahl (the chief of the family), but he is better known as Hibat Allāh. He was born in Old Cairo, A.H. 506 (A.C. 1112-3), or, according to another statement, on Thursday, the 5th of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 500 (28th June, A.C. 1107). He died in that city on the eve of the 2nd of Ṣafar, 598 (1st Nov., A.C. 1201) and was buried at the foot of Mount Muqatta'm. Yāqut al-Ḥamawī says, in his dictionary of places bearing similar names, that he died in the month of Shawwāl. Khazraji means descended from al-Khazraj, the brother of al-Aws. These two were the sons of Hārithah Ibn Thālabah Ibn 'Amr Muzayqiyā Ibn 'Amir Mā al-Samā. The remainder of this genealogical list is well known. Their mother's name was Qaylah قَيْلَة. It was among the descendants of these two that the Prophet found at Madinah his Anṣār (or first assistants). Al-Munastīr, a town in Ifriqiyah (the

1 The author of the Burīdah, a celebrated poem in praise of Muḥammad, bore also the surname of al-Būṣīrī. His name and surname were Sharaf al-Dīn Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd Ibn Ḥammād al-Ṣanhājī al-Dulast al-Būṣīrī. He was a native of Egypt, born, A.H. 608 (A.C. 1211), in one of the dependancies of al-Bahnasā. According to Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn, in the 5th volume of the al-Minhal al-Ṣāfi, ms. of the Bib. Imp. ancien fonds, no. 751, fol. 128 et seq., he died, A.H. 696 or 697, or, according to Ḥajjīl Khālifah, in the year 694 (1294-5). He descended from the Barbar tribe of Ṣanhājah and belonged probably, to the Ḥammād family which reigned over a part of North Africa from A.H. 308 (A.C. 1008) to A.H. 547 (A.H. 1152-3). The Minhal al-Ṣāfi gives some account of this poet.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives 596 (A.C. 1199-1200).—Ed.

1 The life of Yāqūt is given in this work kingdom of Tunis) was founded by Harthamuh Ibn A'yan al-Hāshimī<sup>1</sup>, in the year 180 (A.C. 796-7). He had been appointed governor of that province by Hārūn al-Rashīd, and he arrived there on Thursday, the 3rd of the latter Rabi' 179 (26th June, A.C. 795). In the life of the amīr Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs (No. 123), reference is made to the present article. Būšīr (بوشير), called also Būšīr Qūridus, which last name is written either with a k (ك) or a q (ق), is a town in the province of al-Bahnasā, which is one of the countries included in the Ṣa'id (Upper Egypt). In the life of the kātib 'Abd al-Ḥamid (No. 380), we have spoken of another Būšīr situated in the province of al-Fayyūm. There is also a village near al-Jizah which is called Būšīr al-Sidr, and another in the canton of al-Samannūdiyah. We have thus four places of the same name and all of them situated in Egypt. Al-Munastīr lies between al-Mahdiyyah and Sūsah. It is a place of devotion to which pious men retire when they abandon the world for the service of God. It contains a number of castles resembling convents, all of which are surrounded by one wall<sup>2</sup>. These indications are taken from the work of Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī.

746 HIBAT ALLĀH IBN AL-TALMIDH

Abu 'l-Ḥasan Hibat Allāh Ibn Abī Ḡhanā'im* Ṣā'id Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Talimidh and the title of Amin al-Dawlah (the trusty servant of the empire), a Christian physician and was a native of Baghdād. The kātib 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 678) designates him, in the Khariḍuh, as the sulṭān of doctors, and praises him in the highest terms.

1 See Ibn Khaldūn's History of the Berbers, vol. 1, page 394 of the translation.

2 It is, or was, a Muslim ribāṭ, on a very extensive scale.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid inserts 'bn al-Talimidh al-Ṭabīb between Ḡhanā'im and Ṣā'id. --Ed.

science of medicine, he was for the whole world the point to which they had recourse ; he was the Hippocrates of the age, the Galen of the epoch ; his talents carried the medical science to the acme of perfection, none of the ancient doctors having reached the height to which he attained. His life was long and his days prosperous. When I saw him, he was an old man of a pleasing aspect, and the sweetness (of character) indicated by his looks was, on trial, found to be real. His mind was quick, his body graceful, his sentiments exalted, his thoughts aspiring, his sagacity felicitous and his judgement solid. He was the elder of the Christians, their priest, their head and their chief. His verses shine by their charming style, by the sweetness of the fruits gathered from them and by the admirable abundance (of their thoughts). Here is one of his pieces containing an enigmatical description of a balance :

'Tell me what is the thing which hears various names and gives a just measure for things on earth and for the heavens. It decides with equity and never uses deception. Though blind, it sets the spectator in the right ; it is dumb, but not from an accident or a malady, it announces by a sign its decisions, and answers, by rising and falling, the appeal of him who is in doubt. When suspended in air, it returns a clear reply' "

One of the various names to which the author alludes is the balance of the sun, by which is meant the astrolabe and other astronomical instruments, and which is also indicated by the words giving a just measure for the heavens ; the other names are the balance of discourse, that is to say, grammar, the balance of poetry, which means prosody and the balance of ideas, or logic. These are the things that are designated by the names of balance, measure, cubit and other terms besides. 'Imād al-Dīn then gives a number of passages taken from this author's poems, and some of them we shall notice. The article in which he speaks of the Christian physician Mu'tamid al-Mulk Abu 'l-Faraj Yahyā Ibn al-Talmidh<sup>1</sup>, contains these words: "When Abu 'l-Faraj died, he was replaced by his sister's son," the person of whom we are treating,—“who, for that reason, became known by the surname of his predecessor.” He (Imād al-Dīn) says, in the work entitled Annūdhaj al-A'yān min shu'arā al-Zamān, etc., List of those eminent contemporary poets whom I have known or heard of) “Ibn al-Talmīdh was versed in many sciences; he possessed a solid judgement and a powerful intellect. For a long time, he was in the service of the khalīfs and the kings; his conversation was more brilliant than molten gold or strings of pearls. I met with him at different times, towards the close of his life, and marvelled greatly that he, with his excellent judgement and extraordinary intelligence, should let himself be deprived of (the blessings of) Islāmism; but God, in His bounty, directeth whom He pleaseth and, through His resolve, He leadeth astray whom He pleaseth. In his epistolary compositions, his style was copious and exalted; by his verses, he placed himself among the great masters in poetry and took the place of honour”. He then gives some passages from his poems. Abu 'l-Ma'ālī 'l-Ḥazīrī* (No. 242) mentions him in the Zinat al-Dahr and gives some of his pieces, such as the following :

1 This doctor practised in Baġhdād, with great reputation, towards the close of the fifth century of the Hijrah. This century ended A.H. 1106.

“O thou who hast launched against me, from the bow of departure, the arrow of separation (whose wounds are so) difficult to cure ! pardon the absence of him who is far from thee ; that absence is a fault which bears in itself its punishment.”

Imād al-Dīn cites the last of these verses in the khurīdah, as being the production of Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ḥakīnā<sup>1</sup>, and joins to it another which I here give :

“If he suffered no other punishment than thy departure from him, that alone would be sufficient.”

Al-Ḥazīrī attributes to him the following lines :

“I complained because thy image did not visit (my slumbers), and yet I was prevented from sleeping by my love (for thee). It at length paid me a visit of kindness and complained of my

<sup>1</sup> This is the same poet whose name is written Jakīnā, No. 76n. and No. 510. I am inclined to think that Ḥakīnā is the right name. See No. 742. note. Abd al-Ḥamid prefers Jakīnā.—Ed.

* Abd al-Ḥamid gives al-Kḥazīrī.—Ed.

(not sleeping to receive it). Thus was fulfilled the proverb. Dreams go by contraries."

'Imād al-Dīn says, in his Kh̲arīdah, amongst other things : Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Muḥallib told me that Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Talmīdh recited to him the following lines, declaring them to be of his own composing :

"The happy days of my youth were a (prolonged) intoxication ; but I then recovered and commenced to act as a virtuous man. I stopped to await (the hour of) death, like the traveller who, knowing the place (to which he is going), stops to pass the night at a distance from the (regular) halting-place."

The second of these verses is given by Ibn al-Munajjim<sup>1</sup> in the Kitāb al-Bārī', where it is attributed to Muslim Ibn al-Walid (No. 10n.). Ibn al-Talmīdh must have therefore borrowed and inserted it among his own. Abū Muḥammad Ibn Ḥakīmā having fallen ill, was treated by Ibn al-Talmīdh ; on recovering he gave him some money and composed these lines :

Being, unwell, I went to be treated by him ; for maladies must be cured. He tended me and consoled me, till I was able to thank him as every man would do when delivered from his cares ; and I said : 'Since this doctor has treated me kindly and cured me, let theriac<sup>2</sup> be administered to him'."

He composed on the same person another piece expressing the same idea and which I give here :

"He was kind to his patient and saved him from death ; yet (the sick man : ) was so ill that they were on the point of swathing his legs together, (for burial)<sup>3</sup>. The person who keeps death away from another, inherits to share in that man's wealth."

He, one time, requested the same doctor to cross the Tigris for the purpose of treating him, and, in this written application, he said :

<sup>1</sup> His life will be found in No. 747.

<sup>2</sup> Various readings : ازرياج, زرياج, ذرياج. These words appear to be alterations of ترياق.

<sup>3</sup> This translation is merely conjectural.

"Imra al-Qays, when enamoured with her who rode in the palanquine was cured by an 'abrah (by shedding a flood of tears).<sup>1</sup> An 'abrah (or crossing of the river) would do me also good."

Ibn Ḥakīmā lost his sight towards the close of his life. He had then a quarrel with Ibn al-Talmīdh and, when (the latter) wished to make up with him, he addressed to him this line :

"If you wish to pacify Bashshār, the son of Burd (No. 110), throw upon him his father (i.e. a cloak, burd)."

On this, Ibn al-Talmīdh sent him what he asked for and regained his friendship. Many stories are related of what passed between them. Ibn Ḥakīmā mentioned the name of Bashshār Ibn Burd in the verse because Bashshār had not the use of his sight and he, being blind also, compared himself to that poet. The expression throw upon him such a one is in general use with the people of Baghdād : when a man wishes to make up with his adversary and the latter refuses, they say : "Throw such a one upon him ;" that is let such a one visit the adversary and intercede with him. In the verse is a tawriyah one thing being said and another meant. Here follows a well-known piece of which he (Ibn al-Talmīdh) is said to be the author, but I have found it attributed to al-Nāṣiḥ Ibn al-Dahhān, a grammarian, of Moṣul :

"Away with<sup>2</sup> reasoning ! (see you not how) the passion of love leads to judgments (so wild that they) cannot be brought into the road of common sense. Thus, people say of love, which is eternal, that it is a (transitory) accident, yet our bodies are annihilated under its influence."

The two following verses are by the same author, but 'Imād al-Dīn, in his Khariḍah, attributes them to Abū 'Alī 'l-Muhandis, a native of Egypt :

"My heart shares its love between a troop of beauties, to each of whom I am fondly attached. It is thus a centre of 1 Imra 'l-Qays says, in the fourth verse of of his Mu'allaqah : "a flood of tears is my cure."

2 I read تمس with the edition of Būlāq.

which they are the circumference, and each of my desires is a radius."

By the same :

"His liberality is a physician which cures our indispositions by a kind treatment. He is like mummy for a broken bone, and theriac for the bite of a serpent."

I have since found these two verses in the diwān of the poet Ibn Ḥajjāj (No. 186). The following lines were composed by him on his son Sa'id :

"My love for Sa'id is an enduring substance, his love for me a transitory accident. The six dimensions of my substance are occupied by him ; but he, though enclosed therein, is inclined to leave me for another."

Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Aflah, a poet of whom we have already spoken (No. 451), was cured of a disease under Ibn al-Talmidh's treatment : and, as the latter forbade him to take any other food than that which was prescribed to him, he addressed to him the following lines, complaining of hunger :

"I am hungry ; deliver me from starvation. A piece of bread, even a small morsel, would be my deliverance. Say not to me : 'Just now ! take patience ! I cannot have patience, even for an hour. Today, my empty stomach will hearken to no remonstrance against bread.' "

Ibn al-Talmidh, having read these verses, answered them by the following :

"It is thus that guests (when furnished) like me complain to each other of hunger ; yet I will not give you what is hurtful, remonstrate as you may ! Try and humour your appetite with panada ; that is better than a piece of bread. Answer, I beg of you, to what I prescribe by the words : I hear and obey."

When Ibn Aflah received these lines, he wrote back the following answer :

"I shall endeavour to follow your prescription, but I cannot say with perfect sincerity : I hear and obey. By Allāh ! I have struggled against hunger, but am unable to repel it. Preserve me from its consequences by delivering me from the headache, which it gives."

Ibn al-Talmīdh replied by these lines :

"In poetry my talent is feeble and my abilities limited, whilst you have a genius naturally disposed for it and are skilled in that art. As long as you cannot bear with the pains of hunger, so long you will not be delivered from your headache. Therefore, let your Bismillāh (or grace before meal) be preceded by the taking of (food) an hour later.<sup>1</sup>"

Ibn al-Talmīdh and the celebrated physician Awḥad al-Zamān (the pearl of the age) Abul 'l-Barakāt Hibat Allāh Ibn Malkān<sup>2</sup>, the author of the philosophical treatise entitled al-Mu'tabir (the worthy of notice), looked on each other with feeling of jealousy and rivalry such as usually prevail between men who are eminent in the same profession. The anecdotes concerning the conferences and disputes are well known. Awḥad Al-Zamān was a Jew, but became a Muslim in his latter days. To cure himself of an elephantiasis, he let himself be bitten by vipers which he had kept, for some time without food ; and, after receiving a great number of bites, he was cured, but lost his sight. The history of this affair is well-known. Ibn al-Talmīdh composed on his rival the following epigram :

"Our friend, the Jew, is so filled (fīhi) with folly that it is manifested by his mouth (fīhi) every time he speaks. He talks at random (yatīh) ; not a dog but ranks higher than he ! one would think he had not yet got out of the Wilderness (Tih)."

1 The absurdity of this recommendation and the impossibility of fulfilling it imply that the patient should not take anything. I do not see any other way of explaining the passage.

2 Awḥad al-Zamān was the khalīf al-Mustanjid's physician. He composed a number of medical treatises. For a notice on this doctor see Westenfeld's Arabische Aerzte, No. 177.

Ibn al-Talmīdh was very modest, and Awḥad al-Zamān very presumptuous. This induced al-Badī' al-Aṣṭurlābī (No. 742) to compose the following lines :

"The doctor Abu 'l-Ḥasan and his imitator, Abu 'l Barakāt, stand at opposite extremes : one, by his modesty, has reached the Pleiades, and the other, by his presumption, is in the lowest abyss."

Ibn al-Talmīdh composed some good works on medicine, one of which, the Aqrābādīn (Antidotarium) is a very useful treatise and serves as a practical guide to the physicians of our days. Another of his works, that which he composed on the Kulliyāt<sup>1</sup> of Ibn Sīnā (Avicenna) bears the title of Kunnās wa Ḥawāṣṣ (compilation and glosses)*. The master under whom he made his medical studies was Abu 'l-Ḥasan Sa'id Ibn Hibat Allāh<sup>2</sup>, the author of some well-known medical works, such as the Talkhīṣ (compendium), the Mughnī (sufficient), in one volume, and the Iqnā' (satisfactory), in four volumes. Some persons found fault with these (two last) titles and said that they should have exchanged places, because mughnī signifies what enables to dispense with any thing and would have been an appropriate title for the larger work, whilst the term iqnā', signifying what furnishes a sufficiency, was more suitable for a compendium. All the medical and literary works (composed by Ibn al-Talmīdh) are very good. His conduct was most regular and his gravity so remarkable that, it is said, in the frequent visits made by him to the palace of the khalīfs, he was never heard to utter a jest, except on one occasion. That was in the presence of the khalīf al-Muqtafī (li-amr Allāh). Here is what passed : A pension which had been assigned to him on the glass-bottle manufactory at Baghdād was stopped without the khalīf's knowledge, and, one day that he was with that prince, and intended to withdraw, he had great difficulty in getting up, by reason of his advanced age. On this, the khalif said: "Doctor! you are getting old": To which he replied: "It is true, my lord! my bottles are broken." This expression is employed by the people of Baghdād to indicate that a man is old. When the khalif heard these words from the doctor's lips, he said: "During all the time he has been in our service I never heard him utter a pleasantry." Enquiries being then made into the affair, led to the discovery that his pension on the bottle manufactory had been suppressed. The khalif, being informed of the circumstance, gave orders that the pension should be restored to him and granted him another besides. It had been suppressed by the Wazir 'Awn al-Dīn Ibn Hubayrah. The anecdotes related of this doctor are very numerous. He died at Baghdād in the month of Ṣafar, 560 (Dec.-Jan., A. C. 1164-5), aged nearly one hundred years. In the historical work of Ibn Zulāq* al-Fāriqī it is stated that Ibn al-Talmīdh died on Christmas day and that he was acquainted with more sciences than any other man. All those who inhabited Baghdād, either on one side (of the river) or on the other, went with his corpse to the church and attended the funeral; not one of them stayed away. This article contains only one name the orthography of which requires to be marked; it is Malkān, that which was borne by the grandfather of Awhād al-Zamān. In the life of Ibn al-Jawālīqī (No. 724) we have related a scene which passed between him and Ibn al-Talmīdh in the presence of the khalif al-Muqtafi. My article on Amin al-Dawlah Ibn al-Talmīdh was finished when I met with a book in the handwriting of my professor, Muwaffaq al-Dīn Abū Muḥammad 'Abd al-Laṭīf Ibn Yūsuf, and drawn up by him in the form of an autobiography<sup>1</sup>. Towards the commencement of this work, he describes Ibn al-Talmīdh as being possessed of great learning and skill in medicine. He then says<sup>2</sup>: "One of his (remarkable cures) was this: A woman was carried to him in such a state that her family did not know whether she was living or dead. Though it was then in the depth of winter, he had her stripped and submitted to a prolonged affusion of cold water. He then ordered her to be carried into a warm room, which had been fumigated with aloes-wood and other perfumes. They covered her with a quantity of furred cloaks and, some time after, she sneezed and began to move; then she sat up and was able to go home on foot with her people. Another time, they brought to him a man who sweated blood in the summer season. He asked his pupils, who were about fifty in number, if they knew what that malady was, but none of them could tell. He ordered the patient to eat barley bread with roasted love-apples. The sick man did so for three days and recovered. The pupils asked their master what the malady was and he replied: 'The man's blood had got thin and the pores of his body were much opened; now, the virtue of this regimen is, to thicken the blood and to close the pores.' To give an idea of his disinterestedness, we may mention that the rear of his house was contiguous to the Nizāmiyah college and, when any of the law students was taken ill, he had him brought to his house and took care of him, till he was cured and able to return." Before this, our professor, Muwaffaq al-Dīn ('Abd al-Latīf') says: "I profited greatly under the tuition of this Amin al-Dawlah's son. He lived nearly eighty years. His great experience and his profound acquaintance with the secrets of the human constitution were such that he could discern every malady as clearly as if he saw it through a pane of glass; and he had never the least hesitation in deciding on its nature and mode of treatment. He usually prescribed simple remedies or such as were but slightly compounded; and he thought no one worthy of practising medicine but himself. He used to say: 'A prudent man should wear such clothes as may not draw upon him the envy of the lower order or the contempt of the higher.' So he wore white clothes of a fine quality." He ('Abd al-Latīf') then adds: "This (doctor) was strangled in the court of his house, in the first third of the night<sup>1</sup>; he became a Muslim before his death. I have often regretted his loss".

1 Kulliyāt signifies generalities and, when employed as the title of a medical work, means general principles of therapeutics. Avicenna and Averroes composed each of them a Kulliyāt. In the old Latin translations, this word is rendered or rather transcribed by colliget.

2 The text reads Hibat Allāh Ibn Sa'id which is a fault. See Arabic Aerie, no. 143 and Ḥājjī Khalīfah's bibliographical Dictionary, tom. V, p. 653.

* Two books and marginal notes on the Kulliyāt in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd—Ed.

1 See de Sacy's Relation de l'Egypte, par 'Abd al-Latif, page 458.

2 Ibn Abī 'Uṣaybi'ah gives some long extracts from 'Abd al-Latif's autobiography, but has purposely omitted what concerned Ibn al-Talmīdh. See de Sacy's 'Abd al-Latif, p. 461. I may here observe that Ibn Khalikān was about twenty-one years of age when his professor 'Abd al-Laṭīf died.

* Al-Azraq in 'Abd al-Ḥamid—Ed.

<sup>1</sup> Here the text appears to be corrupt. [Probably he was misled by دهليز meaning portico for which he writes court].—Ed.

747 HĀRŪN IBN 'ALĪ 'I-MUNAJJIM

Abū 'Abd Allāh Hārūn, the son of 'Alī, the son of Yaḥyā, the son of Abū Maṣṣūr al-Munajjim (the astrologer), was an accomplished scholar and a native of Baghdād. We have already spoken of his son 'Alī (No. 444). Hārūn was a ḥāfiẓ knowing by heart and able to repeat a great quantity of poems. His conversation was agreeable and his social talents highly pleasing. The Kitāb al-Bārī (the book of surpassing excellence), a work composed by him on the muwallad (or Muslim)<sup>1</sup> poets, contains one hundred and sixty-one articles. It begins with a notice on Baḥshār Ibn Burd al-'Uqaylī (No. 110), ends with an account of Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ṣāliḥ<sup>2</sup> and offers the finest passages composed by these poets. The author says, towards the beginning of the work; "In writing this book on the history of the muwallad poets, I inserted such pieces of their poetry as I myself had chosen, and, in making that selection, I proceeded with the utmost care and after the best of my knowledge. The learned say that a man's intelligence is indicated by what he chooseth, and that the faculty of choosing well proceedeth from the abundance of the understanding. Some of them also have said: A man's poetry is a part of his discourse, the opinion he professes is a part of his understanding, and his faculty of choosing is a part of his (acquired) knowledge." In this strain, he goes on to a considerable length and then informs us that this work was abridged from another which he had compiled on the same subject and which he reduced to its present dimensions by making suppressions. It is really a very useful work because it does away with the necessity of procuring the (diwān or collected works) of all the poets which it mentions. The fact is that the author, in making his abridgment, retained the cream of their verses and rejected the froth. In the life of the kātib 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 678), we have indicated this work as the main stem of several branches, namely the Khariḍah, the treatise of al-Ḥazirī (No. 242), that of al-Bākhārī (No. 450) and that of al-Tha'ālibī (No. 365). It was the model after which they all composed theirs. Another of Ibn al-Munajjim's works is the Kitāb al-Nisā (book of women). It contains the anecdotes related of them and the elegant passages in prose and verse of which women were the subject. I am unable to give here any of his own verses, having never met with any of them. In the Kitāb al-Bārī, he inserted an article on his father Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā, with extracts from his poems and, immediately after, he gives notice on his brother Yaḥyā Ibn 'Alī with a series of extracts. These we need not insert here, as they will be found in our article on Yaḥyā Ibn 'Alī. Abu 'Aḥd Allāh Hārūn Ibn al-Munajjim died in the year 288 (A.C. 901), at an early age. His great grandfather, Abū Maṣṣūr, was astrologer to the khalīf Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr and, in religion, a fire-worshipper. His son Yaḥyā was attached to the service of *Uḥu'*l-Riyāsatayn al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl (No. 504), and his astrological indications always regulated the actions of that wazīr. After al-Faḍl's catastrophe, an event of which we have already spoken (No. 504), Yaḥyā became al-Māmūn's astrologer and boon companion. The pressing instances of that khalīf, who had chosen him for his favourite and friend, induced him to turn Muslim, and his profession of the Muḥammadan faith, made to al-Māmūn, rendered him the mawla<sup>1</sup> of that prince. The Munajjim family produced a number of men who rose to eminence by their abilities, their literary acquirements and their talent for poetry. All of them were admitted into the intimacy of the (reigning) khalīfs and became their boon companions. Al-Tha'ālibī has devoted a whole section of his Yatimah to the members of this family and notices a great number of them. The above mentioned Yaḥyā died at Aleppo when al-Māmūn was going on his expedition to Ṭarsūs. He was buried in the Quraysh cemetery of that city, and his tomb, with his name inscribed on it, is there still to be seen.

1 See No. 91, note.

2 In the year 190 of the Hijrah (A.C. 811-2), Muḥammad, the son of 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ṣāliḥ the 'Abbasid, was named governor of Mesopotamia and Syria by the khalīf al-Amin. (Nujūm).

---

<sup>1</sup> See vol. III, Introduction.

748 HISHĀM IBN 'URWAH

Abu 'l-Mundhir Hishām al-Asadī was the son of 'Urwah, the son of al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwām. We have already spoken of his father (No. 391). Hishām was one of the most distinguished Tābi'is of Madinah, and transmitted down a great quantity of Traditions. He ranked among the most eminent of the learned (in the Law) and was considered as one of the principal Tābi'is. He belonged to the fourth generation of those who inhabited Madinah. Traditions were taught to him orally by his uncle 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr (the antikhālif) and by Ibn 'Umar (No. 243n.). He saw Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Anṣārī (No. 394n.), Anas Ibn Mālik (No. 539n.), and Sahl Ibn Sa'd<sup>1</sup>. According to another statement, he saw Ibn 'Umar but did not hear any Traditions from him. Traditions were taught on his authority by Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id al-Anṣārī (No. 524n.), Sufyān al-Thawrī (No. 248), Mālik Ibn Anas (No. 524), Ayyūb al-Sikḥṭiyānī<sup>2</sup>, Ibn Jurayj (No. 350), 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Umar<sup>3</sup>, al-Layth Ibn Sa'd (No. 523), Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynā' (No. 255), Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id al-Qaṭṭān (No. 586n.), Waki' (No. 149n.) and others. He went to Kūfah, in the reign of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr and delivered Traditions to the people of that city. His birth took place A.H. 61 (A.C. 680-1). Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Dhuhli<sup>4</sup> states that (the khalif) 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, Hishām Ibn 'Urwah, al-Zuhri (No. 537), Qatādah (No. 516) and al-A'mash (No. 253) were born on or about the day in which al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī, was slain. This occurred on the (festival) day of 'Āshūrah, A.H. 61 (10th Oct., A.C. 680). He went to visit al-Manṣūr, at Baghdād, and died there in the year 146 (A.C. 763-4), or in 145 or 147, according to other statements. The funeral service was said over 1 Sahl Ibn Sa'd al-Sa'idī, one of Muḥammad's Companions and a native of Madinah, delivered upwards of one hundred and eighty Traditions relating to his master. He died at Madinah, A.H. 88 (A.C. 707). Nawawī's Tahdhib al-Asmā. The note No. 738 ought to be suppressed.

2 Abū Bakr Ayyūb Ibn Kisīn al-Sikḥṭiyānī a native of Baṣrah and a Traditionist of good authority, died A.H. 114 (A.C. 732-3), aged seventy-three years.—(Dhahabī's Tabaqāt al-Huffāz.)

3 'Ubayd Allāh, the son of the khalif 'Umar, was slain A.H. 37 (A.C. 657), at the battle of Ṣiffin. (Tahdhib, Huffāz.)

4 Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī al-Dhuhli died A.H. 293 (A.C. 905-6). (Nujūm.)

him by al-Manṣūr, and he was buried in the Khayzūrān cemetery, on the eastern side (of the Tigris). Some say, however, that he was interred on the western side, without the wall (of the city), near the gate of Quṭrubbul, beyond the ditch, and higher up than the cemetery of the Ḥarb gate. His tomb (they say) is still to be seen there and is well-known. It is covered with a flat stone on which is inscribed: This is the tomb of Hishām Ibn 'Urwah. The persons who state that he was buried on the eastern side say that the tomb on the western is that of Hishām Ibn 'Urwah al-Marwazī, a disciple of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak (No. 300). God knows best! He left posterity at Madīnah and Baṣrah. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) relates as follows, in his History of Baghdād. "Al-Manṣūr said to him one day: 'Abu 'l-Mundhir! do you remember when I and my brothers, the legitimate heirs to the khalīfate, went to visit you, and we found you drinking ptisan through a hollow reed? When we left you, our father said to us: 'Appreciate well the merit of this old man; he will never cease to be of your party, come what may!' Hishām replied: 'Commander of the faithful! I do not remember that.' When he withdrew, some one said to him: '(How simple you are) to acknowledge that you do not remember a thing which the khalīf mentioned to you and which would ensure you his favour!' He answered: 'I did not recollect it, and my veraciousness cannot but obtain recompense from God.'" It is related that he went to visit al-Manṣūr and said to him: "Commander of the faithful! deliver me from my debts." Al-Manṣūr asked him how much he owed and, being told one hundred thousand (dirhams)<sup>1</sup> he exclaimed: "How could you, with all your learning in the law and all your merit, contract a debt of one hundred thousand (dirhams) without having the means of paying it?" He replied: "Commander of the faithful! some of my boys were grown up and, being afraid of incurring the disagreeable necessity of answering for their conduct, I constructed for them separate dwellings and made marriage feasts to get rid of them: being assured that God and the Commander of the faithful would come to my assistance." The khalīf continued to repeat the words: "One hundred thousand!"<sup>2</sup>

1 About two thousand pounds sterling.

2 Al-Manṣūr was notorious for his avarice.

as if he found the sum enormous, and at length said: "I shall give you ten thousand." "Commander of the faithful!" said Hishām, "give me whatever sum you can bestow with good will; I heard my father relate that our blessed Prophet said: 'When a gift is bestowed and leaves the mind satisfied, the donor and the receiver obtain equally the blessing of God'". The khalif replied: "I shall then bestow what will leave my mind satisfied." Hishām sprung forward to kiss his hand, but the other prevented him and said: "Son of 'Urwah! we esteem you so highly that we will not let you kiss it, and we esteem it, so highly that we do not allow it to be kissed by others." The anecdotes related of Hishām Ibn 'Urwah are very numerous.

749 HISHĀM IBN AL-KALBĪ

The genealogist Abu 'l-Mundhir Hishām Ibn Abi 'l-Naḍr Muḥammad, Ibn al-Sā'ib Ibn Bishr Ibn 'Amr al-Kalbī was a native of Kūfah. We have already spoken of his father (No. 608) and related what passed between him and the poet al-Farasaḍ. Traditional information, learned from his father, was handed down by his son al-'Abbās and some others, amongst whom were Khalifah Ibn Khayyāt (No. 207), Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd Kātib al-Wāqidi (No. 619), Muḥammad Ibn Abi Sarī al-Baghdādī<sup>1</sup> and Abu 'l-Ash'ath Aḥmad Ibn al-Miqdām<sup>2</sup>. In the science of genealogy he was the most learned of men, and his Jamharat al-Nisab (or collection of genealogies) is one of the best works ever composed on the subject. As a ḥāfiẓ (No. 31), he bore a high reputation. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) says, in his History of Baghdād, that Hishām went to that city and taught Traditions there. He states also that he said: "I have learned by heart more than any man ever did, and forgotten more than any other man. Being reproached by my uncle for not knowing the Qur'ān by heart, I went into a room and swore not to leave the place till I had committed that book to memory, and I accomplished the task in three days. I looked at myself, one day, in a mirror, and grasped my beard with the intention of cutting it off from below my clenched hand, and I cut it off from above it!". A great number of treatises were composed by him, such as the Ḥilf (or pact) made by 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib with the tribe of Khuzā'ah, the Ḥilf al-Fuḍūl (confederation made between the Faḍls)<sup>2</sup>, the Ḥilf (or confederation) formed between (the tribes of) Tamim and Kalb, the Kitāb al-Munāfarāt (contestations between rivals who vaunt the glory of their respective families), the Kitāb Buyūtāt Quraysh (on the illustrious families of the tribe of Quraysh), the Kitāb Faḍā'il Qays 'Aylān (on the eminent merit of the families descended from Qays 'Aylān) the Kitāb al-Maw'ūdāt (on the girls buried alive)<sup>3</sup> on the illustrious houses (Buyūtāt) of the tribe of Rabī'ah, the Kitāb al-Kunā (on by-names), a work on the noble deeds of Quṣayyī and his descendants in the times of Ignorance and of Islāmism; the Kitāb alqāb Quraysh (the usual surnames among the Qurayshites), the Kitāb alqāb al-Yaman (the usual surnames among the Yamanites), the Kitāb al-Maḥālib (book of upbraidings), the Kitāb al-Nawāfil (on gifts), the Kitāb liddai'āi Ziyād Mu'āwiyah (on Ziyād's claim of relationship to Mu'āwiyah)<sup>4</sup>, the History of Ziyād Ibn Abih, the Kitāb ṣanā'ia

1 Muḥammad Ibn Abi Sarī al-Mutawakkil al-Asqalānī (a native of Ascalon) and designated by Ibn Khallikān as a native of Baḡhdād, was considered by the ablest critics in the History of the Traditions as a sure authority. He died A.H. 228 (A.H. 842-3), at Ascalon. (Huffāẓ, Nujūm.)

2 Aḥmad Ibn al-Miqdām, belonged to the tribe, of 'Ijl. This Traditionist died A.H. 253 (A.C. 867).(Nujūm.)

1 Ḥishām meant to indicate by this that his sight was weakened by excessive study. It was customary with men of learning not to let their beards grow longer than the breadth of the hand.

2 The confederation of the Faḍls was formed at Makkah, A.C. 595. for the purpose of protecting strangers who came to that city. This association maintained its influence till the middle of the first century of the Hijrah. Muḥammad entered into it at the age of twenty-five years. (Essai, etc., de M.C. de Perceval, tom. I, p. 330 et suiv.)

3 Female infanticide was common with the Arabs till abolished by Muḥammad. He alludes to the practice in the Qur'ān. sūrah lxxxi, verse 8.

4 Ziyād, a bastard son of Abū Sufyān, was legitimated by his half-brother, the Khalīf Mu'āwiyah, in the forty-fourth year of the Hijrah. Till that time, he was generally called Ziyād Ibn Abih, i.e., Ziyād, the son of his (unknown) father.

Quraysh (the generous deeds of the Qurayshites), the Kitāb al-Mushājarāt (book of contestations), the Kitāb al-Mu'atabūt (the book of reproaches), the Kitāb mulūk al-Ṭawā'if (on the provincial kings)<sup>1</sup>, the Kitāb mulūk Kindah (on the kings of the tribe of Kindah), the Kitāb Iftirāq walad Nizār, (the dispersion of the posterity of Nizār), the Kitāb tafriq Azd (the dispersion of the sons of Azd), the Kitāb Ṭasm wa Jadis (on the ancient tribes of Ṭasm and Jadis). His works are upwards of one hundred and fifty in number. The best and the most instructive is that which is generally known by the title of al-Jamharah (the collection) of genealogical information; the like of it was never composed on the subject. He drew up a genealogical work entitled al-Manzil (the station), which was more extensive than the Jamharah. His Mūjaz (abridgment)<sup>2</sup> treats also of genealogies. The Farid (precious pearl) on the same subject, was composed by him for al-Māmūn, and the Mulūkī (or imperial) another genealogical work, was drawn up by him for Ja'far Ibn Yahyā the Barmakide. The quantity of his narrations concerning the battle-days and the history of the (Arabian) people is very considerable. Here is one of these pieces: The sons of Umayyah assembled at the house of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abī Sufyān, and reproached him for the preference he gave to 'Amr Ibn 'Aṣī and for acknowledging (as his brother) Ziyād Ibn Abih. Mu'āwiyah replied to them and then pushed 'Amr on to speak. In this discourse 'Amr said<sup>3</sup>: "I am he who pronounced these lines at the battle of Ṣiffin:

1 This term usually designates the successor of Alexander the Great and the Arsacides. After the fall of the Umayyid dynasty in Spain, the governors of the cities and provinces became independent and were also designated as the kings of peoples or provincial kings.

2 According to another reading: al-Mu'akhkhār (the final) المُوخَّر in place of المُوْجَز.

3 We possess very few specimens of discourses in prose, pronounced in the first century of the Hijrah. This piece is remarkable for that reason, and is highly characteristic of its author. The grammarians and philologists of later times must have prized it as literary curiosity, for it offers a fair sample of the quaint, pretentious and rhythmical style which was so common during and before the time of Muhammad. The Arabs could then express their ideas very well in verse, but were singularly awkward and affected in their prose compositions. As a prose-writer Muhammad excelled them all.

"When other looked askance, I blinked not ; then I partially closed my eyes, but not in winking (at the sight of danger). You saw me return (to the charge) and continue to dash forward. I support (equally well) good and evil, and am inexorable, like the serpent at the foot of the tree."

"By Allāh ! I am neither languid nor feeble. I am the deaf snake from whose bite none can recover, and whose sting renders a man sleepless. I am one who shatters when he strikes; who cooks well whatever he heats. Let him who pleases consult (me) ; let him who wishes ask (my) advice (he will find it good). O ! if they saw what I witnessed on the battle-day of al-Hārīr<sup>1</sup>: if they faced what I faced, they would have found the outlet too narrow (for their escape). 'The road would have appalled them when ('Ali) the father of al-Ḥasan dashed down upon us, having on his right and on his left men of action and of prudence, noble companions ; there, by Allāh ! the eyes were staring, the mischief (of war) was exalted, and se subdixerunt colei usque ad renes.* There were drawn the lots which rendered mothers childless and made them forget what they were bearing (in the womb); the pupils of the eye were turned red, the horizon was clouded with dust, the (ocean of) sweat came up to the mouth, blood flowed in torrents, the dust flew aloft, the brave stood firm, the cowards drew back, the voices were extinguished, the lips were foaming, and numerous were the struggles hand to neck. War was thus set on its legs ; the time of departure (from life) ; arrived : the combatants struck each other with the scabbards of their swords, after using all their arrows and splintering their lances. On that day, nothing was heard but the shouts of the men and the neighing of the horses. Swords fell upon heads as the bat of washerman falls on the trestle. That lasted<sup>2</sup> for a day, till night came on with its darkness, and till

1 The Persian army was defeated at al-Qādisiyah after a battle which lasted three days. One of those conflicts was called the night of growling (laylat al-Ḥarīr).

2 The true pronunciation of the word نَدَاب is uncertain, the diacritical points varying in the manuscripts and the printed editions. The meaning here given to it is quite conjectural.

* English : Testicles drew together to kidneys (out of fear).—Ed.

morning was enlightened by the dawn. Then nothing remained of the conflict but groans and cries; for the enemy had learned that I was the first of you all in bravery, the ablest in efforts and the steadiest in defending the standard. To me, when compared with you, may well be applied these words of the poet :

'I shut my eyes on certain acts, and if I choose to mention them, I should leave no room for peacemaking. If the tree of my (honour) be of gold, should I not respect it more than to place it in competition with common weeds?' "

We still possess much of the Traditional information which came down from him. He died in the year 204 (A.C. 819-820), or, by another account, in 206. The first is most probably the correct date.

750 HISHĀM AL-ḌARIR, THE GRAMMARIAN

Abū 'Abd Allāh Hishām*al-Ḍarir (the blind) grammarian, was a native of Kūfah and a disciple of Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah al-Kisā'i (No. 408), from whom he received a great quantity of grammatical information. One of his treatises on this subject is even attributed to al-Kisā'i. He composed many grammatical works, such as the Kitāb al-Hudūd (on definitions), which is a short treatise, the Mukhtaṣar (or abridgment) and the Kitāb al-Qiyās (on analogies). Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣ'ab<sup>1</sup> had, one day, with (the khalif) al-Māmūn, a conversation in which committed a fault of grammar. Perceiving that the khalif started at him, he knew what that meant and, on retiring he went to study grammar under the tuition of Hishām. According to Abū Mālik al-Kindī, this grammarian died in the year 209 (A.C. 824-5).

<sup>1</sup> Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣ'ab, a nephew of the celebrated Ṭābir Ibn al-Ḥusayn, governor of Khurāsān, was governor of Baghdad under al-Māmūn and other Khalifs. He died A.H. 235 (A.C. 849-50). (Nujūm.)

* In 'Abd al-Ḥamid : Son of Mu'āwiyah. — Ed.

751 AL-FARAZDAQ, THE POET

Abū Firās Hammām, or Humaym, in the diminutive form, according to Ibn Qutaybah, (No. 306), in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā, was the son of Ghālib surnamed Abu 'l-Akḥṭal, the son of Ṣa'sa'ah, the son of Nājiyah, the son of 'Iqāl, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Sufyān, the son of Mujāshi', the son of Dārim, whose true name was Byhr, the son of Mālik, surnamed 'Awf (host) for his generosity, the son of Ḥanzalah the son of Mālik*, the son of Zayd Manāt, the son of Tamīm, the son of Murr. This celebrated poet of the tribe of Tamīm was generally known by the appellation of al-Farazdaq and by his fellowship with Jarīr (No. 127). His father, Ghālib, was one of the most eminent chiefs of the tribe. His mother, Laylā, was the daughter of Ḥābis and the sister of al-Aqra' Ibn Ḥābis<sup>1</sup>. He (Ghālib) was famous for noble acts and renowned for praise-worthy deeds. Here is an example of his generosity: The inhabitants of Kūfah were afflicted by a famine whilst he was there, and most of them retired into the country (among the nomadic tribes). Ghālib was the chief of one tribe and Suḥaym Ibn Waṭṭīl al-Riyāḥī was at the head of another (the Banū Riyāḥ). The refugees (of Kūfah) assembled at a place called Ṣaw'ar situated in the outskirts of (the desert of) al-Samāwah, in the territory of (the) Kalb (tribe) and at a day's journey from Kūfah. The first syllable of Ṣaw'ar is to be pronounced with an a and the second begins with an ā. Ghālib slew a female camel for his people and prepared a repast with the flesh. To the persons of consequence belonging to the tribe of Tamīm he presented large dishes filled with ṭharīd (bread steeped in broth), but Suḥaym, to whom he sent one dish, upset it and beat him who brought it, saying: "Do I stand in need of a repast from Ghālib? as often as he slays a female camel, I shall slay another." A contest of rivalry then ensued, and Suḥaym slew a female camel for his people. The next morning, Ghālib killed two, and Suḥaym killed also two for his people. The next day, each of them killed three. On the fourth day, Ghālib slew one hundred, and Suḥaym, not having so many at hand, slew none and concealed in his mind (the jealousy which he felt). When the famine was over, the people of Kūfah returned to the city and Banū Riyāḥ said to Suḥaym: "You have brought down upon us everlasting disgrace! Why did you not kill as many as he? For every camel you slew, we should have given you two." He excused himself by saying that his camels were absent, and (soon after) he killed three hundred and said to the people: "Here is for you; eat!" This passed in the khalīfate of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, and he (All) being consulted on the lawfulness of eating that flesh, made answer: "To eat it is contrary to law, because the animals were not killed for eating but through another motive; namely, vain glory and ostentation." So the flesh was cast into the place (kunāsah) where the sweepings and dirt of Kūfah were deposited, and it remained there till eaten by dogs, eagles and vultures. The history of this occurrence is well-known, as it gave rise to a number of poems. One of them was composed by Jarīr, in the form of a satire on Farazdaq and contains a verse often quoted by grammarians in their treatises, to exemplify a rule, and which we here give:

1 Al-Aqra' Ibn Ḥābis, a brave cavalier of the tribe of Tamīm, was one of Muḥammad's Companions, and one of the chiefs who revolted against Abū Bakr, on Muḥammad's death. He afterwards made his submission and commanded the van of the army with which Khalīd Ibn al-Walīd attacked the Persian empire. (Caussin de Perceval's Essai, etc., tome III; Ibn Durayd's Ishṭīlqāq.)

* Omitted in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

"Sons of Dawṭarā! you count as your best title to glory the slaying of old camels, since you cannot (boast of slaying warriors) equipped in helm and mail!"

This idea was borrowed by al-Mahel*<sup>2</sup>, a member of the tribe called the Banī Qaṭan Ibn Nahshal, and expressed by him in the following terms:

1 The grammarians, notice this verse because it offers an example of the particle law-lā followed immediately by a noun in the accusative. They get over the difficulty by saying that a verb is to be understood. See de Sacy's edition of the Alfiyah of Ibn Mālik, page 178, and Ibn 'Aqīl's Commentary on the Alfiyah, page 230 of the Bulāq edition. The word ḍawṭara signifies a heavy, good for nothing man.

2 The orthography of this name is doubtful.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: al-Mujallā.—Ed.

"I was rejoiced that (the tribe of) Mujāshi' could put forward no other claim to honour than the slaying of old camels at Ṣaw'ār."

The Ghālib here spoken of was blind of an eye. The Ṣuḥaym above-mentioned was the son of Wathīl Ibn 'Amr Ibn Juwayn Ibn Wuhayb Ibn Ḥimayr, and the author of this (well-known) verse :

"I am the son of Jalā, the climber of mountains ; when I take off my turban (and veil), you shall know me<sup>1</sup>."

This verse is part of a poem<sup>2</sup>. The poetical works (of Ṣuḥaym) have been collected and form a small (dīwān) ; Wathīl (as a common noun) means a weak rope, or, according to some, the fibres of the date tree<sup>3</sup>. Al-Farazdaq had so great a respect for the tomb of his father that, when any person invoked its protection, he would go to his assistance and help him to obtain what he wanted. As an instance of this, we shall here give an anecdote inserted by al-Mubarrad (No. 610) in his Kāmil : Tamīm Ibn Zayd al-Qaynī, having been appointed to the government of Sind by al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf al-Ṭhaqafi (No. 144), entered into Baṣrah (for the purpose of levying troops), and took off with him as many of the inhabitants as he pleased. An old woman then went to al-Farazdaq and said : "I have invoked the protection of your father's tomb ; here are some of the pebbles (which cover it)." He asked her what she wanted and she replied : "Tamīm, the son of Zayd, has carried off my son, the sole delight of my eyes, the only one who procures me subsistence." "What is his name?" said he. She answered : "His name is Khunaysh*." He immediately wrote to Tamīm the following lines and sent them off by a person who was going (to join him) :

1. This verse is cited by al-Jawharī, in the Ṣalāḥ and by Ibn Hishām in the Mughnī 'l-Labīb. The celebrated general, al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf, applied it to himself in his harangue to the people of Kūfah. See Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, tome I, page 201.

2 The rest of this poem is given by al-Suyūṭī in his Sharḥ Shawḥid il-Mughnī, MS of the Bibl, Imp, no. 1238, fol. 105.

3 According to al-Suyūṭī, this name is of the diminutive form and should be pronounced Wuthayl.

* 'Khunays' in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd—Ed.

"Tamim, son of Zayd ! let not this request be neglected and let not its answer be delayed. Restore me Khunaysh ; I shall consider it as a great favour ; such is the interest I take in a (poor) mother who can no longer enjoy her food. She came to me, O Tamim ! and invoked the tomb of Ghālib, that grave over which the winds sweep the dust. All people know that you are truly generous and, when the fire of war is lighted, brave as a lion."

When Tamim received this letter, he had doubts whether the name was Khunaysh or Hubaysh, and gave orders to see if it was inscribed on the roll of the army. Six names were found ; some of them Khunaysh and the others Hubaysh ; so, he sent all those men to the poet. Al-Farazdaq and Nuṣayb<sup>1</sup>, a well known poet, were one day in the presence-chamber of Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, the Umayyid khalif, who said to the former : "Recite me something ;" expecting to hear an eulogium on himself. Al-Farazdaq pronounced the following lines in praise of his own father :

"How often (was seen) a band of travellers on whom the wind, (fatigued) with bearing along the (heavy) clouds, seemed to be wreaking its vengeance. In their nocturnal journey, they struggled against the blast which enveloped them, (and tried to get) at the water-skins attached to the saddles on which their baggage was tied<sup>2</sup>. When they saw the light of a fire, they would exclaim : "May it be the one (we hope for) ! and already, the (hospitable) fire of Ghālib was close at hand."

Sulaymān turned away from him, as if displeased, and Nuṣayb then said : "Commander of the faithful ! permit me to recite to you a piece in the same rhyme as that which you have heard and, perhaps, not inferior to it in merit." "Let us have it," said the khalif, and the poet recited as follows :

"I said to the caravan which I met coming from the watering-place, (situated) behind Dhāt Awshāl : 'May the Lord provide for you<sup>3</sup> ! Stop and give me news of Sulaymān ; for he (always) seeks 1 See note on Nuṣayb that follows.

2 This translation of two very obscure verses is merely conjectural.

3 This meaning of the second hemistich is very doubtful.

inhabitants of Waddān on whom he may bestow his gifts<sup>1</sup>; They turned, (towards me) and praised him as he had deserved; had they even remained silent, their (well-filled) saddle-bags had sufficed for his eulogium."

Sulaymān then said to al-Farazdaq: "What think you of that?" The other replied: "He is the best poet of his race," and, on rising up, repeated this line:

"The best poetry comes from men of noble race; the worst proceeds from slaves."

Nuṣayb was a black slave, belonging to a man who was an inhabitant of Wādī 'l-Qurā<sup>2</sup>. He bound himself by a written contract (to purchase his liberty)<sup>3</sup>, and (the Umayyad prince) 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwān, in whose honour he composed some verses, bought (of the former master) the right of patronage. Nuṣayb was surnamed Abu'l-Ḥajnā, or, according to some, Abu 'l-Miḥjan<sup>4</sup>. Al-Farazdaq composed a great number of pieces in which he

1 The observation in the preceding note applies equally to this hemistich.

2 A fertile and well-inhabited valley, on the road leading from Madīnah to Syria.

3 For the nature of the bond called kltāb, see d'Ohsson's Tableau general de l'Empire ottoman, tome VI, page 35.

4 The poet Nuṣayb Ibn Riyāḥ, generally known by the surname of Abū Miḥjan (the man with the crook), was a black slave. He was present at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah and, according to the author of the Nujūm, was enfranchised by the ḫalīf 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Marwān. He went to see that prince and, being asked by him what he wanted replied: "I am a slave." 'Abd al-'Azīz ordered appraisers to estimate his value. They answered: "He is a black slave, hardly worth one hundred dīnārs (forty pounds sterling)." "Yes," said Abū Miḥjan, speaking of himself, "but he is a shepherd and well understands the management of a flock." On this, they said: "Two hundred dīnārs." "Yes" said the other, "but he can shape arrows and fledge them." Three hundred dīnārs. "Yes, but he shoots well and hits the mark." "Four hundred dīnārs," "Yes, but he is a reciter of poems." "Five hundred dīnārs." He then addressed the ḫalīf in these terms: "May God favour the Commander of the faithful! where is my handsel"? The prince gave him one thousand dīnārs, purchased his mother and all the family, and granted them their liberty. According to the Nujūm, in which this anecdote is given, Abū Miḥjan died A.H. 108 (A.C. 726-7). Some account of his is given in the Journal Asiatique for February, 1841.

extolled his father. Ša'sa'ah Ibn Nājiyah, the grandfather of al-Farazdaq was a powerful chief in the time of paganism.<sup>1</sup> He purchased (and brought up) thirty female children whom their parents intended to bury alive<sup>1</sup>, and one of them was a daughter of Qays Ibn 'Āsim al-Minqari (No. 74, note). Al-Farazdaq expressed in the following lines the pride he felt in having such an ancestor :

"My grandfather was he who hinderd fathers from burying their daughters; he saved the life of the child, so that it was not buried."

Ša'āh was the first of our poet's forefathers who embraced Islāmism, and the author of the Istī'āb<sup>2</sup> ranks him among the Companions of the Prophet. Such of the (literary) men as were acquainted with poetry differed in opinion respecting the relative merits of al-Farazdaq and Jarir, but the majority considred Jarir as the better poet. It is well-known that these two composed satires on each other and lived in mutual enmity. The pieces (in which they attacked each other) have been collected into a volume, which bears the title of al-naqā'id (detractory pieces), and is a well-known work. Jarir composed on his rival a poem the rhymes of which were formed by the syllable ra and which contained this verse :

"When you were a guest at any one's house, you departed with ignominy and left behind disgrace."

It happened, some time after, that al-Farazdaq stopped at the house of a woman who inhabited Madinah, and he had there an adventure too long to relate. The sum of it was that she received him as guest and treated him with kindness; on which he asked her to yield her person up to him, but she refused. 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, who was then wāll (chief magistrate) of Madinah, was informed of what had passed and gave orders that al-Farazdaq

1 Respecting this barbarous custom, see Sale's note on the eighth verse of the eighty-first sūrah of the Qur'ān.

2 The Istī'āb, a work treating of the Companions of Muḥammad, was composed by Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, a doctor whose life will be given in this work.

should be turned out of the city. He was sent away, mounted on a female camel, and a spectator said : "The devil take Ibn al-Marāghah !<sup>1</sup> one would think he had witnessed what is now passing, when he said : when you were a guest at any one's house, etc." A certain qāḍī, having one day heard a deposition made by al-Farazdaq, said to him : "We accept your testimony," and then told the parties concerned to furnish additional evidence. Al-Farazdaq, being told, after leaving the court, that the qāḍī had rejected his testimony, said (only this) : "What should prevent him from doing so have I not (done like him and) compromised a thousand respectable women ?" Here is one of the pieces which he composed during his residence at Madinah :

"These two females lowered me down from a height of eighty fathoms. I descended like a falcon stopping down its dark head. When my legs took solid footing on the ground, these (girls) said : 'Is he alive, so that he may give hopes (of being seen again), or is he killed so that we must fear (the consequence) ? I said : 'Draw up the cords lest we be discovered,' and I went away more promptly than the last shades of night. I feared two door-keepers who had been set to watch us and I dreaded a black (thing) of teak-wood (a door), with creaking nails<sup>2</sup>".

When Jarir heard these verses, he composed a long qasidah in which he said :

"The mother of al-Farazdaq brought into the world a reprobate, a short-winged buzzard. When night spreads her shades around, he forms his two ropes into a ladder, by which he may mount to the chambers of his female neighbours. Adulterer ! you were lowered down from a height of eighty fathoms, but you could never attain to any height in glory and in honour. People of Madinah ! that man is impurity itself : be on your guard and shut all entrances by which may pass (a wretch so) foul, so versed

1 Literally : God's curse on Ibn al-Marāghah ! This was a nickname given to Jarir. For its origin, see vol. I, page 297. Maledictions of this kind were often employed by the Arabs to express approbation.

2 Ibn Khallikān has cited the last words of this verse incorrectly ; the right reading is : تلوح مسابيح "the broad-headed nails of which shine brightly".

in all lewdness. The expulsion of al-Farazdaq from your town was the purifying of the quarter which lies between the Muṣallā and Wāqim<sup>1</sup>".

When al-Farazdaq heard the contents of this poem, he answered it by another, which was also of considerable length and which contained this passage :

"It would be wrong in me to revile persons resembling my high-minded ancestors, so generous, so noble ! But it would be right for me to return insult for insult, if I was attacked by the descendants of 'Abd Shams or of Hāshim, the two branches of 'Abd Manāf. Such people are my equals in worth ; let me then have one like them (If I must attack). I disdain satirizing Kulayb (Jarir's ancestor) in opposing to him (my ancestor) Dārim".

The inhabitants of Madinah, having heard the first of these (three) pieces, met together and went to Marwān Ibn al-Ḥakam the Umayyad, who then governed the city in the name of his relative, Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abī Sufyān. "It is not fit," said they, "that a poem such as this should be recited in a place where the widows of the Prophet are residing. Besides, the author has incurred the penalty of corporal correction." Marwān replied that he would not inflict that punishment, but would write to a person who would do so. He then ordered al-Farazdaq to quit the city within three days. In allusion to this circumstance, the poet said :

"He threatened me and fixed a term of three days ; the same term assigned to the Ṭhamūd, when threatened with destruction<sup>2</sup>".

Marwān then wrote to one of his officers, commanding him to chastise al-Farazdaq and cast him into prison. (He gave this letter to the poet), making him believe that it contained an order for a present. He afterwards regretted what he had done, and dispatched after the poet a messenger, to whom he (merely) said :

1 Wāqim was the name of a castle at Madinah. For Muṣallā, see No. 262n.

2 Qur'd n, sūrah xi, verse 68.

"I have just pronounced a piece of verse ; have it is ; go and repeat it to al-Farazdaq :

'Say to al-Farazdaq, and folly is like its name!<sup>1</sup> 'If you obey not the order I have given you, go to Najd (ijlis). Leave Madīnah ; it is a place to be feared. Go to Makkah or to Bayt al-maqdis (Jerusalem). If you have committed a grave fault, take now consummate prudence for your guide' "

The word ijlis means go to al-Jalsā, that is, to Najd. This country was called al-Jalsā on account of its elevation ; for the root jālūs signifies to set up (after reclining). When al-Farazdaq heard these verses, he understood what Marwān meant, and threw away the letter. He then said :

"O Marwān<sup>2</sup> ! my camel was stopped, in expectation of a gift which was not totally dispaired of ; and you gave me a sealed letter ; but I feared it would procure me the gift of death. Throw away the letter, Farazdaq ! best it should be dangerous, like the letter of al-Mutalammis"

As we have now mentioned the letter of al-Mutalammis, we shall relate what is told of it, as the reader of this work may perhaps be desirous of knowing what it was. Jarīr Ibn 'Abd al-Masīḥ Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Zayd Ibn Dawfan* Ibn Ḥarb Ibn Wahb Ibn Julay Ibn Aḥmas Ibn Dubay'ah Ibn Rābi'ah Ibn Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn Adnān received the surname of al-Mutalammis for having said, in a qasidah :

"This (happened) at the time (we were dwelling in the valley) of al-'Ird, the flies of which, that is, the wasps, lived in abundance, as also the blue fly, so pertinacious (mutalammis)<sup>3</sup>".

1 This proverbial expression is not noticed by al-Maydānī. It appears to signify: 'It is as bad to be stupid. as to be called so,' and was probably used in speaking to persons whom it was necessary to put on their guard.

2 The right reading is يا مروان with the apocopated vocative. See Ḥamāsah, page 189.

3 This verse is given incorrectly in the editions. the manuscripts and the Ishṭiqāq of Ibn Durayd. p. 192. The Ḥamāsah, p. 323, gives it as it should be and explains its meaning and grammatical construction.

* 'Dawqal' in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

Al-Mutalammis and ʿĪrafah Ibn al-ʿAbd al-Bakri, his sister's son, composed, both of them, satires on ʿAmr Ibn al-Hind al-Lakhmī, the king of Ḥīrah<sup>1</sup>. These poems were communicated to ʿAmr, but he did not manifest any dissatisfaction on hearing them. The two poets, having afterwards praised him in their verses, he handed to each of them a letter, addressed to his lieutenant at Ḥīrah<sup>2</sup>, and gave them to understand that these papers contained an order to bestow on them a handsome present. The truth was that, in them, he enjoined his lieutenant to put the bearers to death. When they arrived near Ḥīrah, al-Mutalammis said to ʿĪrafah : "Both of us have satirized the king and, if he had the intention of bestowing on us a gift, he would have done so, without writing in our favour to Ḥīrah. Come ! let us show the letters to some one who can read ; if they be dangerous for us, we can take to flight before any one knows that we are here." ʿĪrafah replied : "I cannot permit myself to open the king's letter." "By Allāh !" exclaimed al-Mutalammis, "I shall open the one which he gave me ; I must know what it contains, for I do not wish to resemble the man who bore in his hand the instrument which served to kill him." He then looked about and, seeing a young boy come out of the town, he said to him : "Tell me, my boy ! can you read ?" "I can," said the lad. "Well," said al-Mutalammis, "read me this letter." The boy cast his eyes over it and said : "Let the mother of al-Mutalammis be rendered childless." On hearing this, al-Mutalammis said to ʿĪrafah : "Open your letter and see if it contains the same order as mine." ʿĪrafah replied : "ʿAmr may be bold enough to have you put to death, but he dare not do so to me, lest he should give a mortal offence to my tribe." Al-Mutalammis threw his letter into the river of Ḥīrah and fled to Syria. ʿĪrafah entered into the city and was put to death. The history of this is well-known. The letter of al-Mutalammis is an expression employed proverbially

1 For an account of this adventure by al-Mutalammis himself, see Reiske's edition of ʿĪrafah's Muʿallaqah, Prologus, p. XLIX et seq.

2 This is evidently a mistake ; the king of Ḥīrah could not have had a regular lieutenant in his own capital. The true reading is al-Ḥajar, حجر, which place was the capital of Bahrayn. The recital made by al-Mutalammis gives the latter reading.

in speaking of persons who read letters in which their death is ordered. It is to this al-Ḥarīrī alludes, in his tenth Maqāmah<sup>1</sup>, where he says: "And I unsealed it as one would do who wished to escape from (a danger) such as (that contained in) the letter of al-Mutalammis. The poet al-Ablah, of whom we have already spoken (No. 653) said in one of his qasīdahs :

"The passionate lover reads expressions of disdain on the page of her cheek ; (a page as clear) as the letter of al-Mutalammis."

Let us resume our notice on al-Farazdaq. He then set out and fled for refuge to Sa'īd Ibn al-Āṣ<sup>2</sup>, whom he found in company with al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn (the sons of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib), and 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far<sup>3</sup>. When he told them what had happened, each of them ordered him a present of one hundred dinārs and a good travelling camel. He then proceeded to Baṣrah. Marwān, being told (by his friends) that he had acted wrong in exposing himself to be attacked by the ablest poet of (the tribe of) Muḍar, sent after him a messenger with one hundred dinārs and a camel ; so much he dreaded being satirized by the poet. It is related that al-Farazdaq, in one of his journies, halted in (the midst of) a desert and lighted a fire. A wolf, seeing the flame, drew near, and he gave it some of his provisions to eat whilst he recited these lines :

"In the middle of the night, I called near me, by lighting a fire, a dark-grey, swift-trotting (wolf), which had never been a companion (to any one). When he arrived, I said : 'Approach ! take this ! you and I shall have equal parts in the provisions.' I passed the night in cutting the meat and sharing it between us ; now, lighted by the fire, and then surrounded by smoke. When he

1 Page 103 of de Sacy's edition.

2 Sa'īd Ibn al-Āṣ, a member of the Umayyad family, governed Kūfah under the khalīfate of 'Uthmān. In A. H. 29 (A. C. 649-50), he re-established the authority of the Arabs in Āḡlaba'ijān ; in 49 (A. C. 669) he was appointed governor of Madinah by Mu'āwiyah and died A. H. 59 (A. C. 678-9). Nujūm.

3 'Abd Allāh, the son of Ja'far and the nephew of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, was born in Abyssinia during the first Muslim emigration. He was a devoted partisan of his uncle. His death occurred A. H. 80 (A. C. 699-700). Nujūm.

shewed his teeth, as if in laughter, the hilt of my sword was firm in my grasp, and I said : 'Sup, O wolf ! and, if you engage to use no treachery towards me, we shall be inseparable companions. But you are (as bad as) a man ; you and treachery are brothers, nourished with the same milk. Had you aroused any other but me in demanding hospitality, he would have shot you with an arrow or pierced you with the point of his spear.' "

He one day recited to the Umayyad (khalif), Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, a poem rhyming in m and containing the following passage :

"Three (girls) and two make five ; the sixth was (of a colour which) inclined to black<sup>1</sup>. They passed the night lying at my sides, and I passed it in breaking open the seals. It seemed as if... were in it and as if they were sitting on burning coals<sup>2</sup>."

When he pronounced these lines, Sulaymān said to him ; "I am an (imām khalif) and yet you acknowledge in my presence that you committed fornication ; you must therefore undergo the corporal punishment fixed by law." "Commander of the faithful !" said al-Farazdaq, "how can I have incurred such a chastisement ?" Sulaymān answered : "The Almighty has said (Qur'ān, sūr. xxiv, vers. 2) : He and she who commit fornication scourge each of them with one hundred stripes." Al-Farazdaq replied : "The book of God averts that punishment from me, by virtue of these words : And the poets ; none follow them but the misguided. Seest thou not how they roam through every valley (of the imagination), and that they say things which they do not perform. I said also what I did not perform." Sulaymān said to him, in smiling ; "Go away, you reprobate !" Al-Farazdaq did a noble act for which we may hope that he gained admission into Paradise and which we shall relate here. Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik went on a pilgrimage to Makkah during the lifetime of his father (the Khalif). He made the circuits (around the Ka'bah) and endeavoured to approach the (black) stone, so that he might kiss it, but was unable to do so, on account of the crowd. A platform was set up for him, and whilst he was sitting on it, with a number of the (principal) Arabs of Syria, and looking at the people, Zayn al-Ābidin (No. 397), the son of Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib approached. He was the handsomest of men and no one smelled so sweetly. Having made the circuits around the (holy) house, he advanced towards the stone and the people made way for him, so that he was able to kiss it. One of the Syrians asked who that person was to whom so much respect was shown, and Ḥishām, fearing that the Syrians might take a fancy to him<sup>1</sup>, answered that he did not know. Al-Farazdaq who was present, said; "I know him." The Syrian said to him; "Who is he? Abā Firās!" and the poet replied in these terms:

1 I suppose the right reading to be مخام .

2 The breaking open of seals and the pronoun it (in the third line), without an antecedent, indicate evidently obscene ideas. The translator is unable to explain the word مغالق .

"This is he whose footsteps are well-known to al-Baṭḥā<sup>2</sup>; he is known to this temple, to the sacred territory and to that which is profane. This is the son of the best of the servants of God; this is the pious, the pure, the unsullied, the learned. When the Qurayshids look at him they say: 'Virtues such as his are what the virtuous should strive to imitate.' He has reached a pinnacle of glory to which the Arabs of Islāmic times and men of foreign race have been unable to attain. The corner of al-Ḥaṭīm<sup>3</sup> recognises the touch of his hand, and strives to detain it, when he goes to kiss (the black stone). The rod which he wields owes its sweet odour to (the contact of) a hand belonging to a man of comely aspect and exalted rank. His eyes are cast down, through modesty, and those of other men are cast down in his presence; none dare to speak to him unless they see him smile. The light of true guidance shines forth from his forehead like the radiance of the sun dispersing the dark clouds. The source from which he springs is derived

---

1 It was to the Arabs established in Syria that the Umayyad were indebted for their elevation and the maintenance of their power. Ḥishām was apprehensive that they might fix their affection on this 'Alide prince.

2 Al-Baṭḥā is the name of the valley in which Makkah is built.

3 The corner of the Ka'bah near which is inserted the black stone, is called the Ḥaṭīm.

from the Apostle of God; pure are the elements of which he is composed; pure his nature and his disposition. That is the son of Fāṭimah, in case you know him not; with his grandfather terminated the series of the prophets of God. Long since, God ennobled and exalted him; this was traced on the tablet of his (life) by the pen (of fate). Your asking who he is can be for him no disparagement: The Arabs know him whom you know not, and so do the foreigners. Each of his hands (furnishes) a shower (of gifts) which all enjoy; the flow of their (beneficence) is constantly invoked and never ceases. From him, so mild in disposition, no bursts of passion are to be feared; he possesses the double beauty of body and of mind. He alleviates the distressed and takes their burden on himself; so sweet is his temper that the word yes, is sweet for him to say. His, the promises which are never broken; his, the generous inspirations, the large (and hospitable) court and the resolution which appals (the foe). He extends his beneficence to all mankind, and delivers them from gloom,<sup>1</sup> from poverty and from want. He belongs to a family which religion obliges us to love and towards which hatred, if shewn, is an act of infidelity. Their neighbourhood is an asylum and a protection. If pious men were counted, they would hold the first rank; if it were asked who are the best on earth, the answer would be: 'They'. The most bountiful of men cannot keep pace with them in the career of beneficence; generous though he be, he cannot come up with them. They are (fertilising) rains when drought afflicts the land; they are lions, lions of al-Shawrā, when the ardour of war has arisen. Straitened circumstances cannot diminish the abundance of their gifts, their conduct is the same, whether they be rich or poor. When the name of God is pronounced at the beginning or at the close of an invocation, their names are mentioned before those of others. Their generous nature and their hands overflowing with beneficence will not permit blame to settle near them: (Shall we ask) what are the noble qualities which have not adorned their necks, from the commencement of their existence? or must we not rather affirm (that they possess them all)<sup>1</sup>. They who know God know the exalted rank of that man ; from his family religion was received by every nation".

<sup>1</sup> The true reading is doubtful, but the meaning is clear. I read "الغيايد" (darkness). [ الغيايد (absence) in 'Abd al-Hamid.]—Ed.

Hishām was so much displeased on hearing this qaṣṣdah that he had al-Farazdaq taken to prison. Zayn al-‘Ābidīn sent twelve thousand dirhams to the poet, who refused to accept them, saying that he had praised him, not for the hopes of obtaining a gift but with the intention of pleasing Almighty God. To this Zayn al-‘Ābidīn answered : "We others, the people of the house<sup>2</sup>, never take back what we bestow." Al-Farazdaq then accepted the present. Muḥammad Ibn Habib, a person of whom we have already spoken<sup>3</sup>, relates as follows : "Al-Walid, the son of ‘Abd al-Malik, got into the pulpit (to pronounce) the khutbah, and he heard the sound of a nāqūs<sup>4</sup>. "What is that" ? said he. "The monastery," was the reply. He immediately ordered it to be levelled to the ground and did part of the work with his own hands. The people followed his example and destroyed the building. Al-Aḥzam, the king of the Greeks<sup>5</sup>, then wrote a letter

1 Literally : or to that, yes ; i.e. : or to that (question must we not say) yes ?

2 The term people of the house served to designate descendants of Muḥammad, the posterity of his daughter Fāṭimah, and of ‘Alī.

3 The author refers perhaps to a passage in the life of Jarīr the poet (No. 127) Abū Ja‘fr Muḥammad Ibn Habib, a mawla of the Hāshim family, died at Sāmarrāh, A. H. 245 (A. C. 859-60). He was a learned genealogist, well-versed in the history of the ancient Arabs and their battle-days, an exact, veracious and traditionist Traditionist. (Nujūm). For further information see M. Flügel's Grammatische Schulen der Araber, p. 67.

4 In Muḥammadan countries, the use of bells was forbidden in Christian churches. To call the people to prayer they strike with a mallet on a short board which is suspended by cords. This is the naqūs.

5 The Arabic word أحزم (aḥzam) signifies circumspect and corpulent. I suspect we must read أخرم (akhram), an adjective which means slit-nosed, and that the person meant was Justinian II. This prince was deposed and his nose was amputated, A.C. 695 ; but, a few years afterwards he was restored the throne, and reigned till A.C. 711, when he was put to death. Al-Walid reigned from A.C. 705 to 714.

in which he said : 'This monastery was authorised by your predecessors ; and, if they were right in doing so, you are now in the wrong ; if you are in the right, they were wrong. Al-Walid said : 'Can any one answer that ? Al-Farazdaq replied : "Write to him these words : 'And (remember) David and Solomon, when they pronounced judgment concerning a field, in which the sheep of certain people had fed by night having no shepherd ; we were witnesses of their judgment, and we gave the understanding of the cause to Solomon<sup>1</sup>, and to all we gave wisdom and knowledge' ".

The anecdotes told of al-Farazdaq are very numerous, but concision is to be preferred here. He died at Baṣrah, in the year 110 (A. C. 728-9), forty days before the death of Jarīr ; some say, eighty. Abu 'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 345) says, in his Shudhūr al-uqūd<sup>2</sup>, that they both died in the year 111. Al-Sukkārī<sup>3</sup>* states that al-Farazdaq saw 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, and that he died in the year 110. Other accounts say, 112 or 114. Ibn Qutaybah mentions, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā that al-Farazdaq being suffering from a vomica, was taken to Baṣrah in that state. The doctor who was called in prescribed to him a draught of naphtha, on which the patient exclaimed : "Do you mean to make me drink naphtha before I am gone to hell ? I am still in the world". When he died, he was nearly one hundred year of Age. Al-Mubarrad (No. 610) relates as follows, in his Kāmil : Al-Ḥasan

1 Qūr'ān, sūrah xxi, verse 78. On this verse Sale has a note, borrowed from the Musulmān commentators, and informing us that David ordered the owner of the land to take the sheep in compensation for his loss ; but Solomon, who was then only seven years of age, was of opinion that it would be more just for the owner to take the produce of the sheep, namely their milk, lambs and wool, till the shepherd put the field in as good condition as before the trespass.

2 This title signifies Fragments of golden collars. The work itself was historical compilation.

3 Abū Sa'īd al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Sukkārī, a learned philologist, genealogist and historian, studied at the schools of Kūfah and Baṣrah, and composed some works, one of which was a collection of ancient Arabic poetry. He died A. H. 275 (A. C. 888-9), aged sixty-three years. For fuller information see professor Flügel's work entitled Die grammatischen Schulen der Araber, p. 89.

* 'al-Askarī' in 'Aūd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

al-Baṣrī (No. 148), and al-Farazdaq met together at a funeral, and al-Farazdaq said to al-Ḥasan: 'Abū-Sa'id! Do you know what the people are saying? They declare that the best and the worst of men have met at this funeral'. 'Nay', said al-Ḥasan, 'I am not the best of men, neither are you the worst. But, tell me what good work you can adduce in your favour (before the tribunal of God), when this day arrives (for yourself). Al-Farazdaq answered: '(I shall adduce) the testimony I have borne, for the last sixty years, that there is only one God.' A female belonging to the tribe of Ṭamīm declared that al-Farazdaq was seen in a dream and, being asked how the Lord had treated him, he answered: 'He pardoned me'. Being then asked for what reason, he replied: 'For a word which I said in a conversation with al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī'". The words هَمَام and عَقَال, must be pronounced Ḥamām and 'Iqāl. Muḥammad Ibn Sufyān was one of the three individuals who bore the name of Muḥammad in anti-Islāmic times. Ibn Qutaybah mentions them in the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, and al-Suhaylī (No. 346) says, in his al-Rawḍ al-Unuf: "Amongst the Arabs, no one is known to have borne this name except three persons. Their fathers, having heard that a Muḥammad was soon to appear, who would be sent on a (divine) mission to Ḥijāz, gave this name to their sons, hoping that one of them might be that person. According to Ibn Fūrak (No. 584), in his Kitāb al-Fuṣūl (book of chapters), their names were, (1) Muḥammad Ibn Sufyān Ibn Mujāshī', the grandfather of al-Farazdaq, (2) Muḥammad Ibn Uḥayḥah the grandson of al-Julāḥ, the same who was a (uterine) brother of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, the grandfather of the Apostle of God, (3) Muḥammad Ibn Ḥumrān Ibn Rabi'ah. The fathers of these three went to a certain king who was acquainted with the primitive scriptures, and he informed them of the coming of God's apostle and mentioned his name. Each of them had left his wife at home in a state of pregnancy, and then vowed that, if his child was a male, he would name it Muḥammad and so they did. مُجَاشِع must be pronounced Mujāshī' ; دَارِم is pronounced Dārim with an i in the second syllable), the other names in al-Farazdaq's genealogy are too well known to require observation. الزردق pronounced al-Farazdaq was a nick-name given to the poet. Ibn Qutaybah explains it in two different manners, stating, in his Adab al-Kātib, that it signifies a lump of dough, and that its form, as a noun of unity, is Farazdaqah. "The poet," says he, "received this name on account of his ugly face<sup>1</sup>." He then states, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā, that he was so called on account of his short and dumpy stature, which made him be compared to the crust (farazdaqah)<sup>2</sup> with which women polish their teeth. The first explanation is the best, because the poet caught the small-pox and, when recovered, his face remained deformed and wrinkled. It is related that a person said to him : "Abū Firās ! vultus tuus est sicut congeries pudendorum muliebrium (احراج) aḥrāḥ. To this he answered : "Inspice ! forsan in illa videbis pudendum matris tuae"<sup>3</sup>. The word aḥrāḥ, with two ḥ, is the plural of ḥirḥ, a word employed to designate the female sexual organ. In the singular, the second ḥ is suppressed, but reappears ; in the plural ; for it is a general rule that words irregular in the singular become regular in the plural. Nawār, the cousin and wife of al-Farazdaq, was the daughter of A'yan Ibn Ḍubay'ah Ibn 'Iqāl, of the family of Mujāshī'. It was her grandfather, Ḍubay'ah who hamstrung the camel on which 'Āyishah, the mother of the faithful<sup>3</sup>, was mounted, at the battle of the Camel. A Quaryshite having asked Nawār to marry him, she sent to al-Farazdaq and requested him to act as her legal guardian, because he was the son of her uncle. He replied : "In Syriā, you have nearer relations than me, and I cannot but apprehend that one of them may arrive and blame me for interfering. You must therefore declare before witnesses that you leave what concerns you to my decision." She consented and (when the formality was executed), al-Farazdaq went out with the witnesses and said to them : "She has taken you to witness that she leaves what concerns her to my decision ; now I take you to witness, that I have decided on marrying her myself, and that I assign to her a dowry of one hundred she-camels of a bay colour with black eyes".

1 Ibn Quraybah should have added, to complete his explanation, that the poet's face was wrinkled and spotted like a burnt cake of bread.

2 Here the text is faulty ; I read. اقتية التي تشربها.

3 The title of Mother of the faithful was given to all the widows of Muḥammad.

* English version : Do you see your mother's vagina.—Ed.

Al-Nawār was much incensed at this proceeding and, wishing to obtain justice, she went to 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, who was at that time sovereign of Hijāz and 'Irāq. Al-Farazdaq set out also. Al-Nawār took up her abode with al-Khawlah, the daughter of Manzūr Ibn Rabbān al-Fazārī and the wife of 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr. Being kindly received by her, she implored her intervention (with Ibn al-Zubayr). Al-Farazdaq stopped at the house of Ḥamzah, the son of Ibn al-Zubayr and of al-Khawlah, and, having recited some verses in his praise, he obtained from him the promise to intercede. Al-Khawlah then spoke in favour of al-Nawār and Ḥamzah in favour of al-Farazdaq. The influence of al-Khawlah prevailed, and Ibn al-Zubayr ordered the poet to proceed to Baṣrah with al-Nawār, and to avoid every familiarity with her till the governor of that place had decided between them. It was on this occasion that al-Farazdaq composed these lines (on Ibn al-Zubayr):

"The intervention of your son was of no avail, but that of Manzūr Ibn Rabbān's daughter succeeded. An intercessor who goes to you clothed is not like one who goes to you naked."

Some time after, they were reconciled together, but a considerable period elapsed before they had any children. Al-Nawār then had a number of sons, whose names were Labaṭah; Sabaṭah* Khabatah, Rakaḍah, and Zama'ah†, but they all died childless. The daughters only left posterity. Ibn Khalawayh (No. 188) says that among the sons of al-Farazdaq were Kalaṭah and Khalaṭah,† God knows best! Al-Farazdaq afterwards divorced al-Nawār for motives the indication of which would lead us too far. He then repented of what he had done and composed on the subject a number of pieces, one which was the following:

My regret was like that of al-Kusa'i<sup>2</sup>, when Nawār was divorced and left me. She was my paradise and I abandoned it;

1 Ibn Durayd explains the meaning of these strange names in his Isṭiṣṣāq, page 147.

2 See de Sacy's Chrestomatie arabe, tome II, page 239. The best account of Farazdaq is that given by M. C. de Perceval in the Journal Asiatique for June, 1834.

* 'Habaṭah' in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

† 'Jalaṭah' in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

'twas thus that a maleficent demon expelled Adam from his paradise."

The stories and anecdotes told of what he did under these circumstances are too numerous to be related here, and this is not a fit place for them. A male child of al-Farazdaq's died, and the father said over it the funeral service; he then turned to the people who were present, and pronounced this verse:

"Between us and those who lie here there is but little difference: we remain here after them for a short time, and then we depart (to join them)."

He died a few days after.

752 HILĀL AL-ŠĀBĪ

The Kātib (scribe) Abu 'l-Ḥasan Hilāl Ibn al-Muḥssan Ibn Abī Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Hilāl Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Zahrūn Ibn Ḥabbūn*<sup>1</sup> al-Šabī al-Ḥarranī (the Sabeian and native of Ḥarrān), was the grandson of Abū Ishāq al-Šabī, the author of the celebrated collection of epistles<sup>2</sup> and the same of whom we have already spoken (No. 14). He studied under the grammarian Abū Ali 'l-Farīsī (No. 155), 'Alī Ibn Isā al-Rummānī (No. 410), Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Jarrāh al-Kharrāz<sup>3</sup> and other masters. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) mentions him in the history of Baghdād and

1 The orthography of this name is fixed by the author of the Tārīḥ al-'Aynī. See Chwolsohn's Ssabier, vol. I, p. 583.

2 A single volume of this great collection of epistles and dispatches is preserved in the Leyden library, and the list of its contents has been given by M. Dozy in the catalogue of that establishment, vol. I, p. 144 et. seq. The documents are on various subjects and were really sent to their address. Some of them were drawn up by Abū Ishāq himself and the rest by other men of rank and talent. They were once highly admired as specimens of elegant style. but, for an European reader, their principal interest must consist in the historical indications which they sometimes offer.

3 The orthography of this name varies in the manuscripts.

* 'Ḥayyūn' in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

says: "We wrote down (pieces) under his dictation; he was veracious (as a transmitter of literary information). Al-Muḥassan. Hilāl's father, was a Šāben in religion, as his own father, Ibrāhim, was before him; but Hilāl became a Muslim towards the close of his life<sup>1</sup>. Whilst he was an infidel, he took lessons from learned (Musulmāns), so ardent was he in the pursuit of literary knowledge<sup>2</sup>." I met with a work of his, consisting of amusing stories and curious anecdotes. It was entitled by him *Kitab al-Amāthil wa 'l-A'yān wa musdi* 'l-'Awātif wa 'l-Iḥsān* (book of eminent and distinguished men, procurer of favours and of kindness). It forms one volume, and I do not know whether he composed anything else or not. His son, Ghars al-Ni'mah Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn Hilāl<sup>3</sup>, was possessed of every merit and composed some useful works, such as the famous (compilation entitled the) great history and a book to which he gave the title of Al-Ḥafawāt al-uādīrah min al-Mu'aqqalīn al-Malḥūzīn wa 'l-Saqatāt al-bādīrah min al-Mughaffilīn al-Malḥūzīn (strange blunders committed by persons respectable for their intelligence and mistakes into which people favoured by fortune have been led by their carelessness). In this volume he assembled a great quantity of stories relative to the subject of which he treated. Here is one of the anecdotes which I extracted from it: "Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās, who was uncle to (the Abbasids khalifs) al-Šaffāḥ and Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, sent to the former who had then commenced his reign, a deputation of shaykhs (chiefs) belonging to the Arabic (tribes) established in Syria. He thought that their (singular) cast of mind and their declarations of fidelity would afford him some amusement. 'They swear,' said he, 'that of all the Prophet's parents they know none, excepting the Umayyads, who had a right to inherit of him, till you obtained the

1 The unusual expression باخره is replaced, in the edition of Būlāq, by باخر عمره, which is much clearer.

2 It is difficult to determine where this extract finishes.

3 See No. 125n, and No. 295.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : muntadī.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : Mu'ḥaffilīn.—Ed.

supreme authority!'. Here is another anecdote which I extracted from the same book; though not very delicate it is amusing, and in compilations (such as mine), a little pungency is necessary, as the gay should always be mixed with the serious. "Abū Sa'īd Māhik Ibn Bindār, a fire-worshipper and a native of Ray was one of the most eminent *Kātib*s among the Daylamites a people of whose (singular) reserve (and modesty, strange) stories got into currency. When he acted as secretary to 'Alī Ibn Sāmān, one of the Daylamite chiefs, the wazīr Abū Muḥammad al-Muāhallabī (No. 170) resolved to send him out on a mission and, seeing him rise from his place with the intention of withdrawing, he said to him: 'Abū Sa'īd! do not leave the palace till I make you acquainted with an affair with I wish you to arrange for me.' Māhik replied: 'I hear and shall obey.' He then stood up and left the presence chamber. On this, the wazīr said: 'The man is surely possessed, or else he has worked so much with me that his heart is oppressed and he requires to withdraw. Let them tell the door-keeper to prevent him from going out.' " Māhik had been a long time seated and was wanting to go to the privy, and that was the reason of his retiring. (On leaving the room), he found all the privies locked; the wazīr having ordered that to be done, 'because,' said he, 'there was always a bad smell in the palace of Abū Ja'far al-Saymarī, where there was a privy for the use of the public.' Māhik discovered at length one closet which was not locked, but which was reserved for the wazīr. He lifted up the curtain which hung at the entrance and was about to go in when the farrāsh<sup>2</sup> came up and pushed him away. 'Is not this a privy?' said Māhik. The other answered that it was. 'Well' said the Kātib, 'I want to do something there, and why do you hinder me?' The farrāsh replied: 'This is a reserved closet into which none enter except the wazīr.' 'The others are locked,' exclaimed Māhik, 'how then shall I do? I was going out, but the door-keeper prevented me; so I risk doing all in my clothes.' The farrāsh said: 'Get an authorisation to enter into

1 Their mentioning the Umayyads, whose authority al-Saffāh had just overturned and whom he detested, was a sufficient proof of their simplicity.

2 The duty of the farrāsh was to take care of the furniture, and to pitch the wazīr's tents when he was on an expedition.

one of them ; ' it shall then be opened to you, and you may do your business. Though the case was pressing, he wrote to the wazīr a petition in which he said : 'Māhik, the humble servant of our lord the wazīr, wants to do what all men must, and which is a thing not fit to mention.' Now the farrāsh says : 'You shall not go in,' and the door-keeper says : 'You shall not go out ;' and your servant is thus placed in a dilemma ; the thing, moreover, is becoming very pressing. If our lord the wazīr be disposed to oblige his servant, 'he will authorise him to do his need in the reserved closet, provided that such be the will of God. Salutation !' A chamberlain to whom he remitted this paper, presented it to the wazīr who, not knowing what the writer wanted, asked what was the matter. Being informed of the circumstance, he laughed heartily and wrote on the back of the petition : 'Let Abū Sa'id, whom God exalt ! do his need<sup>1</sup> where he pleaseth, if such be the will of God.' The chamberlain carried out the paper to Māhik who handed it to the farrāsh, saying : Here is what you asked for, a Tawqī' (decision) emanating from our lord the wazīr.' The farrāsh replied : 'Al! *Tawqī'*s must be perused by Abū 'l-Alā Ibn Abrūnā, the Kātib charged with the administration of the palace ; as for me, I can neither read nor write.' On this Māhik exclaimed : 'Bring some one of the palace who can do so ; for the matter is very pressing'<sup>2</sup>. Another farrāsh who was present burst into laughter, took him by the hand and led him to a closet, where he might do what he wanted." I extracted also the following anecdote from the same work ; "(The poet) Arṭāh Ibn Suhayyah"<sup>3</sup> lived partly in the time of paganism and partly in that of Islāmism. He entered into the presence of (the Umayyad Khalīf) 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān who, seeing that he was a very old man, asked

1 The wazīr here employs the plainest and coarsest word ; as if he meant to scandalise the modesty of his decorous petitioner.

2 Here Māhik forgets himself and speaks in the crudest terms.

3 This poet belonged to the tribe of Muzraḥ. According to the author of the Masālik al-Absār, MS. of the Bibl. Imp. No. 1371, fol. 95 verso, he lived to the age of one hundred and thirty years. Suhayyah was the name of his mother. Mr. de Hammer mentions him in the Literaturgeschichte der Araber, vol. II, p. 519. Some verses of Arṭāh's are given in the Ḥamāsah.

* 'Sumayyah' in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

him to repeat some of the verses in which he alluded to the length of his life. Arṭāh recited these lines :

'I saw that time consumed (the life of) man, even as the earth consumes bits of iron cast away. When death comes to a son of Adam, she requires his soul and nothing more. Know that she will attack again, till she fulfils her vow by (seizing) Abu 'l-Walid.'

(The khalif) shuddered on hearing these words, thinking that they applied to himself, for his surname was Abu 'l-Walid. Arṭāh perceived the fault into which his inadvertence had led him and said : 'Commander of the faithful ! I am surnamed Abu 'l-Walid.' The persons present declared that he had said the truth, and thus relieved, in some degree, the apprehensions of 'Abd al-Mālik." Here is another anecdote which I derived from the same source : "Abu al-'Alā Sa'id Ibn Maḥlad (No 617, note) who was secretary (kātib) to (the regent) al-Muwaffaq, read to his master a letter, but did not understand it. Al-Muwaffaq then read it and comprehended its meaning. This induced 'Isā Ibn al-Qāshhī to compose the following lines :

'I see that Fortune refuses her favours to him who courts her and grants them to him who neglects her. How many have sought the means of gaining (her good will), but their efforts procured them only useless fatigue. One of her strange freaks is, to show us an amir who is a better scholar than his secretary.' "

The Muwaffaq just mentioned bore the names of Abū Aḥmād Ṭalḥah : he was the son of (the khalif) al-Mutawakkil and the father of the 'Abbāsid khalif, al-Mu'taḍid. The same work furnished me with the following anecdote : "An Arab of the desert was at the station (of Arafāt) with (the khalif) 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb (whilst the ceremonies of the pilgrimage were going on). A person behind us,' said he, called out to 'Umar, in these terms : 'O successor (khalif), of the Apostle of God !' and then : 'O Commander of the faithful.' A voice from behind me then exclaimed : 'That fellow calls him ('Umar) by the name of a person who is dead ; by Allāh ! the Commander of the faithful is dead'. I turned round and recognised the speaker ; he was a member of the tribe of Lihb, a people descended from Naḍr Ibn Azd, and who, in taking omens, were the most skilful in the world." "To this al-Kuṭhāyyir, the lover of al-'Azzā (No. 521) alludes in the following verse :

'I asked a man (of the tribe) of Lihb to take an augury; for that talent is now entirely devolved to Lihb".

(The Arab continued his recital and said) : "When we stopped (at Minā) to throw the stones, a pebble struck 'Umar on the side and made him bleed." On this, some one said : "By Allāh the Commander of the faithful is marked for sacrifice! ! by Allāh ! he never again will visit this station !" I turned round and discovered that it was this very Lihbide who had spoken. 'Umar was murdered before a year passed away' ". This anecdote is given also in the Kāmil (of al-Mubarrad). The expression the person who is dead referred to (the khalif) Abū Bakr al-Ṣaddīq, who was called the successor of the Apostle of God. 'Umar, having obtained the supreme authority, on the death of Abū Bakr, was at first designated by the title of the successor of the successor of the Apostle of God, and he therefore said to the Companions : "This is a title which will be lengthened (indefinitely), if every one who comes to the supreme power is called the successor of his predecessor, and so on. up to the Apostle of God. You are the faithful, and I am your Commander". They then called him the Commander of the faithful (Amīr al-Mūminīn). He was the first who bore this title. The word successor (khalif) was the title usually given to Abū Bakr, and, for that reason, the man (at the pilgrimage) said : "He has called him by the name of a dead man". 'Umar Ibn Shabbah (No. 466) relates, in his History of Baṣrah, on the authority of al-Sha'bi (No. 296) that the first person who offered up a prayer from the pulpit for 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb was Abū Mūsā 'l-Ash'arī<sup>2</sup>, (who did so) at Baṣrah. He was also the first who (in writing to 'Umar) inscribed on the letter : To the servant of God ('Abd Allāh), the Commander of the

1 The camels intended to be sacrificed were slightly wounded on the back on the shoulder, so that they might be known.

2 Abū Mūsā 'l-Ash'arī died A. H. 50 (A. C. 670-1) For a short notice on this general see my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Prolegomena, vol. I, p. 449.

faithful. This made 'Umar say: "I am truly a servant of God and the Commander of the faithful". According to 'Awwānah, the first who designated him by this title was 'Adī, the son of Hātim al-Ṭā'i, and the first who saluted him by it was al-Mughīrah Ibn Shu'bah<sup>1</sup>. According to another statement, 'Umar was one day (holding a public) sitting when he said: "By Allāh! I do not know what we must say! Abū Bakr was the successor of the Apostle of God and I am the successor of the successor of God's Apostle. Is there any title that can answer."? Those who were present said: "Commander (Amīr) will do." "Nay", said he, "you are all Commanders". On this al-Mughīrah said: "We are the faithful and you are our Commander." "Then", said 'Umar, "I am the Commander of the faithful."<sup>2</sup> These observations have led us away from our subject, Hilāl was born in the month of Shawwāl, 359 (Aug.-Sept., A. C. 970), and died on the eve of Thursday, the 17th of Rumādān, 448 (28th November, A. C. 1056).

753 AL-HAYTHAM IBN 'ADĪ

Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Haytham Ibn 'Abī Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Zayd Ibn Usayyid Ibn Jābir Ibn 'Adī Ibn Khālīd Ibn Khuthaym* Ibn Abī Hārithah Ibn Juday Ibn Tadūl† Ibn Buḥtur Ibn Atūd Ibn 'Unayn Ibn Salāmān Ibn Thu'al Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ghawth Ibn Julhumah, was surnamed al-Ṭā'i after his ancestor Julhumah, who was denominated al-Ṭai after his ancestor Julhumah, who bore also the name of Ṭay. His other surnames were al-Thu'ali‡ (descended from Thu'al), al-Buḥturī (descended from Buḥtur) and al-Kūfī (native of Kūfah). He was a

1 See No. 507 n, where the name of this chief is incorrectly transcribed: for Mughayrah read Mughīrah.

2 Ibn Khāldūn gives another account of this in his Prolegomena, vol. I, page 462 of the French translation.

* 'Khaytham' in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

† 'Thadūl' in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

‡ 'al-Tha'alibi' in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd which appears to be wrong.—Ed.

relator of poems (composed by the Arabs of the desert) and of historical anecdotes (concerning them). The specimens, which he handed down, of the language spoken by these Arabs, of their scientific knowledge, of their poetry and of their idioms, are very numerous. His father had settled at Wāsiṭ and was a virtuous man. Al-Haytham (Ibn 'Adī), having undertaken to investigate the origin of (noted) people, discovered and published many things to their disadvantage which, till then, had been carefully concealed, and, by this, he incurred their reprobation. It is related that he mentioned something (disgraceful) of al-'Abbās, the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib (and the ancestor of the 'Abbāsīd khalīfs); and the consequence was that he was imprisoned for some years. It is stated, however, that he had been falsely accused and that words were attributed to him which he never uttered; some time before, he had got married and, as the family of his wife did not like him, they purposely altered what he had said (of al-'Abbās) and then declared him to be the author of (the calumny which they had invented). We may here observe that) he held the opinions of the Khārījites. A number of works were composed by him<sup>1</sup>, such as the Kitāb al-Maṭhālīb (book of vituperative pieces), the Kitāb al-Mu'annimarīn (on those who lived to an advanced age), the Buyūtāt Quraysh (on the principal families of the Quraysh tribe), the Buyūtāt al-'Arab (on the principal families of the Arabs), the Kitāb hubūṭ Ādam etc. (on the fall of Adam, the dispersion of the Arabs and the places, where they settled), a work on the settlements made by the Arabs in Khurāsān and Sawād<sup>2</sup>, a treatise on the genealogy of the tribe of Ṭay, the Madiḥ ahl al-Shām (eulogies composed on the

1 In the Arabic text the term employed is kutub muṣannafah. In the Introduction to the first volume of this translation, and in a note of No. 509, I offered conjectural explanations of this term. I am not inclined to think that it means works in which the diverse matters are classed and arranged under separate heads, each chapter being appropriated to a particular subject. Al-Jawharī says, in his dictionary, that the verb ṣannaf signifies to dispose a thing in classes.

2 The term sawād signifies darkness, verdure, a crowd, and was employed to designate the territory in which Baṣrah and Kūfah were situated. It thus included the ancient Chaldaea and Babylonia. See No. 485.

Arabs established in Syria), a history of the Persians ('Ajam) and the Umayyads, a work treating of the enfranchised slaves who married into Arabian families' the Kitāb al-Wuḥūd (on the deputations sent by the Arabic tribes to Muḥammad), the Kitāb Khīṭaṭ al-Kūfah (description of the territorial allotments made to the first settlers in Kūfah), the Kitāb Wulāt al-Kufah (on the governors of Kūfah), the greater history of the Sharifs, the lesser history of the Sharifs, a classified list (ṭabaqāt) of Jurisconsults and Traditionists, the Kunā al-Ashrāf (on the surnames borne by the Sharifs), the Khawāṭim al-Khulafā (on the signet-rings used by the khalifs), a work on the qāḍīs of Kūfah and Baṣrah, the Mawāsim (periodical meeting-places), a work on the khalifs*, the Kitāb al-Nawādir (curious anecdotes), a book of annals, a history al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Ali, and observations on his death, a history of the Persians (Fāros), a work treating of the officers who commanded the police guards in the service of the Amirs of 'Irāq. He left also some other treatises. As he had the honour of being admitted into the society<sup>1</sup> of (the Khalifs) al-Manṣūr, al-Mahdī, al-Hādī and al-Rashīd, he transmitted down a number of their sayings : "Al-Mahdī" said he, "addressed me (one evening) in these terms : 'Attention, Haytham ! numerous anecdotes are told of the Arabs who dwell in the desert ; some speak of their avarice and meanness, others of their generosity and beneficence, and these accounts all disagree. What do you know on the subject ?' I replied : 'You have fallen on the knowing one ! I once left my family, with the intention of visiting some of my kindred, and took with me a female camel on which I rode. And behold ! she went off and ran away<sup>2</sup>. I followed her till the evening set in, and then I caught her. On looking round, I saw a Beduin tent and went to it. The mistress of it called to me and said : 'Who are you ?' I answered : 'A guest,' She replied : 'What has a guest to do with us ? The desert is surely wide enough.'<sup>3</sup> She then stood up to take some wheat and, having ground it, she kneaded the

<sup>1</sup> Literally : to the sittings.

<sup>2</sup> In this narration al-Haytham imitates the idiom spoken by the nomadic Arabs.

<sup>3</sup> This seems to mean : you may easily find another halting-places.

* al-Khawārij in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

flour, made it into bread and sat down to eat. Very soon after, her husband arrived with milk and saluted (us). He then said: 'Who is this man?' She answered: 'A guest;' and he said to me: 'God grant you a long life!' Speaking then to her, he said; 'Tell me, such a one! did you give your guest anything to eat?' She answered: 'Yes.' He entered into the tent, filled a wooden bowl with milk, brought it out to me and said: 'Drink.' It was the sweetest draught I ever drank. 'I do not see you eating?' said he; 'did she give you anything?' I answered: 'No, by Allāh!' He went in to her, full of anger, and said: 'Woe be to you! you eat and left your guest (without food)!' 'What could I do for him?' said she; 'ought I to give him my own supper to eat'. He had then a discussion with her and ended by giving her a violent stroke on the head, after which, he took a leather provision bag, went to my camel and cut its throat. 'God forgive you!' I exclaimed: 'What are you doing?' He replied: 'By Allāh! my guest must not pass the night hungry.' He then gathered some sticks, lighted a fire and began to cook bits of meat arranged on skewers. He then ate with me, and threw (some morsels)<sup>1</sup> over to her saying: 'Eat, and may God never give you food!! At day-break, he left me and went away; so, I remained sitting and troubled in mind. When the day was advanced, he returned with a female camel whose beauty the eye would never tire in admiring, and said: 'Take this in place of yours.' He then gave me provisions out of the flesh which remained and of the store which he had in his dwelling. I set out and the night brought me to another tent. I saluted, and the mistress of the tent answered my salutation and said: 'what man are you?' I answered: 'A guest.' 'Welcome!' said she, 'God grant you long life and preserve you!' I dismounted; she took wheat, ground it, kneaded the flour and made it into a cake on which she poured cream and milk. She then placed it before me, saying: 'Eat, and excuse (this modest repast). Soon after, a surly-looking Beduin Arab came in and saluted. She rendered the salutation. 'What man are you?' said he. I answered:

---

<sup>1</sup> The civilised Arabs, those who inhabited towns, handed the meat to their guests; those of the desert threw it to them. See a remarkable instance in Imra al-Qays's Mu'alluqah, 10th verse.

'A guest !' He replied : 'What has a guest to do here? He then went in to his family and asked for his supper. She answered : 'I gave it to the guest ' 'How dare you give my supper to a guest?' said he. Many words passed between them, till, at length, he raised his stick and struck her on the head so as to wound her. I began to laugh, on which he came out of the tent and asked me why I did so. I replied : 'All right ! (do not mind)'. He insisted on knowing and I related to him what had passed between the woman and the man with whom I had stopped the night before. He drew near me and said : 'This woman here is the sister of that man and the woman who lives with him is my sister ! I passed the night wondering (at these things) and then went away." Here is an anecdote somewhat similar : "A man, in former times, was eating (his dinner outside the door of his house) and had before him a roast fowl. A beggar went up to him, but was sent away disappointed. Now this man was rich. He afterwards divorced his wife, lost his fortune, and the wife got another husband. The second husband was one day at dinner, with a roast fowl before him, when a beggar came up. He said to his wife : 'Give him the fowl.' She did so and, on looking at the stranger, she recognised in him her former husband. She went to her second husband and told him the circumstance, on which he said : 'And I, by Allāh ! was that very beggar whom he sent away disappointed. So his prosperity was turned over to me, by reason of his ingratitude towards God.'" The following anecdote was related by al-Huytham : "'Amr al-Zubaydī the son of Ma'dī Karīb<sup>1</sup>, had a sword called al-Ṣamsāmah ; and it came into the possession of (the khalif) Mū'ā al-Hādī, the son of al-Mahdī. 'Amr had given it to Sa'īd Ibn al-Āṣ the Umayyad, from whom it passed to his descendants, on the death of al-Mahdī (who afterwards got it), it was purchased by al-Hādī, who paid a large sum for it to the heirs. Al-Hādī was the most liberal of the 'Abbāsīd princes and the most beneficent. He drew the sword from the scabbard, laid it before him and gave orders to admit the poets. When they entered, he had a measure brought in, containing a badrah,<sup>1</sup> and told them to extemporize verses on that sword. Bin Yamin (Bengamin) al-Baṣrī<sup>2</sup>, immediately hastened to recite lines :

1 For the history of this 'Amr, see the third volume of M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'Histoire des Arabes.

"Of all men, Mūsā al-Amin is he who possesses the Ṣamṣāmah of the Zubaydite, the sword of 'Amr which, as we have heard, is the best, that a scabbard ever sheathed. Dark in colour, it encloses within its sides, a hemlock (dhubāḥ) chillness, and, with it, death cares not what she does. The thunderbolt lighted a fire over it and the smiths mingled position with its metal. When bared, it outshines the sun, so that he is scarcely visible. He that draws it for striking need not mind whether his left hand wield it or his right. It dazzles the sight and, like a firebrand (whirled round), the eye cannot fix on it. The lustre and the temper which pervade its sides are of the purest water. It is an excellent glaive to strike with (yu'sā) for him who, in the tumult of battle, fights to maintain his honour ; it is an excellent companion."

Al-Hādī exclaimed (on hearing these verses) : "By Allāh ! you have hit on my very thoughts," and, excited by joy, he ordered the sword and the measure of money to be given to the author. Bin Yamin, on withdrawing, said to the other poets : "Your hopes have been frustrated on my account ; so, here ! take the measure ; the sword is enough for me." Al-Hādī then repurchased it for a large sum. Al-Mas'ūdī states, in his Murūj al-Dhahab, that he bought it from the poet for fifty thousand (dirhams)<sup>3</sup>. The same author gives only a part of these verses. The word dhubāḥ is the name of a poisonous plant which is often mentioned in poems. Yu'sa (percutitur) derives from the verb which is pronounced 'aṣiya in the preterit and ya'si in the aorist ; it must not be confounded with the verb aṣā, ya'sā, which means to commit a sin. Al-Mas'ūdī has inserted the following relation in that chapter of the Murūj al-Dhahāb which treats of the reign of Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-

1 A badrah was ten thousand dirhams ; about two hundred pounds sterling. Some say that any sum, from one thousand dirhams to ten thousand formed a badrah.

2 I can find no information respecting this poet who, to judge from his name, was a Jew and a native of Baṣrah.

3 About one thousand pounds sterling.

Mālik : "Al-Haytham Ibn 'Adī states that 'Umar<sup>1</sup> Ibn Hānī related to him as follows: 'I went forth with 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī, the uncle of (the 'Abbāsīd khalifs) al-Saffāh and al-Manṣūr. When we came to the tomb of (the Umayyad khalif) Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, we dug out the body. It was in good preservation and nothing was missing but the cartilage of the nose. 'Abd Allāh gave it eighty strokes of a whip and then had it burnt. We then went to the territory of Dābiq (near Aleppo) and opened the grave of Sulaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. There we found nothing more than the back-bone, the skull and the ribs. These we burned, and did the same with the other bodies of the Umayyads who were interred at Qinnisrīn. We then went to Damascus and opened the grave of al-Walīd Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, but found in it no remains, either great or small. We dug open the grave of 'Abd al-Malik and found only some bones of the skull. Having then opened the grave of Yazīd Ibn Mu'āwiyāh, we found in it only one bone and remarked, in the place where the body had been deposited, a dark line of a matter like ashes which extended from one end of the cavity to the other. We then visited successively the other Umayyad tombs situated in different countries and burned whatever remains we found in them." The motive which induced 'Abd Allāh to treat thus the bodies of the Umayyads was this : Zayd, the son of 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn (No. 397) and the grandson of al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭālib, the same Zayd of whom we have spoken in the life of the Wazīr Ibn Baqīyah (No. 672), took up arms against Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik and aspired to the khalifate. A number of sharifs and Qur'ān-readers followed his standard. He was attacked by Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafī, a chief whose life we shall give, and his partisans were put to rout. He remained (on the field of battle) with a few friends and, whilst fighting with the utmost bravery, he recited the following lines, as applicable to his own case :

"It's vile to live and hard to die ; a bitter draught each of them is for me. But, since I must submit to one or to the other, I shall honourably march towards my death".

---

1 The edition of Būlāq reads Mu'ammār.

The night separated the two armies and Zayd returned (to his tent) covered with wounds. An arrow had stuck him on the forehead, and a barber-surgeon, who was brought from a (neighbouring) town to extract the iron point, drew it out without knowing who the wounded man was ; for this he concealed from him. Zayd expired immediately after and was buried by his partisans in the bed of a running stream. They covered his grave with earth and weeds, and let the water (resume its course and) flow over it. The barber was present at the interment and, wishing to gain the favour of Yūsuf, he went, the next morning, and informed him of the place where the grave was. Yūsuf had the body taken out, and sent the head to Hishām who, in return, wrote to him the order to strip the body naked and fasten it to a cross. This was done. A poet in the service of the Umayyads composed a verse on this occasion and, in it he said, addressing the descendants of Abū Ṭālib :

“We have crucified that Zayd of yours on the trunk of a date-tree ; and I never yet saw a man who was well-guided attached to the trunk of a tree”.

The lower part of this cross was then encased in masonry<sup>1</sup>. At a later period, Hishām wrote to Yūsuf, ordering him to burn the body and scatter the ashes to the winds. This took place in the year 121 (A. C. 739) or 122. According to Abū Bakr Ibn ‘Ayyāsh (No. 237) and a number of the persons who related historical anecdotes, Zayd's naked body remained on the cross for five years, and no one, during that period, ever saw the privy parts of it ; God, in His favour to Zayd, having veiled them from sight. It was in the Kunāsah<sup>2</sup> of Kūfah that the body was crucified. When Yaḥyā, the son of Zayd, made his appearance in Khurāsān, this event was well-known<sup>3</sup>; al-Walid Ibn Yazid, who was then reigning, wrote to the governor of Kūfah the order to burn the body of 1 The text has : and he built a column underneath the wood, or beam.

2 The word kunāsah signifies a place where the dirt and sweepings of a town are deposited.

3 See Price's Retrospect of Mahommedan history. vol. I, pages 570-572.

Zayd with the wood to which it was attached. This he did and then scattered the ashes to the wind, on the back of the Euphrates, God best knows which is the true account. It was to avenge his cousins that 'Abd Allāh treated the Umayyads in the same manner as they had treated the descendants of 'Alī. The following anecdote was related by al-Haytham : 'I was appointed to collect the cattle-tax due by the Banū Fazārah, and a man of that tribe came to me and said : 'Shall I shew you something extraordinary?' I answered : 'Yes', and he led me to a high mountain in which there was an opening. He bid me enter, but I replied that the guide should always go first. He went in, I followed and a number of people came after us. The (passage in the) mountain sometimes got narrow and sometimes widened, till we at length saw a light. We went up to it, and behold a crevice stretched across the ground and javelins were sticking in the sides of the cavern<sup>1</sup>. We drew them out and found them to be the arrows made use of by (an extinct giant race, that of) 'Ād. On the rock was engraved an inscription, the letters of which were of two fingers' length, or perhaps more. The writing was Arabic, and the inscription ran thus :

"Small we ever return<sup>2</sup> to the dwellings at the foot of Dīu 'l-Liwā, the Liwā of the sands, and thus be assured that our hearts spoke us true. That country was ours and we loved it ; for men are men, and a home is always a home".

It is related that Abū Nuwās Ibn Hānī, the poet of whom we have spoken (No. 162), went to one of the (literary) sittings which al-Haytham had begun to hold. The latter, not recognizing him, did not invite him to approach nor offer him a nearer place. So, the other rose up in a passion (and went away). Al-Haytham asked who he was and, having heard his name, he exclaimed : "God preserve me ! this is a calamity which I did not mean to draw upon myself. Rise up and let us go after him, that we may offer him our excuses". On reaching the poet's door, he knocked and mentioned who he was. Being told by the other to enter, he went in and found him sitting (on the floor), and straining nabidh<sup>1</sup> The house itself was arranged in a manner befitting a (debauchee) like him. Al-Haytham then said : "The granting of pardon belongs to God and afterwards to you. By Allāh ! I did not recognize you ; but the fault was yours, because you neglected mentioning your name. You thus prevented us from showing you fitting respect and treating you with due regard". Seeing that Abū Nuwās appeared to accept his excuses, he added : "I beg of you to spare me (and suppress) whatever verses you may have just composed on me". The poet replied : "There is no means of recalling the past, but you have the assurance (that) for the future (I shall not attack you) ! On this al-Haytham said : "Tell me what is the past, and my life shall be the ransom of yours"! He answered : "It is a verse which I uttered during the state (of irritation) in which you may perceive me still to be". Al-Haytham requested him to repeat it and, on his refusal, he insisted so much that he obtained his wish. The poet recited as follows :

---

1 Literally : In the mountain.

2 Literally : Shall there ever be a return.

"Haytham, the son of 'Adī : you are not of the Arabian stock and it is only indirectly<sup>2</sup> that you belong to the tribe of Tay. When you make (of your father) 'Adī a descendant of Thū'al, place the d of his name before the 'ayn, in tracing up his genealogy<sup>3</sup>".

Al-Haytham rose up and left him, but some time after, the remaining verses of the piece came to his knowledge. Here they are :

"Haytham, the son of 'Adī, is so changeable in mind that every day, he sets his foot in the stirrup. He is always saddling and unsaddling (his camel) for a journey to visit a (rich) enfranchised slave or an Arab. He has a tongue excited (to elequence) by his natural genius<sup>4</sup> ; one would think he had always travelled (like an Arab of the desert) upon a camel's pillion. I should like to see him set up on the bridge and mounted on a steed (a cross)

1 See No. 129n.

2 The Arabic words are على شغب, which I render by conjecture.

3 The word da'i signifies : counterfeit, bastard.

4 Here, and in some other passages of the same piece, I translate by conjecture.

nearly as worthless as himself. O that I saw him covering that steed with a raiment of blood, to replace the filaments and leaves (which covered it before). God help thee! (simpleton!) you need not be so proud of your parentage; (to support your pretensions) you borrowed a genealogy from books."

On this, al-Haytham returned to Abū Nuwās and said: "Good God! did you not give me the assurance and the promise that you would not satirize me?" The other answered (in these words of the Qur'ān, sūrah xxvi, verse 226). "They (the poets) say that which they do not". The anecdotes concerning al-Haytham are very numerous, but we have already given sufficient details. He was born before the year 130 (A.C. 747), and he died on the 1st of Muḥarram, 206 (6th June, A.C. 821), or 207, according to another statement. Ibn Qutaybah's Ma'ārif places his death in the year 209. He left posterity at Baghdād. Al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) says, in his (Ansāb), under the word al-Buḥturī, that he died A.H. 209 at Fam al-Ṣilḥ, aged Ninety-three years. Another author adds that he died at the house of al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl (No. 169). We have already mentioned, in the life of Būrān (No. 117), that her marriage with al-Māmūn took place at Fam al-Ṣilḥ, in that year. From this it appears that al-Haytham was one of the company which he had with him. We have already spoken of Ṭay (No. 143) and (shall speak) of Buḥturī. Ṭhu'ali means descended from Ṭhu'al the son of 'Amr, the son of al-Ghawṭh the son of Ṭay. The rest of the genealogy will be found in our article on al-Buḥturī, under the letter W. A number of families descended from Ṭay bore the surname of Ṭhu'all; such were the Buḥturī, the Salāmān and others. To the tribe of Ṭhu'al belonged 'Amr Ibn al-Masiḥ* al-Ṭhu'ali (the chief) who accompanied one of the deputations sent by the Arab tribes to the Prophet. He became a Muslim at Madinah, being then one hundred and fifty years of age. He was the best archer of all the Arabs. It is to him that the poet Imra al-Qays Hunduj al-Kindi, the son of Hujr, alludes in this verse:

"Sometimes an archer of the tribe of Ṭhu'al, thrusting out his hands from his hiding place!."

1 See my Diwan d' Amrollkai, page 56.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives 'al-Musabbih' and remarks in a footnote that al-Masih is a distorted reading.—Ed.

This is one of the arguments adduced by Ibn Qutaybah, in his Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā, to prove that Imra al-Qays lived about forty years before the Prophet ; for such is the conclusion announced by that author.

754 WĀṢIL IBN 'AṬĀ

Abū Ḥudhayfah Wāṣil Ibn 'Atā, the Mu'tazilite, known also by the name of al-Ḡhazzāl, was a mawlā to the tribe of Ḍubbah or, by another statement, to the tribe of Makhzūm. He was one of those great masters of the Arabic language<sup>1</sup> who discoursed on scholastic theology (kalām) and other sciences. He lisped in pronouncing the letter r (ra') and thus made of it a gh (ghayn). Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad (No. 610) mentions him in the Kāmil and speaks of him in these terms : "Wāṣil Ibn 'Aṭā was really a wonderful man. He had a horrid lisp in pronouncing the letter r and, for that reason he never, in speaking, made use of words wherein it occurred. No one perceived the (difficulty he had to surmount), such was his mastery over the language and the fluency of his pronunciation." Alluding to this, a Mu'tazilite poet named Abu 'l-Ṭurāq al-Ḍabbī, said in praise of the talent with which Wāṣil made speeches without employing the r, a letter which presents itself very frequently in discourse and which was (for him) as if it did not exist :

"Skilled ('alīm) in replacing one letter by another, and surpassing every preacher, whose vain (doctrines) were (thus) overcome by the truth."<sup>2</sup> And another poet said, on the same subject :

"When speaking of wheat (burr) he employs (the word) gamḥ, and, in his enmity to the r, he manages adroitly to express in other letters the words) shi'ar (poetry). He never says maṣār

1 Literally : He was one of the eloquent imāms.

2 The meaning of the last hemistich may perhaps have escaped the translator.

(rain), even in the haste of speech, but comes out with (the word) ghaylī ; so greatly he fears the rain (maṭar)”.

It is related that he said, in speaking of Bashshār Ibn Burd (No. 110): “Is there no one who will kill that blind fellow sur-named Abū Mu‘ādh ? By Allāh ! if treachery were not a characteristic of the Shi‘ites, I should send a person to cut open his belly whilst he is on his couch. Then he would (no longer) be a Sadūsīde or an ‘Uqaylīde.” He said this blind fellow (a’mā) to avoid saying Bashshār and Ḍarīr, instead of Mughiriyah or Mān-ṣūriyah (the names of Shi‘ite sects), he employed the word Ghālīyah (i. e. extravagants, the name of another Shi‘ite sect); being unwilling to say arsalt (which means I should send), he chose the word ba‘athī, and instead of marqad (sleeping-place) or of farāsh (bed), he made use of the word muhja’ (couch) ; to avoid saying yabqar (split open), he employed the term yab‘aj (burst) ; he brought in the ‘Uqaylīdes and the Sadūsīdes because Bashshār was a mawlā to the first mentioned of these tribes and had dwelt for some time with the second. Al-Sam‘ānī (No. 370) states, in his Ansāb, under the title Mu‘tazilī, that Wāṣil Ibn ‘Aṭā used to go and sit with<sup>1</sup> al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (No. 148), but disputes having arisen (concerning the dogmas of the faith), the Khārijites taught that who ever committed a great sin was an infidel (and deserved to be put to death) ; whilst the general opinion of the Muslims was that such a man was a true believer, though guilty of a heinous sin. On this Wāṣil Ibn ‘Aṭā left both parties, declaring that a wicked man of the Muslim community was neither a believer nor an infidel, but held a middle station between the two. This made al-Ḥasan expel him from his school<sup>2</sup>. Wāṣil, having seceded (mu‘tazal) from him, got for a pupil<sup>3</sup> ‘Amr Ibn ‘Ubayd (No. 478) These two and their followers received the nickname of Mu‘tazilītes (seceder). This is the passage to which I referred in my article on ‘Amr Ibn ‘Ubayd, in case the reader wished to know the signification and origin of the term Mu‘tazilīte. In my notice of

1 The expression جلس إلى “to go and sit near” a person, signifies, probably, to attend his lessons.

2 Literally ; from the place where he held his sitting (majlis).

3 Literally : a by-sitter.

Qatādah Ibn Di'amha al-Sadūsi (No. 516), I mentioned that it was he who gave them this name. Wāṣil's skill in avoiding the letter r became proverbial, and poets have often alluded to it in their verses. It is thus that Abū Muḥammad al-Khāzin<sup>1</sup> said, in a high-sounding qaṣīdah composed in praise of the Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād (No. 93) :

Truly, on the day of gifts ('aṭā), he avoids saying the word no, and that with as much care as Ibn 'Aṭā avoids the letter r.

Another poet said of a person whom he loved and who lisped :

"Lisp (to me) that r again ; (it sounds too sweetly) that, if Wāṣil was present and heard it, he would never again suppress the r."

By another :

"Do you treat my love as you treat the letter r, which you (avoid and) never utter ; you have rejected me as if you were Wāṣil."

How admirably said ! how beautiful the expression : you have rejected me as if you were Wāṣil<sup>2</sup> ! Another poet has said :

"Treat me not like the alif of union (ḥamzah wāṣil)<sup>3</sup> ; I should then (like it), be rejected ! treat me not as Wāṣil did the r."

The celebrated Spanish poet, Abū 'Umar Yūsuf Ibn Hārūn al-Kindī al-Ramādī<sup>4</sup>, who died A.H. 403 (A.C. 1013), is the author

1 Abū Muḥammad 'Abū Allāh Ibn Aḥmad, surnamed al-Khāzin (the treasurer, or librarian), was one of the most distinguished poets of Iṣbahān. The Ṣāhib Ibn 'Abbād treated him with great favour, chose him for his librarian and admitted him into his parties of pleasure. After some time, Abū Muḥammad left him in a moment of anger and continued, during a few years, to lead a straggling life in 'Irāq, in Syria and in Hijāz. He afterwards rejoined the Ṣāhib at Jurjān. Al-Tha'ālibī, who furnishes these indications, gives, in his Yatimah several pieces of verse composed by al-Khāzin ; but does not indicate the year of his death, which probably occurred before the beginning of the fifth century of the hijrah (A. C. 1010).

2 Our author admires this hemistich because it bears another meaning, namely : as if you meant to take me into favour.

3 The letter called the alif of union is elided in the pronunciation.

4 No. 821 contains an article on the poet al-Ramādī. He entered into a conspiracy against the wazīr Abū 'Āmir al-Manḡūr, who was then all-powerful in Cordova. For his adventures, see M. Dozy's Historie des Musulmans d'Espagne, tome III, p. 172 et seq.

of the following lines, in which however, he makes no allusion to Wāṣil :

"Neither the r nor I can hope to obtain your favour ; being rejected (by you,) the same misfortune unites us before and (in that) we are equal. When I was alone, I wrote it on the palm of my hand and remained sighing, both I and it!"

This is a subject so vast that we cannot go on with it any farther ; and the examples which we have given are quite sufficient. A great number of verses have been composed by poets on the defect of pronunciation by which the letter s is converted into th (or ts). Here, for instance, is a piece attributed to Abū Nuwās (No. 162) ; though it is not to be found in his collected poetical works. It may probably have been transmitted down orally by 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah al-Iṣbahānī<sup>2</sup> who knew by heart and taught to others a great number of poems. The verses are remarkable for their elegance and sweetness :

"I asked that tender fawn (maiden) what was her name, and she answered : 'Mirdās.* When the night came on, she handed me a cup of wine and said : '(Fear not !) the people are asleep. See how beautiful the garlands which crown us ! the jasmine and the myrtle contribute to adorn them.' On hearing her lisp, I also became a lisper and said 'Where is the pitcher and the wine-cup.'<sup>3</sup> "

If I undertook to give here every piece of this kind, I should be led very far. There are, however, but few which allude to the lisp of the letter r, and therefore shall insert the following :

1 I do not know what the poet means by this verse which I may, perhaps, have misunderstood.

2 Abu 'l-Faraj 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah of Iṣbahān, composed a work on eminent Persians and published editions of the poetical works left by Abū Tammām, Abū Nuwās and al-Buḥārī. Ḥāji Khalīfah places his death in the year 356 (A.C. 966-7). This was also the year in which took place the death of Abu 'l-Faraj 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn of Iṣbahān, the author of the Kitāb-al-Aghānī, (No. 415). Professor Flügel considers them to be one and the same person.

3 In the text of this piece, every s of the dialogue is replaced by th.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives : 'Abāth.—Ed.

"I swear by the whiteness of my beloved's teeth! by the beauty-spot like point on the kha (خ) which is seen on her cheek when the ringlet is turned aside! that her Mawṣilian lisp has fascinated me. The love it inspires has cast me into a swollen sea (of passion). The cheeks of that fair one who speaks with a foreign accent are shaded by scorpions (ringlets) empowered to sting me alone. When she speaks, the deafest of the deaf hearken to the tuneful lisping of her words. She says to me, when I kiss her shining mouth, for it is she whom I love and who grants me all I wish for,—(she says) when the cup of ebriety is emptied and the tint of the wine displays its fairest colours on her cheeks: 'Go on gently! for the inebriating liquor which you sip from the vine of my lips will only add intoxication to intoxication!.'"

This poet has well expressed the thought. In the last verse are a great number of rs which have been replaced by ghs. Al-Khubzārūzī, a poet of whom we have already spoken (No. 733), composed the following piece on a girl who lisped the r, but he does not indicate this lisp except in the last word of the verse.

"At al-Karkh is a fawn who speaks with a lisp and lisping is a quality which I require (in a mistress). How like is her waist to that of the wasp! it is even as thin as the scorpion (ringlet pendent) on her cheek. Her lips enclose a theriac which heals the sting, when its violence burns my heart. If I say when embracing her: 'May my life be the ransom of thine! Dic mihi; ubi est (mentula)?' she replies 'I do not know.'"<sup>2</sup>

One word has brought on another and diverted us from our subject, namely, the history of Wāṣil Ibn 'Āṭā. His neck was so long that people reproached him for it as fault and Bashshār Ibn Burd composed on it the following verses.

"Why should I be plagued with a ghazzāl (a cottonspinner) whose neck is like that of an ostrich in the desert, whether he stays or goes away? That cameleopard's neck of yours, what do you

1 The last verse, if correctly written, should run thus:

ترفق فشرف الخمر بن كرم ربيقتي 'يز يدك عند الشرب * مكر أعلى سكر

2 She said mā'ad ḡhī instead of mā adri.

* In 'Abd al-Ḥamīd شكر أعلى شكر .

mean with it ? I mind it not. You call those men infidels who declared a certain man (i.e. you) to be so!."

Those two persons had a great dislike for each other and proofs of their mutual jealousy are very numerous ; we have already mentioned what Wāṣil said of Bashshār. Al-Mubarrad informs us, in his Kāmil, that Wāṣil was not a spinner (ghazzāl), but that he received this surname because he frequented the cotton-spinners for the purpose of discovering poor and virtuous females to whom he might distribute alms. He then adds : "Wāṣil had a very long neck, and it is related that 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd said, before making his acquaintance. No good can come of that man as long as he has such a neck." Wāṣil composed a number of works, such as a treatise on the different sects of the Murjiyans<sup>2</sup>, another on the repenting of one's sins, another entitled the Intermediate station, another containing pious discourses in which the letter r was not to be found, another on the Ma'ani or rhetorical figures of the Qur'ān, another consisting of discourses on the unity of God and on justice (free-will) a recital of what passed between him and 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd, a guide to the knowledge of the truth (as Sabīl ilā ma'rifat al-Ḥaqq, a treatise on the Da'wah or doctrines) professed by him), a classified list (ṭabāqāt) of the learned and the ignorant, etc. The anecdotes related of him are very numerous. He was born in Madīnah, A.H. 80 (A.C 699-700), and he died in the year 131 (A.C. 748-9)<sup>3</sup>.

755 WATHĪMAH IBN MŪSĀ

Abū Yazid Wathīmah, the son of Mūsā, the son of al-Furāt, bore the surnames of al-Washshā, al-Fārisī al-Fasawī (the silk-mercer, native of the town of Fasā in Persia). Having proceeded 1 This is an allusion to the doctrine professed by Wāṣil and already indicated by our author.

2 See Sale's preliminary discourse to his translation of the Qur'ān, section VIII.

3 The edition of Bulāq and one of my Manuscripts offer the date 181 as that of Wāṣil's death. It does not appear to be acceptable ; that given in the other manuscripts and in the Nujūm is probably the true one, and, as such, is adopted here.

from his native place to Baṣrah, he went from that to Egypt, whence he travelled as a merchant to Spain. He dealt in silk brocades. In a work composed by him on the history of the great apostasy (riddah), he mentions the (Arabian) tribes which apostatized on the death of the Prophet, and gives an account of the expeditions sent against them by (the Khalif) Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddiq. He relates also the manner in which the war was carried on, and gives an account of what passed between these insurgents and the Musulmāns. He mentions in it also the tribes which returned to the true faith, the attacks directed against those who refused to pay the (zakat or tithe on cattle), and relates all that took place between Khālīd Ibn al-Walīd al-Makhzūmī and Mālik Ibn Nuwayrah al-Yarbū'i, on whose death some well-known elegies were composed by his brother Mutammim. In this work he relates the manner in which Mālik was killed, and gives the text of the poems composed by Mutammim and others on that event. It is a good work and contains much useful information. We have already mentioned, in the life of Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Wāqīdī (No. 618), that he also composed a good work on the apostasy. I do not know if Wathīmah wrote any other work than the one I have spoken of; but he acquired a great reputation. Abu 'l-Walīd Ibn al-Faraḍī (No. 326) speaks of him in his (biographical) history of Spain; the ḥāfiẓ Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī (No. 590) mentions him in the Judhwat al-Muqtabis, Abū Sa'īd Ibn Yūnus (No. 334) in his History of Egypt, and Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī (No. 370), in his Ansāb, under the word Washīshā. He there says: "He dealt in washī, which is a stuff made of silk." A number of persons have borne this surname, one of whom was the Wathīmah here mentioned. Wathīmah returned from Spain to Egypt, and died in Old Cairo on Monday, the 10th of the first Jumādā, 237 (9th November, A. C. 851). Abū Sa'īd Ibn Yūnus says, in his History, that Wathīmah left a son whose name was Abū Rifā'ah 'Umārah Ibn Wathīmah, and who taught Traditions on the authority of Abū Ṣāliḥ, al-Layḥ Ibn Sa'd's secretary<sup>1</sup>, on that of his own father and on that of other Traditionists. A history in the form of annals was composed by him. He was born in Old Cairo, and he died on the eve of Thursday, the 23rd of the latter Jumādā, 28 (4th June, A. C. 902). Wathimah means a heap of harbs or of provisions; it signifies also a rock and is employed as a proper name for men. It means also the stone made use of to strike fire. The Arabs say, in one of their oaths: "By him who brought forth the 'adhq' from the jarimah and fire from the wathimah!" 'Adhq' (عذق) means a date-tree, and jarimaha date-kernel. We have spoken of the word Fusawl in the life of Abū 'Alī al-Fārsī (No. 155), and that of Arslan al-Basāsiri (No. 78), so we need not repeat our observations here. Having mentioned the names of Mālik and of his brother Mutammim, I feel obliged to give here a sketch of their history, which is very interesting. Mālik Ibn Nuwayrah was one of those princely-minded, and eminent men who acted as radifs (lieutenants) to kings<sup>1</sup>. Radifs were of two sorts: one rode behind the prince and on the same camel, when they went out to hunt, or to any place of amusement. The office of the second was much more eminent; when the prince held a court of justice, and happened to quit his seat, the radif took his place and judged between the contending parties. This Mālik is the same whose name occurs in the proverbial expression; A pasture-ground, but not like that of al-Sa'dān; a source, but not like that of Šaddā, and a hero, but not like Mālik. He was a gallant cavalier, a poet, a chief devotedly obeyed by his tribe; full of audacity and bravery, so remarkable for his thick head of hair that he was designated by the epithet of Jafūl (hairy-head). When the Arabian tribes sent deputations to the Prophet, he was one of those who went and, having embraced the Muslim religion, he was nominated by the Prophet collector of the alms-tax (sadaqah) payable by his tribe. When the Arabs apostatized, after the death of the Prophet, by their refusing to pay the tax, Mālik did as the others. On the appointment of Abū Bakr to the khalifate, Khālid

<sup>1</sup> Our author (No. 523) declares al-Layḥ Ibn Sa'd to have been an exact and trustworthy Traditionist; but I must say that many of the historical tradi-

---

(Continued from page 149)

tions given on his authority by Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, in his history of the conquest of Egypt, are evidently false.

1 These kings were probably the phylarchs of 'Irāq and of Syria.

Ibn al-Walid marched against the rebels and halted at the place where Mālik was<sup>1</sup>. This chief had already gathered in the tax imposed on his tribe, the Banū Yarbū', and appropriated it to his own use. Khālid spoke to him on the subject and received this answer: "I fulfil the duty of prayer but shall not pay the tax." "Do you not know," said Khālid "that prayer and the payment of this tax go together? one will not be accepted without the other." Mālik answered: "Was it your master who said that?" Khālid replied: "Do you not consider him to be your master also? by Allāh! I have a great mind to strike off your head." Then, after long altercation, Khālid said: I shall take your life." "Is that also the order which your master gave you?" said Mālik. "Do you say that after what you have already said?" exclaimed Khālid; "by Allāh! I shall take your life!" 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar (No. 243n.), and Abū Qatādah the Anṣār<sup>2</sup> were present at this scene and remonstrated with Khālid but he would not hearken to them. Mālik then said: "O Khālid! send us to Abū Bakr and let him judge between us; you have already done so for others who were more culpable than we." Khālid answered: May God never forgive me my sins, if I do not kill you!" He then ordered Ḍirār Ibn al-Azwar al-Asadī to strike off his head. On this, Mālik turned towards his wife, Umm Mutamim, and said to Khālid: "There is the person who costs me my life." She was, indeed, extremely beautiful. Khālid replied: "Not at all! It is God who slays you for abandoning Islāmism." Mālik declared that he was a Muslim. "Ḍirār!" said Khālid, "strike off his head". This was done and the head was put in the place of one of the three stones which supported the flesh-pot. Mālik, as we have said, surpassed most men by the abundance of his hair, which was so thick, that the meat was cooked in the pot before the fire had reached the skull. Ibn al-Kalbī (No. 749). states, in his Jamharah, that Mālik was put

---

1 The history of Mālik is given in a much more satisfactory manner by M. Caussin de Perceval in his Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes.

2 Al-Hārith Ibn Rabi' surnamed Abū Qatādah and one of the bravest horsemen in the service of Muḥammad, was a native of Madīnah. He died, A. H. 54 (A. C. 673-4) (Nujūm).

to death on the day of al-Biṭāh<sup>1</sup>. His brother Mutamim escaped and composed elegies on his death. Khālid seized on the wife of Mālik, or by another account he purchased her out of the booty, and married her. It is said that he allowed her to wait till she had thrice her periodical infirmity, and then obtained her consent to marry him. He invited Ibn 'Umar and Abū Qatādah to the wedding, but they refused, and the former said to him: "I shall write to Abū Bakr and relate to him what has passed." Khālid was inflexible and married her. This induced Abū Nuḥayr<sup>2</sup> al-Sa'di to compose the following lines:

"Say to the tribe whom the horsemen trampled under foot: How long this night appears after the death of Mālik! He was treated with iniquity on account of his wife, and Khālid, who committed the crime, was in love with her long before. He executed his purpose without endeavouring to rein in his passion and control it. He thus became a married man, and Mālik, who perished as all things must, was reduced to nothing. Who now remains after him to protect the widows and the orphans? Who is there... now to aid the poor and the destitute? The Tamimides<sup>3</sup>, from the highest to the lowest<sup>4</sup>, have received a fatal stroke in the person of their cavalier, him on whom they fixed their hopes, him with the slender shoulders<sup>5</sup>.

When intelligence of this event reached Abū Bakr and 'Umar, the latter said to the former: "Khālid has committed adultery; order him to be lapidated." Abū Bakr replied: "I cannot allow him to be lapidated; he only interpreted wrong (his orders)." "But," said 'Umar, "he has killed a Muslim." "I cannot put him to death for that," said the other: "he only interpreted wrong (his orders)." "Then deprive him of his commandment," said 'Umar. "No," replied Abū Bakr, "I shall never sheath a sword

1 See M. Caussin's Essai, etc., tome III p. 366.

2 I follow the reading offered by the manuscript 702 and the autograph of the Annals of Abū 'l-Feda.

3 Mālik's tribe, the Yarbū', was a branch of the great tribe of Tamim.

4 Literally: their fat and their lean.

5 The two last words vary in the printed editions and the manuscripts. I read شرح الحوارى.

* 'Zuhayr' in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

which God drew against the wicked." Such is the relation given of this affair in the book composed by Wathimah and in that of al-Waqidi. and let them be answerable for its turth. Mutamim Ibn Nuwayrah, the brother of Mālik, bore the surname of Abū Nahshal, and was celebrated as a poet. He seldom stirred out of his house (or tent), and troubled himself little about his own affairs, becuase he relied on his brother. He was deformed in body and had lost an eye. When he was informed of Mālik's death, he went to the Mosque of the Prophet (at Madinah) and, having taken his place behind Abū Bakr, he said (with him) the morning prayer. When the khalif, who was in the mihrab turned round (to the congregation), Mutammim stood up and, leaning on the extremity of his bow, recited these lines :

"He was truly admirable when the winds howled about the tents, he who was slain by you, Ibn al-Azwar! You invited him in God's name and you betrayed him; had he invited you, under the safeguard of his honour, he would not have betrayed."

(On pronouncing these last words), he pointed to Abū Bakr who exclaimed : "By Allāh ! I never invited him nor ever betrayed him." The poet continued thus :

"Admirable he was, either sheathed in mail or unarmed ! How excellent a retreat was his dwelling for the benighted traveller who perceived the light of his fire ! Under his dress he concealed no turpitude ; he was, in disposition, mild, and in conduct, chaste."

He then wept and, ceasing to lean upon his bow, he sat down and lamented so bitterly that tears flowed from his blind eye. 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb went up to him and said : " I wish you had composed such an elegy as that on the death of my brother Zayd." Mutammim answered : "O Abū Ḥafs ! if I thought that my brother had gone to the place where yours is now, I should not lament his death." On this, 'Umar said : "Never, since I lost Zayd, did any man give me sweeter consolation than Mutammim." Zayd, the son of al-Khaṭṭāb, fell a martyr in the battle of al-Yamāmah<sup>1</sup>. 'Umar used to say : "I enjoy the breath of the zephyr because it blows from the spot where Zayd reposes." It is stated that 'Umar said to Mutammim : " If I could make verses on the death of my brother, they should be like what you made on the death of yours " It is stated that Mutammim had composed an elegy on Zayd, but did not well succeed; so, 'Umar said to him : Why was your elegy on the death of Zayd so different from that which you composed on Mālik ?" The poet answered : "By Allāh ! I was moved to lament Mālik for motives which did not lead me to lament Zayd." 'Umar said to him one day : You are really a man of judgment ; how was your brother, compared with you" ? He replied : My brother would mount a ṭhafāl (slow-paced) camel, in a thundering (aziz) and cloudy (ṣurrād) night leading by the bridle a restive horse (jarūr) and carrying in his hand a heavy spear. On his shoulders was a small cloak (falūt) and, on each side of him, a provision bag (mazādah), and he would ride on till morning with a smile on his face." The word aziz (أزیز) signifies the sound of thunder ; ṣurrād (صُرَاد) means a thin cloud in which there is no water ; ṭhafāl (ثَفَال) is a slow-paced camel, so heavy that it can hardly walk ; jarūr (جُرُور) is a horse which disobeys the rein ; a falūt (فَلُوت) cloak is one which scarcely holds on the person who wears it ; mazadah (مَزَاد) is the water-bag, as is well-known. Another day, 'Umar said to him : "Tell me something concerning your brother ;" and he answered thus : "Commander of the faithful ! I was once taken prisoner by a tribe of Arabs, and my brother, being informed of what had happened, came to them. When they saw him appear, every one stood up, and every woman of the tribe peeped out through the openings of the tents. He had not time to get off his camel when they lead me up to him, cord and all, (literally : with my rummah), and it was he who untied me." There, said 'Umar, "was true nobility ! " A rummah is a worn out cord ; from it is derived the expression : to give a man a thing with its rummah. It originated in a man's giving to another a camel with a halter on its neck, and was then employed to denote the gift of a thing with all belonging to it. Mutammim said, another day, to 'Umar : "A tribe of Arabs attacked the tribe of my brother whilst he was absent. When the alarm reached him, he sallied forth and followed their foot-steps. He had with him a camel which he rode or drove before him alternately, and he overtook them after travelling three (nights). At the moment they thought themselves out of danger, he appeared unexpectedly. When they saw him, they fled away, abandoning their prisoners and booty. My brother overtook them, and they all surrendered, so that he had only to tie their hands behind their backs and lead them to his own country." On this, 'Umar said; "We heard of his beneficence and his bravery, but we knew nothing of what you have just related." One of the elegies composed by him on Mālik is of singular beauty; it rhymes in k and is to be found in that section of the Ḥamāsah<sup>1</sup> which contains the elegiac poems. Here it is:

<sup>1</sup> See M. Caussin's Essai, tome III, p. 371.

"My companion blamed me for weeping over every tomb and shedding floods of tears. 'Why weep you over every tomb you see? Is it for (the recollection) of that tomb which lies between al-Liwā and al-Dakādik?' I answered: 'Sighs beget sighs; so, let me weep! for all these are (for me) as the tomb of Mālik.' "

In a qaṣidah of considerable length and beauty, the rhyme of which is formed by the letter ayn, the same poet says:

"For a long time we were like the two boon companions of Jadhīmah; so that it was said of us 'They will never be separated!' We led a life of happiness, but before us, death attained the families of Chosroes and of Tubba. When separated, the long time which I passed with Mālik seemed to me as short as a single night."

As the reader of this book may desire some information respecting Jadhīmah and his two boon companions, I shall speak of them here. Jadhīmah, for so his name must be pronounced, belonged to the family of al-Azd, and bore the surname of Abū Mālik. He was the son of Mālik, the son of Fahm, the son of Daws, the son of al-Azd. Ḥirah and the neighbouring country acknowledged his authority. People called him the speckled (al-Abrash) or the spotted with white (al-Waḍḍāh) because he was a leper. The Arabs abstained from giving him the surname of the leper, through fear of offending him, and therefore designated him by one or the other of the former terms. He was one of the provincial kings, and lived about thirty years after Jesus<sup>1</sup>. So great was his pride that he would have no other boon companions than the two stars called al-Farqadān<sup>2</sup>. His sister had a son named 'Amr, the son of 'Adī the Lakhmide, who was the son of Naṣr, the son of Rabi'ah, the son of al-Ḥārith, the son of Mālīk, the son of 'Adī, surnamed 'Amam, because he was the first who wore a turban (imāmah), the son of Numārah, the son of Lakhm. The rest of the genealogy is well known<sup>3</sup>. The name of Jadhīmah's sister was Riqāsh. Her son, for whom Jadhīmah had a great affection, was spirited away by the genii, and his uncle searched for him a long time without finding him. There were two brothers of the tribe of al-Qayn, one of whom was named Mālīk and the other 'Aqīl. Their father's name was Fāriḥ* the son of Mālīk, the son of Ka'b, the son of al-Qayn, whose true name was al-Nu'mān, the son of Jasr, the son of Shay Allāh. These two found 'Amr in the desert, with his hair dishevelled, his nails grown to a great length and his appearance miserable. They knew him and brought him to his uncle, after arranging his hair and attiring him decently. Jadhīmah was so overjoyed at seeing him that he told them to ask whatever reward they pleased, and they said: "Let us be your boon companions as long as you and we live." He answered: That I grant to you." These were the two boon companions whose reputation became proverbial. It is said that they were Jadhīmah's constant guests during forty years and that they never, in all that period, repeated to him a story which 1 According to M. Caussin de Perceval, this prince lived in the third century of our era (Essai, tome II, p. 16).

<sup>1</sup> See Freytags Ḥamāsah, page 370.

2 The Farqadān are the stars B and Y of Ursa minor. We read in the Essai of M. Caussin de Perceval: "Il avoit chait choisi pourses convives deux etoiles appelees El-Farqadani; et, chaque fois qu'il prenait la coupe, on en remplissait en meme temps deux autres, dont il faisait des libation a ces etoiles." (Tome II, p. 18).

3 It is given by M. Caussin in his Essai.

* 'Fārij' in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

they had already told him. It is to them that Abū Khiraṣh the Hudhaylite<sup>1</sup> alludes in these verses, taken from an elegy composed by him on his brother 'Urwah :

"(The calumniator) says : 'I see that he disports himself since the death of 'Urwah ; and that, as you must know, is highly detrimental (to himself) ; (I answered) : 'Think not that I have ceased to remember the days I passed with him ; know, Umaymah ; that I support (my sorrow) with becoming patience. Hast thou heard that, before our time, two sincere boon companions were separated, Mālik and 'Aqīl ?'

This summary account of their history is rather long, and yet I aimed at being concise. Abū 'Alī a'-Qālī (No. 92) says, in the treatise which he designed as supplement to his Amālī, that Mutammim went up to 'Umar, who admired him greatly, and that 'Umar said : "Tell me, Mutammim ! what hinders you from marrying ? God may perhaps raise children from that alliance, for you belong to a family which is on the point of becoming extinct." The poet, in consequence, married a woman of Madinah, but he was not happy with her, nor she with him, so he divorced her and then said :

"I say to Hind, when displeased with her discernment<sup>2</sup> : Does your conduct proceed from the coquetry of love, or do you hate me ? Do you wish for a separation ? and certainly, to separate from any (whom I love) is now, for me, but slightly painful, since Mālik has departed (from the world)."

'Umar said to him : "You will never cease thinking of Mālik !" and, soon after, he received his mortal wound. Mutammim, who was then in Madinah, composed an elegy on his death. In a word, it has never been handed down that an Arab or any other person ever wept for the loss of a friend as much as Mutammim did for that of his brother. Al-Wāqidi relates, in his Kitāb al-Riddah, that 'Umar Ibn al-Khattāb said to Mutammim : "To what degree did you carry your grief for Mālik ?" and that the poet

1 The Hudhaylite poet Khuwaylid Ibn Murrah, surnamed Abū Khiraṣh, died in the khilafat of 'Umar. Some verses of his are given in the Ḥamāsah.

2 Literally : with her intelligence.

answered: "I wept during a year, without ever enjoying a moment's sleep from evening to morning; and I never saw a fire (of hospitality) lighted during the night without thinking to myself that I ought to go out to it, so that I might recall to my recollection the fires lighted by my brother. Mālik ordered a fire to be always kept burning till morning lest travellers might pass the night in his neighbourhood (without discovering his tent), and so that, when they saw the fire, they might draw near to it. Certainly, in his eagerness to have guests he felt more joy than other people do when one of their friends returns to them from a distant land." On hearing this, 'Umar observed that such conduct was highly honourable. The same author relates that Mutammim, being asked what effect grief and the shedding of tears had produced on him, answered in these terms. "This eye," pointing to his blind one, "was already gone, and I wept with the good one so abundantly that the lost eye came to its assistance and shed tears." "Such sorrow," said 'Umar, "is really excessive; no one should grieve like that for the death of a relative." The poets make frequent allusions to Mālik and his brother Mutammim. Ibn Ḥayyūs, (No. 647) said, in one of his qaṣīdahs:

"It was a manifest calamity, like the death of Mālik; and it would be disgraceful for me not to be a Mutammim."

Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Isā al-Dānī, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Labbānah (No. 660), said in a qaṣīdah containing a lament on the fall of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, the sovereign of Seville, who was arrested (and cast into prison) by Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifin, as we have related in our article on al-Mu'tamid (No. 660).

"On quitting your kingdom, you resemble Mālik, and I, in my affliction, resembled Mutammim."

Another poet, probably the Ibn Munīr of whom I have spoken under the letter A (No. 63), composed a piece containing an allusion of the same kind as that which we are mentioning. I have since verified the name of the author and found it to be Najm al-Dīn Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Yūsuf Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Mujāwir of Damascus. Here is the verse :

“O, my dear Mālik ! thou hast left in my heart a nuwayrah (a little fire) and, through love for thee, the pupil of my eye is become a Mutammim.”

Aḥu 'l-Ḡhanā'im Ibn al-Mu'allim, the poet of whom we have spoken (No. 655), said also, in a piece of verse containing the description of a (deserted) dwelling and praying the rains of heaven to water it :

“The rains watered it before my arrival, and I came to complete their work. Had a Mālik been there, I might have been called a Mutammim (a completer).”

Al-Qāḍi al-Sa'id Ibn Sanā al-Mulk (No. 744) made also a similar allusion in the following verse : I wept with both my eyes, as if I tried to complete the task which Mutammim had left unfinished.

To expose this subject fully would require a long dissertation, and we have already passed all bounds in this digression. Pronounce Mutammim. The word سدا (ṣadā), in the expression : a source but not like Ṣadā, is pronounced in three different manners : Ṣuddā, with a double d and a short final a, Ṣaddā, with the vowel a after ṣ and a long final a ; so that, being pronounced with an u, it takes a short final, and, with an a, a long one. The third form is Ṣadāa, with a single d followed by two hamzahs, one coming immediately after the other. This is the name of a famous well the water of which is sweet and limpid.

756 AL-BUḤTURĪ THE POET

Abū 'Ubādah al-Walīd Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Yalḥyā Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn Shimlāl Ibn Jābir Ibn Salamah Ibn Mushīr Ibn al-Ḥārith Ibn Khuthaym* Ibn Abī Ḥārithah Ibn Juday Ibn Tadūlt† Ibn

* In 'Abd al-Ḥamīd : Juḡham.—Ed.

† In 'Abd al-Ḥamīd : Badūl.—Ed.

Buḥṭur Ibn 'Atūd Ibn 'Unayn Ibn Salāmān Ibn Thu'al Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Ghawṭh Ibn Julhumiah Ṭay Ibn Adud Ibn Zayd Ibn Kahlān Ibn Sabā Ibn Yaḥjub Ibn Ya'rab Ibn Qaḥṭān, was a member of the tribe of Ṭay and bore the surname of al-Buḥṭuri. This celebrated poet was born at Manbij, or, by another account at Zardafnah, a village near that place; there he passed his youth and made his studies. He then went to 'Irāq where he recited poems in praise of several khalifs, beginning by al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allah; he eulogized also in his verses a number of grantees and ra'ises (persons high placed in the civil administration). He remained at Baghdād a long time, and then returned to Syria. In many of his poems he speaks of Aleppo and the open country which surrounds it; for he had taken a great fancy to that city. Some of his poems were transmitted down orally by Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad (No. 610). Muḥammad Ibn Khalaf Ibn al-Marzubān<sup>1</sup>, the qāḍī Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Maḥāmili<sup>2</sup>, Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥakīmī<sup>3</sup>, and Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī (No. 622). Ṣālih Ibn al-Asbagh al-Tanūkhī<sup>4</sup>, a native of Manbij, related as follows: "I saw al-Buḥṭuri here, at our town, before he went to 'Irāq. He would enter by that door of the mosque and pass by us (to the other)", here he pointed to the two sides of the edifice, "and, in going and coming, he would recite verses in praise of dealers in onions and love-apples; yet he afterwards became what we see. The 'Ulwah, whose charms al-Buḥṭuri celebrates in a great number of his pieces, was the daughter of a woman called Zariā* and a native of Aleppo. Abū Bakr a'-Ṣūlī says, in his History of Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'ī (No. 143) that al-Buḥturī related as follows: "The first time I gained distinction as a poet was (on a certain day), when I went to see Abū Tammām, who was then at Hims (or Hums Emessa), and presented to him a poem of my composition. He used to hold sittings, and not a poet but went to visit him and submit their productions to his judgment. On hearing mine, he turned towards me, without noticing the other persons who were present, and, when they retired, he said: 'You are the best poet of all who recited verses to me. In what circumstances are you?' I complained of poverty, on which he wrote to the inhabitants of Ma'arrat al-Nu'mān a letter in which he bore testimony to my talent and recommended me to their generosity. Go' said he and recite verses in their praise.' I went to them and they in consideration of his letter, treated me with great honour and made me a pension of four thousand dirhams<sup>1</sup>. This was the first money I ever earned," Abū 'Uḇādah (al-Buḥturī) related, in the following terms, his first interview with Abū Tammām: "I went to visit Abū Sa'id Muhammad Ibn Yūsuf<sup>2</sup> and spoke his praises in a qaṣīdah, which began thus:

1 This is the Muḥammad Ibn Khalaf (not Khalif) of which our author has already spoken (No. 163). He was a native of al-Muḥawwal, a village situated to the west of Baḥḥād. As a transmitter of oral tradition, he was looked upon as a good authority. According to the author of the Nujūm, he was distinguished for his learning and composed some fine works one of which was entitled Tafḍīl al-Kilāb etc. (the pre-eminence of dogs over many of those who wear clothes fully established). He died A. H. 309 (A. C. 921-2). The manuscripts of Ibn Khalikān's work read سبع (seven) in place of تسع (nine), a very common mistake. The true date is given in the Nujūm.

2 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ismā'il al-Maḥāmili acted as qāḍī at Kūfah during two years, and held the highest rank at Baghdād as a Traditionist and a professor. He died A. H. 303 (A. C. 915-16), at the age of sixty-eight years. (Dhahabī's Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz).

3 Abū 'Abd 'Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥakīmī died A. H. 336 (A. C. 947-8). (Nujūm).

"Was a captivated lover ever delivered from his passion, so that I also may hope for deliverance? Was it by breaking his engagements (that he got free), or by hearkening to the advice of a compassionate friend?"

When I finished, he expressed, his satisfaction and said to me: 'God bless you, my boy!' A man who was in the saloon then said: 'God exalt you (amīr)! these verses are by me, but that

1 About ninety pounds sterling.

2 The amīr Abū Sa'id Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf was the first of the Muslim generals who gained a victory over the troops of the famous Bābak al-Khurramī. Being sent to Ardabil in the year 220 (A. C. 835), by the Khalīf al-Mu'taṣim, the orders to repair all the forts which Bābak had destroyed and to establish fortified posts along the road by which provisions were to be conveyed to the Muslim army, he accomplished his task and routed the insurgents in a sanguinary battle. (Ibn al-Aṭḥīr's Kāmil; Nujūm.)

* Zariqah in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd—Ed.

young man has got them by heart and recited them to you before I had time to do so.' Abū Sa'id looked at me with an altered countenance and said: "My boy! you have in your family and relatives a sufficient title to my favour; so, do not have recourse to such means as these." I replied: 'God exalt you! the verses are mine.' On this, the stranger exclaimed: 'Good God, my boy! do not say such a thing.' He then began to repeat some verses of my qaṣidah. On this, Abū Sa'id turned to me and said: "We shall furnish you with whatever you desire but do not again have recourse to proceedings such as these. I was astounded and left the saloon, not knowing what to say and meaning to ask who that man might be. I had not gone far when Abū Sa'id called me back and said: 'We are merely jesting with you, so take things patiently. Do you know that man?' I replied that I did not. 'It is your cousin,' said he; it is Ḥabīb Ibn Aws al-Ṭā'i Abū Tammām! go up to him.' I went over and embraced him. He turned towards me, praised me highly, and spoke favourably of my verses. 'I was only jesting with you,' said he. From that moment I got attached to him and admired greatly his promptitude in learning passages by heart." Al-Ṣūlī relates also in the same work: Abū Tammām made to the mother of al-Buḥturī a proposal of marriage, to which she consented, saying: "Convoke the people to the ceremony." On this, he answered: "The grandeur of God is such that His name ought not to be mentioned (in an affair which is to pass) between us two. Let us give each other the hand and act with mutual indulgence<sup>1</sup>." Al-Buḥturī, being asked whether he or Abū Tammām was the better poet, replied: "His best pieces surpass the best of mine, and my worst are better than the worst of his." It has been said of al-Buḥturī's poems that they were chains of gold. He held (in reality) the highest rank (as a poet). It is related that Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46), being asked which was the best poet of these three: Abū Tammām, al-Buḥturī and al-Mutanabbī (No. 49), replied that two of them were moralists and that al-Buḥturī was the poet. I must

---

1 This appears to mean that Abū Tammām desired the alliance without going through the legal forms.

declare that Ibn al-Rūmī (No. 438) was not equitable towards him when he said:

"The boy, al-Buḥturī, steals from the son of Aws (Abū Tammām) the praises of the great and of the fair. In each of his verses, the thought is well expressed, but that thought belongs to Ḥabīb, the son of Aws."

Al-Buḥturī related that he recited a poem of his composition to Abū Tammām, and that the latter recited to him (in return) this verse of Aws Ibn Ḥajar<sup>1</sup>:

"When our force is diminished by the death of one of our lions, another appears amongst us, ready to show his teeth<sup>2</sup>."

"There, exclaimed Abū Tammām, 'I have announced to myself that my death is near!' I replied: 'God forbid!' 'Nay,' said he, 'my life will not be long; and another poet like you is now growing up in the tribe of Tay (who will replace you also). Know you not the anecdote told of Khalīd Ibn Ṣafwān al-Minqarī?<sup>3</sup> he heard Shabīb Ibn Shabbah (No. 295n), who was of the same family as he; make a discourse and he said to him: My son! the talent displayed by you in speaking announces to me that my death is near: we belong to a family in which, when an orator is produced, his predecessor soon dies.'" Al-Buḥturī here observed that Abū Tammām died a year after. He related also the following anecdote: "I recited to Abū Tammām a poem which I had composed in honour of one of the Ḥumayd family and by which I gained a large sum of money. When I finished, he exclaimed: 'Very good! you shall be the prince of poets

1 See No. 260 n.

2 This is merely an attempt to express the idea announced in the Arabic verse, which, if literally translated, would run thus: when we lose the sharpness (of our teeth) in (losing) one of our chieftains, the tooth of another chief flourishes up among us.

3 Khalīd, the son of Ṣafwān, and chief of the tribe of Tamim, spoke his language with great elegance. His father was also remarkable for his talent as a fine speaker. An amusing anecdote is related by Ibn Badrūn (Dozy's edition, p. 216) of what passed between him and Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Saffāh, the first 'Abbasid Khalīf. Ibn Quṭaybah mentions him in the Kitāb al-Ma'arīf.

when I am no more.' These words gave me more pleasure than all the wealth which I had collected." Maymūn Ibn Hārūn related as follows: "I met with the historian Abū Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn Jābir Ibn Dawūd al-Balādhūri<sup>1</sup> and he appeared absorbed<sup>2</sup> in thought. I asked him what had occurred, and he said: 'I was one of those persons whom (the khalif) al-Musta'in admitted into his intimate society.' Some poets having come to celebrate his praise, he said: 'I will receive eulogiums from no man, unless he produce a verse like that which al-Buḥturi composed on (the khalif) al-Mutawakkil' and which runs thus:

'If a passionate lover could be forced to do what is beyond his power, the pulpit would certainly hasten forward to salute you.'

'I returned home and, the next time I went to see him, I told him that I had composed some verses which were better than those of al-Buhturi.' 'Let us hear them,' said he; and I recited as follows.

'If the mantle of the Chosen one (Muḥammad) possessed the faculty of thought, it would think that you were its former master; and, when you received it and put it on, it would have said: 'These are his shoulders and his arms!'"

He told me to return to my dwelling and execute the order which I should receive from him. He then sent me seven thousand dinārs<sup>3</sup>, with this message: 'Treasure them up for what may befall you after my death, for, as long as I live, you shall receive from me a pension sufficient for your support.' Al-Mutanabbī expressed, in the following terms, the thought announced by al-Buḥturi:

"If the tree towards which you look had the use of reason, it would stretch its branches towards you, in saluation."

1 See No, 183, note. The Arabic text of al-Balādhūri's celebrated work on the conquests affected by the first Muslims has been published at Leyden by M. Goeje.

2 The meaning of the words "حالته متمازكة", is doubtful.

3 Somewhat more than three thousand five hundred pounds sterling.

Abū Tammām expressed the same idea before them both, when he said :

"If a piece of ground could advance forward to receive the bones of Nu'mā, the soil which is parched up would have moved towards her!"

Al-Buḥturi's verse is taken from a long qaṣīdah<sup>2</sup>, in which author has attained the height of excellence. He praises in it (the khalif) Abu 'l-Faḍl Ja'far al-Mutawakkil 'alā-Allāh and describes his going forth to preside at the public prayer on the day of the Breaking of the fast. It begins thus :

"I conceal within my bosom the love I bear you, and I (sometimes) disclose it ; grieving under your cruelty, I am blamed and then excused."

The verses with which the one above mentioned is connected are the following :

"You fasted in righteousness ; you are the most meritorious of fasters ; and you now break the fast in conformity to the prescriptions of God. Let your eyes be rejoiced by the day of the Fast-breaking ; it is the most brilliant in the year, the most renowned. On it, you showed off the grandeur of the empire in (sending forth) the loud-sounding phalanx which guards the faith and which maintains it. On hearing it approach, we thought that the mountains were in march ; it advanced, that morning, in such numbers as surpassed the most numerous army. The horses veighed, the riders shouted, the swords glanced and the spears glittered. The earth, submissive, trembled under their weight ; the sky was obscured and the horizon shrouded in dust. The sun, in rising, lighted up the day, but his brightness was soon extinguished in a turbid cloud of dust. (So it remained) till your face, appearing in all its splendour, dispelled the darkness and cleared away the dust. The spectators are fascinated by your presence ; towards you are directed every finger and every eye.

1 The word لاَعظَمَ (lla'zām) here rendered by : "To receive the bones," signifies "to exalt" if pronounced ll'zām. I know not which is the right reading.

2 This qaṣīdah is not very long ; it contains only thirty-seven verses.

They feel that your aspect, which they now enjoy, is one of God's blessings for which none should be ungrateful. By your looks you reminded them of the Prophet and, when you appear exalted above your escort, they cry out : "God is the only god ! God is almighty !" (This continued) till you reached the muṣallā,<sup>1</sup> arrayed (as you were) in the robe of true direction, visible to every eye. You advanced as one who is humble and submissive to the will of God, without ostentation and without pride. If a passionate lover could be forced to do what is beyond his power, the pulpit would certainly hasten forward to salute you. Eloquence came to assist you with such wisdom as announced and displayed the evidence of truth. Clothed in the Prophet's mantle, you gave warnings and good tidings (to the congregation)."

This extract is sufficient for our purpose. The poem itself is really a piece of lawful magic and is composed with a facility not to be imitated. What an admirable flow (of language) ! how light the bridle (with which he directs his steeds) ! how beautifully he has moulded his ideas ! how elegant his thoughts ! in the poem there is nothing superfluous ; every part of it is exquisite ! The collection of his poetical works exists<sup>2</sup> and his verses are currently known ; it is therefore needless to insert here many specimens of his poetry. I shall, however, relate some anecdotes concerning him which may be considered as interesting. He had a young slave-girl<sup>3</sup> called Nasīm (zephyr) and sold her to kātib Abu 'l-Faḍl al-Ḥasan Ibn Wahb, the brother of the Sulaymān Ibn Wahb whom I have already given an account of (No. 259). He then regretted deeply what he had done, longed to get her back and composed

1 See No. 263.

2 The copy of al-Buḥārī's Diwān belonging to the Bibliothèque impériale, ancien fonds, no. 1392 was written A. H. 610 (A. C. 1213) and is in excellent preservation. It contains 432 leaves, or 864 pages. The poems are arranged in alphabetical order, according to the letters which form the rhymes. Most of these pieces are eulogiums addressed to khalīfs, wazīrs, amīrs and other great men ; the rest consists in satires ; addresses to friends and ghazals or amatory pieces. The text of this manuscript has not been collated and offers, in consequence, some false readings.

3 The Arabic word is ghulam غلام .

verses in her praise, declaring that he had been deceived and that the sale was effected against his will. Here is one of these pieces :

"O Nasīm ! are the promises of Fortune ever true when she encourages the hopes of a passionate lover ? Why do I miss thee in my dreams ? Why hast thou ceased to console the lover who is scorned by his mistress ? You abstain from coming to visit me through fear of those (who are about you) ; but what can hinder your image from visiting my nocturnal slumbers ? Today, love has passed all bounds in (the treatment of) its victims, and I, as you well know, am a lover. Let al-Ḥasan Ibn Wahb enjoy (his triumph) ; he meets with his beloved and I am separated from mine."

He composed many pieces on the same person. There was at Aleppo a man called Ṭāhir Ibn Muhammad al-Hāshimī, who, on the death of his father, inherited a fortune of about one hundred thousand dinārs<sup>1</sup>. This sum he spent in deeds of charity, bestowing gifts on poets and (needy) visitors. Al-Buḥturī went from 'Irāq to see him and, on arriving at Aleppo he heard that the man was overwhelmed with debts and obliged to stay in his house. This intelligence grieved him excessively and he sent to Ṭāhir, by one of his mawlās, a poem which he had composed in his praise. When Ṭāhir received and read the piece, he shed tears, called in his servant and said : "Sell this house of mine." The other exclaimed : "If you sell your house, you will be reduced to beggary<sup>2</sup>." "Sell it you must !" replied the other. The sale produced three hundred dinārs, one hundred of which Ṭāhir tied up in the corner of a handkerchief and sent to al-Buḥturī with a letter containing these lines :

"If there was a gift adequate to the esteem in which I hold your merit, I would heap upon you silver, pearls and rubies, rare though they were. But the elegant scholar, the man of intelligence, will condescend to pardon a friend who, possessing but little, offers an insufficient gift."

---

1 About fifty thousand pounds sterling.

2 Literally : you will remain (standing) over the heads of the people. That is : you will go up to those who are sitting at their meals and stand before them in expectation of receiving from them a morsel of bread.

When al-Buhturī received this letter, he sent back the money and wrote to the donor the following verses :

"Blessings on you ! you are worthy of being beneficent ! In the race of generosity, you precede and your rival can only follow<sup>1</sup>. A small gift may appear great and a great one small ; that depends on the feeling of him who counts on your generosity. But I return this mark of your bounty, because, if taken from you, it would be money ill acquired, and as such, is unlawful. If you repay verses with verses, the obligation is fulfilled and the dinārs are superfluous."

When the sum was brought back, Tāhir opened the knot of the handkerchief and put in fifty dinārs more, declaring, at the same time, by a solemn oath, that he would not allow al-Buhturī to return them. When the latter received this gift, he recited these lines :

"I give you thanks ; your humble servant feels a real pleasure in being grateful. God increases the store of him who is thankful. In every age there is but one model of perfection, and, in this age, you are certainly the one."

Al-Buhturī often recited with admiration the following lines, composed by a poet whose name I have forgotten :

"Turtle-dove of (the groves of) al-Arāk ! for whom do you will ? for whom do you lament ? By your complaints, you have excited (to sorrow) those hearts of ours and, by your weeping, drawn tears from those eyes. Come ! let us, in our affliction get up a scene of sorrow, and sigh for the absence of our brethren who have journeyed to a distant land. We shall assist you, and you shall aid us ; those that are in sorrow can console the sorrowful."

I have since discovered that the author of these verses was an Arab called Nabhān al-Faq'asī. Al-Buhturī was passing through Moṣul, or according to another statement, through Rās-'Ayn, when he was taken seriously ill. The physician who attended and treated him, prescribed, one day a muzawwarah<sup>1</sup>. The poet having no one with him except a servant boy, told him to prepare it. One of the chief men (ra'ls) of the town used to visit him during his illness and being then present, said: "That boy cannot prepare such a thing well; but I have a cook;" here he enumerated all the good qualities of this cook and extolled his talents to the highest. Al-Buḥturi's boy abstained from preparing the muzawwarah, fully relying on the promise of the ra'ls. The poet remained sitting, in expectation of receiving it, but the ra'ls had so many affairs to occupy his mind, that he quite forgot to have it made. Al-Buḥturi, seeing that it was not forthcoming and that the time had passed in which he should have received it, wrote these lines to the ra'ls.

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally : the concurrent latter, and you before.

"I find that your promise respecting the muzawwarah is a deception (zawr) though you positively declared that you would direct a person to prepare it. May God not cure him who hopes to be cured by it! and may his fortune<sup>2</sup> not be exalted who puts to it his hand! Forbid your messenger to bring it to me, as I have forbidden mine to receive it."

The anecdotes and honourable acts related of him are very numerous; so we need not expatiate on them further. His poems were not arranged in order till Abū Bakr al-Ṣūlī collected them and classed them alphabetically (by their rhymes); 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah<sup>3</sup> collected them also and arranged them according to their subjects, as he did for the poems of Abū Tammām. Al-Buḥturi drew up a Ḥamāsah in imitation of that which was compiled by Abū Tammām. There exists also a work of his on the ideas which usually occur in poetry (Ma'ānī al-Shi'r). He was born in the year 206 (A.C. 821-22), other accounts say, 205, 202, 201 and 200, he died in the year 284 (A.C. 897-98); others says, in 285 or 283, but the first date is the true one. Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 345)

1 The word muzawwar or muzawwarah occurs in the Canon of Avicenna. From the comparison of three passages in which it is found, I am led to think that it means sorrel-soup. It was certainly a culinary preparation in which bread was sopped and which, it appears, had an acid taste. In north Africa this word designates semoule, or granulated flour, of the finest sort.

2 Literally: the hand.

3 See No. 753 note.

says in his A'mār al-A'yān (lives of eminent men), that al-Buḥtūrī died at the age of eighty years. His death took place at Manbij; some say, but inexactly, at Aleppo. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) mentions, in his History of Baghdād, that al-Buḥtūrī received the surnames of Abu 'l-Ḥasan and Abū 'Ubādah, but, being advised, in the reign of al-Mutawakkil, to adopt the latter exclusively, as being the more remarkable, he did so. Literary scholars often ask to whom Abu 'l-Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 46) alludes in this verse:

"Al-Walid said that the nab'a-tree<sup>1</sup> produces no fruit; and the flock of gazelles missed obtaining fruit from the nab'a-tree."

These persons say: Who is this Walid and in what (piece of verse) did he say that the nab'a-tree produces no fruit? This question has been addressed to me by many. The al-Walid mentioned in the verse was the al-Buḥtūrī of whom we are now speaking; he said, in a long qaṣidah of his composition:

"She reproached me with my struggles against poverty; but that was foolish in her: the nab'a-tree is bare and has no fruit upon its branches."

This is the verse to which Abu 'l-Alā made allusion. I mention this as a piece of information which may be useful. 'Ubayd Allāh and Abū 'Ubādah, the sons of Yaḥyā, the son of al-Walid al-Buḥtūrī, were persons in whose praise al-Mutanabbī composed a number of qaṣidahs. They were al-Buḥtūrī's grandsons and eminent ra'ises at that time. Buḥtūrī means descended from Buḥtur, who, as may be seen in the genealogical list given at the head of this article, was one of our poet's ancestors. Zardafnah is a village in the dependencies of Manbij. Manbij is a town of Syria, situated between Aleppo and the Euphrates. It was built (anew) by Chosroes when he effected the conquest of Syria<sup>2</sup>. He called it Manbeh, which name the Arabs changed into Manbij. As it was the birth-place of al-Buḥtūrī, it is frequently mentioned in his poems. We find it, for instance, in the following passage, terminating long qaṣidah and in which he addresses Abū Ja'far

1 The nab' was of no good but for making bows and arrows.

2 Chosroes II conquered Syria (A. C. 611). It was in this expedition that he took Hieropolis. (Manbij)

Muḥammad Ibn Ḥumayd Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamid al-Ṭūsī, the person in whose honour he composed it:

"I shall never forget the tranquil moments I passed with you; enjoying, at your house, the temperate shade of a happy life. I dwelt there in comfort and, reposing under the shelter of its trees (afyāihi), I thought myself at Manbij."

Al-Buḥtūrī's usual residence was in 'Irāq, as he was employed in the service of al-Mutawakkil and of al-Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān<sup>1</sup>. There he lived highly respected. When these two lost their lives in the manner which all know<sup>2</sup> he returned to Manbij. Being obliged, in the interest of his states, to have frequent interviews with the governor of the place, he used to address him by the title of amir, because he stood in need of his good-will. As he did this against his inclination, he inserted the following lines in one of his poems:

"Ja'far (al-Mutawakkil) and al-Faṭḥ are gone, partly soiled with dust (murammal) and partly stained with gore (muḍarraj). Can I ever hope again for aids (anṣāran) against Fortune, now that they, my Aws and Khazraj<sup>3</sup>, have their dwelling (ṭhawā) in the grave? They were my masters by whose kindness I drained off (ḥalabtu) to the last drops, the favours poured upon me by their copiously flowing (muthajjij) rains (their beneficence)<sup>4</sup>. They were taken off designedly and for an evil purpose; and I am left here, obliged to give the title of amir to the governor of Manbij!"

---

1 It is hardly necessary to warn the reader that this Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān, one of al-Mutawakkil's wazirs, must not be confounded with Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān of Seville, the author of the Qalā'id al-'Iqiyān and other well known works. The first was murdered in the palace of al-Ja'farī, near Sarra-man ra'ā (A. H. 247), and the other at Morocco, A. H. 529.

2 They were murdered by some of the Turkish guards at the instigation of Muḥammad al-Munṭaḥḥir, the son of al-Mūtawakkil.

3 The tribes of al-Aws and Khazraj took Muḥammad under their protection at Madinah and were therefore called his Anṣārs (helpers).

4 The text of this piece is inexactly given in the manuscripts and the printed editions. The corrections, furnished by al-Buḥtūrī's Dīwān, are indicated in the translation.

Al-Mas'ūdī says, in his Murūj al-Dhahab : "Hārūn al-Rashīd passed near Manbij with 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Šālih, who was the most elegant speaker of all the surviving descendants of al-'Abbās. Seeing a well-built castle (country-seat) and a garden full of trees covered with fruit, he asked to whom that property belonged. 'Abd al-Malik replied : 'To you, Commander of the faithful ! and then to me.' 'On what scale,' said al-Rashīd, 'is the castle built ?' The other made answer : 'It is inferior to that of the dwellings (in which members) of our family (reside), and it surpasses that of dwellings inhabited by other men.' 'Describe to me your town,' said al-Rashīd. 'Its water is sweet' replied 'Abd al-Malik, its air cool, its plains are solid (underfoot), its maladies rare. 'How are its nights ?' said al-Rashīd. 'The whole night' answered 'Abd al-Malik, is as (pleasant as) the morning's dawn.'" End of al-Mas'ūdī's relation. This 'Abd al-Malik bore the surname of Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān ; he was the son of Šālih, the son of 'Alī, the son of 'Abd Allāh the son of al-Abbās the son of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. The town of Manbij, which he held as appanage was his place of residence. He died at al-Raqqah in the year 199<sup>1</sup>. He expressed his thoughts with great precision and elegance ; but I must abstain from entering into this subject, lest I should be led too far. Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī<sup>2</sup> says, in his Muṣhtarik under the word al-Suqyā (the irrigated grounds), that five places bear this name. He concludes the article with these words : The fifth is a village with gardens, near the gates of Manbij ; it is settled in perpetuity (waqf)<sup>3</sup> on the

1 In the note No. 129, it is stated, on other authorities, that 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Šālih died in A. H. 193. The date given here by Ibn Kḥallikān is certainly wrong, for the Nujūm informs (No. 240) that, previously to the month of Rajab, A. H. 196 he was already dead.

2 The life of this Yāqūt will be found in this work.

3 A property settled on a religious establishment is called a waqf. It may be stipulated by the donor that his descendants are to receive the whole or part of the revenues which it produces. On the death of the last descendant, the property is fully acquired to that establishment and must remain with it in perpetuity.

descendants of al-Buḥturī the poet." Abū Firās<sup>1</sup> al-Ḥamdānī mentions it in his poems.

757 AL-WALID IBN ṬARIF

Al-Walid Ibn Ṭarif Ibn al-Ṣalt Ibn Tāriq Ibn Sihān* Ibn 'Amr Ibn Mālik al-Shaybānī al-Shāri; such is the genealogy given by Abū Sa'd al-Samānī (No. 370) in two passages of his Ansāb: one under the title of al-Arqam and the other under that of al-Ṣihānī, a name in which the s is followed by an i. Al-Walid was one of those men who acquired a great reputation for courage, audacity and bravery. He was chief of the Khārijites<sup>2</sup> and usually stationed in Naṣībīn, al-Khābūr and that neighbourhood. He revolted under the khalifate of Hārūn al-Rashīd, committed acts of violence and gathered about him a great multitude (of rebels)<sup>3</sup>. Abū Khālīd Yazīd Ibn Mazyad Ibn Zāyidah al-Shaybānī, a chief whose life we shall give, was sent against him by al-Rashīd, at the head of a numerous army, and tried, at first, to circumvent and wheedle his adversary. The Barmakids not liking Yazīd, incensed al-Rashīd against him: "He spares the rebel," said they, "in consideration of the relationship which exists between them<sup>4</sup>. Though

1 This name is incorrectly transcribed Farās (No. 146), where the life of the poet is given.

2 The term Khariji designated those who revolted against the established authority for religious motives.

3 Abu 'l-Fidā does not speak of Khālīd in his Annals, but Ibn al-Aṭhīr gives us an account of him in the Kāmil, under the year 178 of the hijrah. This chief revolted at Naṣībīn, penetrated into Armenia, besieged the city of Khulāt till he obtained from the inhabitants a gift of thirty thousand pieces of gold. He then invaded Adharbā'ijān, Hulwān, the Sawād of 'Irāq, the countries on the west bank of the Tigris and Mesopotamia; devastating these provinces and ransoming the cities. The khalif Hārūn al-Rashīd sent against him Yazīd Ibn Mazyad, and that chief vanquished and slew the rebel in the following year.

4 Al-Walid and Khālīd were relatives; they belonged to the tribe of Shaybān and drew their descent from the same ancestor, Wā'il.

* 'Sibijān Ibn 'Umar' in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

al-Walid has very few troops, Yazid does nothing but amuse him with fair promises till he sees how things may turn out." This induced al-Rashid to write an angry letter to Yazid, in which he said: "Had I dispatched on this business one of my salves, he would have done things better than you. You are trying to deceive (me) and spare your own relatives, but the Commander of the faithful swears that, if you defer giving battle to al-Walid, he will send a person with orders to bring to him your head." In consequence of this letter, Yazid attacked al-Walid, defeated and slew him. This took place on the eve of Thursday in the month of Ramaḍān 179 (Nov.-Dec., A.C. 795). The battle was so remarkable that it is mentioned in the books of annals. Al-Walid had a sister named al-Fāri'ah, or, as some say, Fātimah. She possessed a talent for poetry and, as al-Khansā made elegies on the death of her brother Ṣakhr<sup>1</sup>, she followed the same path and composed, on the death of hers, an excellent qasidah. It is very scarce and not to be found complete in any of the literary anthologies<sup>2</sup>; Abū 'Alī al-Qālī (No. 92) himself gives only four verses of it in his Amāll. I happened to discover a complete copy of the poem and, as it is not only rare but good, I shall insert it here:

"At Tall Nuhākā are the remains of a tomb (which appears) like a hill overtopping all other hills. In it are enclosed hereditary glory, chieftanship, courage and sound judgement. Trees of al-Khābūr! why are you covered with leaves? you appear not to grieve for the death of the son of Ṭarīf; of that hero who cared for no other provision but that of piety; who required no wealth but by means of lances and of swords. The only treasures he valued were (steeds) sleek and vigorous accustomed to charge upon the ranks (of the foe). You (who regret him not) you cannot have witnessed that (battle), nor stood firm before the enemy when he attacked, and that not feebly. You must never have put on a coat of mail, with the intention of entering into an abyss of terror, into the crowd of warriors with brilliant arms. You must never have charged in a day of battle, when war, pregnant (with dangers), was

1 See No. 156 and M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes.

2 In Ibn al-Aṭṭār's Kāmil it is given with some omissions, transpositions and new readings.

goaded on by the points of the yellow-shafted spears<sup>1</sup>. He and generosity were inseparable companions ; whilst he lived, generosity was pleased with him ; now, that he is dead, she finds no companion that can please her. (Walid exclaimed) you are lost for us (irreparably) ? as the days of our youth are lost ; O ! that we could redeem you (from death) by the sacrifice of thousands of our youths ! till Walid's life was extinguished, he never ceased to be a curb for his foes and a refuge for the feeble. Alert, my people ! death and ruin are at hand, and the earth is inclined to tremble for his loss. Alert, my people ! calamity, and destruction are near ; here comes adversity, the obstinate foe of the generous. Behold ! the moon is ready to fall from its place among the stars, and the sun has resolved to eclipse his light. Behold the lion who was in all things lion ; they now bear him to a cavity hollowed in the earth and covered over. May God punish that spot of ground which hides from our sight a hero who was never sated in doing act of kindness. He perished by the hands of Yazid Ibn Mazyad ; but what of that how often did he engage his bands against hostile troops ! May the benediction of God rest upon him for ever ! I see that death lets fall her strokes on all that is noble."

She composed a great number of other elegies on his death, and, in one of them, she says :

"I think of al-Walid and his glorious deeds, now that I see the land deprived of his presence. I am gone to look for him in heaven, in that place to which aspired his noble pride, now levelled to the dust<sup>2</sup>. His people lost him by their fault ; let them now search for as good a protector as him whom they lost ! O ! if the swords which struck him with their edge, had known what they did, they would have recoiled off him, when wielded to strike, through respect and through dread of his bravery."

Al-Walid used to recite the following lines every time he was engaged in battle ;

<sup>1</sup> I read ينكر نها with the Būlāq edition.

<sup>2</sup> Literally : "As was desired by his nose now cut off." The word nose signifies figuratively honourable pride.

"I am Walid Ibn Ṭarīf al-Shāri ! the lion-chief whose ardour none can withstand ! It was your tyranny which drew me forth from my abode."

It is related that when the army of al-Walid was routed Yazid himself pursued his adversary to a great distance and succeeded in killing him and cutting off his head. When al-Walid's sister was informed of his death, she put on the armour in which she used to fight, and charged upon the troops of Yazid. When he saw her, he cried out : "Let her alone !" and then, sallying forth, he struck her horse with his lance and said to her : Go away, and God's curse<sup>1</sup> be upon you ! you will bring disgrace upon the tribe<sup>2</sup>." On hearing these words, she felt ashamed and went away. Ṭarīf is to be pronounced as here written (not Ṭurayf). Tell Nuhākā, the place where this celebrated battle was fought, is, I believe, in the territory of Naṣibin. Al-Khābūr is the well-known river which has its source at Rās-Ayn and falls into the Euphrates, near Qarqisiyā. On its banks are a great number of villages which resemble large towns, the country around them being perfectly cultivated and the markets abundantly stocked with the produce of the soil. The name is so well-known that I need not indicate its orthography. Shāri (a seller) has for its plural Shurāt and serves to designate the Khārijites. This name was applied to them because they had the custom of saying : "We have sold our souls through obedience to God ;" that is to say "We have given them to purchase paradise, in abandon ing the cause of the imāms (khālifs who transgress the law." The true name of al-Khansā was Tumaḍir. Her father, 'Amr Ibn al-Sharid, belonged to the tribe of Sulaym. The word khans signifies to have a flat nose and prominent nostrils : she received this nickname because that was her case. The history of her brother Ṣakhr and the elegies which she composed on his death are well-known. We have said a word of him in the life of Abū Aḥmad al-Askarī (No. 156). Opinions are at variance respecting the place where his tomb is situated. Some say that

1 Literally : "And the vehemence of God be upon you ! "

2 She, who was a relation of Yazid's, might have been taken prisoner and ill treated.

he was buried near 'Asīb, a well-known mountain in the country of the Greeks<sup>1</sup>, and that the tomb which is to be seen there and is considered as the tomb of Imra al-Qays Ibn Ḥujr al-Kindī, the celebrated poet, is in reality that of Ṣakhr. According to another statement, both were buried there. The ḥāfiẓ Abū Bakr al-Ḥāzimi (No. 599) says, in his Dictionary of homonyms, that 'Asīb is a mountain in the land of Ḥijāz, and that Ṣakhr, the brother of al-Khansā, was buried near it. From these indications it would appear that there are two mountains which bear this name; one of them, which is the best known, lies in the country of the Greeks and the other in Ḥijāz. Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī<sup>2</sup> should have noticed 'Asīb in his geographical Dictionary, but I do not find it mentioned in that work.

758 WAHB IBN MUNABBIH

Abū 'Abd Allāh, Wahb Ibn Munabbih* [Ibn Kāmil Ibn Sayj]<sup>3</sup>, Ibn Dhī Kibār] al-Yamanī (a native of Yaman) was the great transmitter of narrations and legends. He possessed information concerning the origin of things, the formation of the world, the history of the prophets and of (ancient) kings.<sup>4</sup> According to Ibn Qutaybah (No. 306) he declared that, of all God's books, he had read seventy-two. The same author says: "I saw a treatise of his entitled: An account of the crowned kings belonging to the race of Ḥimyar, with their history, the anecdotes related of them, the indication of their tombs and specimens of their poetry.

1 The mountain named 'Asīb is situated in the neighbourhood of Angora. See my Diwan d' Amro al-Kaiş, page 28.

2 The life of this geographer will be found in this work.

3 See Wustenfel's edition of Nawawī's biographical dictionary, page 609.

4 A great part of the information which the Musulmān historians give us respecting the ante-Islāmic history of Persia, Greece, Yaman, Egypt and other countries, comes from Wahb Ibn Munabbih. He was an audacious liar, as Muslim critics of a later period at length discovered.

* From Ibn to 'Kibār' not in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

It forms one volume and is an instructive work. He had several brothers ; one of them, who was older than himself and named Hammām Ibn Munabbih, related some traditions which he had learned from Abū Hurayrah (No. 244n.).<sup>1</sup> 'Wahb was counted as one of the Abnā. We shall here explain what is meant by this denomination ; Abū Murrah Sayf Ibn Dhī-Yazan the Ḥimyarite, held the sovereignty of Yaman. When the Abyssinians took possession of his empire, he went to implore the assistance of Chosroes Anūshīrwān, against the invaders. The history of his proceedings on this occasion are well known and a full account of them would lead us too far! The result was that Chosroes sent off with him seven thousand five hundred Persian horsemen under the command of Wahraz. So says Ibn Qutaybah, but, according to Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq (No. 586), the king sent with him only eight hundred horsemen, of whom two hundred were drowned in the sea, and six hundred escaped. Abu al-Qāsim al-Suhayli (No. 346) declares that the first statement is more likely to be true, because it is difficult to suppose that six hundred horsemen could have resisted all the Abyssinians. When these troops arrived in Yaman, they fought a battle with the Abyssinians, gained a victory over them and expelled them from the country. Sayf Ibn Dhī-Yazan and Wahraz took upon themselves the supreme command and held it for four years. Sayf, having admitted some of the Abyssinians into his service, went out to one of his hunting-grounds and took those people with him. When they found him alone, they threw their javelins at him and killed him, after which, they fled to the tops of the mountains ; but the companions of Sayf pursued them there and slew them all. From that moment, the monarchy of Yaman was dissolved ; the people of that country not placing themselves under the command of another sovereign, but the inhabitants of each district choosing a member of the tribe of Ḥimyar for their king. The government of these provincial kings subsisted till God gave the Muslim religion to the world. According to another recital, the country remained in the hands of the Persians and was governed by the lieutenants of Chosroes till the mission of God's Prophet. At that time, there were in Yaman two young men who acted as generals for Barwiz (Perviz); one of them was a Daylamite and bore the name of Firūz; the other was called Dāduwayh.* They became Muslims and were the same persons who penetrated with Qays Ibn al-Makshūh<sup>1</sup>, into the house of al-Aswad al-Ansī, who had set up for a prophet in Yaman, and slew him. The history of this event is so well known that we need not relate it<sup>2</sup>. Our object in mentioning all this is to indicate the origin of the word Abnā (sons). This title was given to the sons and grandsons of such Persian soldiers as settled in Yaman, got married and had children. Ṭāwūs, the learned doctor of whom we have already spoken (No. 278) was one of the Abnā. I indicated that fact in his biographical notice, but did not explain the word as I have done here. The history of Wahb is sufficiently known; so, we need not mention any thing more concerning him<sup>3</sup>. He died at Ṣan'ā in Yaman, in the month of Muḥarram, 110 (April-May, A. C. 728); or, by other accounts, in 114 or 116. He had then attained the age of ninety years. We have spoken of Ṣan'ā in the life of 'Abd al-Razzāq al-Ṣan'ānī (No. 373). Some foreign names are mentioned above, but, as they are well known, we abstain from indicating their orthography and thus avoid lengthening the present article.

---

<sup>1</sup> See M. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, vol. I, p. 146 et seq.

759 THE QĀḌĪ ABU 'L-BAKHTARĪ

Abu 'l-Bakhtarī Wahb Ibn Wahb Ibn Kathīr Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Zama'ah Ibn al-Aswad Ibn al-Muṭṭalib Ibn Asad Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzza Ibn Quṣayyi Ibn Kilāb, a member of the tribe

1 Some copies read Maksūh. Ṭabarī and other historians replace this name by 'Abd Yağhūth.

2 The full history of al-Ansī will be found in Kosegarten's edition of the Annals of Tabārī and in M. Caussin's Essai.

3 Wahb a Jew converted to Islāmism, was highly esteemed in his days as a transmitter of historical information and even as a relator of Traditions. Part of the latter information he delivered on the authority of some of the Ṭabī'is, or disciples of Muḥammad's Companions; and in that, he is considered as trustworthy.

* Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Zādhuwayh.—Ed.

of Quraysh, a descendent of Asad and a native of Madinah, taught Traditions on the authority of 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Umar al-'Umari, Hishām Ibn 'Urwah, (No. 748). Ja'far al-Sādiq Ibn Muḥammad (No. 128) and others; Traditions were delivered on his authority by Rajā Ibn Sahl al-Ṣāghānī, Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Sa'id Ibn al-Musayyab and others. He was considered as one whose Traditions ought to be rejected and was notorious as a fabricator of such pieces. Having removed from Madinah to Baghdād, under the khalifate of Hārūn al-Rashīd, he was appointed by that sovereign to the qādīship of 'Askar al-Mahdī, (a place situated) to the east of Baghdād. We have already spoken of this town in our article on al-Wāqidi (No. 618). Some time after, the khalif removed him from that post and nominated him to the qādīship of Madinah, in the place of Bakkār Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Zubayrī (No. 228). He gave him, at the same time, the direction of military affairs in that (province). Al-Bakhtari, being afterwards deprived of these offices by the khalif, proceeded to Baghdād and there he continued to reside till his death. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) says, in that article of the history of Baghdād which contains the life of the Ḥanafite qādi Abū Yūsaf Yā'qūb Ibn Ibrāhīm.<sup>1</sup> "This doctor was chief qādi at Baghdād. On his death, al-Rashīd gave his place to Abu 'l-Bakhtari Wahb Ibn Wahb the Qurayshide, who was a jurisconsult, a historian and a genealogist; generous, noble-minded and bountiful; fond of praise and rewarding amply those who eulogized him. Whether he gave little or much, he always requested the receiver to forgive his parcimony. He rejoiced so loudly when an applicant came to solicit his benevolence, that any person who did not know who he was would say: 'There is a man who has obtained a great favour which he asked for.' Ja'far al-Ṣādiq married Ibn al-Bakhtari's mother at Madinah and some of his Traditions with their isnāds<sup>2</sup>, were handed down by his step-son. Her name was 'Abadah, her father 'Alī, descended from 'Abd Manāf by the following line: Yazīd, Rakānah, 'Abd Yazīd, Hāshim al-Muṭṭalib, 'Abd Manāf. Her mother was the daughter of 'Aqīl, the son of Abū Ṭālib. The Khaṭīb, in his History of Baghdād,

1 The life of Abū Yūsuf the Ḥanafite will be found in this work.

2 See Introduction to vol. I.

praises Abu 'l-Bakhtārī in the highest terms and relates that a poet went to him one day and recited these lines :

"When Wahb opens his lips to smile, you would take (the brightness of his teeth) for the lightnings of a cloud which rejoices in pouring out its waters over many lands. Words of blame uttered by those who are hostile to great men cannot injure Wahb ; the star is not hurtled when barked at by a dog. Many men inherit treasures from their fathers, and the treasures of the Sons of Fihir (the Qurayshids) consists in that concretion of beneficence (whose name is) Wahb."

"Abu 'l-Bakhtārī", says the historian "gave way to an excess of joy and laughed outright. He then called forward one of his 'awns,<sup>1</sup> and whispered something in his ear. The man brought to him a purse containing five hundred dinārs<sup>2</sup>, and he Abu 'l-Bakhtārī gave it to the poet". Abu 'l-Faraj al-Isbahānī (No. 415) relates as follows, in the article of the Kitāb al-Aghānī which contains the life of Abū Dulaf al-'Ijlī (No. 513) : "Aḥmad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Ammār spoke to me and said : 'We were one day at the house of Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad (No. 610), and found with him a young boy who was the grandson of the qadī Abu 'l-Bakhtārī Wahb Ibn Wahb. His face was smooth and handsome. With him was another boy who resembled him in beauty and who was the grandson of Abū Dulaf al-'Ijlī. Al-Mubarrad said to the grandson of Abu 'l-Bakhtārī : 'I know a charming anecdote of your grandfather ; how he performed an act of generosity, the like of which no man ever did before.' He (the boy) asked to hear it and al-Mubarrad spoke as follows : 'A literary man received an invitation to some place (or other), and there they gave him to drink a different sort of nabīdh<sup>3</sup> from that which was served to the rest of the company. This made him compose the following verses :

1 The 'awn (aid, helper) is a sort of constable and messenger attached to the tribunal of a qādī.

2 Somewhat more than two hundred and fifty pounds sterling.

3 See No. 129.

"Two sorts of nabīdh were in the same room ; one for the rich men, and one for their guest ! Had you done the same with your eatables, you would have followed the rule you have observed with respect to your intoxication liquor. But, if you wished to reach the goal towards which all generous men aspire, you would have imitated the conduct of Abu al-Bakhtari : He sought for his brethren throughout the land and enabled the poor man to do without the help of the rich."

When these verses came to the knowledge of Abu 'l-Bakhtari, he sent to the author three hundred dinārs. 'I told him,' said Ibn 'Ammār, 'that (Abū Dulaf), the grandfather of the other boy, did something of the same kind and even finer.' (Al-Muburrad) asked to hear what it was, and I related as follows : 'He was informed that a man, formerly rich, had fallen into poverty and that his wife told him to go and enlist in the army (jund) ; on which he said :

"Let me alone ; you require of me a thing exorbitant : to bear arms and to hear people in armour cry : Halt ! Do you take me for one of those men of death who, night and day, seek their own destruction? When death approaches others, it appals me; how then could I rush towards it, head foremost<sup>1</sup>? Do you think that to go forward and fight when an adversary in single combat is in my nature, or that my bosom contains the heart of Abū Dulaf?"

Abū Dulaf (having heard of this,) sent for the man and said : 'How much pay (rizq) did your wife count on your receiving ?' He answered : 'One hundred dinārs<sup>2</sup>'. 'And how long, said Abū Dulaf, 'do you expect to live ?' The man answered : 'Twenty years.' 'Then' said Abū Dulaf, 'I owe you the amount of what you (both) hoped for, and shall pay it out of my pocket, not out of the sultān's treasury'. He then gave orders that the sum should be paid immediately. 'I saw,' said the narrator, that the face of Abū Dulaf's grandson brightened up and remarked that Abū 'l-Bakhtari's grandson was put quite out of countenance.' End of the recital furnished by the author of the (Kitāb al-Aghānī). We have given these 1 Literally ; in thrusting forward the shoulder.

---

2 About fifty pounds sterling.

verses in the life of Abū Dulaf (No. 913) and mentioned the name of him who made them, with the manner in which they were brought about. They differ, in some degree, from those which are inserted here. The first piece of verse (cited in the foregoing extract and) referring to Abu 'l-Bakhtari, was composed by Abū 'Abd al-Rahmān Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Rahmān Muḥammad Ibn 'Atiyah, a celebrated poet (No. 186n.). He drew his surname of al-'Aṭawī from the name of his grandfather, who was a native of Baṣrah and a mawlā of the family of Layth Ibn Bakr Ibn 'Abd Manāt Ibn Kinānah. He (al-'Aṭawī was a Muṭazelite and left a diwān of poetry. The Khaṭīb, in his History of Baghdād, attributes to Abu 'l-Bakhtari the following saying : "I prefer being with people better informed than myself to being with people who are not so well informed as I am. For, if I know more than they do, I can learn nothing from them ; whereas, with the others, I can gain information." The Khaṭīb relates also in the same work, that Hārūn al-Rashīd, on arriving at Madinah, declared that it would be a profanation if he were to go up into the Prophet's pulpit whilst he had still on him his travelling jacket (qabā) and sword-belt. Abu 'l-Bakhtari, on hearing these words, said to him : "Ja'far, the son of Muḥammad" meaning Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, "related to me that he heard his father speak in these terms ; 'Gabriel, on whom be the blessing of God ! descended ( from heaven) to the Prophet, and he had upon him a qabā and a belt furnished with its sword.' " This induced al-M'uāfā al-Tamīmī to compose the following lines :

"Evil and woe betide Abu 'l-Bakhtari when all men shall appear together at the resurrection ! for he has said and published a falsehood respecting Ja'far. By Allāh ! he never had one hour's conversation with Ja'far, either in town or in country, never whilst he lived, was he seen to pass between the (Prophet's) tomb and the pulpit<sup>1</sup>. May God chastise the son of Wahb for publishing a scandalous falsehood : he pretends that, when the Muṣṭafā Aḥmad (the chosen one, Muḥammad) received the visits of Gabriel, that

---

1 This was perhaps the passage leading to that part of the mosque where Ja'far al-Ṣādiq usually stationed.

angel, holy and pure, appeared to him in boots, and in a black qabā, with a sword girt around his loins !”

Ja'far Ṭayālīsī relates that Yahyā Ibn Ma'in<sup>1</sup> stopped one day behind the circle of students who were taking lessons from Abu 'l-Bakhtarī. The professor was then repeating to them the Tradition which came from Ja'far al-Ṣādiq. On hearing it, Ibn Ma'in exclaimed : “Enemy of God ! you there tell a lie of the Prophet !” “On that,” said Ibn Ma'in, “the police-guards arrested me<sup>2</sup>, but I said to them ; ‘This man pretends that the messenger of the Lord of all creatures came down to the Prophet with a qabā on his shoulders.’” They replied to me : ‘By Allāh ! that man is a lying story-teller, and they let me go’ Ibn Qutayba says, in his Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, that Abu 'l-Bakhtarī's authority as a Traditionist was feeble. The Khaṭīb says, in his History, that Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī (No. 194) related what here follows : “Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 191) was asked if he knew by whom was published the Tradition which runs thus : No speed (can be made) except with cloven hoofs, or with solid hoofs or with wings ? and he replied : ‘No one can have related such a thing except that liar ; meaning Abu 'l-Bakhtarī.’ This qāḍī composed a number of works, such as the Kitāb al-Rāyāt (on standards), the history of Ṭasm and Jadis, the Kitāb šifat al-Nabī (a description of the Prophet's person and character the Faḍā'il al-Anšār (the meritorious qualities and doings of Anšārs), the Kitāb al-Faḍā'il al-Kabīr (the larger work on meritorious qualities), and a genealogy of the descendants of Ismā'il containing also a quantity of Traditions and narratives. The anecdotes told of him and of his merits are very numerous. He died at Baghdād, A. H. 200 (A. C. 815-6) under the khalifate of al-Māmūn. Ibn Qutaybah mentions him twice in the Kitāb al-Ma'ārif ; the first time, in special article wherein is given an account of what he was ; the second time, in the paragraph headed : The names which occur thrice successively, where he gives as examples : “Abu al-Bakhtarī Wahb, the son of Wahb, the son of Wahb, and among the Persian kings: Bahrām, the son of Bahrām, the son of Bahrām,

1 The article on Ibn Ma'in is given in this work.

2 The true reading is ناخذنى الشرط.

• Kitāb al-Rawāyat, (a book of Narrations) in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

and, among the descendants of Abū Ṭālib, Ḥasan, the son of Ḥasan, the son of Ḥasan, and, among the Ghassānids, al-Ḥārith the younger, son of al-Ḥārith the lame, son of al-Ḥārith the elder. These are all the cases which Ibn Qutaybah mentions, the others appeared in later times ; thus Abū Ḥamid al-Ghazzālī (No. 562) was named Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad<sup>1</sup>. Bakhtari is derived from the verb bakhtara, which signifies to strut proudly. This surname is often confounded with that of Buhturi. Zam'a, in its primitive signification means the excrescence which grows behind the cloven feet of animals. It was afterwards employed as a proper name. We have already spoken of al-Asadi. This article was finished when I met with an anecdote which I must add to it : Abu 'l-Bakhtari related as follows : "I used to go into the presence of Hārūn al-Rashīd, and I found him, one day, with his son al-Qāsim, surnamed al-Mu'tamin, standing before him. I kept my eyes fixed on the boy, from the time I went in till I was going out. One of the khalif's boon companions then said : 'Abu 'l-Bakhtari must, I think, like lambs' heads. The khalif understood his meaning and, when I went again to see him, he addressed me thus : 'I see that you cannot take your eyes off my son al-Qāsim ; do you wish that he should be given up to you completely ? ' I replied : 'God protect the Commander of the faithful ! why cast up to me a thing (a vice) which is not in me ? ' I looked on him fixedly because Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, on whom be God's blessing ! related, on the authority of his forefathers, up to the Prophet of God, that the Prophet said : 'Three things fortify the sight : looking at verdure, at running water and at a handsome face.' I copied this from the handwriting of the qāḍī Kamāl al-Din Ibn al-'Adīm (No. 104, note) ; it was his rough draught of the History (of Aleppo).

760. YĀRŪQ AL-TURKUMĀNĪ.

Yārūq Ibn Arslān al-Turkumānī was a chief who had great influence over his people. It was after him that the horde of

<sup>1</sup> Examples of this last case became very numerous.

Turkumāns called the Yārūqiyah was thus named. He was of a colossal stature, a formidable aspect, and resided outside of Aleppo, in the country to the south of the city. He, his family and followers built for themselves, on a lofty hill bordering the river Quwayq, a great number of houses and large edifices which are known by the appellation of al-Yārūqiyah and bear the appearance of a village. He and his people resided there. It is yet inhabited by a numerous population and is frequently visited by the people of Aleppo in the spring season, for the purpose of amusing themselves in its green fields and looking down on the Quwayq. It is a place of amusement and diversion. Yārūq died in the month of Muḥarram, 564 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1168); so says Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Ṣhaddād, in the life of the Sulṭān Ṣalāḥ al-Dīn. The word ياروق is to be pronounced Yārūq. Quwayq is the name of a little river which passes near Aleppo; its waters flow abundantly in winter and spring, but cease to run in summer. Poets have often mentioned it in their verses, Abū 'Ubādah al-Buḥturī (No. 743) particularly, who has repeatedly spoken of it in his qaṣīdahs. He says, for instance, in one of his pieces:

"O ye lightnings! disclose (to my sight) the Quwayq and the two outskirts of Aleppo! flash over the castle of Baṭyās! Show me the land of roses tinged with yellow, the land where the myrtle is gathered (majnā). When I went to that country, it assembled around me (its delights) and greatly tranquilized my heart".

Baṭyās is the name of a village which lay outside of Aleppo, but is now so completely ruined that not a trace of it remains. Ṣāliḥ Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib<sup>1</sup> built there a castle which he inhabited and his sons (after him). It was situated between al-Nayrab and al-Ṣālihiyah, villages lying near each other and to the east of Aleppo. The castle was built on a hill which commands al-Nayrab, but nothing now remains of it except some mouldering ruins. So I find it written in the handwriting of a well-informed native of Aleppo.

---

<sup>1</sup> This was the father of 'Abd al-Malik, the 'Abbāsīd prince of whom we have spoken in No. 129 note.

761 YĀQŪT AL-MAWṢILĪ, THE PENMAN

The kātib (secretary or writer) Abū 'l-Durr (the father of pearls) Yāqūt (hyacinth) al-Mawṣilī (an inhabitant of Moṣul), was the son of a Musalmān ('Abd Allāh). He obtained the title of Amin al-Din (trustworthy in religion) and was surnamed al-Malikī (the Malakiyan) after (his patron) the Sulṭān Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Malik Shāh II, the son of Saljūq, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Malik Shāh I. Having settled at Moṣul, he studied with great assiduity under Abū Muḥammad Sa'id Ibn al-Mubārak, an Egyptian grammarian who is more generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Dahhān (No. 247). He read over, under the tuition of this master, all the works composed by him, as also al-Mutanabbai's Diwān, al-Ḥariri's Maqāmāt and some other treatises. He wrote a great deal and specimens of his penmanship, which was extremely beautiful, spread abroad into (distant) countries. In the latter part of his life he remained without a rival in the art of calligraphy. The style of (writing employed by) Ibn al-Bawwāb (No. 432) in the transcription (of books), excellent and renowned as it is, does not come up to his. He had a passion for transcribing the Ṣaḥāh of al-Jawharī (No. 9, note) and wrote a great number of them, each copy forming one volume. Some of them, which I have seen, are now sold for one hundred dīnārs<sup>1</sup> a piece. Numbers of students received from him lessons in writing and profited greatly under his direction. During his lifetime, he enjoyed a high reputation, and people came to study under him from all quarters. Al-Najīb Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Bakr al-Wāsiṭī (of the town of Wāsiṭ) sent him a qaṣidah which he had composed in his praise; he had never seen him, but only heard of his (eminent talent). In this poem, which is a good one of its kind, the author extols, in the highest terms, the beauty of Yāqūt's handwriting. Here is the piece:

"Where are the gazelles (maidens) of 'Ālij and al-Muṣallā (?) those fawns that dwelt near the stream of al-Mu'allā? Do the branches of the willow (slender-waisted girls) still flourish on the sandhills? Do full moons (handsome faces) still shine in that horizon ? Have those gazelles still got faces so beautiful that their aspect would alleviate (a lover's) sadness ? Compared with these nymphs, what is the tender narcissus which, after sustaining the attacks of the zephyr, erects against its stem ? Compared with those cheeks, what is the tint of the rose when the cloud sheds upon it copiously its waters and its dew ? Do those knolls offer (to our sight) star-like oranges borne on branches which are bent down and brought near (the hand) ? How could you think that any water could match that of the Tigris ? They who judged so uttered a falsehood ! It is by no means true ; God forbid ! Does any city on earth resemble the Abode of Welfare<sup>1</sup> ? To find the like of Baghḍād would be a miracle. It shows us, each day, faces different from those of yesterday and seemingly pregnant (with mischief) ; (it shows us) maidens of whom a sage would become enamoured, were he to see their mincing and coquetish gait. They bind their hair with Nāṣiriyan ribbons<sup>2</sup> and thus reduce you to bondage<sup>3</sup>. They pay no regard to your saying : 'Were it not (that I fear)'...; they only know (how to say) these words : '(we must have) the entire (heart) or else (none at all).' That is a pasture-ground for the hearts (of lovers) ; on the retreat of spring it is always watered by successive showers. That is a city where a man acquires new ideas and gains the summits of learning, of gravity and of gaiety. (Baghḍād), to be perfect, requires only the possession of a hyacinth (yāqūt) ; O that she had it already to adorn her ! Who will come to her aid, so that the perfume of Amin al-Dīn's presence may float around her ? That alone would suffice for her pre-eminence. Had she a reason to hope for Yāqūt's visit, even speechless things would (find a tongue and) exclaim : 'A hearty welcome !' Relators of anecdotes may tell her of the perfume (which his talent spreads around), but she would feel much more pleasure at his sight. (He is) an ocean of generosity ; the noblest of men follow in his

<sup>1</sup> Between forty and fifty pounds.

1 The abode of welfare (Dār al-Salām) was the poetical name of Baghḍād.

2 This fashionable ribbon was perhaps named Nāṣiriyan in honour of the Sultan Saladin, whose official title was Al-Malik al-Nāṣir (the victorious king).

3 Literally : and thus undo your knotting and untying. The expression, "to knot and untie," signifies "to possess sovereign authority, to have the power of nominating and deposing governors".

steps; for the generous man, when noble deeds are done, has always followers. He unites in himself every scattered portion of knowledge; were he not living, the mother of all talent would be childless. He possesses a reed (pen) whose attacks inspire terror to the lions (powerful chiefs), and to which squadrons of horse submit with humility. When its mouth (nib) opens to let flow black (ink) upon white (paper), the white and the yellow (the swords and spears) are astounded. (He is) vigilant in guarding the kingdom, yet he neither aims an arrow nor bares a blade. Eloquence is sent (by him) on messages when sheets of paper can fulfil the duties of ambassadors. The arrogant then recoil, filled with terror at what he dictates and prescribes. Sometimes you see him mix with his hand the lots (of the game) of science, phrase by phrase; (so as to form a picture) like meadows enamelled with flowers, or like strings of pearls; (producing thus a piece) elegant in penmanship, brilliant in expression and in the thoughts which they convey. O you who aspire to proficiency! prepare (for your work) like Amin al-Din; take your time, and fatigue your mind but gently. You, my lord! the (sworn) brother of generosity and the nurturer of glory! you, the son of high renown! you who bear off the prize! you are the full moon of which the penman, the son of a crescent<sup>1</sup>, was the father. He that retreats (before obstacles) is good for nothing. Though he was the first (in point of time), you are more worthy of preference, for you out-ran him and he came in the second. Amin al-Din! you in whom God shews how! He can unite, as in one sheaf, liberality and every merit! I am one of those who bear eulogiums to your tribe (your dwelling) so that it (my poem) may ever continue to roam about and be recited<sup>2</sup>. When your eulogium is indited by a qāḍī (by a competent judge), an 'adl (competent witness)<sup>3</sup> can bear

1 The son of a crescent, in Arabic: Ibn Hilāl. This was the patronymic appellation of the famous penman Ibn al-Bawwāb. (See No. 432)).

2 I read with one of my manuscripts, and the edition of Bulāq يظل تبهو يتلى. The other reading يظل لا يتسل means: "has remained inconsolable," and is evidently not to be accepted.

3 The 'adl is an officer in the qāḍī's court: he writes out his judgements, signs them as a witness and draws up deeds. He must be a man of approved integrity and veracity.

testimony (to its truth). Accept this virgini (piece) from a father who never troubled his mind about seeking a husband for his daughter. I desire neither reward nor recompense; but I really see that you are worthy of praise. The impulse of friendship bears this (poem) towards you, and it goes, wishing to obtain a kind reception from your good opinion. Since it is difficult for me to reach you, let my heart answer for my sincerity; (that you can appreciate), for you are a man of an excellent judgement. Continue to enjoy good health as long as the squadrons of darkness hover round the horizon! as long as the morning unsheathes the blade of its light!"

Amin al-Din (Yāqūt) died at Moṣul in the year 618 (A.C. 1221-2), at an advanced age. When he grew old, his penmanship changed (for the worse).

762 YĀQŪT AL-RŪMĪ THE POET

Abu 'l-Durr Yāqūt Ibn 'Abd Allāh<sup>1</sup> al-Rūmī (the Greek), surnamed Muhaḍḍhab al-Dīn (pure in religion), was the mawlā of a merchant named Abū Maṣṣūr al-Jilī. This celebrated poet, having studied the science (of law) and acquired extensive literary information, directed his genius to the composition of verses and attained proficiency in that art. When his talent raised him to distinction, he assumed the name of 'Abd al-Raḥmān. His place of residence at Baghdād was the Nizāmiyah College. In the Ḍhayl (or supplement to al-Sam'ānī's historical continuation), the author, Ibn al-Dubayṭī (No. 635) mentions him among the 'Abd al-Raḥmāns, and says: "He passed his early youth in Baghdād, where he learned by heart the sacred text of the Qur'ān, got some acquaintance with general literature and learned to write a good hand. He used to recite verses of his own composition, most of which consisted in blandishments addressed to his mistress and in the expression of his passion. All these pieces are on love-

---

1 The meaning of these names is explained at the beginning of the preceding article.

matters and are full of tenderness ; many people know them by heart." He (Ibn al-Dubayhī) then gives some passages of his poetry and mentions that one of them was recited to him by the author himself. It begins thus :

"O my two friends ! I swear that the night never got dark without inspiring the lover with desire or with folly."

The rest of the piece may be found in the Majmū'ah al-Ṣaghīr (the lesser compilation)<sup>1</sup>. Al-Rūmī's verses have got into general circulation and are sung to music. They are full of grace and tenderness. Here is one of his poems :

"If your tears cease to flow after the departure of those whom you love, all (the passion) that you affect to feel is false and counterfeit. How can you admit consolation or forget their images (seen in your dreams), now that their dwellings and native soil are deprived of their presence ? May God never afflict (us) with the departure of a tribe by whose removal full moons (handsome faces) and pliant branches (slender waists) disappeared from our eyes ! They set out and my heart followed in the track of their caravan ; all my provision of firmness was exhausted when they went away. Since they are gone, the earth never discloses its smiles (its flowers) ; the willow and the lotus-tree agitate their branches no more. On the morning of our separation care and sadness caused my tears to flow and lighted up a fire in my heart. All the waters of Noah's flood were (poured forth) from my eyes and the flames which the Friend of God encountered<sup>2</sup> raged within my bosom. If solid rocks could feel such sorrow as I endure for my beloved (the mountains of) Uḥūd and Lubnān (Lebanan) would shrink<sup>3</sup> before it ; Yadhbul would melt away under such pain as mine ; Ruḍwā would be shattered to pieces, and Thahlān would sink under the weight<sup>4</sup>. O thou whose splendid beauty holds me captive ! the sovereignty of thy

1 This work is not known.

2 According to the Qur'ān, sūrah 21, Abraham, the Friend of God (Khalīl Allāh) was cast by Nimrod into a fiery furnace and miraculously saved.

3 The true reading is evidently لجان.

4 Those are mountains of Arabia.

charms has shewed me no kindness. Be, however, as thou wilt ! no one shall ever replace thee in my affection. Thou art for me a limpid fountain, and my heart is parched with thirst."

Here is another of his poems :

"Who will bear to Baghdād the news of what I suffer for that maid and of the love I feel for her ? Who will bear my salutation to the Abode of Welfare! ? Breath of the zephyr ! carry the salutation of an ill-starred wretch to her who has harassed me and who heeds not the promises she made me. Describe to her a part only of the love with which she inspired me ; perhaps she may have pity on one who is borne down by passion and delirium. Declare in the public place of al-Zawrā (Baghdād) that I have there a fawn (a maiden) whose absence has driven sleep from my eyelids and whose beauty is marvellous ; when she departed, my firmness of mind departed also and, when she turned away, she turned me over to death. When she repelled me, sleep was repelled from my eyes, and, when she shunned me, the wine which I drank was mingled with tears. My life and death are in her hands ; she is for me paradise or hell ; she is the only fountain where I can calm my longing and allay my thirst. Her absence is my death ; her presence is, for me, life, happiness and the obtainment of my wishes. From her cheeks proceed the fires which consume me ; her slender waist is the cause of my emaciation, and her languishing eyes make me languish in sickness. You who blame me cannot but excuse me : the grace of her movements indicates sufficiently that I was forced to love her and adore her."

I heard many jurisconsults in Syria and 'Irāq recite a piece of his which they knew by heart and which began thus :

"O thou who excitest troubles in my bosom ! since thy departure, my body is emaciated through the love I bear thee and will never be restored to health until thou givest consent to my wishes by saying : 'Yes' O thou who, as often as censors have blamed my love, hast offered them my justification in (letting them see) thy flowing ringlets ! Tell me if my tyrant is authorized by

---

1 The Abode of Welfare (Dār al-Salām) was one of the names by which Baghdād was designated.

the Wajiz to slay me? It is said so in the Tahdhīb or the Shāmil? Does the Muḥadḍhab<sup>1</sup> say that a lover whose eyes are moist and whose tears flow in torrents deserves to be tormented? Have your seductive eyes told you it was lawful to take away our lives with glances whose magic is like that of Bābil<sup>2</sup>? ”

The piece contains more verses than these, but I have here given all that I am able to me recollect. A literary man recited to me, at Aleppo, some verses of Yāqūt al-Rūmī's, one of which was as follows :

“Art thou not sweeter in qualities than (all other) maids? why then dost thou dwell in heart which is a hell<sup>3</sup>? ”

He mentioned also that some of the Baghdād critics objected to this verse. I reflected on the matter and then said to him : “Fault was found with it perhaps in this particular that her being sweeter in qualities than the other maidens did not necessarily imply that she should not be in hell ; for she, being sweeter in qualities than they were, was not (to be counted as) one of them ; and what is denied is merely that the maidens should be in hell.” To this he replied : “You are in the right ! that is the very point in which they found fault with him<sup>4</sup>.” In the year 625 (A.C. 1227-8), I met at Arbela a man of eminent merit who related to me as follows : “I was in Baghdād, at the Nizāmiyah college, in the year 620, and, one day, I found this Abu 'l-Durr (Yāqūt) sitting at the door of that institution. I sat down beside him, and engaged in a conversation on literary matters. Whilst we were thus occupied, an elderly man, weak in body and in a very sorry plight, came up, leaning on a staff, and sat down near us. Abu-'l-Durr asked me if I knew who he was and, on my answering that I did not, he said : ‘That is the mamlūk (white slave) on whom his master, (the poet) Ḥayṣ Bayṣ (No. 241) composed these lines :

1 These are well-known treatises on law.

2 The inhabitants of Bābil were well-skilled in magic, as they had for teachers the fallen angels, Hārūt and Mārūt (Qurān, sūrah 2, verse 96).

3 The poet's idea is : my heart is filled with the flames of love and yet I bear you in it.

4 It is difficult to understand the objection and the author's explanation of it.

"Put on what cap<sup>1</sup>, what gown, what vest you please ; you cannot add to the love which I bear you. Less love than that which you are worthy of possesses already the totality of my heart ; if you wish to augment that (love) give (me) another heart (the one I have is insufficient to contain it)."

"I turned to look at the man, observing his appearance and reflecting on the state to which he was reduced. I searched for these two verses in the diwān of Ḥayṣ Bayṣ's poems, but was unable to find them. God best knows (if they be his) ! " Abu 'l-Durr left a diwān of poems which, as I am told, forms a small volume. I have never seen it, but have met with numerous verses taken from it. His verses are currently known in 'Irāq, in the province of the East (Mesopotamia) and in Syria ; so, what we have given may suffice. In the life of al-Khidr Ibn 'Aqil al-Irbālī (No. 205) we have inserted three verses of al-Rūmī's. Since the above was written, two copies of his diwān came into my possession, this was at Damascus, in the year 667 (A.C. 1268-9); the book is a small one, containing only ten quires (two hundred pages)—I read in a historical work of those later times, that Abu 'l-Durr (Yāqūt) was found dead in his lodgings at Baghdād, on the 12th of the first Jumādā, 622 (22nd May, A.C. 1225), but the people said that he had been dead for some days. Ibn al-Najjār (No. 5, note) mentions, in his History of Baghdād that Abu 'l-Durr was found dead in his room on Wednesday, the 15th of the first Jumādā of that year. He had left the Nizāmiyah and gone to reside in a house situated in the Darb Dinār al-Ṣaghīr (Lesser Dinār-street). It is not known at what age he expired but I am inclined to think that he was advanced in years<sup>2</sup>. Rūmī means belonging to the country of the Rūm (Greeks), which is a vast and celebrated region, filled with cities. This is a fit place for introducing a piece of curious information which is often needed and frequently asked for: The people of Rūm (The Greeks and the Romans) are designated also as the Banu 'l-Aṣfar (sons of the tawny one), and poets often employ this expression

1 For the meaning of the word شربش see Mr. Dozy's Dictionnaire des noms des vêtements des Arabes.

2 طامع is evidently the equivalent of طامع.

in their verses. 'Aqil Ibn Zayd al-'Abādi (No. 85, note) says, in one of his qaṣīdahs.

"The noble sons of al-Aṣfar, kings of al-Rūm, have left no remembrance of their deeds."

I frequently sought for the origin of this denomination, but could find no one capable of allaying the thirst I had (for that piece of information); till I at length met, by chance, with an old book entitled al-Laṣīf (the miscellany),<sup>1</sup> but, on which the name of the person who dictated its contents (i.e. the author) was not inscribed. I copy here a passage of it in which the narrator says: "Al-'Abbās informed me that he heard his father make the following statement: In the first period (of the empire), the king of the Rūm died<sup>2</sup>, leaving a wife. Rival chiefs aspired to the empire and great mischief was done between them. It was then agreed upon to take for their king the first person who would appear to them, and they held an assembly for that object. Now, a man had set out from Yaman for al-Rūm, taking with him an Abyssinian slave. He (the slave) ran away and appeared before them. 'See,' said they, 'into what we have fallen'! They married him to that woman, and she bore a son whom they named al-Aṣfar (the Tawny). The master (of the slave) remonstrated with them and the boy (the slave) said: 'He has spoken the truth! I am his slave.' They tried to appease him (the master) and made him gifts till he was satisfied. The Rūm were therefore called the Sons of the Tawny, on account of the yellowness of the child, who was the son of an Abyssinian and a white woman." God knows best<sup>3</sup>!

1 This work is no longer known.

2 Or, according to other readings, was torn to pieces, was burned.

3 The learned among the Musulmāns and some of our European orientlists have offered various solutions of this problem but none of their explanations is satisfactory. I am inclined to believe that the denomination Banu 'l-Aṣfar signified the sons of the emperor, and that it was given to the Greeks of the Eastern empire because their sovereign bore, amongst his other titles, that of Flavius, which had been transmitted by Vespasian to his successors. An interpreter, confounding Flavius with flavus, may have told the Musulmāns that this name signified yellow (aṣfar).

763 YĀQŪT AL-ḤAMAWĪ.

Abū 'Abd Allāh Yāqūt Ibn 'Abd Allāh, a Greek (of Asia) by origin and by birth, received the surname of al-Ḥamawī because he was enfranchised at Ḥamāt, and obtained that of al-Baghdādī because he made a residence in the city of Baghdād. He bore the honorary title of Shihāb al-Dīn (flambeau of religion). When a child, he was carried off a captive from his native place and sold at Baghdād, to a merchant named 'Askar Ibn Abī Naṣr Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Ḥamawī. His master sent him to school, with the intention of deriving profit from him later, in making him keep the accounts of his commercial transactions. This 'Askar could not write correctly and knew nothing except commerce. He inhabited Baghdād, got married there and had a number of children. When Yāqūt was grown up and had acquired some knowledge of grammar and literature, he was employed by his patron as a travelling clerk and, in that capacity, he went back and forward from Syria to Kīsh<sup>1</sup>*, 'Umān and the neighbouring countries. His master was then under the necessity of enfranchising him and turning him away, in consequence of a disagreement which took place between them. This happened in the year 596 (A. C. 1199-1200). Yāqūt then commenced copying books for a salary and, by their perusal, he acquired considerable information. At a later period, he received some (money) from his patron, who had taken pity on him, and was sent off by him on a voyage to Kīsh. Finding, on his return, that his benefactor was dead, he realized part of what was in his hands and gave to the widow and orphans wherewithal to satisfy them. The remainder served him as a trading capital with which he travelled to different countries, and part of it he employed in the book-trade. The lecture of some khārijite books impressed on his mind a considerable portion of the doctrines (professed by these sectarians) and he conceived a strong prejudice against 'Alī, the son of Abū Ṭālib. In the year 613 (A.C. 1216-7) he went to Damascus, and as he was sitting in one of the bāzārs, he got into a discussion with a partisan of 'Alī. In the course of the dispute, he was led to speak of 'Alī in a manner not to be borne and was assaulted so violently by the people that he was likely to be killed. Having got out of their hands, he fled from Damascus, but not before the governor of that city had received intelligence of what took place and given orders to arrest him. Search was made for him, but without success. He reached Aleppo where he stopped, full of apprehension and waiting to see how things would end. On the first third, or by another account, on the second third of the latter Jumādā, 613 (Sept. Oct., A. C. 1216), he left that city and went to Moṣul, whence he proceeded to Arbela and from that to Khurāsān. He avoided entering Baghdād, knowing that the person with whom he had the discussion was a native of that place and fearing to lose his life if his adversary mentioned and what he had said. On arriving in Khurāsān, he stopped there for the purpose of trading to the towns in that country, and fixed his residence at Marw (Meru). From that he proceeded to Nasā and then entered into the province of Khawārazm where he encountered the invading army of the Tartars. This was in the year 616 (A.C. 1219-20). Having barely escaped with his life, he fled as naked as when he shall be raised from the dust of the grave on the day of the resurrection and arrived at Moṣul, after suffering on the way such hardships and fatigue as would even tire a narrator before he could describe them all. Deprived of every resource, in want of even the vilest food and the coarsest clothing he remained for some time at Moṣul, and then went to Sinjār. From that he removed to Aleppo and, having taken lodgings in the caravansarai outside the city, he continued to reside there till his death. The date of this event we shall give farther on. I copied the following notes from the work compiled by the Abu 'l-Barakā Ibn al-Mustawfī (No. 528) and treating of the history of Arbela: Yaqūt arrived in that city, A.H. 617, in the month of Rajab, (Sept., A.C. 1220). He had been residing in Khawārazm but left it after the battle which took place between the Tartars and Muḥammad Ibn Tukush Khawārazm Shāh, the sovereign of that country. As he had previously been occupied in making historical researches, he composed a work in four large volumes and entitled: Irshād al-Alibbā ilā ma'rifat al-Udabā (Guide of the intelligent to an acquaintance with the learned). In the beginning of the work he says : "I have given in this work all the information I could obtain respecting the grammarians, the philologists, the genealogists, the eminent Qur'ān-readers, the relators of historical facts, the annalists, the booksellers of note, the writers of renown, the authors of such epistles as have been collected into volumes, the persons distinguished for the beauty of their mansūb<sup>1</sup> handwriting, and all those who composed or compiled works on literature. In this task, I aimed at concision, though unable to remain within the limits of brevity, and I spared no pains in determining the dates of the deaths and fixing the days and the hours of the births. I mention the works composed by them, the more interesting of the anecdotes concerning them; their origin, their genealogy and some of their poetry. (I compiled this work) during my travels in various countries and my intercourse with the inhabitants. The ishāds<sup>2</sup> I have suppressed except those which contain but a few names and which are easy to be learned; and, moreover, I did all in my power to have the exactness of these traditions certified by oral declaration and by the licences given to teach them. As it was my object to produce a small but useful work, I have indicated in it the sources whence I derived my information and the places where I found it: the books, for instance, composed by such of the learned as were considered sure authorities in these matters and on whose declarations all relied for the genuineness of these traditions." He (Ibn al-Mustawfī) then states that Yāqūt composed a work on the history of the poets both ancient and modern. Other works were written by Yāqūt, such as the Mu'jam al-Buldān (gazetteer of alphabetical lists of places<sup>3</sup>), the Mu'jam al-Shu'arā (biographical dictionary of poets) the Mu'jam al-Udabā (biographical dictionary of literary men), the Muṣhtarik waq'an wa 'l-Mukhtaliṣ ṣaq'an (a dictionary of geographical synonyms) which is a useful book, the Kitāb al-Mabdā wa 'l-Ma'al (the Commencement and the End), treating of history, the

---

1 The island of Kis is situated at the entrance of the Persian Gulf, opposite to Ormus.

* M. de Slane gives : Kīs.—Ed.

1 See No. 454, note.

2 See Introduction to Vol. I.

3 This and the Muṣhtarik are the only works of Yāqūt which I have met with. The Mu'jam al-Buldān forms the five or six volumes and contains much curious information. I understand that Mr. Wustenfeld has prepared an edition of it which is now (1865) in the press.

Kitāb al-Duwal (book of Empires), the collected sayings of Abū 'Alī 'l-Fārisī (No. 155), an 'Unwān (title or preface) to the Kitāb al-Aghānī (No. 415), the Muqtaḍib fi 'l-Nisab (selection of genealogies) containing those of the Arabian tribes, an account of al-Mutanabbī (No. 49) and a treatise entitled *Kitāb man lahu himmah etc**. (book for him whose high aspirations are directed towards the acquisition of knowledge)<sup>1</sup>. Al-Qāḍī 'l-Akram (the honourable qāḍī) Jamāl al-Dīn Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid al-Shaybānī al-Qifṭī (No. 510, note), who was Wazīr to the sovereign of Aleppo, states, in the Anbā 'l-Ruwāt fi Abnā 'l-Nuḥāt, that Yāqūt, on arriving at Moṣul, whither he had fled on escaping from the Tartars, wrote to him a letter in which he describes his situation and relates what passed between him and these invaders. It begins by the invocation of the divine name and the praises of God, after which, it continues in these terms: "Your mamlūk (humble servant) Yāqūt Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥamawī, wrote this letter from Moṣul in the year 617 (A.C. 1220-1), on his arrival from Khuwarazm whence he was driven by the Tartars whom God exterminate! (He sent it) to the presence of his sovereign lord<sup>2</sup>, the Wazīr Jamāl al-Dīn al-Qāḍī 'l-Akram Abū 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Yūsuf Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd al-Wahid al-Shaybānī al-Taymī (member of the tribe of Shaybān and descended from) Taym Allāh, who was the son of Shaybān, the son of Tha'labah, the son of 'Ukābah. May God cast his shelter around him and exalt his rank in the scale of domination<sup>3</sup>. (To him), who is, at the 1 The loss of these compilations is much to be regretted.

2 Literally: the master of his thralldom.

3 This long letter contains very little information and was evidently composed with the intention of displaying the great command of language possessed by the author. Its style, though laboured and excessively affected, is by no means remarkable for elegance, though the Wazīr Ibn al-Qifṭī and Ibn Khallikān have inserted it in their respective works. Nothing can be conceived more verbose and more jejune than this pompous epistle. It is almost needless to say that the copyists did not always understand it and have committed numerous faults in its transcription. Some of these errors I have rectified, but a few passages remain of which the text cannot be amended though the meaning be tolerably clear.

* According to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd: this is not the title of a book. The sentence means: He, i.e. Yāqūt, had high aspirations to acquire knowledge.—Ed.

present day, the wazir of the sovereign of Aleppo and al-'Awāṣim<sup>1</sup> (is addressed) this account of what has passed in Khuwārazm and of what has happened to the writer. (It offers) a slight indication of the manner in which he began and ended (his career) on taking leave of your (excellence). He shrank from the idea of submitting it to your appreciation such was his respect and veneration for your dignity and such his repugnance to offer you a document so unworthy of your exalted merit. But now, that a number of practitioners in the art of prose and verse have been informed of these (events) and have hastened, as I well know, to set them down in writing and to hurry in active competition towards the task of transmitting the knowledge of them (to future ages); now, that the generosity of him who holds me enslaved has, no doubt, unsealed, these (epistles) and assigned to their (authors) a high rank in his favour, I feel encouraged to present this (notice), to my (honoured) master and to a judgment which will shew how exalted it is by perusing it and treating its imperfections with indulgence. For (I am not a professed writer); every person who fingers dirhams should not be taken for a money-changer, neither is the man who acquires a pearl to be considered as a jeweller. Here follows my statement :

“In the name of God, the Merciful, the Clement! may God render durable, for the advantage of science and of those who cultivate it, for the prosperity of Islamism and its sons, the gift which He has conferred, bestowed and granted to enjoy, namely, the ample (and beneficent) shade of the lord wazir, whose partisans may God exalt whose glory and power may He redouble! whose ensigns and standards may He maintain victorious! whose pen may He long allow to run (on the surface of paper), so that it may direct towards all lands the flow of his donation! May He prolong his life and exalt his glory to the heavens, whilst He surrounds him with favours of which the freshness shall never fade and of which the number and the multitude shall never be restrained by limits. May his vigour and his sword never be broken! may the love which all bear him and the number of those who love him be never diminished ! God prolong his rule for the advantage of the world and of our religion ! so that he may repair their disorder, drive away their affliction, elevate their beacon and, by his salutary influence, enable them to leave a lasting impression. May his light shine forth, his blossoms open, his flowers brighten and his lustre be augmented ! May God extend the shade of his (the Wazlr's patronage) over the sciences and those who profess them ; over literature and those who cultivate it ; over the meritorious acts and those who practise them ; so that, by his well established bounty, he may exalt these (fair) structures, adorn their diadems with the finest jewels of his glory, embellish their duration with the mature (honours) of his exalted dignity, give them great importance for mankind by the loftiness of his views, and establish in the highest degree of merit their utility and their rank. By the efficiency of his orders he has exalted the influence of the Muslim states ; he presides as a guardian over the foundations which support the dogmas of the faith, he exalts those who defend them and abases those who attack them. By the excellence of his government he strengthens the arms<sup>1</sup> (of the true doctrine) and, by his well-directed efforts, he has smoothed for it the way to the attainment of its purposes. Thus, by the excellence of his administration, hath he become a brilliant star on the forehead of the age, and a model to be imitated by every man whom nature has formed for (the exercise of) justice and benevolence. Therefore shall he enjoy a fitting recompense as long as the two companions (light and darkness) shall subsist, as long as days and nights shall be renewed, as long as there shall be a sun to shine in the east, and a soul to rejoice at the prospect of conversing with his Excellence<sup>2</sup> !.

---

1 Al-'Awāṣim (the fortresses) was the name given to that part of ancient Cilicia which borders on the north of Syria.

After (these preliminaries), the humble slave (who writes this) exposes to (your) high and seigniorial dignity to (your) right honourable and exalted station, which God favour with happiness long to endure, brilliant with lustre, satisfying all our wishes and

1 The Arabic word signifies : the part of the arm on which the bracelet is worn.

2 Literally : his illustrious presence.

embellished with every mark of excellence<sup>1</sup>, a state of things the relation of which is rendered unnecessary by your lordship's quick intelligence, and for the elucidation and description of which, the clear judgment you are gifted with might dispense me from employing (indā) the pen. But, let it be sufficient for him (the wazīr) to recollect in what terms our blessed Prophet described the true believers: 'Certainly', said he, 'my people are fond of talking<sup>2</sup>'. This (letter) is (merely) a disclosure of the writer's sincere devotion (to you) as client, of the pride he feels in being an humble servant to (your) seigniorial presence and in being considered as such; for your quick genius suffices to prevent him from manifesting, out of what is laid up in his mind, sentiments which might have the appearance of adulation. Indeed, the proofs of your humble servant's zeal in the religious duty of clientship are evident to all the world, and the mark impressed on him by the stamp indicating the sincerity of his love for your honourable name is still apparent on the pages of time. So also is his faith in the sacred laws (of gratitude) imposed by that bounty (of yours) which, covering all the land, has rendered clearly visible, by its splendour, the edifice of noble deeds (which you erected). Your servant's repeating, in your praise, the recitals whose authenticity has been verified by personal experience, is well justified<sup>3</sup>. He summoned the people of all lands to assert with zeal in their faith in the supremacy of your (generosity, proofs of) which he has (often) received in his hand. Your friend, sincerely devoted to the belief in your superiority and especially distinguished by the intention of collecting all the scattered (recollections), all the (accounts) wide-spread (of your bounty), was accustomed to toil in the sweat of his brow; so that, at length, he rendered you a ka'bah of generosity towards which it was not necessary to prescribe the obligation of pilgrimage for those who were able to undertake the journey, neither was that duty incumbent on those who

---

1 Literally: with a white forehead and white pasterns. These were considered by the bedwin Arabs as marks of a good horse.

2 Literally: my people are speakers.

3 Literally: his recital of the traditions of glory, the isnāds of which are near (easy to be verified), is established by his personal observation.

possessed means, to the exclusion of the indigent and the way-worn traveller. All of them obtain (from you) a meed sufficient to fortify them, a portion adequate to their wants and on which they counted. The grandees have drawn from your source an abundant supply of noble deeds; the learned have found examples of merit in those persons who are attached to your service; the poor have received your letters of protection against the vicissitudes of time and the frowns of fortune; therefore have they prescribed as a sacred rite towards you, the saluting and the glorifying of your noble and illustrious character; the touching with their lips and the kissing of your generous hand. God is a witness that your humble servant, in his journeyings and sojournings, in private and in public, in conduct and in reputation, had always for his distinctive mark the custom of perfuming the assemblies of the worthy and the meetings of the learned with (the account of) the services which your Excellence has rendered and which were obtained from your generosity. He made it his pride (to speak of them) before all people, and thus prepare an embroidery for the discourse he was about to utter:

"When I, through cupidity, gave lustre to other men by my poems, I gave my verses lustre by the mention of your name."

They upbraid thee that they have embraced Islāmism. Answer: Upbraid me not with your having embraced Islāmism; rather God upbraideth you, that He hath directed you to the faith. Avow the fact if you can speak sincerely<sup>1</sup>. May God never debar us (the wazīr's) trusty friends, from the ample stock of His common favours, nor preclude us all, who are all his servants, from the constant flow of His gifts! O God! Lord of the expanded earth, of the exalted heavens, of the swollen seas and of the winds compelled to work (Thy will)<sup>2</sup>! hearken to my invocation and listen to my prayer! Help us up to that height in His favour which we desire to reach and which we hope to attain, through the merits of Muḥammad the Prophet and of his Companions and of his kindred!

1 Qur'ān, Sūrah 49, verse 17. The application of this verse is by no means clear.

2 The epithets here employed are taken from the Qur'ān.

When your humble servant left your noble presence and departed from the abode of unsullied glory and exalted merit, he intended to conciliate frowning Fortune and draw milk from the udder of this age, wicked and unruly as it is. For he was seduced by the idea that changing place—brings grace,—that passing into a foreign land—brings wealth to hand,—that dwelling with one's friends—disgrace and pain upon us sends,—and that the lover of home who stirs not apace,—is distanced in the race<sup>1</sup>.

"After stopping for a time in hesitation, I felt assured that death was preferable to poverty. So, I bade farewell to my family, whilst my heart was filled (with grief) and left my native land in the pursuit of wealth. My wife wept on our separation, and I said to her: 'Bear it with patience! death is surely better than a life of misery. I shall gain a fortune or die in a town where few tears will be shed over my grave.'"

Mounted on the steed<sup>2</sup> of hope, your servant rode off to a distant land, and placed his foot in the stirrup of peregrination with every company (that offered); he crossed the valleys and the hills till he nearly reached the Sudd<sup>3</sup>; but perfidious Fortune did not befriend him, neither did the times, now ran mad, treat him with kindness:

"Ask the nights and days to acknowledge their fault, they will not conceal that news".

I was like a mote in the eye of fortune or a bone in her throat; so, to get rid of me, she deluded me in promising to fulfil my wishes and finished by casting me into the snares of death:

"He stopped not long in any land before he set out for another; his person was with (his fellow-travellers) but his mind was far distant. One day, he was at Huzwā; another, at al-'Aqīq; another, at al-'Udhayb, and another, at al-Khulaysā. Now he

---

1 These are rhyming proverbs.

2 Literally: the camel's hump.

3 The sudd or barrier of Gog and Magog was supposed to exist on the west side of the Caspian sea.

went towards Najd and Āwinah (near) the valleys of al-Ḥuzūn, and then to the castle of Taymā'."

But, alas! after all these lessons of adversity, how far was I from the accomplishment of my wishes and the attainment of my desire! The frowns of ill-luck drew smiles from cruel time, and I ceased not to blame Fortune and reproach her with her errors, till, instead of getting wealth, I was satisfied in reaching home<sup>2</sup>. And during all that, your humble servant tried to pass away those days and to get over them; deluding himself with the hopes of sustenance, covering his head with the veil of endurance and self-denial, arrayed in abstinence and in scanty fare, but not resigned to the wearing of such clothing; your brother was forced and had not strength to resist<sup>3</sup>. He remained there, consoling himself in the society of his fellow merchants whose humours he could support and from whom he had no affronts to fear; he treated them with politeness and was happy to receive from them a pittance. Otherwise, no advantage could be expected from them and no harm could be feared:

"If I must absolutely have a family and a home, let it be in a place where I can have nothing to fear from those whom I meet, and they, nothing to fear from me."

My mind had once formed the thought of assuming high airs, of riding on a spirited horse, of seeing my ambitious desires come forth from the egg, fledged and winged, and of striking fire (drawing profit) from every steel, whether lavish or sparing of its sparks; (but now):

"Instructed by experience, I care not if people shun me and if I never receive nor make a visit. Never, whilst I live, shall I ask if the army has marched or if the general has departed'.

---

1 All those places are mentioned in the poems composed by the Bedwin Arabs and were situated in Arabia.

2 Literally: instead of booty I was content to return. A well-known proverb.

3 For the explanation of this proverb, see Freytag's Ma'ādat, Vol. I, p. 266.

The place where I stopped was called Marw al-Shāhjan, which (latter) word according to the explanation given by them means the soul of the sultān. I found there some works treating of the sciences and of literature, volumes composed by men of intelligence, and whilst I studied them, I forgot family and country, and thought no longer of sincere friends nor of my home. Amongst them I discovered some stray volumes which I had long sought for, and some works which I had ardently desired. To them I applied with the avidity of a glutton and, having assigned to them a place from which they could easily depart, I began to browse in these gardens, to admire the beauty of their form and of their contents, to let my eyes rove freely over these pasture grounds, to enjoy these detailed accounts, these compendiums, and to think that I should remain in that quarter till I became a neighbour of (those who repose under) the earth :

“When adversity attacks me with troops having sadness and expatriation in the van, I lay for them an ambuscade of which the two chiefs are a lamp and a book ; and I pass the night in relating of Fortune's character, things so wonderful that their truth would excite doubt. I dispel my cares by quiet, as the cares of others are dispelled by wine.”

(So things continued) till the catastrophe arrived by which Khurāsān was overwhelmed with ruin, with evil all-destroying and with desolation. Now, I declare on my life and by Allāh ! that it was a country beautiful in all its parts, charming in all its regions ; a fertile garden enjoying an air pure and languishing (mild), and in which the trees inclined their branches with delight at the singing of the birds. In it the rivulets shed tears whilst each flower smiled at the other ; the breath of the zephyr was sweet and the temperature of the climate healthy. Never shall I forget those delightful arbours and those trees sinking under (the weight of) their foliage. The southern gales bore thither its wine-skins filled with the liquor of the clouds ; the meadows drank the wine of the dew, and on the flowers were formed drops like pearls fallen from the string. When the thirst of its groves was quenched with that liquor, their odour was the intoxicating breath of the zephyr ; they drew near to each other, even closer than friend to friend, and embraced even more tenderly than lovers. In the intervals were seen anemonies whose colours were mixed with that of the love-sick wooer<sup>1</sup> and which resembled the lips of two maidens who draw near, one to the other, for the purpose of giving and receiving an affectionate kiss. Their aspect sometimes deceived the most intelligent (naḥrlr), so that he took them for burning coals (jumr) on which drops of water were poured successively in order to extinguish them (i'tilāf)<sup>2</sup>. There you saw the ox-eye flourish so brilliantly that the eye of the spectator is cheered at the sight, whilst its blossoms glittered like little cymbals of gold or like dinārs of that metal. Among them appeared the (white flowers of the) anthemis, shining like the teeth of the beloved when she bites the cheek of the lover. How rich (that land) in prospects which delight the eyes and of which the colours are charming (rā'iq). It is, in a word, and without exaggeration, a copy of Paradise; there was to be found all the heart could wish for, all that could enchant the sight. Encircled with its noble endowments, if offered, throughout all its tracts, a profusion of rich products to the world. How numerous were its holy men pre-eminent for virtue (rāqat kḥiyaruhu)! how many its doctors whose conduct had for motive the conservation of Islāmism! The monuments of its science are inscribed on the rolls of time; the merits of its authors have redounded to the advantage of religion and of the world, and their productions have been carried into every country. Not a man of solid science and sound judgment, but emerged like the sun, from that part of the East; not a man of extraordinary merit but took that country for his setting-place or longed to go and join its inhabitants. Every quality truly honourable and not factitious was to be found among them and, in (the garden of) their sayings, I was enabled to cull the roots of every generous impulse. Their children were men, their youths heroes, and their old men saints; the testimonies of their merit are clear; the proofs of their glory are manifest; yet, strange to say! the sulṭān who reigned over these provinces abandoned them with unconcern and said to himself: 'Take the open country<sup>1</sup>, or else you will encounter perdition'. So, he hastened off as a young ostrich runs away and, when he began to look about, where nothing was to be seen, he thought that he perceived a man or many men (in pursuit of him)<sup>2</sup>. How many gardens, springs of water, fields of corn, honourable stations and advantages which they enjoyed, did they leave behind! But Almighty God did not give the same unto another people<sup>3</sup> because He averted those saints from the station of the wicked. But He put them to the proof, and found them grateful; He afflicted them, and found them patient; so He caused them to join the company of the holy martyrs and raised them to the lofty stations of the virtuous elect. Yet perchance ye hate a thing which is better for you, and perchance ye like a thing which is worse for you; but God knoweth and ye know not<sup>4</sup>. The people of infidelity and impiety roamed through those abodes; that erring and contumacious race dominated over the inhabitants; so that those palaces were effaced of the earth as lines of wiring are effaced from paper, and those abodes become a dwelling for the owl and the raven; in those places, the screech-owls answer each other's cry, and in those halls, the winds moan responsive to the simoom. Old friends who enter there are filled with sadness; Iblis himself would bewail the great catastrophe:

1 The text is corrupt but the meaning appears to be that which is given here. I read shabaha with one of the manuscript.

2 That means: the colour of these flowers was red with dark spots.

"(It is now) as if no charming companion, handsome as a statue, had ever been there; as if princely chiefs, lions in bravery (had never resided there). Yet, in generosity, they were Ḥātims and sons of Māmāh<sup>5</sup>; if prudence were taken into count; they were

1 Literally: to the air.

2 For an account of Kuwwārazm-Shāh's flight before the troops of Jengeez-Khan, see Abu'l-Fedā's Annals. A.H. 617.

3 Qur'an, sūrah 44, verses 24, 25. These verses apply to the Egyptians who went forth in pursuit of the Children of Israel. God gave their possessions to another people; so says the Qur'an; but our author remarks that God did not leave those of the Khūrāsānis to the invaders, because He would not treat the Musulmāns like the people of Pharaoh.

4 Qur'an, sūrah 2, verse 213.

5 The generosity of Ḥātīm al-Tā'i is well-known; Ka'b Ibn Māmāh, one of the principal chiefs of the tribe of Iyād, was also noted for his liberality. See Freytag's Ma'tdant, t. I, p. 325, and Mr. Caussin de Perceval's Essai t. II, pp. 1, 13.

Ahnafs<sup>1</sup> and Sa'ds<sup>2</sup>. But time, in its vicissitudes, hath hurled them to destruction, so that fate is now a moral lesson fitted to make our hearts bleed and those of our posterity."

We belong to God and to God we shall return! It was an event sufficient to break the back, to destroy life, to fracture the arm, to weaken the strength, to redouble sadness, to turn grey the hair of children, to dishearten the brave, to blacken the heart and to stupify the intelligence. Then did your humble servant turn back and retrace his steps. Filled with grief, he sought a friendly retreat where his mind might repose in security (he fled), his heart beating, his tears flowing, his reason lost and his intelligence absent. It was with difficulty that he accomplished his purpose and arrived at Mosul, where he stopped, after encountering dangers, undergoing sufferings supporting misfortunes with resignation, diminishing his baggage and, more than once, running the risk of his life. For he passed through drawn swords, troops flying in disorder, ranks broken, blood spilt with impunity. Every time he got on a camel's saddle or crossed a desert, he had these words in his mouth<sup>3</sup>. 'In this journey we have met with misfortune, but, praise be to God Who has left to us the power of praising Him, and Who has conferred on us favours which surpass enumeration! In a word, if the term of my life had not been appointed for a later period, it would have been difficult for my friends to have said: 'The unfortunate man has escaped or is arrived'! and they would have struck their hands like people whose hopes have been disappointed; and he would have been joined to the millions of millions, or even more, who perished by the hands of the infidels. Then he would have left his dearest treasure to her who derives subsistence from his life:

"Fortune does not appreciate my worth; she knows not that I have strength of mind and can make light of the events brought about by time. Adversity passes the night in shewing how she can transgress against me, and I pass it in letting her see what patience is."

1 See (No. 277) and Freytag's Maydani t. I, p. 396.

2 Sa'd Ibn Hudhaym هذيم died some years before the introduction of Islāmism. He was so celebrated for his wisdom that the Bedwin Arabs used to take him for judge in their contestations. (D'Horbelot, Ribloth orientale.)

3 Literally: this was his distinctive mark.

Your humble servant now declares that he has no means of tranquilizing his mind, no promise by which to flatter his heart or his eyes, except in beguiling them with the hope that his afflictions shall disappear, once he stands in your noble presence.

"Enjoy good health, continue (to do so) and pass your days in pleasure ; for your existence will console (us all) for what is past and gone. You are the soul of glory, mankind is its body ; you are a pearl, and we (possessing it) regret not the shell".

Your humble servant is now residing at Moṣul and endeavouring to repair the harm done to him by this grave and disquieting event. He passes his time in the exercise of his profession, but Fortune is ready to say to him, in plain and intelligible language : 'By Allāh ! You have fallen into your old mistake !' For now, one object occupies his thoughts and, on my life and by Allāh ! that is nothing more than procuring a provision of books which he may transcribe and of (written) leaves which may serve him as companions ; — in that occupation, his toil is great and his profit small ; — then (he thinks of) travelling and resolves that, after accomplishing his task and attaining in some degree the object on which he has set his mind qarūnah, he will invoke Divine assistance and journey forth<sup>1</sup>. In the hope of accomplishing his wish ; namely, to appear in your presence, regale his sight, even for a single moment, with the aspect of your greatness, and then, casting away the staff of travel in your specious hall, repose under the shelter of your wing till he attain the hour which is to give him (everlasting) repose. He will take his place among your Excellency's servants, for such he always professed himself to be, even when far from your presence ; and if your Excellency take him by the hand, Fortune becoming indulgent, may exalt him after having cast him down. For, with his diminished strength, he is unable to accomplish his projects and incapable of entering the lists and encountering new hazards<sup>2</sup>. Besides the earth has now enclosed

---

1 Literally : ride on the direction of the road.

2 Literally : times ; i. e. vicissitudes of fortune.

his brethern in its bosom and the succession of days and nights has removed (most of) his contemporaries out of sight; grayness has settled on his beard; his means are insufficient for (the satisfying of) his wants; the falcon of hoary age has swooped at and seized on the raven (the black hair) of his youth; the daylight of prudence has invaded and repelled the night of ignorance; the services he rendered to his friends have been rapaid with evil<sup>1</sup>, and the brilliant garment of youth he has exchanged for the tattered cloak of hoary age:

"My youth departed and was ended before I enjoyed it since it left me I can only expect death. Old age precludes me from attaining what I seek for."

Your humble servant composed the following elegy in verse on the loss of his youth, but how little does it avail (ghanā) a man to weep for those who are deposited in the earth amongst mould-ering bones:

"Since my hair has turned gray, Fortune knows me no more, and the marks by which she is distinguished can no longer be recognised by me<sup>2</sup>. When my soul thinks of it (my youth), it yearns for it with longing desire and my eyes pour forth tears; till a time comes to embellish what has passed away and recollection supplies me with abundant sighs. Why not? since nought (lammā) remains in the bottom of my drinking-cup but a mere mouthful, filled with grounds. The contents of every goblet are clear at first, but in the bottom are found only a few drugs (muzjā-hum-āt) and some sediment'.

Your humble servant hopes that the above example of senile garrulity will obtain from you a glance of benevolence; for assuredly, the judgment of our lord and master, the Wazir, of him who is the asylum of the human race, from east to west, procures,

---

1 The word ghana which is not rendered in the translation, may perhaps signify: which is a case particular to him alone.

2 Or else: her favours are denials. The two words are also technical terms of Arabic grammar and, in that case, they signify: her definite (nouns, i.e. gifts) are, for me, indefinite; which may mean: I obtain them not.

when he applies, it, according to his glorious custom, an increase of rank and honour (for him who is the object of it. Receive my salutation”).

I have lengthened greatly this article, by the insertion of Yaqūt's epistle, but it was impossible to give it by extracts. My friend (sāhib) al-Kamāl Ibn al-Shi'ār al-Mawṣilī<sup>1</sup> writes as follows, in his work entitled 'Uqūd al-Jumān (clusters of pearls)': "Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Maḥmūd, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Najjār (No. 5, note) and the author of a history of Baghdād, spoke to me in these terms: 'The above mentioned Yāqūt recited to me the following three lines and told me that he had composed them on a young Turkish slave who, having inflamed eyes, wore a black veil to protect them :

"That Turkish youth whose face might be taken for a full moon shining in all its refulgence, shades his eyes with the border of a veil (lit. of a protector) to prevent their brightness from fascinating his admirers. But, by Allāh! since these eyes have wounded hearts through coats of mail, what is there to protect the protector! "

Yaqūt was born in the country of the Greeks (Asia Minor), in the year 574 (A.C. 1178-9) or 575". So says the author just cited. He died on the 21st of the month of Ramaḍān, 626 (13th August, A.C. 1229), in a Khān situated outside the city of Aleppo, as we have already mentioned towards the beginning of this article. He left his books as a waqf<sup>2</sup> to the mausoleum (mash-had) of al-Zaydī (?),* which, establishment is situated in Dinār street (Darb dīnār), Baghdād. He delivered them to 'Izz al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Athīr (No. 435), the author of the great historical work, and this shaykh carried them to their destination. When Yāqūt rose to distinction and got into reputation he changed his name into Ya'qūb. In the beginning of the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 626 (in the latter part of September, A.C. 1229), I arrived at Aleppo for the purpose of pursuing my studies. This was subsequent to Yāqūt's death; and I found every one speaking in his praise, extolling his merit and his great literary requirements. It was not therefore in my destiny to meet with him.

1 Abu'l Barakāt al-Mubārak Ibn Hamdān Ibn al-Shi'ār الشعار surnamed Kamāl al-Dīn al-Mawṣilī (belonging to Moṣul) composed a voluminous work on the poets of the seventh century of the Hijrah. He died A. H. 654 (A. C. 1256-7). (Hājji Khālifah Ghirbāl al-Zumān).

2 See (No. 21, note) and (No. 756, note).

* 'Abd al-Hamid gives : al-Masjid (the mosque) al-Zaydi.—Ed.

764 YAḤYĀ IBN MA'ĪN.

Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'īn Ibn 'Awn Ibn Ziyād Ibn Biṣṭām Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Murri, a native of Baghdād and a celebrated ḥāfiẓ, was a doctor of the highest authority, deeply learned and noted for the exactitude of his (traditional) information. He came, it is said, from a village situated near al-Anbār and called Naqiya.* His father was secretary to 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mālik<sup>1</sup>, or according to another statement, he was chief of the kharāj (or land-tax) offices at Ray. He left, on his death, a sum of one million and fifty thousand dirhams<sup>2</sup> to his son Yaḥyā. All this sum was spent by the latter in (collecting) Traditions, so that, at length, he had not a shoe to put on. Being asked how many Traditions he had written down, he answered: "I wrote down with my own hand six hundred thousand Traditions." Aḥmad Ibn 'Uqbah, the person who related this anecdote, said: "And I believe that the relators of Traditions had also written out for him six hundred thousand as much more." (When Ibn Ma'īn died) he left one hundred and thirty cases filled with books and four water-jar stands filled with them also. He was the great

---

1 "In the year 192 (A. C. 807-8) 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mālik marched with a body of ten thousand men against the Khurramiyah (the partisans of Bābak) who were stirring up troubles in Adl'arbā'ijūn. After killing and taking prisoners (many of the insurgents), he returned victorious."—(Nujūm.)

2 Upwards of twenty thousand pounds sterling.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Naqayāya.—Ed.

master in the art of improbation and justification<sup>1</sup>. The most eminent doctors learned Traditions from him and taught them on his authority. Amongst them were Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il al-Bukhārī (No. 543), Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj al-Qushayrī (No. 690), Abū Dāwūd al-Sijistānī (No. 254) and other ḥafīzes. A close fellowship and intimacy subsisted between him and Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19), and they studied together all the sciences connected with the Traditions. This is a fact so well known that we need not expatiate on the subject. He (Ibn Ḥanbal) and Abū Khaythamah<sup>2</sup> related Traditions on his (Ibn Ma'in's) authority, and were his contemporaries. 'Alī Ibn al-Madīnī<sup>3</sup> said: "In Baṣrah, the science (of the law and the Traditions) passed down to Yaḥyā Ibn Abī Kaṭhīr<sup>4</sup> and Qatādah (No. 516); in Kūfah, it reached Abū Ishāq (No. 477) and al-A'mash (No. 253); the science of Ḥijāz passed to Ibn Shihāb (No. 537) and 'Amr Ibn Dīnār (No. 249, note). All these six were at Baṣrah, and what they knew was transmitted to Sa'id Ibn Abī 'Arūbah<sup>5</sup>, Shu'bah (No. 207, note), Ma'mar<sup>6</sup>, Ḥammād Ibn Salamah (No. 112, note), and Abū

1 The science called Tajrīḥ wa ta'dīl (improbation and justification) had for object to determine the degree of credibility to which every witness in a court of law and every reporter of Traditions were entitled. For that purpose, it was necessary to study the life of the individual. The requisite points in a Traditionist were good conduct, piety, veracity, exactness and a retentive memory.

2 Abū Khaythamah, Zuhayr Ibn Ḥarb al-Nasā'i, an eminent Traditionist, was distinguished for learning and piety. Nasā' was his native place, but he travelled to many countries and afterwards settled at Baḥdād. He died in the month of Shabān, 234 (March, A.C. 849).—(Nujūm; Ḥuffāz.)

3 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh, surnamed Ibn al-Madīnī, was a Traditionist of the highest authority. He died at Madīnah, in the month of Dhū al-Qadah, 234 (May-June, A.C. 849).—(Nujūm; Ḥuffāz.)

4 Yaḥyā Ibn Abī Kaṭhīr al-Yamānī, named also Ṣāliḥ Ibn al-Mutawakkil, was a Traditionist of considerable reputation. He died A.H. 128 (A.C. 745-6), according to the author of the Nujūm; in the Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz, his death is placed a year later.

5 Abū 'l-Naṣr Sa'id Ibn Abī 'Arūbah a Traditionist of Baṣrah died A. H. 156 (A.C. 772-3), or 157.—(Kitāb al-Ma'ārif; Ḥuffāz.)

6 Ma'mar Ibn Rāshid al-Ḥarrānī al-Baṣrī, a Traditionist of good authority, died A. H. 152 (A. C. 769), or 153.—(Ḥuffāz.)

'Awānah<sup>1</sup>. At Kūfah the heads of the science were Sufyān al-Thawri (No. 248) and Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249); in Hijāz its head was Mālik Ibn Anas (No. 524); in Syria, its head was al-Awzā'i (No. 336). The knowledge possessed by these passed to Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq (No. 586) Huṣḥaym (No. 84, note) Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'id (No. 586, note) Ibn Abī Zā'idah, Waki' (No. 149, note), Ibn al-Mubārak (No. 300), who was the most learned of them all, Ibn Mahdi<sup>2</sup> and Yaḥyā Ibn Ādam<sup>3</sup>. The united knowledge of them all passed to Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in." Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal declared that every Tradition which was not known to Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in was not a (true) Tradition. He said also: "There is in this place a man whom God created for the purpose of exposing the falsehood of lying Traditionists;" and the person whom he meant was Ibn Ma'in. "Never," said Ibn al-Rūmi<sup>4</sup>, did I hear any one except Ibn Ma'in speak equitably of the shaykhs (the Traditionists); others fall upon them in their discourse, but Yaḥyā (Ibn Ma'in) would say: 'I never saw a man make a mistake without my casting a veil over his fault or trying to excuse him; and I never reproached a man, to his face, with anything that might displease him; I preferred pointing out to him, in a private conference, the mistake into which he had fallen and, if he did not take my observations well, I left him there'." He used also to say: "I wrote down (quantities of Traditions) under the dictation of liars, and made use of the paper for heating my oven; I thus obtained (at least one advantage), bread well baked." He sometimes recited these lines:

"Wealth gained by lawful or unlawful means will all disappear, leaving nothing behind but the iniquities it wrought. The devout

1 The ḥafiz Abū 'Awānah al-Waḍḍāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh, was a member, by enfranchisement, of the tribe of Yaṣṣḥkur. He died at Baṣrah in the month of the 1st Rabī' 176 (June-July, A. C. 792).—(Nujūm; Ḥuffāz).

2 Abū Sa'id 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Mahdi, an inhabitant of Baṣrah and a ḥafiz of the highest authority, died in that city, A. H. 198 (A.C. 813-4), at the age of sixty-three years.—(Nujūm; Ḥuffāz).

3 The ḥafiz Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā Ibn Ādam ۞ was a Traditionist of the highest authority. He died A. H. 203 (A.C. 818-19).—(Ḥuffāz).

4 The Ibn al-Rūmi here mentioned speaks of Ibn Ma'in as if he had conversed with him and could appreciate his merit. He cannot therefore be the poet of that name (see No. 438), who was only twelve years of age when Ibn Ma'in died.

man does not really fear God unless he gains honestly what he eats and drinks. (His heart) concealed within him should be pure, as also the work of his hands, and his words should be employed only in virtuous discourse<sup>1</sup>. Thus hath the Prophet spoken in the name of the Lord, so, the blessing of the Lord and His salutation be on the Prophet”.

Al-Dāraquṭnī (No. 409) mentions Yaḥyā Ibn Ma‘īn as one of those who delivered Traditions received by him orally from al-Shāfi‘ī (No. 532). In our article on the latter, we have spoken of Ibn Ma‘īn’s conduct towards him and of what passed, on that occasion, between Ibn Ma‘īn and the Imām Aḥmad (Ibn Ḥanbal). Ibn Ma‘īn heard also Traditions delivered by ‘Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak, Sufyān Ibn ‘Uyaynah and others of the same class. When he made the pilgrimage which he frequently did, he used to go to Makkah, in passing through Madinah. The last time he went, he visited Madinah on going and, on his return, he stayed there three days. Having then set out with his fellow-travellers, he stopped with them at the first halting-place in order to pass the night, and he had a dream in which he heard a voice call out to him, saying! “O Abū Zakariyā! dost thou then dislike my neighbourhood<sup>2</sup>?” When the morning came, he said to his companions! “Continue your journey; as for me, I return to Madinah”. They did so, and he went back to that city where he passed three days and then died. His corpse was borne to the grave on the bier which had been made use of at the Prophet’s burial. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) says, in his History of Baghdād, that Ibn Ma‘īn’s death took place on the 23rd of Dhu ‘l-Qa’dah, 233,* but he is certainly mistaken, as I shall here prove: Ibn Ma‘īn went to Makkah and made the pilgrimage, after which, he returned to Madinah and there died. But how is it possible that a man who has made the pilgrimage could die, the same year in the month of Dhu ‘l-Qa’dah<sup>3</sup>? Had the Khaṭīb said that he died

1 This hemistich may also be rendered thus: his discourse should consist in Traditions only.

2 Muḥammad’s tomb is at Madinah.

3 The pilgrimage takes place in Dhu ‘l-Hijjah, the month which immediately follows Dhu ‘l-Qa’dah.

* 29 June, A.C. 848.—Ed.

Dhu 'l-Hijjah, the thing had been possible. Some persons suppose that the mistake was committed by the transcriber of the work, but I found, in two copies of it, that the passage is the same as we have just given. It is therefore difficult to admit that the error proceeded from the copyist. Further on, the same author says that he died before accomplishing the pilgrimage. In that case, the date which he gives might pass for correct; but I since met with a historical work entitled: Kitāb al-Irshād fī ma'rifat 'Ulamā il-Bilād (the directory, containing information respecting the learned men of all countries), and compiled by the ḥāfiẓ Abū Ya'la 'l-Khalil Ibn 'Abd Allāh, Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Khalil al-Khalilī<sup>1</sup> and, in it I read that Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'in died on the 22nd of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, in the year above mentioned (28th July, A.C. 848). From this it appears that he did make the pilgrimage. The Khaṭīb states also that he was born in the later part of the year 158 and then adds: "He died at the age of seventy-seven years, wanting ten days". This cannot be, as will be found of the calculations be made. In another historical work I read that he lived to the age of seventy-five years. God knows best! The funeral prayer was said over the body by the governor of Madinah and was afterwards repeated several times. Ibn Ma'in was buried in the Baqī' cemetery. When they were carrying him to the grave, a man preceded them, crying out: "This is he who expelled falsehoods from the Traditions left by the Prophet of God." A Traditionist composed on his death an elegy in which he said:

"He is departed, that learned man who corrected the faults of every Traditionist, cleared up the contradictions in the isnāds, and dissipated the doubts and ambiguities which perplexed the learned of all countries".

The word معين must be pronounced Ma'in. Biṣṭānī has an i after the b; remarks on the other letters are needless; I read in a historical work that Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'īn was the grandson of Ghiyāth, the son of Ziyād, the son of 'Awn, the son of Bisṭām, who was a mawlā of al-Junayd Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ghaṭafānī al-Murri, the same who governed Khurāsān in the name of the Umayyad Khalīf Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. The genealogy given at the beginning of this article is that which is generally accepted as the more correct. Murri means belonging to the tribe of Murrah, who was a descendant of Ghaṭafān, being the son of 'Awf Ibn Sa'd Ibn Dhubyān Ibn Baghīḍ Ibn Rayth Ibn Ghaṭafān. It is a large and famous tribe. A great number of Arabian tribes bear this name. Al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) says, in his Ansāb: "نَبَا" may be pronounced Naqiyā or Naqayā. It is the name of a village near al-Anbār. From it came Yaḥyā Ibn Ma'īn al-Naqayā'i". The Khaṭīb says that the Pharaoh was a native of this village; God knows best!

---

<sup>1</sup> Abū Ya'la 'l-Khalilī's work treated of the persons who transmitted Traditions. He composed another work bearing also the titles of Irshād and containing a history of Qazwīn, his native place. As a ḥāfiẓ, he held a high reputation. He died in the latter half of the fifth century of the Hijrah (A. C. 1059-1106).—(Ḥājī Khalīfah; Huffāz.)

765 YAḤYĀ IBN YAḤYĀ.

Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā al-Laythī was the son of Yaḥyā, the son of Kaṭhīr, the son of Wislāsīn or Wislās, the son of Shammāl, the son of Manghāyā. He drew his origin from the Masmūdah, a Barbar tribe which had contracted clientship with the (Arabian) tribe of Layth. He, for that reason, bore the appellation of al-Laythī. His grandfather, Abū 'Isā Kaṭhīr, the first of the family who passed into Spain, fixed his residence in Cordova. It was there that he (Yaḥyā) heard (the lessons) of Ziyād Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Ziyād al-Lakhmī, surnamed Shabaṭūn†, who was a

1 I follow the orthography of one MS. and of the printed text of Maqqarī's Spanish History. Abū 'Abd Allāh Ziyād Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Lakhmī, generally known by the name of Shaba ṭūn was a native of Cordova and a doctor of the rite of Mālik. It was he who first introduced into Spain the system of jurisprudence drawn up by that imām and who taught there the Muwaffā (No. 524, note). Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the second Umayyad sovereign of Spain

(Continued on page 219)

* نَبَا in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

† 'Abd al-Ḥamīd gives: Basabṭūn and its variation as Sabaṭūn in the margin.—Ed.

native of that city and the person who (there) knew best by heart and could dictate the contents of the Muwaṭṭā composed by Mālik Ibn Anas (No. 524). He heard also Traditional information delivered by Yaḥyā Ibn Muḍar al-Qaysī, a native of Spain. At the age of twenty eight years he travelled to the East and learned perfectly the Muwaṭṭā under the dictation of Mālik, with the exception of some paragraphs, belonging to the chapter which treats of the spiritual retreat<sup>1</sup>. Not being sure of having heard these passages well, he learned to repeat them correctly under the direction of Ziyād. At Makkah he heard (Traditional information delivered by) Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249) and, in Miṣr (Old Cairo) he received lessons from al-Layḥ Ibn Sa'd (No. 523) 'Abd Allāh Ibn Wahb (No. 302) and 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Qāsim (No. 337). After attending assiduously the lessons of Mālik and profiting greatly by his tuition, he studied the law under the principal disciples of that imām, both those of Madīnah and those of Miṣr. Mālik used to call him the 'āqil (or intelligent man) of Spain. His motif for doing so is thus related: Yaḥyā was, one day, at Mālik's lecture with a number of fellow-students, when some one said: "Here comes the elephant"! All of them ran out to see the animal, but Yaḥyā did not stir. "Why", said Mālik, "do you not go out and look at it? such animals are not to be seen in Spain". To this Yaḥyā replied: "I left my country for the purpose of seeing you and obtaining knowledge under your guidance; I did not come here for the purpose of seeing the elephant." Mālik was so highly pleased with this answer that he called him the 'āqil of the people of Spain. Some time after, Yaḥyā returned to Spain and, having become chief (of the 'ulamā) he propagated throughout all that country the system of law drawn up by Mālik. It was accepted by immense multitudes, wished to have him for a qāḍī at Cordova, but could never obtain his consent. Ibn Ziyād died A.H. 204 (A.C. 819-20), or 193, according to another statement. It was by his advice that Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā travelled to the East for the purpose of studying under Mālik.—(Gayangos's Maqqari, (Vol. II, p. 100, et seq).

---

(Continued from page 218)

1 The spiritual retreat (i'tikāf) consists in remaining some days and nights successively in a mosque and passing that time in prayer, fasting and meditation.

and the number of persons who taught the doctrines which they had learned from him was very great. The best edition<sup>1</sup> of the Muwaffā and that which has the greatest reputation was given (orally) by Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā. By his rectitude and piety he obtained the highest respect from the amirs (the men in power) and acquired great influence over them; such was his self-denial, that he scrupulously avoided accepting any office under government. The elevated rank which he held (in public estimation) was much superior to that of a qāḍī, and his refusal, through religious motives, to accept such an office gave him more influence over men in power than any qāḍī could possess. The Spanish writer, Abū Muḥammad 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad, generally known by the surname of Ibn Ḥazm (No. 423), says: "Two systems of law were at first promulgated by persons in power and high station: that of Abū Ḥanīfah (No. 738) and that of Mālik. Abū Yūsuf Ya'qūb, the disciple of Abū Ḥanīfah,"—we shall give his life,—“being appointed (chief) qāḍī, acquired, the right of nominating all the others, and there was not a city, from the far east to the most distant of the African provinces, in which he did not establish, as a qāḍī, one of his own disciples or one of those who professed his doctrines. Here, in Spain, we adopted the system of Mālik for the following reason: Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā was in high favour with the ṣulṭān, and his advice in whatever concerned (the nomination of) qāḍīs was always followed. So, no qāḍī, was ever appointed to act in any part of the Spanish provinces till Yaḥyā had given his opinion and pointed out the person whom he preferred. He never designated any person for that office except one of his own disciples or of those who followed his doctrines. Now, as all men hasten towards that which is advantageous for them in the world, they adopted willingly what they hoped would conduce to their interest. I must add that Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā never filled the duties of a qāḍī and would never consent to accept such a place. This line of conduct served to augment his influence with the men in power and disposed them to follow more readily his advice”.

<sup>1</sup> Literally: recital. The contents of those classical works were taught orally, the professor knowing them by heart.

The following anecdote is related by Aḥmad Ibn Abi 'l-Fayyād<sup>1</sup> in the work composed by him: The Amīr 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Ḥakam, surnamed al-Murṭadā<sup>2</sup> and the (fourth) Umayyad sovereign of Spain, convoked, by letter, the juriconsults into his presence, and they all went to the palace. It was in Ramaḍān, (the month of strict abstinence), and he, happening to look at one of his concubines whom he loved passionately, was so much excited (by her beauty) that he lost all self-command and had commerce with her. He then regretted deeply what he had done and consulted these doctors respecting the mode of manifesting his repentance and expiating his sin. Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā replied: 'A sin of that kind can be expiated by a fast of two consecutive months'. As he had hastened to give this opinion (fatwā) before the others had time to speak, they kept silent, but, on leaving 'Abd al-Raḥmān's presence, they spoke to each other of what had passed and then said to Yaḥyā: 'What prevented you from giving a fatwā conformable to the doctrine of Mālik?' That imām said 'He who sins thus has the choice of manumitting (a slave) or giving food (to the poor), or of keeping a fast'. To this he answered: 'Had we opened to him such a door as that, he would satisfy his passion every day and repair his fault by freeing a slave. So I imposed on him the severest penalty in order to prevent him from relapsing'. When Yaḥyā left Mālik, with the intention of returning to his native country, he went to Miṣr and found there 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Qāsim, who was occupied in making a written compilation of the doctrines which he had learned from Mālik. (On seeing this collection) he resolved on hastening back and hear Mālik himself treat the questions which Ibn al-Qāsim had enregistered. He therefore travelled (to Madinah) a second time and, finding, on his arrival, that Mālik was very ill, he stayed with him till he expired. After attending the funeral, he returned to Ibn al-Qāsim, who recited to him the

1 This author is not mentioned by Ḥājjī Khalifah and al-Maqrūbī merely informs us that the subject of his work was historical. According to an indication given by Ibn al-Aṭṭar in his Kāmil, it contained information respecting the Abbāsid dynasty. See Mr. Dozy's Historia Abbadidarum, II<sup>d</sup> part, p. 34

2 This is a mistake; his surname was al-Muzaffar doctrines such as he heard them from Mālik's own lips. Abu 'l-Walid Ibn al-Faraḍī (No. 326) mentions that fact in his historical work, with some other particulars of the same kind. When Yaḥyā Ibn Yāḥyā returned to Spain, he became the paragon of the age and had none to equal him in that country. He was a man of great intelligence. Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Lubābah<sup>1</sup> said: "The (great) jurisconsult of Spain is 'Isā Ibn Dīnār<sup>2</sup>; its most learned man is 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ḥabīb<sup>3</sup>, and its most intelligent man is Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā." Yaḥyā, being suspected of having had a share in the (great) revolt<sup>4</sup>, fled to Toledo and then solicited a letter of protection, which was granted to him by the Amīr al-Ḥakam. He then returned to Cordova. "Never", said Aḥmad Ibn Kḥālīd<sup>5</sup>, "since the time of the introduction of

1 Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn Lubābah (لبابه), a native of Spain, a teacher of Mālikite jurisprudence and a Traditionist, died A.H. 314 (A.C. 926-7).—(Gayangos's Maqqari, and the Arabic edition of the same work.)

2 According to al-Maqqari, this 'Isā Ibn Dīnār was a jurisconsult and composed a work entitled al-Ḥidāyah (the guide)? He left Cordova during the reign of Ḥishām Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, the second Umayyad sovereign, and travelled to the East, where he studied the law under Mālik.

3 Abu Marwān 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ḥabīb was a native of Cordova and one of the Spanish doctors who travelled to the East for the purpose of studying under Mālik. He contributed to the introduction of that imām's doctrines into Spain. Al-Dabbī places his death in the month of Dhū 'l-Ḥijjah 239 (May, A. C. 854). See Casiri's Bibliotheca Arabica Hispanica, t. II, p. 138. According to the authority followed by Mr. de Gayangos' (Maqqari, vol. I, p. 343) he died at Cordova, A.H. 238, after composing not less than one thousand works or treatises on various subjects.

4 This is the famous revolt of the suburb (rabaḍ) of Cordova which took place A.H. 198 (A.C. 814), under the reign of al-Ḥakam Ibn Ḥishām. A full and exact account of this event, which led to the conquest of Crete by these suburabians (Rabaḍis), is contained in Mr. Dozy's Historie des Musulmans d'Espagne, t. II, p. 68 et seq.

5 Aḥmad Ibn Kḥālīd, a doctor of the law and a Traditionist, was a contemporary of Ibn Lubābah (see note 1 above). The Umayyad sovereign 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāsir esteemed him so highly that he had him brought to Cordova and lodged in one of the houses belonging to the mosque near the palace. He allowed him a daily ration of provisions and made him considerable presents. The enemies of Ibn Kḥālīd reproached him for accepting these favours, and he composed a work in vindication of his conduct.—(Maqqari, Arabic text, vol. II, p. 158).

Islāmism, did any of the learned in Spain enjoy such good fortune, such influence and such a reputation as Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā". Ibn Baṣḥkuwāl (No. 206) says, in his Historical work: "The prayers which Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā addressed to God were always fulfilled. In his appearance, dress and manner of sitting he greatly resembled Mālik. It is related that he said: 'I (one day) went to take hold of the stirrup of al-Layth Ibn Sa'd (No. 523), and his servant boy tried to prevent me, on which he addressed to me these words: 'You shall have all the learned men for servants': and that I have lived long enough to witness." The same author adds: "Yaḥyā Ibn Yaḥyā died in the month of Rajab, 234 (Feb., A.C. 849). His tomb is situated in the cemetery of the 'Abbāsids, and prayers are offered up at it in times of drought." This cemetery lies outside Cordova. Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydi* (No. 590) informs us, moreover, that he died on the 22nd of that month. Abu 'l-Walīd Ibn al-Faraḡī states that his death took place in 233, or, by another account, in 234 and in the month of Rajab. God knows best. Wislās or Wislāsin is a Barbar word which signifies he hears them<sup>1</sup>. Shammāl is pronounced with an a after the sh and a double m. Mangḥāyā signifies a killer in Barbar<sup>2</sup>. We have already spoken of the words Laythī (No. 481) Barbar (No. 15) and Māsmūdah, (No. 662).

766 YAḤYĀ IBN AKTHAM.

Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā Ibn Aktham Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Qaṭan Ibn Sam'an Ibn Muḥannaj al-Tamīmī al-Usayyidi al-Marwazī (a member of the tribe of Usayyid, which was a branch of that of Tamīm, and a native of Marw) drew his descent from 1 The word islāssin is barbar and signifies he heard them.

2 In Barbar, the root anḡh or enḡh انغ signifies to kill. A killer or murderer is designated by the words inigh or inḡhān. The same root appears in the name of Mangḥāyā, which, however has not a Barbar form, * 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: al-Mahdī.—Ed.

Akṭham Ibn al-Ṣayfi, the judge of the Arabs<sup>1</sup>. He was learned in the law and sagacious in his judgement. Al-Dāraquṭnī (No. 409) mentions him as having been one of al-Shāfi'i's (No. 532) disciples, and the Khaṭīb (No. 33) says, in his History of Baghdād: "Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham was untainted with heresy and followed the doctrine professed by the people of the Sunnah (the orthodox). He heard (Traditions) from 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak (No. 300), Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249) and others". We have already related, in our article on Sufyān, what passed between Yaḥyā and that doctor. "Traditions were delivered on his authority by Abū 'Isā al-Tirmidhī (No. 587) and others". Ṭalḥah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far<sup>2</sup> said of him: "Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham was a man of note in the world; his proceedings and his history are well known; neither the great nor small are ignorant of his merit, his learning, the high authority which he held and the skill with which he minded his own interest and those of the khalifs and sovereigns who were his contemporaries. He possessed an extensive knowledge of jurisprudence, great literary acquirement, singular skill in the conduct of affairs<sup>3</sup> and the talent of surmounting difficulties". He obtained such influence over al-Māmūn's mind that no one could surpass him in that khalif's favour. Al-Māmūn himself was versed in the sciences; so, when he knew the character of Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham and perceived that he held the highest station in learning, he set his whole heart on him and went so far as to appoint him to the office of qāḍī 'l-quḍāt<sup>4</sup> and confide to him the administration of his subjects. The wazīrs charged with the direction of public affairs took no decision without submitting

1 Akṭham Ibn Al-Ṣayfi, a chief of the Tamīm tribe, was so highly renowned for his wisdom, that the Arabs of all the tribes used to take him for judge in their contestations. He died towards the fifth year of Muḥammad's preaching, having then attained a very advanced age. (See Mr. Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, t. II, p. 579; Ibn al-Jawzī; Ibn Durayd.)

2 Ṭalḥah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far was one of the witnesses who signed the Khalif al-Muṭṭi's (المطيع) abdication. This took place A. H. 363 (A.C. 974). (Nujūm).

3 The Arabic word is المعارضه but one of the MSS. has المعارضه. If this reading be adopted, the meaning is speaking with elegance.

4 The qāḍī 'l-quḍāt (qāḍī of qāḍis or lord chief justice), resided in the capital and had all the other qāḍis under his jurisdiction.

it to Yahyā for his approval. We know of no person's having ever obtained such complete influence over the mind of his sovereign except Yahyā Ibn Yahyā (No. 765) and Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād (No. 31). A person, noted for speaking with great elegance, being asked which of the two, Yahyā Ibn Akṭham or Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād, was the better man, he answered in these terms: "Aḥmad was grave with his concubine and with his daughter; Yahyā was gay with his adversaries and his enemies; Yahyā was untainted with heresy and followed the orthodox doctrine, whilst Aḥmad was quite the contrary." In our article on Aḥmad we have said some words of his religious belief and of his partiality for the Mu'tazalites. Yahyā was heard to say: "The Qur'ān is the word of God, and whoever says that it is created should be invited to abandon that opinion; and if he do not, his head should be struck off." The jurisconsult Abu'l-Faḍl 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Uḡhnuhī<sup>1</sup> surnamed Zayn al-Dīn, mentions, in his treatise on the partition of hereditaments (farā'id), the problems designated by surnames<sup>2</sup>, and, amongst them, that one which is called the Māmūniyan (al-Māmūniyah) and which is the fourteenth in order. It runs thus: (A person died, leaving) father and mother and two daughters. Before the inheritance was shared (between them) one of the daughters died, leaving (as survivor) the other persons specified in the problem<sup>3</sup>. It was called the Māmūniyan for the following

1 Abu 'l-Faḍl 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Al-Uḡhnuhī, a doctor of Shāfi'ite jurisprudence, was a native of Uḡhnuh, a village near Arbela, in Ādharbā'ijān. He studied the law at Baḥdād and composed, on the farā'id, or partition of inheritances, a work of great repute. He afterwards returned to Uḡhnuh where he died in the first fifth of the sixth century. (A.H. 501-520; A.C. 1107-1126). (Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi'īn; ms. of the Bibl. imp. ancien. fonds. no 861).

2 In the science which treats of the partition of inheritances, some problems occur which are so remarkable that each of them is distinguished by a particular name; such, for instance, as the Akḍarian, the Gharvūryan, the Malikiyan, the Ḥimāriyan, etc. On this subject the reader may consult the 6th volume of Dr. Perron's translation of Sidi Kḥalīl's treatise on Mālikite jurisprudence. This work is included in the collection entitled Exploration Scientifique de l'Algérie.

3 The parents and the two daughters were, each of them, entitled to a certain portion of the inheritance; but, as one of the daughters died before the partition, her share was to be divided among the survivors. In this case, two separate calculations must be made.

reason : (The Khalif) al-Māmūn wished to find a man fit to act as a qāḍī and hearing of Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham's talents, he had him sent for. Yaḥyā, being introduced, saw clearly that the khalif disdained him on account of his low stature; on which he said : "Commander of the faithful ! it is for my learning that you require me and not for my stature, ask me a question." Al-Māmūn proposed to him the one above mentioned and Yaḥyā answered : "Commander of the faithful ! was the person who died first a male or a female?" The khalif perceived immediately that he was acquainted with the problem and appointed him qāḍī. In this problem, if the first who died was a male, the two questions (to which it gives rise) can be resolved by (dividing the inheritance into) fifty four (equal parts); and if the first who died was a female, the grandfather (of the daughters), could not inherit in the second case (that is on the death of the daughter) because he is a father of a mother (the maternal grandfather ; and the questions (involved in the problem) can both be resolved by (dividing the inheritance into) eighteen parts<sup>1</sup>. The Khaṭīb says in his History of Baḡdād : "Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham was nominated as qāḍī of Baṣrah at the age of twenty years or thereabouts. The people of that city found him look so young that they asked each other of what age he might be. Yaḥyā, being informed of this, spoke (to them) as follows : 'I am older than 'Attāb Ibn Asīd<sup>2</sup> whom the Prophet sent to act as a qāḍī in Makkah ; I am older than Mu'ādh Ibn Jabal<sup>3</sup>, whom the Prophet sent to act as a qāḍī for the people of Yamān ; and I am older than Ka'b Ibn Sūr<sup>4</sup>, who was sent by 'Umar Ibn al-

1 For the rules of inheritance partitions, see Dr. Perron's Sidi Khalil, vol. VI; D'Ohsson's Tableau general de l'Empire Othoman, V., p. 288, and the Note sur les successions musulmanes, which was drawn up by Mr. Solvet and inserted in Mr. Bresnier's Chrestomathie arabe.

2 'Attāb Ibn Asīd, a member of the Umayyad family, was appointed governor of Makkah by Muḥammad. He died A. H. 13 (A. C. 634), the same day as Abū Bakr. (Kitāb al-Ma'ārif).

3 Mu'ādh Ibn Jabal, of the tribe of Khazraj, was a native of Madinah and one of Muḥammad's companions. He died A.H. 18 (A. C. 639), aged thirty-eight years.—(Mu'ārif)

4 Ka'b Ibn Sūr belonged to the tribe of Azd. He joined the party of 'Ayyūb and lost his life at the battle of the Camel, A.H. 36 (A.C. 656).—(Mu'ārif).

Khaṭṭāb to act as a qāḍī for the people of Baṣrah'. In making this answer he produced his own justification". The Prophet nominated 'Aṭṭāb Ibn Asīd, qāḍī of Makkah, on the taking of that city, and he ('Attāb') was then twenty-one years of age, or twenty-three, according to another statement. He became a Muslim on the day in which Makkah was taken, and addressed these words to the Prophet: "I shall be your Companion and never quit you"; on which the Prophet said to him: "Would you not consent to my appointing you over the family of God"? 'Attāb continued to act as their qāḍī till he died. (The Khaṭīb) adds: Yaḥyā remained a year without receiving any one as a (competent) witness<sup>1</sup>. One of the amīns (syndics of corporation) then went to him and said: "O Qāḍī! you have put a stop to all proceedings and made too long a delay<sup>2</sup>. 'How so'? said Yaḥyā. 'Because', said the amīn, 'you who are the qāḍī will receive no one as a witness'. In consequence of this remonstrance, he authorised, that very day, seventy persons of the city to act as witnesses". Another author states that Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham was appointed qāḍī of Baṣrah in the year 202 (A.C. 817-18). We have already mentioned, in the life of Hammād Ibn Abī Hanīfah (No. 195) that Yaḥyā succeeded Ismā'il, the son of that Hammād, in the *qāḍī*ship of Baṣrah. 'Umar Ibn Shabbah (No. 466) relates in his Kitāb Akhlāb al-Baṣrah (History of Baṣrah) that the *qāḍī*ship of Baṣrah was taken from Yaḥyā in the year 210. Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr<sup>3</sup> relates as follows: "We were with al-Māmūn, on our way to Syria, when he ordered a proclamation to be made declaring mut'ah (temporary) marriages to be lawful. On this Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham said to me and Abu 'l-'Aynā (No. 617) 'Tomorrow morning, early, go both of you<sup>4</sup> to him and, if you find an opportunity of speaking (to him on the subject) do so; if 1 According to the Muslim law of testimony, none but persons noted for integrity and piety can be received either as witnesses in a court of justice or as witnesses to bonds and deeds.

2 I read تربت.

3 This person is not known to the translator.

The regular and incorrect form غدا, employed here instead of اغدو, is worthy of remark.

not, remain silent till I go in.' We went there and found him with a toothpick in his hand and exclaiming, in a violent passion : 'Two mut'ahs occurred in the time of the Prophet of God and in that of Abū Bakr ; and shall I forbid the practice ? Who are you, vile scarabee ! to dare forbid me to follow what was practised by the 'Prophet of God and by Abū Bakr ' ? On this, Abū 'l-'Aynā made me a sign and said : 'Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr ! that is a man who is capable of attributing to 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb what he has just said ; how can we speak to him<sup>1</sup> ? ' So we held our peace. Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham then came in and sat down. We sat down also, and al-Māmūn said to him : 'Why do I see you look so troubled ? ' Yaḥyā answered : 'Commander of the faithful ! it is with grief for a novelty introduced into Islāmism.' 'What novelty ? ' said the khalif. Yaḥyā replied : 'A proclamation has been made declaring mut'ah marriages lawful, declaring fornication lawful.' 'Fornication ? ' exclaimed al-Māmūn. 'Yes ; mut'ah is fornication ! ' On what authority do you say so ? ' 'On that of the book of Almighty God and of a declaration made by His Prophet. God said : Now are the true believers happy, and so forth to the words : and those who keep themselves from carnal knowledge of any except their wives or the (slaves) whom their right hands possess ; and who so coveteth any (woman) beyond these, they are transgressors<sup>2</sup>. Commander of the faithful ! a mut'ah wife—is she a woman possessed by the right hand (a slave) ? ' The khalif answered : 'No ! ' 'Is she a wife who can inherit and be inherited of lawfully in the sight of God ? a wife bearing legitimate children ? one whose marriage is regulated by lawful conditions ? ' The khalif answered : 'No'. 'Then', replied Yaḥyā, 'whoever passes these two limits is a transgressor. Commander of the faithful ! there is al-Zuhri (No. 537) who related on the authority of 'Abd Allāh and al-

1 The text of this passage is corrupt. The edition of Būlāq inserts وقال before رجل and two manuscripts read نكحه instead of بكحه. I believe the right reading to be قال محمد بن علي وقال محمد بن علي and, as such, I adopt it. The reading ياجعل instead of راجعك is given by the edition of Būlāq and one of the manuscripts.

2 These verses are to be found in the beginning of the twenty-third sūrah of the Qur'ān.

Ḥasan, the sons of Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥanafiyah (No. 533) that they heard their father declare that he heard 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālīb say : The Prophet ordered me to proclaim that mut'ah marriages were forbidden and unlawful, after he had authorised them. Al-Māmūn then turned towards us and said : 'Is it well ascertained that this Tradition came from al-Zuhri ?' We replied : 'It is, Commander of the faithful ! a number of Traditionists have related it, such as Mālik (No. 544), to whom God be gracious !' On hearing this, he exclaimed : 'God forgive me ! proclaim that mut'ah marriages are forbidden !' and a proclamation to that effect was immediately made." The qādī Abū Ishāq Ismā'il Ibn Ishāq Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Hammād Ibn Zayd Ibn Dirham al-Azdī, who was a doctor of Mālikite jurisprudence and an inhabitant of Baṣrah, said, in speaking of Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham and extolling his merit : "He one day did to Islāmism a service the like of which no man ever rendered to it before". Yaḥyā's works on jurisprudence are excellent, but so voluminous that they are neglected by readers. He composed some treatises on the fundamentals of jurisprudence and published a work against the people of 'Irāq (the Ḥanafites) to which he gave the title of al-Tanbīh (the warning). He had frequent discussions with Dāwūd Ibn 'Alī (No. 210). When he was a qādī, a man went up to him, and the following dialogue ensued : "May God preserve you ! how much should I eat" ? Yaḥyā replied : "Enough to get over hunger and not enough to attain satiety". "How long may I laugh ?" "Till your face brightens, but without raising your voice." "How long should I weep ?" "Weeping should never fatigue you, if it be through fear of God". "What actions of mine should I conceal ?" "As many as you can". "What are the actions which I should do openly ?" "Those which may serve as examples to good and virtuous men whilst they secure you from public reprobation." On this, the man exclaimed : "May God preserve us from words which abide when deeds have passed away<sup>2</sup> ! " Yaḥyā was the most acute of men and the most

1 Ismā'il Ibn Ishāq was appointed qādī of Baḡhdād, A.H. 262 (A.C. 875-6). —(Nuḡm.)

2 The reading followed here is قول قاطن و عمل ضائع, which phrase signifies: "Word abiding and deed transitory."

skilful in the management of affairs. I read in a miscellany that Aḥmad Ibn Abi Khalīd al-Aḥwal (No. 4, note), al-Māmūn's wazīr, was standing, one day, in the presence of his sovereign when Yaḥyā came forth from a closet to which he had retired and stood (also in the khalif's presence). "Come up", said al-Māmūn. He went up and sat with him on the sofa, but at the farthest end of it. Aḥmad then said: "Commander of the faithful! the qāḍī Yaḥyā is for me a friend to whom I confide all that concerns me, but he is changed from what he used to be for me." On this, al-Māmūn said: "O Yaḥyā! the ruin of a sovereign's prosperity is caused by the misintelligence which arises between his ministers. No one can equal you or Aḥmad in my esteem; what then is the motive of this mutual distrust?" Yaḥyā replied: "Commander of the faithful! I declare, by Allāh! that my feelings towards Aḥmad are even more friendly than what he said; but he, seeing the rank which I hold in your favour, fears that, one day or other, I may turn against him and disserve him in your mind. I prefer telling this to you openly, so that he may be relieved from his apprehensions, and I declare that even if he injured me to the very utmost, I should never speak ill of him in your presence." "Is that the fact?" said the khalīf to Aḥmad. He replied: "It is so". Al-Māmūn then exclaimed: "God protect me from you both! I never met with men more shrewd and more intelligent than you. No vice could be reproached to Yaḥyā except a certain inclination which was attributed to him and of which he had the reputation<sup>1</sup>; but God best knows how he may have been in that respect. The Khaṣīb (No. 33) states, in his History of Baghdād, that Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal (No. 19) being informed, of the imputations cast on Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham's character, exclaimed: 'Good God! who can say such a thing?' and denied the fact in the most positive manner. It is related, moreover, that the jealousy borne to Aḥmad was excessive. He was acquainted with a great number of sciences and, when he had a conversation with any one and found him skilled in jurisprudence, he questioned him on points relative to the Traditions and, if he discovered that he knew Traditions by heart, he would propose to him some grammartical difficulty; then, if he found that he was acquainted with grammar, he would question him on scholastic theology; and all that for the purpose of confounding the man and bringing him to a stand. A very intelligent native of Khurāsān, who knew by heart many Traditions, went to see him one day and was drawn by him into a discussion. When Yahyā discovered that he was versed in a variety of sciences, he asked him if he knew any Tradition which had served as a fundamental principle of Jurisprudence. The other replied: "I learned from Sharik (No. 270) that Abū Ishāq (No. 477) told him that al-Hārith<sup>1</sup> related to him that 'Ali caused a pederast to be lapidated." Yahyā, on hearing this, stopped short and addressed not another word to the man. The Khatib then relates that Yahyā received a visit from the two sons of Mas'adah<sup>2</sup>, who were extremely handsome. When he saw them walking across the court of his house, he recited extempore these lines:

---

<sup>1</sup> This innuendo is more than sufficiently explained, a little farther on.

"O you who have left your tents to visit me! may God grant you both long life with His blessing! Why have you come to me when I am unable to do either the lawful deed or the deed forbidden. It saddens me to see you stand before me and to have nothing to offer you except fair words".

He then made them sit down before him and kept them in amusing chat till they went away. It is said that he was dismissed from the qādīship on account of these verses<sup>3</sup>. I read in a miscellany that Yahyā Ibn Aktham was jesting, one day, with al-Hasan Ibn Wahb, the same person of whom we have spoken in the life of his brother Sulaymān (No. 259) and who was then a boy. In playing with him, he tapped him on the cheek and, perceiving that he was displeased, he recited these lines:

"O full moon, whose cheek I tapped and who, highly offended, turned away from me in anger! If a scratch displeased you

1 Al-Hārith Ibn Qays was one of the Ṭabī'īs, or disciples of Muḥammad's Companions.

2 One of these brothers was perhaps the 'Amr Ibn Mas'adah whose life is given in this work (No. 482).

3 These verses have most certainly a double meaning: the expressions employed in them being very equivocal.

or a bite, wear always, my master, a veil (to conceal your face). Let not those locks appear as a temptation, nor let their ringlets cover your cheeks, lest you slay, the wretched, or tempt the anchorites, or leave the qāḍī of the Muslims in torment."

Aḥmad Ibn Yūnus al-Ḍabbī relates as follows: "The kātib Ibn Zaydūn, who was an extremely handsome youth, was writing under the dictation of the Qāḍī Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham when the latter pinched his cheek. He felt much confused, blushed and threw away the pen. 'Take up your pen,' said Yaḥyā, 'and write down what I am going to say to you.' He then dictated to him"—the above mentioned verses. The following anecdote was related by Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il al-Ṣaffār<sup>1</sup>: "I heard Abū'l-'Aynā say, at one of Abū 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad's (No. 610) sittings, (or conferences): I was<sup>2</sup> at one 'Abū 'Āṣim' al-Nabīl's sitting, and Abū Bakr, the son of Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham, began to pull about a young slave who was there. The boy cried out; Abū 'Āṣim asked who was that man? and, being informed that it was Abū Bakr the son of Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham he said: If he be guilty of theft, his father hath been also guilty of theft heretofore<sup>3</sup>." This anecdote is given by the khatīb, in his History of Baghdād. The same author relates, in that work, that al-Māmūn asked Yaḥyā who was the author of this verse:

"A qāḍī who considers fornication as meriting corporal chastisement, and thinks a worse crime no harm."

Yaḥyā replied: "Does the Commander of the faithful not know by whom it is?" "I do not", said the khalīf. "Well", said Yaḥyā, "it was uttered by that profligate, Aḥmad Ibn Abī Nu'aym," the same who said:

1 Abū 'Alī Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṣaffār, the same Traditionist of whom mention is made in the life of Abū Sulaymān al-Kharrābī (No. 148), died A.H. 341 (A.C. 952).—(Nujūm).

2 Abū 'Āṣim al-Laḥāk al-Shaybānī, surnamed al-Nabīl (the genius), was a Traditionist of the best authority and a native of Baṣrah. He died A.H. 212 (A.C. 827-8), or 213, at the age of ninety-one years.—(Nujūm, ʿIṭabaqāt al-Iḥfāz).

3 This is an application of the seventy-seventh verse of the twelfth sūrah of the Qur'ān, which refers to Joseph and Benjāmin. Abū 'Āṣim substituted in it the words his father in place of one of his brothers. For the theft committed by Joseph, see Sale's note on this verse.

'I think that tyranny will never cease as long as the nation is governed by an 'Abbāsīd.'

The narrator says that al-Māmūn was confounded, and that, after a moment's silence, he gave orders to have Aḥmad Ibn Abi Nu'aym banished to Sind. These two verses belong to a piece which I shall give here :

"Fortune, which reduced me to silence, now permits me to speak of the afflictions which have kept me so long astounded. Cursed be Fortune for exalting some men and depressing others ! May that nation never prosper,—that nation which deserves to suffer lengthened adversity and lasting perdition ! If it consent to undergo the administration of Yaḥyā, of a man who is incapable of ruling it ; a qāḍī who considers fornication as meriting corporal chastisement and thinks a worse crime no harm. He would judge in favour of his smooth-faced fondling and give sentence against Jarīr and 'Abbās'. God protect us ! justice hath disappeared and little honesty is to be found with mankind. Our amīr takes bribes : our judge acts like the people of Lot, and our head (the khalīf) is the worst of rulers. Did religion prosper and flourish, every just measure would be taken for (the welfare of) the people ; but I am sure that tyranny will never cease, as long as the nation is governed by an 'Abbāsīd."

I am inclined to think that this piece contained more verses than what are inserted here, but these are all which the khatīb gives. The Amālī (or dictations) drawn up by Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-Qāsim al-Anbārī (No. 616) contains an anecdote which I shall now insert : "The qāḍī Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham said to a person whom he admitted into his familiarity and with whom he was accustomed to jest : 'Tell me what you heard the people say of me'. The other replied : 'They say nothing of you but what is good. 'Nay', said the qāḍī, 'I do not make you this question for the purpose of obtaining from you a certificate of morality.'

---

1 This verse seems to mean that the qāḍī would prefer the society of a vile minion to that of poets such as Jarīr (No. 127) and al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf (No. 297). The whole piece is very obscure, as it contains expressions and allusions which can only be explained by conjecture.

The man then answered: 'I never heard them accuse the qāḍī of any thing except an irregular inclination.' Yaḥyā laughed and said: 'I ask God's pardon for all the sins of which I am accused except that which you have mentioned<sup>1</sup>, (for I never committed) it.' " Abu 'l-Faraj al-Iṣbahānī (No. 415) relates, in his kitāb al-Aghānī, a number of similar anecdotes concerning Yaḥyā. He says also: "Al-Māmūn, having frequently heard imputations of this nature cast upon Yaḥyā, resolved on putting him to the test and invited him to a private interview. He then said to a young mamlūk (white slave) who was a Khazarian by nation and remarkably handsome: 'You alone shall attend us, and, when I go out, do not leave the room.' When they met in the sitting-room and had conversed together for some time al-Māmūn retired as if on some necessary occasion and, having left the slave with Yaḥyā, he concealed himself in a place whence he could see what would happen. The slave, whom he had told to jest and make sport with Yaḥyā, did what he was ordered, and the khalīf well knew that Yaḥyā would not dare to take liberties with the boy. Having then heard Yaḥyā say: 'Were it not for you (who seduced us) we should have been true believers!' "<sup>2</sup> he came into the room and recited these verses:

"We hoped to see justice made manifest, but that hope was followed by disappointment. How can the world and its inhabitants prosper, if the chief qāḍī of the Muslims acts like the people of Lot?"

The kātib Abū Ḥakīmah Rāshid Ibn Ishāq Ibn Rāshid, who was the author of these verses, composed a great number of pieces on Yaḥyā. In the article on al-Māmūn which al-Mas'ūdī has given in his Murūj al-Dhahab, will be found some anecdotes concerning Yaḥyā; we abstain from inserting them here because they are of the same kind as those just mentioned. A story is told of Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abi Sufyān which greatly resembles the one we have just related of al-Māmūn's asking who was the author of a certain verse and of Yaḥyā's replying by another verse taken from the same poem. When Mu'āwiyah Ibn Abi Sufyān the Umayyad

1 The true reading is: المشهور عنا غير .

2 Qur'ān, Sūrah 34, verse 30.

was laid up with the malady of which he died, he suffered so greatly that his life was despaired of, and one of 'Alī Ibn Abī Talīb's sons, whose name I do not recollect, went to make him a visit. Mu'āwiyah rallied all his strength and sat up in his bed, in order to receive him and not give him the gratification of seeing how ill he was. Being too weak to hold himself up, he at length leaned back upon a pile of cushions and recited this verse:

"I rally all my strength, so that those who are ready to rejoice at my sufferings may see that I am a man whom misfortune cannot overcome."

The son of 'Alī immediately rose from his seat and went out, reciting this line:

"When death grasps you in its clutches, you will find all your amulets of no avail."

The persons present admired greatly this repartee. The verses here mentioned are taken from a long Qaṣidah which was composed by Abū Dhuwayb Khuwaylid Ibn Khālīd al-Hudhālī (the Hudhālīte)<sup>1</sup> on the death of his sons, five of whom were carried off, in one and the same year, by the plague. They had fled from their native place with their father and were going to Egypt. Abu Dhuwayb died on his way to that country, or, by another account, on his way to Ifrīqiyah (North Africa), whither he was accompanying 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr. I have since read, in the ninth chapter of Ibn al-Habbāriyah's (No. 650) Falak al-Ma'ānī*, that al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abī Ṭalīb, went to visit Mu'āwiyah during his illness, and that the latter said to his attendants: "Prop me up (with cushions)" and then recited the verse of Abū Dhuwayb's applying it to his own case. Al-Ḥasan†

1 Abū Dhuwayb Khuwaylid Ibn Khālīd was a member of the tribe of Hudhāyl. He went to Makkah, with the intention of seeing Muhammad, but, on arriving, he found him dead. In the Khilāfat of 'Umar, he accompanied an expedition sent against the Greeks and died in that campaign. According to another statement, he died on his way to Makkah, when 'Uthmān was Khalīf. He was said to have been the best poet of the tribe of Hudhāyl, which was also the most poetical of all the Arabian tribes—(Suyūṭī's Shawāhid al-Mughnī.)

* Falak al-Maghānī in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

† Al-Ḥusayn in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

saluted (on entering) and then repeated the other verse. God knows if this be exact. Abū Bakr Ibn Dāwūd al-Zāhiri (No. 578) relates the same anecdote in his Kitāb al-Zuharah and attributes the reply to al-Ḥasan, the son of 'Alī. I must here observe that neither Ibn al-Habbāriyah nor al-Zāhiri mention that Mu'āwiyah was in his last illness when this happened, and such could not possibly have been the case, because al-Ḥasan died before Mu'āwiyah, neither could al-Ḥusayn have been present at Mu'āwiyah's death, for he was then in Ḥijāz and Mu'āwiyah breathed his last in Damascus. I since found, towards the beginning of the work entitled Kitāb al-Ta'āzi (book of consolations) and composed by Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Mubarrad (No. 610) that this scene passed between al-Ḥusayn and Mu'āwiyah. It was probably from this work that Ibn al-Habbāriyah took his account of it. An anecdote of a similar kind is related of 'Aqīl, the son of 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib: Having abandoned his father*, he joined the party of Mu'āwiyah, who received him with great kindness and treated him with the highest honour; but that was merely for the purpose of annoying 'Alī. After the murder of 'Alī, Mu'āwiyah remained sole possessor of the supreme authority, and, finding 'Aqīl's presence becoming irksome, he began to say in his presence things that might offend him and oblige him to go away. One day, at a levee where all the most eminent of the Syrian (Arabs) were assembled, Mu'āwiyah said to them: "Do you know who was the Abū Lahab of whom God (in his Qur'ān†) spoke in these terms: "The hands of Abū Lahab shall perish?" The Syrians answered that they did not. "Well," said he, "Abū Lahab was the paternal uncle of that man," pointing to 'Aqīl. He had no sooner pronounced these words that 'Aqīl said: "Do you know who was Abū Lahab's wife, of whom God said: And his wife also, the bearer of faggots, having on her neck a rope made of palm-tree fibres?" † They answered that they did not: "Well", said he, "she was the paternal aunt of that man", pointing to Mu'āwiyah. The fact was that Umm Jamil, Mu'āwiyah's aunt

---

* The correct version should be: 'Aqīl, the son of Abi Ṭālib, having abandoned his brother. M. de Slane's rendering is an error.—Ed.

† Qur'ān, sūrah 111.

and the daughter of Ḥarb Ibn Umayyah Ibn 'Abd Shams Ibn 'Abd Manāf, was the wife of Abū Lahab 'Abd al-'Uzzā and the person who is indicated in the sūrah of the Qur'ān. It was really a silencing answer. An anecdote similar to the foregoing is told of a certain king who laid seige to a city. He had with him an immense army of cavalry and infantry, with provisions in abundance. He sent a letter to the lord of the city, advising him to surrender the place or else he should be attacked. In this letter he spoke of his numerous troops and the great quantity of munitions which he had brought with him, and in it he inserted this passage of the Qur'ān: Until they came to the valley of the ants; and an ant said: "O ants! enter into your dwellings lest Solomon and his forces treat you under foot and perceive it not!" The lord of the city, having received this epistle, pondered over it for some time and then read it to his officers. "Who", said he, "can return to that a proper answer?" One of the secretaries replied: "Let these words be written to him: And he smiled, laughing at its words."<sup>2</sup> This answer was approved of by all present. An anecdote of a similar kind is thus related by Ibn Rashīq al-Qayrawānī (No. 157), in his Anmūdḥaj: 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Muthānnā al-Ṭūsi, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Muwaddib, belonged to a family of al-Mahdiyyah<sup>3</sup> and was a native of Qayrawān. He had some reputation as a poet but led a wandering life, being always in search of minerals and the philosopher's stone. His manner of living was very miserable and parsimonious, as he spent (in chemical operations) whatever he was able to gain. Having left this country with the intention of going to Sicily, he was taken prisoner, at sea, by the Christians (Rūm) and remained a long time in captivity. Thiqat al-Dawlah Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Qudā'i, the prince of Sicily, having concluded a truce with the Christians, obtained that all the captives should be sent to him. Ibn al-Muwaddib, who was one of the number, recited to Thiqat al-Dawlah a poem in which he extolled his merit and thanked him for what he had done. Not receiving, in return, a gift adequate to his expectation and being inordinately desirous (of obtaining money) he spoke (to that amir on the subject) and was most importunate (in his demands)<sup>1</sup>. At that time, he was living concealed in the house of an al-chemist with whom he was acquainted, and remained there a long while. Having then gone out (one night) in a state of intoxication, with the intention of purchasing sugar-plums (to eat with his wine), he was arrested before he was aware and carried before the chief of the shurṭāh (police guards), by whom he was conducted to governor. "You good-for-nothing fellow!" said the latter, "what is this I hear of you?" The poet replied: "A pack of lies! may God protect our lord the amir?" The prince then asked him who it was that said in one of his poems:

1 Qur'ān, sūrah 27, verse 18.

2 This is the continuation of the foregoing verse.

3 Al-Mahdiyyah is a seaport town in the province of Tūnis.

"The man nobly born is always plagued by scoundrels<sup>2</sup>."

The poet replied: "It was the same person who said:

"The enmity of poets is the worst of acquisitions." "

The prince remained silent for some time and then ordered him a sum of one hundred rubā'īs<sup>3</sup>; but, fearing that he might again be irritated against him and punish after pardoning, he expelled him from the city. The lines cited here are the second hemistichs of two verses belonging to that qaṣidah of al-Mutanabbi's (No. 49) which rhymes in na and which he composed in praise of Badr Ibn 'Ammār. It begins thus:

"Love takes away from the tongue the faculty of speech, and the complaints which give most solace to a lover are those which he utters aloud."

It is well-known poem. The verse to which the first hemistich belongs is as follows:

"Impose silence on that adviser who, in accusing me, leads you into error. The man nobly born is always plagued by scoundrels."

---

1 This passage may also signify; He discoursed (on alchemy) and searched with great ardour (the philosopher's stone).

2 Literally: by sons of fornication.

3 I can discover nothing precise respecting the value of the coin called rubā'i, which word, in Arabic means A quadruple.

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid gives: Dinārs.— Ed.

The second verse is this :

"The complots of fools turn against themselves, and the enmity of poets is the worst of acquisitions."

Having mentioned the name of Thiqat al-Dawlah, we shall give here a poem composed in his praise by Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muḥammad al-Tanūkhī, generally known by the appellation of Ibn Qāḍī Milāh (the son of the Qaḍī of Milāh). The poet recited it to him on the festival of the Sacrifice. This qasīdah, which is so remarkable for its originality, was not to be found complete, but I at length discovered a copy of it written on the cover of a book. Till then, I knew only a part of it and never heard of any person's knowing more. As it is so fine a poem and so rare, I have decided on giving it here :

"Love and my afflicted heart cause my tears to flow, whilst my eyes gather (a harvest of) that passionate desire which is imposed (on every lover). True it is that I am called towards that object which I wished to avoid and from whose abode I had departed; it is a soft-voice gazelle (maiden) adorned with ear-rings who invites me. Hers are the large, dark eyes, the languishing glances, (the waist so slender that it leaves) the girdle empty, and the bracelet holding firmly (to the arm). The brackish water flowing from her country; is (for me) sweet-tasted, and its cold winds shed genial mildness. What makes me despair of our meeting are the dangerous grounds which intervene and in which (even) the nocturnal breeze (loses its force and) dies. The jealous spy abstains from sleep lest he should see, in a dream, (my) union effected (with her whom I love). He passes the day regretting that, though our dwelling-place was near (to him), his inattention prevented him from seeing what had passed. The atmosphere gives us to expect a thunder-cloud, pouring down its showers and whose lightnings, like yellow serpents, glance around. When it appeared and the thunder howled, and the eyelids of the black cloud shed their waters. I was like a man stung by a scorpion; the thunder was the incantation of the serpent charmer, and the mizzling rain was the saliva which he blew from his mouth; so great were the sufferings I endured. By that was recalled to my mind the recollection of (my beloved)

Rayyā and of what I had forgotten ; I now remember (all), but that redoubles my affliction. When we met in the sacred territory (of Makkah), Rayyā rejoiced our hearts by the cry of labbayka (here I am at your call) ; our camels then roamed freely ; I looked at her, whilst the humps of the camels were dropping blood<sup>1</sup> and she said (to her female companions) 'Does any one of you know that young man ? his gazing at me so long makes me uneasy. When we are in march, he walks on a line with us, and when the camels' feet cease to move, he also stops.' I then said to her two companions : 'Tell her that I am smitten with love for her' and they replied : 'We shall manage (to do so) cautiously.' Say also to her : 'O Umm 'Amr ! is not this (valley of) Minā ? wishes made in the vale of Minā are never disappointed (tukhlafu). It was for me an omen (tafāltu) of your fulfilling your latest promise, when you let me see, as if by accident, the tips of your fingers dyed with ḥinnā. In 'Arafāt, I find what informs (me) of a favour I shall obtain ; that of your hearts inclining towards me. The (traces left by the) blood of the victims will always serve to guide us, even when my reason is absorbed in converse with love. The kissing of the sacred stone will announce to me the approach of good fortune and of a time favourable to our love.' They bore (her) my message and she said, in smiling : 'The words of augury are deceptive. On my life ! did I not tell you both that he arrays his discourse in the embroidered robe of eloquence ? Trust as little as you can to his insidious words and say (to him) : 'Thou shalt know, to-day, which of us is the better augur. You hoped, in (the valley of) Minā, to obtain your wish, and, when in that vale, you injured my reputation. Our pilgrim's sacred garment has announced that we are forbidden to meet and that I shall refuse to grant what you desire. There (is my answer). And, when I cast the pebbles, that should have informed you of my removal, by a distant journey, from the dwellings where you reside. Take care lest I disdain you, on the night of the departure ; it will be quickly done, but the persons skilled in augury are few.' Never did I see two such 1 Literally : were like noses dropping blood. The camels intended to be sacrificed were marked with an arrow stuck into the hump.

---

devoted lovers as we are ; but tongues are sharp and have a double edge. Were it not for a sweet-voiced and slender-waisted maiden, for the brilliant whiteness of her teeth, for her large, dark eyes and her long eyelashes, the passionate lover would recover (his senses), he that could not close his eyes would enjoy sleep, he that despaired would hope, and he that was sick would cease (to suffer). Censorious females sometimes reproach me for lavishing my wealth on those who awaited my gifts in silent expectation, and not on my companions who asked (them) with importunity. They said : 'When you have spent all your money and are in want, who will give you more,' And my answer was : 'Yūsuf! that illustrious descendant of Quḏā'ah, whose generosity hastens to grant in abundance that which calls forth gratitude.' Whenever a cloud of (beneficence) which promised abundant showers, frustrated our hopes, we found that the rains of his bounty never disappointed us. When he and other princes toil to acquire glory, he succeeds easily, but they must labour hard and only obtain the gleanings. Always vigilant, he combines mildness with energy ; his hands procure him what he wants and protect him against what he fears. He is a sword drawn to strike the enemies of the faith, and a protecting curtain lowered down over those who fear God. When in march, two armies accompany him : his prudence and his troops ; he has for companions two swords : firm resolution and the sharp-edged steel. Always ready to chastise those who offend him, he regulates the actions of fate by his decisions. His foresight discovers that which no other can perceive, and arranges matters which could not be settled by the spear. May God protect him who guards, by his vigilance, religion's sacred ground and who protects the hills of Islāmism even in the darkest night ! (God protect) him who gives full career to his promises in the arena of glory and who regulates his threats conformably to the obligations of justice ! him who cuts his enemies to pieces whilst their chiefs take to flight before the swords which fall upon their heads ! He directed against them an army which levelled the earth by the very sound of its march ; and the hills were unable to sustain the weight of all the arrows which oppressed them. His lances, in the brightness of the morning, were like serpents gliding through the thick vapours of the mirage; the brightness of his swords lighted up the darkness, and clouds of dust obscured the day. The light of the sun was hidden by the dust, but the action of his swords in striking foemen's necks was not interrupted. Every year you send against them an army, charged to claim from them (what you exact), and it obtains satisfaction at the point of the spear. When they concealed the wound which one year had inflicted and were recovered from their sufferings, you began again to open that wound (تقرف). How many (chiefs) with faces covered by the twisted braids of their hair, whom you left (on the field of battle), with their necks no longer covered (akshafa) by the beard of the chin (لحيته). (Each of them) was a sword which cut deeply into the object on which it fell; yet they fled, and you may now see shortened those (bodies) which were so long. By my life! you transgressed against God by imploring His favour (for you possessed it already), and you rendered services of which God (alone) knows the number. You pursued them for the sake of your people, till they were scattered far and wide; you invited them to the faith until they became orthodox believers (tahannafū). O Thiqat al-Mulk! you whose empire is an arrow fledged and pointed for piercing the hearts of the enemy! may you enjoy this festival of which you are the ornament and which borrows from your brilliant qualities its noblest epithets. The (victim with) its sides marked, appeared in brilliant array, as if its back was covered with the variegated gauze of 'Irāq. After a year's absence, it (this festival) comes to visit you, because it longed to see you and looked anxiously forward to this day of meeting. You gave to it your glory to serve it for a collar and for ear-rings; and it thus appears before us decked in rings and jewels. The presence of your son Ja'far renders this day doubly fortunate; how admirable the festival which enjoys the presence of two kings! May you never cease to be asked for favours and to grant them, to inspire hopes and to fulfil them, to be called on when misfortunes are impending and to avert them! "

1 We do not possess another text of this very obscure poem; so that in many passages, I have been obliged to correct and translate by conjecture. It has been published with a great number of various readings, by Mr. Amari, in his Bibliotheca Arabo-Sicula, p. 634 et seq.

Here ends the qaṣīdah, Ṭhiqāt al-Dawlah had a son named Tāj al-Dawlah Ja'far, who was versed in literature and had a talent for poetry. A well known piece of verse was composed by him on two pages, one of which was dressed in red silk and the other in black. Here it is:

"I see two rising moons (faces) each borne on a branch (a slender body) and in just proportion; they are arrayed in robes one of which is tinted like the cheek and the other like the pupil of the eye. Here, behold the sun in the red sky of evening, and there, the moon in the shades of night fall."

These verses were composed by him in the year 527<sup>1</sup>. On the tenth of Muḥarram, 215 (9th March, A.C. 830), al-Māmūn arrived in Miṣr (Old Cairo) and set out again, towards the end of the month of Ṣafar (April). The qāḍī Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham, whom he had taken with him and appointed to the qāḍiship of Miṣr, held that place during three days and then departed with his sovereign. It was for this reason that Ibn Zūlāq (No. 159) has inserted his name in the History of the qāḍīs of Egypt. It has been handed down that Yaḥyā related the following extraordinary fact: "When I was in al-Ruṣāfah (No. 19, note)," said he, "a man, who was a grandfather in the fifth degree, claimed, at my tribunal, the inheritance of the grandson of his great grandson<sup>2</sup>." 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn Abī 'Amr al-Mu'adhḥal Ibn Ghaylān Ibn al-Muḥārib Ibn al-Buḥturī al-'Abdī (No. 143, note) the celebrated poet, went frequently to visit the qāḍī Yaḥyā and used to drop in at his levees. One day, having found great difficulty in approaching him and undergone some humiliation; he ceased his visits. Being then pressed by his wife to renew them, he answered her in these terms:

"She would oblige me to disgrace myself, thinking my dishonour a trifle in comparison with her advantage. 'Ask favours,'

1 This date is false. The Amir Tāj al-Dawlah succeeded to his father Ṭhiqāt al-Dawlah, A. H. 388 (A.C. 998), and abdicated on 410 (A.C. 1019-20). It is not probable that he could have composed this madrigal event in the year 427.

2 By the Muslim law, the nearest surviving male ascendant has a right to a certain share in the property left by his descendant.

said she, 'from Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham'; and I replied: 'Ask them from the Lord of Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham.' "

This qāḍī continued to pass through many vicissitudes of fortune till the reign of al-Mutawakkil 'ala-Allāh. When the qāḍī Muḥammad, the son of the qāḍī Aḥmad Ibn Abī Duwād (No. 31) was dismissed from office, Yaḥyā was appointed to succeed him on that occasion, the khalīf invested him with five robes of honour. In the year 240 (A.C. 854), al-Mutawakkil deposed him, seized on his riches and nominated, in his place, a member of the 'Abbāsīd family named Ja'far Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid Ibn Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās al-Hāshimī. Ja'far's secretary then went to Yaḥyā and said: "Surrender up to me the administration with which you are charged". Yaḥyā replied: "Not till two creditable witnesses shall declare that the Commander of the faithful sent me orders to do so". The administration was taken from him by force, and al-Mutawakkil, who was greatly incensed against him, seized on all his estates and ordered him to remain a prisoner in his own house. Some time after, he (Yaḥyā) set out to make the pilgrimage and took his sister with him, as he intended making a residence in the holy city. Having then learned that al-Mutawakkil had forgiven him, he renounced the project of settling (at Makkah) and departed for 'Irāq but, on reaching al-Rabadhah he breathed his last. This took place on Friday, the 15th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 242 (14 April, A.C. 857), or, according to another statement, on the first day of the following year (30th April, A.C. 857). He was interred at that place, having then attained the age of eighty-three years. Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sa'īd related as follows: The qāḍī Yaḥyā Ibn Akṭham was, for me, a sincere friend; he loved me and I loved him. When he died, I wished that I might see him in a dream, so that I might ask him how God had treated him. And, one night, I had a dream in which I saw him and asked him that question. He replied: 'God has forgiven me, but He reprimanded me and said: 'O Yaḥyā! thy mind was allayed (and turned) from me during thy dwelling in the world.' I answered: 'Lord! I place my reliance on a Tradition which was related to me by Abū Mu'āwiyah al-Ḍarīr (No. 84. note), who had learned it from al-A'mash (No. 253), who had heard it from Abū Šāliḥ<sup>1</sup> who had heard Abū Hurayrah (No. 244, note) say that the Prophet of God pronounced these words: 'God said: I should be ashamed to punish in the fire a grey-headed man.' On this, God said to me; 'Yahyā! I pardon thee; My Prophet said the truth, but yet thy mind was turned from Me during thy abode in the world.' " This relation is given by Abū 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī in his Risālah<sup>2</sup>. "Aktḥam means a corpulent man or sated with food. This name is sometimes written Aktam, but, in both cases, the signification is the same." So says the author of the Muḥkam (No. 424). Qaṣan and Sam'ān take the vowels here indicated. I consulted a great number of books and of persons versed in this art (etymology) respecting the word Muḥannaj, but could obtain no certain information about it. I then met with a correct copy of the Khaṭīb's History of Baghdād, which had been written out under the dictation of a master who knew the work by heart, and I read there that Muḥannaj should be written as here indicated. I since found the same pronunciation given in 'Abd al-Ḡhanī Ibn Sa'id's al-Mukḥṭaliṣ wa 'l-Mu'taliṣ (No. 376). Usayyidi means belonging to the tribe of Usayyid, a branch of that of Tamīm. Usayyid, the son of 'Amr, the son of Tamīm, was the progenitor of this family. We have already spoken of the relative adjectives Tamīmī and Marwāzī (No. 3). The village of al-Rabadhah is a dependancy of Madīnah. It lies on the great pilgrim road and is a regular halting-place for their caravans. It was on this place that Abū Dharr al-Ḡhifārī was banished by 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān<sup>3</sup>. He remained there till his death; his tomb is still to be seen and is often visited (by pious pilgrims). Milah is a small town in one of the districts of Ifriqiyah, but God knows best<sup>4</sup>. The qādī Ja'far Ibn 'Abd al-Wāḥid bore the surname of Abū 'Abd Allāh and died in the year 258 (A.C. 871-2), or by another account, in 268 or 269.

1 Abū Šāliḥ al-Sammān, named also Dhakkwān and surnamed al-Zayyāt, was a mawlā of the tribe of Ḡhāṭafān and an eminent Traditionist. He died at Madīnah, A.H. 101 (A. C. 719-20). (Nujūm, Iḥṣāz).

2 See No. 369 and; for an account of the Risālah, my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Prolegomena, 1st part, p. 456.

3 Abū Dharr Jundab Ibn al-Sakan al-Ḡhifārī, one of the earliest converts to Islāmism, died at al-Rabadhah A.H. 32 (A.C. 652-3). (Nujūm, Ma'ārif.)

4 The town of Milah lies 18 or 20 miles N.W. of Constantina.

767 YAḤYĀ IBN MU'ĀDH

Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā Ibn Mu'adh al-Rāzī (a native of Ray and) a celebrated preacher, was one of the men of the path (No. 111) Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Qushayrī (No. 369) mentions him in his (celebrated treatise, the) Risālah and includes him in the number of the *Shaykh*s (the most eminent Ṣūfī doctors). "He was", says he, "the only man, in his day, who had no model but himself; he was most eloquent on the subject of hope (in God's mercy); particularly when he discoursed on the knowing (of God). "He went to Balkh where he resided for some time and then returned to Naysābūr, where he died. One of Yaḥyā's sayings was: "How can he be abstemious (from wordly enjoyments) who is without the fear of God? respect that which is not thine and use with great moderation that which is thine." He used sometimes to say: Hunger is a spiritual exercise for those who aspire (to the knowledge of God), a trial for those who are turning (unto God), a regular practice for those who abstain (from the enjoyments of this world) and a favour granted to those who have acquired the knowledge (of God's perfection). Solitude is the fit companion for the sincerely devout; missing the opportunity (of obtaining salvation) is worse than death; for missing (such a thing) is the being cut away from the truth, whereas death is only the being cut away from living. Abstinence consists in three things: poverty, solitude and hunger. If a man thinks to deceive God by trying to cast a veil over his sins, God will tear off that veil and expose them to the public". "He learned Traditions from Ishāq Ibn Sulaymān al-Rāzī<sup>1</sup>, Makkī Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Balkhī<sup>2</sup>

---

1 According to the author of the Tabaqāt al-Huffūz, Abū Yaḥyā Ishāq Ibn Sulaymān al-Rāzī was a sure and exact Traditionist, and a native of Kūfah. He settled at Ray and taught Traditions on the authority of Mālik and others. His piety and the holiness of his life led the people to consider him as one of those mysterious personages who were designated by the title of *abdāl*s and of whom Mr. Lane has given a very good account in his translation of the thousand and one nights, chap. III, note 62. This ascetic died A. H. 200 (A.C. 815-6), or 199, according to the compiler of the Nujūm.

2 Makkī Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Balkhī (a native of Balkh) taught Traditions on the authority of Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, Abū Ḥanīfah, Mālik and others. He died A.H. 214 (A.C. 829-30), or 215... (Ḥuffūz).

and 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṭanāfisi'. A number of strangers belonging to Ray, Hamadhān and Khurāsān taught, on his authority, a few well supported Traditions. The Khaṭīb (No. 33) says of him, in the History of Baghdād: "When he came to Baghdād the Shāykh<sup>s</sup> of the Ṣūfīs and the devotees gathered round him and, having set up a throne, they placed him on it, sat down before him and entered into a conference. Al-Junayd (No. 140) then uttered some words, on which Yaḥyā said: "Be silent, my lamb! what have you to do with speaking when all the people are talking"? The allusions and expressions which he employed were remarkably elegant. One of his sayings was: "A pious discourse is a fine thing, but its meaning is finer; its use is finer than its meaning; the recompense which it merits is finer than its use and, finer than its recompense is the favour of Him for Whose sake that discourse was made". He said also: "True friendship cannot be augmented by kindness nor diminished by unkindness". Another of his sayings was: "He whose aspect is not as silver for the vulgar, as gold for the aspirants (to the knowledge of God), as pearls and rubies for those who know God and are advanced in His favour, that man is not one of God's sages who aspire to know Him". He said also; "The finest thing in the world is a correct discourse uttered by an eloquent tongue and proceeding from a handsome face; a shrewd discourse, drawn from a profound ocean (the heart) by the tongue of an ingenious man". He said also: "My God! how can I forget Thee, I who have no other lord but Thee? My God never shall I utter the words: Never again shall I return (to sin), for I feel that my heart is liable to break its promises; yet shall I utter them, provided that I die before I relapse". One of his prayers was as follows: Almighty God! though my sins cause me to fear, my hopes in Thy mercy assure me against danger. Almighty God! Thy kindness has concealed my sins from this world, but it is for me more necessary that they should be concealed from view on the day of the resurrection. Thou hast been bountiful towards me in preventing them from appearing before the company of true believers: do not, therefore bring me to shame on that day, in the presence of all Thy creatures, O Thou most merciful of the merciful ! " A descendant of 'Ali, who resided at Balkh and to whom he went to pay his respects, said to him : "Tell me, Master ! and may God assist you ! what is your opinion of us who are the people of the house (the members of Muḥammad's family)" ! Yaḥyā replied : "It is that which I would say of clay kneaded with the water of (divine) revelation and sprinkled (?) with the water of the (heavenly) mission : can it give out any other odour than the musk of true direction and the ambergris of piety"? The 'Alide (was so highly pleased with this answer that he) filled Yaḥyā's mouth with pearls. The next morning, Yaḥyā received a visit from the 'Alide and said to him : "Your coming to see us is an effect of your goodness, and our going to see you was on account of your goodness ; so you, in visiting and being visited, are doubly good". Another of Yaḥyā's sayings was : "To him who is going to see a true friend the way never appears long ; he who goes to visit his beloved never feels lonely on the road". He said also : "How miserable are the sons of Ādam ! if they feared hell as much as they fear poverty, they would all enter into paradise". "No man", said he, "obtained his utmost wish without longing for death as ardently as the hungry man longs for food. He sees causes of ruin approach, is uneasy about his family and his brethern and is just falling into a state which would trouble the soundest reason." He said again : "He who neglects the minor duties of piety will not obtain the greater gifts (which God bestows)". Another of his sayings was : "Of the things which fall into the lot of those among you who are truly believers, the best are three namely, that which, it profits them not, will not harm them ; that which, if it rejoices them not, will not sadden them, and that which, if it does not gain them praise, will not bring upon them blame".* He said again : ("A man's) acts are like the mirage ; (his) heart is devastated (and deprived) of piety ; (his) sins are equal in number to the sands and the grains of * de Slane's rendering is not intelligible. The passage is quite clear and should be rendered thus : "Of the things which fall into the lot of a believer from your (i.e. human) habits the best three are : if you do not benefit him, do not harm him either ; if you do not please him do not sadden him either : and if you do not praise him do not blame him either." - Ed.

1 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṭanāfisi', a traditionist whose authority was cited by Ibn Mājah and other eminent doctors, died A.H. 230 (A.C. 844-5).- (Huffūz, Nujūm).

---

dust; yet he desires to possess the high bosomed maidens of his time. Woe be to you! you are drunk but not with wine. How perfect would you be had you striven against (تأقت) your hopes! how great, had you hastened in fulfilling your appointed duty! how strong had you resisted your passions"! On such subjects he uttered many fine maxims. He died at Naysābūr in the year 258. Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh said: "I read these words on the tomb-stone of Yaḥyā Ibn Mu'ādh al-Rāzi "The sage of the epoch, may God whiten his face and unite him with the blessed Prophet! died on Monday, the sixteenth of the first Jumādā, 258, (30th March A.C. 872), at Naysābūr.

668 YAḤYĀ IBN MANDAH

Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā al-'Abdī was the son of 'Abd al-Wahhāb, the son of the imām Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad, the son of Ishāq, the son of Muḥammad, the son of Yaḥyā, the son of Mandah, the son of al-Walīd, the son of Mandah, the son of Baṭṭah, the son of Istandār, the son of Jihārbakht, the son of Firuzān. Mandah is a surname; he who bore it was called Ibrāhīm. It is said that Istandār's real name was al-Firuzān. God knows! Yaḥyā Ibn Mandah was a most distinguished ḥāfiẓ and one of the most eminent amongst the Traditionists. We have already spoken of his grandfather (No. 594). Yaḥyā was designated by the surname of Abū Zakariyā, his father by that of Abū 'Amr, his grandfather by that of Abū 'Abd Allāh, his great-grandfather by that of Abū Muḥammad and his great-great-grandfather by that of Abū Ya'qūb. He was a native of Iṣbahān and a Traditionist, as were his father, his grandfather, his great-grandfather and his great-great-grandfather before him. Highly distinguished for his merit, his talents and his vast knowledge in Traditional lore, he was also a trustworthy relator of Traditions, an accomplished ḥāfiẓ and one of those who were noted for the copiousness of their information and for their veracity. The works composed by him were numerous, his conduct exemplary and the duties he imposed on himself arduous. At that epoch, the family to which he belonged had not a member worthy of being compared to him. He published, for the first time, some collections of Traditions, part of which he drew from his own stock and the rest from the lips of the numerous Shaykhs and teachers who resided at Iṣbahān. He heard Traditions delivered by Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Zayd al-Ḍabbī, Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Rahīm al-Kātib, Abū Maṣṣūr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Faḍlawayh al-Iṣbahānī, his own father and his two paternal uncles, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Ubayd Allāh and Abu 'l-Qasim 'Abd al-Raḥmān. His other teachers were Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Nu'mān al-Qaṣṣās,* Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Jaṣṣās, Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Ḥawrdānī† and Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Thaqafi. Having gone to Naysābūr, he there heard Traditions taught by Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn khalaf al-Muqrī and Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Bayhaqī (No. 27). At Hamadhān he learned Traditions from Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad al-Nahāwandī; at Baṣrah he studied them under Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibrāhīm Ibn Muḥammād Ibn Aḥmad al-Shāhid, 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Sa'dānī and a great number of other professors. One of the works compiled by him was a (biographical) History of Iṣbahān. Having gone to Baghdād, on his way to the pilgrimage, he taught Traditions in that city and made dictations in the mosque of al-Manṣūr. So great was his reputation and so high the rank which he held (as a Traditionist), that a crowd of Shaykhs went to note down his observations, and amongst them were Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir, 'Abd al-Qadir Ibn Abī Ṣāliḥ al-Jilī, and the grammarian Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Aḥmad‡ al-Khashshāb. Traditions were delivered on his authority by the ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Barakāt, 'Abd al-Wahhāb Ibn al-Mubārak al-Anmāṭī, Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī Turāb al-Zankawī al-Khayyāt, both of them natives of Baghdād, Abū Ṭāhir Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd al-Ghaḥfār Ibn al-Sabbāgh, the ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Ala, and a great number of others. The ḥāfiẓ Ibn Al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) mentions him in the Kitāb al-Dhayl and says: "He wrote out for me a licence to teach all the Traditions which he himself had learned." He then adds: "The hāfiẓ Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad, whom I asked what he thought of him, extolled him highly and praised his good memory, his knowledge and his learning". Farther on he says; "I heard the hāfiẓ Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Abī Naṣr Maṣṣūr Ibn Muḥammad al-Laftawānī say: 'The family of Ibn Mandah began by a Yahyā and ended by a Yahyā, meaning in the knowledge of the Traditions, in science and in merit.'" 'Abd al-Ghāfir Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Fārisī, the hāfiẓ of whom we have already spoken (No. 377) mentions him in the Sivāq (or continuation) of the History of Naysābūr and says: "Abu Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn Mandah was a man of great merit and came of a family noted throughout the world for learning and for the knowledge of Traditions. He travelled (to many cities), met there the great doctors, and learned Traditions from their lips. He composed a work on the two Ṣaḥīḥs (that of Muslim and that of al-Bukhārī)." It is related on the best authority that one of the learned gave the following saying as Ibn Mandah's: "Excessive laughter is a mark of folly; folly and precipitation result from weakness of mind, weakness of mind, proceeds from want of judgment; want of judgment comes from a bad education, and a bad education draws down contempt. Headlessness is a sort of madness; envy is a malady for which there is no cure, and detraction engenders hatred." It has been handed down from al-Asma'i (No. 354), through a series of creditable narrators, that the following anecdote was related by Ibn Mandah. "I was in the desert and went into a mosque. The imām stood up to direct the prayer and then recited the passage of the Qur'ān (sūrah 71, verse 1) in which God says: "We sent Noah unto his people. Here he got embarrassed and continued to repeat the same words, on which a Bedwin Arab, who was standing behind him and accompanying the prayer, exclaimed: 'Well, man! If Noah has not gone there, send some one else.'" Yahyā Ibn Mandah used often to repeat these lines of a poet:

* In 'Abd al-Ḥamid, al-Qudāt.—Ed.

† In 'Abd al-Ḥamid, al-Jawrdānī.—Ed.

‡ 'Abd al-Ḥamid inserts: Ibn between Aḥmad and al-Khashshāb vide No. 324.—Ed.

"I wondered how a man could purchase error at the price of true direction; but he who purchases worldly goods at the price of his religion is more to be wondered at. But still more wonderful is the man who sacrifices his religion to obtain the worldly advantages possessed by another; he is yet a greater loser than the two former."

He was born at Iṣbahān on Tuesday morning, the 19th of Shawwāl, 434 (1st of June, A. C. 1043), and he died there on the feast of the Sacrifice, 512 (24th March, A. C. 1119). After his death, the Mandah family never produced a man like him. Ibn Nuqṭah (No. 634) says, in the Ikmāl al-Ikmāl, that his death took place on Saturday, the 12th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, 511 and that his father 'Abd al-Wahhāb was born in the year 386 (A.C. 996), and died in the month of the latter Jumādā, 475 (Oct.-Nov., A.C. 1082). We have marked the orthography of his ancestors' names in our article on his grandfather Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad<sup>1</sup>.

869 IBN SA'DŪN AL QURṬUBĪ

Abū Bakr, Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'dūn Ibn Tammām Ibn Muḥammad al-Azdī al-Qurṭubī (a member of the Arabian tribe of Azd and a native of Cordova), bore the title of Ṣā'in al-Dīn (preserver of the faith) and was one of the imāms (or great masters), who, in latter times, were well versed in the Qur'ānic readings, the sciences connected with the Qur'ānic text, the Traditions, grammar, philology, etc. He left Cordova in the flower of his youth and proceeded to Egypt. In Alexandria, he heard the lessons of Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Rāzī and, in Miṣr (Old Cairo), those of Abū Ṣādiq Murshid Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn al-Qāsim al-Madanī al-Miṣrī (a native of Madīnah who had settled in Egypt). There also he studied under Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Iṣbahānī, generally known by the appellation of al-Ṣilafī (No. 43) and other masters. In the year 517 (A.C. 1123-4), he arrived in Baghdād and read the Qur'ān under the direction of the Shaykh Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī al-Muqrī (teacher of the Qur'ān-readings), who was generally known by the designation of Ibn Bint al-Shaykh Abī Manṣūr al-Khayyāt (the son of the daughter of the Shaykh Abū Manṣūr the tailor). He heard from the lips of that professor the contents of a great number of books, one of which was Sibawayh's Kitāb (No. 479). He read Traditions under Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Bāqī al-Bazzār,* surnamed Qāḍī 'l-Māristān (the qāḍī of the infirmary), Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Ḥuṣayn (الحصين) Abu 'l-'Izz Ibn Kādis and other masters. He was religious and devout, remarkable for such gravity and dignity of bearing as inspired respect. As a Traditionist he was a sure authority, veracious and trustworthy; his talents were great, his words few, his good actions numerous and his discourse instructive. He resided at Damascus for some time and then went to inhabit Moṣul, whence he removed to Iṣbahān. From that he returned to Moṣul and all the Shaykhs (or eminent doctors) of the time went to hear his lessons. Thī ḥāfiẓ Ibn al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) mentions him in the Dhayl and says: "I met him in Damascus, where he gave lessons which (even) the Shaykhs under whom Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Rāzī had studied, went to hear. I myself selected some choice passages out of his lectures. Having asked him the date and place of his birth, he replied that he was born in the year 486 (A.C. 1093-94) at Cordova, a city in Spain." I read in a book that his birth took place in the year 487, but the former date is the true one. Our Shaykh the Qāḍī Bahā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn Yūsuf Ibn Rafī' Ibn Tamīm generally known by the surname of Ibn Shaddād and qāḍī of Aleppo, took pride in stating that he had learned Traditions and Qur'ān readings from Abū Bakr al-Qurṭubī. To this we shall recur in our article on Ibn Shaddād. "We used," said he, "to read (the Qur'ān) under him at Moṣul, and, every day, we saw a man come in, salute him without sitting down, hand him a packet the contents of which were unknown to us and then retire. We tried to discover what was in it, and at length found out that it was a fowl ready plucked which the Shaykh purchased, every day, from that man, for his own use and which, on returning to his house, he cooked with his own hands." The same qāḍī states, in his Dalā'il al-Aḥkām, that he read (the Qur'ān) under him during the space of eleven years and finished in the year 567 (A.C. 1171-2). The Shaykh Abū

<sup>1</sup> The passage here indicated is not to be found in our manuscripts.

* In 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, al-Bazzār.—Ed.

† In 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, al-Kādis.—Ed.

Bakr al-Qurṭubī often repeated the following verses, tracing them, through a regular series of transmitters, up to the author, the Kātib Abū 'l-Qāhir al-Wāsiṭī:

"The pen of fate writes out what is to happen; so, whether we move or remain quiet, it is just the same. How foolish in thee to toil for sustenance! is not sustenance granted even to the embryo in the womb?"

He said also: "The following verses were repeated to us by Abū 'l-Wafā 'Abd al-Razzāq Ibn Wahb Ibn Ḥassān, who stated that they were recited to him in Old Cairo by Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Manī' (منيع), who gave them as having been composed by himself:

"I have a device by which calumny may be averted, but no device can serve against a liar. No stratagem of mine can avail against him who says things of his own invention."

The Shaykh Abū Bakr al-Qurṭubī died at Moṣul, on the day of the festival of the Sacrifice, 567 A. H. (4th August, A.C. 1172).

770 YAḤYĀ IBN YA'MAR.

Abū Sulaymān, or, as some say, Abū Sa'id, Yaḥyā, the son of Ya'mar al-Adawī* al-Waṣḥqī, was a grammarian of Baṣrah, and a Tā'bi'i (one of those who had received lessons from a Companion of Muḥammad). He met (and knew) 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar (No. 243, note), 'Abd 'Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās (No. 43, note), and others (of the Companions). Qatādah Ibn Dī'āmah al-Sadūsī (No. 516) and Ishāq Ibn Suwayd al-Adawī handed down Traditions on his authority. He was one of the chief Qur'ān-readers<sup>1</sup> of Baṣrah, and it was from him that 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Ishāq learned the manner of reading (that book). He removed to Khurāsān and was appointed Qāḍī at Marw. The text of the Qur'ān, the rules of grammar and the various dialects of the Arabs were equally familiar to him. He acquired his knowledge of grammar from Abu 'l-Aswād al-Duwālī (No. 285). It is related that, when Abu 'l-Aswad drew up the chapter on the agent and patient (the subject and object of the verb), a man of the tribe of Layth added thereto some chapters and, having found, on examination, that there existed, in the language of the (desert) Arabs, some expressions which could not be made to enter into that (section), he stopped short and abandoned the work. It is possible that this person was Yaḥyā Ibn Ya'mar, who, having contracted an alliance, by oath, with the tribe of Layth, was considered as one of its members. He was a Shī'ite of the primitive class, one of those who, in asserting the superior merit of the People of the house<sup>1</sup>, abstained from depreciating the merit of those (Companions) who did not belong to that family. 'Āṣim Ibn Abi 'l-Najūd (No. 294) the Qur'ān-reader, related as follows: "Al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf (No. 144), being informed that Yaḥyā Ibn Ya'mar declared al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn to be of the posterity of the Apostle of God, and that he was then in Khurāsān, wrote to Qutaybah Ibn Muslim (No. 517), the governor of that province, ordering him to send Yaḥyā to him. This was done and, when Yaḥyā stood in his presence, he said to him: 'Do you pretend that al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn were of the posterity of the Apostle of God? by Allāh! I shall cast (to the ground) that part of you which has the most hair on it<sup>2</sup>, unless you exculpate yourself'. 'If I do so', said Yaḥyā, shall I have an amnesty?' 'You shall', replied al-Ḥajjāj. 'Well,' said Yaḥyā, 'God, may His praise be exalted! said: And we gave unto him (Abraham) Isaac and Jacob: we directed them all; and Noah had we before directed, and, of his posterity, David and Solomon, and Job, and Joseph, and Moses, and Aaron; thus do we reward the virtuous, and Zakariya, and John, and Jesus, and Elias; all of them were righteous.<sup>3</sup> Now, the space of time between Jesus and Abrahām is greater than which separated

<sup>1</sup> See No. 18, note.

* In 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, al-Adawānī which is supported by the explanation of the author at the end of the article.—Ed.

1 See No. 767.

2 That is: I shall strike off your head.

3 Qur'ān, sūrah 6, verse 84.

al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn from Muḥammad, on all of whom be the blessing of God and His salvation !' Al-Ḥajjāj answered : 'I must admit that you have got out of the difficulty ; I read that before but did not understand it !' The quotation was most appropriate ; how admirable the talent displayed by Yahyā in adducing that passage ! How finely he applied it ! "Then," said 'Āṣim, "al-Ḥajjāj said to him : 'Where were you born ?' Yahyā answered : 'At Baṣrah'. 'Where were you brought up ?' 'In Khurāsān.' 'And this pure Arabic (which you speak), how did you come by it ?' 'It was God's gift.' 'Tell me if I commit faults in speaking.' 'Yahyā remained silent, but as al-Ḥajjāj insisted on having an answer,' he at length said : 'O Amīr ! since you ask me, I must say that you exalt what should be depressed and depress what should be exalted<sup>1</sup>.' 'That, by Allāh ! is a grave fault.' He then wrote these words to Quṭaybah : 'When this, my letter, reaches you, take Yahyā Ibn Ya'mar for your qāḍī. Salutation !' Ibn Sallām (No. 509) stated that he heard Yūnus Ibn Ḥabīb<sup>3</sup> relate as follows. Al-Ḥajjāj said to Yahyā Ibn Ya'mar : 'Do you remark any incorrection in my speech?' 'Yes,' replied Yahyā, 'in one point'. 'What is that.' 'In reading the Qur'ān'. 'That were shameful indeed ! what is it ?' 'In reciting this verse : Say, if your fathers and your sons, and so forth to the words be more dear (aḥabba) to you than God<sup>4</sup> you pronounce aḥabbu.' Ibn Sallām here observed : "It would appear from this that, as the phrase was long, al-Ḥajjāj forgot how it commenced. Al-Ḥajjāj then said : 'be assured that you shall never hear me commit such a fault again.' "Then," said Yunus, "he sent him to Khurāsān which, at that time, was governed by Yazīd, the son of al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Ṣufrah." God best knows which of these statements is exact. Ibn al-Jawzī (No. 345) says, in his Shuḍhūr al-Uqūd<sup>5</sup> : "In the year eighty-four of the Hijrah (A.C. 703), al-Ḥajjāj

1 The true reading is amā hiyā laka.

2 This passage signifies also : you put in the nominative what should be put in the accusative and vice versa. I suspect that Yahyā employed this equivocal expression designedly.

3 The life of Ibn Ḥabīb is given in No. 765, note.

4 Qur'ān, surah 9, verse 24.

5 This was a historical work. Its title signifies : Golden beads for necklaces.

banished Yahyā Ibn Ya'mar because on saying to him: 'Do I speak incorrectly,' he received this answer: 'You do but the fault is scarcely perceptible'. 'I give you three days,' said al-Ḥajjāj, 'and, if I find you, after that, in the land of 'Irāq, I shall put you to death.' In consequence of this, Yahyā left the country." Abū 'Amr Naṣr Ibn 'Alī Ibn Nūḥ Ibn Qays stated that the following relation was made to him by 'Uthmān Ibn Miḥṣan (محصن): "The Commander of the faithful pronounced a khuṭbah at Baṣrah, and in this discourse, he said 'Fear God! he that fears God incurs no huwārah'. The congregaton did not understand what he said and asked its meaning from Yahyā Ibn Ya'mar. He answered that the word huwārah signified loss and that the khalīf meant to say: He who fears God shall sustain no loss." Al-Qazzāz (No. 626) says, in his Kitāb al-Jāmi': Hawārāt means dangers: its singular is hawārah. Al-Rāzī said: "I related this to al-Aṣma'i (No. 345) and he answered: 'I never heard that till this very moment, now that you have told it to me. The rare expressions of the language are really very numerous, but that one I never heard' ". Al-Aṣma'i related as follows: "My father told me that Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab, wrote, when in Khurāsān, a letter to al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf in which he said: 'We met the enemy and forced him to take refuge on the summit 'ar'arat of the hill, and we are at the foot of it al-Ḥaḍīd'. 'How,' said al-Ḥajjāj, 'did the son of al-Muhallab come by such words as these? and, being told that Yahyā Ibn Ya'mar was with him, he said: 'Ah! that explains it. Yahyā composed poetry and was the author of this verse:

'People concur only in hating my family; but from the oldest times, people hate those who are good!.' "

Khālīd al-Ḥaḍhdhā (No. 539, note) stated that Ibn Sirīn (No. 539) possessed a copy of the Qur'ān in which Yahyā Ibn Ya'mar had marked the vowel points. He spoke the purest Arabic, using the most elegant terms without effort and quite naturally. His adventures and remarkable sayings are well known. He died in the year 129 (A.C. 746-7)<sup>2</sup>, Ya'mar or Ya'nur,—but this latter

1 Literally: the fat.—This verse is by no means clear, and its application is not evident unless we suppose it to have been uttered by one of the 'Alids.

2 Dihabi, cited by the author of the Nujūm, places the death of Yahyā Ibn Ya'mar in the year 89 of the Hijrah.

form is neither current nor correct,—is the present tense of the verb 'amira, which signifies to live long. This name, like that of Yaḥyā (he lives), was given to him as a presage of long life. 'Adwān' means descended from 'Adwān, whose true name was al-Ḥārith and who was the son of 'Amr Ibn Qays 'Aylān. He received the surname of 'Adwān (hostility) because he attacked his brother with the intention of killing him. Washiqi means descended from Washiq, who was the son of 'Awf, the son of Bakr, the son of Yaḥkur, the son of that same 'Adwān.

771 AL-FARRĀ THE GRAMMARIAN

Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā Ibn Ziyād Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Manzūr al-Aslamī al-Daylamī al-Kūfī (a Daylamite by origin and a native of Kūfah by birth), was generally known by the surname of al-Farrā. He was a member, by enfranchisement, of the tribe of Asad, or, according to another statement, of the tribe of Minqar. Al-Farrā was the most eminent of all the doctors of Kūfah and also the most distinguished by his knowledge of grammar, philology and the various branches of literature. Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab (No. 41) is stated to have said: "Were it not for al-Farrā, pure Arabic would no longer exist; it was he who disengaged it (from the ordinary language) and fixed it (by writing). Were it not for al-Farrā, good Arabic had gone to the ground; (before his time), it was a matter of discussion; everyone who pleased had the pretention of knowing it and discoursed on it as well as his intelligence and his genius would permit, so that it had nearly disappeared'. He and al-Aḥmar<sup>1</sup> learned grammar from Abu 'l-Hasan al-Kisā'i (No. 408); they were the most eminent of his disciples and also the most attached to him. Al-Farrā, having resolved on entering into the service of (the khalif) al-Māmūn, went a great number of times to the door of the palace (with the hope of obtaining admittance), and, <sup>1</sup> 'Alī al-Aḥmar (the red) was a soldier in al-Raṣhīd's nūbā, or body-guard. His knowledge of pure Arabic was so extensive that al-Kisā'i got him appointed as tutor to that khalif's children. He died on his way to Makkah), A.H. 194 (A.C. 809-10). Flügel's Grammatische Schulen der Araber, Part 1st, p. 134.

one day, whilst, he was waiting there, Abū Bishr Thumāmah Ibn al-Ashras al-Numayrī (No. 504, note) a Mu'tazilite doctor who was intimate with (the khalif) al-Māmūn, went up to him. "I saw, said Thumāmah, 'a person in the attire of a literary man; so, I sat down beside him and commenced putting to the test his knowledge of philosophy. Finding that he was (in that branch), an ocean (of learning), I tried him in grammar and discovered that he had not his parallel; I then examined him in jurisprudence and perceived that he was a good legist and well acquainted with the conflicting opinions of those people (the juris consults); I ascertained also that he was an able astronomer, a learned physician, and well-versed in the history of the (desert) Arabs, their battle-days and their poetry. On this, I said to him: 'Who are you? you must be al-Farrā!' He replied: 'I am he'. I immediately went in to the Commander of the faithful, al-Māmūn, informed him of the circumstance and got the order to have al-Farrā introduced without delay. It was thus that he became acquainted with al-Māmūn". Qutrub (No. 609) related as follows: "Al-Farrā entered into the presence of (the khalif) al-Rashīd and made a discourse in which he committed solecisms. On this, Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā the Barmakid (No. 129) said: 'Commander of the faithful! he speaks incorrectly.' The khalif said to al-Farrā: 'You commit solecisms?' and received this answer: 'Commander of the faithful! it is in the nature of the (desert) Arabs to employ correctly the final inflexions, and in the nature of those who inhabit fixed abodes to employ them incorrectly; when I am on my guard, I do not commit faults but, when I return to my natural habit, I commit them.' The khalif was satisfied with this answer. The Khatīb (No. 33) says, in his history of Baghdād: "When al-Farrā got acquainted with al-Māmūn, the latter bid him draw up a work which should contain the principles of grammar and all the pure Arabic expressions which he had heard. He then ordered him to be confined in a chamber of the palace, and appointed male and female servants to attend him and furnish him with everything which he required; hoping, by this means, to deliver his heart from all preoccupations and to leave him nothing to wish for. They were even to inform him of the hours of prayers by chanting the adhān (or call) at the proper times. He sent to him also a number of copyists and attached to his service confidential men and agents charged to pay the expenses. Al-Farrā then dictated, and the copyists wrote down his observations; and this continued during two years, until they had finished the work. It was entitled al-Ḥudūd (the limits or chapters<sup>1</sup>.) Al-Māmūn ordered this book to be transcribed (and placed) in his libraries. When al-Farrā had finished his task, he went out in public and began the composition of the Kitāb al-Ma'ānī (rhetorical figures employed in the Qur'ān?). The narrator (of these facts) says: 'We tried to count the number of persons who assembled for the purpose of hearing him dictate (and publish) the text of the Kitāb al-Ma'ānī, but, not being able to do so (they were so many), we counted the qāḍīs only and found that they were eighty.' He continued to dictate the work till he finished it. The copyists then withheld it from the public, so that they might make money of it, and declared that they would not communicate it to any person unless he consented to have it copied by them at the rate of one dirham for five leaves<sup>2</sup>. Al-Farrā, to whom complaints were made on this subject, sent for the copyists and remonstrated with them. Their answer was: 'We attended your lessons in order to profit by your learning; of all your works this is the most essential; so, allow us to gain a livelihood by means of it.' He replied: 'Be more complaint with them; it will be for your advantage as well as theirs.' Finding that they would not follow his advice, he said to them: 'I shall let you see (what you do not expect), and then announced to the public that he would dictate the Ma'ānī and join to it a complete commentary, with fuller remarks than those already given. He therefore held sittings and dictated one hundred leaves on the word al-ḥamd<sup>3</sup> alone. The copyists then went to him and said: 'We shall concede to the public what they demand and copy for them at the rate of one dirham for ten leaves.' What induced him to (compose and)

1 For the contents of this grammatical work, see Flügel's Grammatische Schulen, p. 134).

2 It is worthy of remark that a dirham, or six pence, for ten pages of copy, was considered as an exorbitant price, at Baḡhdād, towards the beginning of the ninth century of our era.

3 Al-ḥamd is the first word of the expression which, in Arabic means: "Praise be to God" and by which most Muslim books commence.

dictate the Ma'ānī was, that one of his disciples, who was then in the service of al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl (No. 169) and whose name was 'Umar Ibn Bukayr, wrote to him in these terms: "The Amir al-Ḥasan is always asking me questions relative to the Qur'ān, and I cannot readily call to mind the proper answers. Would you be pleased to lay down for me certain fundamental principles, and compile, on that subject, a work to which I may refer." On reading this note, he invited his disciples to assemble and hear him dictate a work on the Qur'ān. On the appointed day, when all were present, he came in to them and told a man who acted as a mu'adhdhin in the mosque and who knew well the Qur'ān, to commence reciting (the text of that book). The man began by the Fātiḥah<sup>1</sup> and al-Farrā explained it, and this continued till they went over the whole book; the mu'adhdhin reciting and the professor explaining. This commentary fills about one thousand leaves; nothing like it had ever been composed before, and no person can possibly add to it. Al-Māmūn placed his two sons under al-Farrā's tuition, so that they might be instructed in grammar. One day, al-Farrā rose from his place; on some necessary occasion, and the two young princes hastened to bring him his slippers. They struggled between themselves for the honour of offering them to him, and they finally agreed that each of them should present him with one slipper. As al-Māmūn had secret agents who informed him of every thing that passed, he learned what had taken place and caused al-Farrā to be brought before him. When he entered, the Khalif said to him: "Who is the most honoured of men?" Al-Farrā answered: "I know not any one more honoured than the Commander of the faithful." "Nay," replied al-Māmūn, "It is he who arose to go out and the two designated successors of the Commander of the faithful contented for the honour of presenting him his slippers, and at length agreed that each of them should offer him one." To this al-Farrā answered: "Commander of the faithful! I should have prevented them from doing so had I not been apprehensive of turning them away from some honourable example which they had already received or discouraging their minds in the pursuit of that high estimation to which they ardently aspire. We know by tradition that Ibn 'Abbās held the stirrups of al-Ḥasan and al-Ḥusayn, when they were getting on horse back after paying him a visit. One of those who were present said to him: 'How is that you hold the stirrups of these striplings, you who are their elder?' To which he replied: "Ignorant man! no one can appreciate the merit of people of merit except a man of merit." Al-Māmūn then said to him: 'Had you prevented them, I should have inflicted on you the penalty of censure and reproach and should have declared you in fault. That which they have done is no debasement of their dignity; on the contrary, it exalts their merit, renders manifest their excellent nature and inspires me with a favourable opinion of their character. No man, though great in rank, can be dispensed, by his high position, from three obligations: he must respect his sovereign, venerate his father, and honour his preceptor. As a reward for their conduct, I bestow on them twenty thousand dinārs (£10,000), and on you, for the good education which you give them, ten thousand dirhams (£500)." The following anecdote is related also by the Khaṭīb: "One day, al-Farrā was sitting in the house of the legist Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan, who was the son of his aunt, and happened to say that few men ever mastered one branch of science without finding the others quite easy. On this, Muḥammad said: 'You, Abū Zakariyā! have studied pure Arabic; so, I shall question you on a point of (canon) law.' 'Let us hear your question,' said al-Farrā, '(and I shall answer) with the blessing of God.' Muḥammad then said to him: 'What do you say of a man who, in making the two satisfactory prostrations that some neglect in the accomplishment of the prescribed prayer rendered necessary, neglects, again, in these prostrations, something important?' Al-Farrā reflected for some time and then replied that the man incurred no obligation. 'Why so?' said his cousin. 'Because,' said he, 'according to us grammarians, a diminutive noun cannot be diminished again; and besides, the two prostrations are the completion of the prayer, and that which is complete requires no further completion.' On hearing this, Muḥammad exclaimed: 'Now, I am sure that a descendant of Adam never engendered a son like you!' " I already mentioned this anecdote in the life of al-Kisā'i (No. 408) and there referred to the account which I give of it here. Al-Farrā had a leaning towards the doctrine of the Mu'tazilites. Salamah, the son of 'Āṣim, related as follows: "Al-Farrā told me that he and Bishr al-Marisi (No. 112), lived together in the same house, for twenty-one years and that neither of them learned any thing from the other." Al-Jāhiḡ (No. 481) said: "I arrived at Baghdād, in the year 204 (A. C. 819-20), at the time of al-Māmūn's entry into that city. Al-Farrā used then to come to see me, and I wished him to learn scholastic theology (kalām), but he had no desire of doing so." Abu 'l-Abbās Tha'lab said: "Al-Farrā used to hold public sittings in the mosque adjoining his own house. He philosophized (employed the philosophical style) in his works to such a degree that he introduced philosophical terms into his discourse". Salama, the son of Aḡmad and the grandson of 'Āṣim said: "I wondered at al-Farrā's esteem for al-Kisā'i whom he much excelled in grammatical knowledge." One of al-Farra's sayings was: "When I am dying, my soul shall undergo in some measure, the influence exerted by (the conjunction) ḡattā: it will be depressed, elevated and afflicted<sup>1</sup>." No verses have been handed down as his excepting the following, which were given by Abū Ḥanīfah al-Dinawari (No. 187, note) on the authority of Abū Bakr al-Ṭuwāl:

---

1 The Fātiḥah or opening, is the name given to the first sūrah of the Qur'ān.

"Lord of a single acre of ground, you have nine chamberlains! You sit in an old ruin and have door-keepers to exclude visitors! Never did I hear of a door-keeper in a ruined dwelling! Never shall the eyes (of men) see me at a door of yours, a man like me is not made to support repulses from door-keepers."

I since discovered that these verses are attributed to Ibn Mūsā 'l-Makfūf*; God knows best! Al-Farrā was born at Kūfah, whence he removed to Baghdād, which continued to be his usual place of residence. He was so ardent in the pursuit of gain that he could not remain quietly at home and, when he had passed a whole year

---

1 These terms in the language of the grammarians, signify: govern the genitive case, the nominative and the accusative.

* In 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, al-Makfūf.—Ed.

in hoarding up money, he would go to Kūfah, and pass there forty days with his people to whom he generously distributed the sum which he had collected. He composed a number of works, such as the Hudūd and the Ma'ānī of which treatises we have already spoken; two works, one much larger than the other, on the mushkil (or expressions of doubtful import) which occur in the Qur'ān (?); the Kitāb al-Bahī* (?), a small volume, of which I met a copy after drawing up the present article. It contains the greater part of the terms which Abu 'l-'Abbās Tha'lab inserted in his Faṣīḥ (No. 42); it is of the same size as that book, and the only difference between them is, that the latter offers the same matters in another order: al-Farrā merely remodeled the work and made thereto a few additions. I may add that the Bahī contains a few terms which are not to be found in the Faṣīḥ, but there is very little difference between the two books. His other works are the Kitāb al-Lughāt (on dialectical expressions), the Kitāb al-Maṣādir, etc., (on the nouns of action which are found in the Qur'ān), the Jam'a wa-Tathnīyah, etc. (on the plurals and duals which occur in the Qur'ān), the Kitāb al-Waqf wa'l-Ibtidā (on the full stop and the commencement of phrases), the Kitāb al-Fākhīr; var al-Mufākhīr†, the Kitāb Ālat al-kātib (the tool for secretaries), the Kitāb al-Nawādir (on rare expressions) the Kitāb al-Wāw (on the copulative conjunctions) etc. Salamah, the son of 'Āsim, states that al-Farrā dictated (most of) his works from memory; those dictated by him from copies which he held in his hand were the Kitāb Mulāzim (?) and the Kitāb Yāfi' wa Yafa'ah<sup>1</sup>. According to Abū Bakr al-Anbārī (No. 616) those two books contained about fifty leaves, and all his works filled three thousand leaves. Muḥammad Ibn al-Jahm<sup>2</sup> composed a poem in honour of al-Farrā; its rhymes are formed by an u followed from the syllable hi; but I abstain from

---

1 It is said that, in the whole Arabic language, no root furnishes two adjectives having the same signification and exactly similar in their form to the adjectives yāfi' (يَافِع) i.e. adult, and yafa'ah (يُفَعُّ) which come from the root yafu' يَفَعُّ.

2 An interesting anecdote of this member of the Barmakid family is given in No. 37.

* In 'Abd al-Īlamid, al-Bahā.—Ed.

† In 'Abd al-Īlamid, al-Mufākhīr.—Ed.

inserting it here, to avoid lengthening this article. Al-Farrā died A. H. 207 (A. C. 822-3) on the road to Makkah, and at the age of sixty-three years. He was surnamed al-Farrā (the furrier), not because he manufactured or dealt in furs, but because he was a farra (scanner or sifter) of words. So says al-Sam'ānī in his Ansāb, and he cites for his authority the Kitāb al-Alqāb<sup>1</sup>. Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Marzubānī (No. 621) says, in his work<sup>2</sup> that Ziyād, the father of al-Farrā, was maimed of his hand, it having been cut off in the war with al-Ḥusayn, the son of 'Alī. This assertion requires to be examined: al-Farrā lived sixty-three years and was therefore born in the year 144; the war with al-Ḥusayn took place in A.H. 61; so, between that event and al-Farrā's birth, eighty-four years must have elapsed; to what age then did his father live? If the person who lost his hand was al-Farrā's grandfather, the thing had been possible. منظور must be pronounced manzūr. We have already spoken of the word Daylamī, and of the Banū Asad. Minqar was the son of 'Ubayd, the son of Muqāis, whose real name was al-Ḥārith, the son of 'Amr, the son of Ka'b, the son of Sa'd, the son of Zayd Manāt, the son of Ṭamīm, the son of Murrah. The tribe named after him is very numerous and has produced a great number of remarkable men, some of whom were Companions of the Prophet. They were all surnamed al-Minqarī. Such were Khālīd, the son of Ṣafwān, and Shabīb, the son of Shabbah<sup>3</sup>. Ṣafwān and Shabbah were the sons of 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn al-Aktham al-Minqarī. Khālīd and Shabīb were noted as good orators, speaking with elegance and precision. Khālīd had frequent sittings with the Commander of the faithful, al-Ṣaffāh, as is well-known and Shabīb was often in the society of (the khalifs) al-Manṣūr, al-Mahdī and others. Mention has been made of them both in our article on al-Buḥtūrī (No. 743).

1 In the bibliographical dictionary of Ḥājī Khālifāh, four works are mentioned which bear this title.

2 Ḥājī Khālifāh gives the titles of five works composed by Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Marzubānī.

3 See No. 295, note. Two MSS, and the lithographed text of Ibn Quṭaybah's Kitāb al-Ma'ārif read Shaybah.

772 ABŪ MUḤAMMAD AL-YAZĪDĪ

Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā Ibn al-Mubārak Ibn al-Mughīrah al-'Adawī, surnamed al-Yazīdī, was a teacher of the Qur'ānic readings, a grammarian and a philologist. He studied under Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā al-Baṣrī (No. 480), the great teacher of the readings, and succeeded him in that occupation. He inhabited Baghdād and there taught Traditions which he had learned from Abū 'Amr, Ibn Jurayj (No. 350) and others. Traditions were received from him and transmitted down by his son Muḥammad, by Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām (No. 509) by Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī (No. 84), by a number of his own sons and grandsons, by Abū 'Umar al-Dūrī (164, note)<sup>1</sup>, Abū Ḥamdūn al-Ṭayyib* Ibn Ismā'il<sup>2</sup>, Abū Shu'ayb al-Sūsī<sup>3</sup>, 'Āmir Ibn 'Umar al-Mawṣilī<sup>4</sup>, Abū Kḥallād Sulaymān Ibn Kḥallād and others. He differed from Abū 'Amr respecting the manner of reading a few words in the Qur'ān, having adopted for them a manner of his own. As he had been preceptor to the children of Yazīd Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yazīd al-Ḥimyarī<sup>5</sup>, (the Kḥlaif) al-Mahdī's maternal uncle, he was surnamed al-Yazīdī (the Yazīdīyan). Hārūn al-Rashīd, to whose service he was subsequently attached, confided to him the education of his son al-Māmūn, who was still a child<sup>6</sup>. Abū Muḥammad al-Yazīdī was considered as a trustworthy Traditionist, a learned Qur'ān-reader and an elegant speaker; he was well acquainted with the idioms of the (desert) Arabs, skilled in grammar and veracious (as a Traditionist). A number of fine works were

1 The manuscripts and the printed editions read Abū 'Amr, but I follow the excellent copy of the Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā which is in the Bibl. imp., ancient fonds, No. 742; see fol. 52.

2 Abū Ḥamdūn al-Ṭayyib Ibn Ismā'il al-Dḥuhli, a native of Baghdād and a teacher of the Qur'ān-reading was noted for the sanctity of his life. The date of his death is not given. (Ṭab al-Qurrā, f. 53).

3 Abū Shu'ayb Ṣāliḥ Ibn Ziyād al-Sūsī, a Qur'ān-reader of great authority, died A.H. 261 (A.C. 874-5), aged upwards of ninety years. (Ṭab al-Qurrā, f. 53.)

4 Abū 'l-Faṭḥ 'Āmir Ibn 'Umar, a native of Moṣul, a teacher of the Qur'ān-readings and a Traditionist, died A.H. 250 (A.C. 864-5).—(Ṭab al-Qurrā, f. 60).

5 Our author speaks of this chief at the end of the present article.

6 The Arabic proverb says: He placed al-Māmūn in his lap.

* Al-Ṭāibib (physician) in 'Abd al-Ḥamid.—Ed.

composed by him. His views were just and his poetry (so good that it) was collected into a dlwān. The philological work entitled Kitāb al-Nawādir (book of rarities) was drawn up by him on the plan of the Nawādir which al-Aṣma'i (No. 354) composed for Ja'far the Barmakid (No. 129), and contains designedly, the same number of leaves as that treatise. He obtained his knowledge of pure Arabic and of the history of the people (the adventures and quarrels of the Arabic tribe) from Abū 'Amr (Ibn al-'Alā), al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad (No. 208) and other learned men of that age. Abū Ḥamdūn al-Ṭayyib* related as follows: "I met the son of Abū 'l-'Atāhiyah (No. 91) who had just taken down in writing a mass of information which had been dictated to him by Abū Muḥammad al-Yazīdī, and all of which the latter declared to have received from Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā. It filled nearly one thousand jilds (or skins), each jild forming about ten leaves: so there were ten thousand leaves in all." Al-Yazīdī obtained an immense quantity of philological information from al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad, and wrote down under his dictation the rules of prosody, which science that master had just begun to discover, he placed, however, his principal reliance on Abū 'Amr, whose extensive acquaintance with pure Arabic he highly appreciated. At one time, he kept a school for boys, opposite to the house in which Abū 'Amr resided, and was then admitted into the familiarity of that doctor, who became very partial to him on account of his quick intelligence. The information transmitted down by him is considered as perfectly genuine. His works are the: Nawādir of which we have just spoken, the Maqṣūr wa al-Mamdūd (on the short and the long alif), a compendium of grammar and a treatise on the vowels (nuqāt) and diacritical points (shakl). Ibn al-Munādī related as follows: "I frequently asked about (the moral character of) Abū Muḥammad al-Yazīdī, his veracity and his credibility as a relator of Traditional knowledge. These questions I addressed to a number of our Shaykhs, some of them professors of Arabic, other of Qur'ān-reading and others of Traditions; and they all declared that he was trustworthy and veracious, and that he never felt fatigue nor dislike in the pursuit even of the slightest information which could be obtained from oral Tradition. 'But', said they, 'he was suspected of being inclined towards the doctrines of the Mu'tazilites.' " Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām taught the text of the Gharīb (unusual and obscure expressions of the Qur'ān and the Traditions) on the sole authority of Abū Muḥammad al-Yazidī, because he well knew the eminent merit of that doctor. In the reign of al-Rashīd, al-Yazidī and al-Kisā'i (No. 408) held sittings together and taught Qur'ān-reading to the public. Al-Kisā'i was preceptor to al-Amin (the son of al-Rashīd), and al-Yazidī to al-Māmūn (the other son). By the order of that khalif, al-Kisā'i taught his pupil the system of reading (harf) adopted by Ḥamzah (No. 199) and al-Yazidī taught him the system of Abū 'Amr (Ibn al-'Alā). "Al-Yazidī," said al-Aṭhram (No. 531, note), "entered one day into the house of al-Khalīl Ibn Aḥmad and found him seated on a cushion. Al-Khalīl made room for him and invited him to sit down beside him. Al-Yazidī did so and then said: 'I am sure that I inconvenience you.' 'Nay,' replied al-Khalīl, "no place is too narrow for two friends or too wide for two enemies.' " Al-Māmūn, having asked al-Yazidī about something, received from him this answer: "No; and may God accept my life as a ransom for yours, Commander of the faithful!" "Well said!" exclaimed the Khalif, "never was the word and better placed than in the phrase which you have just uttered!" He then made him a present. "One day," said al-Yazidī, "I went to see al-Māmūn; all nature was smiling<sup>2</sup>, and his female musician Nu'ām*, who was one of the handsomest women of the age, was singing to him an air of which these were the words:

1 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Ja'far al-Munādī, a celebrated Traditionist and Qur'ān-reader, was highly esteemed for the exactitude of his information, his knowledge of history and his acquaintance with pure Arabic. He died in the month of Muḥarram, 336 (July-August, A.C. 947). Ṭab. al-Qurrā, f. 78).

* Al-Ṭabīb in 'Abd al-Ḥimīd.—Ed.

"You pretended that I had wronged (you) and, fled from me, but in flying, you shot an arrow which pierced me to the heart. You did well to fly ; but be indulgent and pardon me ; this is the spot where the proscrip̄t finds a refuge ; this is the place to which he whom love has afflicted may retreat, to which he whose eyes have been wounded by your beauty may run for protection. You have robbed my heart of its ease, yet, may God never paralyse the hand which committed that theft ! ”

1 Had the word and not been inserted, the phrase would have signified: May God not accept my life, etc.

2 Such appears to be the meaning of the expression al-dunyā ghādhdhah, which signifies literally: the world was flourishing.

* Omitted in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

Al-Māmūn made her sing the same piece three times and then said : ‘Tell me, Yazidī ! can there be anything (in life) better than what we are now engaged in?’ I answered: ‘There is, Commander of the faithful!’ ‘What is it?’ said he. I replied : ‘The giving of thanks to Him Who has granted to you this great and signal favour.’ He answered : ‘You are in the right and have said the truth. !’ He then, after making me a present, ordered one hundred thousand dirhams (£2,500) to be brought in, so that he might give it away in alms. I have still before my eyes the sight of purses as they were brought in and of the money as it was distributed.” Al-Yazidī complained, one day, to al-Māmūn of being in great need, by reason of debts which he had incurred. The khalif answered : “We have not, at present, means of giving you wherewithal you may obtain (the deliverance) you desire.” “Commander of the faithful,” said al-Yazidī, “I am reduced to great straits and my creditors are hard upon me. Think of some expedient for me.” Al-Māmūn reflected a little, and it was then agreed upon between them that al-Yazidī should come to the door of the palace, when the khalif was holding one of his familiar parties, and there write a note in which he would request to be admitted or to have one of the sovereign’s boon companions sent out to him. When the company were assembled, al-Yazidī came to the door and gave the servant a sealed letter. Al-Māmūn, to whom it was brought in, opened it and found that it contained these lines :

“Worthiest of brethren and of friends ! I am here, as a parasite, waiting at your door. Let me make one of the society or send out to me one of my companions (to keep me company).”

Al-Māmūn read the letter to those who were present and said : “It is not fit that such a parasite should enter here, in such a state (as we are).” He then sent out to him this message : “Your entrance here, at this hour, is impossible ; choose for yourself the person whom you wish for a boon companion.” When al-Yazidi received this missive, he answered “I can make for myself no better choice than ‘Abd Allāh Ibn Tāhir (No. 318).” Al-Māmūn then said to ‘Abd Allāh : “His choice has fallen on you, so you must go out to him.” The other replied : Commander of the faithful ! must I become the associate of a parasite ?” The khalīf answered ; I cannot possibly turn him from his intention ; but you have the choice of going out to him or of avoiding that obligation by paying a fine.” “I shall give him ten thousand dirhams (£500),” exclaimed ‘Abd Allāh. “I do not think,” said al-Māmūn that, for so small a sum, he will forego the pleasure of your company.” ‘Abd Allāh then offered ten thousand more, and then another ten, whilst the khalīf continued to say : “I do not think that enough for him.” When the offer mounted up to one hundred thousand dirhams, al-Māmūn said : “Send them to him quickly.” ‘Abd Allāh wrote a draught on his intendant for the sum and sent it off by a messenger. Al-Māmūn then said (to al-Yazidī) : “In the present case, it is better for you to accept this sum than to carouse with ‘Abd Allāh Ibn Tāhir whilst he is in his present state.” Al-Yazidī consented to receive the money. He (al-Māmūn ?) was very adroit in every thing he did. Abū Aḥmad Ja‘far al-Balkhī<sup>1</sup> relates in his book<sup>2</sup>, that al-Yazidī asked al-Kisā‘ī’s opinion respecting the following verses :

“I do not think that a kharab can be hatched from its egg by a falcon. The ‘ayr is not a horse’s foal, (it) is not ; the foal (is but) a foal.”

The word kharab signifies a male bustard<sup>3</sup>, and ‘ayr’ means the male of the onager. Al-Kisā‘ī answered that the last of 1 Abu Aḥmad Ja‘far Ibn ‘Abd Allāh al-Balkhī was a doctor of the Ḥanafī sect and the author of some controversial works, the titles of which are given by Ḥājī Khalīfah, in his Bibliographical Dictionary. The year of his death is not mentioned.

2 I am unable to indicate the title of this book, the author having composed more works than one.

3 In Arabic, hubāra. Dr. Shaw has given a description of it in his Travels.

the words) foal ought to be in the accusative, because it is the object of the verb to be (which in Arabic governs the accusative)<sup>1</sup>; so, that being admitted, there is, in the rhyme, a fault of the kind called iqwā.<sup>2</sup> "Nay" replied al-Yazīdī, "the verse is correct, for the phrase finishes with the second is not, which merely serves to corroborate the first. After these words, the poet enounces a new proposition and says: The foal (is but) a foal." He then (bowed so low that he) struck the floor with his bonnet and exclaimed: "(It is) I, Abū Muḥammad, (who say so!)," Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd the Barmakide (who was there present, felt scandalised at this conduct and) said to him: "How dare you (be so familiar as to) pronounce your surname in the presence of the Commander of the faithful? By Allāh! al-Kisā'i's mistake joined to his good breeding, is better than your right answer, joined to your unpoliteness." To this, al-Yazīdī answered: "The sweetness of my triumph put me off my guard." I must here observe that al-Kisā'i was wrong in saying that the verse contained an iqwā, for, in the technical language of the prosodians, the term iqwā designates specially a change in the grammatical inflexion (or vowel) which accompanies the letter (or consonant) forming the rhyme, and this change consists in nothing more than the substitution of an o (the sign of the nominative) for an i (the sign of the genitive), or vice versa; that is, one of the rhyme-consonants takes an o and the other an i; but if the discordance exists between two verses, so that one rhyme-consonant takes an a (the sign of the accusative) and the other an o or an i, that irregularity is not called an iqwā but an īṣrāf. Abū 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arrī (No. 46) alludes irregularities in one of his longer poems containing a lament on the death of the Sharīf al-Tāhir, the father of al-Riḍā (No. 641) and of al-Murtaḍā (No. 418); he thus describes the croaking of the raven:

---

1 Al-Kisā'i, meant to say that muhro, which is the last word of the verse and in the nominative case, should have been put in the accusative and pronounced muhra. He was mistaken.

2 For the meaning of this technical term and those which occur farther, on, see de Sacy's Truite de prosodie arabe and Freytag's Darstellung der Arabischen Verskunst.

"It is modelled on the 'iḡā and is devoid of iqwā, or ikfā, and of īṣrāf.<sup>1</sup> "

This verse being connected (by its meaning) with those which precede, cannot be rendered intelligible unless the other be cited, and that we think unnecessary to do here. I merely quote it as an example ; that is all. Some say that the īṣrāf is a variety of the iqwā ; if that be so, al-Kisā'i was right in what he said. This paragraph is a superfluity but contains some useful information. The greater part of al-Yaḡīdī's poetry is good. Hārūn Ibn al-Munajjim (No. 753) speaks of him in the Kitāb al-Bārī and gives some fragments of his composition ; such, for instance, are the following satirical lines, directed against al-Aṣma'i al-Bāhili (No. 354) :

"You who pretend to draw your origin from Aṣma', tell me how you are connected with that noble race ? Are you not a man whose genealogy, if verified, proves that you descend from Bāhilah ? " 2

"This last verse" said Ibn al-Munajjim, "is one of the most satirical which have been composed by the later poets." I may add that the idea contained in it is borrowed from the following verse in which Ḥammād 'Ajrād (No. 197) attacked Bashshār, the son of Burd (No. 110) :

"You call yourself the son of Burd, though you are the son of another man ; or, grant that Burd married your mother ; who was Burd ? "

Here is another of his (al-Yaḡīdī's) satirical pieces :

"Be careful not to lose the friendship of Abu 'l-Muqātil, when you approach (to partake of) his meal. Breaking his crumplet, is, for him, as bad as breaking one of his limbs. His guests fast against their will and without meaning to obtain the (spiritual) reward which is granted to fasting."

1 These terms of prosody have probably other significations in the ordinary language, but it is not necessary to indicate them.

2 "More despicable than a Bāhili" was a common proverb among the Arabs.

In our article on al-Mubarrad, we have given (No. 610) a passage taken from one of al-Yazidi's poems and directed against Shaybah Ibn al-Walid. Amongst the numerous anecdotes and stories which he handed down, we may notice the following: "A man, pretending to be a Prophet, was arrested and taken before (the khalif) al-Mahdi: 'Are you a Prophet?' said al-Mahdi: 'I am' said the prisoner. 'To whom were you sent (on a mission)?' The man replied: 'Did you allow me to go to any person? why, the very moment I received my mission, you cast me into prison!' The khalif laughed and said: 'Go and be converted unto God.'" Al-Yazidi had five sons who became distinguished as men of learning, philologers, poets and narrators of historical anecdotes. Their names were Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibrāhīm, Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il, 'Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Ubayd Allāh and Abū Ya'qūb Ishāq. All of them composed works on philology and genuine Arabic. Muḥammad, who was the eldest, was also the best poet among them<sup>1</sup>. According to Di'bīl al-Khuzā'i (No. 213), he was the author of these lines:

"Why should you travel about when the person whom you love (and pursue) dwells in a fixed abode? That, assuredly, is an enormous fault. As long as you assist Fortune and Care against yourself, whom can you have to blame? (The lover answered): I am miserable, yet shall I never think of her with indifference, neither will she be clement, though, by her, I am miserable."

He composed also these lines:

"O thou whose dwelling is so far off! thou whose name is always on my tongue and whose image is in my heart<sup>2</sup>. The vicissitudes of Fortune may remove thee to a distant land, yet still shall my desires bring near to me thy image."

He composed a great quantity of good poetry and assisted his father in the education of al-Māmūn. In the latter part of his life he became dull of hearing. When al-Māmūn set out for 1 For an account of the members of the Yazidi family, most of whom were distinguished literary men, see professor Flügel's Grammatische Schulen der Araber, p. 90.

2 Literally: who are joined to my heart and to my tongue.

Khurāsān, he (Muḥammad al-Yazīdī) went with him, and remained in his service after their arrival in the city of Marw. He continued to reside there till the accession of al-Mu'taṣim; whom he then accompanied to Egypt, where he died. His father, Abū Muḥammad, died A.H. 202 (A.C. 817-8) in Khurāsān, and probably at Marw, whither he had accompanied al-Māmūn from Baghdād and where the latter had established his residence. I since found in Abū 'Amr al-Dānī's<sup>1</sup> Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā (chronological list of Qur'ān-readers), that he died at Marw in the year just mentioned, but the author then adds these words: "Ibn al-Munādī related that, according to what he had heard, he lived to within a few years of a century and died at Baṣrah; but the first statement is the truest." God knows best! We have already spoken of his grandson Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Muḥammad al-Yazīdī (No. 614), and given the date of his death with some account of him and of his merit. ('Adawī) means belonging to the family of 'Adī, who was the son of 'Abd-Manāt, the son of Udud, the son of Ṭābikhah, the son of al-Yās, the son of Muḍar, the son of Nizār, the son of Ma'add, the son of 'Adnān. The descendants of 'Adī formed a numerous and celebrated tribe. Abū Muḥammad al-Yazīdī belonged to it in the quality of a mawlā; his grandfather, al-Mughīrah, having been the enfranchised slave of an 'Adawide woman and having therefore been surnamed al-'Adawī. At the beginning of this article we have explained the meaning of the surname al-Yazīdī and mentioned who Yazīd was; I need not repeat that account here. Many of al-Yazīdī's descendants were men of eminent talent and renown, authors of books and composers of charming and celebrated poems. Some of these pieces I should give here, were I not apprehensive of lengthening this article too much. The posterity of al-Yazīdī were highly proud of the work composed by his son Ibrāhīm and entitled Mā ittafaq lafẓuh etc. (list of homonyms). This treatise contains every term which has different significations. I saw a copy of it in four volumes. It is a most valuable work and affords an evident proof of the vast learning and extensive information possessed by the author. Other good and useful works were composed by the same person. This also may be said of the other members of his family: they composed works which are in great repute. Yazīd the Ḥimyarite, who was the maternal uncle of (the khalif) al-Mahdī, held a high rank under the 'Abbāsids and acted as governor of Baṣrah and of Yaman in the name of al-Manṣūr. He died at Baṣrah, A.H. 165 (A.C. 781-2). It was of him that Bashshār Ibn Burd said:

---

<sup>1</sup> See No. 713. One of al-Dānī's works is a manual for the student of the Qur'ānic readings, and is entitled the Muqni'. Its contents have been made known to us by Mr. de Sacy, in the Notices et Extraits, t. VIII. See also t. XX, p. 456 of the same work in the second part of my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Prolegomena.

"Abū Khālīd! you who, when young, were an able swimmer in the ocean (of generosity), are encamped on its border, now that you are grown old. You were formerly beneficent, but you fell back from that habit, till you went treading in the beaten path of ordinary men. The rank to which you attained is exalted to an extreme degree and, to an extreme also, has your fair renown declined; you are like 'Abd Allāh's cat, which, when young, was sold for a dirham and, when old, for a qirāṭ." <sup>1</sup>

After searching uselessly for the anecdote of 'Abd Allāh's cat in the works which I imagined would have contained it, I consulted the persons who were versed in those matters but could obtain no information on the subject. I then met with the following verses, the author of which was al-Farazdaq (No. 763):

"I saw other people increase in honour, day by day, whilst your honour gradually declined. (You are) like the cat which, when young, bears a high value and, when old, is cheap."

It was from these verses that Bashshār borrowed his idea; he did not mean a particular cat, but meant to say that every cat which, when young, was sold dear, lost its value when it grew old.

773 AL-TIBRĪZĪ.*

Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Bisṭām al-Shaybānī al-Tibrīzī (a member of the tribe of Shaybān and native of Tabriz), generally known by the title of al-Khaṭīb (the preacher) was one of the great masters in (the science of Arabic) philology, and possessed a perfect knowledge of polite literature, such as grammar and philology. He made his studies under Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri (No. 33), Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Alī al-Raqqī<sup>1</sup>, Abū Muḥammad al-Dahhān the philologist<sup>2</sup>, and other literary men. He heard Traditions delivered, in the town of Šūr (Tyre), by the legist Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Sulaym Ibn Ayyūb al-Rāzī (No. 251) Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Yusuf al-Dallāl al-Sāwī<sup>3</sup>, Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Raqqī and others. Traditions were delivered on his authority by the Khaṭīb and ḥafīẓ Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Thābit (No. 33), the author of the History of Baghdād, by the ḥafīẓ Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir<sup>4</sup>, Abū Maṣṣūr Mawhūb Ibn Aḥmad al-Jawālīqī (No. 724), Abu 'l-Ḥasan Sa'd al-Khaṭayr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sahl al-Anda-

<sup>1</sup> By the term qirāṭ, the poet probably meant to designate the twenty-fourth part of the dirham.

* The Arabs pronounce it thus.—Ed.

1 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn Zunayn (زَيْن) al-Raqqī (a native of Raqqah, in Mesopotamia) and an inhabitant of Baghdād, was highly distinguished for his talents. He was versed in grammar, Arabic philology, polite literature and the art of calculating inheritance shares. He composed also a work on the theory of the rhyme; in prosody. One of his masters was Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri. His death took place in the year 450 (A.C. 1058-9). Suyūṭī's Biographical Dictionary of grammarians and literary men; ms. of the Bibl. imp., supplement, n. 683.

2 Our author has already noticed an Abū Muḥammad Sa'id Ibn al-Mubārak al-Dahhān (No. 247), a grammarian of great celebrity; but the Abū Muḥammad al-Dahhān of whom he speaks here, lived in the preceding century, and was the son of Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī. He was an able grammarian, versed in Arabic philology, jurisprudence and the Qur'ān-readings. In his lectures on jurisprudence, he adhered to the system followed in 'Irāq (the doctrine of Abū Ḥanīfah), and, in dogmatic theology, he followed the system of the Mu'tazilites. He taught also the Traditions and had al-Ṭibrizī for a pupil. He was very negligent in his dress. Died A.H. 447 (A.C. 1055.)—Suyūṭī's Grammarians.

3 Various readings: al-Sayyārī, al-Sayyādī:

4 Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir, one of the great Traditionists of 'Irāq, was born A.H. 467 (A.C. 1074-5). He became eminent as a grammarian, philologist, legist and historian. He died in the month of Šha'bān, A.H. 550 (October, A.C. 1155)—(Tabaqāt al-Ḥuffāẓ.)

lusi<sup>1</sup> and other distinguished men. A great number of students commenced and finished their education under him. The ḥāfiẓ Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī (No. 370) speaks of him in the Dhayl and in the Ansāb; he enumerates his merits and says: "I heard Abū Maṣṣūr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Khayrūn<sup>2</sup>, the teacher of the Qur'ān readings, state that Abū Zakariyā Yaḥyā Ibn 'Alī al-Tibrizī did not hold a satisfactory conduct; he then related some things respecting him and said: 'I asked the ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn Nāṣir his opinion of what Ibn Khayrūn had said (concerning al-Tibrizī's character), but he kept silent as if he would not contradict what had been said<sup>3</sup>, but he at length declared that al-Tibrizī, as a philologist, was a sure authority and that the information which he handed down was worthy of credit.'" Al-Tibrizī composed some instructive works on literature, such as a commentary on the Ḥamāsah (No. 143), a commentary on al-Mutanabbī's (No. 49) poems, a 1 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Sa'd al-Khayr Ibn Muḥammad al-Anṣārī, a native of Valencia in Spain, received also the surname of al-Ṣīnī (the Chinese) because he had gone to China in search of Traditional information. After encountering many dangers in his travels, he fixed his residence in Baḥḥad, where he studied jurisprudence under the celebrated doctor Abū Ḥāmid al-Ḥazzālī. Subsequently to a journey made to Iṣbahān, where he heard Traditions taught by the doctors of that city, he returned to Baḥḥad, studied the belles-lettres under Yaḥyā al-Tibrizī and died there, in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 541 (June-July., A.C. 1146).—(Al-Maqqarī. Arabic text, vol. I, p. 895).

2 Abū Maṣṣūr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Khayrūn, a native of Baḥḥad and teacher of the Qur'ān-readings, was noted for the surety of his information and the sanctity of his life. He composed a work on the readings entitled al-Miftāḥ (the key) and died in the month of Rajab A.H. 530 (January, A.C. 1145) at an advanced age.—(Tabaqāt al-Qurra, no. 742, fol. 148).

3 Tibrizī's moral character does not appear in the best light, if we may judge after a piece of verse composed by him and given farther on. Ibn Khayrūn must have often been scandalized by facts of this nature, as the most eminent doctors and many of the sovereigns who patronized poets and literary men, took the greatest pleasure in composing and listening to poems which cannot be transferred, undisguised, into any European language. Ibn Khallikān himself cites, with complacency, verses which do not admit of a literal translation. Amongst the Muslim princes, ulamā, qādis and poets, there were probably but few who could say, with Ovid: Amore puerorum et minus.

commentary on Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri's (No. 46) Dīwān entitled Siq̣ al-Zand<sup>1</sup>, a commentary on the seven Mu'allaqahs, a commentary on the Mufaḍḍaliyāt<sup>2</sup>, a Tahdhib (or remodeling) of the Gharib al-Ḥadīth<sup>3</sup>, a Tahdhib of the Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq<sup>4</sup>. He is the author of a good introduction to grammar, having for object the elucidation of the secrets of that art; this work is very rare. He composed also a treatise on prosody and rhyme, entitled al-Kāfi (the sufficient), a treatise on the parsing of the Qur'ān, to which he gave the title of al-Mulakhkḥaṣ (the summary) and a copy of which I saw in four volumes. His commentary on the Ḥamāsah forms three works, the greater commentary, the middle and the less<sup>5</sup>. Other works also were composed by him. We have related in our article on the Khaṭīb Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī what passed between that historian and al-Tibrizī, when the latter was studying under him at Damascus and to that article we refer the reader<sup>6</sup>. He (al-Tibrizī) studied polite literature at the Nizāmiyah college in Damascus. The motive which induced him to go to Abu 'l-'Alā al Ma'arri, was, that having procured a copy of Abū Maṣṣūr al-Azhari's (No. 613) Kitāb al-Tahdhib, in four small volumes, he wished to verify the correctness of its text under the direction of some person well versed in 1 See de Sacy's Chrestomathie, arabe, t. III, p. 90.

2 The Mufaḍḍaliyāt is a collection of ancient poems. An edition of this rare and precious compilation with al-Marzūqī's commentry, is to be published at Berlin by Mr. Gosche.

3 Gharib al-Ḥadīth means rare and obscure expressions occurring in the Traditions. A number of works were composed on this subject, but the most noted was that of Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām (No. 509).

4 The work entitled Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq (correction of discourse) was composed by Ibn al-Sikkīt, a philologer whose life will be found in this work.

5 Tibrizī's middle commentary on the Ḥamāsah is that which has been published by Freytag. It is frequently diffuse and unsatisfactory. The information borrowed by the author from his predecessors is often very useful, but his own communications are generally philological futilities. In explaining the verses of the text, he disserts on what is simple and evident, but seldom attempts to clear up a real difficulty.

6 The passage to which our author refers is not to be found in any of the manuscripts. It is absent also in the printed editions.

philology, and Abu 'l-'Alā was indicated to him as the fit man. He put the volumes into a bag and carried them on his back from Tabriz to al-Ma'arra, not having the means of hiring whereon to ride. The transpiration penetrated from his back into the books and left on them marks of humidity. They are now in a waqf<sup>1</sup> at Baghdād, and, when a person not acquainted with what happened, sees them, he thinks that they must have remained for some time under water; these stains are, however, nothing else than the sweat of al-Tibrizī. So I find it related in the history of the grammarians composed by al-Qāḍi al-Akrām Ibn al-Qifṭī, the wazīr, of Aleppo (No. 510, note). God knows if his account be true! Al-Tibrizī went to Egypt when a young man and had there for a pupil the Shaykh Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ṭāhir Ibn Bābshād, the grammarian (No. 280) to whom he communicated some philological information. He then returned to Baghdād and continued to reside there till the day of his death. He taught from memory a great number of poems which he had learned from the author, Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn al-Muẓaffar Ibn Muḥayriz<sup>2</sup> al-Baghdādī; such, for instance as the following piece, given by al-Sam'ānī in that article of the Dhayl, which treats of the Khaṭīb al-Tibrizī. It is the best known of that poet's productions:

"O my two friends! how sweet were the morning draughts which I took on the bank of the Tigris and yet sweeter were those of evening at al-Ṣarāt<sup>3</sup>. Near these two streams I drank the liquor of a vine; it was like melted cronelian, and they were like liquid pearls. Two moons were then present; one, that of the heavens and the other a moon (a young beauty) of the earth; one inspiring desire for the sweets of love, the other enamoured. I kept filling the cup (for that earthly moon) and sipping nectar from her lips whilst she kept filling for me and drinking from my lips.

---

1 No. 729.

2 According to some MSS. Nahrir. The person who bore this name is not noticed in the works consulted by the translator.

3 No. 129, note.

I said to the full moon (of heaven): 'Do you know who is this?' and she answered: 'I do; it is my twin sister!.'"

These verses are the finest and the most elegant which poetry can offer. The idea expressed in the second verse is borrowed from Abū Bakr al-Dāni Ibn Labbānah (No. 660), who said, in a long qaṣīdah which he composed in praise of al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād (No. 660), the sovereign of Seville:

"I asked his brother, the (bountiful) ocean, what he thought of al-Mu'tamid and he answered: He is my brother; but he is always tranquil and sweet."

It was not sufficient for the poet to represent that prince as the brother of the ocean, but he must add that he was tranquil and sweet, whereas, the ocean is agitated and salt. This is an example of pure and original eulogium. The qaṣīdah itself begins thus:

"She wept on bidding me farewell, and her fellow-travellers knew not whether those tears were drops of dew or pearls fresh (from the shell). She was followed by a band (of maidens), Nay! I am wrong; the word band cannot be said of stars shining through the darkness of night."

This poem is of considerable length, and I therefore abstain from giving it all, lest I should be drawn away from my subject. The khaṭīb (al-Tibrizī) related that the following lines were recited to him by the author, who was the Ibn Muḥayriz above mentioned:

"Maidens of the tribe of Muḍar! (your companion) Salmā is sister to the moon (in beauty). O may Salmā never afflict me (with her disdain)! she has abandoned my eyes to unceasing wakefulness. Whether she turn away from me or towards me, my heart's blood is equally in peril. I have lodged the whiteness of her teeth in the black (core) of my heart and (the pupil) of my eye."

He himself composed some poetry, such, for instance, as the following lines:

---

1 In this translation the word sister is placed for brother and the gender of certain pronouns has been changed. For the reason see note 3 on page 277.

"Some persons are surfeited with a day's travelling, but I am surfeited with dwelling in the same place. I have resided in 'Irāq amongst the vilest of men, descendants of the vile."

He related also that al-'Imād* al-Fayyād wrote to him as follows :

"Say to Yahyā, the son of 'Alī, though discourse assumes various characters, yet, mine contains neither falsehood nor deception ; (say to him) : You are merit in person, when the eyes of men are turned towards merit ; true merit has obtained, through you, its real value. All those who once existed are surpassed by you, and those who now exist are fatigued in following your footsteps. You were born under one of those conjunctions which occur after a lapse of many centuries. Other men, compared with you, are as cloudy weather compared to a clear sky. When inquiries are made respecting them, the accounts received are various ; from what we have heard and seen, (some are like) level plains and (others like) rugged ground. If we weighed against you all who ever existed, (we would find you to be) a king (and them mean) artisans. What are now (the tribes of) Shaybān and Azd ? all said respecting them is mere conjecture. You are the stem of (the tree of) learning and other men are only its branches. You are the ocean, and the men most distinguished for their merit are mere springs of water. The sword, if put ( ح ) to the test, is far superior to scabbards. The mu'allā is not equal to the fadd, neither is Ḥajūn to be compared with Makkāh's temple<sup>1</sup>, Mirth and levity may amuse, but serious affability is far above them. White females and brown are not on an equality in beauty. A married female may please, but nothing is so charming as a young virgin. I said to the envious : 'Be whatever you wish to be ; he who shoots farthest obtains the prize, whether you be proud or humble.' May your life endure as long as the definition of motion differs from that of rest ! May your wishes be accomplished as long as birds dwell in nests! My affection for you has been carefully preserved from all admixtures which alter affection; in me its exterior manifestation is not in disaccord with the interior; nay, the love which my heart bears towards you is formed of sincerity. Make a wager (about it), for wagers are sometimes made on love-matters; if one man be deceitful, another is sincere."

1 The Arabs of the desert made use of ten arrows in casting lots : each arrow had a particular mark and a particular name. That which gained the entire pool was called the mu'allā ; that which entitled the drawer to one seventh of the pool was called the fadd.—Ḥajūn was the name of a valley near Makkah.

* Al-'Amīd in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

Ibn al-Jawālīqī (No. 724) relates that his Shaykh the Khaṭīb Abū Zakariyā (al-Tibrizī) said to him: I then wrote to al-'Imād al-Fayyād these verses:

"Say to al-'Imād*; the brother of high eminence: I am but a drop of water from your overflowing ocean. You have raised me to honour and gained me high renown, in bestowing on me so ample a vestment of eulogium. Out of your gracious bounty you have clothed me in a raiment of poetry, and I, proud of that attire, have marched about in the height (of glory) and in the gardens (of delight). I here give you a pebble in return for a pearl which was the produce of a cultivated mind. My genius would be at a stop, did it attempt any thing similar; it could hardly produce a fraction (of such excellence as yours). How could a streamlet compete with the vast ocean? how could a pebble be compared with a pearl? You, the able horse man in (the career of) that jewel-adorned poetry and that prose which dissipate even the pains of sickness! you who, by your abilities, aim at the highest point (of perfection and attain it)! know that my talent cannot reach so far. Impose not on me the task of giving you fitting praise; such a duty I am unable to fulfil. My talent has been always too feeble; for poetry; I have often turned away from making verses, and even with great aversion. Be then so kind as to excuse me; I avow that, compared with your abundance, talent like mine is poverty".

Al-Tibrizī was born in the year 421 (A. C. 1030); he died suddenly at Baghdād on Tuesday, the 27th of the latter Jumādā 502 (1st Feb., A. C. 1109), and was interred in the cemetery at the Ābriz gate. In Bisṭām, the letter b is followed by an i. We have already spoken of Shaybānī (No. 42) and of Tibrizī (No. 570): so, we need not repeat our observations.

* al-'Amīd in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

774 IBN MUṬĪ AL-ZAWĀWĪ

Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭī<sup>1</sup> Ibn 'Abd al-Nūr al-Zawāwī, surnamed Zayn al-Dīn (the ornament of religion), was a member of the Ḥanafī sect and one of the great masters of the age as a grammarian and a philologist. He resided at Damascus for a long time and had a great number of pupils to whom his tuition was highly profitable. Some useful works were composed by him<sup>2</sup>. Having removed to Miṣr (Old Cairo), on the invitation of al-Malik al-Kāmil (No. 668), he opened a course of literature in the mosque called al-Jāmi' al-'Atīq, and received, for his pains, a fixed salary. He remained there till his death; he died in New Cairo, towards the end of the month of Dhu 'l-Qa'dah, 628 (Sept., A.C. 1231), and was buried, the next day, on the border of the Khandaq (fosse) which is in the vicinity of the imām al-Shāfi'ī's mausoleum. His tomb is still to be seen. He was born in the year 564 (A.C. 1168-9). Zawāwī means belonging to the Zawāwā (Zoaves), a great tribe which, with its numerous branches and subdivisions, inhabits the country outside of Bijāyah (Bugia), a government (town) in the province of Ifriqiyah.

775 YAḤYĀ IBN AL-MUNAJJIM

Abū Aḥmad Yaḥyā was the son of 'Alī, the son of Yaḥyā, the son of Abū Maṣṣūr, surnamed al-Munajjim (the astrologer),

1 It is probably by error that this surname is here written Ibn Abd al-Muṭī'. In the grammar of Ibn Mālik, verse 5, and in the first verse of the author's own grammar (see Ḥājī Khalīfah's Bibliographical Dictionary, vol. I, p. 415), we read Ibn Muṭī', and such is the appellation by which he is generally known. In the Bibliographical Dictionary of the grammarians by al-Suyūṭī, the surname given to him is also Ibn Muṭī'.

2 His grammatical treatise entitled the Alfiyah, because it consisted of about one thousand verses, was in great repute till outdone by the treatise of Ibn Mālik which bears the same title. The Fuṣūl or aphorisms, another of Ibn Muṭī' 's grammatical works, had a great number of commentators.

and whose real name was Abbān* Ḥāsis, the son of Urid, the son of Kād, the son of Mihānidād Ḥāsis,† the son of Farukhdād‡ the son of Asad, the son of Mihr Ḥāsis, the son of Yezdegird (the last of the Sasanid kings of Persia). He commenced his career as a boon companion of al-Muwaffaq Abū Aḥmad Ṭalḥah, the son of the khalif al-Mutawakkil and the father of the khalif al-Mu'taḍid bi-Allāh. Al-Muwaffaq never became khalif, but acted as the lieutenant of his brother, al-Mu'tamid 'alā-Allāh, and was constantly engaged in fighting against the Qarmāṭs. As his achievements in this war are well-known and would furnish matter for a long narration, this is not a fit place for relating them. After (the death of) al-Muwaffaq Yaḥyā (Ibn al-Mu'ajjim) became the boon companion of the succeeding khalifs and, more particularly, of al-Muktafī bi-Allah, the son of al-Mu'tadid. He attained to a high rank in that prince's favour and was preferred by him to all the other courtiers and table-companions. He professed these doctrines of scholastic theology which were received by the Mu'tazalites and wrote a number of treatises on that subject. Sitzings were held by him in the presence of al-Muktafī, and many shoolmen attended them. Amongst the numerous works composed by him, we may notice, the Bāhir (eminent) containing the history of such poets as had flourished under the two dynasties (that of the Umayyads and that of the 'Abbāsids). It begins by an article on Bashshār Ibn Burd (No. 110) and ends with another on Marwān Ibn Abī Ḥafṣah (No. 689). His son Abu 'l-Ḥasan Aḥmad Ibn Yaḥyā terminated this work, which had been left unfinished, and had the intention of adding to it an account of all the modern poets. He, in consequence, gave in it notices on Abū Dulāmah (No. 228) Wālibah Ibn al-Ḥubāb (No. 162, note). Yaḥyā Ibn Ziyād (No. 403) Muṭi' Ibn Iyās (No. 183, note), and Abū 'Alī al-Baṣīr. Abu 'l-Ḥasan was a scholastic theologian and, as a legist, he adhered to the system of jurisprudence drawn up by Abū Ja'far al-Ṭabari (No. 544). The (other) works composed by him were, a history of his own family, in which he traced its origin up to the Persians, the Ijmā' (general agreement) treating of al-Ṭabarī's system of jurisprudence, a Mudkhil (or introduction) to the study of that system and a vindication of its principles, a Kitāb al-Awqāt (treatise) on the hours of prayer (?), etc. His father, Yaḥyā, had many curious and amusing encounters with al-Mu'taḍid such, for instance as that which Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī al-Mas'ūdī (No. 559) gives in his Murūj al-Dīḥab. "Yaḥyā Ibn al-Munajjim," says he, related as follows: 'It was one day in the presence of al-Mu'taḍid, who was then in an angry mood. His mawlā, Badr, of whom he was very fond, came in and the khalīf, having distinguished him at a considerable distance, laughed aloud and asked me who was the poet that said:

* 'Abd al-Ḥamid inserts 'Ibn' between Abbān and Ḥāsis. Ed.

† Muḥṣid son of al-Ḥāsis in 'Abd al-Ḥamid. Ed.

‡ Marūḥdād in 'Abd al-Ḥamid. Ed.

"In her face is an intercessor which obliterates the wounds she inflicted on our hearts; whenever she intercedes, she is heard with deference?"

I replied: 'It was al-Ḥakam Ibn 'Amr al-Sārī<sup>1</sup>, who said so.' On this, he exclaimed: 'He has expressed the thought admirably well! let us hear the whole piece.' I, in consequence, recited to him these lines:

'O! how I suffer from a person who has driven away my sleep, so that it will return no more, and who has added fresh torments to those which afflicted my heart! The sun seems to be rising out of her shoulders, so handsome is her face; or rather, the moon is rising out of her buttoned vest. She is looked on with kindness by her lover, despite the wrongs he suffered from her (cruelty). and whatever she does is forgiven. In her face is an intercessor which obliterates the wounds she inflicted on our hearts; whenever she intercedes, she is heard with deference."

Abu 'l-Faḥ Ibn Kuṣḥājīm (No. 128, note), the celebrated poet, says, in that chapter of his work entitled al-Mayā'id wa 'l-Muṣārid, which treats of hunting lions with arrows, that Abū Aḥmad Yaḥyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā al-Munajjim, who was the boon companion of (the khalif) al-Muktafī bi-Allāh, related as follows: "The Commander of the faithful, al-Muktafī bi-Allāh, was displeased with me because, when he was about returning from al-Raqqah, I set out before him and made the first stage of the journey by water. This I had been induced to do by Abu 'l-Abbās Aḥmad, the son of 'Abd al-Šamad (No. 363) who asked me go in the same boat with him. I did not think that the khalif would be displeased by my doing so or offended at my leaving him and staying away. When we arrived at (the town of) al-Daliyah, he gave orders that I should be taken back to Qarqisiyah and remain there till I had killed a lion and sent it to him. I was therefore obliged to return, and a number of the vocal musicians, who had taken the water-conveyance, were sent back with me. I then wrote to khalif some verses, but could not induce him to relent; so, I returned to al-Raḥabah, and there went to lodge with Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Sa'id al-Quṭrubullī. I passed the time with him in the enjoyments of life; and we had drinking parties, morning, noon and night. He was highly pleased with my society. One of our companions was Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān, the grandson of (the wazir) Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyāt (No. 669). I then wrote from al-Raḥabah, to the wazir Abu 'l-Ḥusayn al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh (No. 438) and, in my letter, I enclosed a piece of verse which I requested him to read to al-Muktafī. It runs as follows:

<sup>1</sup> In some of the manuscripts this name is written al-Shirī.

[Abd al-Ḥamīd gives in the margin on the authority of Murūj: Al-Ḥakam Ibn Qanbarah al-Māzinū al-Baṣrī. Ed.

"Fortune would rather perish than procure us pleasure and unite us with our friends. She struck me and my brethren with an arrow which scared our souls and let them quite appealed. We were sent back when the rest of the company went forward on their way, and then our affliction was extreme. Were we told of such a misfortune as ours happening to any other, the recital would fill us with terror. We were ordered to hunt lions and, for my part, I should think it fortunate if the lion did not hunt us. Were we to disobey, then, you would find this (proverb) justified. What people can obey if asked above their force? Every task may be imposed on a man except that which is impossible. Princes are always fond of jesting, but their jests are accompanied with speedy favours. The wazir neglected us, and we were ruined: a man's deserts (even) is serving the cause of God, are (sometimes) unrequited. We stretched forth our hands to Him and our hopes took refuge in His bounty. He is an intercessor whose prayer is never rejected, even when the request of the ablest intercessor is not granted. The sports of kings brings on familiarity and fructify into gifts of real value.<sup>1</sup> You, the director of the khalif's empire! render us a service and speak to him in our favour: the best of men is he who is the most obliging."

This letter was put into the government letter-bag and sent off with Muḥammad Ibn Sulaymān, the dispatch bearer. When (the wazir) al-Qāsim received it, he did not lay it out of his hand till he went in to al-Muktafi and read to him both it and the poem. (The khalif) found the verses very good and gave orders that a letter should be immediately sent off, authorizing me to depart from the place where I was and to have myself provided with a conveyance, so that I might proceed to the (khalif's) court. In a very short time, the messenger brought me the letter and I started off. On arriving in Baghdād, I recited to al-Muktafi the following verses:

"The nights which appeared to me so short in the Karkh (a suburb) of Baghdād, seemed very long when I was in Qarqisiyah. Was it well done to depart and leave me there, like a pledge, me a stranger and unwell! I was the only one punished, yet I had accomplices in my fault; but patience! God is the only protector I require. If God grant that I return safe to Baghdād, before grief kills me, and, if He let me see that the khalif al-Muktafi, the descendant of the khalifs, he on whom our hopes are fixed, is still for me as he was, neither shewing me aversion nor disapprobation nor altered sentiments, then indeed, all the pains I suffered will appear light because they were inflicted with a good intention."

The khalif admired this piece and was much touched with its contents: I perceived even from his looks and tone of voice that he pitied me". The anecdotes told of him are numerous and many of his productions are beautiful. He was born in the year 241 (A.C. 855-6), and he died on the eve of Monday, the 13th of the first Rabi', A.H. 300 (28th October, A.C. 912). We have already spoken of his father 'Alī (No. 443), of his brother Hārūn (No. 759), and of his nephew 'Alī (No. 444). I did not then trace up their genealogy, not having discovered it till I was drawing up the present article. I give it here as I found it written in the Fihrist (No. 273, note), of Abū 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn Ishāq al-Nadīm, but I do not attempt fixing the orthography of the proper names, not having the means of verifying them; so I transcribe them here as I found them.

---

<sup>1</sup> Literally: saleable.

776 ABŪ BAKR IBN BAQĪ

Abū Bakr Yaḥyā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Baqī, a celebrated poet and a native of Cordova in Spain, was the author of the muwāshshahāt (stanzas, sonnets), which are so much admired. Al-Faṭḥ Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Qaysī (No. 500), speaks of him in these terms, in his Maṭmaḥ al-Anfus<sup>1</sup>: "He was expert in verse and prose, firm and regular in the texture of his style<sup>2</sup>; he possessed (great) qualities and, by the beauties of his (productions), he embellished the morning (assemblies and those of) the evening. In the career of perfection, he sped on and reached the goal, and he built (edifices) of information on the most solid columns. But Fortune refused him her favours. cut and severed the cord of his pasturing (in the enjoyments of life) she accomplished none of his projects, neither did she shed on him one drop of prosperity. She granted not to him (موغته) a just share of respect, and established him not in the fertility of a (rich) pasture-ground. He therefore became a rider (a crosser) of mountains, a traverser of deserts; never halting for a single day and never finding people with whom he had a right to be pleased. And moreover, his mistrustful imagination was not to be overcome by (the assurance of) safety; his mind was (fickle and) unstable, like the pearls of a broken necklace. (This continued) till Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Qāsim<sup>1</sup> snatched him out of that vacillation, granted to him the means of subsistence, raised him to the heaven in which he himself stationed, watered him with the stream of his bounty, furnished to him a retreat under the shelter of his (patronage) and prepared for him a path of comfort in which he might expatiate (as he liked). He (Ibn Baqī) lavished on him therefore (the finest of) his sayings, and, in return for many gifts, ennobled him in his rhymes, bestowed on him exclusively the most precious pearls (of poetry) and adorned his breast with the collars of brilliant qasīdahs". The same author speaks of him again in the Qalā'id al-Iqyān and says: "It was he who bore aloft the standard of poetry, who possessed the talent<sup>1</sup> of open declaration and indirect allusion; it was he who established the rules of that (art) and revealed its beauties; the (expressions the most) untractable became obedient to his will. When he drew up verses, he put to shame the row of pearls on a necklace, and produced (a poem) more beautiful than robes of flowered silk; and (yet) his evil fortune domineered (ظلم) over him, and the days of his (existence) never brightened up." The following piece is attributed to Abū Bakr (Ibn Baqī), but I do not find it given by al-Faḥ in either of the above mentioned works. It is, however, a very fine poem, one of the best composed by the author and the most generally known:

1 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ, better known by the surname of Ibn Kḥāqān, wrote in a style so affected, so full of obscure expressions and so extravagant in its metaphors, that the reader is very often in doubt respecting the true meaning of those turgid and pompous phrases. The extracts taken by Ibn Kḥallikān from his works have not been always reproduced correctly by the copyists, who evidently understood very imperfectly what they were writing. That may be seen in comparing the text of the passage here cited with that which al-Maqqarī, in his History of Spain, Vol. II, p. 59 of the Arabic edition, gives of the same passage. The translation here offered is probably not always exact.

2 Literally: numerous in the knotting of his threads and in the irregularity.

1 I can find no information respecting this Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Qāsim, but, from his names I am almost inclined to suppose that he descended from the Hammūdiye branch of the Idrisid family.

2 Literally: the sign, which probably means the distinguishing mark.

"Dearer to me, than the life of my father is that gazelle (maiden) whom my eyes saw with admiration (as she roamed) between al-'Udhayb and the banks of the (river) Bāriq. I asked her to let me gaze yet longer and thus allay the thirst of my passion, and she answered by a promise soon to be fulfilled. We passed the night in darkness under a canopy adorned with brilliant stars, and, whilst the night swept on, I handed to her a (liquor), dark as musk and, like it, fragrant to the smell. I held her to me (as closely) as the warrior grasps his sword; and her two long ringlets hung, like the sword-belt, round my neck. At length, drowsiness overcame her and I removed her (a little) from me whilst she clasped me in her arms. I placed her at a distance from the heart which loved her, so that she might not have under her head a palpitating pillow. When I saw the night drawing towards its end and perceived that its (dark) locks and the crown of its head were turning grey, I bade adieu to my beloved and said, with a sigh: 'Give me the pain of seeing you depart.'"

The ḥāfiẓ Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Ibn Dihyah (No. 472) has inserted some of these verses in the work which he entitled: al-Muṭrib min aṣḥ'ār ahl il-Maghrib (volume of amusement, extracted from poems composed by natives of the West). Another of Ibn Baqī's poems is a long qasidah in which he praises Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Qāsim, the same person who has been already mentioned in this article. Here is an extract from the eulogistic part:

"There are two lights which cannot be hidden from mortals; nobleness of character and beauty of aspect. Both are united in Yahyā; so, let him renounce to the (attempt of) concealing that superiority which is evident to all. In every land, his praises spread a perfume which surpasses that of the penetrating vapours arising from the censer. Add to his qualities; add to his generosity; you might as well add leaves to the forest, water to the rain-cloud<sup>1</sup>. On that generous man rests the calm of gravity joined to such courage as is displayed by the lion in his den. He is like the sword which, even when hidden in the scabbard, appals the hearts of those who inhabit towns. He surpasses (in bounty) the dark cloud, shedding its rains without interruption; he bestows as it does, but prayers are never offered up to obtain his beneficent showers. He puts to shame the copious ocean; for, in each of his hands, are five seas. I am come to obtain a share of your beneficence, which is as the pouring forth of the rains, or rather, the pure water of paradise. I saw that the countenance of prosperity, near you, was (smiling and) white, and therefore, to reach you, I rode across the green waters of every sea. Towards you speeded the ship which bore an able poet (البلغ شاعر); it was (obedient), as the camel which is guided by a halter fastened to its nose. The daughters of A'waj<sup>1</sup> were fatigued with bearing me company; so many were the solitary deserts which they had to cross".

---

<sup>1</sup> The last hemistich, rendered literally, signifies: between the grove and the rain-cloud.

The author of the Qalā'id al-'Iqyān gives the following fragment of a piece by the same author:

"O thou who, of all mankind, art the most killing in glances and the sweetest in kisses! since when are aloes and honey combined in thee? Thy cheek is like the rising sun, and, on its surface, is a rose to which wine and modest shame add fresh colours. Love for thee is, for my heart, an article of belief, and is confirmed by the letters which issue from thy cheeks and by the messengers coming from thy glances. If you know not that I have lately lost my liberty, command me what thou wilt: I shall do it and obey. Couldst thou see my heart, thou wouldst perceive therein a wound not yet healed up and inflicted by thy glances".

The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 678) mentions him in the Kharidah and inserts there some extracts from his poems; then, at the end of the book, he speaks of him again and gives, as his, the following verses:

"In a goblet was a cool (wine) which (in aspect), resembled a cornelian sky, studded with stars. (That liquor) has built a ka'bah (temple) for pleasure in the haram (sacred ground) of youth and, to it, sports hasten on their pilgrimage from every side."

The poetry of Ibn Baqī offers numerous beauties. He died A.H. 540 (A.C. 1145). The word Baqī (بقي) takes an a and a double i.

<sup>1</sup> A'waj was the name of a horse celebrated for his good qualities and the excellence of his breed.

777 MU'IN AL-DĪN AL-ḤAŞKAFĪ.

Abu 'l-Faḍl Yaḥyā Ibn Salāmah Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad, surnamed Mu'in al-Dīn (aider of the religion) and generally known by the title of al-Khaṭīb al-Ḥaṣkafī (the preacher of Ḥiṣn Kayfā), is the author of a diwān containing poems, exhortations and epistles. Born at Ṭanzah, he was brought up at Ḥiṣn Kayfā, whence he removed to Baghdād. In that city, he studied literature under the Khaṭīb Abū Zakariyā al-Tibrizī (No. 773) and, by the solid information which he thus acquired, he rose to distinction. He studied also, with success, the Shāfi'ite system of Jurisprudence. Having left Baghdād with the intention of returning to his native place, he stopped al-Mayyāfāriqīn, where he fixed his residence and filled the office of a khaṭīb. He acted also as a muftī (expounder of the law) and gave public lessons which were highly profitable to those who attended them. The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn (No. 678) mentions him in the Kharīdah and says: "In science, the most learned man of the time; in talent for poetry and prose, the Ma'arrī (No. 46) of the epoch; his were the elegant assonances and the admirable paranomasias, the parallelisms and (their) exactitude, the style firm and delicate, the thoughts simple and profound, the perfect taqṣīm (the expression of different ideas in the same verse) and the talent (of which the renown was) widely spread and lasting." The same writer then says, after making a long eulogium of the poet and enumerating his merits: "I wished to meet with him, and flattered myself, that, on my arrival at Moṣul, I should see him; for I was ardently desirous of instruction and most assiduous in frequenting men of talent, for the purpose of augmenting my acquirements. But the length of the journey and my inability of supporting fatigue were obstacles which prevented our meeting." He then gives a number of passages extracted from the poems of this author and, amongst them, the following:

"I passed the evening in reprimanding a dissolute fellow, but he took my reproaches as a jest: 'Wine,' said I, 'is a bad thing.' He replied: 'God preserve it from turning bad!'—'It brings on obscene discourse,' said I. 'The pleasure of life is in such discourse,' said he. 'It excites vomition,' said I. 'I honour it,' said he, 'too well to discharge it by the ordinary passage; but, after all, I shall give it up.' 'When ?' said I. 'When I am laid in the tomb.' "

I may here observe that the Khaṭīb borrowed the expression : discharging by the ordinary passage, from another poet with whose name I am unacquainted, but who composed the following (fine) verses which are currently known :

"A censor reproached me for loving wine, and I answered : 'I shall drink it whilst I live and even in my grave. Arise ! pour me out a liquor, red, clear and and pure ; though it is forbidden, I care not. Casuists declare that it is lawful when boiled down ; but I have in my stomach a fire which will reduce it to one third'. If they ask me why I cast it up, my answer is : 'I respect it too much to discharge it by the ordinary passage'."

'Imād al-Dīn al-Iṣbahānī adds : "A person of merit recited to me, at Baghdād, some verses similar to the five* which are so currently known. They are much admired for their natural turn and the art with which they are composed. Here they are :

"I complain to God of two fires (which consume me) ; one proceeding from the cheeks of my beloved, and the other lighted up by her in my heart. (I complain) of two maladies ; one which her glances have excited in my blood, the other which is settled in my body. (I complain) of two delators ; one is my tears which, when I think of her, betray my secret ; the other, the spy who always watches over her. (I complain) of a double weakness ; one is that of my patience, when I think of her and of my love ; the other, that of people who think her obedient to my will. She is so thin and slender that I exclaim, in admiration : Is that her waist or my little finger ? is that her skin or my own ?"

One of his good pieces is that in which he satirizes a vocal musician and which we here give :

"A musician whose singing reduced him from riches to poverty ; such a one I met with in an assembly of persons whom I liked to have for companions. When I saw him, my talent in my physiognomy did not deceive me, and I said : 'what is that ? can such a

* The Ḥanafite doctors declared that the juice of the grape, boiled down to one third of its primitive volume, was a lawful drink.

* السيارات meaning planets.—Ed.

countenance ever become pleasing?' To remain no longer in doubt respecting him, I spoke from amidst the company, saying: 'Come, my man! sing us the air of: O for the days passed at Sal'a<sup>1</sup>, the days passed at Sal'a are not to be despised.' On this; he raised up one of his eyebrows, lowered the other, and emitted from his mouth a fetid gale which filled the room and which, whilst he marked the measure, was, for every soul of us, a cause of annoyance. When he began to speak (sing), a person who was listening in a dark corner of the hall (الغنا) said: 'He is not satisfied with modulating and confounding (notes), but must also sing false! There he is for you! will he never have done calling his servant scoundrel and drawing near to us?'<sup>2</sup> He pretends to scan (to accent well the words of) the air and only gets more embroiled!' His intonation was a cry frightful beyond the bounds of description<sup>3</sup>; he who had sent for him did not foresee the annoyance which the fellow would give to the company. Some of the assembly stopped their noses; others, their ears, and the rest covered their eyes, to avoid seeing him. I was so provoked that I could not refrain from expressing my indignation, and exclaimed: 'Listen sirs! I or the singer must be heard! Now I declare that I shall not sit down unless this man be sent away! drag the dog out by the heels! he is (for us) a cause of sickness and malady!' They answered: "You have pitied our sufferings and delivered (ذبت*) from torture. Thus in sending him out, I secured my own tranquillity and obtained the thanks (of the company). When his face was turned from us, I recited this prayer at the head of the assembly: 'Praise be to God who has delivered us from affliction.'"†

---

1 According to the author of the Marāṣid, Sal'a was the name of a place in the neighbourhood of Madinah.

2 The text is here corrupt, the manuscripts offering a number of various readings. The translation is probably not exact.

3 The right reading appears to be النبا

* برلت in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

† Abd al-Ḥamīd adds:

Despite of numerous compositions on the subject, I never came across such a piece:

Al-~~kh~~ṭīb, mentioned above, expresses the same idea:

(Continued on page 295)

In our article on the Shaykh al-Shāṭibī (No. 512) we have given a piece of his, forming an enigma the word of which is bier. The idea of it is very good. Most of al-Ḥaskafī's poetry is remarkable for this kind of wit and for the neat manner in which the thoughts are expressed. He was attached to the Shī'ite doctrines, as may be easily perceived in his poems. In the town of Āmid, were two youths who had a great fondness for each other and were always together<sup>1</sup>. One of them rode out to the country, set off at a gallop, the horse fell and he was killed. The other immediately sat down to drink wine, was choked by the liquor and died the same day. A literary man spoke of their fate in the following lines :

"They shared between themselves the clear draught of life and the troubled draught of death. We never before saw two equal partakers in the same destiny. They continued in mutual love till the last moment of their existence, and seldom does fidelity in love last till the hour of death."

When the Khatīb (al-Ḥaskafī) heard these lines, he said : "The poet did not work out the idea, not having mentioned the cause of their death ; but I did so in a piece composed on the same occurrence and said :

"(I should have given) my life to save the two brothers who lived in Āmid and who received the stroke (of death) on a day unlucky and frowning ('abūs). One was killed by a horse and the other by wine (khandarīs)".

Had he said ; "One was killed by a horse (sāfināt) and the other by liquor (sāfiyāt)" it would have been much better, on account of the assonance. The poet (adopted this correction and,

---

(Continued from page 294)

"He, who forces people to hear him sing, is veiled from the houses of the people and is denied admittance.

He sang then twinkled his eyes and shook his beard, then we said : The youth was undoubtedly epileptic,

He scanned the verse in a way that the most of us liked the tongue in his mouth had been cut off.

No allegation of people was brought against him but he was sent away slapped".—Ed.

<sup>1</sup> This passage, in parenthesis, is omitted in most manuscripts.

to preserve the rhyme), altered the first verse somewhat in this manner :

My life etc..... who received the stroke of death on a day severe in its evils (adhāt)."

I since found the two first mentioned verses in the Kitāb al-Jinān*, a work composed by al-Qāḍī al-Raṣhīd Ibn al-Zubayr (No. 64), who there attributes them to the eminent legist and teacher of the Qur'ān-readings, Abū 'Alī al-Ḥuṣayrī Ibn Aḥmad al-Mu'allim; but I met with the account above given in the handwriting of a contemporary<sup>1</sup>. The Khaṭīb al-Ḥaṣkafī left some fine moral exhortations and some choice epistles. He continued to hold a high rank (in public estimation) and to teach up to the day of his death. This occurred A.H. 551 (A.C. 1156-7), or in 553, according to another statement. He was born in or towards the year 460 (A.C. 1067-8) Ḥiṣkafī means belonging to Ḥiṣn Kayfā, a strong and lofty castle situated between Jazīrat Ibn 'Umar and Mayyāfāriqīn. Had this adjective been formed regularly, it would have been al-Ḥiṣnī, which term is even sometimes employed; but, when a relative adjective is formed from two nouns one of which governs the other in the genitive, the two are (generally) combined together so as to make one word and from that word the relative is derived, and so it was in the present case. It is thus that from Rās Ayn has been formed Rās'anī; from 'Abd Allāh, 'Abdalī, from 'Abd Shams, 'Abshamī, and from 'Abd al-Dār, 'Abdarī; the same rule applies to all other names of a similar kind. Ṭanzah (طنزه) is the name of village in Diyār Bakr, situated higher up than Jazīrat Ibn 'Umar. It has produced some eminent traditionist and other learned men, all of whom bore the surname of al-Ṭanzī. The Kātib 'Imād al-Dīn says, in the Kharīdah: "From this village came Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Ṭanzī, the same who composed these verses :

"I still love the land of Ṭanzah, though my townsmen, since I left them, deceived my expectations. May God bless that land! could I again see its soil, I should take it as a collyrium for my eyes, so dearly do I love it."

<sup>1</sup> According to another reading : of a Maḥḥarībīn.

* Al-Lisān in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, - Ed.

The same author adds: "This poet was still alive in the month of Ramaḍān, 568 (April-May, A.C. 1173).

778 YAḤYĀ IBN TAMĪM AL-ŠANHĀJĪ.

Abū Ṭāhir Yaḥyā Ibn Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs al-Ḥimyarī al-Šanhājī (No. 123), was a sovereign of Ifrīqiyah and the neighbouring countries. We have already spoken of his father (No. 123) and traced up their genealogy; some of his ancestors also have been mentioned in this work. He was appointed to act as his father's lietutenant at al-Mahdiyyah, on Friday, the 25th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah, 497 (19 September, A.C. 1104), at the moment in which the seventh degree of Capricorn was the ascendant. On the day of his father's death, when the supreme authority devolved on him, he was aged forty-three years, six months and twenty days. He then rode out (in state), according to custom, with all the officers of the empire around him, and, on returning to the palace, he gave to every person connected with government, such as the courtiers and the (chiefs of the) troops, magnificent robes of honour to replace the (mourning) dresses which they had put on in consequence of the death of Tamīm. He distributed also to the soldiers (jund) and (armed) Negro slaves large sums of money, and made them most flattering promises. In the Kitāb al-Jam'u wa 'l-Bayān (collection and exposition) a work treating of the history of Qayrawān and composed by 'Izz al-Dīn (the glory of religion) 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Shaddād Ibn Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, who was the son of Yaḥyā's brother, I found the following passage: "The amīr Tamīm, a very short time before his death, sent for his son Yaḥyā, who was then in the government palace (dār al-Imārāh) with his officers and companions. Yaḥyā entered with them all, and they found Tamīm in the treasury room. He told them to sit down and said to one of the company: 'Arise! go into that closet and look for a book of such and such an appearance, it is in such and such a place; go and bring it here.' The man went and brought the book which, on examination, proved to be a collection of predictions relative to the fate of empires<sup>1</sup>, 'That is it,' said he, 'count off from the beginning so many leaves and read the page to which you come'. There, the following words were found written: The king against whom treason shall be wrought (al-malik al-maghdūr) will be of a lofty stature, have a mole on the right thigh and a black spot on the left side. The amīr Tamīm then told him to shut the book and put it back into its place. When that was done, he said: 'Two of those marks I have already seen, but the third remains to be discovered. Rise up, you, Sharīf! and you, such a one, and procure me certain information respecting the third.' They rose up and went with Yaḥyā into a place where they could not be seen by Tamīm. Yaḥyā then uncovered his body and showed them, on his left side, a spot shaped like a crescent. They returned to Tamīm and informed him of the circumstance, on which he said: It is not I but God that has given him (the power)! He then spoke to them in these terms: 'I shall relate to you an extraordinary occurrence; a slave-merchant offered me for sale the girl who became that man's (Yaḥyā's) mother. I found her handsome and, my mind being inclined towards her, I purchased her and placed her in the hands of the attendants of the palace. I then told the merchant to come to me another time for payment, and I began to consider where I could find money pure (in the sight of God) and acquired by lawful means, with which I might pay the price. Whilst I was reflecting on the matter, I heard al-Sāmikī<sup>2</sup> calling out in a loud voice and requesting permission to speak with me. I passed my head out of the window and asked him what he wanted. He replied: 'I was just this moment digging in the (ruined) palace of al-Mahdī and found there a trunk closed with a padlock; so I left it as it was and am come to inform you of the fact.' I sent with him a person in whom I could confide, and they found in the trunk a quantity of robes embroidered with gold fringes and rotten with age. I ordered the fringes to be melted down and thus obtained neither more nor less than the price of the young girl.' The

1 In Arabic, Maḥamah. See my translation of Ibn Khaldūn's Prolegomena, vol. II, p. 226.

2 I suppose that the word السامكى * is a proper name.

* السائل (beggar) in 'Abd al-Hamīd.—Ed.

persons present were filled with admiration on hearing this recital and invoked on Tamīm the favour of God. Money and robes were then distributed to them by his orders; after which, they retired." 'Abd al-'Azīz the historian just mentioned, says also: "As to the book of which we have spoken, I met with it since, in the possession of the sulṭān al-Ḥasan, now deceased." He meant al-Ḥasan the son of 'Alī and the grandson of Yaḥyā. He then gives, from that book, a number of predicitons which received their accomplishment. Let us return to our account of Yaḥyā: Once seated on the throne, he took the direction of the affairs, governed his subjects with justice and reduced a number of fortresses which his father had been unable to take. 'Abd al-'Azīz says, in his History: "Under his reign," that is, the reign of Yaḥyā, "the Mahdī Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart (No. 662) arrived from Tripoli at al-Mahdiyyah, on his return from the pilgrimage. He stopped at a mosque situated to the south of the Maṣjid al-Sabt (the mosque of Saturday) and there a number of people from al-Mahdiyyah gathered round him for the purpose of studying, under his direction, some works treating of the fundamentals of the faith. He then took on himself the task of putting a stop to the many scandalous acts which were publicly committed and Yaḥyā, to whom his conduct was reported, assembled a number of the legists and had him brought before them. The humble appearance of Ibn Tūmart, his squalid dress and his profound learning made such an impression on the Amīr that he asked the man for his blessing. The other replied: 'May God prosper thee for the welfare of thy subjects and render their happiness profitable to thy offspring.'" Ibn Tūmart remained but a short time at al-Mahdiyyah and then went to al-Munastīr where he stopped for a while, and, from that, he proceeded to Bugia." In the life of Tamīm the father of Yaḥyā, we mentioned that Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart passed at Bugia (Bijāyah) whilst that prince was reigning; God knows if that be true! Farther on, 'Abd al-'Azīz says: "In the year 506 (A.C. 1113-4), some strangers arrived at al-Mahdiyyah and asked for an interview with Yaḥyā, pretending that they were practitioners of the great art (aichemy) and that they had attained the end for which that art was instituted. He allowed them to enter and, when they appeared before him, he asked to see a specimen of their talent. To this they replied: 'We can deprive tin of its dimness and its particular sound, so that it is not to be distinguished from silver. Your Lordship has saddles, swords, standards, tents and vases worth many quintals of silver, in place of these we shall give you as much as you wish, as much as you can employ in the important affairs which engage your attention<sup>1</sup>; but you must allow us to operate (before you) in private.' To this he consented and admitted them to a place where they might work in his presence. The amīr had no person with him except the Sharīf Abu 'l-Ḥaṣan 'Alī and the general Ibrāhīm, commander of the cavalry<sup>2</sup>. The operators, who were also three in number, had agreed upon a private signal; and as soon as they found a fair opportunity, one of them called out: Dārāt al-būṭaqaḥ (the crucible is upset!) Each of them then sprung forward, with a dagger in his hand, and rushed upon the person opposite to him. The amīr was sitting on a sofa; he who attacked him exclaimed: 'I am a saddler, and struck him on the top of the head. The blow cut through some folds of the turban but inflicted no wound. A second stroke, directed by an unsteady hand against his breast, merely scratched the skin. The amīr then struck the assassin with his foot and threw him on his back. The servants, hearing the noise, opened the door which gave on the room in which they were, and Yaḥyā, having gone in to them, bolted that door against his assailants. He who attacked the Sharīf did not leave off till he killed him. The Qā'id Ibrāhīm, having drawn his sword continued to fight against the three till the guards broke in the door which was at their side, entered into the room and slew the assassins. As they wore the Spanish (Muslim) dress, a number of persons thus attired were massacred in the city. The amīr Yaḥyā went out immediately and walked through the streets till the tumult was calmed." Yaḥyā governed with justice, he was particularly watchful over the interests of his people and knew exactly what were the receipts and the expenditure of the administration; following thus the line of conduct which is marked out

---

1 وتستعمل ذلك في مهماتك, is the reading of the manuscripts and is here followed.

2 Literally: (qā'id al-A'lunah (leader of the bridles).

by an intelligent mind and a sound judgement. In the books of the predictions he is designated by the title of al-Maghlidūr, and how justly it was applied to him is demonstrated by the occurrence of which mention has been just made. He was well acquainted with history and biography, having read many books treating of these matters; he was a protector of the weak, kind and charitable to the poor, whom he always provided with food in times of distress; he admitted into his familiarity the men of learning and of merit, and kept in such order the (nomadic) Arabs who inhabited his territories, that they stood in awe of him and abstained from giving career to their avidity. He was well-skilled in the practice of astrology and the art of drawing judgements from the stars. His countenance was handsome; over one of his eyebrows was a black spot; his eyes were dark blue, his stature somewhat lofty and his legs thin. He had always at his court a number of poets, who went there to sing his praises and immortalize his renown in their diwāns. One of them was Abu 'l-Šalt Umayyah Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Abi 'l-Šalt, the same of whom we have already spoken (No. 101). This poet obtained Yaḥyā's protection after having travelled over many countries and been tossed by fortune from one place to another. He is the author of well-known epistle which treats of Egypt, its wonders, its poets, etc., and he composed a great number of fine eulogiums on Yaḥyā, on Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, the son of Yaḥyā and on al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī, his grandson. Here is an extract from one of these poems:

"Restrain your mind from every passion except that of bestowing, and that of fighting, true glory is composed of bravery joined to liberality. Such is the conduct of Yayḥā whose gifts revived our expiring hopes, by the fulfilment of his promises. He bestows a whole flock of camels at a time, camels slender-limbed and smooth, or horses sleek and strong, full grown and robust. His are the lofty mind and the eye proudly glancing; his the tents pitched on a mountain (of glory) on the keystone of the vault in which culminate the Pleiades. When he appears seated (in state) on the imperial throne, you have before your eyes a Joseph (in beauty) stationing in the sanctuary erected by David. The race from which he sprung wore, for their usual clothing, coats of plated mail, and had for dwelling-place the backs of well trained steeds, obedient to the rein. (They were) envied because they had none to equal them ; and where shall we find a great man who is not exposed to envy ! One common origin unites you all, but every sort of wood does not give out the perfume of the lignum aloes. I say to the rider who hurries on his camel, traversing the earth, from one desert to another : 'Pass not by a source of which the waters are pure ; expect not, from the solid rock, a spring to quench your thirst. Here are the fountains of Yaḥyā which never run dry ; this is the way which leads to them ; it is always open. Let your sword decide your claims : the decision of the sword is not to be rejected<sup>1</sup>.' "

He composed other poems besides those. Yaḥyā died on Wednesday, the festival of the Sacrifice, A.H. 509 (25th April, A.C. 1116). His astrologer said to him (that) day : "The casting of your nativity to-day announces for you evil fortune ; so, do not ride out". Yaḥyā followed his advice, and his sons proceeded (without him) to the Muṣallā (No. 262, note), accompanied by the great officers of the empire. When the prayer was over, they all entered into the presence of the sovereign for the purpose of offering him their salutations, according to the established custom. Chanters, then recited passages of the Qur'ān and poets repeated their verses ; after which, the company proceeded to the great saloon and partook of a repast. Yaḥyā stood up with the intention of going there but, on reaching the door, he made a sign to one of his slave-girls, and leant upon her for support ; he had then scarcely made three steps into the room when he fell down dead. His son 'Alī, whom he had appointed to act as his lieutenant at Sfax, a small town in Ifrīqiya was sent for and, on his arrival, received (from the people) the oath of fidelity. Yaḥyā was buried in the palace (or citadel, Qaṣr), according to custom ; but, a year after, his remains were transported to Qaṣr al-Sīdah ; one of the castles within the walls of al-Munastīr. This town is also in Ifrīqiya. He left thirty male children. His son and lieutenant, 'Alī (Ibn Yaḥyā) was born at al-Mahdiyyah on Sunday morning, the 15th of Ṣafar, 479 (1st June, A.C. 1086).

---

1 This last verse has no connexion with those which precede and must be out of its place.

On the death of his father, who had given him the government of Sfax, the principal officers of the empire assembled and drew up a dispatch in his father's name, ordering him to come to him in all haste. He received this message at night and set out immediately, escorted by some of the chiefs who commanded the (nomadic) Arabs. He travelled with the utmost diligence and arrived on the noon of Thursday, the day after the festival of the Sacrifice. The first thing he did was to hasten the internment of his father and to say over him the funeral prayer. Yaḥyā was buried on Friday morning, the 13th of Dhu 'l-Ḥijjah. The new sovereign then held a sitting for the reception of the people; and they all entered and saluted him with the title of amir (imārah). He then rode out at the head of his troops and bands, after which, he returned to the palace. It was under his reign that his brother Abu 'l-Futūḥ, the son of Yaḥyā went to Egypt, taking with him his wife Bullārah who was the daughter of al-Qāsim (Ibn Tamīm), and his son al-'Abbās, who was then a child at the breast. On his arrival at Alexandria, he was lodged in a palace and treated with great honour, by the order of al-'Āmir, who, at that time, was the sovereign of Egypt. He died in that city after a very short residence, and Bullārah married al-'Ādil Ibn al-Sallār, whose true name was 'Alī and of whom we have spoken in this work (No. 460). When al-'Abbās grew up, he was gradually advanced in dignity by al-Ḥāfiẓ, the sovereign of Egypt, and succeeded to al-'Ādil as Wazīr. Our professor Ibn al-Aṭhīr (No. 435) has an article in his history, under the head of various events of the year 502, in which he speaks of the three men who went to Yaḥyā under the pretext of conversing with him on alchemy. According to him, they attacked Yaḥyā, that year, and then occurred what we have related. This event coincided with the coming of Abu 'l-Futūḥ and his companions fully armed, to the door of the palace; but they were refused admission. "Yaḥyā" says Ibn al-Aṭhīr, was therefore convinced that they were all in the plot, and ordered Abu 'l-Futūḥ to be sent with his wife Bullārah to Qaṣr Ziyād (a fortress situated between al-Mahdiyyah and Sfax), and there kept in confinement. Bullārah was his (Abu 'l-Futūḥ's) cousin. On the death of Yaḥyā, his son and successor ('Alī') dispatched them by sea to Egypt, and they landed at Alexandria." End of the extract.

Things continued to go on prosperously till the death of 'Alī, who expired on Tuesday, the 22nd of the latter Rabi', 515 (10th July, A.C. 1121). He was buried in the Qaṣr. Before dying, he designated his son Abū Yaḥyā al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā as his successor in the supreme authority. Al-Ḥasan was born in the town of Ṣūṣah and in the month of Rajab, 502 (February, A.C. 1109). On the day of his accession, he had attained the age of twelve years and nine months. The day after his father's death, he appeared in public and, having received the salutations and good wishes of the people, he rode out in the midst of his troops. The events which occurred during his reign are too numerous to be related and we shall only notice one of them. Roger the Frank, sovereign of Sicily, took Tripoli of Africa, by assault, on Tuesday, the 6th of Muḥarram, 541 (18th of June, A.C. 1146), massacred all the (male) inhabitants, reduced to slavery the women and children, and seized on all their wealth. He then began to repeople it and filled with men and military stores. On Monday, the 12th of Ṣafar, 543 (1st of July, A.C. 1148), he occupied al-Mahdiyyah, which had been evacuated by al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī. This prince, feeling his inability to resist an attack, had departed from the city, carrying off with him whatever objects of value could be easily transported. All the inhabitants fled with the exception of such as were too feeble to depart. The Franks took possession of the city and found there an immense quantity of money and treasure. This family produced nine kings; the first Ziri Ibn Manād (No. 234), and the last, al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī, with whom fell the dynasty of the Bādisids, which had subsisted two hundred and sixty-eight* years. Al-Ḥasan retired to al-Malga, a strong castle in the neighbourhood of Tunis (and near Carthage), which was then held by Abū Maḥfūz Maḥriz Ibn Ziyād, one of the Arab chiefs<sup>1</sup>. He underwent there such vexation and annoyance from Maḥriz that he did not make a long stay and resolved on going to Egypt and putting himself

1 For a fuller account of these events and of the persons here named, see the second volume of my translation of the History of the Berbers, by Ibn Khaldūn.

* One hundred and eight years in 'Abd al-Hamid. Both the statements are wrong. The actual duration was 208 years (A.H. 334 to A.H. 543).—Ed.

under the protection of al-Ḥāfiẓ, the Fātimid sovereign of that country. When the officer whom Roger had left in al-Mahdiyyah as his lieutenant heard of al-Ḥasan's intention, he sent spies to watch his proceedings and fitted out twenty galleys for the purpose of seizing him if he retired by sea. Al-Ḥasan, being informed of this, gave up his project and resolved on going to 'Abd al-Mūmin Ibn 'Alī (No. 383), in the city of Morocco. He therefore sent three of his sons to Bugia, a city lying at the extreme limit of Ifriqiyah, with directions to ask from (Yahyā Ibn 'Azīz) the sovereign of that city, the permission to set out from thence for Morocco. This prince, fearing that, if al-Ḥasan reached 'Abd al-Mūmin, they would both concert some plan detrimental to himself, dissimulated his real intentions and sent back the messengers with a letter filled with a profusion of fair promises and containing these words: "There is no necessity for your going to 'Abd al-Mūmin; I shall do for you every thing you can desire." Al-Ḥasan set out, in consequence, for Bugia; but, on arriving near that city, he found that the sovereign, instead of coming out to meet him, had given orders to transport him to Algiers, a town situated beyond Bugia. Al-Ḥasan was taken to Algiers and lodged in a place by no means suitable to a person of his rank. The daily allowance of provisions assigned to him was quite insufficient for the number of his followers, and he was prevented from going about. It was in the month of Muḥarram, A.H. 544 (May-June, A.C. 1149) that he arrived in Algiers. In the year 547, 'Abd al-Mūmin took Bugia, and the sovereign of that city fled to Constantine.<sup>1</sup> Roger, the sovereign of Sicily, died in the first third of the month of Dhū 'l-Hijjah, 548 (February, A.C. 1154), and had for successor his son William I.<sup>2</sup> It was to the prince (William II) that Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn Qalāqīs, the poet of whom we have spoken (No. 735), went to recite laudatory verses. This was in the year 563 (A.C. 1167-68). On 1 Ibn Khallikān has written, by mistake, al-Qusṭanṭīniyah (Constantinople) instead of Qusanṭīna (Constantine). See the Historie des Berbers, t. II, p. 58.

2 In the Arabic text this name is written غنيم (Ghinīm). The same name is written غليلم (Ghulielm) in the inscription traced on the parapet of the Old Norman palace called La Cuba, near Palermo. See Mr. Amari's article in the Revue archéologique of 1849, p. 669.

the death of William, the authority passed to his daughter, who became the mother of the emperor of Germany (al-anbirūr malik al-Lāmāniyah), the same who is still living. When she died, her son, who was then a child, obtained the supreme power. He has reigned a long time, is clever and intelligent, and keeps up a regular intercourse by letters and otherwise with al-Malik al-Kāmil (No. 668), the sovereign of Egypt. God knows how far these indications may be true! 'Abd al-Mūmin arrived before al-Mahdiyyah (which was then in the hands of the Franks) and took it after a most obstinate resistance. He made his entry into the city on the festival day of 'Āshurah, A.H. 555 (21 January, A.C. 1160) and established there a lieutenant.<sup>1</sup> Al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī (whom he had found at Algiers) accompanied him in this expedition and, being well acquainted with the resources of the country, was now left with that lieutenant for the purpose of assisting him in the direction of affairs. Two farms in the neighbourhood of the city were assigned to him for his support, and a house was given to him in which he might reside with his sons and followers. I have not been able to discover the date of his death.<sup>2</sup> Maḥriz Ibn Ziyād, the chief above mentioned, was killed at the combat of Satif,<sup>3</sup> on a Thursday, in the second third of the latter Rabi', A.H. 555 (April, A.C. 1160).<sup>4</sup> It was for this al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī that Abu 'l-Ṣalt Umayyah Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz composed the work entitled al-Ḥadīqah (No. 101).

779 YAḤYĀ THE BARMAKID

Abu 'Alī* Yaḥyā, the Wazīr of Hārūn al-Raṣhid, was the son of Khālīd and the grandson of Barmak. We have already

1 See Histoire des Brebers, t. II, p. 589.

2 Al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī died, A. H. 563 (A. C. 1167-68).

3 The combat of Satif, in which the Almohades, commanded by 'Abd Allāh, the son of 'Abd al-Mūmin, defeated the Arabs of Ifriqiyah, took place in the year 546 (A.C. 1151-2). (Histoire des Berbers, t. II, p. 190).

4 According to the author of the same work, t. II, p. 194, Maḥriz was killed at the battle of Qayrawān, A.H. 556 (A.C. 1161).

* Abu al-Faḍl in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.—Ed.

spoken of his sons, Ja'far, (No. 129) and al-Faql (No. 502). Their ancestor Barmak was a Magian of Bal<sup>kh</sup> and the servant (officialating minister) of the Nawbahār, a place of worship which the Magians had in that citiy. It was he who lighted therein the (sacred) fires. Barmak and his sons were generally designated as the sādins (or guardians) of that temple. He was a man of great authority among those of his religion. I do not know whether he became a Muslim or not. His son Khālīd rose to power under the 'Abbāsids and succeeded to Abū Salāma. Ḥafṣ al-Khallāl (No. 194) as Wazīr to Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Safaḥ. We have spoken of him in the article on Ja'far and mentioned there the date of his death. Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Mas'ūdī says, in his Murūj al-Dhahab: "The height to which Khālīd Ibn Barmak attained in prudence, bravery, learning, generosity, and other noble qualities was never reached by any of his sons: Yaḥyā did not equal him in judgement and intelligence, nor al-Faql, the son of Yaḥyā, in liberality and disinterestedness, nor Ja'far, the son of Yaḥyā, in epistolary writing and elegance of language, nor Muḥammad, the son of Yaḥyā, in nobleness and elevation of mind, nor Mūsā, the son of Yaḥyā, in bravery and energy. When Abū Muslim al-Khurāsānī (No. 347) sent Qaḥṭabah Ibn Shabīb al-Tā'ī against Yazīd Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah al-Fazārī, who was governing two 'Irāqs in the name of the (Umayyad Khalif) Marwān Ibn Muḥammad, Khālīd was one of those who accompanied him. They halted, on the way, at a village and, whilst they were breakfasting on the terrace of one of the houses, they saw several flocks of gazelles and other wild animals coming from the desert and approaching so near that they got (into the camp) among the soldiers. 'Amīr!' said Khālīd, 'order the men to saddle and bridle!' Qaḥṭabah stood up in amazement and, seeing nothing to alarm him, said: 'What do you mean, Khālīd! by this advice?' The other replied: The enemy are in march against you; do you not see that, if these flocks of wild animals draw so near to us, they must be flying before a numerous body of men? The troops were scarcely on horseback when the dust (raised by the approaching army) was perfectly visible. Had it not been for Khālīd, they would all have perished." As for Yaḥyā, he was perfect in talent, judgment and noble qualities.

Al-Mahdi, the son of Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, placed his child, Hārūn al-Rashīd, under his care and confided to him the boy's education. When Hārūn became khalif, he acknowledged his obligations to Yaḥyā and said to him: "My dear father! it is through the blessings and the good fortune which attend you and through your excellent management that I am now seated on this throne; so, I confide to you the direction of affairs." He then handed to him his signet-ring. Allusion to this is made in the following lines, composed by al-Mawṣilī, a poet whom I suppose to be the same person as Ibrāhīm al-Nadīm (No. 9) or else his son, Iṣḥāq (No. 84):

"Did you not see that the light of the sun, once languishing (and dim), brightened up on the accession of Hārūn? (That happened) through the good fortune which attends God's trusty servant, Hārūn the beneficent; Hārūn is now chief of the state and Yaḥyā is his wazīr."

Al-Rashīd had so deep a respect for Yaḥyā, that, in speaking of him, he always called him my father, and authorised him to take the initiative in every affair and bring it to a conclusion. This lasted till he overthrew the Barmakids. Being then irritated against Yaḥyā, he imprisoned him for life and put to death his son Ja'far, as we have already related. Yaḥyā was highly distinguished for wisdom, nobleness of mind and elegance of language. One of his sayings was; "Three things indicate the degree of intelligence possessed by him who does them: the bestowing of gifts, the drawing up of letters and the acting as ambassadors." He used to say to his sons: "Write down the best things which you hear; learn by heart the best things which you write down; and, in speaking, utter the best things which you have learned by heart." He said also: "This life is a series of vicissitudes, and wealth is (given to us as) only a loan; let us follow the models (of virtue) offered by our predecessors and leave a good example to those who come after us." Al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān (No. 505) states that he heard Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd say: "As for the man to whom I have done no good, I have always before me the choice (of doing so or not), and as for him to whom I have done good, I am engaged to serve him (for the future)."

The Qāḍī Yaḥyā

Ibn Akṭham (No. 766) related as follows : "I heard al-Māmūn say : 'Yaḥyā Ibn Khālīd and his sons had none (to equal them) in ability, in elegance of language, in liberality and in bravery ; it was well said by a poet that :

'The sons of Yaḥyā are four in number, like the elements ; when put to the test, they are found to be the elements of (which) beneficence (is formed)'

I said to him : 'Commander of the faithful ! their ability, their elegance of language and their liberality we all acknowledge ; but in which of them was courage ?' He replied : 'In Mūsā, the son of Yaḥyā ; I had even the intention of establishing him as governor in the frontier province of Sind.' " Ishāq al-Mawṣillī, the son of Ibrāhīm al-Nadīm, states that his father made to him the following relation ; "I went to Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd Ibn Barmak, and complained to him of a (pecuniary) embarrassment. He answered : 'Alas ! what can I do for you ? I have nothing at the present moment. However, I shall point out to you a thing which I hope you will be the man to execute : The agent of the governor of Egypt came to see me and requested me to ask a gift from his master for myself. I refused, but he still insists. Now, I am told that such a one, your slave girl, cost you three thousand (dinārs) ; so here is what I may do ; I shall ask him to make me a present of that girl and tell him that she pleases me very much ; but do not you consent to sell her for less than thirty thousand dinārs. You will then see what will happen.' Well, by Allāh ! I had scarcely time to look about me when in came the agent. He asked me how much I would take for the girl ; I replied that I would not dispose of her for less than thirty thousand dinārs ; he continued bargaining with me and finished by offering twenty thousand. When I heard this sum mentioned, I had not the heart to refuse it and I sold her. Having received the money, I went to see Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd. He asked me what I had done in the sale of the girl, and I replied : 'By Allāh ! I could not refrain from accepting twenty thousand dinārs, as soon as I heard the offer.' He answered : 'That was mean-spirited on your part ; but the agent of the governor of Persia has come to me on a similar mission ; so, here is your girl ; take her back and do not sell her for less than fifty thousand dīnārs when he goes to bargain with you for her. He will certainly give you that price. This man came to me, and I asked fifty thousand dīnārs. He began to bargain and, when he offered me thirty thousand, I had not the heart to refuse that sum and could scarcely believe my ears. I accepted this offer and then went to Yahya, the son of Khālid. 'For how much did you sell the girl?' said he. I told him, and he exclaimed: 'You unfortunate fellow! was your first (fault) not sufficient to prevent you from committing a second?' I replied: 'My heart was too weak to refuse a sum for which I could have never hoped. 'Here' said Yahyā, 'is your girl; take her and keep her!' I replied: 'I have gained by her fifty thousand dīnārs and am again become her owner. Bear witness that I declare her free and that I promise to marry her.' It is thus I found the anecdote related, but I since met with the history of the wazīrs composed by al-Jihshyārī (No. 359, note), and there I read that Ibrahim al-Mawṣilī was told by Yahyā not to accept less than one hundred thousand dīnārs and that he sold her for fifty thousand, and that, the second time, he was told not to accept less than fifty thousand and that he sold her for twenty thousand. Al-Aṣma'ī (No. 354) related as follows: "I went, one day, to visit Yahyā and he said to me: 'Tell me, Aṣma'ī! are you married?' I replied that I was not. 'Have you a slave-girl?' said he. I answered: 'I should willingly be indebted to you for one.' He then ordered a young girl to be brought in: she was in the height of beauty, of grace and of elegance: and he said to her: 'I give you to this man;' and then he told me to take her. I thanked him and was wishing him every happiness when she burst into tears and exclaimed: 'O my lord! how can you give me away to such a man as that? do you not see how deformed and ugly he is?' He said to me: 'I will give you in exchange for her two thousand dīnārs.' I answered: 'I have no objection to that.' The money was given to me and the girl was taken back to Yahyā's house. That girl, said he, 'did something to displease me, and I meant to punish her in giving her to you, but then I had pity on her.' 'Why did you not inform me of that previously' said I, 'so that I might have reassumed my pristine form; you should at least have allowed me to comb my beard, wipe my eyes, perfume my person and make myself handsome.' He laughed (at this sally) and ordered another thousand dinārs to be given to me". The following anecdote was related by Ishāq al-Nadīm: When Yahyā, the son of Khālīd rode out, the usual gift which he bestowed on those who went up to him with an application was two hundred di hams.<sup>1</sup> One day, as he was riding out, a literary man, who was also a poet, drew near to him and said:

'O thou who art the namesake of Yahyā the chaste (saint John the Baptist!) the bounty of the Lord hath assigned to thee a double paradise (one on earth and the other in heaven). Two hundred (dirhams) is the gift of everyone who cross with thy path; but that sum is too little for a man like me; 'tis what he receiveth from thee who runneth the quickest!"

Yahyā replied: "You say true; let this man be taken to my house." When he returned from the khalīf's residence, he asked the man what was his business and received this answer: 'I have contracted marriage and am under the necessity of filling one of three obligations: either to pay the dowry (which I have settled on my wife and) which amounts to four thousand dirhams (£ 100), or to divorce (her) to pay (her) a pension till such time as I shall have the means of procuring the bride's outfit.' Yahyā gave orders that he should receive four thousand dirhams for the dowry, four thousand for the purchase of a dwelling, four thousand for the requisite furniture of a house, four thousand for the reception of the bride and four thousand for future maintenance. He received the twenty thousand and departed." Muḥammad Ibn Munādhīr (No. 127, note) the celebrated poet, related as follows: "Al-Rashīd made the pilgrimage with his two sons, al-Amin Muḥammad and al-Māmūn 'Abd Allāh. Yahyā Ibn Khālīd accompanied him with his two sons, al-Faḍl and Ja'far. When they arrived at Madīnah, al-Rashīd held a public sitting with Yahyā Ibn Khālīd, and distributed to the inhabitants the customary donations. Al-Amin then held a sitting with al-Faḍl and distributed donations; after which al-Māmūn, accompanied by Ja'far, did the same. For this reason, the people of Madīnah named that year of the three donations. Never had they seen the like before. I composed, on this subject, the following verses<sup>1</sup>:

1 About five pounds sterling.

"They are come to us, the descendants of the kings belonging to the family of Barmak. What good news! what a beautiful sight! Their rule is, to make, every year, an expedition against the enemy and a journey to the Temple ancient and pure. When they halt in al-Baṭḥā (the valley) of Makkah, that (city) is illuminated by their presence. Baghdād is then in darkness and, whilst they perform the pilgrimage, three moons dispel the shades which covers us in Makkah. Their hands were created for nothing else but deeds of liberality, and their feet were made of (treading) the boards of the pulpit."

The Khaṭīb (No. 33) says, in the article on Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar al-Wāqidi (No. 618) which he inserted in his History of Baghdād, that he (al-Wāqidi) related as follows: "I traded in corn at Madīnah and had in my hands one hundred thousand dirhams which had been lent to me in order that I might make them productive. This money I lost and then I went to 'Irāq for the purpose of seeing Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd. Having sat down in his antechamber, I entered into conversation with the servants and door-keepers, and asked how I could get to see him. They answered: 'When his dinner is taken in to him, no one is prevented from entering; we shall then admit you.' When the dinner was brought, they let me in and seated me with him at the same table." 'Who are you?' said he, 'and what do you require?' I told him and, when the dishes were removed, we washed our hands; after which I went over to him with the intention of kissing him on the head, but he drew back from me. When I (retired and) reached the place where the guests mount their horses on departing, a servant came to me with a purse containing one thousand dīnārs and said: 'The Wazīr wishes you a good evening; he bids you help yourself out of your difficulty with this and requests you to come to see him to-morrow morning.' I returned to see him (the next morning) and sat down to table with him, and he began to question me as he had done the day before. When the dishes were removed, I went up to him for the purpose of kissing him on the head, but he drew back from me. On my going to the mounting-place, a servant brought me a purse containing one thousand dinārs and said: 'The Wazīr wishes you a good day, bids you help yourself out of your difficulties with this and requests you to return tomorrow.' I took the money, retired, and, the next day, went again to see him. He then gave me as much as I had received the two days previously. On the fourth day, I went to visit him as I had done before, and he then allowed me to kiss him on the head. 'I did not at first permit you to do so,' said he, 'because I had not rendered you a service which entitled me to that mark of respect. But now, I have been of some use to you.' (He then called his servants and said:) 'Boy let such and such a house be given to this man; Boy! fit it up with such and such a set of furniture; Boy! give him two hundred thousand dirhams, the half to pay his debts and the other half to put him in better circumstance. 'He then said to me: 'Become my companion and reside in my house. I replied: 'May God exalt the Wazīr! I hope you will allow me to return to Madīnah that I may repay there what I owe; after that, I shall reappear in your presence; that, for me, would be more befitting.' He gave his consent and furnished me with every requisite for travelling. I went to Madīnah, paid my debts and, having returned, I never quitted him since.'—Abū Qabūs al-Ḥimyārī* went, one day, to see him and recited to him the following verses:

---

<sup>1</sup> M. de Sacy has given these verses in his Chrestomathie arabe, t. I, p. 13.

"May the plentitude of God's favour descend on Yaḥyā, who bestows such gifts as not a man before him ever gave. He forgets the services which he renders, but never forgets his promise."

Yaḥyā granted to the poet what he came to apply for and bestowed on him also a sum of money. I may here observe that the (idea expressed in the) second verse was afterwards (borrowed and) applied by Sharaf al-Dawlah Muslim Ibn Quraysh (No. 647, note): A man said to him: "Amir! do not forget my demand," * 'Abd al-Ḥamīd observes: The name occurs in Kitāb al-Wuzarā wa al-Kutāb as Abū Qābūs 'Umar Ibn Sulaymān al-Ḥīrī, which is correct because he was a Christian of Ḥīrah.—Ed.

---

and he replied : "Not till I have fulfilled it." Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-Anṣārī<sup>1</sup> makes (honourable) mention of Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd in the following passage :

"Mayest thou (fair maid) be ever fortunate ! knowest thou not that during those nights which had borrowed their darkness from the colour of thy hair, I used to wait with patience till their obscurity was dispelled by the brightness of a face which shone like the face of Yaḥyā, when (his son) Ja'far was mentioned (with commendation)."

Yaḥyā used to say : "Spend when Fortune turns towards you, for her bounty cannot then be exhausted, spend when she turns away, for she will not remain with you." He said also : "The benefactor who reminds (a person) of a service rendered alloys the value of that service ; and he who forgets a favour received is guilty of ingratitude and neglect of duty."

Another of his sayings was : "The sincere intention (of doing a good action) and a legitimate excuse (for not doing it) are equivalent to its accomplishment." He said again: "In adverse fortune, wiles (and stratagems) led to perdition." Al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl (No. 169) was heard to say : "When a man's conduct towards his brethern is changed on obtaining authority, we know that he is not fitted for that place<sup>2</sup> ; so said the president of the board of generous actions, Abū 'Alī Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd Ibn Barmek." Yaḥya had a private secretary whom he admitted into his familiarity. This secretary resolved on having his son circumcised, and people of all classes made preparations for being present at the ceremony. The great officers of the empire, the chiefs of the civil administration and the government-writers offered, all of them presents suitable to their respective ranks. A friend of the secretary, being in reduced circumstances and unable to satisfy his desire of doing like the others, took two large and clean bags, filled one of them with salt, the other with perfumed potash, and 1 This Muslim died A.H. 208 (A.C. 823-24). We have spoken of him in No. 10. note.

2 Literally : We know that authority is greater than he.

sent them to him with a letter of which we give here a copy : "Could I fulfil my will, I should conform to the custom and, if my means permitted me to accomplish my ardent desire, I should outdo even the foremost in the race of generosity and surpass those who make the greatest efforts to shew you honour. But my means preclude me from doing what I wish and the narrowness of my fortune prevents me from engaging in a rivalry with the wealthy. Fearing, however, that the register of our gifts should be closed before the inscribing of my name therein, I send you some of that which, at the beginning (of a repast), brings good luck and a blessing, and of that which concludes (the repast) by its perfume and cleansing quality. (in so doing) I bear with patience the pain which my inability gives me, and support the anguish of not having the power to execute (my intentions). But, as long as I find not the means of filling my duty towards you, I shall offer, for my excuse, this word of almighty God : No blame shall be incurred by those who are weak, or by the sick, or by those who find not wherewithal to contribute. (Qur'ān, sūr. 9, verse 92.) Receive my salutations." When Yahyā Ibn Khālīd arrived at the place where the festival was held, his secretary shewed him all the presents which he had received and even the two bags with the accompanying letter. The idea of sending these two objects appeared to Yahyā very good, and he ordered them to be filled with money and taken back to the person who had sent them. The sum thus given was four thousand dīnārs (£ 2,000). A man said to Yahyā : "By Allāh ! thou art milder in temper than al-Aḥnaf Ibn Qays (No. 277)," and received this answer : "Those who offer me more than I deserve shall not have a place in my favour." Ishāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣilī called on one of his servant-boys and, not getting an answer from him, he said : "I heard Yahyā, the son of Khālīd, observe that a man's mildness of temper is indicated by the ill-breeding of his servants." Yahyā was one day riding out with al-Raṣḥīd when a man stopped before the khalīf and said : "My mule is dead." Al-Raṣḥīd replied : "Let five hundred dirhams (£ 10) be given." On this, Yahyā made him a sign and, when they dismounted, al-Raṣḥīd said to him : "Father ! you made me a sign about something and I do not understand what it meant." Yahyā replied: "The mention of so small a sum as that should never proceed from your lips; a person of your rank should say: five thousand, or ten thousand." "Well," said al-Raḡhīd, "and when a demand such as that is made to me, what shall I answer?" "You must then say:" said Yaḥyā, "buy him a mule." To conclude, we may observe that the anecdotes related of the Barmikid family are very numerous, and that an abridgment such as this will not admit the insertion of any more. When Hārūn al-Raḡhīd put to death Jā'far, the son of Yaḥyā the Barmakid, he reduced to ruin all the family and cast into prison Yaḥyā and al-Faḍl, the son of Yaḥyā. The place of their confinement was al-Rāfiqah, called also Old Raqqah and situated near the town of New Raqqah, which is a well-known place on the bank of the Euphrates. To designate both towns they say the two Raqqahs, giving thus to one name a predominance over the other. Examples of a similar licence are offered by the names al-'Umarāni,<sup>1</sup> al-Qamarāni<sup>2</sup> and some others. Al-Jihshyārī relates in his History of the Wazīrs, that, when Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd, was in prison, where they kept him closely confined, he had one day a longing to eat some sikkājah.<sup>3</sup> Having obtained, with great difficulty, the permission to prepare some, he cooked it, but, when he had finished, the skillet in which he had made it fell from his hand and was broken to pieces. On this, he recited some verses, upbraiding Fortune and expressing his loss of every hope and every desire. He remained in the prison of al-Rāfiqah till his death, which event took place on the 3rd of Muḥarram, 190, (29th November, A.C. 805). He died suddenly, without any previous illness, being then seventy years of age, or seventy-four, according to another account. His son al-Faḍl said over him the funeral service. He was buried on the border of the Euphrates, in the suburb called Rabad Harthamah. In his pocket was found a paper on which was written in his own hand: "The accuser has gone forward (to the tribunal) and the 1 Al-'Umrāni (the two 'Umaras), was a term employed to designate the two first khālīfs, Abū Bakr and 'Umar.

2 The term al-Qamarāni (the two moons) was employed to designate the sun and the moon.

3 The sikkājah was a dish prepared with barley-meal, minced meat and vinegar.

accused will soon follow; the Qāḍī will be that equitable Judge Who is never unjust and who has no need of taking evidence." Al-Rashīd, to whom this paper was sent, wept, the remainder of that day, and his countenance, for some days after, bore striking marks of sorrow.<sup>1</sup> Yaḥyā settled a monthly pension of one thousand dirhams (£ 25) on Sufyān al-Thawrī (No. 248), and the latter used to say, when prostrated in prayer. "O Lord! Yāḥyā has delivered me from the cares of this life, deliver him from the pains of the next." When Yaḥyā died, one of his brothers saw him in a dream and asked him how God had treated him? To this he replied: "He forgave me in consideration of Sufyān's prayers." Some say that the Sufyān of this anecdote was Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah (No. 249). God knows best! "Al-Rashīd," says al-Jihshyārī, "repented of his conduct towards the Barmakids and deeply regretted the manner in which he had treated (the prisoners). He said, before some of his brothers that, if he could be assured of their fidelity, he would reinstate them in their places. He used also to say: 'Some people impelled us to punish our ablest and most faithful advisers, and they made us believe that they themselves were capable of replacing them; but, when we did what they wanted, they were not of the least use to us.' He then recited this line:

'Infamous wretches<sup>2</sup>! spare us your calumnies, or fill (with ability) the place which they filled (so well).'

I may observe that this verse has for its author al-Ḥuṭay'ah (No. 91, note), and that, after it, comes the following:

"They were persons who, if they built, built well; if they took an engagement, they fulfilled it, and if they imposed an obligation, they rendered it binding."

Al-Zamakhsharī (No. 684) says, somewhat to this effect, in his Rabī' al-Abrār: "Under the bed of Yaḥyā, the son of Khālīd, was found a paper on which was inscribed:

1 In some of the manuscripts, this biographical notice ends here.

2 The Arabic imprecation is: no father to your father, and seems to signify: may God's curse be on your ancestor.

3 The manuscripts belonging to Mr. Caussin de Perceval has اوشدوا النجار and the edition of Bulāq اوشدوا البجار, which readings I do not understand.

"By the reality of God ! injustice is disgraceful ; an unhealthy pasture-ground is that of injustice. We must go before him who shall retribute every action on the day of judgment ; all adverse parties must appear before God."

*[I must now say<sup>1</sup> that I have inserted in this compendium the quantity (of information) which it was possible for a person to give who had but little leisure. I have omitted under this letter, which is the Y, a considerable number of articles which I intended to have inserted, but had not time enough (ittasā') to do so. I have kept them back, with a great deal of rough drafts, so that they may serve (اعدها) for another (Ākhar) and a more extensive work which I mean to compile on the same plan, if God grant me time and if He aid me in my undertaking (wa waffaq li 'l-'amal). It shall contain (muḥṭawīyan) a mass (jumma') of that information which is required by persons who occupy themselves with these matters, and will dispense the reader from the necessity of recurring to a great number of books (wa yastaghīn man yuṭāli 'ahū 'an nuraḡāt kutub kathīrah) ; for I have selected my notes from standard works of history and from the (authentic) accounts given of those who lived in ancient and in modern times. To the best of my belief (fi mā yaḡlib 'alā Ḥannī). I have not neglected to consult any of the noted works which are in the hands of the public or any of those which are less known (al-khāmīlah) whether they were voluminous or concise ; and I have always taken care to select therefrom whatever seemed fit to enter into (fi) this work. It is my intention, with the will and the help of God, that it shall form more than ten (akthar min 'asharah) volumes ; but assistance must be demanded from the Almighty and His aid must be implored to direct me.<sup>2</sup>]

1 The following paragraph is to be found in professor Wustenfield's edition, but none of our manuscripts gives it except that which belongs to Mr. Cuassin de Perceval. It is omitted in the edition of Būlāq. I follow the text of Mr. Caussin's manuscript, that of the lithographed edition being very incorrect.

2 The work which our author here promised never appeared. The articles which follow were added to the present work by Ibn K<sup>h</sup>allikān himself, some years after the appearance of the autograph copy. See the note by which he concludes this work.

* □ Omitted in 'Abd al-Ḥamīd.--Ed.

INDEX

A

- Aaron, 255.
 'Abādah, 40.
 'Abāth, 146n.
 Abbān, 284n.
 Abbān Ḥaṣiṣ, 284.
 'Abbās, 233.
 al-'Abbās, 3, 30, 31, 79, 102, 133, 172, 195, 233, 303.
 al-'Abbās Ibn al-Aḥnaf, 233n.
 'Abbāsids, 8, 65n, 98n, 127, 130, 133, 136, 138, 163n, 186n, 221n, 223, 275, 289, 307.
 'Abd Allāh, 131, 187, 275, 296.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās, 172, 254.
 'Abd Allah Ibn, 'Abd al-Mu'min, 306n.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Awfā
   'Alqamah al-Aslamī, 41n.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Abī Ishāq, 254.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī, 138, 140
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās, 127.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Amr, 37.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Awn al-Baṣrī al-Muzanī, 35n, and note.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Ṣa'dānī, 250.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Muthannā al-Ṭūsī, 237.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ja'far, 117.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Mālik, 213.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Muhammad al-Hanafiyah, 228.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mubārak, 42, 101, 216, 224.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Mu'tazz, 22.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Naṣr, 54.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Rajā, 46.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ṭāhir, 270.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar, 1, 42, 151, 254.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Umar Ibn al-Akṭham al-Minqarī, 265.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Wahb, 219.
 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Zubayr, 100, 125, 235.
 'Abd Allāh al-Rāzī, 253.
 'Abd al-'Aziz, 111n, 299.
 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwān, 111.
 'Abd al-Ghani Ibn Sa'id, 245.
 'Abd al-Ḥamid, 4n, 12n, 14n, 18n, 22n, 29n, 35n, 38n, 40n, 65n, 68n, 70n, 71n, 84n, 86n, 88, 90n, 95n, 106n, 107n, 108n, 109n, 115n, 120n, 122n, 125n, 126n, 127n, 129n, 132n, 134n, 146n, 147n, 152n, 156n, 159n, 161n, 173n, 177n, 179n, 184n, 199n, 212n, 218n, 223n, 235n, 238n, 250n, 253n, 254n, 263n, 264n, 266n, 267n, 268n, 281n, 282n, 284n, 285n, 294n, 296n, 298n, 306n, 313n, 318n.
 'Abd al-Laṭif, 95n, 97.
 'Abd al-Malik, 130, 138, 172, 186n.
 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ḥabīb, 222.
 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwān, 129.
 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Ṣāliḥ, 172.
 'Abd Manāf, 114, 180.

- 'Abd-Manāt, 274.
 'Abd al-Mū'min Ibn 'Alī, 305, 306.
 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, 3, 103, 123, 133, 172.
 'Abd al-Qādir Ibn Abī Ṣāliḥ al-Jilī, 250.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 190.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Abī Nu'aym, 2, 3.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Ḥakam, 221.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn al-Qāsim, 219, 221.
 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Nāṣir, 7, 222n.
 'Abd al-Razzāq al-Ṣan'ārī, 179.
 'Abd al-Ṣamad, 286.
 'Abd al-Ṣamad Ibn Abī 'Amr al-'Abdī, 243.
 'Abd Ṣhams, 114, 296.
 'Abd al-Wahhāb, 249, 252.
 'Abd al-Wahhāb al-Mālikī, 34.
 'Abd Yaghūth, 179n.
 'Abdah, 34.
 'Abdalī, 296.
 'Abdarī, 296.
 Abī Ṭālib, 236n.
 al-Ablah, 117.
 Abraham, 255.
 al-Abrash, 155.
 'Ābriz gate, 282.
 'Abshāmī, 296.
 'Abu 'l-'Abbās, 48.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad, 286.
 Abu al-'Abbās Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn al-Nū'mān al-Qaṣṣāṣ, 250.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās 'l-Mubarrad, 143, 160, 180, 232, 236.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās al-Ṣaffāh, 163n, 307.
 Abu 'l-'Abbās Ṭha'lab, 65, 258, 263, 264.
 Abū 'l-'Abbās al-Ṭūsi, 48.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh, 3, 47, 55, 57, 59, 245, 249.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Akfānī, 14.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Faḍl, 73.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Ḥārūn Ibn al-Munajjim, 98, 99.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Hishām al-Ḍarir, 106.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥumaydī, 149, 223.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn, 60, 61, 62.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Sa'id, 244.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ṭalḥah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Uthmān al-Bighālī al-Karkhī, 74.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn Ismā'il al-Maḥāmīlī, 160n.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Ja'fī, 59.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Marzubānī, 265.

- Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Mufajja' 14.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad 54, 55, 57, 61, 81, 249, 252, Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-'Abbās Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Abī Muḥammad al-Yazīdī, 274.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī Sa'd al-Tājir, 4.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-Ḥakīmī, 160n.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Rāzī, 252.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Jaṣṣāṣ, 250.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Barākāt Ibn Hilāl al-Sa'idī, 87.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Ismā'il al-Bukhārī, 214.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Maḥmūd, 212.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Manī' 254.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Najjār, 33.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn al-Nu'mān, 55.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar al-Wāqidī, 312.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibrāhīm, 273.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Nāfi' 1.
 Abū Abd Allāh Wuhb Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Kāmil Ibn Sayj Dhī Kibār al-Yamani, 177.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Wāqidī, 149.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Yāqūt Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 196.
 Abū 'Abd Allāh Ziyād Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Lakhmī, 218n.
 Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 172.
 Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥaytham Ibn 'Adī Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Zayd Ibn Usayyid Ibn Jābir Ibn 'Adī Ibn al-Ghawth Ibn Julhumah, 132.
 Abū Abd al-Raḥmān Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Muḥammad Ibn 'Aṭiyah: 183.
 Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān 'Ubayd Allāh, 273.
 Abū Aḥmad al-'Askārī, 176.
 Abū Aḥmad Jā'far al-Balkhī, 270.
 Abū Aḥmad Ṭalhah, 130.
 Abū Aḥmad Yaḥyā, 283, 285.
 Abu 'l-Akḥṭai, 107.
 Abu 'l-'Alā, 54, 170, 279.
 Abu 'l-'Alā Ibn Abī al-Nadā al-Ma'rūf, 77.
 Abu 'l-'Alā Ibn Afrūnā, 129.
 Abu 'l-'Alā al-Ma'arri, 162, 170, 271, 276, 278.
 Abu 'l-'Alā Sa'id Ibn Maḥlad, 130.

- Abū 'Alī al-Baṣīr, 284.
 Abū 'Alī al-Fārisī, 126, 150, 199.
 Abū 'Alī al-Ḥusayn Ibn Aḥmad al-Mu'allim, 296.
 Abū 'Alī Ismā'il, 62.
 Abū 'Alī Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṣaffār, 232n.
 Abū 'Alī Muḥammad Ibn Sa'id Ibn Binḥān, 65.
 Abū 'Alī al-Muhandis, 92.
 Abū 'Alī al-Qālī, 157, 174.
 Abū 'Alī Yaḥyā, 306, 314.
 Abū 'Āmir al-Manṣūr, 145n.
 Abu 'Amr, 50, 249, 266, 267.
 Abū 'Amr al-Dānī, 274.
 Abū 'Amr Ibn al-'Alā 50, 266, 267, 268.
 Abū 'Amr Ibn Jurayj, 266.
 Abū 'Amr Nāṣr Ibn 'Alī Ibn Nuḥ Ibn Qays, 257.
 Abū 'Amr al-Shaybānī, 39n.
 Abu al-Ash'ath Aḥmad Ibn al-Miqdām, 102.
 Abū 'Āṣim al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Shaybānī, 232. and n.
 Abu al-Aswad al-Duwali, 255.
 Abu al-'Atāhiyah, 267.
 Abū 'Awānah, 214, 215.
 Abu 'l-'Aynā, 227, 228, 232.
 Abu 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Mustawif, 197.
 Abū 'l-Bakhtārī, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185.
 Abū Bakr, 107n, 131, 132, 150, 151, 152, 153, 226n, 228, 232, 289, 316n.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn 'Alī Ibn Thābit, 276.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Bayhaqi, 250.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Manṣūr Ibn Khalaf al-Muqri, 250.
 Abū Bakr Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Jarrāḥ al-Kharraz, 126.
 Abū Bakr al-Anbari, 264.
 Abū Bakr Ayyūb Ibn Kisīn al-Sikhiyānī, 100n.
 Abū Bakr al-Ḥāzimī, 177.
 Abū Bakr al-Dānī Ibn Labbānah, 280.
 Abū Bakr Ibn 'Ayyāsh, -139.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Bāqī, 288, 291.
 Abū Bakr Ibn Dāwūd al-Zāhiri, 236.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Zayd al-Ḍabbī 250.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Bāqī al-Anṣārī, 18.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Abd al-Bāqī al-Bazzār, 253.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Muḥammad al-Nahāwandī, 250.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn Abī Nāṣr Manṣūr Ibn Muḥammad al-Laftawānī, 251.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Ḥawrdānī, 250.

- Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-
 'Isā al-Dānī, 158.
 Abū Bakr Muḥammad Ibn al-
 Qāsim al-Anbārī, 233.
 Abū Bakr al-Qurṭubī 253,
 254.
 Abū Bakr al-Ṣiddīq, 131, 149.
 Abū Bakr al-Ṣulī, 160, 161, 169.
 Abū Bakr al-Ṭuwāl, 263.
 Abū Bakr Yaḥyā Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān
 Ibn Bāqī, 288.
 Abū Bakr Yaḥyā Ibn Sa'dūn
 Ibn Tammām Ibn Muḥammad al-Azdi al-Qarṭubī, 252,
 Abū 'l-Barakāt, 95.
 Abū 'l-Barakāt 'Abd al-Waḥḥāb
 Ibn al-Mubārak al-Anmāṭī,
 18, 250.
 Abū 'l-Barakāt Hibat Allāh
 Ibn Malkān, 94.
 Abū 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Anbārī,
 65.
 Abū 'l-Barakāt Ibn al-Muṣṭa-fawī, 28.
 Abū 'l-Barakāt al-Mubārak
 Ibn Hamdān Ibn al-Shi'ār
 212n.
 Abū Bishr Thumāmah Ibn al-
 'Ashras al-Numayri, 259.
 Abū Dāwūd al-Sijistānī, 214.
 Abū Dharr Jundab Ibn al-
 Sakan al-Ghifārī, 245 & note.
 Abū Dhuwayb Khuwaylid Ibn
Khālīd al-Hudhālī, 235.
 Abū Dulaf al-'Ijlī, 181, 182.
 Abū Dulāmah, 284.
 Abū 'l-Durr Yāqūt Ibn 'Abd
 Allāh al-Rūmī, 190, 193, 194.
 Abū 'l-Durr Yāqūt al-Mawṣilī,
 187.
 Abū Dūwād Muḥammad Ibn
 al-Musayyab al-'Uqaylī, 9.
 Abū 'l-Faḍā'il al-Nūrī, 27.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl, 306n.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl 'Abd al-'Azīz Ibn
 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān
 al-Ushnuhī, 225.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl Aḥmad Ibn al-
 Ḥasan Ibn Jirūn al-Amin,
 74.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl al-Ḥasan Ibn
 Wahb, 166.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl Ja'far, 81.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl Ja'far al-Mutawakkil 'ala Allāh, 165.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn
 Hibat Allāh Ibn al-'Alā,
 250.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl Muḥammad Ibn
 Nāṣir, 18-19, 19n, 250, 276,
 277.
 Abū 'l-Faḍl Yaḥyā Ibn
 Salamah Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn
 Muḥammad, 292.
 Abū 'l-Faraj, 89.
 Abū 'l-Faraj 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah of Iṣbahān, 146 and note, 234.
 Abū al-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzī,
 122.
 Abū 'l-Faraj Yāsin,
 22.
 Abū 'l-Faṭḥ, 288n.

- Abu 'l-Faṭḥ 'Āmir Ibn 'Umar, 266n.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ibn Kuṣḥājīm, 285.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Muḥammad Ibn Iṣḥāq al-Nadīm, 288.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh al-Qaysī, 288.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Nāṣir Ibn Abī 'l-Mukārim 'Abd al-Sayyid Ibn 'Alī at Muṭarrizi, 4.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn Abī 'l-Karam Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Karīm Ibn 'Abd al-Wahīd al-Shaybānī, 24.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn Qalāqīs, 305.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Sulaymān Ibn Ayyūb al-Rāzi, 276.
 Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Sultān Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Musallam al-Maqdisī, 87.
 Abu 'l-Feda's Annals, 208n.
 Abu 'l-Feda's Geography, 71n.
 Aḥu 'l-Fidā, 173n.
 Abū Firās, 119, 124.
 Abū Firās al-Ḥamdānī, 173.
 Abū Firās Hammām, 107.
 Abu 'l-Futūḥ, 303.
 Abu 'l-Futūḥ Barjawān, 9.
 Abu 'l-Futūḥ Naṣr Allāh Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Makhlūf Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd al-Qawī Ibn Qalāqīs al-Lakhmī al-Azhar al-Iskandarānī, 20.
 'Abd al-Ghāfir Ibn Ismā'il Ibn 'Abd āl-Ghāfir al-Fārisī, 251.
 Abū Ghālib Shujā' Ibn Fāris al-Dihlī, 73.
 Abu al-Ghanā'im Ibn al-Mu'alim, 159.
 Abū Ḥafṣ, 153.
 Abu 'l-Ḥajnā, 111.
 Abū Ḥakimah Raṣhīd Ibn Iṣḥāq Ibn Raṣhīd, 234.
 Abū Ḥamdūn al-Ṭayyib Ibn Ismā'il al-Dihlī, 266 & note, 267.
 Abū Ḥāmid 'Abd al-Ḥamīd Ibn Ḥibat Allāh Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Abī 'l-Ḥadīd al-Madā'nī, 27.
 Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazzālī 185, 277n.
 Abū Ḥanīfah, 4, 41, 42, 43 and note, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 220, 246n, 276n.
 Abū Ḥanīfah al-Dīnawarī, 263.
 Abū Ḥanīfah al-Nu'mān Ibn Abī 'Abd Allāh Muḥammad Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ḥayyūn, 52, 58.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan, 3, 54, 55, 56, 57, 95, 170, 284.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Aḥmad Ibn - Yahyā, 284.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī, 52, 54, 55, 300, 301.

- Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Abī Turāb al-Zankawī al-Khayyāf, 250.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah al-Kisā'i, 106.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī al-Mas'ūdī, 285.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā 99.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Bākhārī, 56.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Hibat Allāh Ibn Abī Ghānā'im Sa'id Ibn Hibat Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī, 88.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Hilāl Ibn al-Muḥassan Ibn Abī Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn Hilāl Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Zahrūn Ibn Ḥabbūn al-Sābi al-Harrānī, 126.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Furāt, 39.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Ibn al-Talmidh, 91.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Khushyār Ibn Labbān Ibn Baṣṣahri, 71n.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Kisāi, 258.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Mālik Ibn Sa'id Ibn Mālik al-Fāriqī, 62.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Mas'ūdī, 307.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Mubārak Ibn 'Abd al-Jabbār al-Ṣayrāfi, 65.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Muḥammad Ibn al-Muẓaffar Ibn Muḥayriz al-Baḡhdādī, 279.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Naḍr, 34.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Rawḥi, 7.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan al-Sabbāk, 14.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Sa'd al-Khayr Ibn Muḥammad al-Anṣārī, 277n.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Sa'd al-Khayr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Sahl al-Andalusī, 276.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Sa'id Ibn Hibat Allāh, 95.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan Tāhir Ibn 'Bābshād, 279.
 Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Ubayd Allāh 250.
 Abū Ḥudhayfah Wāṣil Ibn 'Aṭā, 143.
 Abū Hurayrah, 178, 245.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn, 14, 15.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Aḥmad Ibn Ja'fār al-Munādī, 267n.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn 'Alī Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Umar, 87.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Ibn Lankak, 14.
 Abu 'l-Ḥusayn Muḥammad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far, 11.
 Abū 'l-Ḥusayn al-Qāsim Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh, 286.
 Abu al-Ḥusayn Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd al-Muti' Ibn 'Abd al-Nūr al-Zawawī, 283.
 Abū 'Isa Kathīr, 218.
 Abū 'Isa al-Tirmidhī, 224.
 Abū Ishāq, 126n, 214, 231.
 Abū Ishāq Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Dhuhli, 100.

- Abū Ishāq Ismā'il Ibn Ishāq
 Ibn Ismā'il Ibn Ḥammād
 Ibn Zayd Ibn Dirham al-
 Azdi, 229.
 Abū Ishāq al-Sabi'i, 42.
 Abū Ishāq al-Ṣābi, 126.
 Abū Ishāq al-Shirāzi, 1.
 Abū Ismā'il Ḥammād Ibn 'Abī
 Sulaymān Muslim, 42n.
 Abu 'l-'Izz Ibn Kadīs, 253.
 Abū Ja'far Aḥmad Ibn Yaḥyā
 Ibn Jābir Ibn Dāwūd al-
 Balādhuri, 164.
 Abū Ja'far al-Manṣūr, 47, 63,
 99, 100, 127, 380.
 Abū Ja'far Mas'ūd, 51.
 Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn
 Ḥabīb, 121n.
 Abū Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn
 Ḥumayd Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamīd
 al-Ṭūsi, 170, 171.
 Abu Ja'far Muḥammad Ibn
 Sulaymān, 286.
 Abu Ja'far al-Ṣaymari, 128.
 Abu Ja'far al-Ṭabari, 284.
 Abu 'l-Karam Hibat Allāh
 Ibn 'Alī Ibn Mas'ūd Ibn
 Thābit Ibn Hāshim Ibn
 Ghālib Ibn Thābit al-Anṣārī
 al-Khazraji, 86.
 Abū Khālīd, 275.
 Abū Khālīd Yazid Ibn Mazyad
 Ibn Zāyidah al-Shaybānī,
 173.
 Abū Khallād Sulaymān Ibn
 Khallād, 266.
 Abu 'l-Khaṭṭāb Ibn Diḥyah
 290.
 Abū Khaythamah, 214.
 Abū Khirāsh, 157.
 Abū Lahab 'Abd al-'Uzzā
 236, 237.
 Abu 'l-Ma'ālī al-Ḥaziri, 69,
 90.
 Abu 'l-Ma'ālī Hibat Allāh Ibn
 al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Muṭṭalib, 91.
 Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn, 86n.
 Abu 'l-Mansūr Niazar al-
 'Ubaydī 6.
 Abū Maḥfūz Marḥiz Ibn Ziyād
 304.
 Abū Makārim Hibat Allāh Ibn
 Wazīr Ibn Muqallad, 83,
 86.
 Abū Mālik, 155.
 Abū Mālik al-Kindī, 106.
 Abū Manṣūr, 99, 252,
 283.
 Abū Manṣūr Aḥmad Ibn 'Abd
 Allāh Ibn Aḥmad al-Farghānī al-Miṣri 62.
 Abū Manṣūr al-Azharī, 278.
 Abū Manṣūr al-Jawālīqī,
 19.
 Abū Manṣūr al-Jili, 190.
 Abū Manṣūr Mawḥūb Ibn
 Aḥmad al-Jawālīqī, 276.
 Abū Manṣūr Muḥammad Ibn
 'Abd Allāh Ibn Faḍlawayh
 al-Iṣbahānī, 250.
 Abū Manṣūr Muḥammad Ibn
 'Abd al-Mālik Ibn al-Ḥasan
 Ibn Khayrūn, 277 & note.
 Abū Manṣūr at-Munajjim,
 98.

- Abū Maṣṣūr al-Tha'ālibi, 7.
 Abū Marwān 'Abd al-Malik
   Ibn Ḥabīb, 222n.
 Abū Maymūnah, 3.
 Abū Miḥjan, 111.
 Abū Mu'ādh, 144.
 Abū Mu'āwiyah al-Ḍarīr,
   244.
 Abū Muḥammad, 249, 271,
   274.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh,
   64.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh
   Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn
   Aḥmad al-Khushshāb, 250.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh
   Ibn Aḥmad al-Khāzin,
   145n.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh
   Ibn 'Alī al-Muqrī, 252.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh
   Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Sa'id al-
   Qutrubullī, 286.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh
   Ibn Muḥammad al-Akfānī
   14.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh
   Ibn Muḥammad al-Tanūkhī, 239.
 Abū Muḥammad 'Alī Ibn
   Aḥmad, 220.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Dahhān,
   276.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan,
   63.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn
   Aḥmad Ibn Ḥakīnā al-
   Ḥamīmī, 68.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Ḥasan Ibn
   'Ammār, 9.
 Abū Muḥammad Ibn al-
   Ḥakīnā, 70, 90, 91.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Khāzin,
   145.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Muḥallabī,
   128.
 Abū Muḥammad Ṣa'id Ibn al-
   Mubārak al-Dahhān, 187,
   276.
 Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā Ibn
   Akṭham Ibn Muḥammad Ibn
   Qaṭan Ibn Sam'ān Ibn
   Muḥannaj al-Tamīmī al-
   Usayyidi al-Marwazī, 223.
 Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā Ibn
   Mubārak Ibn al-Mughīrah
   al-'Adawī, 266.
 Abū Muḥammad Yaḥyā al-
   Laythī, 218.
 Abū Muḥammad al-Yazidī,
   266-275.
 Abū 'l-Munḍhir Hishām al-
   Asadī, 100, 101.
 Abū 'l-Munḍhir Hishām Ibn
   Abī 'l-Naḍr Muḥammad Ibn
   Sā'ib Ibn Bishr Ibn 'Amr
   al-Kalbī, 102.
 Abū 'l-Muqātil, 272.
 Abū 'l-Murḥaf Naṣr, 18, 19.
 Abū Murrah Sayf Ibn Dhī
   Yazan, 178.
 Abū Mūsā 'l-'Aṣḥari, 42n, 13.
 Abū Muslim 'l-Khūrasānī, 307.
 Abū 'l-Muṭarrāf Muḥārib Ibn
   Dithār al-Sadūsī, 42n.

- Abu 'l-Muwayyad al-Muwaf-faq Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Makki, 4.
 Abu 'l-Nadā Bīāl Ibn Jarir
 al-Muḥammadi, 22.
 Abū Nahshal, 153.
 Abu 'l-Naṣr Sa'id Ibn Abi
 'Arūbah, 214n.
 Abū Nu'aym, 3.
 Abū Nuḥayr al-Sa'dī, 152,
 Abū Nuwās, 140, 141, 142,
 146.
 Abū Qābus al-Ḥimyarī, 313 &
 note.
 Abū Qābus 'Umar Ibn Sulaymān al-Ḥira, 313n.
 Abu 'l-Qāhir al-Wāsiṭī, 254.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim, 23, 58, 60, 62,
 86, 87.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-'Aziz,
 58, 60, 61, 62.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Karīm
 Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd
 Allāh Ibn Yūsuf al-Dallāl
 al-Sāwī, 276.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Abd al-Raḥmān
 250.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Alī Ibn Tirād
 'l-Zaynabī, 65.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Hibat Allāh
 69.
 Abu 'l-Qasim Hibat Allāh Ibn
 al-Faḍl Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz
 Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-
 Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Aḥmad
 Ibn al-Faḍl Ibn Ya'qūb Ibn
 Yūsuf Ibn Sālim, 73.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Aflah, 93.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Ḥajar, 23.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Ḥānī al-
 Andlusi, 66.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn al-Ḥusayn
 253.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibn Sa'id Ibn
 al-Musayyab, 180.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ibrāhīm Ibn
 Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad al-
 Shāhid, 250.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il, 273.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Ismā'il Ibn
 Muḥammad, 251,
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Maḥmūd al-
 Zamalkhsharī, 65.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim Naṣr Ibn Aḥmad
 Ibn Naṣr Ibn Māmūn,
 11.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Quṣḥayrī,
 245, 246.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim al-Suhayli,
 178.
 Abu 'l-Qāsim 'Ubayd Allāh
 Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh
 Ibn Zunayn al-Rqqī, 276. &
 note.
 Abū Qatādah, 151, 152.
 Abū Qubays, 50.
 Abu 'l-Raqa'maq Aḥmad Ibn
 Muḥammad al-Anṭāki,
 8.
 Abu Rifā'ah 'Umarah Ibn
 Wathimah, 149.
 Abu Ruwaym Nāfi', 2.
 Abu 'l-Sa'adat Hibat Allāh Ibn
 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn
 Ḥamzah, 64.

- Abū 'l-Sa'ādāt (Ibn al-Shajari), 66, 68.
 Abū Sa'd, 51, 52.
 Abū Sa'd al-Sam'ānī, 73, 149, 173, 277.
 Abū Ṣādiq Muṣṣid Ibn Yaḥyā Ibn al-Qāsim al-Madīnī, 87, 252.
 Abū Sa'id, 123, 128, 162.
 Abū Sa'id 'Abd al-Raḥmān Ibn Maḥdī, 215n.
 Abū Sa'id al-Ḥasan Ibn al-Ḥusayn al-Sukkrai, 122n.
 Abū Sa'id Ibn Yūnus, 149.
 Abū Sa'id al-Khudrī, 1.
 Abū Sa'id Māhik Ibn Bindār, 128.
 Abū Sa'id Muḥammad Ibn Yūsuf, 161.
 Abū Sa'id Yaḥyā, 254.
 Abū Salāma, Ḥaṣṣ al-Kallāl 307.
 Abū Ṣāliḥ, 38, 149,
 Abū Ṣāliḥ al-Sammān, 245n.
 Abū 'l-Salt Umayyah Ibn Abd al-'Azīz Ibn Abī 'l-Salt, 301, 306.
 Abū 'l-Sa'ūd, 22.
 Abū Shu'ayb Sālih Ibn Ziyād al-Sūsī, 266 and note.
 Abū Sufyān, 103n.
 Abū Sulaymān, 254.
 Abū Sulaymān al-Khaṭṭābī, 232n.
 Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-Bāqilānī, 74.
 Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Iṣbahānī, 252.
 Abū Ṭāhir Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥaqaṣī, 250.
 Abū Ṭāhir al-Dhuhli, 53.
 Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad, 54, 55.
 Abū Ṭāhir Muḥammad Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥīm al-Kātib, 250.
 Abū Ṭāhir al-Silafī, 20, 81.
 Abū Ṭāhir Yaḥyā Ibn 'Abd al-Ghaḥfār Ibn al-Ṣabbāgh 250.
 Abū Ṭāhir Yaḥyā Ibn Tāmīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs al-Ḥimyari al-Ṣanhājī, 297.
 Abū Ṭālib, 63, 119, 139, 180, 185, 196.
 Abū Tammām al-Ṭā'i, 25, 28, 65, 68, 146n, 161, 162, 163, 65, 169.
 Abū 'l-Tayyib, 7.
 Abū 'l-Tayyib al-Mutanabbi 25, 28.
 Abū 'l-Ṭufayl 'Āmir Ibn Wathīlah, 42 and note.
 Abū Turāb, 15n.
 Abū 'l-Turūq al-Ḍabbī, 143.
 Abū 'Ubādah, 170.
 Abū 'Ubādah al-Buḥārī, 25, 28, 159, 160, 161, 186.
 Abū 'Ubayd al-Qāsim Ibn Sallām, 266, 268, 278.
 Abū 'Ubaydah, 34.

- Abū 'Umar al-Dūrī, 266.
 Abū 'Umar Yūsuf Ibn Hārūn al-Kindī al-Ramādī, 145.
 Abū 'Uthmān Sa'id, 15.
 Abu 'l-Wafā 'Abd al-Razzāq Ibn al-Wahb Ibn Ḥassān, 254.
 Abu 'l-Walid, 130.
 Abu 'l-Walid Ibn al-Faraḍī, 149, 222, 223.
 Abū Yahyā al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yahyā, 304.
 Abū Yahyā Ishāq Ibn Sulaymān al-Rāzī, 246n.
 Abū Ya'lā al-Khalīl Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Aḥmad Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Khalīl al-Khalīlī, 217 and note.
 Abū Ya qūb, 249.
 Abū Ya'qūb Ishāq, 273.
 Abū Yazid, 180.
 Abū Yazīd Wathīmah, 148.
 Abū Yūsuf, 47, 183n.
 Abū Yūsuf Ya'qūb, 220.
 Abū Yūsuf Ya'qūb Ibn Ibrāhīm, 180.
 Abū Zakariyā Yahyā al-'Abdī, 216, 249, 262.
 Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn Ādam, 215n.
 Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥasan Ibn Bisṭām al-Shaybānī al-Tibrizī, 275, 277..
 Abū Zākariyā Yahyā Ibn Ma'in Ibn 'Awn Ibn Ziyād Ibn Bisṭām 'bn 'Abd al-Rahmān al-Murri, 213.
 Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn Mandah, 251.
 Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn Mu'adh al-Rāzī, 246.
 Abū Zakariyā Yahyā Ibn Ziyād Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Manzūr al-Aslāmī al-Daylamī al-Kūfī, 258.
 Abyssinia, 117n.
 Abyssinian, 178, 195.
 'Ād, 140.
Adab al-Kātib, 123.
 Ādam, 75, 126, 133, 248, 292.
 al-'Adawānī, 254n.
 'Adawī, 274.
 Aden, 22, 24n.
 Ādharbā'ijān, 16, 117n, 173n, 213n, 225n.
 'Adī, 132, 141, 156, 274.
 al-'Ādil Ibn Sallār, 303.
 'Adnān, 274.
 'Aḍud al-Dawlah Ibn Buwayh, 6.
 'Adwān, 258.
 'Adwānī, 258.
 al-Afḍal, 25, 26.
 Afghānistān, 51n.
 Africa, 84n, 86n, 169n, 235, 304.
 African, 220.
 Aḥmad, al-Dhuhli 54, 263.
 Aḥmad Ibn Abi Duwād, 225, 244.

- Aḥmad Ibn Abi 'l-Fayyāḍ, 221.
 Aḥmad Ibn Abi Khālīd al-Aḥwal, 230.
 Aḥmad Ibn Abi Nu'aym, 232, 233.
 Aḥmad Ibn Ḥanbal, 18, 44, 184, 214, 215, 216, 230.
 Aḥmad Ibn Khālīd, 222.
 Aḥmad Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ḥāṭim al-Nūshārī, 12, 13, 17.
 Aḥmad Ibn al-Miqdām, 102n.
 Aḥmad Ibn Muḥammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Farghānī, 53.
 Aḥmad Ibn al-Muthannā, 14.
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Ammār, 181.
 Aḥmad Ibn 'Uqbah, 213.
 Aḥmad Ibn Yūnus al-Ḍabbī, 232.
 al-Aḥmar, 258.
 al-Aḥnaf Ibn Qays, 315.
 Aḥnafs, 209.
 al-Aḥzam, 121.
 'Ajam, 134.
 Aktam, 245.
 Aktham, 245.
 Aktham Ibn al-Ṣayfī, 224.
 Aleppo, 8, 26, 85n, 99, 138, 160, 161, 167, 170, 185, 186, 193, 197, 199, 200, 212, 213, 253, 279.
 Alexander the Great, 104n.
 Alexandria, 20, 23, 58, 252, 303.
Alfiyah, 108n, 283n.
 Algiers, 305, 306.
 'Alī al-Aḥmar, 258n.
 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn 'Abbās, 172.
 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib, 36, 41, 64, 100, 105, 108, 117, 119, 121n, 122, 134, 138, 140, 196, 197, 229, 235, 236, 248, 265.
 'Alī Ibn 'Aṣim, 45, 46, and note.
 'Alī Ibn Ḡhannām al-Kūfī, 40n.
 'Alī Ibn Ḥamzah al-Iṣbahāmī, 146, 169.
 'Alī Ibn Ḥārūn, 288.
 'Alī Ibn Ḥasan, 48.
 'Alī Ibn Ḥusayn, 87.
 'Alī Ibn 'Isā al-Rummānī, 126.
 'Alī Ibn al-Kūfī, 39, 40.
 'Alī Ibn al-Madini, 35, 214, and note.
 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad Tabrizī, 281.
 'Alī Ibn Muḥammad al-Ṭanāfisi, 247.
 'Alī Ibn al-Nu'mān, 60, 61.
 'Alī Ibn Sāmān, 128.
 'Alī Ibn Ṭirād al-Zaynabī, 74.
 'Alī Ibn Yahya, 98, 283, 288, 302, 303, 304.
 'Alī al-Ṭāhir, 66.
 'Alī Zayn al-'Ābidīn, 138.
 'Alides, 66, 119n, 248, 257n.

- 'Ālij, 187.
Almegisti, 71.
 Almohades, 306n.
 Alp Arsalān, 51, 52.
Amāli, 157, 174, 233.
 'Amam, 156.
A'mār al-'Ayān, 170.
 Amari, Mr. 305n.
 al-A'maṣh 100, 214, 244.
 Āmid, 295.
 al-'Amid, 281n, 282n.
 al-Amīn, 98n, 268, 311.
 Amīn al-Dawlah Ibn al-'Ammār, 9.
 Amīn al-Dawlah Ibn al-
     Talmīdh, 88, 96, 97.
 Amīn al-Dīn, 187, 188, 189, 190.
 al-Amīn Muḥammad, 311.
 al-Āmir, 303.
 'Āmir Ibn 'Umar al-Mawṣili
     266.
 'Amr Ibn 'Adi, 156.
 'Amr Ibn 'Āṣī, 104.
 'Amr Ibn Dinār, 214.
 'Amr Ibn al-Ghawth, 142.
 'Amr Ibn al-Hind al-Lakhmī, 116.
 'Amr Ibn Ka'b, 265.
 'Amr Ibn Maṣ'adah, 231.
 'Amr Ibn al-Masīḥ al-Ṭhu'alī
     142.
 'Amr Ibn Qays 'Aylān, 258.
 'Amr Ibn al-Ṣharīd, 176.
 'Amr Ibn Tamīm, 34, 245.
 'Amr Ibn 'Ubayd, 144, 148.
 'Amr Ibn 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, 37, 38.
 'Amr al-Zubaydi, 136, 137.
 Anas Ibn Mālīk, 41, 42, 100.
Anbā 'l-Ruwāt fi Abnā 'l-Nuḥāt, 199.
 al-Aḥbār, 41, 51, 213, 218.
 Angora, 177n.
Anmūdḥaj, 237.
Anmūdḥaj al-A'yān min shu'arā'
     al-Zamān, 90.
Annals of Abu 'l-Fidā 2n, 3n,
     152n, 173n.
Annals of Ṭabari, 179n.
Ansāb, 3, 142, 144, 149, 173,
     218, 265, 277.
 Anṣār, 87, 151, 171n, 184.
 al-'Anṣī, 179n.
Antidotarium, 95.
 'Aqīl Ibn Tāriḥ, 156, 157.
 'Aqīl Ibn Abī Ṭālib, 236.
 'Aqīl (?) 'Adī Ibn Zayd al-
     'Abādī, 195.
 al-Aqīq, 29, 67, 204.
Aqrābādīn, 95.
 al-Aqra' Ibn Hābiṣ, 107.
 'Arab, 20, 32, 36n, 59n, 74,
     130, 135, 141, 142, 157, 168,
     251, 304.
 al-A'rābī, 36n.
 Arabia, 191, 205n.
Arabian nights. See also Thous- and and one nights.
 Arabic, 31n, 34, 50, 53, 55, 64,
     66, 68n, 70n, 71, 85, 86,
     121n, 122n, 127, 133n, 134
     141n, 143, 163n, 164n, 166n,
     189n, 201n, 211n, 224n,
     238n, 256, 257, 258, 262,
     264n, 266n, 267, 268, 270n,

- 271, 273, 276, 277n 288n,
298n, 305n, 317n.
- Arabs, 34, 36, 53, 55, 58, 64,
69, 103n, 104n, 117n, 119,
120, 121n, 123, 133, 134,
135n, 142, 150, 154, 156,
170, 202n, 205n, 209n,
236, 255, 259, 266, 272n,
224, 275n, 281, 300,
303.
- 'Arafāt, 56, 130, 240.
- al-Arāk, 168.
- Arbela, 26, 27, 33, 193, 197,
225n.
- Ardabil, 161n.
- al-'Arjī, 36, 37, 38.
- Armenia, 173n.
- al-Arḡam, 173.
- Arsacides, 104n.
- Arsalān al-Baṣūṣirī, 150.
- Arṭāh Ibn Suhayyah, 129, 130,
and note.
- Asad, 180, 258, 284.
- Asad Ibn 'Amr al-Bajali, 49,
and note.
- al-Asadī, 185.
- Ascalon, 102n.
- al-Aṣfar, 195.
- al-A'shā, 38.
- 'Āshūrah, 100.
- Asia, 196.
- Asia Minor, 212.
- 'Asīb, 177.
- 'Āṣim, 263, 264.
- 'Āṣim Ibn Abī 'l-Najūd, 255, 256.
- *Askar Ibn Abī Naṣr Ibn
Ibrāhīm al-Ḥamawī, 196.
- 'Askar al-Maūdī, 180.
- al-'Askarī, 122n.
- Al-Aṣma'i, 3, 251, 257, 272,
310.
- Aṣturīlābi, 71.
- al-Aswad al-'Ansī, 179.
- 'Aṭī Ibn Abī Rabāḥ, 42.
- al-Athram, 268.
- 'Aṭṭāb Ibn Asīd, 226, 227.
- Avicenna, 95, 169n.
- Awāj, 291.
- al-'Awāṣimi, 200.
- 'Awf, 107.
- 'Awf Ibn Abī Jamīlah, 36.
- 'Awf Ibn Bakr, 258.
- 'Awf Ibn Sa'd Ibn Dhubyān
Ibn Baghid Ibn Rayth Ibn
Ghaṭafān, 218.
- Awḥad al-Zamān, 94, 95,
96.
- 'Āwīnah, 205.
- 'Awn, 218.
- 'Awn al-Dīn Yaḥyā Ibn
Huhayrah, 19, 96.
- Aws, 87, 163, 171.
- Aws Ibn Ḥajar, 163.
- 'Awwānah, 132.
- al-Awzā'i, 215.
- A'yan Ibn Ḍubay'ah Ibn 'Iqāl, 124.
- 'Aydhāb, 23, 24.
- 'Āyishah, 124, 226n.
- Ayman al-'Ālamīn, 19.
- 'Ayn Shams, 7.
- Ayyūb al-Sikhtiyāni, 1, 100.

- Azd, 104, 226n, 252, 292, 293, 312.
 281.
 al-Azd, 155.
 al-Azhar, 20.
 al-Azharī, 42.
 al-'Aziz, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 60.
 al-'Azzā, 131.
- B
- Bāb al-Futūḥ, 6.
 Bāb Ḥarb, 20.
 Bāb Salām, 54.
 Bābak al-Khuramī, 161n, 213n.
 Bābil, 41, 51, 193.
 Babylonia, 133n.
 al-Badī' al-Aṣṭurlābī, 69, 95.
 Badī' al-Zamān, 23.
 Bādīsids, 304.
 Badr, 285.
 Badr Ibn 'Ammār, 238.
 Badūl, 159n.
 Baghdād, 5, 11, 14, 18, 19, 20, 27, 30, 33, 34, 42, 43, 51, 53, 55, 63, 64, 65, 68, 69, 70, 71, 73, 74, 78n, 79n, 80, 88, 89n, 95, 96, 98, 100, 102n, 106n, 126, 142, 150, 184, 188, 190, 192, 193, 194, 196, 197, 212, 313, 214, 225n, 229n, 232, 247, 250, 252, 260n, 263, 266, 274, 276n, 277n, 279, 282, 287, 292, 293, 312.
 al-Baghdādī, 196.
 al-Bahā, 264n.
 Bahā al-Dīn Abu 'l-Maḥāsīn Yūsuf Ibn Rāfi' Ibn Tamīm, 253.
 Bahā al-Dīn Ibn Shaddād, 186.
 Bahl, 264.
 Bāhilah, 272.
 Bāhilite, 272n.
 Bāhir, 284.
 al-Baḥnsā, 86n, 88.
 Baḥr, 107.
 Bahrām, 184.
 Baḥrayn, 116n.
 al-Bākharzī, 99.
 Bākhtarī, 185.
 al-Bakhtarī, 180.
 Bakkār Ibn Abd Allāh al-Zubayri, 180.
 Bakr, 258.
 al-Balādhurī, 164n.
 Bal-'Anbar, 39.
 Balḫ, 546, 248, 307.
 Balqīs, 15.
 Bani 'l-Naḍir, 42n.
 Bani Qaṭan Ibn Nahshal, 108.
 Bani Qurayzah, 42n.
 Bani Samurah, 14.
 Banū al-Aṣfār, 194, 195n.
 Banū 'Āmir Ibn Layth, 3.
 Banū Asad, 265.
 Banū Fazārah, 140.
 Banū Riyāh, 107, 108.
 Banū Yarbū', 151.

- Bqī', 217, 291.
 Barbar, 86n, 218, 223.
 Bariq, 290.
 Barjawān, 10, 11, 60.
 Barmak, 306, 307, 312.
 Barmakid, 259, 264n, 267, 316.
 Barmakide, 104, 271.
 Barmakids, 173, 308, 317.
 Barwiz, 179.
 Basa'ūṭūn, 218n.
 Bashshār Ibn Burd, 92, 98, 144, 147, 148, 272, 275, 284.
 Başrah, 11, 14, 15, 18, 34, 100n, 101, 109, 117, 122, 125, 131, 133n, 134, 137n, 149, 183, 214, 215n, 226, 227, 229, 232n, 250, 254, 256, 257, 274, 275.
 al-Başrī, 40.
 al-Baṭhā, 119, 312.
 Baṭṭah, 249.
 Battle of the Camel, 124, 226n.
 al-Bayāḍī, 51.
 Bayṭās, 186.
 Bayt al-maqdis, 115.
 al-Bazzāz, 253n.
 Benjamin, 137, 232n.
 Berlin, 278n.
Bibliothèque imperiale, 3n, 166n.
 Bijāyah, 283, 299.
 Bilbays, 9.
 Bin Yamīn (Benjamin) al-Başrī, 137.
 al-Birkah, 57.
 Bishr al-Marisi, 263.
 Biṣṭām, 218, 282.
 Biṣṭāmī, 217.
 al-Biṭāḥ, 152.
Book of Animals, 81.
 Bresnier's Chrestomathie arabe, 226n.
 Bugia, 283, 299, 305.
 Buḥtur, 132, 170.
 al-Buḥturī, 31, 132, 142, 146n, 159-173, 185, 265.
 al-Buḥturī's Diwān, 166n, 171n.
 Bujayr, 54.
 Būlāq 54n, 92n, 108n, 127n, 138n, 148n, 173n, 189n, 228n, 317n, 318n.
 Bullārah, 303.
 Bulukīn, 9n.
 Būrān, 142.
 Burd, 272.
Biurdah (poem), 86n.
 Buṣīr Qurīdus, 87, 88.
 Būṣīr al-Ṣidr, 88.
Buyūtāt al-'Arab, 133.
Buyūtāt Quraysh, 133.

C

- Cairo, 6, 7, 9, 10, 53, 54, 55, 57, 60, 61, 63, 64, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 149, 150, 219, 243, 252, 254, 283.
Canon of Avicenna, 169n.
 Capricorn, 297.
 Carthage, 304.
 Casiri's Bibliotheca Arabica

Hispanica, 222n.
 Caspian sea, 204n.
 Caussin's Essai, 152n, 153n, 156n.
 Chaldaea, 133n.
 China, 277n.
 Chinese, 277n.
 Chosroes, 155, 170, 178.
 Chosroes Anūshirwān, 178.
 Chosroes II, 170n.
 Christian 88, 89, 313n.
 Christmas day, 96.
 Chwolsohn's Ssabier, 126n.
 Cilicia, 200n.
Commentary on the Stations (Maqāmāt) of al-Ḥarīrī, 4.
 Constantina, 245n.
 Constantine, 305.
 Constantinople, 305n.
 Cordova, 145n, 218, 219n, 222, 223, 252, 253, 288.
 Crete, 222n.
 La Cuba, 305n.

D

al-Ḍabbī, 222n.
 Dābiq, 138.
 Dādūwayh, 179.
 Dahlak, 22.
 al-Dakādik, 155.
Dalā'it al-Aḥkām, 253.
 al-Dāliyah, 286.
 Damascus, 26, 75, 85n, 138, 194, 196, 197, 236, 253, 278, 283.
 Damietta, 55.
 al-Dānī, 274n.

Dār al-Salām, 188n, 192n.
Dār al-Tirāz, 81.
 al-Dāraqutnī, 216, 224.
 al-Darawī, 84.
 Ḍarb dinār, 212.
 Ḍarb Dinār al-Saghīr, 194.
 Ḍarb al-Sabā, 64.
 Dārij, 67.
 Dārim, 107, 114, 123.
 Ḍarir, 144.
 David, 122, 255, 301.
 Dawqal, 115n.
 Daws, 155.
 Ḍawṭarā, 108.
 Dāwūd Ibn 'Ālī, 229.
 Daylam, 1.
 Daylamite, 128, 179, 258.
 de Gayangos' Maqqari, 222n.
 de Hammer, 129n.
 D'Horbelot, Riblioth Orientale, 209n.
 d'Ohsson's Tableau general de l'Empire Ottoman, 111n, 226n.
 de Perceval, M. Caussin, 5n, 45n, 103n, 125n, 156n, 317n, 318n. de Perceval, M. Caussin, Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, 45n, 66n, 68n, 107n, 136n, 151n, 156n, 174n, 178n, 179n, 208n, 224n.
 de Sacy, 68n, 117n, 274n. de Sacy's Anthologie grammaticale, 19n.
 De Sacy's Chrestomathie arabe, 57n, 125n, 312n.
 De Sacy's Ḥarīrī 13.

de Sacy's Relation de, Egypt, 96n.
 de Sacy's Traite de prosodie arabe, 271n.
 de Slane, M, 36n, 64n, 196n, 236n, 248n.
Dlahabi, 257n.
Dhahabī's Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz, 100n, 160n.
Dhakwān, 245n.
Dlāt Awshāl, 110.
Dhayl, 253, 277.
Dhu 'l-Liwā, 140.
Dhu 'l-Nūn, 79n.
Dhu 'l-Riyāsatayn al-Faḍl Ibn Sahl, 99.
 Di'bil al-Khuzā'i, 273.
 Dik al-Jinn, 28.
 Dirār Ibn al-Azwar al-Asadi 151.
 al-Diwān al-'Aziz, 30.
Diwan d'Amrolkais, 142n, 177n.
 Diyā al-Dīn, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 31, 32, 33.
 Diyā al-Dīn Ibn al-Aṭhir, 24.
 Diyār Bakr, 296.
 Dozy, M, 126n. 163n.
 Dozy's Dictionnaire des noms, des vêtements des Arabes, 194n.
 Dozy's Historia Abbadidarum 221n.
 Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, 109n, 145n, 222n.
 Ḍubay'ah, 124.

Ḍubbah, 143.
Dumayt al-Qaṣr, 56.
Durrat al-Ḡhawwās, 35, 38.
Durrat al-Tāj fīshī'r Ibn Ḥajjāj, 71.

E

Egypt, 6, 7, 9n, 23, 24, 26, 27, 32, 52, 53, 55, 58, 70, 84, 86, 88, 92, 149, 150n, 177n, 235, 252, 274, 279, 301, 303, 304, 306, 309.
 Eg'ptian, 3n, 64n, 81, 87, 187, 208.
 El-Farcadani, 156n.
 Elias, 255.
 Emessa, 8, 79n.
 English, 70n, 105n, 124n.
Essai, 5n, 103n, 156n.
 Euphrates, 43, 140, 170, 176, 316.
 European, 57, 126n, 195n, 277n.
Exploration Scientifique de 'l-Algerie, 225n.
 Eve, 24.

F

Fuḍā'il al-Anṣār, 184.
 al-Fāḍil 'Abd al-Raḥīm, 21.
 al-Faḍl Ibn Marwān, 308.
 al-Faḍl Ibn Ṣahl, 37, 99.
 Faḍl Ibn Ṣāliḥ, 62.
 al-Faḍl, Ibn Yahyā, 307, 311, 316.
 Faḍls, 103.

- Fahm, 155.
 al-Fa<sup>kh</sup>ri, 65n.
 al-Falak al-Dā'ir 'ala 'l-Mathal al-Sā'ir, 27.
 Falak al-Ma'āni, 235.
 Falak al-Maghāni, 235n.
 Fam al-Şilḥ, 142.
 al-Faramā, 55.
 Farās, 173n.
 Farazdaq, 108, 125n.
 al-Farazdaq, 102, 107, 126,
   275.
 Farazdaqah, 124.
 al-Farghāni, 10.
 al-Fāri'ah, 174.
 Farid, 104.
 Fāriḥ, 156.
 Fārij, 156n.
 al-Fārisi al-Faṣawī, 148.
 Fāros, 134.
 al-Farqadān, 156.
 al-Farrā, 258-265.
 Farukhdād, 284.
 Faṣā, 148.
 Faṣawī, 150.
 Faṣiḥ, 264.
 al-Faṭḥ Ibn Khāqān, 171. and
   note 289.
 Fātiḥah, 261,
 Fāṭimah, 120, 121n, 174.
 Fāṭimid, 6, 8, 305.
 Fatimids, 52, 53.
 al-Fayyūn, 88.
 Fihri, 181.
 Fihrist, 288.
 Firūz, 179.
 Firuzān, 249.
 Flavius, 195n.
 Flugel, 146n.
 Flugel's *Die grammatischen
   Schulen der Araber*, 121n,
   122n, 258n, 260n, 273n.
 Franks, 306.
 French, 71n, 132n.
 Freytag, 278n.
 Freytag's Darstellung der Arabischen Verskunst, 271n.
 Freytag's Hamasa, 74n, 155n,
 Freytag's Maidāni, 205n, 208n,
   209n.
 al-Furāt, 148.
- G
- Gabriel, 59, 183.
 Galen, 89.
 Gayangos's Maqqari, 219n,
   222n.
 Germany, 306.
 Ghālib, 107, 108, 109, 110.
 Ghāliyah, 144.
 Ghanā'im, 88n.
 Gharib, 39, 268.
 Gharib al-Ḥadīth, 278.
 Gharib al-Muṣannaḥ, 39n.
 Ghars al-Ni'mah Abu 'l-Ḥasan
   Muḥammad Ibn Hilāl, 127.
 Gharūryan, 225n,
 Ghassānids, 185.
 Ghaṭafān, 218, 245n.
 al-Ghawṭh, 142.
 al-Ghazzāl, 143.
 Ghīyāth, 218.
 Ghirbāl al-Zamān, 212n.
 Goeje, M. 164n.
 Gog, 204n.

Gosche, Mr., 278.

Greece, 177n.

Greek, 72n, 190, 196.

Greeks, 71, 121, 177, 194, 195n, 212, 235.

H

Ḥabaṭah, 125n.

Ḥabīb Ibn Aws al-Ḥā'ī Abū Tammām, 25, 162, 163.

Ḥābis, 107.

al-Ḥadāyā wa 'l-Tuḥaf, 15.

al-Ḥādī, 134, 136, 137.

al-Ḥadiqah, 306.

al-Ḥafawāt al-nādirah min al-Mu'qqalin al-Malḥūzīn wa 'l-Saqatāt al-bādirah min al-Mughaffilīn al-Malḥūzīn, 127.

al-Ḥāfīz, 303, 305.

Ḥafs al-Ḥallāl, 307.

al-Ḥajar, 116n.

al-Ḥājir, 63.

al-Ḥājirī, 29n.

al-Ḥajjāj Ibn Yūsuf, 109 and note 255, 256, 257.

Ḥājji Khalīfah, 7n, 86n, 146, 212n, 217n, 221n, 265n.

Ḥājji Khalīfah's Bibliographical Dictionary, 71n, 95n, 270, and note.

Ḥajūn, 281.

al-Ḥakam Ibn 'Amr al-Sāsī, 285.

al-Ḥakam Ibn Hishām, 222n, al-Ḥakam Ibn Qanbarah al-Māzinā al-Baṣrī, 285n.

al-Ḥākim, 10, 60, 61, 62.

al-Ḥākim al-Mustanṣir, 7.

Ḥakīnā, 90n.

Ḥalimah, 34, 40.

Ḥamadḥān, 247, 250.

Hamām, 123.

Ḥamāsah, 65, 74, 75, 115n, 129n, 155, 157n, 169, 277, 278.

Ḥamāt, 8, 196.

al-Ḥamawī, 196.

Ḥammād, 86n,

Ḥammād Ajrad, 272.

Ḥammād Ibn Abī Ḥanīfah, 41, 49, 227.

Ḥammād Ibn Abī Sulaymān, 42.

Ḥammād Ibn Salamah, 214.

Ḥammām Ibn Munabbih, 178.

Ḥammūdite, 289.

Ḥamrā, 57.

Ḥamzah, 3, 45, 268.

Ḥamzah al-Zayyāt, 41.

Ḥanafī, 270n, 283.

Ḥanafites, 4, 51, 180, 229, 293.

Ḥanzalah, 107.

Ḥarb gate, 101.

Ḥarb Ibn Umayyah Ibn 'Abd Shams Ibn 'Abd Manāf, 237.

al-Ḥarīr, 105

al-Ḥarīrī, 35, 38, 39, 68, 117.

al-Ḥarīrī's Maqāmāt, 187.

al-Ḥārith, Ghassānid, 185.

al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Amr Ibn Ka'b, 265.

al-Ḥārith Ibn 'Amr Ibn Qays 'Aylān, 258.

al-Ḥārith Ibn Ka'b, 38.

al-Ḥārith Ibn Mālik, 156.

al-Ḥārith Ibn Qays, 231, note.

- al-Ḥārith Ibn Rabi', 151n.
 Ḥārithah Ibn Tha'labah Ibn 'Amr Muzayqiyā Ibn 'Āmir Mā al-Samā, 87.
 Ḥarmalah Ibn Yaḥyā. 45.
 Ḥarrān, 126.
 Harthamah Ibn A'yan al-al-Hāshimī, 88.
 Hārūn Ibn 'Alī 'l-Munajjim, 98, 99, 272, 288.
 Hārūn al-Rashīd, 35, 88, 172, 173, 180, 183, 185, 266, 306, 308, 316.
 Hārūt, 193n.
 al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, 122, 123, 144.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī, 304, 305, 306.
 al-Ḥasan, Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi Ṭālib, 36, 63, 64, 105, 117, 134, 185, 235, 236, 255, 256, 262. al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Alī Ibn Yaḥyā, 299, 301, 304.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Muḥammad al-Ḥanafīyah, 229.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Sahl, 142, 261, 314.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn 'Umārah, 49.
 al-Ḥasan Ibn Wahb, 167, 231.
 Hāshim, 8, 114, 121n, 180.
 Hāshimid family, 3.
 al-Ḥasīs, 284n.
 al-Ḥaskafī, 295.
 Ḥātim 119n.
 al-Ḥaṭim, 21n, 119, and note.
 Ḥātim al-Ṭā'i, 132, 208n.
 Ḥātim, 208.
 Ḥayṣ Bayṣ, 73, 74, 76, 77, 78, 193, 194.
 al-Haytham, 134, and note, 136, 140, 141, 142.
 al-Haytham Ibn Ḥabīb al-Ṣarrāf, 42.
 Ḥayyūn, 126n.
 al-Ḥaziri, 90, 99.
 Heliopolis, 7n.
 Hibat Allāh, 81.
 Hibat Allāh al-Buṣiri, 86, 87, 88.
 Hibat Allāh Ibn Sa'id, 95n.
 Hibat Allāh Ibn al-Talmidh, 88, 97.
 al-Ḥidāyah, 222n.
 Hieropolis, 170n.
 Ḥijāz, 24, 123, 125, 145n, 177, 214, 215, 236.
 Hilāl al-Ṣābi, 126, 127, 132.
 Ḥilf al-Fuḍāl, 103.
 Himāriyan, 225n.
 Hims, 161.
 Himyar, 177, 178.
 Ḥimyarite, 178, 275.
 Hind, 157.
 Ḥirah, 116, 155, 313n.
 al-Hisān, 296n.
 Hishām al-Ḍarir, 106.
 Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 38, 118, 119, 121, 137, 138, 139, 218.
 Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān, 218n, 222n.

- Hishām Ibn Ḥassān al-Azdi al-Baṣrī, 35 and note.
 Hishām Ibn al-Kalbī, 102, 103n
 106.
 Hishām Ibn 'Urwah, 34, 42,
 100, 101, 102, 180.
 Ḥiškafī, 296.
 Ḥiṣn Kayfa, 292, 296.
 al-Ḥiṣnī, 296.
Historie des Berbers 305n,
 306n.
History of Arbela, 28, 33.
History of Baghdād, 33, 41,
 42, 45, 49, 63, 102, 170, 180,
 183, 184, 194, 216, 224, 226,
 230, 232, 245, 247, 259, 276,
 312.
History of Baṣrah, 131.
History of Egypt, 149.
History of Iṣbahān, 3.
History of the Kadis of Cairo,
 9n.
History of Nayṣābūr, 251.
History of the Qāḍī Jawhar,
 53.
History of the Qāḍīs of Cairo
 61n.
History of the Qāḍīs of Egypt.
 56, 243.
History of Spain, 288n.
History of the Wazīrs, 316.
History of Ziyād Ibn 'Abīh, 103.
 Ḥubaysh, 110.
 Ḥudhayl, 235n.
 Ḥudhaylite, 157, 235.
al-Hudūd, 256, 264.
Ḥuffāz, 100n, 102n, 214n,
 215n, 217n, 245n, 246n,
 247n.
 Ḥujr, 34, 40, 142.
 Ḥulwān, 173n.
 Ḥumayd, 163.
 Ḥumayd al-Ṭawīl, 34.
 Humaym, 107.
 Hums Emessa, 161.
 Ḥunayn, 59.
 Hurmuz, 1n.
 Ḥusām al-Dīn 'Īsa 'l-Ḥājirī
 29
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abī
 Ṭālib, 100, 117, 119, 138, 236,
 255, 256, 262, 265.
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-
 Nu'mān, 61 and note.
 al-Ḥusayn Ibn Yūsuf, 62.
 Ḥuṣhaym, 36, 37, 215.
 al-Ḥuṣṭa'yah, 317.
 al-Huṣūn, 205.
 Ḥuzwā, 204.

I

- Ibn 'Abbās, 36, 47, 262.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, 150n.
 Ibn 'Abd al-Muṭī', 283n.
 Ibn Abī Uways, 3.
 Ibn Abī Za'idah Waki', 215.
 Ibn Aflah, 93.
 Ibn 'Ammār, 182.
 Ibn al-Anbār, 39.
 Ibn al-Anbārī, 66.
 Ibn 'Aqīl, 108n.
 Ibn 'Aṭā, 145.
 Ibn al-Aṭhīr al-Jazari, 24, 303.
 Ibn al-Azwar, 153.

- Ibn Bāqī, 289, 290, 291.
 Ibn Bardūn, 163n.
 Ibn Bashkuwāl, 223.
 Ibn al-Bawwāb, 187.
 Ibn Bint al-Shaykh Abī Manṣūr al-Khayyāt, 252.
 Ibn Dahhān, 187.
 Ibn al-Dharawī, 84.
 Ibn al-Dubaythī, 190, 191.
 Ibn Durayd, 115n, 224n.
 Ibn al-Faḍl, 74, 76, 77, 78, 79.
 Ibn Fūrak, 123.
 Ibn al-Habbāriyah, 235, 236.
 Ibn Ḥabīb, 256n.
 Ibn Ḥajjāj, 71, 93.
 Ibn Ḥakīnā, 68, 92.
 Ibn Ḥanbal, 44, 214.
 Ibn al-Ḥasan, 48.
 Ibn Ḥayyūs, 157.
 Ibn Ḥazm, 220.
 Ibn Hilāl, 189n.
 Ibn Hishām, 109n.
 Ibn Hubayrah, 44n, 79.
 Ibn Jarīr, 66n.
 Ibn Jawālīqī, 96, 282.
 Ibn al-Jawzī, 40, 169, 224n.
 256
 Ibn Jinnī, 65.
 Ibn Jurayj, 100.
 Ibn al-Kalbī, 151.
 Ibn Kathīr, 3n.
 Ibn Khālawayh, 125.
 Ibn Khaldūn's History of the Berbers, 88n, 304n.
 Ibn Khaldūn's Prolegomena, 131n, 132n, 245n, 274, 298n.
 Ibn Khālīd, 222n.
 Ibn Khallikān, 78, 113n, 160n, 172n, 199n, 277n, 288n, 305n, 318n.
 Ibn Khāqān, 288.
 Ibn al-Khāshshāb, 64.
 Ibn al-Khaymī, 75.
 Ibn Khaysūm, 277.
 Ibn al-Labbānah, 158.
 Ibn Lankak al-Baṣrī, 11 and note, 14.
 Ibn Lubābah, 222n.
 Ibn al-Madīnī, 214n.
 Ibn Maḥdī, 215.
 Ibn Ma'īn, 35n, 45n, 184, 213, 214, 216, 217.
 Ibn Mājah, 247n.
 Ibn Mālik, 108n, 283n.
 Ibn Mandah, 251.
 Ibn al-Marāghah, 113.
 Ibn Mubārak, 47, 215.
 Ibn Muḥayriz, 280.
 Ibn al-Mujāwir, 159.
 Ibn al-Munādī, 267, 274.
 Ibn al-Munajjim, 91, 99, 272.
 Ibn al-Munajjim al-Ma'arri, 84.
 Ibn Munīr, 158.
 Ibn Mūsa 'l-Makfūf, 263.
 Ibn al-Mustanīr, 39.
 Ibn al-Mustawfī, 33, 198.
 Ibn Muṭī' al-Zawawī, 283 and note.
 Ibn al-Muwaddib, 237.
 Ibn al-Najjār, 194.
 Ibn Nu'mān, 9n, 10.
 Ibn Nuqṭah, 252.
 Ibn Qādī Milah, 239.
 Ibn Qalāqīs, 20, 21, 23, 24, 83.
 Ibn al-Qāsim, 221.
 Ibn al-Qaṭṭān, 73, 80.

- Ibn Qutaybah, 107, 122, 123, 143, 163n, 177, 178, 184, 185, 265n.
 Ibn Rashīd al-Qayrawānī, 237.
 Ibn al-Rūmī, 163, 215.
 Ibn Sa'dūn al-Qurṭubī, 252-254.
 Ibn Sallām, 256.
 Ibn al-Sam'ānī, 65, 250, 253.
 Ibn Sanā al-Mulk, 81-86.
 Ibn Sanjar Bahram, 29n.
 Ibn al-Sawādī, 73, 77.
 Ibn Shaddād, 253.
 Ibn al-Shajari, 64, 65, 67, 69, 70.
 Ibn Shihāb, 214.
 Ibn al-Sikkī, 4n, 278n.
 Ibn Sinā, 95.
 Ibn Sirin, 45, 257.
 Ibn Surayj, 53.
 Ibn al-Ta'āwidhī, 30, 31.
 Ibn Ṭabaṭabā, 8.
 Ibn al-Talmīdh, 88, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96.
 Ibn Tamīm, 303.
 Ibn Tūmart, 299.
 Ibn 'Umar, 1, 2, 100, 152.
 Ibn 'Uyaynah, 317.
 Ibn Wazīr, 84.
 Ibn Yahyā, 302.
 Ibn Yūnus, 72n.
 Ibn Zaydūn, 232.
 Ibn Ziyād, 219n.
 Ibn al-Zubayr, 125.
 Ibn Zūlāq, 52, 53, 243.
 Ibn Zūlāq al-Fāriqī, 96.
 Ibn Zūlāq's History of the Qaḍis of Egypt, 60.
 Ibrāhīm (commander), 300.
 Ibrāhīm (Mandah), 249.
 Ibrāhīm al-Ḥarbī, 184.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Ṭarzi, 296.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Āli al-Dhuhli, 100n.
 Ibrāhīm Ibn Ḥātim al-Asadi, 87.
 Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣili, 310.
 Ibrāhīm al-Nadīm 308, 309.
 Ibrāhīm al-Yazidī, 274.
 Idrisid, 289n.
 Ifriqiyah, 53, 87, 235, 245, 283, 297, 302, 305, 306n.
 Ifṭikīn al-Turkī, 6.
 'Ijl, 102n.
 Ijmā', 285.
 Ikmāl al-Ikmāl, 252.
 Ikhtilāf al-Fuṣṭah, 53.
 'Imād al-Dīn, 19, 24, 69, 72, 85, 86, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 291, 292, 293, 296.
 al-'Imād al-Fayyāḍ, 281, 282.
 Imāmiyahs, 52.
 Imra al-Qays Ḥunduj Ibn Ḥujr al-Kindi, 92 and note, 142, 143, 177.
 Imra al-Qays's Mu'allaqah, 62n, 135n.
 'Imrān Ibn Muḥammad Ibn al-Dā'i Sabā Ibn Abi 'l-Sa'ūd Ibn Zuray' Ibn al-Abbās al-Yāmī, 22.
 India, 51.
 Intermediate Station, 148.

al-Intiṣār, 65.
 'Iqāl', 107, 123.
Iqnā', 95.
Iqtinā', 4.
 'Irāq, 19n, 26, 60, 125, 134,
 145n, 150n, 160, 167, 173n,
 192, 194, 229, 242, 244, 257,
 276n, 281.
 'Irāqs, two, 44, 307.
 al-'Ird, 115.
Irshād, 217n.
Irshād al-Alibbā ilā ma'rifat al-
Udabā, 197.
 'Isā Ibn Dīnār, 222.
 'Isā Ibn al-Qāshhī, 130.
 Isaac, 255.
 Iṣbahān, 3, 15, 51, 145, 146n,
 249, 250, 252, 253, 277n.
 Iṣhāq, 63, 249, 308.
 Iṣhāq Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn Muṣ'ab
 106 and note.
 Iṣhāq Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Mawṣili,
 266, 309, 315.
 Iṣhāq Ibn Sulaymān al-Rāzī,
 246.
 Iṣhāq Ibn Suwayd al-'Adawī
 254.
 Iṣhāq al-Nadīm, 311.
Iṣṭiqāq, 107n, 115n, 125n.
Iṣlāḥ al-Manṭiq, 4, 278.
 Islamism, 31, 66, 90, 103, 112,
 129, 151, 179, 200, 203, 207,
 223, 228, 229, 241, 245n.
 Ismā'il, 184
 Ismā'il Ibn Abi Khālīd,
 34.
 Ismā'il Ibn Ḥammād, 41, 44,

49, 227.
 Ismā'il Ibn Iṣhāq, 229n.
 Ismā'il Ibn Muḥammad Ibn
 Ismā'il al-Ṣaffār, 232.
 Israel, 208n.
 Istandār, 249.
Isti'āb, 112.
 Iyād, 208n.
 'Izz al-Dīn 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn
 Shaddād Ibn Tamīm Ibn
 al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, 297.
 'Izz al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan
 'Alī Ibn al-Aṭhīr, 27, 33, 212.

J

Jābir Ibn 'Abd Allāh al-
 Anṣārī, 100.
 Jacob, 82, 255.
 Jaḥimāh, 155, 156.
 Jadīs, 104, 184.
 Ja'far Ibn 'Abd al-Wāhid Ibn
 Ja'far Ibn Sulaymān Ibn
 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn al-'Abbās al-Hāshimī, 244, 245.
 Ja'far Ibn Falāḥ, 66.
 Ja'far Ibn Rabi'ah, 45.
 Ja'far Ibn Yaḥyā, 104,
 207, 259, 307, 311, 314,
 316.
 Ja'far (al-Mutawakkil), 171.
 Ja'far al-Ṣādiq, 63, 180, 183,
 184, 185, 246n.
 Ja'far (Tāj al-Dawlah) 242,
 243.

- Ja'far Ṭayālisi, 184.
 al-Jāhiẓ, 81, 263.
 Jakina, 68n, 90n.
 Jakināt, 70n.
 Jala'ah, 125n.
 Jalābī, 71n.
 Jalāl al-Dīn al-Zaynabī
     77.
 Jalhah, 40n.
 al-Jalsā, 115.
Jam'a wa 'l-Tathniyah, 264.
 Jamāl al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan
     'Alī Ibn 'Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd
     al-Wahīd al-Shaybānī, al-
     Qiftī, 199.
 Jamāl al-Dīn al-Qāḍī 'l-Akram
     Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn
     Yūsuf Ibn Ibrāhīm Ibn 'Abd
     al-Wahīd al-Shaybānī al-Saywī, 199.
al-Jamhrah, 104, 151.
Jamharat al-Nisab, 102.
 Jāmī' al-'Atīq, 55, 57, 87,
     283.
 Jāmī' al-Qaṣr, 33.
 Jarīr, 107, 108, 112, 113, 114,
     121n, 122, 233.
 Jarir (al-Mutalanmis). Ibn
     'Abd al-Maṣīh Ibn 'Abd
     Allāh Ibn Zayd Ibn
     Dawfan Ibn Ḥarb Ibn Wahb
     Ibn Julay Ibn Aḥmas Ibn
     Ḍubay'ah Ibn Rabī'ah Ibn
     Nizār Ibn Ma'add Ibn
     'Adnān, 115.
 Jasn, 156.
 Ja'wanah Ibn Sha'ūb al-Shijā'i,
     2, 3.
 Jawhar, 53, 58, 62.
 al-Jawharī, 39, 109n, 133n.
 al-Jawrdānī, 250n.
 Jawsh, 18n.
 al-Jaydā, 38n.
 al-Jaz'a, 29.
 al-Jazīrah, 33.
 Jazīrah Ibn 'Umar, 24,
     296.
 Jengeez Khān, 208n.
 Jerusalem, 115.
 Jesus, 156, 255.
 Jew, 94.
 al-Jidā, 38.
 Jiddah, 24.
 al-Jifār, 55.
 Jihārbakht, 249.
 al-Jihshyārī, 310, 316, 317.
 Jilān, 71n.
 al-Jizah, 54, 38.
 Job, 255.
 John the Baptist, 255,
     311.
 Joseph, 82, 232n, 255,
     301.
Journal Asiatique, 111n, 125n.
 al-Jubb, 57.
 Juddah, 24.
Judhwat al-Muqtahis, 149.
 al-Julāh, 123.
 Julhumah, 40, 132.
 al-Junayd, 247.
 al-Junayd Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ghaṭafānī at-Murri, 218.
 Jurjān, 145n.
 Jusham, 159n.
 Justinian II, 121n.

K

- Ka'b Ibn Māmah, 208n.
 Ka'b Ibn Sa'd, 265.
 Ka'b Ibn Sūr, 226, and note.
 Ka'bah, 118, 119n.
 Kābul, 41, 51.
 al-Kābuli, 51.
 Kād, 284.
 al-Kādish, 253n.
 al-Kāfi, 278.
 Kalāṭah, 125.
 Kalb, 103, 107.
 Kalilah and Dimnah, 68n.
 Kamāl al-Dīn, 72, 78n.
 Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn al-'Adīm, 185.
 al-Kamāl Ibn al-Shi'ār al-Mawṣilī, 212 and note.
 Kamāl al-Dīn Ibn Yūnus, 72, and note.
 Kāmil, of Ibn Athīr 109, 122, 161n, 173n, 174n, 221n.
 Kāmil (of al-Mubarrad), 143, 148.
 al-Karkh, 66, 69, 147, 287.
 al-Karkhi, 73, 80.
 Kathīr, 218.
 Kātib, 85.
 Kātib al-Wāqidi, 102.
 Kāwūs, 1n.
 Khalaṭah, 125.
 al-Khābūr, 173, 174, 176.
 Khālāṭ, 173n.
 Khalaṭah, 125.
 Khalf, 160n.
 Khālid (Mujālid), 36n,
 Khālid, 173n.
 Khālid al-Hadhhdhā, 257.
 Khālid Ibn Barmak, 306, 307, 309, 310, 311, 312, 314, 315, 316, 317.
 Khālid Ibn Ṣafwnā al-Minqari, 163, 265.
 Khālid Ibn Walid, 107n 149, 150, 151, 152, 153.
 Khālidites, 15.
 Khalif of Baghdād, 8.
 Khalifah Ibn Khayyāt, 102.
 al-Khalil, 59, 268.
 Khalil Allāh, 191n.
 al-Khalil Ibn Aḥmad, 34, 40, 59n, 267, 268.
 Khān, 212.
 Khandaq, 283.
 al-Khansā, 19, 174, 176, 177.
 Kharashah, 34.
 Kharashamah, 40.
 Kharidah, 19, 24, 69, 73, 85, 86, 88, 90, 91, 92, 99, 291, 292, 296.
 Khārijī, 173n.
 Khārijites, 133, 144, 173, 176, 196.
 al-Khashshāb, 250.
 Khaṭīb, Abū Bakr al-Baghdādi, 11, 14, 17, 41, 42, 43, 45, 49, 63, 101, 102, 126, 170, 180, 183, 184, 216, 217, 218, 224, 226, 227, 230, 231, 232, 233, 245, 247, 259, 262, 276, 278, 293, 294n, 312.
 Khaṭīb Abū Zakarriyā al-Ṭibrizi, 279, 282, 292.

al-Khaṭīb al-Haskafī, 292, 295, 296.

al-Khaṭīrī, 90n.

al-Khaṭṭāb, 153.

Khawārij, 134n.

Khawātim al-Khulafā, 134.

al-Khawlah, 125.

al-Khayf, 56.

Khaytham, 132n.

al-Khayzurān, 51, 63, 101.

Khazarian, 234.

al-Khāzin, 145n.

al-Khazraj, 87, 171, 226n.

Khazraji, 87.

al-Khiḍr Ibn 'Aqil al-Ibrānī
194.

Khiṭāṭ (Maqrizi), 54n.

al-Khubzāruzzī, 11, 13, 15, 18, 147.

al-Khulaysā, 204.

Khunays, 109n.

Khunaysh, 109, 110.

Khurāsān, 34, 40, 106n, 133,
139, 197, 206, 218, 231,
247, 254, 255, 256, 257,
274.

Khurāsānis, 208n.

Khurramiyah, 213n.

Khushyār Ibn Labān Ibn
Bāshahri of Jilān, 71 and
note.

Khawārazm, 197, 199, 200.

Khawārazm-Shāh, 208n.

Khawarizm, 4, 5, 6.

Khawaylid Ibn Murrah, 157n.

Khuzā'ah, 40, 103.

Khuzā'i, 34, 40.

Kindah, 104.

Kis, 196n.

al-Kisā'i, 45, 106, 258n, 263, 268, 270, 271, 272.

Kish, 196.

Kisrā, 79n.

Kitāb al-Aghānī, 68n, 146n,
181, 182, 199, 234.

Kitāb al-Akhlāq, 52.

Kitāb Akhlāq al-Baṣrah, 227.

Kitāb Ālat al-Kātib, 264.

Kitāb al-Alqāb, 40, 265.

Kitāb alqāb Quraysh, 103.

Kitāb alqāb al-Yaman, 103.

Kitāb al-Amālī, 64.

Kitāb al-Amāliḥ wa 'l-A'yān wa musdī al-'Awāṭif wa 'l-Iḥsān, 127.

Kitāb al-Anwā, 40.

Kitāb al-Anqāt, 285.

Kitāb al-'Ayn, 40.

Kitāb al-Bahī, 264.

Kitāb al-Bānī, 91, 98, 99,
272.

Kitāb Buyūtāt Quraysh, 103.

Kitāb al-Dhayl, 73, 251.

Kitāb al-Duwal, 199.

Kitāb Faḍā'il al-Kabīr, 184.

Kitāb Faḍā'il Qays 'Aylān, 103.

Kitāb al-Fākhīr, 264.

Kitāb al-Fuṣūl, 123.

Kitāb Ghārib al-Ḥadīth, 40.

Kitāb hubūf Ādam, 133.

Kitāb al-Hudūd, 106.

Kitāb Ibtida al-Da'wah bi 'l-
'Uhaydiyin, 52.

Kitāb iddh'at Ziyād Mu'āwiyah, 103.

- Kitāb Iṣtirāḡ walad Nizār*, 104.
Kitāb Ikhtilāf Uṣūl al-Madhāhib, 52.
Kitāb al-Intiṣār, 52.
Kitāb al-Irshād fī ma'rifat 'Ulumā il-Bilād, 217.
Kitāb al-Jam'a wa 'l-Bayān, 297.
Kitāb al-Jāmi', 257.
Kitāb al-Jinān, 296.
Kitāb Khilq al-Farās, 40.
Kitāb Khiṭaṭ al-Kūfah, 134.
Kitāb al-Kunā, 103.
Kitāb al-Lughāt, 264.
Kitāb al-M'āni, 40, 260.
Kitāb al-Ma'āni 'l-Mukhtara'ah, 28.
Kitāb al-Ma'ārif, 123, 163n, 184, 214n, 226n, 265n.
Kitāb al-Mabdā wa al-Ma'al, 198.
Kitāb man lahu himmah 199.
Kitāb al-Maṣādir, 40, 264.
Kitāb al-Mathālib, (by Hishām Ibn al-Kalbī), 103, (by al-Haytham Ibn Adī), 133.
Kitāb mathālib ahl al-Baṣah, 34.
Kitāb al-Maw'ūdāt, 103.
Kitāb al-Mu'anmarin, 133.
Kitāb al-Mu'atabāt, 104.
Kitāb al-Mudkhil, 40.
Kitāb al-Mughrib, 4.
Kitāb Mulāzim, 264.
Kitāb mulūk Kindah, 104.
Kitāb mulūk al-Tawā'if, 104.
Kitāb al-Munāfarāt, 103.
Kitāb al-Mushājarāt, 104.
Kitāb al-Nawādir, 134, 264, 267.
Kitāb al-Nawāfil, 103.
Kitāb al-Nisā, 99.
Kitāb al-Qiyās, 106.
Kitāb al-Rāyat, 184.
Kitāb al-Rawayāt, 184n.
Kitāb al-Riddah, 157.
Kitāb ṣunā'a Quraysh, 103, 104.
Kitāb al-Ṣifāt, 39.
Kitāb Ṣifāt al-Nabī, 184.
Kitāb al-Ṣilāh, 40.
Kitāb al-Ta'āzī, 236.
Kitāb tafriq Azd, 104.
Kitāb Ṭasm wa Jadīs, 104.
Kitāb al-Tahdhib, 278.
Kitāb al-Waqf wa 'l-'Itidā, 264.
Kitāb al-Wāw, 264.
Kitāb al-Wuṣūd, 134.
Kitāb Wulāt al-Kūfah, 134.
Kitāb al-Wuzarā al-Kuttāb, 313n.
Kitāb Yāfi' wa Yafa'ah, 264.
Kitāb al-Zīj, 71.
Kitāb al-Zuharah, 236.
Kitāb al-Zuharah, 236.
Kosegarten, 179n.
Kūfah, 41, 42, 44, 46, 50, 100, 106, 107, 108, 109n, 117n, 122n, 132, 133n, 134, 139, 160n, 214, 215, 246n, 258, 263, 264.
al-Kūfī, 132.
Kulayb, 114.
Kulliyāt of Ibn Sīnā, 25.
Kulthūm, 34, 40.
Kuna al-Ashraf, 134.
Kunāsah, 44, 139.

Kunnas wa Hawāsh, 95.

al-Kusā'i, 125.

al-Kuthayyir, 131.

L

Labatalah, 125.

al-Labbādi, 16.

Labid Ibn Rabi'ah al-'Āmiri, 68.

al-Laṣīf, 195.

Lakhm, 20, 156.

Lakhmide, 156.

al-Lāmāniyah, 306.

Lane, 246n.

Lankak, 18.

Layth (tribe), 218, 255.

Layth Ibn Bakr Ibn 'Abd
Manāt Ibn Kinānah, 183.

al-Layth Ibn Sa'd, 100, 149, 219, 223.

al-Laythi, 218, 223.

Laylā, 107.

Lebanān, 191.

Legatee, 15.

Leyden, 126n, 164n.

Lihb, 131.

Lihbide, 131.

Literaturgeschichte der Araber,
129n.

al-Liwā, 155.

Lubnān, 191.

Lum'a of Ibn Jinnī, 65.

M

Mā ittafaq lafẓuh, 274.

Ma'add, 274.

Ma'āni, 260, 261, 264.

Ma'āni al-Shi'r, 169.

Ma'ārij, 226n, 245n.

al-Ma'arraḥ, 279.

Ma'arrat al-Nu'man, 84.

Ma'arri, 292.

al-Madā'ini, 27, 28.

Madīḥ al-Shām, 133.

Madinah, 2, 3, 9, 4n, 42, 55,
63, 69, 87, 100n, 101, 111n,
112, 113, 114, 115, 117n, 142,
151n, 153, 157, 171n, 180,
183, 214, 216, 217, 219, 221,
226n, 245, 252, 294n, 311,
312, 313.

al-Maghdūr, 301.

Maghrib, 9, 53, 55, 57, 58, 61.

al-Maghribi, 84n.,

Maghribin, 296n.

Magians, 307.

Magog, 204n.

Māh, 41.

Maḥāsīn Ibn 'Ajam, 26.

al-Mahdī, ('Ubaydi) 6, 8, 43, 134, 136.

al-Maheli, 223n, 265, 266, 273,
275, 298, 308.

Mahdi Muḥammad, Ibn Tū-mart, 299.

al-Mahdiyyah, 10, 88, 237, 297,
299, 302, 303, 304, 305,
306.

al-Mahel, 108.

Māhik, 128, 129.

Mahriz Ibn Ziyād, 304, 306,
and note.

Ma'in, 217

Majd al-Dīn, 77.

- Majd al-Din Abu 'l-Sa'adat al-Mubarak, 33.
 Majd al-Din, al-Şāhib, 77.
 al-Makhzūmī, 38.
 Makkah, 4, 5, 9n, 21n, 24, 38, 42, 50, 55, 56n, 103n, 115, 118, 119n, 216, 219, 226, 227, 235n, 240, 244, 258n, 265, 281, 312.
 Makki Ibn Ibrāhīm al-Balkhī, 246.
 Maksūh, 179n.
 Malakiyān, 187.
 al-Makfūf, 263.
 al-Malfūf, 263n.
 al-Malga, 304.
 Malhamah, 298n.
 Mālik, 1, 3, 12, 34, 45, 52, 53, 107, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 218n, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 229, 246n.
 al-Malik al-'Ādil Ibn Ayyūb, 33.
 al-Malik al-Afḍal Nūr al-Dīn 'Alī, 25, 26.
 al-Malik al-Ashraf, 33.
 Mālik Ibn Anas, 215, 219.
 Mālik Ibn Nuwayrah, al-Yarbū'ī, 149, 150.
 al-Malik al-Kāmil, 283, 306.
 al-Malik al-Manşūr, 26.
 al-Malik al-Nāşir, 188n.
 al-Malik al-Kabir 'Izz al-Dīn Mas'ūd, 26.
 Malik Shāh, 51, 52.
 Malik Shāh I, 187.
 Malik Shāh II, Sultān Abu 'l-Fath, 187.
 al-Malik al-Zāhir Ghāzī, 26.
 al-Mālikī, 187.
 Mālikite, 222n, 225n, 229.
 Malikiyan, 225n.
 Malkān, 96.
 Māmah, 208.
 Ma'mar, 214.
 Ma'mar Ibn Rāshid al-Ḥarrānī, al-Başrī, 214n.
 al-Māmūn, 35, 36, 99, 104, 106, 142, 184, 224, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 232, 233, 234, 243, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 266, 268, 269, 270, 273, 279, 309, 311.
 al-Māmūniyah, 225.
 Manāqib al-Udabā, 65.
 Manbeh, 170.
 Manjib, 160, 170, 171, 172.
 Mandah, 249, 252.
 Manghāya, 218, 223.
 al-Manşūr, 6, 42, 43, 48, 63, 100, 101, 134, 138, 250, 265, 275.
 Manşūr Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Jawshan Ibn Manşūr Ibn Humayed Ibn Ithāl Ibn Wazar Ibn 'Atṭāf Ibn Bishr Ibn Jandal Ibn 'Ubayd al-Rā'i Ibn Husayn Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn Jandal ... Ibn Nizar Ibn Ma'add Ibn 'Adnān, 18.
 Manşūriyah, 144.
 al-Manzil, 104.
 Manzūr, 265.

- Manzūr Ibn Rabbān al-Fazārī, 125.
Maqāmah, 117.
Maqāmāt, 23, 68.
 al-Maqqari, 221n, 222n, 277n, 288n,
 Maqqari's Spanish History, 218n.
Maqṣūr wa 'l-Mamdūd, 267.
Marāsid, 294n.
Ma'ārif, 142.
 Marj al-Dalhamiyah, 85.
 Ma'rūf al-Karkhi, 69, 80n.
 Marūhdād, 284n.
 Mārūt, 193n.
 Marw, 34, 35, 37, 40, 51, 197, 223, 255, 274.
 Marw al-Shahjān, 206.
 Marwān Ibn Abi Ḥafṣah, 284.
 Marwān Ibn Ḥakam, 114, 115, 117.
 Marmān Ibn Muḥammad, 44.
 Marwānide, 7.
 Marwazī, 245.
 al-Marzubān, 41.
 al-Marzūqi, 278n.
 Maṣ'adah, 231.
al-Maṣā'id wa 'l-Maṭārid, 285.
Masālik al-Abṣār, 122n.
 Maṣḥad of al-Zaydī, 212.
 al-Masiḥ, 142n.
 Maṣjid al-Bir wa 'l-Jummayzah, 57.
 Maṣjid al-Sabī, 299.
 al-Maṣjid al-Zaydī, 212n.
 Masmūdah, 218, 223.
 Mas'ūd, 87.
 al-Mas'ūdī, 137, 172, 234.
al-Maṭhal al-Sāir fī adab al-Kātib wa 'l-Shāir, 27.
Maṭmah al-Anfus, 288.
 Mawāsīm, 134.
 al-Mawṣili, 308.
 Mawsilian, 147.
 al-Maydānī, 115n.
 Maymūn Ibn Hārūn, 164.
 al-Mayyāfāriqīn, 292, 296.
 Māzin, 34.
 Meru, 197.
 Mesopotamia, 26, 33, 98n, 173n, 194, 276n.
 Mihrijān, 41.
al-Miftāḥ, 277n.
 Mihānidād Ḥasīs, 284.
 Mihr Ḥasīs, 284.
 Milah, 239, 245.
 Minā, 131, 240.
al-Minhal al-Ṣāfi, 86n.
 al-Minqari, 265.
 Mirbad of Baṣrah, 11, 18, 34.
 Mirdās, 146.
Miṣbāḥ, 4.
 Miṣr, 219, 221, 243, 252, 283.
 Morocco, 171n, 308.
 Moses, 255.
 Mosul, 9, 25, 26, 27, 33, 87, 92, 187, 190, 197, 199, 209, 210, 212n, 253, 254, 266n, 292.
 Mu'ādh Ibn Jabal, 226.
 al-Mu'āfa Ibn Zakariya al-Jariri, 11.
 al-Mu'allā, 187.
al-Mu'allalaqahs, 45n, 68, 92n.

- Mu'ammad, 138n.
 Mu'āwiyah, 103, 104, 106n,
 Mu'āwiyah Ibn Ābi Sufyān,
     133, 103 and note, 104, 114,
     117n, 234, 235, 236.
 al-Mubarrad, 109, 122, 131,
     148, 181, 182, 273.
 Muḍar, 68, 117, 274, 280.
Mudkhil, 285.
Mufaḍḍaliyāt, 278.
al-Mufākhīr 264.
 Muḡayrah, 132n.
 al-Muḡīrah Ibn al-Shu'bah
     132, 274.
Muḡīrī, 95.
 Muḡīriyah, 144.
Muḡīnī 'l-Labīb, 109n.
 Muḡrib, 4, 6.
Muḡadhdhab, 1, 193.
 Muḡadhdhab al-Dīn, 190.
 Muḡadhdhab al-Dīn Abu Ṭālib
     Muḡammad, 75.
 al-Muḡallab Ibn Abi Ṣufrah,
     256, 257.
 Muḡammad<sup>o</sup>, 3, 7, 15n, 34,
     35, 41, 42n, 86n, 100n,
     104n, 112n, 121n, 124n,
     134, 151n, 164, 179n,
     203, 216n, 224n, 226n, 231n,
     235n, 248, 254, 256.
 Muḡammad Ibn 'Abd Allāh,
     249.
 Muḡammad Ibn 'Abd al-Mālik
     Ibn Ṣāliḥ, 98.
 Muḡammad Ibn 'Abd al-Mālik
     al-Zayyāt, 286.
 Muḡammad Ibn Abi Sarī al-
     Baḡhdādī, 102, and note.
 Muḡammad Ibn Aḡmad al-
     Hakīmī, 160.
 Muḡammad Ibn 'Alī, 276n.
 Muḡammad Ibn Fādīḥ al-
     Aḡwāzī, 35.
 Muḡammad Ibn Ḥabīb, 121.
 Muḡammad Ibn Hakīmā 68,
     69.
 Muḡammad Ibn Ḥanafiyyah, 229.
 Muḡammad Ibn al-Ḥasan al-
     Ṣhaybānī, 42, 262.
 Muḡammad Ibn Hishām Ibn
     ismā'il al-Malkhazūmī, 38.
 Muḡammad Ibn Ḥumrān Ibn
     Rabī'āh, 123.
 Muḡammad Ibn Ishāq, 45, 178,
     183, 215.
 Muḡammad Ibn al-Jahm,
     264.
 Muḡammad Ibn Khalaf Ibn al-
     Marzubān, 160 and note.
 Muḡammad Ibn Mlik Shāh I,
     178.
 Muḡammad Ibn Maṣṣūr 227,
     228.
 Muḡammad Ibn Muḡammad
     Ibn Muḡammad, 185.
 Muḡammad Ibn Munādhīr,
     311.
 Muḡammad Ibn al-Munkadir,
     42.
 Muḡammad Ibn al-Nu'mān, 9,
     58, 60, 61.
 Muḡammad Ibn Sa'd, 102.
 Muḡammad Ibn Sufyān Ibn
     Mujāshī', 107, 123.
 Muḡammad Ibn Sulaymān,
     287.

- Muḥammad Ibn Sharaf, 33.
 Muḥammad Ibn Tukush Khuw-ārazm Shāh, 197.
 Muḥammad Ibn Tūmart, 299.
 Muḥammad Ibn Uḥayḥah, 123.
 Muḥammad Ibn 'Umar Ibn
 Lubābah, 222.
 Muḥammad Ibn Yahyā, 349,
 307.
 Muḥammad (King of Aden),
 22
 Muḥammad, the missionary, 53.
 Muḥammad al-Muntaṣir, 171n.
 Muḥammah al-Baqir, 183.
 Muḥammad, qādī, 59, 60, 61,
 244.
 Muḥammad al-Sa'dī, 81.
 Muḥammad al-Yazidī, 274, 256
 273.
 Muḥārib Ibn Dithār, 42.
 Muḥāsīd, 284n.
 al-Muḥassan, 127.
 al-Muḥawwal, 160n.
Muḥkam, 245.
 Mu'in al-Dīn al-Ḥaṣkafī, 292,
 297.
 al-Mu'izz, 6, 8, 9n, 10, 53, 54, 58.
 al-Mu'izz Abu Tamīm Ma'add
 Ibn al-Manṣūr, 53.
 Mu'izz al-Dawlah, 6.
 Mujālid Ibn Sa'id al-Hamdānī al-Kūfī, 36 and note.
 al-Mujalla, 108n.
Mu'jam al-Buldān, 198.
Mu'jam al-Shu'arā, 198.
Mu'jam al-Udabā, 198.
 Mujāshī, 107, 109, 123, 124.
Mūjaz, 104.
Majmū'ah al-Ṣaghīr, 191.
al-Mukhtalif wa 'l-Mu'talif, 245.
 al-Mukhtār al-Musabbihī, 6, 10, 52.
Mukhtaṣar, 106.
 al-Muktafi bi-Allāh, 284, 286, 287.
 al-Mulakhkhaṣ, 278.
Mulūkl, 104.
 al-Munajjim, 99, 283.
 al-Munastir, 86, 87, 88.
al-Muntakhab [poem], 53.
Muqaddimah, 5.
 Mu :ā'is, 265.
 al-Muqallad Ibn al-Muṣayyab, 9.
 Muqātil Ibn Sulaymān, 45.
 Muqaṭṭam, Mount, 87.
Muqrī', 274n.
 al-Muqtafi li-amr Allāh, 65n,
 66n, 95, 96.
Mu'rib, 4.
 Murjiyans, 148.
 Murr, 107.
 Murrah, 129n, 218, 265.
 Murri, 218.
 al-Murtaḍā, 221, 271.
Murūj al-Ḥahab, 137, 172, 234, 255, 307.
 Mū-ā 'l-Amin, 137.
 Mūsā 'l-Hādī, 136.
 Mūsā Ibn Furāt, 148.
 Mū-ā Ibn Ja'far, 33.
 Māsā Ibn Yahyā 307, 309.
 al-Musabbih. 142n.
 al-Musabihi 10.

Muşallā, 114, 302.
 al-Muşallā, 187.
 Muşannaj, 245.
 Muştarik, 172, 198n.
 Muştarik waḍ'an wa 'l-Mukh-talif şaq'an, 198.
 Muslim Ibn al-Ḥajjāj al-Quşha-yri, 214.
 Muslim Ibn al-Walid, 91.
 Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-
 Anşāri, 314.
 al-Muştafā, 7.
 Muştafā Aḥmad, 183.
 al-Musta'in, 164.
 al-Mustanjid, 94n.
 al-Mustanşir, 7, 299, 302.
 al-Mustarşhid, 65n, 69.
 Musulmān, 41, 122n, 149,
 177n.
 al-Mu'taḍid, 130, 284, 285.
 al-Mutalammis, 115, 116, 117.
 al-Mu'tamid 'alā-Allāh, 284.
 al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbād, 158, 280.
 Mu'tamid al-Mulk Abu 'l-
 Faraj Yaḥyā Ibn al-Talmidh, 89.
 al-Mu'tamid Şanā al-Mulk, 81.
 al-Mu'tamin, 185.
 al-Mu'tamin Işhāq, 63.
 Mutammim, 149, 150, 152,
 153, 154, 157, 158, 159.
 al-Mutanabbî, 64, 65, 162, 164, 170, 199, 238, 277.
 al-Mutanabbî's Diwan, 187.

al-Murriizi, 4, 5.
 al-Mu'taşim, 161n, 274.
 al-Mutawakkil, 130, 164, 170,
 171, 244, 284.
 al-Mutawakkil 'alā Allāh, 160,
 165, 244.
 Mu'tazili, 144.
 Mutazilites, 4, 143, 144,
 183, 225, 259, 263, 268, 284.
 al-Muṭi', 224n.
 Muṭi' Ibn Iyās, 284.
 Muṭrib min aṣṣhār ahl il-Maghrib,
 290.
 al-Muṭṭalib, 180.
 al-Mu'āfā al-Tamimi, 183.
 al-Muwaffaq, 130, 284.
 al-Muwaffaq Abū Aḥmad
 Ṭalḥah, 284.
 al-Muwaffaq Ibn Aḥmad,
 6.
 Muwaffaq al-Din Abu 'l-Ma'ālī
 Aḥmad, 27, 28.
 Muwaffaq al-Din Abu Muḥa-mmad 'Abd al-Laṭif Ibn
 Yūsuf, 96, 97.
 Muwawṣṣahāt, 288.
 Muwaṭṭā, 218n, 219, 228.
 al-Muẓaffar, 221n.

N

Nabatean, 51.
 Nabḥān al-Faqasī, 168.
 al-Nābil, 232n.
 Naḍr Ibn Azd, 131.
 al-Naḍr Ibn Şhumayl, 34, 35,
 37, 38, 39, 40.

- Nāfi, the mawla of Ibn 'Umar, 1, 2, 42.
- Nafi, the Qur'ān Reader, 2, 3.
- al-Nafīs al-Qutrusī, 30.
- Nafisah, al-Sayyidah, 63.
- Naḥrīr, 279n.
- Najd, 19, 115, 205.
- al-Najīb Abu 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥusayn Ibn 'Alī Ibn Abi Bakr al-Wāsiṭī, 187.
- Nājiyah, 107.
- Najm al-Dīn Abu 'l-Faṭḥ Yūsuf Ibn al-Ḥusayn Ibn Muḥammad, 158, 159.
- al-Nāmī, 22n.
- al-Nāmūs, 22.
- Naqayāya, 213n.
- Naqiyā, 213, 218.
- Nasā, 197, 214n.
- Nashū al-Mulk Abu 'l-Ḥasan 'Alī Ibn Mufarraǵ, 84.
- Naṣībīn, 173, 176.
- Nasiḥ, 35n.
- al-Naṣiḥ Ibn al-Dahhān, 92.
- Nasim, 167.
- Naṣīr al-Dīn al-Ṭūsī, 72n.
- al-Nāṣīr li-Dīn Allāh Abu 'l-'Abbās Aḥmad, 30.
- Naṣīriyan, 188.
- Naṣr, Ibn Bujayr, 54.
- Naṣr al-Dīn Maḥmūd, 26.
- al-Naṣr al-Khubzāruzzī, 11, 14, 17, 18.
- Naṣr Ibn Rabi'ah, 156.
- Naṣr al-Numayrī, 18.
- Nawādi*, 267.
- al-Nawār, 124, 125.
- al-Nawawī, 1n, 177n.
- Nawbahār, 307.
- al-Nayrab, 186.
- Nayṣābūr, 35, 246, 249, 250.
- Naẓm al-Jumān*, 41n, 47n.
- Negro, 297.
- Nile, 32, 83.
- Nimrod, 191n.
- Nizām al-Dīn Abū Naṣr al-Muẓaffār Ibn Jarīr, 66n.
- Nizāmiyah, 97, 190, 193, 194, 278.
- Nizār, 7, 8, 104, 274.
- Noah, 191, 251, 255.
- Norman, 23n, 305n.
- Note sur les successions musulmanes*, 226n.
- Notices et Extraits*, 274n.
- Nu'aym, 268.
- Nujūm*, 40n, 42n, 46n, 49n, 98n, 100n, 102n, 106n, 111n, 117n, 121n, 148n, 151n, 160n, 161n, 172n, 213n, 214n, 215n, 224n, 229n, 232n, 245n, 246n, 247n, 257n.
- Nu'mā, 165.
- al-Nu'mān, (Abū Ḥanifah) 41, 49.
- al-Nu'mān Ibn Jasr, 156.
- al-Nu'mān Ibn Muḥammad, 52, 53, 55, 56, 62.
- Numārah, 156.
- Numayr Ibn 'Āmir, 20.

Numayrī, 20.

Nūr al-Dīn Arsilān Shāh, 26, 27.

Nuṣayb, 110, 111.

O

Ormus, 196n.

Ouahb, 179n.

P

Palermo, 305n.

Perron, Dr. 225n, 226n.

Persia, 41, 71n, 79n, 148, 177n,
284, 309.

Persian, 5, 18, 41n, 70,
105n, 107n, 178, 179,
184.

Persian Gulf, 196n.

Persians, 18, 70, 71n, 146n,
178, 285.

Perviz, 179.

Pharaoh, 208n, 218.

Pleiades, 301.

Price's Retrospect of Mahommadan history, 139n.

Ptolemy, 71.

Q

al-Qāḍī 'l-A'azz, 20.

al-Qāḍī al-Akram Ibn al-Qiftī, 199, 279.

al-Qāḍī 'l-Fāḍil, 25, 32, 81, 82, 83, 85.

al-Qāḍī al-Fāḍil 'Abd Raḥīm, 20.

Qāḍī 'l-Māristān, 253.

al-Qāḍī al-Raṣhīd, 81.

al-Qāḍī al-Raṣhīd Ibn al-Zubayr, 296.

al-Qāḍī l-Sa'id, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 159.

Qadīd, 54n.

al-Qāḍisiyah, 105n, 111n,

Qaḥṭabah Ibn Shabīb al-Ṭāī, 307.

Qalā'id al-Iqiyān, 171n, 289, 291.

Qālūn, 3n.

al-Qarāfah, 7.

Qarmaṭs, 284.

Qarqisiyah, 176, 286.

al-Qāsim, 6, 27, 185, 287, 303.

al-Qaṣr, 9, 10.

Qaṣr al-Baḥr, 6.

Qaṣr al-Dhahab, 7.

Qaṣr al-Sidah, 302.

Qaṣr Ziyād, 303.

Qatādah Ibn Dī'āmah al-Sadūsī,
100, 145, 214, 254.

Qaṭan, 245.

Qaylah, 87.

al-Qayn, 156.

Qayrawān, 9n, 10, 54, 237,
297, 306n.

Qays 'Aylān, 103.

Qays Ibn Aṣīm al-Minqārī,
112.

Qays Ibn al-Makshūh, 179.

Qazwin, 217n.

al-Qazzāz, 257.

Qinnisrīn, 138.

Quḍā'ah, 241.

al-Qudā'i, 250n.
 Qunbul, 3.
Qur'ān, 2, 3, 18, 21n, 25, 39, 44, 45, 49, 53, 80, 87, 103, 112n, 114, 122n, 138, 142, 143, 190, 191n, 193n, 198, 203n, 208n, 228n, 232n, 234n, 236, 237, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 260, 261, 264, 266, 268, 274, 276n, 277, 278, 296, 302, 315.
Quraysh, 33, 99, 103, 104, 133, 180.
Qurayshide, 180.
Qurayshids, 119, 181.
Qurayshite, 124.
Qurayshites, 103, 104.
Qūsh, 24.
Qusantīnā, 305n.
Quşayyī, 103.
al-Qusantīniyah, 305n.
Qutaybah Ibn Muslim 255.
Qutrub Muḥammad, 39, 259.
Qutrubbul, 101.
Quwayq, 186.

R

Rabaḍ Harthamah, 316.
al-Rabadhah, 244, 245.
Rabadīs, 222n.
Rabī' al-Abrār, 317.
al-Rabī' Ibn Yānus, 43, 47, 48.
Rabī'ah, 68, 103, 156.
al-Rafīqah, 316.
al-Rahabah, 286.

al-Rā'i, 22n.
Rajā Ibn Sahl al-Ṣaghānī, 180.
Rakaḍah, 125.
Rakānah, 180.
al-Ramādī, 145n.
al-Raqqah, 18, 172, 276n, 286, 316.
Rās 'Ayn, 168, 176, 296.
Rās'anī, 296.
al-Rashid, 134, 172, 173, 174, 180, 258, 259, 268, 308, 311, 315, 316, 317.
al-Rawḍ al-Unuf, 123.
Ray, 213, 246, 247.
Raydān al-Ṣaqlabī, 10.
Rayyā, 240.
al-Rāzī, 257.
Red Sea, 24.
Renaud, M., 71.
Reiske, 116n.
Revue archeologique, 305n.
al-Riḍā, 271.
Riqāsh, 156.
Risālah, 245, 246.
Roger the Frank, 304, 305.
Romans, 194.
Rūḍah, 54n.
Rudwā, 191.
Ruḥ al-Ḥaywān, 81.
Rām, 194, 195, 237.
al-Rūmī, 191, 194.
al-Ruṣāfah, 43, 243.

S

Subā, queen of, 15.

- Sabaṭḥ, 125.
 Sabaṭn, 218n.
 Sabeen, 126, 127,
Sabīl ilā ma'ārifat al-Ḥaqq,
 148.
 Sa'd, 265.
 Sa'd Ibn Hudhaym, 209n.
 al-Sa'dān, 150.
 Šaddā, 150.
 Sa'ds, 209.
 Sadūsīde, 144.
 al-Saffāh, 127, 128n, 138, 265.
 Šafwān, 265.
 Šahāh, 39, 109n.
 Šahāh of al-Jawhari, 187.
 Šāhib Ibn 'Abbād, 145.
 Šahīh (of al-Bukhārī), 251.
 Šahīh (of Muslim), 251.
 Sahl Ibn Sa'd al-Sa'idī, 41, 42,
 100.
 Ša'id (upper Egypt), 88.
 Sa'id (Ibn Ḥajjāj), 93.
 al-Sa'id Ibn Sana al-Mulk, 81,
 84, 85.
 Sa'id Ibn Abi 'Arūbah Shu'bah,
 214, and note.
 Sa'id Ibn al-Āṣ, 117, 136.
 Šā'in al-Dīn, 252.
 al-Sakb 40.
 Šakhr, 174, 176, 177.
 Sal'ā, 294.
 Saladin, 25, 84, 188n.
 Šalāh al-Dīn, 25, 26, 84,
 85n.
 Šalāh al-Dīn, Sulṭān, 186.
 Salamah, 263, 264.
 Sale, 122n, 148n, 232n.
 Šālīh Ibn 'Alī Ibn 'Abd Allāh
 Ibn 'Abbās Ibn 'Abd al-
 Muṭṭalib, 172, 186.
 Šālīh Ibn al-Aṣbagh al-Tanū-khī, 160.
 Šālīh Ibn al-Mutawakkil
 214n.
 Šālīh Ibn Usamah, 54.
 al-Šālīhiyah, 186.
 Saljūq, 51, 187.
 Salmā, 280.
 Sam'an, 245.
 al-Sam'āni, 3, 142, 144, 190, 218, 265, 279.
 al-Samannūdiyah, 88.
 Samarqand, 59.
 Sāmarrah, 107, 121n.
 al-Samāwah, 107.
 al-Sāmikī, 298.
 Sammāk Ibn Ḥarb, 42.
 Šamšāmah, 136, 137.
 Šan'ā, 54, 179.
 Šanhājah, 86n.
 al-Šarāt, 279.
 Šarkhad, 26.
 Sarraman ra'ā, 171n.
 Ša'sa'ah, 107, 112.
 Sāsānid, 284.
 Satif, 306n.
 Sawād, 133, 173n.
 Sawār, 107, 109.
 Sayf al-Dwlah, 9n.
 Sayf al-Dawlah al-Mubārak
 Ibn Munqidh, 84.
 Sayf Ibn Dhī Yazan, 178.
 al-Sayyādī, 276n.
 al-Sayyārī, 276n.
 Sayyid al-Ahl, 87.
 Seville, 158, 171n, 280.

- Sfax, 303,
Shābatūn, 218.
Shaba'ūn, 218n.
Shabbah, 265.
 al-Shā'ibī, 36, 131.
Shabīb Ibn Shabbāh, 163,
 265.
 al-Shāfi'ī, 1, 45, 50, 51, 53, 63, 216, 224, 283.
Shāfi'ite, 225n, 292.
Shāfi'ites, 4.
Shajarah, 69.
Shajari, 69.
Shāmil, 193.
Shammāl, 218, 223.
Shams al-Dawlah Tūrān Shāh,
 24, 84.
 al-Sharaf, 33.
Sharaf al-Dawlah Muslim Ibn
Quraysh, 313.
Sharaf al-Dīn Abū 'Abd Allāh
Muḥammad Ibn Sa'd Ibn
Ḥammād al-Ṣanhājī al-Dulusi
al-Būṣīrī, 86n.
Sharaf al-Dīn Abu 'l-Ḥasan,
 74.
Sharaf al-Dīn Ibn 'Unayn,
 81.
Sharaf al-Dīn al-Ṭusī, 72.
Sharaf al-Mulk Abū Sa'd
Muḥammad Ibn Manṣūr al-
Khuwārazmī, 51.
Sharh Shawāhid il Mughnī,
 109n.
Shārī, 176.
Sharīfs, 134.
Sharik, 46, 231.
 al-Sharqiyah, 26, 27.
 al-Shāṭibī, 295.
 Shaw, Dr., 270n.
 al-Shawrā, 120.
Shay-Allāh, 156.
Shaybah, 265n.
Shaybah Ibn al-Walīd, 273.
Shaybān, 173n, 199, 275, 281.
Shaybānī, 282.
Shayzar, 9.
Shihāb, 65n.
Shihāb al-Dīn, 196.
Shi'ites, 15n, 35n, 58, 144, 255,
 295.
Shija', 3.
 al-Shi'ri, 285n.
Shudhūr al-'uqūd, 122, 256.
Shumayl, 34, 40.
Shurāt, 176.
 Sibawayh's Kitāb, 253.
 Sibjān Ibn 'Umar, 173n.
 Sicily, 23, 24, 237, 304, 305.
 Sidi Khalīl, 225n, 226n.
Ṣiffīn, 100n, 104.
 al-Siḥānī, 173.
 al-Silafī, 73, 87, 252.
 Simāk Ibn al-Nu'mān, 15, 16.
 al-Simāk, 14n.
 Sind, 109, 233.
 al-Ṣinī, 277n.
 Sinjār, 26, 79, 197.
Siq al-Zand, 278.
 Solomon, 15, 122, 237, 255.
 Sons of Tawny, 195.
 Spain, 7, 104n, 149, 218, 219,
 220, 221, 222, 223, 253, 277n,
 288.
 al-Sudayrah, 66.
 Sudd, 204.

- Şufyān, 107, 224, 317.
 Şufyān al-Ṭhawrī, 47, 100, 215, 317.
 Sufyān Ibn 'Uyaynah, 215, 216, 219, 224.
 Suḥaym, 107, 108, 109.
 Suhayyah, 129n.
 al-Sukkari, 122.
 Sulaym, 176.
 Snlaymān Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 110, 111, 118, 138.
 Sulaymān Ibn Wahb, 166, 231.
 al-Şūlī, 162.
 Sumaysāt, 26.
 Sumayyah, 129n.
 al-Suqyā, 172.
 Şūr, 276.
 Şurr Durr, 23.
 Sūsah, 88, 304.
 al-Suyūṭī, 109n, 123.
 Suyūṭī's Biographical Dictionary of grammarians and literary men, 276n, 283n.
 Suyūṭī's Grammarians, 276n.
 Suyūṭī's Shawāhid al-Mughnī, 235n.
 Syria, 9, 27, 55, 81, 85, 98n, 111n, 116, 119, 124, 127, 134, 145n, 150n, 160, 192, 194, 196, 200, 215, 227.
 Syrian, 119, 236.
 Syrians, 119, 236.
- T
- Ṭabaqāt al-Ḥuffāz, 214n, 232n, 246n, 276n.
 Ṭabaqāt al-Qurrā', 3n, 266n, 267n, 274, 277n.
 Ṭabaqāt al-Shāfi', 225n.
 Ṭabaqāt al-Shu'arā, 107, 122, 124, 143.
 al-Ṭabarī, 179n, 285.
 al-Ṭabīb, 266n, 267n.
 Ṭābī'i, 1.
 Ṭābīkhah, 274.
 Tabrīz, 276, 279.
Tafḍīl al-Kilāb, 160n.
Tahdhīb, 1n, 36n, 100n, 193.
Tahdhīb al-Asmā, 42n, 100n. al-Ṭāhir, 271.
 Ṭāhir Ibn al-Ḥusayn, 106n.
 Ṭāhir Ibn Muḥammad al-Hāshimī, 167, 168.
 al-Ṭā'i, 84, 132.
 al-Ṭā'i li-Allāh, 8.
 Tāj al-Dawlah Ja'far, 243, and note.
 Tāj al-Dīn al-Kindī, 75.
Tajriḥ wa ta'dīl, definition of 214n.
 Ṭallah Ibn Muḥammad Ibn Ja'far, 224.
Talkhīṣ, 95.
 Tall Nuhākā, 174.
 al-Talmīdh al-Ṭabīb, 88n.
 Tamīm, 34, 39, 76, 103, 107, 109, 110, 123, 152n, 163n, 223, 224n, 245, 265, 297, 298, 299.
 Tamīm Ibn al-Mu'izz Ibn Bādīs, 88.

- Tamim Ibn Zayd al-Qayni, 109.
 Tamīmī, 245.
 al-Tamīmī al-Māzini, 34.
 Tamīmides, 152.
al-Tanbih, 229.
 Ṭanzah, 292, 296.
 al-Ṭanzī, 296.
 Ṭarafah Ibn al-'Abd al-Bakrī 116.
 Ṭarafah's Mu'allaqah, Prologus, 116n.
 Ṭarīf, 174, 176.
Tārīkh al-'Aynī, 126n.
 Tartars, 27, 197, 199.
 Ṭasm, 104, 184.
al-Taṣrif al-Mulūki, 65.
 Ṭāwūs, 179.
 Ṭay, 25, 132, 133, 141, 160, 163.
 al-Ṭay, 132.
 Taym Allāh, 199.
 Taym Allāh Ibn Ṭha'labah, 41.
 Taymā, 205.
 al-Ṭha'libī, 11n, 12, 56, 99, 132n, 145n.
Ṭhābit, 41.
Ṭhadūl, 132.
Ṭahlān, 191.
Ṭha'labah, 199.
Ṭhamūd, 114.
Ṭhiqat al-Dawlah, 237, 239, 243.
Ṭhiqat al-Mulk, 242.
Ṭhousand and one nights, 246n.
Ṭhu'al, 132, 141, 142.
Ṭhu'ali, 132, 142.
Ṭhumāmah, 259.
 Tibrizi, 277n, 282.
 al-Tibrizi, 275-282.
 Tigris, 33, 55, 91, 101, 173n, 188.
 Tikrit, 79.
 Tinnis, 55.
 al-Ṭirimāh Ibn Hakim, 76.
Tirmidh, 41, 79.
 Toledo, 222.
 Tripoli, 299, 304.
 Tubba', 155.
Tuhfat al-Zurafā fi Tārīkh al-Khulafā, 7.
 Ṭamādir, 176.
 Tunis, 88, 237n, 304.
 Ṭurayf, 176.
 Turkish, 62, 171n, 212.
 Turkumāns, 186.
 al-Ṭūsī, 72.
 Tyre, 276.

U

- 'Ubayd, 265.
 'Ubayd Allāh, 100n, 170.
 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Umar 100 and note.
 'Ubayd Allāh Ibn 'Umar al-'Umari, 180.
 'Ubayd al-Rā'i, 19.
 al-'Udhayb, 204, 290.
 Udud, 274.
 Uḥud, 191.
 'Ukābah, 199.
 'Ulwah, 160.
 'Umān, 196.

- 'Umar, 316n.
 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, 100, 112.
 'Umar Ibn Bukayr, 261.
 'Umar Ibn Hānī, 138.
 'Umar Ibn al-Khaṭṭāb, 130, 131, 132,, 152, 153, 154, 155, 157, 158, 226, 228, 235n, 316n.
 'Umar Ibn Shabbah, 131, 227.
 al-'Umarānī, 316.
 'Umārat al-Yamanī, 32.
 'Umaymah, 157.
 Umayyad, 7, 44, 111, 117n, 118, 119n, 129, 136, 218, 221, 222n, 226n, 234, 307.
 Umayyads, 127, 128n, 134, 138, 139, 140, 284.
 Umayyah, 104.
 Umayyid, 104n, 110.
 Umm 'Amr, 15, 16, 240.
 Umm Jamil, 236.
 Umm Mutammim, 151.
 Umm Salamah, 3.
 'Uqaylide, 144.
 'Uqūd al-Jumān, 212.
 Urid, 284.
 Ursa minor, 156n.
 'Urwah, 34, 40, 100, 102, 157,
 Usāmah al-Dhuhli, 54.
 Usayyid, 223, 245.
 Usayyidi, 245.
 Ushnuh, 225.
 'Uthmān Ibn 'Affān, 37, 117n, 235n, 245.
 'Uthmān Ibn Miḥsan, 257.
- V
- Valencia, 277n.
 Vespasian, 195n.
- W
- al-Waḍḍāh, 155.
 Waddān, 111.
 Wahb Ibn Munabbih, 177, 178, 179, 181, 183, 184.
 Wuhraz, 178.
 Wādī 'l-Qurā', 111.
 Wā'il, 173n.
 Wajīz, 193.
 Wakī' Ibn al-Jarrāh, 42, 100.
 Wālibah Ibn al-Ḥubāb 284.
 al-Walid al-Buḥturi, 170.
 al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, 121, 138, and note.
 al-Walid Ibn Ṭarīf, 173, 174, 174, 176, 177.
 al-Walid Ibn Yazīd, 139.
 al-Wāqidī, 153, 157, 180, 312.
 Wāqim, 114.
 Ward, 18n.
 Wardiyah, 71.
 Warsh, 3.
 al-Waṣṣal 'l-Marqūm fī ḥall al-Manzūm, 25, 28.
 Washq, 258.
 Washqī, 258.
 al-Washshā, 148.
 al-Waṣī, 15n.
 Wāṣil, Ibn 'Aṭā, 143, 144, 145, 146, 148.

Wāsiṭ, 187.
 Wathīl Ibn Amr Ibn Juwayn
 Ibn Wuhayb Ibn Ḥimayr, 109.
 Wathīmah Ibn Mūsā, 148, 149,
 150, 153, 159.
 Wazīr, 199, 201, 211.
 Wazīr Ibn Baqīyyah, 138.
 Wazīr Ibn al-Qifṭī, 199 and note.
 William I, 305.
 William II, 23n, 305.
 Wislās, 218, 223.
 Wislāsīn, 218, 223.
 Wustenfēld, 177n, 198n, 318n,
 Wustenfēld's Arabische Aerzte,
 94n, 95.
 Wuthayl, 109n.

Y

Yadhbul, 191.
 Yahyā, 98, 99, 170.
 Yahyā Ibn Tamīm, 302, 303.
 Yahyā, the Barmakid, 271, 306,
 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312,
 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318.
 Yahyā Ibn Abī Kaṭhīr al-Yam-anī, 214, and note.
 Yahyā Ibn Ādam, 215.
 Yahyā Ibn Akṭham, 223, 224,
 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230,
 231, 232, 233, 534, 243, 344.
 Yahyā Ibn 'Alī, 99.
 Yahyā Ibn 'Alī Ibn al-Qāsim,
 289, 290.
 Yahyā Ibn 'Azīz, 305.
 Yahyā Ibn Mā'in, 35, 45, 184,
 213, 215, 218, 219.

Yahyā Ibn Mandah, 249, 251, 252.
 Yahyā Ibn Mu'ādh, 246, 249,
 283, 285.
 Yahyā Ibn Muḍar al-Qaysī,
 219.
 Yahyā Ibn al-Munaiim, 283-288.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'dūn, 252.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'id, 215.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'id al-Anṣārī,
 100.
 Yahyā Ibn Sa'id al-Qaṭṭān,
 100.
 Yahyā Ibn Tamīm al- Sanḥajī,
 297-306.
 Yahyā Ibn Yāhiyā, 218, 219,
 220, 221, 222, 223.
 Yahyā Ibn Yamar, 254, 255,
 256, 257, 258.
 Yahyā Ibn Ziyād, 284.
 Yahyā al-Tibrizi, 277n.
 Yamāmah, 5n.
 Yaman, 9, 22, 23, 24, 177, 178,
 179, 195, 226, 275.
 Yamanites, 103.
 Ya'mar al-'Adawi al-Washqī,
 254.
 Ya'qub, 212.
 Ya'qūbs, 4.
 Yāqūt al-Ḥamawī, 87, 88, 172,
 196, 197, 198, 199, 212,
 Yāqūt Ibn Arslān al-Turkumānī, 185.
 Yāqūt al-Mawṣili, 187, 188,
 190.
 Yāqūt al-Rūmī, 190, 195.
 Yāqūt al-Turkumanī, 185.

Yarbī, 152n.
 Yarūq, 185, 186.
 al-Yarūqiyah, 186.
 al-Yās, 274;
 Yaṣḥkur, 215n, 258.
 Yāsir, 22, 24.
 Yatimah, 7, 11n, 12, 99, 145n.
 Yatimat al-Dahr, 56.
 Yazdigird, 71n, 284.
 Yazid, Ibn Kulthūm, 34,
 Yazid Ibn al-Kumayt, 48.
 Yazid Ibn Maṣṣūr Ibn 'Abd
 Allāh Ibn Yazid al-Ḥimyari,
 266, 274, 275.
 Yazid Ibn Mazyad, 173 and
 note 174, 175, 176.
 Yazid Ibn Mu'āwiyah, 138.
 Yazidī Ibn al-Muhallab, 256, 257.
 Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah
 al-Fazārī, 44, 307.
 al-Yazidī, 266, 267, 268, 269,
 270, 271, 272, 273, and note
 274.
 Yazīdīyan, 266.
 Yūnus Ibn Ḥabīb, 256.
 Yūsuf, 69, 139, 241.
 Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd Allāh Ibn
 Muḥammad Ibn al-Ḥusayn
 al-Qudā'i, 237, 241.
 Yūsuf Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, 112n.
 Yūsuf Ibn Tāshifin, 158.
 Yūsuf Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi,
 138.

Z

Zadhūwayh, 179n.
 Al-Zāhiri, 236.

Al-Zuhr al-Bāsim fi awṣāf
Abi 'l-Qāsim, 23.
 Zakariyā, 255.
 Zam'a, 185.
 Zama'ah, 125.
 al-Zamakhsharī, 5, 66, 317.
 Zamzam, 21n.
 Zardafnah, 160, 170.
 Zariā, 161.
 Zariqah, 161n.
 Zarqā al-Yamamah, 5 and note.
 Zawawā, 283.
 Zawawī, 283.
 al-Zawrā, 192.
 Zayd, 63, 66, 109, 110, 138,
 139, 140, 153, 154.
 Zayd al-Khayl, 66.
 Zayd Manāt, 107, 265.
 Zayn al-'Ābidīn, 119, 121.
 Zayn al-Dīn, 225, 283.
 al-Zaynabī, 76, 78.
 Zīnat al-Dahr, 69, 70, 90.
 Ziri Ibn Manād, 304.
 Ziride, 9n.
 Ziyād Ibn 'Abd Allāh, 265.
 Ziyād Ibn 'Abd al-Raḥman Ibn
 Ziyād al-Lakhmī, 218, 219.
 Ziyād Ibn Abīh, 103, 104.
 Ziyād Ibn 'Awn, 218.
 Zoaves, 283.
 Zubaydite, 137.
 al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwām 100.
 Zuhayr Ibn Abi Sulmā, 45.
 Zuhayr Ibn Ḥarb al-Nasā'i, 214n.
 Zuhayr al-Sakb, 34, 40.
 al-Zuhri, 1, 100, 228, 229.
 Zūtā, 41, 51.

Ibn Khallikan's

WAFAYAT AL-A'YAN

WA ANBĀ' ABNA' AL-ZAMĀN

(A Biographical Dictionary)

Vol. 7

Eng. Translation

M. de Slane

Edited by

Dr. S. Moinul Haq

WA
(A M.

This i Khallik disting had ga this b attentio teenth known brough
Then h
lation.
literate correcti orthogr has al
Christia of Edu Slane l months
Its usefi ment Brockel importa graphic fore, it and liter
From its sent day and unc valuable search and hist

ISBN 8
Set of

KITAB BHAVAN

Exporters & Importers
1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj
New Delhi-110002, [India]

Phones : 3274686, 3277392, 3277393

Fax : 91-11-3263383

Telex : 31-63106 ALI IN

ISBN 81-7151-170-8 Set
ISBN 81-7151-177-5 (Vol. VII)

First Published in India 1996

Published by:

Nusrat Ali Nasri for Kitab Bhavan
1784, Kalan Mahal, Daryaganj
New Delhi-110002

Printed in India at:

Johar Offset Printers
Maujpur, Ghonda
Delhi-110053.

NOTE ON TRANSLITERATION

ا	=	a	د	=	d
آ	=	aw	ت	=	t
ای	=	ay	ظ	=	z
ب	=	b	ع	=	'
ط and ث	=	t	غ	=	gh
ث	=	th	ف	=	f
ج	=	j	ق	=	q
ح	=	h	ک	=	k
خ	=	kh	گ	=	g
د	=	d	ل	=	l
ذ	=	dh	م	=	m
ر	=	r	ن	=	n
ز	=	z	و	=	o; w
س	=	s	ه	=	h
ش	=	sh	ی	=	i; y
ص	=	s	.	=	.

Long vowels: a, i, u

Short vowels: a, i, u

NOTE

"The sacred aayat from the Holy Qur'an and ahadith have been printed for Tabligh and for increase of your religious knowledge. It is your duty to ensure their sanctity. Therefore, the pages on which these are printed should be disposed of in proper Islamic manner".

CONTENTS

	Page
Note on Transliteration	iii
Note	iv
780     Yahya Ibn Muhammad Ibn Hunbyrah	1
781     Yahya Ibn Zabadah	16
782     Yahya Ibn Nizar	22
783     Yahya Ibn Al-Jarrah	26
784     [Yahya B. 'Isa] Ibn Matruh	31
785     [Yahya B. 'Isa] Ibn Jazlah	39
786     [Yahya B. Habash] Shihab Al-Din Al-Suhrawardi	41
787     Abu Ja'far [Yazid B. Al-Qa'qa'] The Qur'an Reader	47
788     Yazid Ibn Ruman, The Qur'an Reader	51
789     Yazid Ibn Al-Muhallab	52
790     Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim	87
791     Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah	91
792     Yazid Ibn Hatim Al-Muhallabi	100
793     Yazid Ibn Mazyad Al-Shaybani	105
794     [Yazid] Ibn Mufarrigh	121
795     Yazid B. Salamah (Ibn Al-Tathriyah)	151
796     Ya'qub Al-Majishun	160
797     The Qadi Abu Yusuf	162
798     Ya'qub Al-Hadrami	177
799     Abu 'Awanah [Ya'qub Ibn Ishaq] The Hafiz	181
800     Ya'qub B. Ishaq Ibn Al-Sikkit	183
801     Ya'qub Ibn Al-Layth Al-Saffar	191
802     Ya'qub Ibn Yusuf Ibn 'Abd Al-Mu'min	225
803     Ya'qub Ibn Da'wud, The Vizir	242

IBN KHALLIKHAN'S BIOGRAPHICAL DICTIONARY

780 YAHYA IBN MUHAMMAD IBN HUBAYRAH

Abu T-Muzaffar Yahya Ibn Muhammad Ibn Hubayrah Ibn Sa'id Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Ahmad Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Jahm Ibn 'Amr Ibn Hubayrah was surnamed 'Awn al-Din (aid of the religion) and drew his descent from Shayban (the progenitor of the Arabic tribe which bears this name). His ancestor Hubayrah was the son of 'Alwan, the son of al-Hawfazan, whose real name was al-Harith, the son of Sharik, the son of 'Amr, (or Matar) the son of Qays, Shurahbil, the son of Murrah, the son of Hammam, the son of Dhuhl, the son of Shayban. Tha'labah, Shayban's father, was the son of 'Uqabah, the son of Sa'b, the son of 'Ali, the son of Bakr, the son of Wa'il, the son of Qasit, the son of Hinh, the son of Aqsa, the son of D'ami, the son of Jadilah, the son of Asad, the son of Rabi'ah the son of Nizar, the son of M'add, the son of 'Adnan.--It is thus that his genealogy has been given by a number of authors, such as Ibn ad-Dubaythi (vol. III. p. 102) in his historical work and Ibn al-Qadisi (vol. I. p. 290) in his Kitab al-Wuzara (book of vizirs). It was not made public till some years after his accession to the vizirate, when it was mentioned by the poets in their eulogies. He was a native of Bani Awqar, a village situated in that part of Iraq which is called Dujayl. It is the same place which bore the name of Dur, 'Armanya, and which is now named, after him, Dur al-Wazir (the monastery or village of the vizir). His father belonged to the jund (or military colony) (vol. II. p. 132) established there. Yahya professed the doctrine taught by Ahmad Ibn Hanbal. He learned Traditions, acquired considerable information in each branch of knowledge, learned the readings of the noble book (the Qur'an) and concluded that study by going over all the systems of Qur'an-reading and the different lessons which have been handed down. He studied grammar, became acquainted with the history of the desert Arabs and of their battle-days, cultivated assiduously the art of penmanship, got by heart the locutions employed by elegant speakers and applied himself to the acquisition of a good epistolary style. His master in polite literature was Abu Mansur al-Jawaliqi (vol. III. p. 498) and, in law, Abu'l-Husayn Muhammad Ibn Muhammad al-Farra. He was also a pupil of the preacher Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Yahya Ibn 'Ali Ibn Muslim Ibn Musa Ibn Imran al-Zabidi.<sup>1</sup> He learned the Traditions respecting the Prophet from Abu 'Uthman Isma'il Ibn Muhammad Ibn Qayla al-Isfahani, Abu'l Qasim Hibat Allah Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Husayn <sup>الحسين</sup> the katib, and from those who came after them. He himself taught Traditions, some of which he had learned from the imam al-Muktafi li-Amr Allah, the Commander of the faithful. A great number of persons received Traditions from him and, amongst them, the hafiz Abu'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi (vol. II. p. 96). The first office which he filled (under government) was the inspectorship of the plantations (ishraf al-akriha)<sup>2</sup> situated on the west (bank of the Tigris); he then passed to the inspectorship of the taxes paid in kind (al-iqamat al-amkhzaniyah), and was afterwards appointed inspector of the makhzan or government stores (al-ishraf bil-makhzan). This place he did not long fill, having been nominated, in the year 542 (A.D. 1147-8), clerk of the khalifs household (kitabah diwan al-zimam, from which post he was raised to the vizirate. The author who compiled the biography of Ibn Hurbayrah relates, in these terms, the motives which led to his nomination: "Amongst the things which increased his influence and raised him to the vizirship was the conduct held by Mas'ud al-Bilali' the shihnah (or resident) whom the sultan Mas'ud Ibn Muhammad Ibn Malik Shah the Seljuqid had established at Baghdad as his lieutenant. Al-Bilali was one of those Abyssinian slaves and eunuchs who held so high a rank in the (Seljuq) empire. He used to behave with great impoliteness in the presence of the khalif, transgressing the rules of etiquette which were always to be observed, and permitting his licentious followers to spread disorder (through the city). Qawwar al-Din Abu'l Qasim 'Ali Ibn Sadaqah, who was, at that time the khalif's vizir, wrote a number of letters to Sultan Mas'ud, requesting him to reprimand al-Bilali for his conduct, but could never obtain an answer. When 'Awn al-Din was appointed clerk of the household, the khalif spoke to him on the subject and bade him write to the sultan. 'Awn al-Din, knowing that the vizir had already written a number of letters and that they had remained unanswered, sent off request after request till he obtained a reply. The letter (which had this effect) was drawn up by himself, and I should insert it here, were it not so long; but I may mention, in a summary manner, that it contained good wishes for

1 See towards the end of this article.

2 The names of the offices mentioned in this paragraph are here rendered by their probable signification; as we do not yet possess any precise information respecting the internal administration of the khalifate in its latter days.

the sultan's welfare, reminded him of the exemplary conduct held by his predecessors towards the khalifs, of their sincere obedience, the respect which they always shewed them and the protection which they afforded them against those who dared to thwart them. He then complained of Mas'ud al-Bilali, mentioned that he [had] written a number of times on that subject without receiving an answer and spoke to a great length on this matter. It was in the month of the latter Rabi' 542 (September, A.D. 1147) that he wrote this letter. Very soon after, he received an answer containing the sultan's excuses with a formal disapproval of al-Bilali's conduct. The khalif al-Muktafi was highly pleased to have followed the advice of 'Awn al-Din and felt deeply obliged to him; so, 'Awn al-Din continued to enjoy his favour and was raised to the vizirate."

The same author says: "Another motive which conduced to 'Awn al-Din's nomination was, that, in the year 543 (A.D. 1148-9), two of the sultan's emirs. One of whom was al-Baksh al-Mas'udi, lord of al-Lihf, which is a place in Iraq, and the other, Ildegiz al-Sultani, came to Baghdad with a numerous body of troops and committed in it the greatest disorders. This will be found related in the books of annals.<sup>3</sup> The vizir Qawwam al-Din Ibn Sadaqah undertook to bring about an arrangement, but without success. 'Awn al-Din then asked and obtained the khalif's authorisation to treat with the invaders who had attacked him and, by his skilful management, he succeeded in putting a stop to their evil doings till such time as they had assembled sufficient forces to resist them, and enabled the people to seize on their riches. This event was a means employed by destiny for the elevation of Ibn Hubayrah and the dismissal of Ibn Sadaqah from the vizirate. Effectively, when this serious affair was terminated, the khalif al-Muktafi summoned Ibn Hubayrah to his presence by a notification (mutali'ah), which was carried to him by two emirs of the empire. When Ibn Hubayrah read it, all his family made great demonstrations of joy<sup>4</sup> and, as he rode with his followers to the khalif's palace, the public learned that he had been appointed vizir. On his arrival at the door of the hujrah (the khalif's cabinet), he was called in and found al-Muktafi seated, to receive him, on the right side of the Taj.<sup>5</sup> He kissed the ground, saluted and then, during an hour, a conversation with the khalif which no other person could overhear. On retiring he found a robe of honour (tashrif) prepared for him, according to the custom followed towards vizirs. He put it on and, being called in a second time, he kissed the ground and invoked blessings on the khalif in a style which excited that prince's admiration. He then pronounced these words:

---

3 Ildegiz was governor of Arran and Adharbaijan. He and a number of other emirs revolted against the sultan Mas'ud, marched towards Baghdad, defeated the khalif's troops and committed all sorts of atrocities. They then asked and obtained the khalif's pardon, retired and spread ravage and devastation over all the countries through which they passed. — (Ibn al-Athir's Kamil; Mirkhond.)

4 The meaning of the text is doubtful.

"As long as my life endures, I shall thank 'Amr for services of which he never vaunted, great though they were. He saw my indigence even there where it was concealed, and kept it in sight until it disappeared."

I may observe that these are two verses of three which were composed by Ibrahim Ibn al-'Abbas al-Suli.<sup>6</sup> The verse which should have come after the first was:

A generous man whose wealth is never withheld from his friend, and who never manifests a complaint if the shoe (fortune) slips from under him.

'Awn al-Din, in reciting the two verses, altered the last half of the second, which originally ran thus:

and it was like a mote in his eye, till removed.

Having thought fit to address the khalif in this style, he altered the expression, through respect. When he retired, they brought him a bay horse, with white pasterns, a white spot reaching from the forehead to the nose, and a rich caparison; such being their custom with respect to vizirs. The details of this ceremony I have abridged. He then rode forth, preceded by the great functionaries, the officers of the empire, the emirs attached to the court, all the khalif's servants and all the chamberlains of the diwan; with drums beating before him and the masnad (cushion) borne after him, according to the usual practice on such occasions. He entered into the diwan, dismounted apart and took his seat on the dast [uppermost seat]. The shaykh Sadid

5 The Taj, or crown, was a pavilion adjoining the palace of the khalifs at Baghdad. — See M. de Sacy's Chrestomathie Arabe, tome I, page 74. It was in it that the khalif appeared in state, on the days of solemn audience.

6 Those verses are given in the Hamasa, page 697. The commentator, at-Tabrizi, says that they were composed by a native of Madinah in honour of Amir Ibn Said Ibn al-Asi, who, as we learn by the Nujum, was put to death, in the year 69 (A.D. 688-9) by the Umayyad khalif, 'Abd al Malik Ibn Marwan. Ibrahim al Suli could not have composed this piece, for he died A.H. 283 (A.D. 857) and was not a native of Madinah.

al-Dawlah Abu Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Karim Ibn al-'Anbari then stood forward to read the diploma (of the vizir's nomination). It was a remarkable piece of its kind and, were it not so long, I should insert it here; besides, it is well known and copies of it are in the hands of the public. When he finished, the Qur'an-readers chanted (passages of the Qur'an) and the poets recited pieces of their composition. Ibn Hubayrah was installed in the vizirship on Wednesday, the 3rd of the latter Rabi' 544 (10th August, A.D. 1149). He bore at first the title of Jalal al-Din (grandeur of religion), but, on being appointed vizir, he received that of 'Awn al-Din. Eminent for learning and for merit, he displayed also an unerring judgment and a virtuous disposition; during his vizirship he conducted matters in a manner which attested the greatness of his abilities and the excellence of his counsels. This assured him (the khalif's) gratitude, entitled him to high consideration and contributed largely to his good fortune. As he had a great respect for the learned, his receptions were attended by all men distinguished for talent, no matter in what line. Traditions were repeated in his presence and controlled by him and the shaykhs (professors) who were there; discussions were carried on and useful information was communicated to an extent which cannot be described. He composed some works such as the al-Ihsah fi ma'ni al-Sihah (elucidation of passages in [Jawhari's Arabic dictionary,] the Sihah), forming nineteen books (volumes?); a commentary on the al-Jam' bayn al-Sahihayn (vol. I, p. 120) with an exposition of the maxims uttered by the Prophet and contained in that work; the Kitab al-Muqtasid (which hits the mark) -- this word takes an i after the s; a complete commentary on it, in four volumes, was drawn up by the celebrated grammarian Abu Muhammad Ibn al-Khashshab (vol. II, p. 66) and an abridgement of the Islah al-Mantiq<sup>7</sup>: the Kitab al-'Ibadat, etc.) treatise on devotional rites) according to the system of canon law taught by the imam al-Shafi'i; an Arjuzah etc. (technical verses) on the long and the short final a; an Arjuzah on the art of penmanship (or orthography الخط Our professor 'Izz al-Din Abu'l Hasan 'Ali, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Athir (vol. II, p. 288) gives, in his lesser historical work, that which treats of the Atabeks, a chapter, concerning the siege of Baghdad in the month of Dhu'l-Qa'dah 553 (Nov.--Dec. A.D. 1158) by al-Malik Muhammad and Zayn al-Din. He says there that al-Muktafi li-Amr Allah made every effort to put that city in a good state of defence and that his vizir, 'Awn al-Din Ibn Hubayrah, helped him in a manner of which no other person could have been capable. He adds: "By 7 The life of Ibn al-Sikkit, the author of the Islah al-Mantiq, is given in this volume.

---

al-Muktafi's order, a proclamation was made in Baghdad, promising five dinars (2 £ 10s.) to every person who should be wounded during the hostilities, and, effectively, that sum was given to everyone who received a wound. A man of the people got wounded and went to the vizir, who said: 'That is a mere scratch, not worth 'a penny.' The man returned to the fight and got a stroke across his belly, so the entrails were falling out; he then came back to the vizir and said: 'My Lord will that satisfy you? The vizir laughed, ordered him a donation and sent for a doctor to dress his wound.' (End of the extract.)

I must here make an observation: the Muhammad of whom Ibn al-Athir speaks was the son of Mahmud Ibn Muhammad Ibn Muluk [Malik] Shah, the Seljuqid, and the Zayn al-Din was Abu'l-Hasan 'Ali Ibn Bektikin, generally known by the (Turkish) appellation of Kutcheh (the little) and the father of Muzaffar al-Din, lord of Arbela (vol. ii, p. 535). According to another author, this Malik Muhammad was Muhammad Shah, and the event took place in the year 552. God knows which of the two is in the right! It is Ibn al-jawzi who says so in his Shuzur al-'Uqud, and he must have been better acquainted with what passed than any other, for Baghdad was his native place and he was there all the time. I have spoken of Muhammad Shah<sup>8</sup> in the article on his father. The imam (khalif) al-Muktafi li-Amr Allah Muhammad bore the surname of Abu 'Abd Allah and was the son of al-Mustazhir; he died on the eve of Sunday, the 2nd of the first Rabi' 555 (12th March, A.D. 1160). His son al-Mustanjid Billah Abu Muzaffar Yusuf was then proclaimed khalif. Ibn Hubayrah went into him, took the oath of fealty, was received honourably and confirmed in the vizirship. Fearing to be dismissed from office, he never attempted to contradict his sovereign, and he continued in place till the hour of his death. His praises were celebrated by the most distinguished poets of the age, and one of them, Abu'l Fawaris Sa'd, surnamed Hays Bays (vol. I. p. 559) and generally known by the appellation of Ibn Sayfi, composed on him some exquisite eulogiums. In one of these pieces he says:

Anecdotes of generosity excite him, even in his calmest mood, as the red intoxicating liquor excites the nomadic village. He stands first when other people spring from their seats in dismay, and when the loftiest pinnacles (chiefs) tremble before the storms of calamity. He interrupts vile discourse, avoids opprobrious language and is always taken up with the love of glory. He is incapable of committing the slightest act of meanness, and his bosom is unmoved by the dangers incurred in those deeds which lead to glory. When name of 'Awn al-Din Yahya is pronounced, the clouds flash forth their lightnings (harbingers of rain), and the strong lances wave proudly.<sup>9</sup>

---

8 I read : Mahmud Shah; see vol. III, p. 234.

It was the custom at Baghdad that, in the month of Ramadan the great officers of the empire partook of a repast (simat) given by the khalif at the house of the vizir, and this repast was called the tabak. Hays Bays, who was high-minded man and had all the noble pride of true Arab, was one of the guests. Seeing that a number of persons, having no other merit than that of being paid functionaries, passed before him to a higher place, he was so highly offended that he wrote to the vizir 'Awn al-Din a letter in which he requested that (for the future) his absence might be pardoned. (It ran thus:)

Thou, who in wealth and in poverty, wert always lavish of thy money! thou who, morning and night, furnishest provisions to (needy) travellers! Thou who convoked the persons enriched by thee to partake of an augmentation from thy bounty! In every house there is a table supplied with provisions by the generosity, and yet thou invitest its master to the tabak. Thy gifts are poured fourth like a torrent and, were those on whom they light not afraid of thy just severity, they would cry but: "Save us from drowning!" Thy noble qualities cover the land with a constant shower: even in the day of battle, thou drenchest the soil with the blood and the sweat of the horsemen. Spare my shoulders from being pressed in a manner which, if I resented, would expose my reputation and my character to sarcasms. If thou permittest it, such a humiliation will degrade me; and how often hast loaded me with burden (of gifts) which I could hardly bear; I am sick of the fortune (which pursues me) and of her attacks: my noble pride alone preserves my life, Grant me the favour which I ask; (grant it as readily) as thou bestowest thy numerous gifts. To be liberal in granting honour is far above being liberal with money. The disk of the sun; exalted though he be, turneth yellow from grief, when obliged to descent towards the horizon. People consider as folly such (sensibility as mine); but often hath innate dignity been confounded with folly.

The vizir 'Awn al-Din received the present of an inkstand made

---

9 The copyists and editors, not having well understood this piece, have given it very incorrectly. In the third line, I read الدنيا and, in the fourth, but with doubt, يقنف of rock-crystal and inlaid with coral. Seeing at his levee a number of poets and, amongst them, Hays Bays, he observed that it would be well to compose a piece of verse on that object. One of the persons present, a blind man whose name I have not met with, then recited these lines:

Iron was, by divine favour, rendered soft for [prophet] David, so that he wrought it at will into coats of mail.<sup>10</sup> The crystal, though a stone has been softened for you, yet bending it to one's wish is hard and difficult.

Hays Bays here observed that the poet had spoken, not of inkstand but of the maker; on which the vizir said: "Let him who finds fault change (it for the better)."<sup>11</sup> Hays Bays did so in these lines:

Your inkstand was made of your two days,<sup>11</sup> and these have been mistaken for crystal and for coral. One is your day of peace, which is white and pours forth abundance; the other is your day of war which is red, like red blood.

I since found the two first verses in the Kitab al-Jinan, a work composed by the Shaykh al-Qadi al-Rashid Ahmad Ibn ab-Zubayr al-Ghassani, the same of whom mention has been made towards the beginning of this work (vol. I, p. 143). He attributes them to al-Qadi al-Rashid Ahmad Ibn al-Qasim al-Saqalbi,<sup>12</sup> Qadi of Misr, who, as he relates, went to the levee of al-Afdal Shahanshah Amir al-Juyush (vol. I, p. 612) and, seeing before him an inkstand of ivory inlaid with coral, extemporized these lines:

Iron was, by divine favour, rendered soft for [prophet] David, so that he wrought it, at will, into coats of mail. Coral though a stone, has been softened for you, yet it is hard and disobedient to the will.

Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Bakhtyar, generally known by the name of al-Ablah (vol. III, p. 159) composed, in this vizir's praise, a number of qasidahs; one of which I insert here because it is the finest:

The zephyr and the (pliant) willow (ban) of the sandhill have 10 Qur'an, sur. 34, verse 10.

11 The meaning of this is explained in the next verse.

12 Ahmad Ibn al-Qasim, surnamed al-Qadi al-Rashid, was a native of Sicily, from which country he moved to Egypt. He died A.D. 1131-2. — (History of the Qadis of Misr; ms. of the Bibl. imp., ancient fonds, no 691.)

committed a falsehood: they offered themselves as the likeness<sup>13</sup> (of my beloved), but they forgot the ornaments (of her person) and her (graceful) neck. O thou who art a statue (in beauty)! thou whose anklets are too wide<sup>14</sup> for the instep and whom I am unable not to love! I once had tears and strength of mind; but now, neither tears nor strength of mind remain. Thou hast rendered my body a dwelling-place for sickness, since thou dwellest in al-Jara, after having departed from Tabala<sup>15</sup>. O (my friend!) thou who seest those gazelles (maidens) cross our way! know that my heart, and not the winding valley, is their pasture-ground. Her waist is pliant like wand, and the polishes date-tree blossoms (her teeth) with a piece of arak wood. When she holds discourse with you, she fails not bring back (to you) the days of passionate love. Often have I passed the wine-cup to my companions, whose eyes shewed inebriation and who staggered in their gait. (We were then) in an arbour embellished with flowers, whose raiment was not (made of the silks) from Yaman or from San'a. In the morning, I hastened with ardour to visit the soil of that spot (where I met my beloved; I was there) before the turtle-doves had mounted to the top of the ban-tree. The lightning-clouds shook over it their flashing swords, and the lake, through fear of them, put on a coat of mail.<sup>16</sup> O thou who blamest me! load me, as you please, with reproaches sufficient to rend even the solid rock; but know that I was formed by nature for loving, just as the vizir was formed by nature for deeds of liberality.

The poet then makes his transition to the eulogium which, to avoid prolixity, I suppress. Abu'l Fath Sibt Ibn al-Ta'awizi (vol. III, p. 162) composed also in his honour a single qasidah which I here give:

13 Literally: they described thee.

14 I suppose that the poet wrote وسمت "are wide," instead of ضمت "are tight," - as thick ankles were probably not considered to be a point of beauty. By the word anklets are meant the bracelets worn on the ankles by Muslim ladies. These ornaments are of a crescent shape and as thick as the thumb. They are hollow inside and contain a little ball of metal which, as it rolls about, makes a clinking sound.

15 Tabala was a village on the road leading from Makkah to Yaman; al-jara lay probably at a great distance from that place.

16 That is: the [surface of the water was wrinkled with waves. "The breeze has changed the water into "a coat of mail," said al-Mu'tamid Ibn 'Abbad to Ibn 'Ammar, in one of his sportive moods. See Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans d'Espagne, t. IV, p. 139.

May the rains descend on these vernal abodes and on these hills which, since the departure of their inhabitants, look sickly and emaciated like me. For her (who is absent) I have engaged that my eyelids shall be a fountain and pour from their angles an abundant flood of tears. Though her dwelling place be much changed from the state in which I saw it, the love which is in my heart shall never be known to change. O my two friends! the aspect of that cloud whose lightnings gleam dimly over al-Ajra'ayn has renewed my affection for her and awakened my passion. My eyes and my sight have been delivered over to constant waking by the slowness of that procrastinating maid in the fulfillment of her engagements. When I said to her: "My body is emaciated by love!" she would reply: "Where is the lover who is not emaciated?" When I said: "Let my tears bear witness to the sadness which you cause me;" she would answer: "Tears are not witnesses whose evidence can be accepted." Blame me not, my two friends! if I weep in my foolish passion for one who always breaks her promise and always procrastinates. The heaviest affliction which a lover can undergo is the irksome indifference of his beloved and the fatiguing remonstrances of censorious friends. At the foot of you insulted sandhill are (the maidens) fair and incomparable, who played with those hearts of ours and with our reason, on the morning in which their glances and our hearts met together and which was not free from the blood of wounded (lovers). O! how admirable is the valley of al-Arak, where the perfume of your presence is revealed by the northern and the southern breezes. In that cool valley, morning and evening, as often as blew the zephyr, a love-sick heart found alleviation. I invoked indifference, but it would not aid me; I attempted to use patience (and to bear with her), but it was of no avail. Thou (my beloved) knewest all the causes of love and you heaped them on a back which was already loaded with misfortunes. The only profit I derived from the loving of fair maidens was watching the nights of longing desire, how slowly they passed over. How often did these nights inspire me with the hope of meeting a man renowned in manners, grave, prudent and precipitate; in the enjoyment of whose favour I might proudly swing my body from side to side, and, in whose court, I might sweep haughtily along in training robes. Now I have been long accustomed to his gifts and only desire to kiss that beneficent hand; the generous character of Yaha the vizir gives me the assurance of that favour's being granted, and 'Awn al-Din is the very best of sureties.

This vizir frequently recited the following verses:

The secrets of love can be explained to you by no man, till it has procured for thee the vexation of being reproved. The love which I bear her will not consent that she should ever permit me to see in her even the slightest imperfection.

The shaykh Shams al-Din Abu'l Muzaffar Yusuf Ibn Qizaghli or [Firaghli] Ibn 'Abd Allah (vol. I, p. 439), who was a daughter's son of the shaykh Jamal al-Din Abu'l Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi (vol. II, p. 96) states, in his Mirat al-Zaman, a historical work of which I saw, in Damascus, a copy composed of forty volumes, all of them in the author's own handwriting, that his father, Qizaghli, was a white slave (mamluk) belonging to 'Awn al-Din and that his mother was the daughter of the shaykh Jamal al-Din Abu'l Faraj just mentioned. Their son was therefore a mawla<sup>17</sup> to him ('Awn al-Din). He states also that he heard his preceptors at Baghdad relate that 'Awn al-Din gave the following account of his elevation: "I was in such straitened circumstances that, for some days, I remained without food. One of my family then advised me to visit the tomb of Ma'ruf al-Karkhi (vol. III, p. 384), and there ask God's assistance, because all prayers offered up at that tomb were fulfilled. So I went to the tomb of Ma'ruf, prayed there and invoked (the help of God). I then retired, with the intention of returning to the town (balad),"--by the word town he meant Baghdad, -- "and I passed through Katufta ['Atfa]," -- a place  near Baghdad, -- "and there I saw a deserted mosque. I went into it for the purpose of saying a prayer of two rak'ash, and saw there a sick man lying on a mat. I sat down by his head and asked him if he desired anything. He replied: 'A quince.' I went to a fruiterer's, and got from him two quinces and an apple, for which I left my cloak (mizar) in pledge. The man ate part of a quince and bade me shut the door. When I had done so, he got off the mat and told me to dig there. I dug and found a jar. 'Take it,' said he, 'for you are more deserving of it than any other.' I asked him if he had not an heir and he answered: 'No; I had a brother whom I have not seen this long time and who, as I am told, is dead. We were natives of al-Rusafah.' He was still talking to me when he died. I washed his body, put it into a shroud and buried it. Having taken the jar, which contained five hundred dinars (  $\text{ق.}$  2250) I went to the Tigris with the intention of crossing over, when a waterman, dressed in rags and having an old boat, called out: 'Come with me.' I dropped down the river with him, and never did I see a man so like to the one that had just died. 'Where do you belong to?' said I. He answered: 'To al-Rusafah; I have some daughters and am very poor.' 'Have you any relatives?' said I. 'No,' said he, 'I had a brother, but it is very long since I saw him, and I know not what God has done with him.' 'Hold your lap;'" said I. He did so, and I poured all the money into it. Seeing him greatly astonished I related to him what had passed. He then bade me take the half of it, but I replied: 'I shall not take even a single piece.' I then went up to the residence of the khalif, wrote a supplication (and sent it in). It came out endorsed thus: "The inspectorship of the makhzan. From that post I mounted to the vizirate."

---

17 See introduction to the second volume.

Ibn Qizaghli* continues thus: "My grandfather, Abu'l-Faraj, relates, in his Muntazim, that the vizir begged of God to die a martyr and, every time he found an opportunity of risking his life for the faith, he encountered the danger. On Saturday, the 12th of the first Jumada, 560 (27th March, A.D. 1165), he was in good health. That night, he went to bed perfectly well, but, at day-break, he had a fit of vomiting and sent for a doctor. This man attended him and gave him a draught which, some say, was poisonous, and he died. About six months after wards, this doctor drank poison and then said repeatedly: 'That which I gave to drink has been given to me!' till he died."

(Ibn al-Jawzi) says, in the Muntazim: "On the night of the vizir's death, I was sleeping, with my companions, on the roof of the house, and I had a dream in which, methought, I was in the palace of the vizir and that he was there seated. A man came in with a javelin in his hand and struck him with it between the unthian<sup>18</sup>, so that the blood gushed out like a fountain and struck the (appsite) wall. I then turned round and, seeing a gold ring lying on the ground, I took it up and said: 'To whom must I give it? (The answer was): 'Wait till servant come forth and to him give it.'" On awaking, I related the dream to my companions and had scarcely finished when a man came up and said: 'The vizir is dead.' One of those who were present exclaimed: 'That is impossible! I left him, yesterday evening in the very best health'. Another man then came and confirmed the news. The son of the vizir ordered me to wash the corpse. I began to do so and, on lifting up the arm in order to wash the maghabin,"—by this word are designated the folds made by certain parts of the body, the armpits, for instance; its singular is maghbin;--"the ring fell from the hand to the ground and, on seeing it, I marvelled greatly, by reason of my dream. Whilst washing the corpse, I remarked on the face and on the body spots which denoted that he had been poisoned. When the bier was brought out, all the shops in Baghdad were closed and not a single inhabitant but accompanied the funeral. The prayer was said over the corpse in the Mosque of the Citadel (jami'al-Qasr) and interred in the college (madrasah) founded by the vizir himself, but of which even the ruins have now disappeared. A number of poets composed elegies on his death." End of Ibn al-Jawzi's recital.

---

* [For variants see Cairo ed. vol. V, P. 282-Ed.]

18 Unthian (the two testicles). It is difficult to conceive how such a wound could be inflicted. Did the author mean to write thidian (the two nipples)?

The author of the history of this vizir states that the cause of his death was sudden predominance of phlegm over his natural temperament. Having gone out to hunt with (the khalif) al Mustanjid, he took a laxative draught which was not sufficient to operate the evacuation of the phlegm. On Friday, the 6th of the first Jumada, he rode back to Baghdad, supported on the saddle (by servants), and went to his pew in the mosque, where he attend the public prayer. After that, he returned to his house and, at the hour of the morning prayer, he had a recurrence of the attack and swooned away. The waiting-maids screamed out, but he recovered and told them to be silent. His son, 'Izz al-Din Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad, who was his lieutenant in the vizirship, being informed of what had passed, hastened to see him and said, on entering into the room: "The ustad al-dar (mayor of the palace) has sent different persons to know the cause of the outcry."--This ustad bore the names of Abu'l Faraj Muhammad and the surname of Ibn Maslamah; he was the son of 'Abd Allah, the son of Hibat Allah, the son of al-Muzaffar, the son of the ra'is al-ru'asa' (vol. III, p. 48).--"The vizir smiled (on hearing these words), notwithstanding his state of suffering, and pronounced these lines:

'How many are those who, in their folly, will rejoice at my death and wield the sword with tyranny after my decease. If they, poor fellows! were aware of the evils which shall befall them when I am gone, they would die before me.'

"He then swallowed a draught which brought on an evacuation, after which, he called for water to make the ablution preparatory to prayer. He said the prayer in a sitting posture and made the prostration, but, as he continued for a considerable time without sitting up, the attendants shook him and perceived that he was dead. The imam (khalif) al-Mustanjid, being informed of this event, gave orders for his burial."

'Awn al-Din left two sons 'Izz al-Din Muhammad, him of whom mention has been just made, and Sharaf al-Din Abu'l-Walid al-Muzaffar. As for his birth, Abu 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Qadisi (vol. I, p. 290) states, in his History of the Vizirs, that this vizir, according to his own declaration, was born in the year 497 (A.D. 1103-4). One (of his contemporaries) said: "I saw him in a dream, subsequently to his death, and asked him in what state he was? He replied:

"We are asked concerning our state, after undergoing a change of state and being for ever concealed from sight. We have obtained double reward for what we wrought in view of our own salvation, and we found that the good we did to others was selected (and put aside as the best)."

When the news of his death reached the mayor of the palace, 'Adud al-Din Ibn al-Muzaffar, the poet Sibṭ Ibn al-T'awidhi was present. He was a mawla to the Muzaffar family, his father Nushtikin having been a mamluk (white slave) to one of its members. It was the son who changed the name of Nushtikin into that of 'Abd Allah. Ibn al-T'awidhi, wishing to ingratiate himself with 'Adud al-Din who, to his knowledge, was not on good terms with the vizir, extemporized these lines:

People told me that the vizir was dead: "Come," said they, "let us weep for Abu 'l-Muzaffar Yahya," I replied: "That is for me the slightest of misfortunes and afflictions, since Ibn al-Muzaffar ('Adud al-Din) is alive (Yahya)."

Another individual, whose name I do not now recollect, but who was a poet of some celebrity, pronounced these verses (on the same event):

O Lord! the noble (Yahya) Ibn Hubayrah is dead and Yahya Ibn Ja'far<sup>19</sup> is alive! With one Yahya have disappeared all meritorious and princely qualities, but, with the other Yahya lives (Yahya) every folly and every vice.

My intention (in relating these anecdotes) is to show how numerous were the merits of Ibn Hubayrah and I have prolonged this article for the purpose of attaining that object.

I remarked in Abu'l-Khattab Ibn Dihyah's (vol. II, p. 384) work, the Kitab al-Nibras fi tarikh khulafa' bani'l 'Abbas (the book of the lamp, on the history of the 'Abbasid khalifs), an error which I am anxious to point out, lest those who read that book may suppose the author's statement to be correct. In speaking of the khalif al-Muktafi li Amrillah he has something to this effect: 'That khalif was highly fortunate in possessing such a vizir as Abu'l Muzaffar 'Awn al-Din Yahya Ibn Muhammad Ibn Hubayrah, who was descendant of the great emir Abu Hafs 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, whose transcendent merit, loudly celebrated by all historians, was transmitted to his grandson 'Awn al-Din. He then relates something highly honourable for 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah who was governor of the two Iraqs under the Umayyads. Ibn Dihyah thought that the vizir of whom we have here spoken was a descendant of that emir. I was greatly surprised at his making such a mistake: the vizir drew his origin from the progenitor of the tribe of Shayban, as we have already shewn at the beginning of this article, and the emir belonged to the tribe of Fazarah, as will be seen in our article on his son Yazid: and wide is the difference between Shayban and Fazarah. The author was, no doubt, led into this error by finding in the genealogy of the vizir an 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, which person he took for the emir. Such a fault, coming from a man like Ibn Dihyah, is not be pardoned; for he was a hafiz (knowing by heart traditional information) and should have been well acquainted with general biography امور الناس. The mistake is evident, but, to err is in the lot of humanity.

---

19 The author speaks of this person at the end of the present article.

Most of the persons whose names occur in this article have been already mentioned in this (biographica)<sup>20</sup> history and have each of them, a separate article, but we have not spoken of [al-Shaykh] al-Zabidi. He was a man of great influence, an active reformer of manners<sup>20</sup> and a person whose society was profitable to the vizir. As I have not mentioned him in this work, I feel it is my duty to direct towards him the reader's attention, for a man like him should not be passed over. He arrived in Baghdad A.H. 509 (A.D. 1115-6) and died in the month of the first Rabi' 555 (March-April, A.D. 1160). Abu 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Najjar (vol. I, p. 11) says, in his History of Baghdad: "He was born at Zabid (in Yaman), on the eve of Wednesday, the 22nd of Muharram; 460 (3rd December, A.D. 1067); he died on Monday, the 1st of the first Rabi' 555 (11th March, A.D. 1160), and was buried in the cemetery adjoining the Jami' (or mosque) of al-Mansur at Baghdad."

As for the verse of the poet: "O iord! the noble (Yahya) Ibn Hubayrah is dead and Yahya Ibn Ja'far is alive;" the last words refer to Abu'l Fadl Yahya Ibn Abi'l Qasim 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Muhammad

---

<sup>20</sup> See vol. III, p. 216, note (5). The arabic expression is to command what is laudable and forbid what is reprehensible.

Ibn al-Mu'ammār Ibn Ja'far, surnamed Za'im al-Dīn (the champion of the faith). He was appointed inspector of the Makhzan in the month of the latter Jumada, 542 (Oct.-Nov. A.D. 1147), and remained in office till the year 567 (A.D. 1171). He was appointed vizir on the dismissal of Abu'l Faraj Ibn al-Muzaffar<sup>21</sup> and occupied that post till his death. His conduct entitled him to praise and gratitude, and he was a friend to men of learning. His birth took place at Baghdad after the last evening prayer al-isha' of Thursday, the 29th Safar, 511 (2nd July, A.D. 1117). He died in Baghdad on the 20th of the first Rabi', 570 19th October, (A.D. 1174), and was interred in a mausoleum (turbat) which he had erected for himself in the al-Harbiyah cemetery.

781 YAHYA IBN ZABADAH

Abu Talib Yahya Ibn Abi'l Faraj Sa'id Ibn Abi'l-Qasim Hibat Allah Ibn 'Ali Ibn Zabadah al-Shaybani (belonging to the Arabic tribe of Shayban) was a katib (writer in a government office) and a munshi (a drawer up of official dispatches). His family, belonged to Wasit, but Baghdad was the place of his birth, of his residence and of his death. He bore the surname of Qawwam al-Din (support of religion) or, according to another statement, 'Amid al-Din (column of religion). Eminent in rank and in talent, he obtained the highest reputation as a Katib, a munshi and an arithmetician; besides which, he possessed some skill in jurisprudence, dogmatical theology, [ilm al-Kalam] the fundamentals (of law) and other sciences. As a versifier, he displayed great talent. When a student, he attended the lessons of Abu Mansur al-Jawaliqi (vol. III, p. 498) and studied Qur'an-reading under the tuition of that professor and of his successors. He learned Traditions [hadith] under some of the teachers and, from his early youth till the time of his death, he filled (successively) a number of places in the service of the diwan (the government of the khalif). His epistles are remarkable for the graces of their style, the elegance of their ornaments and the delicacy of their allusions. In drawing up dispatches, he paid more attention to the ideas than to the cadence; his letters are elegant, his thoughts just, his poetry good and his merits are so conspicuous that they need not be described. Being nominated director of the office which administered (the cities of) Basrah, Wasit and al-Hillah, he continued to fill that post till the month of Muharram, 575 (June-July, A.D. 1179), when he was recalled from Wasit and appointed to act as hajib (chamberlain) at the Nuba* door<sup>1</sup> and to render justice in all cases of appeal to the sovereign.<sup>2</sup> In the month of the first Rabi' 577 (July-August, A.D. 1181), he was dismissed from all these offices and, in the month of the first Jumada, 582 (July-Aug. 1186), he was restored to them again. When the mayor of the palace (ustad al-dar) Majd al-Din Abu'l Fadl Hibat Allah Ibn 'Ali Ibn Hibat Allah Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Hasan, generally designated by the surname of Ibn al-Sahib, was put to death (by order of khalif al-Nasir), which event occurred on Saturday, the 19th of the first Rabi', 583 (29th May, A.D. 1187), Ibn Zabadah was appointed to succeed him. In the year 585 (A.D. 1189-90), he was dismissed from office and sent back to Wasit where he remained till the month of Ramadan, 592 (August, A.D. 1196), and was then recalled (to Baghdad). On Monday, the 22nd of Ramadan, he was appointed director of the official correspondence and obtained again the inspectorship of the board of government grants (muqata'at), which places he held till his death. His conduct was exemplary and the line of life which he followed most praiseworthy. He was particularly careful in fulfilling his religious duties, and transmitted down a few Traditions. A great quantity of his prose writings and poetical compositions has been written down under his dictation by different persons. One of these pieces is as follows:

---

21 The same who was mayor of the palace. See page 14.

In times of trouble, the worthless are raised to such eminence that the affliction is general. When tranquil water is agitated, the dregs rise from the bottom.

By the same:

People never find me more firm than when I am in the power of sudden misfortunes. It is thus that the sun does not display all his force till he enters into the mane<sup>3</sup> of the Lion (i.e. in the sign of the zodiac.)

In the following verses, written by him to al-Mustanjid, he compliments that khalif on the arrival of the festival day (the 10th Dhu'l-Hijjah):

* [Al-Mutawalli in Cairo ed.]

1 The state entrance of the khalif's palace at Baghdad was called the Taj. It was death for whoever dared to tread on the sill-stone of that door.

2 See vol. I, p. 346, note (14).

3 One of the lunar mansions is called the mane of the Lion.

Glorious prince! thy elevation is so great that our felicitations cannot reach thee; it is we who should obtain felicitations, reposing, as we do, under the shelter of thy favour. Thou art time (good fortune) itself; the day of the festival is a part of time, and it is not the custom to compliment time on the arrival of the festival.

By the same:

If you aspire to command, act uprightly; then, even if you wish to reach the heavens, you will succeed. The alif (ا), one of the written letters of the alphabet, is placed at the head of the others because it is upright.

By the same:

Envy not those who are vizirs, even though they obtain from their sovereigns, by the favour of fortune, more than they ever expected. Know that a day will come when the solid earth shall sink from under them as it used to sink before them through awe. Aaron, the brother and partner of Moses, would not have been seized by the beard<sup>4</sup>, had he not been (his brother's) vizir.

To Ibn Zabadah belonged every sort of elegant ideas. He left a diwan (or collection) of epistles; I saw a copy of it in my native place, but am unable to insert here any of its contents, as I cannot call them to mind.

Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Sa'id al-Dubaythi (vol. III, p. 102) says, in his History: "Abu Talib Yahya Ibn Sa'id Ibn Hibat Allah,"—meaning Ibn Zabadah,—"recited to me from memory the following lines which, as he told me, had been repeated to him by Abu Bakr Ahmad Ibn Muhammad al-Arrajani (vol. I, p. 134):

The eyes of that maiden had their attention divided (between two objects), whilst she was bewildered at departing and afflicted by the coming of the camels, which was announced to her by the burden of the driver's song. With one eye, she answered my salutation and, with the other, she watched the looks of the jealous spies. Seeing around her persons ready to denounce her, she suppressed her tears and withdrew into the asylum of her tent. On the morning in which I bade them farewell, whilst tears flowed from my eyes and my mind was troubled at being <sup>4</sup> According to the Qur'an, sur, 20, verse 95, Moses seized his brother Aaron by the beard, because he had suffered the Israelites to set up the golden calf.

---

separated from my companions, the reflection of those tears appeared on her cheeks, and (our foes) were jealous, thinking that she wept at my weeping.

When Ibn Zabadah was dismissed from the inspectorship of Wasit) the poet, Abu'l Ghana'im Muhammad Ibn 'Ali, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Mu'allim (vol. III, p. 168), wrote to him these lines:

When the rains refused to moisten the earth, you poured upon mankind the showers of your liberality. You were not removed from the province for a motive which might expose you to depreciation and neglect; but, when the torrents of your generosity seemed ready to overwhelm the land, they sent you away, in order to save the country from a deluge.

Al-Wajih Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, generally known by the name of Ibn Suwayd, and who was a merchant of Takrit, related to me the following anecdote: "The shaykh Muhi al-Din Abu'l Muzaffar Yusuf, who was the son of Jamal al-Din Abu'l Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi (vol. II, p. 96), the celebrated hafiz and preacher, was sent from Baghdad on an embassy to the court of al-Malik al-'Adil Ibn al-Malik al-Kamil Ibn Ayyub (vol. III, p. 235), who was then reigning in Egypt. Al-Malik al-Salih Najm al-Din Ayyub, the brother of al-Malik al-'Adil, was at that time detained as a prisoner in the fortress of al-karak."--I have already spoken of this in the article on al-Kamil (vol. III, p. 246).

[al-Wajih said:]* "When Muhi al-Din passed through damascus, on his return, to Baghdad, I happened to be there and went to visit him with the Shaykh Asil al-Din Abi'l Fadl 'Abbas Ibn 'Uthman Ibn Nabhan al-Irbili (a native of Arbela), who was then chief of the (corporation of) merchants. We sat down and, in the conversation which ensued, he (Muhi al-Din) said: 'I prevailed on al-Malik al-Nasir Da'wud, the lord of al-Karak, to swear that he would not allow al-Malik al-Salih to leave the prison, unless an order came to that effect from al-Malik al-'Adil.' On this, al-Asil said to him: 'Tell me, master! did you do so by the order of the August diwan (the khalif's government)?' Muhi al-Din answered: 'Was any authorisation necessary, for making such a demand? The welfare of the public required me to do so; but you, Asil! are an old fellow.'<sup>5</sup> To this, our master (al-Asil) replied: 'It is true; I am an old fellow, and know not what

* [See Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 290-Ed.]

5 Literally: "You are Tareh; "that is: You are as old as Tareh! by which name Arabic historians designate Terah, the father of Abraham.

I say: but I shall relate to your Worship an event which has some analogy to this and which I know to be very curious." Let us hear it'; said Muhi al-Din. Al-Asil then spoke as follows: 'Ibn Ra'is al-Ru'asa',<sup>6</sup> being director of the administration at Wasit, was bound to send (to Baghdad), every, month, the sum of thirty thousand dinars ( £ 15,000), as the contribution of Wasit, and the custom was that no delay, not even of a single day, should be allowed. On one of these months, he was unable to make up the sum and, feeling uneasy on the subject, he consulted his na'ibs (lieutenants). They replied: 'There, my Lord, is Ibn Zabadah who is indebted (to the administration) for many times that sum; call him to an account and he will make up to you over and above what you have to send off.' He, in consequence, sent for Ibn Zabadah and said to him: 'Why do you not pay (your taxes) like the others?' Ibn Zabadah answered that he had a note in the khalif al-Mustanjid's handwriting, dispensing him from paying. 'Have you a note in the khalif al-Nasir's handwriting?' said the other. 'I have not', replied Ibn Zabadah 'Be off! said Ibn Ra'is al-Ru'asa', and bring here what you owe.' Ibn Zabadah answered: 'I care for nobody and shall bring nothing'. He then stood up and walked out of the room. The na'ibs then said to their master: 'You possess the two cushions (emblems of civil and military authority?) and have the right of control over all the government intendants; no one has the high hand over you, and who is this man that he should return you such an answer? You would do well to enter by force into his house and seize on all that it contains; no one will dare to make any observation.' In pursuance of their advice, he ordered boats to be got: ready for himself and his soldiers. Ibn Zabadah resided at that time on the other side of the river, opposite to Wasit. When the boats were brought for Ibn Ra'is al-Ru'asa and his men, a zabzab (or yawl) was seen coming, as if from Baghdad. When he perceived it, he said: 'This zabzab must be coming on an affair of importance; let us see what it may be; after that we shall resume what we are about. As the boat drew near, some of the khalif's servants who were in it cried out: 'Kiss the ground! kiss the ground! He obeyed, and they handed to him a notification (mutala'ah) containing this order: 'We send you a robe of honour and an inkstand for Ibn Zabadah: place the robe on your head, hold the inkstand to your breast, and go on foot to him; clothe him in the robe and send him off to us, in order that he may be our vizir.' He put the robe on his head, held the inkstand against his bosom and went off on foot. When he met Ibn Zabadah, he recited to him this verse:

---

<sup>6</sup> This name signifies: the son of the chief of chiefs. See vol. III, p. 48.

Whilst a great man is living, people hope in him and fear him; but no one knows what is concealed in futurity.

He then began to make excuses and received this answer: 'No blame on you for to-day.' Ibn Zabadah then embarked in the yawl and set off for Baghdad. No other example is known of a person's having had the vizirate sent to him. When he arrived, the first thing he did was to dismiss Ibn Ra'is al-Ru'sa' from the inspectorship of Wasit, saying that he was not fit for such an office. 'Now', said al-Asil, 'who can assure your Worship that al-Malik al-Salih will not get out of prison and obtain the throne? You may then be sent to him as an ambassador, and how will you be able to look him in the face without blushing?' Muhi al-Din answered him by this line:

"(That will happen) when the two gatherers of acacia-berries shall return, and when Kulayb shall be raised from the dead for the tribe of Wa'il."<sup>7</sup>

Very soon after, al-Malik al-Salih got out of the prison of al-Karak, obtained the government of Egypt, and then happened what happened. "I was in Misr," said al-Wajih, "when Muhi al-Din came there as ambassador to al-Malik al-'Adil, but this prince having been arrested (by his officers), was replaced by al-Malik al-Salih. Muhi al-Din went forth to compliment the latter; of that I was an eyewitness."

It was in these terms that al-Wajih related to me the anecdote, but it contains a mistake, committed either by him or by al-Asil. Ibn Zabadah was never appointed vizir; he filled no other places than those which I mentioned at the beginning of this article; so if the narration be true, the thing happened when he was sent for to act as munshi. God knows the truth!

Ibn al-Dubaythi says: "I asked Abu Talib Ibn Zabadah when he was born, and he answered: On Tuesday, the 25th of Safar, 522 (1st March, A.D. 1128). He died on the eve of Friday, the 27th of Dhu 'l-Hijjah, 594 (30th October, A.D. 1198). The funeral service was said over him in the mosque of the Castle, at Baghdad [Jami' al-Qasr], and he was interred near the mausoleum of Musa Ibn Ja'far (vol. III, p. 463)."

Zabadh means a bit of zabad (civet), which is a perfume made use of by women.

---

<sup>7</sup> For the meaning of this verse, which became proverbial, see Freytag's Nierdanii Proverbia, t. I, P. 128.

782 YAHYA IBN NIZAR

Abu'l Fadl Yahya Ibn Nizar Ibn sa'id al-Manbaji (a native of Manbaj), is mentioned, in these terms, by the hafiz Abu Sa'd 'Abd al-Karim Ibn al-Sam'ani (vol. II, p. 156), in the Dhayl, a work which was composed as a supplement to the Khatib's History of Baghdad (vol. I, p. 75) "He composed poetry in a natural and unaffected style, and wrote down for me some of his verses. When I asked him the date of his birth, he answered: 'In the month of Muharram, 486 (February, A.D. 1093), at Manbaj.'" The same author then gives some of his pieces, one of which is as follows:

There was a clear-complexioned youth, the line of whose 'idhar' [cheek]<sup>1</sup> augmented the trouble and the cares of his admirers. Oceans of beauty undulate in his cheeks and cast ambergris<sup>2</sup> upon their shores. Youth lets its waters flow over his cheeks. So that the borders of those streamlets produce myrtle.<sup>3</sup>

It has come into my mind that there are things to be criticized in this piece: The poet says, in the second verse, that oceans of beauty undulate in his cheeks; why then does he say, in the third verse, that youth lets its waters flow over them? What congruity is there between the water of youth and oceans of beauty? Not content with committing that fault, he represents the water as flowing in streamlets, that is to say, in rivulets; but rivulets are not to be placed on a line with oceans. In the same verse, he compares the 'idhar' to ambergris; why then, in the third, does he assimilate it to myrtle? It is true that poets, when they seek for objects to which the 'idhar' may be compared, have the custom of designating it as ambergris or as myrtle, but they never bring both together in the same piece. At the time in which I studied polite literature, [al-adab], I heard two verses recited which pleased me much; they are by an author whose name I could not learn, and run thus:

O thou who reproachest me with admiring one whose cheeks are encircled with an 'idhar! knew that the fertile and the sterile soils are not to be compared. A sea of beauty undulates on those cheeks and casts ambergris upon its shores.

In the beginning of the year 672 (July-August, A.D. 1273), a volume of the work entitled al-Sayl wa al-Dhayl and composed by the

- 1 For the meaning of this word, I refer to the first volume, p. xxxvi.
- 2 The word ambergris is often employed as the synonym of 'idhar'.
- 3 See introduction to vol. I, p. xxxvi.

katib 'Imad al-Din al-Isfahani as a supplement to his Kharidat al-Qasr (vol. III, p. 303), fell into my hands. In it I found an article on Yahya Ibn Nizar al-Manbaji in which is introduced a piece of ten verses composed by him in praise of the Sultan Nur al-Din Mahmud Ibn Zangi (vol. III, p. 338). As that piece contains the second of the two verses just mentioned, I perceived that the person who versified the idea contained in the second of the three verses above given was the author of those which are inserted in the Sayl. Soon after, I received a visit from my friend Jamal al-Din Abu'l Mahasin Yusuf Ibn Ahmad, generally known by the surname of al-Hafiz al-Yaghmur* and, in the course of our conversation, mention was made of the two verses. On this, he observed that the author of them was 'Imad al-Din Abu'l Manaqib Hussam Ibn Ghozzi<sup>**</sup> Ibn Yunus al-Mahalli (a native of al-mahalla in Egypt) who had settled in Damascus. "I heard him recite them," said he, "and he mentioned that they were of his own composing. "Nay," said I, "the verse containing the idea (which we have remarked) was composed by Yahya Ibn Nizar al-Manbaji; 'Imad al-Din al-Mahalli may have made the first verse for the purpose of introducing the other as citation tadmin as is customary in some cases; but he should have indicated that it was a citation, lest those who read them both might suppose it to be his. Observe that the first verse is not in the piece which yahya al-Manbaji composed in honour of Nur al-Din." At a later period, it struck me that al-Mahalli's piece also was liable to censure: in the verse which prepared the way for the other he says that fertile and sterile grounds are to be compared. Now, these qualities depend upon the presence or the absence of vegetation. Then, in the next verse, he assimilates the 'idhar to ambergris; but what analogy is there between plants and ambergris? The manner of introducing the second verse is therefore faulty. This critical remark is similar to that already made on the piece which consists in three verses.

A number of persons recited to me two (other) verses composed by al-'Imad al-Mahalli and which I here give:

They said to me: "The hair sports with the cheeks of the youth whom you admire;" and I answered: "That is not a defect....The glowing coal of his cheek has burned the ambergris "of his beauty-spot, and the smoke arising from it has formed the 'idhar."

The idea then crossed my mind that the same critical remark

---

* [al-Ya'muri in Cairo ed., p. 294-Ed.]

** [Adi in Cairo ed., p. 294-Ed.]

which I made on the other verses was applicable to these also. Observe that the poet, when told of the hair's sporting with the youth's cheeks, does not disapprove of it, but says: That is not a defect. He therefore admits that the hair was an excellent thing in its kind. Why then does he say in the next verse that the glowing coal of the cheek has burned the ambergris, etc. and that the 'izar was formed of the smoke? What analogy is there between the smoke of ambergris and hair? To express the thought correctly, he should have said to those who spoke to him: That is not hair but the smoke of ambergris.--I had at Aleppo a friend and fellow-student named 'Awn al-Din Abu al-Rabi'ah Sulayman Ibn Baha' al-Din 'Abd al-Majid al-'Ajami, who was a native of that city. He composed two verses in which he came near to the idea above mentioned and which insert here:

When the flame of his cheek appeared to my eyes, my heart flew into it like a moth (into a candle). Burnt by that flame, it formed a beauty-spote and there, on the borders (of the cheek), is the trace of the smoke.

Here the idea is well brought out and cannot incur a censure similar to the preceding, but the poet has fallen into another fault which deserves to be taken up: he represents the 'idhar as the smoke resulting from the burning of the heart, whereas, al-'Imad al-mahalli called it the smoke of the ambergris of the beauty-spot; now, there is certainly a wide difference between the two kinds of smoke; one smells sweetly and the other badly. Our article on 'Abd Allah Ibn Sarah al-Shantarini (vol. II, p. 59) contains two verses in which that poet has expressed a very original idea; he says:

(I think of her) whose waist was so slender and the border (lineaments) of whose beauty so tender (delicate), that my heart was filled with a tender passion. It was not an 'idhar which clothed her cheek but rather a tint cast upon it by the dark pupils of (our) eyes.<sup>4</sup>

The original source of all the pieces of this cast is a poem in which the katib. Abu Ishaq Ibrahim a Sabi speaks of his page Yumn, who was of a swarthy complexion. We have already given it (vol. I, p. 32), but we reproduce here what related to our subject;

---

<sup>4</sup> In the translation already given of this piece and the following, the meaning has been so much softened down and disguised, that the observations here made by our author do not apply to them. It was therefore necessary to render them more literally.

Thou hast a face which my right hand seems to have traced, and words which deceive my hopes. In it is the image of the full moon, but over it have been cast the shades of night.

The thought contained in 'Awn al-Din's two verses comes near to that which is expressed in the following lines, composed by Abu'l Husayn Ahmad Ibn Munir al-Tarablusi (vol. I, p. 140).

Think not that the mole upon her cheek is a tear of blood fallen from my eyes. It was produced by a burning coal from the fire in my heart, immersed in that (cheek), it was extinguished and then rose to the surface.

I have here digressed from my subject and discoursed rather diffusely, but my observations are not devoid of utility.

Abu Sa'd al-Sam'ani says also (in the work above cited): "Yahya Ibn Nizar al-Manbaji recited to me the following verses and gave them as his own:

Had she turned away from me through coquetry or through disapprobation, I should still hope to gain her affection and should forgive her. But, if she rejects me through satiety, I cannot hope to make her relent; it is difficult to mend a glass, once it is broken.

He (Yahya Ibn Nizar) left other fine pieces of verse and expressed (therein) many elegant ideas.

The historical annals compiled by ('Alif al-Din) Abu'l Faraj Sadaqah Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Haddad<sup>5</sup> contain a passage to this effect: "On the eve of Friday, the 6th of Dhu'l-Hijjah, 554 (19th Dec. A.D. 1159), Yahya Ibn Nizar al-Manbaji died at Baghdad and was buried in the Wardiyah cemetery. It is said that he felt a weight (or obstruction) in one of his ears and called in an administrator of theriac (a quack-doctor) to treat him. This operator sucked his ear and drew out of it a portion of the brain; that was the cause of the patient's death." Al-Sam'ani says that he was the brother of Abu'l Ghana'im, the famous merchant. Of the latter he gives an account in a separate article of the Dhayl, and praises him highly.

Imad al-Din al-Mahalli was an elegant and refined literary scholar, if we may judge from the anecdotes told of him. He left some good poetry, consisting of short pieces only, and no qasidahs. He knew by heart the Maqamat (of al-Hariri, see vol. II, p. 490) and explained their difficulties. His death took place at Damascus, on the eve of Wednesday, the 14th of the first Rabi', 629 (9th January, A.D. 1232). He was buried in the Sufi cemetery. His birth is placed, by estimation, in the year 560 (A. D. 1164-5). His early youth was passed at al-Mahallah and, from that place, he drew his surname. The denomination under which he was generally known was that of Ibn al-Jamal. I found among my rough notes, and in my own handwriting, two verses attributed to Wajih al-Din Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn Yahya Ibn al-Hasan Ibn Ahmad, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Zarawi* (vol. II, p. 555) the poet. Here they are:

---

5 See vol. I, p. 290.

Her 'idhar is the smoke of the aloes-wood of her beauty-spot; her saliva, the water of the roses of her cheek.

I then found the following verses attributed to Ibn Sana'al-Mulk (vol. III, p. 589), but they belong, in reality, to As'ad Ibn al-Mammati (vol. I, p. 192):

A brunette who surpasses all others in complexion, in shape and in the sweetness of her lips. Her breath is the vapour arising from the aloes-wood of her beauty-spot; and her saliva is the rose-water of her cheek. Were the moon to write her a letter of compliments, the signature would be "Your humble servant."

I found the following lines attributed to an inhabitant of Aleppo called Muhadhhab al-Din Abu Nasr Muhammad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim Ibn al-Khidr, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Burhan al-Tabari; he was a native of Tabaristan, a calculator and an astronomer:

Her waist was slender, the radiance of her face dazzling and her aspect charming to the eye. With the fire of her cheek the heated the ambergris of her beauty-spot and, from the smoke of that ambergris, resulted the 'Idhar.

I then perceived that al-Mahalli had borrowed his idea from one or the other of those persons just mentioned.

783 YAHYA IBN AL-JARRAH

Abu'l Husayn Yahya Ibn Abi 'Ali Mansur Ibn al-Jarrah Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Muhammad Ibn Daw'ud Ibn al-Jarrah, a native of Egypt--

---

* [Ibn al-Dawri in Cairo ed., p. 297-Ed.]

this addition to the genealogy I found in the handwriting of a literary scholar, but am unable to certify its exactitude, and consider the first (links of the chain) as the surest,—was surnamed Taj al-Din (crown of the religion). During a long time office he was employed as a writer (katib) in the correspondence, under the government of Egypt. He wrote a great deal and in a beautiful hand. His talents, literary acquirements and varied information were of the highest order; his natural genius was fine, his poetry charming and his letters elegant. He heard Traditions in the frontier city of Alexandria, where he had for teachers the hafiz Abu Tahir al-Silafi (vol. I, p. 86) and Abu al-Thana' Hammad Ibn Hibat Allah al-Harrani. Traditions were taught also by him to numerous auditors.

An enigma was composed by him, of which the word was dumluj (دملج), a term serving to designate the object worn by women (the bracelet which encircles the ankle or the upper arm). As this riddle is a remarkable thing of the kind, I am induced to insert it here; it is in prose and runs thus: "What is the thing,<sup>1</sup> which, by inversion, becomes a stone; its face is a moon; if you reject it, it takes patience and goes apart from mankind (or from the skin); if you render it hungry, it will be satisfied with a date-stone; it folds itself around vacuity; if you glut it, it kisses your foot and becomes the companion of your servants (your shoe-ties); if you perfume it, it is lost; if you take it to the bazar, it refuses to be sold; if you let it be seen, it renders (its) possession agreeable (to you) and embellishes the enjoyment (which it procures you); if you double its second (letter) and reject the finals, it troubles life and renders necessary an alleviation from praying; at the time of the 'asr, it causes anguish, at the fajr, it gives (you) alleviation an repose but, to its good termination is joined a bad trace; if you divide it, it prays for you and leaves a thing which, if you are borne upon it, affrights you, thought it aids you to accomplish your wishes, increases your wealth and, by means of that which is a help for the poor, brings about for you a good result. Receive my salutations."

Any person, meeting with this enigma and not knowing the way of solving it, would find great difficulty in clearing it up: I shall therefore give here the elucidations which the subject requires: The

---

1 Most of the words employed in this enigma have a double signification, one which is quite obvious but not appropriate, and the other, appropriate but less generally known. So the expressions of the author are, in themselves a tissue of enigmas. The piece itself is a very poor one and not worth the long commentary in which Ibn Khallikan takes the trouble of explaining it.

words: What is the thing which, by inversion, becomes a stone indicate the terms dumluj (d, m, l, j, bracelet for the ankle or the upper arm), which, being inverted, gives j, l, m, d, (jalmad, stone). The words: whose face is a moon mean that it is as round as the moon. In the expression: if you reject it, it takes patience and goes apart from the skin (b, sh, r), the word bashar is the plural of bashara (the skin of the body); now when it is thrown off, it takes patience and leaves the place where it was. If you render it hungry, it will be satisfied with a date-stone (nuwa); the word nuwa has two significations, namely, remoteness and a date-stone. In the provinces of Iraq, it is the custom to grind down date-stones with ripe or unripe dates and give them as forage to oxen; but here, the author intended to disguise the meaning which he gave to the word: when the dumluj is taken off the arm or the leg, it may be said to be hungry because its belly (or interior) is empty, and to be resigned to its nuwa, or removal from the limb of its owner. People say: "Such a one is satisfied with a nuwa نوى when he is so poor that he cannot procure a morsel to eat and makes up for that by sucking a datestone. This is often done by the inhabitants of Hijaz and of barren countries, when provisions are scarce. The author of the enigma had these two significations in view when he made use of the word nuwa, and, in that, consists the tawriyah (or disguising of the true meaning). In the expression: it folds itself around vacuity,<sup>2</sup> the word khawa means emptiness; and, effectively, when it (the bracelet) has its interior empty, it is really khawi (vacuus). The word glutting, in the expression: if you glut it, it kisses your foot, means putting it on, for the owner, when he does so, has filled its interior, and it is then over the foot, as if it was kissing it. In the words: it becomes the companion of your servants, we find also a tawriyah: khadam (servants) is the plural of khadim and one of those plurals which recur very rarely. The active participle having the form fa'il (which is the type of the form khadim) does not take a pluri'al having the form fa'l (which the type of khadam) except in a few cases which are to be learned (not from rules but) by audition; such, for instance as gha'ib (absent) haris (gardian) and jamid (solid), of which the plurals are ghaiyab, haras and jamad respectively. It is by audition only that these plurals are to be learned. The same word khadam is also the plural of khadama, which means the strap bound round the pastern of the camel and to which is tied the thong which holds the leathern shoe (on the animal's foot). An ankle-bracelet is called a khadama because it is sometimes made of straps inlaid with gold and silver. Another plural of khadamah is khidam. The expression: if you perfume it, it is lost has another meaning which is here disguised (though intended): the word dha', having for its noun of action diya', means to be lost, and signifies, when applied to perfumes, that their odour escapes (and spreads around). The words: if you take it to the bazar, it refuses to be sold, have here another meaning: as the word suq signifies not only the place where things are bought and sold, but also the legs, (the words which signify) taking it to the bazar (mean also) entering the leg into it: It refuses to be sold, because it is customary not to offer for sale an object of that kind until it is taken off the leg; we may therefore say that, before it is taken off, it refuses to be sold. The words: if you let it be seen, it renders its possession agreeable to you and embellishes the enjoyment (which it procures you) are so clear that they require no explanation.<sup>3</sup> If you double its second (letter), which is the m, and reject the final, you obtain the word dummal (boil, impostume), which troubles life by the pain it gives and therefore renders necessary an alleviation from (the fatigues of) praying. At the time of the 'asr, it causes anguish; the word 'asr has a double signification: it designates one of the (daily) prayers, and is also the noun indicating the action expressed by the verb (asar, to press). Here again is a disguising of the meaning, and such is also the case with the word fajr which signifies the dawn of day and is, besides, the noun of action belonging to the verb fajar which signifies to let flow. When a man's tumour is pressed, he feels anguish and trouble, and when he lets the humour run out of it, he obtains alleviation and repose. To its good termination is joined a bad trace; here the author designedly opposes the idea of badness to that of goodness and, no doubt, the discharge of the humour is a good thing and the scar left on the place a bad (or ugly) one. If you divide it, it prays for you; that is, if you cut the word dumluj in two, the first half is dum (endure!), which is prayer that a man may live long. And leaves a thing which, if you are borne upon it, affrights you; what is left is the syllable luj; now, the word lujj means the waves of the sea. In the first case, there is but one j and in the second, there are two; but licenses of this kind are pardoned when they occur in enigmas, conundrums<sup>4</sup> and riddles, and no attention is paid to them. As the sea is a fearful thing, the author said; it affrights you. It sometimes aids you to accomplish your wishes, because you arrive by it at the place to which you wished

2 This idiomatical expression, when taken in its usual signification, denotes that a person supports patiently the sufferings caused by hunger.

3 This phrase is so far from being clear that most of the copyists do not understand it; they write تأخّل in place of جمل and الاتباع or الامتاع in place of الامتاع

4 The word rendered by conundrum is تصنيف. It means in reality, changing the diacritical points of a word; the result of which is that the consonants of the word are changed and its meaning also.

to go; it increases your wealth, because people embark for the purpose of trading. And, by means of that which is a help for the poor, it brings about for you a good result: by the words: that which is a help for the poor, is meant a ship, in as much as God said (Qur'an, sur. 18 verse 78).*: but the vessel belonged to some poor people who worked upon the sea; this vessel was therefore a help for them in their need the manner in which a thing terminates. God knows how far these explication are right.

The word which signifies enigma has eight forms: lughz, lughuz, laghz, laghaz, ulghuza, loghghuza and lughuza.—What we have said here is rather long, but it was requisite that no doubts should be left in the reader's mind. In a collection of pieces drawn up by a man of talent who was one of my acquaintances, I found two verses attributed to Yahya Ibn al-Jarrah and I give them there:

I lift my hand towards my beard, with the intention of plucking out a white hair; but instead of the white one, it takes out a black. Since my own hand does not obey my wish, what must I think my enemies?<sup>5</sup>

He (Ibn al-Jarrah) was born on the eve of Saturday, the 15th of Sha'ban, 541 (21st January, A.D. 1147), and died at Dimyat on the 5th of Sha'ban, 616 (16th October, A.D. 1219). The enemy (the Crusaders under John of Brienne), whose projects may God always confound! were then besieging that place.—Jarrah is to be pronounced with a double r preceded by an a. — The enemy took Dimyat on Tuesday, the 27th of the month just mentioned (7th November), but God knows if this date be right. The Muslims retook it in the month of the latter Jumada, 618 (A.D. July-August, 1221).

I give here a note which I found in the handwriting of the professor and philologist Muhammad al-Din Abu Talib Muhammad Ibn 'Ali, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Khaymi. He was a native of al-Hilla (in Mesopotamia) and had settled in Misr (Old Cairo). He says: "The enemy landed before Dimyat on Tuesday, the 12th of the first Rabi', 615 (8th June, A.D. 1218); they landed on the eastern bank of the (river) on Tuesday, the 16th of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, in the same year (3rd February, A.D. 1219). This fortress was taken on Tuesday, the 26th of Sha'ban, 616 (6th November, and kept them from poverty. The word result (ma'al) means A.D. 1229), and was recovered from them on Wednesday, the 19th of Rajab, 618 (8th September, A.D. 1221). From the time of their landing till that of their departure, three years, three months and seventeen days elapsed. It is a remarkable coincidence that they landed on a Tuesday, blockaded the town on a Tuesday and took it on a Tuesday. According to a tradition, God created on a Tuesday all things disagreeable."

---

* [al-Qur'an, 18 : 79]

5 This passage, though given in the printed editions, is not to be found in our manuscripts.

Dimyat is a Syrian word; its primitive form was Dhamiat (ذميطة) with a point on the d (ذ -), and is derived from -ud-, which means the power of the Lord.<sup>6</sup> This seems an allusion to the junction of the two seas, that of fresh water (the Nile) and that of salt; but God knows best.

784 [YAHYA B. 'ISA] IBN MATRUH

Abu'l Husayn Yahya Ibn 'Isa Ibn Ibrahim Ibn al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali Ibn Hamzah Ibn Ibrahim al-Husayn Ibn Matruh, surnamed Jamal al-Din (beauty of religion) was a native of Upper Egypt (Sa'id). He there passed his youth and, after residing for sometime in Qus, he entered into the civil administration and filled successively various offices till he got attached to the service of the sultan al-Malik al-Salih Abu'l Fath Ayyub, surnamed Najm al-Din (star of the religion). This prince, who was the son of the sultan al-Malik al-Kamil (vol. III, p. 240) and the grandson of al-'Adil Ibn Ayyub, was then acting in Egypt as his father's lieutenant. When al-Malik al-Kamil aggrandized his empire by the adjunction of the Eastern Countries (Iraq, Mesopotamia, etc.) and obtained possession of Amid, Hisn Kayfa, Harran, al-Ruha (Edessa), al-Raqqah, Ras 'Ayn, Saruj and their dependencies, he sent there his son, al-Malik al-Salih, as his lieutenant. This took place in the year 629 (A.D. 1231-2). Ibn Matruh, who was attached to the service of that prince, accompanied him in all his excursions throughout these provinces [al-bilad] and continued to do so till his master returned to occupy the throne of Egypt. Al-Salih made his entry into Cairo on Sunday, the 27th of Dhu'l Qa'dah, 637 (19th June, A.D. 1240). In the beginning of the year 639 (July-August, A.D. 1241), Ibn Matruh came back to Egypt and received from the sultan the intendancy of the treasury. He continued to rise in favour and to 6 The ancient Egyptians called this town Tamiati and the Greeks Tamiathis. The meaning assigned to this name by our author has nothing to support it.

---

gain the good will of his sovereign till the latter obtained possession of Damascus for the second time. This was in the month of the first Jumada, 643 (Sept-Oct. A.D. 1245). Sometime afterwards, the sultan established commissaries (na'ibs) in Damascus, and Ibn Matruh, whom he sent there to act as vizir, rose thus to easy circumstances and an elevated position. Al-Malik al-Salih then set out for Damascus, where he arrived in the month of Sha'ban, 646 (Nov.-Dec. A.D. 1248), and then dispatched an army against Hims (Emessa), for the purpose of taking that city from the commissaries who had been established there by al-Malik al-Nasir Abu'l Muzaffar Yusuf (vol. II, p. 445), surnamed Salah al-Din. This prince was the son of al-Malik al-'Aziz, the son of al-Malik al-Zahir, the son of sultan Salah al-Din (Saladin), and lord of Aleppo. He had taken by force (the city of Hims) from the hands of its former possessor, al-Malik al-Ashraf Muzaffar al-Din Abu'l Fath Musa (vol. I, p. 628), the son of al-Malik al-Mansur Ibrahim and the grandson of al-Malik al-Mujahid As'ad al-Din Shirkuh. As this prince was devoted to al-Malik al-Salih, the latter set out from Egypt with the intention of reinstating him in the possession of Hims. He then took from Ibn Matruh the office which he held at Damascus, and sent him off with the army which was marching against Hims. Whilst al-Malik al-Salih was remaining in Damascus, where he resolved to await the result of the expedition, he received intelligence that the Franks were assembling in the island of Cyprus, with the intention of invading Egypt. He in consequence sent off to the troops which were blockading Hims the order to raise the siege and return to Egypt for the purpose of guarding its territory. The army went back to that country, and Ibn Matruh, who had continued in the service of al-Malik al-Salih, now incurred that sultan's displeasure, for some things which he had done. In the beginning of the year 647, the Franks landed in Egypt and, on Sunday, the 27th of Safar, in the same year (11th June, 1249), they obtained possession of Damietta.<sup>1</sup> Al-Malik al-Salih encamped with his army at al-Mansurah, and Ibn Matruh continued in his service notwithstanding the disfavour shown to him. On the eve of the 15th of Sha'ban, 647 (Nov. A.D. 1249) al-Malik al-Salih died at al-Mansurah and Ibn Matruh went to Cairo (Misr) where he remained in his house till the day of his death. This is but a summary sketch of his history.

He possessed great talents, an amiable disposition and, to his merit and uprightness, he united the most estimable qualities of heart. An intimate friendship subsisted between him and me; when separated from each other, we kept up an epistolary correspondence and, when we met in a fixed abode (the city), we had sittings in which our time was passed in literary and amusing conversation. He composed a diwan of poetry, the greater part of which he recited to me. One of the pieces which I heard from him was a long and elegant qasidah, commencing thus:

---

<sup>1</sup> According to other accounts, saint Louis took Damietta on the 22nd of Safar (6th June).

Here is Ramah (vol. I, p. 200); take to the right of the valley, and let your swords repose in their scabbards; but beware of the glances shot from the large eyes of its maidens! how many lions (heroes) have been struck down by those arms! To him among you who feels sure of his heart (I shall only say that), in that place, I am not sure of my own. My two companions! at the sand-hill, in the (tribe's) reserved grounds, a heart remains in captivity and has no one to redeem it. It was stolen from me on the day of the tribe's departure, by the glances of an eye whose lashes were darkened with collyrium. In the tribe of her for whose love I am dying, are eyes always watching the proceedings of lovers. There also is a sweet-voiced (maiden), with perfumed and honeyed lips, from whom, only for those jealous spies, I should have obtained my will. By what way can a meeting be effected with one who is so closely guarded by bright swords and yellow (shafted) spears? Her flowing hair dwells within a tent of hair, and her beauty always resides in the desert.<sup>2</sup> They guard with the spear her whose waist, so slender and so gracefully bending, resembles the pliant (spear). A female (friend) said to us: The look of hair pendant over her cheek and as straight as the letter alif | being joined to the mim † of her smiling mouth,<sup>3</sup> will heal the thirst of the passionate lover.

The whole poem is very fine, but I limit my choice to this passage, through the necessity of being concise. Another piece of his is the following:

I am attached to a person of the family of Ya'rub, whose glances are sharper and more destructive than the swords of her noble Arab kinsmen. I have lodged her in the recess formed by my bosom, through love for her brilliant teeth and for the sweet water of her lips. Censors! you who blame the languor of her eyes; I am pleased with her very defects. She is pliant (in her movements), though the zephyr passes not by (to bend) her waist;

---

2 The translator may have perhaps mistaken the meaning of this verse.

3 These two letters form the word ma, which signifies water.

she sheds perfume around, yet ambergris breathes not from her bosom.

Being taken ill, in one of his journeys, he stopped at a mosque on the road-side and said:

The doctor may be unable to cure me; so, Thou, O Lord! who healest all woes, heal my illness through Thy gracious bounty. I am detained here as Thy guest, and beneficence towards guests is a quality of the generous.

After his death, these lines were found written on a piece of paper. He related to me that he had, one day, a discussion with Abu'l Fadl Ja'far Ibn Shams al-Khilafat (vol. I, p. 328), respecting a verse contained in a qasidah which had been composed by the latter and which began thus:

Who will bring to me that pliant branch (mai'ien) who is engirdled with eyes<sup>4</sup>, whose qualities, whose lips and whose voice are all sweet? Rich (i.e. large) in haunches, poor (thin) in waist; did you ever hear speak, in the world, of a rich person being poor?

The verse which gave rise to the contestation was as follows:

I say: "O sister of the gazelle!" and she answers: "May the gazelle perish! may it not" serve!"

Ibn Shams al-Khilafat pretended that it was his and that it belonged to one of the qasidahs which were contained in his diwan. Each of the disputants had then a certificate drawn up, attesting the verse to be his, and these documents they had signed by a number of witnesses. Ibn Matruh declared solemnly, that he had composed it, and he was a man very cautious in his affirmations and never known to claim a thing which did not belong to him; but God knows the secrets of all things!

One of my acquaintances recited to me the following lines, declaring that Ibn Matruh had taught them to him and had mentioned that they were by himself.

O thou who hast forced me to put on the raiment of sickness, a sallow complexion marked with the (blood) of tears!

---

<sup>4</sup> The meaning of these words is: on whom all eyes are fixed. The same idea is similarly expressed by al-Mutanabbi in a verse which is given in the next page.

receive the last sighs of a heart which I should have expelled from my bosom, had it not melted away through grief for thy absence.

During the time of his remaining secluded in his house, whilst his mind was preoccupied and his heart saddened at having no longer any place to fill, he caught a disorder in his eyes which finished by nearly depriving him of sight. I used then to visit him very often, but as I was at that time acting as the deputy of the chief qadi and magistrate of all Egypt, whose name was Badr al-Din Abu'l Mahasin Yusuf Ibn al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali, surnamed the Qadi Sinjar, I was under the necessity of suspending my visits for a short period. He therefore wrote to me these lines:

O thou whom my eyes are longing to see; thou, the charms of whose society have never ceased to fill my heart! These eyes and this heart in their present state, are always a dwelling for the moon and for the sun.<sup>5</sup>

The following verses are taken from one of his long qasidahs:

The (admiring) eyes which encircle that queen of beauty form her yataq; she takes our bosom for her tent and, in my heart, she has a sabaq.

The edea expressed in the first verse is borrowed from al-Mutanabbi, who said:

The glances of admirers are fixed upon her waist; so that she is encircled with a girdle of eyes.

Yataq (يطاق) is a Turkish word; it designates the company of soldiers who pass the night around the royal tent, and guard it when the prince is making an expedition.<sup>6</sup> Sabaq سبق means the king's tent; when he is on a march, a tent is sent forward to the place where he intends to halt, so that, on his arrival, he may find every thing prepared and not be obliged to wait till the tent in which he had already stopped is brought up. In the following verses, he introduces, with great elegance, a verse of al-mutanabbi's:

When she smiled and let me sip intoxication from her lips, I called to mind what had passed between al-'Uzayb and 5 There is here an allusion to Ibn Khallikan's title of Slams al-Din (the sun of religion). By the moon is perhaps meant the qadi Sinjar who, as we have, seen, bore the title of Badr al-Din (the moon of religion).

6. The primitive signification of the Turki'h word yataq is bed.

Bariq<sup>7</sup>; her slender stature and the flow of my tears made me think of our (slender) lances couched against the foe and of the rapid course our steeds.

We give here al-mutanabbi's verse, which forms the beginning of a long qasidah:

I called to mind what passed between al-'Uzayb and Bariq: there our lances were couched; there ran, with emulation, our rapid steeds.

Ibn Matruh and Baha' al-Din Zuhayr (vol. I, p. 542) were old friends. Their acquaintance commenced when they were boys and residing in Upper Egypt. They were as two brothers, neither of them having any wordly interest distinct from that of his companion. When they entered into the service of al-Malik al-Salih; they maintained their mutual friendship and carried on a written correspondence in verse, containing an account of whatever occurred to them. Baha' al-Din himself related to me that Jamal al-Din Ibn Matruh wrote to him, one day, for the gift of a darj (a large sheet) of paper, being then in straitened circumstances. They were at that time in the East (Mesopotamia), as I believe. Here are the lines:

Sir! I am in want of a leaf (in Arabic: ورق ; bestow on me a sheet as fair as your reputation. If it comes to me with some Ink (I shall say): "Welcome to the (fair) cheeks and the dark "eye."

Baha' al-Din informed me that the writer had placed two vowel points upon the r of the word w, r, q. 'ورق' so that it might be read either waraq (leaf) or wariq (money), and thus make known his distressed situation. Baha' al-Din answered in these terms:

My master! I send you what you wrote for: a little ink and some wariq. Yet the small quantity<sup>8</sup> of that is precious in my sight, since you compared it to cheeks and eyes.

In the life of Baha' al-Din (vol. I, p. 544) I have given two verses which Ibn Matruh wrote to him and I related, after Baha' al-Din's own statement, the motive which led the author to compose them. Since I wrote that, an accomplished literary scholar arrived in Egypt <sup>7</sup> These are the names of two places in Arabia, but they signify also sweet water and flashing, by which terms poets sometimes designate the moisture of the lips and the whiteness of the teeth.

<sup>8</sup> To obtain the measure and the meaning of this verse, we must read yasiru and I mentioned to him, in conversation, what Baha' al-Din had told me. I said also that he had recited to me the following verse, as having been composed by Ibn al-Halawi (vol. I, p. 544):

You compose verse well and you reward those who praise you in verse. Tell us then whether you are Zuhayr or Harim?.

Here, that person said to me: "The qasidah of which you speak was recited to me by the author, Ibn al-Halawi, when we were in Mosul; but I read the verse in a different manner, for I heard it thus pronounced by him who composed it:

You make verse well and you remunerate those who bring verses to you. Tell us them whether you are Zuhayr or Harim?"*

Ibn al-Halawi may, perhaps have composed this verse in the form given to it by Baha' al-Din and, afterwards, modified it in the manner indicated by the literary scholar; or, perhaps, one or other of these relaters may have made mistake; but the verse is very good, both ways. The history of Zuhayr Ibn Abi Sulama al-muzani<sup>9</sup> is so well known that we need not leave our subject for the purpose of giving a long account of this anteislamic poet. He used to compose poems in praise of Harim Ibn Sinan al-Muzani, a famous Arab chieftain in the times of paganism. Harim frequently bestowed rich presents on Zuhayr and even swore that, every time the poet saluted him, he would give him, out of his property, something very fine, such as a horse, or a camel, or a male slave, or a female slave. Zuhayr, not wishing to be onerous to Harim, never afterwards passed by a company where that chief was, without saying: "Salutation to you all, this morning! with the exception of Harim; the best among you, I leave him out."

Let us resume our account of Ibn Matruh: I have been informed that, before his elevation to power, he wrote a petition to a ra'is (or chief of a government office), requesting him to take charge of a certain affair for one of his friends. The ra'is sent out to him the paper with the following answer written on it: "To arrange such an affair would be a toil for me." To this Ibn Matruh wrote as a reply: "Were it not for toiling etc." The ra'is understood the allusion and did the business. These words belong to a verse of al-Mutanabbi's which runs:

---

* [Harim in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 307-Ed.]

9 For the history of Zuhayr, the author of one of the Mu'allaqah, see, Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes, tome II, page 527 et seq.

Were rank to be gained without toil, every man would be a ra'is; (but they know that) liberality impoverishes, and hardy daring is often fatal.

The hint was really very delicate. Jamal al-Din Abu'l Husayn Yahya Ibn 'Abd al-'Azim Ibn Yahya Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Ali, a learned and highly accomplished philologist, who was generally known by the surname of al-Jazzar al-Misri, recited to me an elegant qasidah which he had composed in honour of Ibn Matruh. It is rather long, so I shall merely give the amatory part of it:

Here is her vernal abode which my should was longing to see again; stop the caravan so that I may fulfil my duty towards that spot (in offering it my salutations). According to the laws of love, it would be disgraceful for me if I treated with ingratitude a place which procured me so much happiness. I shall never forget the nights passed therein with her whom I loved, and those happy hours. If, since their departure, I am become the mere shadow of myself, yet the love which I feel for her has never ceased to be a reality. My friend, sincere and noble! at such a moment as this, the generous man never forgets his friends. Place your hand upon my heart; you may perhaps alleviate its palpitations within my bosom: My eyes have shed torrents of tears, since they last saw this abode of love, and how often have they wept when they saw (from afar) the lightings (of the beneficent raincloud) glimmer over it. They have exhausted the pearls, of their tears, and now, they scatter on the ground their rubies (drops of blood). Stay with me, and tell the caravan to wait: if it will not, let it go forward on its way; this is a country which we can seldom hope to attain, and we have never missed attaining (overtaking) a caravan. How often, in these tracts, have I endeavoured to see her who, when she called her sister, astonished the moon (who thought that the call was addressed to her). The rose is disgraced by the redness of her cheeks and the juice of the grape wishes to resemble (in flavour) the moisture of her lips. For her, beauty is well adapted and has always been so; and real worth has always been adapted to (the character of) Ibn Matruh.

Ibn Matruh was born at Usyut on Monday, the 9th of Rajab, 592 (8th June, A.D. 1196); he died in Old Cairo on the eve of Wednesday, the 1st of Sha'ban, 649 (19th October, A.D. 1251) and was buried at the foot of Mount Muqattam. I was present at the funeral service and the interment. One of his last injunctions should be inscribed on the headstone of his grave:

I am deposited, like a pledge, in the bottom of an excavation, possessing no other wordly good that shroud. O Thou who includest all Thy servants in Thy mercy, I am one of Thy servants who were sinners.

It is stated that, when he had breathed his last, a paper, on which were written the following lines, was found under his head:

Why standest thou in such terror of death, since the mercy of the Lord may always be hoped for? Hadst thou been guilty of every crime which mortals ever committed the mercy of God can extend over them all.

The chief Qadi Badr al-Din Yusuf, he of whom we have spoken above, died in Cairo on Saturday, the 14th of Rajab, 663 (14th June, A.D. 1265), and was interred in the mausoleum which bears his name and lies near the mosque founded by him in the lesser Qarafah cemetery.* He told me more than once, that he was born in the mountains near the town of Arbela and that he drew his descent from a zirzar (or Greek patrician). Usyut is a town in Upper Egypt; some persons suppress the first letter of the name and pronounce it Suyut.

785 [YAHYA B. 'ISA] IBN JAZLAH

Abu 'Ali Yahya Ibn 'Isa Ibn Jazlah, the physician, was the author of the Kitab al-Minhaj, a work drawn up in alphabetical order and containing the names of plants, drugs, medicaments, etc., in great quantity. He was a Christian, but became Muslim and then composed an epistle in which he confuted the Christians, exposed the foulness of their doctrines and extolled Islam. In it he set forth arguments to prove that the latter was the true religion and adduced passages which he had read in the Pentateuch and the Gospel and which spoke of the apparition [ai-Zahur] of Muhammad as a prophet to be sent by God. (According to him, these passages) were concealed by the Jews and the Christians, who never made them public and whose turpitudes he then enumerates. It is an elegant epistle and displays great talent. In the month of Dhu'l Hijjah, 485 (January, A.D. 1093), it was read (by students) under his direction.<sup>1</sup>

---

* [Qarafat al-Sughra in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 309 Ed.]

1 The Arabic may also signify: "it was read (before witnesses, so that it might serve as a proof) against him (in case he relapsed)." This may, perhaps, be what Ibn Khallikan, or his authority, meant.

The manner [sabab: cause] of his conversion was, that he went to study (logic?) under Abu 'Ali Ibn al-Walid the (mu'tazli) whose lessons he attended assiduously and who never ceased exhorting him to embrace Islamism, adducing evident proofs which attested the truth of that religion. This continued till God directed him, and he then became a good Musalman. He studied medicine under Abu'l Hasan Sa'id Ibn Hibat Allah Ibn al-Husayn<sup>2</sup> and profited by that doctor's tuition. He possessed a superficial knowledge of polite literature and wrote a good hand. A great number of works were composed by him for the Imam (khalif) al-Muqtadi bi'amr Allah, such as the Taqwim al-Abdan (regimen of the body), the Minhaj al-Bayan etc. (highway of exposition, treating of the (plants and simples) made use of by man), the Isharah fi talkhis il 'Ibarah (indication concerning the abridgment of the 'ibarah),<sup>3</sup> an epistle in praise of the medical art, demonstrating its accordance with the divine law and refuting the attacks directed against it, an epistle addressed to Alya (Elias?) the priest, when he (the author) became a Muslim. There are other works of his besides the above. He was one of those doctors who were famous for their theroretical knowledge of medicine and for the practice of that art. Abu'l Muzaffar Yusuf Sibī Ibn al-Jawzi (vol. I, p. 439) mentions him in the historical work entitled Mir'at al-Zaman, and says: "When he became a Muslim Abu'l Hasan, who was then qadi of Baghdad, deputed to him the task of engrossing the judgements pronounced in court. He (Ibn Jazla) acted as doctor to the inhabitants of his quarter and the persons of his acquaintance; he took from them no retribution [ujrat] and carried to them gratuitously the potions and medicines which they required. He sought out poor people and made them the objects of his charity. Sometime before his death, he made a waqf<sup>4</sup> of his books and deposited them in the mash-hed (or funeral chapel) of Abu Hanifah (vol. III, p. 555)." All this is mentioned under the year 493 (A.D. 1099-1100), and it was customary with that historian to place each of his biographical notices under the year in which the individual died; his books being drawn up in the form of annals. The author of the work

---

2 Sa'id Ibn Hibat Allah, a celebrated doctor of Baghdad, was employed between the years 470-500 (A.D. 1077-1106), as physician to the khalifs al-Muqtadi and al-Mustathir Billah. Some of his pupils, such as Ibn Jazlah Awhad al-Zaman and Ibn al-Talimid, became highly distinguished -- (Wustenfel's Arabische Aerzte, no. 143).

3 The Isharah and the Ibara treated probably of medicine: Haji khalifah does not indicate them in his Bibliographical dictionary.

4 See vol. I, p. 49.

entitled Kitab al-Bustan al-Jami' li-tawarikh al-Zaman (the Garden being a collection of historical tales)<sup>5</sup> states that Ibn Jazlah died in the year 493, and Abu'l Hasan Ibn al-Hamadani (vol. I, p. 280) informs us, besides, that his death occurred towards the end of Sha'ban (beginning of July, 1100). This indication is borrowed from him by Ibn al-Najjar in the History of Baghdad (vol. I, p. 11). Another author states that his conversion to Islam took place in the year 466, to which Ibn al-Najjar add: "On Tuesday, the 11th of the latter Jumada (11th February, A.D. 1074).--Jazla is to be pronounced with an a after the j; it takes, no vowel after the z, but the l is followed by an a.

786 [ YAHYA B. HABASH ] SHIHAB AL-DIN AL-SUHRAWARDI

Abu'l Futuh Yahya Ibn Habash Ibn Amirak, surnamed Shihab al-Din (flambeau of religion), was a native of Suhraward and a philosopher; the same who was put to death at Aleppo. Some say that his name was Ahmad (not Yahya), and others assert that the surname kunniyah Abu'l Futuh was his real name. Abu'l 'Abbas Ahmad Ibn Abi 'Usaybiah al-Khazraji<sup>1</sup>, the philosopher who composed the 5 This work is not noticed by Haji Khalifah.

1 Abu'l 'Abbas Ahmad Ibn al-Qasim Ibn Khalifah Ibn Abi Usaybi'ah surnamed Muwaffaq al-Din and a member of the Arabic tribe of Khazraj, was born in Damascus, where his father was an oculist and his uncle Rashid al-Din Abu'l Hasan 'Ali, director of the hospital for the treatment of the maladies of the eyes. He studied philosophy under Rida al-Din al-Jili, and profited greatly by the lessons of Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah Ibn Ahmad Ibn al-Baytar, with whom he made a number of botanical excursions. Ibn al-Baytar is the author of the Dictionary of Simples, a deservedly celebrated compilation of which Dr. Sontheimer published a German translation, at Stuttgart, in the year 1840. Ibn Abi 'Usaybi'ah kept up for sometime an epistolary correspondence with the celebrated physician and philosopher, 'Abd al-Latif. In the year 634 (A.D. 1236-7), he got an appointment in the hospital founded at Cairo by the sultan Salah al-Din (Saladin). Some years after, he accompanied the Amir Izz al-Din Aidmor to Sarkhod, in Syria, and he died there, aged upwards of seventy years. His history of the physicians, entitled 'Uyun al-Anba fi Tabaqat al-Atibba (sources of information concerning the physicians of divers classes), contains a number of curious and highly interesting articles. The list of its chapters has been given by Mr. Wustendfeld in his Geschichte der Arabischen Aertze, No. 237, and from that work are taken the indications given here. In the catalogue of the Bodleian library, tome II, p. 131 et seq. will be also found this list of chapters.

work called Tabaqat al-Atibbah (classified dictionary of medical men), gives to this Suhrawardi the name of 'Umar and does not mention that of his father. The true name is, however, the one which I have indicated, in the beginning, and I have therefore placed his article here (among the Yahyas). I found in the handwriting of some persons versed in this branch of science (biography) that such was his name, and I received the same information from a number of other, that exactness of whose knowledge could not be doubted. That fortified my opinion and led me to place al-Suhrawardi's article here. He was one of the most learned men of that age. He studied philosophy and the fundamentals of jurisprudence under the Shaykh Majd al-Din al-Jili, who was then teaching in the city of Maraghah, one of the governments [a'mal] in Adharbaijan, and he continued with him till he attained pre-eminence in these two sciences. This Majd al-Din al-Jili was the professor under whom Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (vol. II, p. 652) studied with such profit and completed his education; he was considered as a great master (imam) in all those branches of science. The author of the Tabaqat al-Atibba' says, in that work: "Al-Suhrawardi was the first man of his time in the philosophical sciences, all of which he knew perfectly well. In the science of the fundamentals of jurisprudence he stood pre-eminent; he was gifted with great acuteness of mind and the talent of expressing his thoughts with precision. His learning was greater than his judgment." He then states that he was put to death towards the close of the year 586, at the age of thirty-six years. At the end of this article we shall give the true date of his death. After this, he says: "It is reported that he was acquainted with the art of simia' (natural magic), and the following anecdote was related by a Persian philosopher who happened to travel with him from Damascus: 'When we reached al-Qabun, a village which lies near the gate of Damascus, on the road leading to Aleppo, we came up to some Turkomans who had with them a flock of sheep. We said to the shaykh (al-Suhrawardi): Master! we would like to have one of those sheep to eat? He replied: 'I have with me ten dirhems (6 shillings); take them and buy a sheep.' We bought one from a Turkoman and proceeded on our journey, but we had not gone far when a companion of this herdsman came up to us and said: Give back the sheep and take a smaller one; for that 2 The Arabic text has here, and farther on, "a head of sheep"; the word, "head" is employed also in English to designate one individual of a species; we say: three head of oxen. In Arabic historians we sometimes meet with the expression: "he brought back many heads of prisoners," which means simply: many prisoners. In Turkish and in Persian expressions of this kind are very common; "three chains of elephant" means three elephants.

---

a fellow (whom you got it from) did not know how to sell it to you; this sheep is worth more than the sum given for it. We talked with him on the subject, and the shaykh said to us, on perceiving what was going on: 'Take the sheep and walk off with it; I shall stay with the man and give him satisfaction.' We proceeded on our way whilst the shaykh entered into conversation with the fellow, endeavouring to tranquillize him. When we had got to a short distance, he left him and followed us. The Turkoman ran after him, calling out to stop, but the shaykh did not mind him. Finding that he could get no answer, he ran up to the shaykh in a passion and pulled him by the left arm, exclaiming: 'Do you mean to go away and leave me thus?' The arm separated from the shoulder and remained in his hand, with the blood running out. Astounded at the sight, and forgetful of what he was about, the Turkoman threw down the arm in terror. The shaykh turned back to the arm, took it up with his right hand and then followed us. The other continued to retreat, and the shaykh kept looking at him till he disappeared. When he came up to us, we saw in his right hand a towel and nothing else.

A great number of similar anecdotes are related of him, but God knows if they be true. He composed some works, such as the Tanqihat (enucleations), treating of the fundamentals of jurisprudence, the Talwihat (elucidations), the Kitab al-Hayakil (book of temples)<sup>3</sup>, the Kitab Hikmat til-Ishraq (the philosophy of illuminism)<sup>4</sup>, and epistle entitled al-Ghurbat al-Gharibah (extraordinary peregrination (?)) and drawn up on the plan of Avicenna's Epistle of the bird [Risalah al-Tayr] (see vol. I, p. 443) and on that of the Hay Ibn Yaqzan composed by the same author.<sup>5</sup> This epistle, which is elegantly written, treats of (What is called) the discourse of the mind (i.e. its ambitious suggestions) and whatever, in the system of the philosophers, is connected with that subject. Here are some of his sayings: "Let your reflection be turned towards such an image of sanctity as may be gratification to the seeker of enjoyment."--"The tracts of sanctity are an abode on whose (floor) the ignorant cannot tread"--"For the bodies darkened (by sin), the realm of the heavens is forbidden. Declare therefore the unity of God and be filled with veneration for Him; remember Him, for you are naked, though clothed in the raiment of existence."--"Were

---

3 This work was probably a treatise on mysticism.

4 For the signification of the word ishraq see my French translation of Ibn Khaldun's Prolegomena, tome III, p. 167.

5 Another work bearing the title of Hay Ibn Yaqzan (or Yaqdhan) was composed by Ibn Tufayl and published by Pocock.

there two suns in the world, its columns would be destroyed."--"The order (of nature) refuses to be otherwise than it is."

"I hid myself and said: 'I am not visible;' and by my effort, I let myself be seen by all things that have being."--"If I was sure that we (and God) were never to meet, I should satisfy my passion in the enjoyment of Salma."<sup>6</sup>

"I implore thee, O Lord! to deliver my subtle part (the soul) from this dense (or "material world)."

Some poems are attributed to him, one of which is on the soul and in the same style as the verses rhyming in 'ayn' which were composed by al-Husayn Ibn Sina and which we inserted in his article (vol. I, p. 443). This philosopher (al-Suhrawardī) said (on the subject):

She divested herself of the temple (the body) at the sand-hill of the park (the world), and aspired with ardour to regain her former abode. Impelled by passionate desire, she turned towards that dwelling-place, that vernal residence of which even the crumbling ruins had disappeared. She stopped to question it, and the echo (or screech-owl) replied: "There is no way (to effect) your meeting." She is like a flash of lightning glimmering over the park, and then disappearing, as if it had not gleamed.

A well known piece of his is the following:

Our souls are always turned towards you with tender affection; to meet with you would be their nosegay and their wine.<sup>7</sup> The hearts of your lovers yearn for you and aspire after the pleasure of that meeting. O how lovers are to be pitied! they must conceal their feelings, and yet their passion betrays them. If they let their secret be known, they risk the shedding of their life's blood; for this only is shed the blood of lovers. Whilst they hide (their feelings), flowing tears tell their secret to the jealous spies. The symptoms of (love's) malady appear in their looks, and that suffices to dispel every doubt concerning them. (Your devoted lover humbly) abases the wing (with indulgence) before him. To meet with you, his heart is always yearning; to please you, his eyes are ever watchful. Replace the darkness of your cruelty by the light of your kindness; your aversion is night, and your

---

6 That is : were I sure that there was no future life, I should indulge in sensual pleasures during this life. --The preceding sentences are evidently borrowed from the Sufis.

7 All this piece has a mystic import: the beloved is God.

benevolence is day. She (the beloved) acted sincerely towards her lover, and their hearts were sincere towards her; the light (shining) from those (hearth) was like a lamp burning in a niche. Their desires are ardent; the hour favour your approach; clear are the goblets (for the feast). My friend! the lover is not to be blamed if the morning shines (if his joy appears) in the horizon of (happy) meeting; lovers are not in fault if their ardour overcomes their secrecy, so that their passion is increased and they reveal it. In risking lives, they knew that such prodigality was (followed by) success. The herald of (mysterious) truths called unto them and, from morning till evening, they continued obedient to that call. Whilst they rode along the way of fidelity, their tears formed an ocean on which the seamen were their passionate desires. By Allah! they sought not permission to approach the door of the beloved, till they were invited thither and had received the key. Never do they find pleasure in discourse of which the beloved is not the subject; all their time is therefore (continued) happiness. They appeared in the (beloved one's) presence, though every sign which could attest the existence of their persons had disappeared, when they saw the beloved, they stood reveled and uttered a loud cry. He (the beloved) annihilated them from before him; the veils of existence which shaded them were removed and their souls were dissolved.<sup>8</sup> Try to resemble them, if you are not like them; to resemble the generous (brings) good success. Arise my boon companion! and bring the wine in its cup! for the goblets have already passed round; (let it be the produce) of the wine of nobleness (drawn) from the tun of piety; let it not be such wine as has been trod out by the husbandman.

He left some other elegant pieces, in prose and in verse; but we need not lengthen this article by inserting them. He was a follower of the rite introduced by al-Shafi' (vol. II, p. 569) and had received the title of *al-Murid* bal-Malakut* (the aspirant who desires the divine glory). He was suspected of holding heretical opinions, of disbelieving in God and of following the system professed by the philosophers of ancient times. These suspicions became so general that, when he arrived in Aleppo, the 'ulama' of the city issued a fatwa in which they declared that he might be slain with impunity; so pernicious did his 8 The ultra-sufi doctrine of the soul's being absorbed into God and of its then losing the consciousness of its individuality is openly declared in this verse.

---

* [mu'cyad in Cairo ed, Vol., V, p. 316 -- Ed.]

opinions appear to them. The most ardent of the assembly for his condemnation were the two shaykhs Zayn al-Din and Majd al-Din, the sons of Jahyal.

The shaykh Sayf al-Din al-Amidi (vol. II, p. 235) relates as follows: "I met with al-Suhrawardi in Aleppo, and he said to me that he should certainly become master of the earth. I asked him how he learned that, and he replied: 'In a dream; methought I drank up the waters of the ocean'. I observed to him that the dream might signify being celebrated for learning, or something of that kind; but I saw that he would not give up the idea which he had in his mind. It seemed to me that he possessed great learning and little judgment."

It is related that when he was convinced that he should be put to death, he often recited these lines:

I see that my foot has shed my blood; my blood is now worthless; alas! of what avail was my repentance?

The idea in the first hemistich is borrowed from Abu'l Fath 'Ali Ibn Muhammad al-Basti (vol. II, p. 314), who said:

My foot bore me towards my death; I see that my foot has shed my blood; I did not cease to repent, but repentance has been useless to me.

This occurred in the reign of the sultan al-Malik al-Zahir (vol. II, p. 443), son of the sultan Salah al-Din (Saladin) and sovereign of Aleppo. Al-Suhrawardi was imprisoned by his order and then strangled, in pursuance to the sultan al-Din's advice. It was in the castle of Aleppo, on the 5th of Rajab, 587 (29th July, A.D. 1191) that the execution took place. Al-Suhrawardi was then eight and thirty years of age.

Baha' al-din Ibn Shaddad, the qadi of Aleppo, speaks of him, towards the commencement of his life of Salah al-Din.<sup>9</sup> After mentioning how orthodox حسن عقيدہ that sultan was in his belief, he enters into a long discourse in which he praises him for the scrupulous observance of his religious duties and then adds: "He ordered his son, the sovereign of Aleppo, to put to death a youth just grown up, whom they called al-Suhrawardi and who was said to be an adversary of the divine law. (Al-Zahir) had him arrested as soon as he was told of it, and acquainted his father with the circumstance. The latter ordered the prisoner to be put to death, which was done."

---

9 See Schulten's Vita et res gestae Saladini page. 7.

The body was exposed on a cross during some days. Sibi Ibn al-Jawzi (vol. I, p. 439) has inserted in his historical work the following statement, which had been made by the same qadi, Ibn Saddad: "On Friday, the 29th of "Dhu'l Hijjah, 587 (17th January, A.D. 1192), after the hour of prayer, the corpse of Shihab al-Din al-Suhrawardi was carried out of the prison of Aleppo, and all the partisans of that man dispersed and left him."

I must here add that, when I was residing in Aleppo, where I passed some years, studying the noble science (the divine law), a great difference of opinion existed among the inhabitants respecting the charter [amr] of al-Suhrawardi. Each of them spoke according to the dictates of his fancy: some declared him to have been a Zindiq<sup>10</sup> and an infidel; others took him for a saint and one of those favoured persons who were gifted with miraculous powers [al-Karamat] they said also that after his death, they had witnessed things (prodigies) which justified their opinion. But the public, in general, considered him to have been an infidel who believed in nothing.<sup>11</sup> May God pardon us our sins, grant us health (of mind) and preserve us from evil in this world and the next! may He permit us to die in the belief of those who know the truth and are rightly directed! The date for his death given here is the true one, though it disagrees with that which I inserted, on another authority, in the beginning of this article. According to a third statement, his execution took place in the year 588, but that indication is of no value.

Both syllables of Habash are pronounced with an a. -- Amirak is a Persian word signifying petty emir, that people add the letter k to the end of nouns in order to form the diminutives.-- We have already spoken of Suhrawardi in our article on the shaykh Abu Najib 'Abd al-Qadir al-Suhrawardi (vol. II, p. 150), and to that we refer the reader.

787 ABU JA'FAR [YAZID B. AL-QA'QA'] THE QUR'AN — READER

Abu Ja'far Yazid Ibn al-Qad'qa' the reader<sup>1</sup>, was a mawla, by 10 The followers of Zoroaster's doctrine were called Zindiqs by the Musulmans; for them, this term is the equivalents of infidel.

11 Al-Suhrawardi was evidently a Sufi, and very far advanced in pantheistical speculations.

1 In the first century of Islamism, the true manner of reading the Qur'an could only be learned by oral instructions. The reason of this has been already given. Vol. I, p. 152.

enfranchisement<sup>2</sup> of 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Ayyash Ibn Abi Rabi'ah al-Makhzumi<sup>3</sup>, and bore the surname of al-Madani (the inhabitant of Madinah). He learned the manner of reading the Qur'an from 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Abbas (vol. I, p. 89), by reciting it under his direction عرصا and received instructions on the same subject from his patron, Ibn 'Ayyash, and from Abu Hurayrah (vol. I, p. 570). He heard it read by 'Abd Allah, the son of 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab (vol. I, p. 567), and by Marwan Ibn al-Hakam (afterwards, the fourth 'Umayyad khalif). It is said that he read the Qur'an under Zayd Ibn Thabit (vol. I, p. 372). Qur'an-reading was taught on his authority by Nafi' Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Abi Nu'aym (vol. III, p. 522) Sulayman Ibn Muslim Ibn Jammaz<sup>4</sup>, 'Isa Ibn Wardan<sup>5</sup> and 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Ziad Ibn Aslam. He is the author of a system of readings. Abu 'Abd al-Rahman al-Nasa'i (vol. I, p. 58) said: "Yazid Ibn al-Qa'qa' is a sure authority. He taught Qur'an-reading to the people in Madinah before the catastrophe of al-Harrah,"<sup>6</sup> Muhammad Ibn al-Qasim al-Maliki said: "Abu Ja'far Yazid Ibn al-Qa'qa' was a mawla of Umm Salamah, one of the Prophet's wives." He said: "Some say that he was the same person as Jundub Ibn Firuz, a mawla of 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Ayyash al-Makhzumi, and that he was a most holy man [afdal al-nas]."

Sulayman Ibn Muslim said: "Abu Ja'far Yazid Ibn al-Qa'qa' informed me that he taught Qur'an-reading in the mosque of the Prophet at Madinah, before the affair of al-Harrah; and that battle

2 See the introduction to the second volume, page IX.

3 Abu'l Harith 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Ayyash Ibn Abi Rabi'ah al-Makhzumi, the Qur'an-reader, is said to have seen the Prophet. He learned the readings from some of the Prophet's companions and taught them to a great number of other persons. It is stated that he was killed, in the service of God, A.H. 78 (A.D. 697-8), in Sijistan; but, by another account, he lost his life subsequently to the year 70 -- (Tabaqat al-Qurra', Ms. of the Bib, imp., ancien fonds, no. 748, fol.8).-- The author of the Nujum says that he was killed in India, A.H. 48 A.D. 668-9).

4 The reader, Abu'l Rabi الربيع Sulayman Ibn Muslim Ibn Jammaz was a mawla of the tribe of Zuhra and a native of Madinah. He generally followed the system of reading adopted by Nafi'-- (Tab, al-Qurra', fol. 34 verso The date of his death is not given.)

5 Abu'l Harith 'Isa Ibn Wardan al-Hadda' الحدا' the camel driver) was a native of Madinah and a reader. He died probably before Nate. --(Tab. al-Qurra', fol. 25 verso).

6 Further on, our author speaks again of the battle of al-Harrah.

(said he) took place towards the end<sup>7</sup> of the year 63, in counting from the time of the Prophet's arrival in Madinah.<sup>8</sup> He was an excellent reader. Every day, I used to look over what he read (tu us) and (thus) learned from him his system of reading. He related to me that, when he was a child, they brought him to Umm Salamah, who stroked his head and invoked God's blessing on him."—"I asked him," said the same Sulayman, "at what time he commenced Qur'an-reading?" and he said to me: "Do you mean teaching it or learning it?" I answered: 'Teaching it;' and he replied: 'O! it was long before al-Harrah; in the days of Yazid Ibn Mu'awiyah (the second Umayyad khalif). The battle of al-Harrah was fought fifty three years after the death of the Prophet."

Nafi' Ibn Abi Nu'aym said: "When the body of Abu Ja'far Yazid Ibn al-Qa'qa' the reader, was washed after his death, they perceived that all the space from the neck to the heart was (smooth and white) like a leaf of the Qur'an, and every one present was convinced that it was the light of the Qur'an (which had produced that appearance)."

Sulayman Ibn Muslim related as follows: "Yazid Ibn al-Qa'qa' told me that, when Nafi' passed near him, he would say: 'Do you see that fellow? When a body still wearing long hair, he used to come and read (the Qur'an) under 'my direction, but he afterwards treated me with ingratitude.' In relating this, he laughed." Sulayman said: "The concubine of Abu Ja'far declared that the whiteness which reached from his neck to his heart became (afterwards) a white spot between his eyes." He related again as follows: "I saw Abu Ja'far in a dream, after his death. He appeared to be on the top of the Ka'bah, and I said: 'Is that Abu Ja'far?' He replied: 'It is I; offer to my brethren a salutation from me and tell them that God has placed me among the living [martyrs*] who obtain regularly a portion (of the Divine favour). Offer my salutation to Abu Hazim<sup>9</sup> and tell him that Abu Ja'far

---

7 The Arabic expression ras al-sanah (the head of the year) means the end of the year. Ibn Khaldun designates the end of a century by the words ras al-miya.

8 The battle of al-Harrah was fought towards the end of the last month of the Muslim year. According to Abu'l Fida, in his Annale, it took place, on the 27th of Zu'l Hijja, A.H.63 (27th of August, A.D. 683).

* Shuhada', here means martyrs in the path of God, who according to the Qur'anic verse are not to be considered as dead. "Nay, they live of finding their sustenance in the Presence of their Lord" Al Qur'an 3: 19.

9 By the surname of Abu Hazim may perhaps be meant a disciple says to him: 'Prudence! prudence! for Almighty God and his angels are present, every evening, at your suitings.'

Malik Ibn Anas (vol. II, p. 545) said: "Abu Ja'far the reader was a holy man "and acted as mufti (casuist) for the people of Madinah."

Khalifah Ibn Khayyat (vol. I, p. 492) said: "Abu Ja'far Yazid Ibn al-Qa'qa' died at Madinah in the year 132 (A.D. 749-750)." According to another tradition, he died in the year 128.

Abu 'Ali'l Ahwazi<sup>10</sup> says, towards the commencement of his treatise on the readings entitled al-Iqna' (the satisfactory): "Ibn al-Jammaz said that Abu Ja'far "never ceased to be for the people their imam (great master) in Qur'an-reading, till the year 133, when he died at Madinah. Some say that his death took place in the year 130, but God knows best."

As al-Harrah has been mentioned in this article more than once and as some readers, not knowing anything about it, may wish to obtain information on the subject, I shall here say that the word harrah : حرّ, in its primitive signification, designates every spot of ground which is covered with black stones. A tract of this kind is called a harrah (the plural of which is hirar); there are a great number of hirars. That which is here mentioned is the Harrah of Waqim, which lies near Madinah, to the east of the town. When Yazid, the son of Mua'wiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan, held the supreme authority, he dispatched against Madinah an army commanded by Muslim Ibn 'Uqbah al-Murri. That chief sacked the place, and the inhabitants, who had gone out to this harrah, engaged in a battle the details of which would take us too long to relate; besides, they are to be found in the books of annals.<sup>11</sup> It is said that, after the catastrophe of al-Harrah upwards of one thousand unmarried girls of Madinah gave birth to children, in consequence of the infamous treatment [fujur] which they had undergone. When Muslim Ibn 'Uqbah had massacred the inhabitants of Muhammad's companions and a Traditionist of good repute whose names were Abu Hazim Salamah Ibn Dinar. He was a native of Medina and a mawla of the tribe of Khazraj. He died A. H. 135 (A.D. 752-3), according to an Nawawi, in his Tahdhib (Wustenfeld's edition, or, in 140, according to the author of the Tuba qat al-Huffaz.

---

10 According to Haji Khalifah in his biographical Dictionary, the author of the treatise on the Qur'an -readings which bears the title of al-Iqna', was Abu' Ali Hasan Ibn 'Ali al-Ahwazi, who died A.H. 446 (A.D. 1054-5).

11 See Abu'l Fida's Annals, tome I, P. 395, and Dozy's Histoire des Musulmans of Espagne, tome I, p. 100 et seq where a full and satisfactory account of this battle is given.

of Madinah, he set out for Makkah and was seized by death at a place called the Thaniyah (or defile of) Harsha (حرشي). On this, he called in Husayn حُصَيْن Ibn Numayr al-Sakuni and said to him: "Come here, you ass!<sup>12</sup> you are to know that the Commander of the faithful ordered me, in case I was on the point of death, to give you the command; and now, that I am dying, I am unwilling to disobey him (though I ought to do so)."<sup>13</sup> He then prescribed to him a number of things which he should execute, after which he said: "If I got to the fire (of hell) after (my good action of) having slain the people of al-Harrah, I shall be very unfortunate indeed!" - Waqim (واقم) is the name of one of the atams of Madinah Al-Utum (الأطم) is a building like a castle and situated near al-harrah that place was (usually) called the Harrah of Waqim.<sup>14</sup>

788 YAZID IBN RUMAN, THE QUR'AN-READER

Abu [Rawh] Yazid Ibn Ruman, the Qur'an-reader!<sup>1</sup> was a mawla of the family of al-Zubayr Ibn al-'Awwam (vol. II. p. 199) and a native of Madinah. He learned how to recite the Qur'an correctly by reading it aloud under the direction of 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Ayyash Ibn Abi Rabi'a al-Makhzumi (see page 162 of this volume), and he heard it read by Ibn 'Abbas (vol. I. p. 89) and 'Urwah Ibn al-Zubayr (vol. II, p. 199). Qur'an-reading was learned from him by Nafi' Ibn Abi Nu'aym (vol. III, p. 522), who read aloud the text under this direction. Yahya Ibn Ma'in (see page 24 of vol. IV) declared that Yazid Ibn Ruman was a sure authority. Wahb Ibn Jarir<sup>2</sup> stated that his father related to him as follows: I saw Muhammad Ibn Siah (vol. II, p. 586) and Yazid Ibn Ruman counting on their fingers the number of verses from the Qur'an which they recited during the prayer.<sup>3</sup> Yazid Ibn Ruman 12 Literally : You ass packsaddle !

13 See Dozy's Hist. des Musulmans d'Espagne tome I, page 127.

14 The text of this passage is probably incorrect: if translated literally, it would signify : which place was therefore called the Harrah of Waqim. It is here rendered in a manner which excludes the absurdity.

1 See. Vol. I, p. 152, note. 1.

2 Abu'l -'Abbas Wahb Ibn Jarir, a traditionist of Basra, died A.H. 206 (A.D. 821-2), (Tabaqat al Huffaz: Nujum.)

3 When the Musulman performs the ceremonies of the canonical related as follows: "I was praying by the side of Nafi', the son of Jubayr Ibn Muta'im<sup>4</sup>, and he made me a sign to prompt him; and we were then praying<sup>5</sup>. He stated also that, in the time of (the khalif) 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, the people made twenty-three prostrations during the prayer, when they were in the month of Ramadan.<sup>6</sup> Yazid Ibn Ruman died in the year 130 (A.D. 747-8).
(Contd. on the next page)

789 YAZID IBN AL-MUHALLAB

Abu Khalid Yazid al-Azdi was the son of al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Sufrah. We have already mentioned his father under the letter M (vol. III, p. 508), and, as we have there traced up and spoken of his genealogy, we need not repeat our observations here. Ibn Qutaybah (vol. II, p. 22) states, in his Kitab al-Ma'arif, and a number of other historians also relate as follows: "Al-Muhallab, on dying, designated Yazid as his successor. The latter was then thirty years of age. 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan (the Umayyad khalif) dismissed Yazid from office by the advice of al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf al-Thaqafi (vol. I, p. 356), and appointed in his place, as governor of Khurasan, Qutaybah Ibn Muslim al-Bahili (vol. II, p. 514). Yazid then fell into the hands of prayer, he must recite, in a low voice, at least three verses of the Qur'an. Devotees repeat even a whole chapter or a considerable number of verses, ten, twenty, one hundred, etc, each time. It appears from the anecdote here related, that counting on the fingers the number of the verses, as they are recited, was authorized by the example of two very eminent doctors, although it was probably considered as an irregular proceeding.

---

4 Quray shite, Jubayr Ibn Mut'im al-Nawfali, one of the companions, embraced islamism subsequently to the battle of Badr, and then accompanied Muhammad in some of his expeditions. His authority as a Traditionist is acknowledged by al-Bukhari and Muslim. He was one of the most learned of the Quray shite chiefs. His death took place at Medinah, A.H. 54 (A.D. 673-40, according to the author of the Nujum, and of the Tahdhib al-Asma' Nafi', the son of Jubayr, was considered as an imam of great merit and a learned and sure Traditionist. He died A.H. 99 (A.D. 717, 8) --(Tahdhib).

5 This anecdote seems adduced to prove that the Musulman, in reciting a portion of the Qur'an during the prayer, may have himself prompted by his neighbours, in case his memory fails him.

6 These prostrations are made in addition to those which are required in the ordinary form of prayer. The Hanafites make twenty; the Shafites, thirty-six. We learn here that, in the time of 'Umar, twenty-three was the usual number.

al-Hajjaj." I must here make some observations: Al-Hajjaj, who was married to Hind, the sister of Yazid and the daughter of al-Muhallab, had conceived a great dislike for his brother-in law, as he apprehended, from what he saw of his noble character, that the place which he then filled might, one day be occupied by Yazid. So, to protect himself against his attacks. He never ceased to ill-treat him. He was always consulting astrologers and other persons who cultivated the art (of divination), in order to learn by whom he should be succeeded, and they used to answer: "By a man named Yazid." He was then governor of the two Iraqs and saw no one capable of replacing him in that office except this Yazid. And thus it fell out; on his death, Yazid obtained the command. So say the historians.

Let us now resume our extract from the Ma'arif and finish it. "Al-Hajjaj inflicted tortures on Yazid who at length escaped from prison and went to see Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, who was then in Syria. That prince interceded with his brother (the khalif) al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, and obtained a free pardon for Yazid. This put a stop to al-Hijaj's conduct towards the latter. When Sulayman obtained the khalifate, Yazid received from him the government of Khurasan and then took (the cities of) Jurjan and Dihistan. Having set out for Iraq, he learned about the death of Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik and proceeded to Basra where he was arrested by 'Adi Ibn Artat أرتات who bound him in chains and sent him to 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz. Yazid was imprisoned by that khalif, but, having effected his escape, he went to Basra. On the death of 'Umar, he revolted against the new khalif, Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, who then sent against him his brother Maslamah (Ibn 'Abd al-Malik). This general slew Yazid (on the field of battle)."

The hafiz Abu'l Qasi, generally known by the surname of Ibn 'Asakir (vol. II. p. 252), says, in his greater historical work: "Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab, had been appointed to govern Basra in the name of Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. Some time after, 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz conceived a dislike for him and was still incensed against him when 'Adi Ibn Artat, to whom he had given the government of Basra, brought Yazid to him." Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab taught some traditions which he had learned from Anas Ibn Malik (vol. II, p. 587), 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz and his own father al-Muhallab. Traditions were handed down on his authority by his son 'Abd al-Rahman, by Abu 'Uyaynah the son of al-Muhallab, by Abu Ishaq al-Sabi'i (vol. II, p. 392) and by others.

Al-Asmi'i, (vol. II, p. 123) related that al-Hajjaj, having arrested Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab, inflicted on him grievous tortures and would not consent to suspend them unless he received, every day, from the prisoner, the sum of one hundred thousand dirhems ( £ 2.500). When the money was not paid in, al-Hajjaj put Yazid again to torture, that very day, and continued to torment him till the night set in. One day, Yazid had collected one hundred thousand dirhems, for the purpose of bying off that day's tortures, when the poet al-Akhtal<sup>1</sup> came in to him and said:

Abu Khalid! Khurasan has perished since your departure, and the needy all exclaim: "Where is Yazid?" Since you are gone, the two Marws. The throne of government has no splendour since your absence; beneficence has ceased and there is no generous man to shower down his gifts.

By the two Marws, the poet meant Marw al-Shahjan, which is the greater, and Marw al-Rud, which is the lesser. They are both well-known cities of Khurasan. We have already spoken of them in this work (vol. I, p. 50).

"On this," says al-Asma'i, "Yazid gave the poet the one hundred thousand dirhems, and al-Hijjaj, being informed of the circumstance, sent for him and said: 'Native of Marw! art thou still so generous, though in such a state? well I shall hold thee quit of the tortures of this day and of those which follow it.'" So the anecdote is related by Ibn 'Asakir, but the mere received opinion is that the author of the verses, he to whom this happened, was al-Farazdaq (vol. III. p. 612); and I since found the verses in the collected poetical works of Ziad al-A'ajam (vol. I, p. 631) God knows best!

The same hafiz (Ibn 'Askir) related as follows: "When Yazid fled from al-Hajjaj and went to find Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, who was then at al-Ramlah he passed, on his way through Syria, by the tents of some Arabs and said to his servant boy: 'Go to those people and ask them to give us a drink of milk.' When the milk was brought, he drank it and said: 'Give them one thousand dirhems ( £ 25).' The boy observed to him that these people did not know who he was (and that he need not give them so much); and he replied: 'But I know who I am; give them the thousand dirhems.' And that was done." The same author says: 'Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab made the pilgrimage and (to conclude the rites and ceremonies) he sent for a barber to shave his head. When the operation was finished, he ordered him a recompense of one thousand dirhems.' And that was done." The man was amazed and astounded, but at length said: 'With this sum

---

1 See vol. III, p. 138. note

I shall go and ransom from slavery my mother, such a one.' Yazid said: 'Give him another thousand'. The barber exclaimed: 'May my wife be divorced from me if I ever shave any one's head after this!' 'Give him two thousand more,' said Yazid."

Al-Mada'ini said: Sa'id Ibn 'Amr Ibn al-Asi<sup>2</sup> bore a fraternal affection to Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab. When 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz caused the latter to be imprisoned and gave orders that no person should be allowed to see him, Sa'id went to him and said: "Commander of the faithful! Yazid owes me the sum of fifty thousand dirhems, but you hinder me from seeing him; will you permit me to go and exact from him the payment?" The khalif consented, and Sa'id entered into the chamber of Yazid, who was rejoiced to see him, "How did you get in?" said he. Sa'id informed him of the stratagem. "By Allah!" exclaimed Yazid, "you shall not go away without that sum." Sa'id refused, but Yazid declared in the most solemn manner that he should accept the money and sent to his house for fifty thousand dirhems which he gave to him. Another, author in relating this anecdote, adds: A poet said on that subject:

I never saw a noble prisoner give presents to a visitor, except Yazid. He bestowed fifty thousand on Sa'id Ibn 'Amr, who went to see him; and the money was paid down without delay to Sa'id.

Abu'l Faraj al-Mu'afah Ibn Zakariya al-Nahrawani (vol. III, p. 374) relates, in his Kitab al-Aris wa 'l-Jalis, an anecdote which learned from 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Kufi and which we insert here: Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik (the 'Umayyad khalif) required from 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah<sup>3</sup> the payment of one million of dirhems (£ 25,000), out of (what the latter had gained in) his expeditions on sea. 'Umar (not being able to pay that sum) went to see Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab<sup>4</sup>, who had been appointed governor of Iraq and took with him 'Uthman Ibn Hayyan al-Qa'qa' القحطاع Ibn Khalid al-'Absi, al-Hudhayl Ibn Zufar al-Kilabi and some other persons belonging to (the tribe of) Qays. When

---

2 This Sa'id must have been the son of the conqueror of Egypt, but I can find no information respecting him.

3 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah<sup>1</sup> Fazari was one of the most active generals and provincial governors whom the Umayyad had in their service. He died in the year 106 (A.D. 724-5).

4 The recital which follows is omitted in the edition of Bulak. I give it after three manuscripts and indicate the corrections which should be made in the lithographed text of Wustensfeld. The piece is curious, as it offers specimens of the sententious and elliptical style of speaking for which the ancient Arabs were remarkable.

they arrived at the door of Yazid's pavilion, the chamberlain obtained permission to introduce them (adhana lahum al-hajib) and informed them that his master was washing his head. Yazid, at length came in, threw himself upon his bed and then said: "What has brought you all together?" Uthman replied: "Here is our shaykh and master, Ibn Hubayrah; al-Walid (the late khalif) furnished him with money and troops when he was about undertaking an expedition on sea, and a debt of one million of dirhems is now made out against him. We therefore said: Yazid is the chief of the Yamanites, the vizir of Sulayman and the lord of al-Iraq; he has delivered from similar difficulties persons who were far from being similar to us. By Allah! if the wealth of the tribe of Qays had been sufficient, we should have taken the payment upon ourselves." Al-Qa'qa' then spoke and said: "Son of al-Muhallab! this is an excellent affair sent to you by God, and no one deserves such a favour more than you. Act therein according to your former doings; let not stint or parsimony hinder you from fulfilling this duty; we have come to you with Ibn Hubayrah, on account of debt with which he is loaded. Give therefore to us our money and hide our shame from the Arabs." Al-Hudhayl Ibn Zufar then spoke as follows: "Son of al-Muhallab! had I found a pretext for not coming to you, now that you have riches in Iraq. I should have stayed away. You once came to us when you feared danger and you remained with us a guest: did we then allow you to retire in sorrow? By the right hand of God! though we left (neglected to visit) you when you were in Syria, we have now come to you (anatiannak) in Iraq; that (distance) is only a short step and renders indispensable the fulfilling of our duty (towards you)." Ibn Khayth-mamah then spoke and said: "I shall not repeat to you, son of al-Muhallab! what the others have just said: (for their words would give me to understand) that you (anna anta) are not strong enough to deliver Ibn Hubayrah from his burden; and on whom then could we count? By Allah! the case is not so (and I shall merely say that) the tribe of Qays is not in a situation to help him; their went is insufficient, and the khalif will grant him no respite" Ibn Hubayrah then spoke and said: 'As for me, my affair is done if my request succeed, and (I am done for) if it be rejected; since I find no one (to whom I could think of applying), either before or after you. This business did indeed preoccupy my mind, but (I am convinced that) you have already arranged it." On hearing these words, Yazid laughed and said: "Hesitation is the brother of avarice; there shall be no difficulties raised (by me); judge (for yourselves and say how much you require)." Al-Qa'qa' said: "The half of the sum," and Yazid replied: "I take charge of it. Boy! let us see what there is for breakfast." The repast was brought in and we (said the narrator) let our disappointment appear to him more than we were aware of (jankarna mahu akthar mimma 'arafna). When we had finished (falamma faraghna), he ordered us to be perfumed and arrayed in handsome robes.

The narrator continues his recital thus: We then withdrew and, as we passed (the door), Ibn Hubayrah said: "Tell me who, after Ibn al-Muhallab, will take charge of paying the remainder? God has (surely) reduced your credit and your influence! By Allah! Yazid knows not the difference between half and whole; for him one is the same as the other. Go back and speak to him of what remains (to be paid)."

The narrator continues in these terms: Yazid suspected that they would come back to him for the entire sum, and he therefore told the chamberlain to admit them, if they returned. When they came and were introduced, Yazid said to them: "If you regret your agreement, I shall cancel it, and if you think the sum which I offered too little, I shall increase it." Ibn Hubayrah then said: "Son of al-Muhallab! when a camel is heavily loaded, his very ears are a weight for him; and I am heavily loaded with what remains for me to pay." Yazid replied: "I take the whole burden on myself." He then rode to Sulayman and said: "Commander of the faithful you established me in authority for the purpose of attaining your ends through my means; I hesitate at nothing, as long as the money (which you furnish me) is sufficiently ample; but I have not now in my hands even the least trifle belonging to you, wherewithal I may render services (to the needy) and (thus) erect movements of (your) generosity; were you not there to help me, the undertaking of the smallest thing would cripple me." He then said: Ibn Hubayrah has come to see me, with his principal companions. Sulayman (here interrupted him and) said: "Take care and touch not the money which belongs to God (the money of the state); that man is all duplicity and cunning, a collector (of wealth) and a refuser (of it to others), a deceiver and a miser, a man to be avoided. And what did you do?" Yazid answered: "I undertook to pay his debt (kal: hamaltu anhu." "You were in the wrong)," said Sulayman; "you should have carried the money (kal: ahmilu) to the public treasury." "By Allah!" replied Yazid, "I did not take charge of it with the intention of defrauding (the state); I shall carry the money to the treasury tomorrow." This he did, and Sulayman, being informed of it, sent for him. When he saw him (come in), he laughed and said: "It is for you that my fire has burned and that my tinder-box gave out sparks (ذكت بلد ناري ووريت بك زناري)." The charge is for me and the honour for you. My oath (that the cash should be paid in) is fulfilled قدوفت لي يميني. Go now and take back your money". This he did.

Yazid said, one day: "By Allah! I prefer life to death and an honourable reputation to life; could I obtain a gift never yet granted to mortal, I should wish to have an ear by means of which I might hear what people say of me after my death." We have mentioned this saying in the life of his father al-Muhallab (vol. III. p. 508), to whom we attributed it, and not to Yazid; God knows best!

Abu'l Hasan 'Ali al-Mada'ini (vol. I, p. 438), said: "One of Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab's intendants sold, for the sum of forty thousand dirhems ( £ 1,000), the melons produced in one of that emir's farms. When Yazid was informed of the circumstance, he said to the intendant: 'You have converted us into greengrocers! were there not old women enough in the tribe of Azd among whom you might have shared them?'--'Umar Ibn Laja<sup>5</sup> the poet praised Yazid in the following terms:

Trace up the genealogy of the Muhallabs; you will find them all, from father to son, noble and generous. How many the envious who detested them unjustly for their merit, and who could not reach, nor even approach, the height to which that family has risen by its virtues. But you always see illustrious chiefs exposed to envy whilst no one envies the vile. Were it said to Glory: 'Turn from them and leave them; since thou art all-powerful in the world; she would not obey. Noble sentiments are souls of which no men but the Muhallabs are the bodies.

Al-Asma'i relates that some members of the tribe of Quda'ah went to visit Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab, and one of them recited to him these verses:

By Allah! If the request which we address to you fails, we know not to whom we can direct our prayer. We have travelled over many lands and found none but you who had the reputation of being generous. Persevere in the conduct to which you have accustomed us; or, if not, tell us towards whom we shall go.

He ordered one thousand dinars to be given to the poet, who, the following year, came back and said:

Why are the doors of other men abandoned whilst yours is crowded like a market? Is it through affection that they come to you or through respect? or did they leave distant countries in search of a pasturage, announced by the lightnings of

---

5 'Umar Ibn Laja was a contemporary of the poet Jarir, whom he sometimes satirized. -- (Ibn Durayd's Ishtiqaq.)

beneficence which they saw flashing from your hands? I know that you take pleasure in noble deeds and that those who did so are very few.

Yazid ordered ten thousand dirhems to be given to the poet. Persons versed in history all agree that, under the Umayyads, the most beneficent family was that of the Muhallabs, and, under the 'Abbasids, that of the Barmikids. God knows best! They displayed great bravery in many famous conflicts.

Ibn al-Jawzi (vol. II, p. 96) relates, in his Kitab al-Azkiya (book for the intelligent), that a serpent fell (from the roof of a hovel) upon Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab and that he did not push it away; on which, his father said to him: "You have lost your judgment in retaining your courage." When 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays al-Kindi took up arms against al-Hajjaj--the history of this event is well known<sup>6</sup>--he went to Tustur where many persons joined him and, mention being made of the Muhallab family, much abuse was directed against its members. On this, 'Abd al-Rahman said to Harish Ibn Hilal al-Quray'i<sup>7</sup>, who was one of the company: "What is the matter with you, Abu Qudamah? why do you not speak out your mind? and received from him this answer: "By Allah! I know of none who are so careful of themselves as they when they are in easy circumstances, and so indifferent for their personal safety when they are in distress."

'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Sulaym al-Kalbi went to visit al-Muhallab and, seeing that all his sons, from the eldest to the youngest, were on horseback he said to them: "May God accustom the Muslims to see a continual series of you; by Allah! though you are not grandchildren of the Prophet, you are grandchildren of a malhamah.<sup>8</sup> Habib, one of al-Muhallab's sons, lost a male child and charged Yazid to recite the funeral service over the corpse. On this, some person said to him: "Why do you confide that duty to your brother? are you not his elder and is not he that is dead your son?" Habib replied: "My brother is honoured by the people; he bears a high reputation among them, and all the Arabs have their eyes fixed on him. I should regret to abase that (reputation) which God has exalted."

6 The fullest account which we have of 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn al-Ash'ath's revolt is given by Price, in his Retrospect of Mahomedan History, vol. 1 p. 455 et seq.

7 This Harish belonged to the tribe of Tamim and was one of their bravest warriors. He distinguished himself highly in Khurasan. -- (Ibn Durayd's Ishtiqaq.)

8 These last words appear to mean: you are a band which will bring about a catastrophe.

Mutarraf Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Shikhkhir<sup>9</sup>, seeing, one day Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab walking about in a silk robe, of which the train swept the ground, said to him: What meaneth this manner of walking? it is odious to God and to his Prophet!" "Dost thou know me?" said Yazid. "I do," replied the other, "thy commencement was a filthy drop (of sperm), thy end shall be a nasty carcass, and, during the interval, thou weariest the excrement (of a worm)."—This thought has been versified in the following manner by Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah Ibn Muhammad al-Sami, a native of Khurasan.

I gazed with wonder on him who was proud of his shape and who, before that, was but a nasty drop. To-morrow, when that handsome shape is gone, he will be a filthy carrion in the earth. Nay, with all his self-love and pride, he carries excrements between his flanks.

The hafiz generally known by the surname of Ibn 'Asakir (vol. II. p. 252) says, in that article of his greater historical work which treats of Abu Hirash Mukhallad, the son of Yazid Ibn al-Mukhallad: "This Mukhallad was one of those whose liberality procured them universal praise. He went to see 'Umar Ibn Abd al-'Aziz for the purpose of speaking to him in favour of his father: who had been imprisoned by that khalif. He had been appointed by his father to the government of Jurjan. On his way, he passed near Kufa and there received the visit of Hamzah' Ibn Bayd al-Hanafi<sup>10</sup>, who came to him with a number of the inhabitants. This famous poet then stood before him and recited these verses:

We have come to you for an affair which we request you to arrange; say to us: 'Welcome!' so that another welcomer may answer you. Refer us not to people who, when they make a promise, tell a lie. You are the head of a family before whom the East and the West have bent in submission and under whose care you were educated; excellent, I declare, were the lessons which they gave. In your eleventh year, you possessed that wisdom which is required but by hoary chieftains; your thoughts

---

9 Mutarraf Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Shikhkhir was the son of one of the Prophet's companions. He died subsequently to the year 87 (A.D. 706). —(Ibn Qutaybah's Ma'arif.) From what is related of him here, he seems to have been a rigid and puritanical Muslim.

10 The poet Hamzah Ibn Bayd al-Hanafi was a native of Kufa. He celebrated the praises of al-Muhallab, of that emir's sons and of the qadi Bilal Ibn Abi Burda. The gifts which he received for his eulogiums were immense. — (Kitab al-Aghani.)

were always turned towards serious affairs, whilst the thoughts of those as old as you were fixed on sport and play. You were so beneficent that I exclaimed: 'Does there yet remain a petitioner to ask a favour? an applicant who has something to demand? From you, gifts flowed upon solicitors, and also from those in your antechamber, when their generosity was invoked.

'Let me hear your affair' said Mukhallad. He immediately arranged it and then ordered one hundred thousand dirhems (£ 2500) to be given to the poet".

A man who had already visited Mukhallad and received from him a present adequate to his deserts, went to see him again, and Mukhallad said to him: "Did you not already come to us, and did we not make you a gift?" "It is true;" replied the visitor. "What then," said Mukhallad, "has brought you back?" "Those words," replied the man, "which al-Kumayt (vol. III. p. 373) pronounced, in speaking of you:

He gave, then gave again; we returned to him and he gave; then I returned, and he renewed his gift. (This happened) many times. I never return to him but he receives me with smiles and treats me with honour.<sup>11</sup>

His reply obtained for him that made it a gift double of the former."

Qabisah Ibn 'Umar al-Muhallab related as follows: "Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab effected the conquest of Jurjan and Tabaristan, and took prisoner one of their great chiefs named Sul."--I may here observe that this Sul was the prince of Jurjan and the grandfather of two celebrated and good poets, Ibrahim Ibn al-'Abbas al-Suli (vol. I, p. 22) and Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn Yahya al-Suli (vol. III, p. 68).--Yazid found there a great quantity of treasure and other valuable objects. He therefore wrote to (the khalif) Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik a letter in which he said: "I have taken Tabaristan and Jurjan, places which none of the Chosroes dynasty and none of their successors had ever been able to conquer. I am sending you so many files of camels<sup>12</sup> loaded with money and presents that, when the first of them reaches 11 The expression here rendered by treating with honour signifies literally: doubling the cushion: which was done probably for the purpose of seating the visitor more commodiously. It occurs again in the article on Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah.

12 The manuscripts all read قطار This plural from of the word قطار is not mentioned in the dictionaries.

you, the last will be still here with me." 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, who succeeded to the khilafat on the death of Sulayman, required of Yazid the fulfilment of this promise and cast him into prison. Mukhallad, the son of Yazid went to intercede with 'Umar in favour of the prisoner. Qabisah continues thus: "From the time of Mukhallad leaving the city of Marw Shahjan till he reached Damascus, he gave away in presents one million of dirhems ( £ 2,5000). When he was about to appear before 'Umar, he put on a suit of shabby clothes (which he tucked up), and a dirty old cap.<sup>13</sup> 'Umar, on seeing him, said: 'I perceive that you have tucked up your clothes;' to which Mukhallad replied: 'If you tuck up yours or let them hand down, we shall do the same.' He then addressed him thus: 'You have extended your clemency to 'all men; why then keep you this man in prison? If there be a legal proof of his culpability, adduce it and then pronounce sentence; if not, make him take oath (that he is not guilty), or else be reconciled with him on condition of his giving up to you all his landed estates.' Yazid, on hearing this, exclaimed: 'As for the oath, it shall never be said by the Arabs that Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab, was obliged to take one by necessity; as for my landed estates, they are of sufficient value to pay what is claimed of me.' Mukhallad died at the age of twenty seven years and (on this occasion) 'Umar said: 'Had God meant well towards the father, he would have left this youth with him.'

It is stated that Mukhallad died of the plague. The funeral service was recited over him by 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, who said, on finishing: 'To-day is dead the most gallant youth of all the Arabs.' He then pronounced the following lines of a poet, applying them to the circumstance:

Our souls are going off in sighs for the loss of 'Amr, and the faces of all the people are darkened and soiled with dust."

An elegy, composed on his death by Hamzah Ibn Bayd al-Hanafi, the poet above mentioned, contains the following lines:

The thrones (of state) will no longer be occupied by you; and, to-day that your (grave) clothes only, (not your chamberlains,) prevent you from being seen, the only throne on which you repose is the bier.<sup>14</sup> The last time we saw you was at Dabiq, on 13 The austerity of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, his detestation of worldly pomp and his rigid piety are well-known.

---

14 The word sarir signifies throne and bier. The poet employs it here in the two meanings.

the day in which they poured upon you the crumbling mould (of the grave).

Al Farazdaq (vol. III, p. 612), said, in an elegy on his death:

Never did the bier which they carried off hold the like of Mukhallad! Never did grave-clothes cover a man like him. Thy father is one whose name sufficed to put a hostile squadron to flight, though in it (every lance-head)<sup>15</sup> was fully a span in length. The foe knew that, when he girded his loins, he was the lion of the forest that never fled from danger بالمعرد

The passage given above proves that Mukhallad, the son of Yazid, died on or about the year 100 (A.D. 718-9), for 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz was raised to the khilafat in the month of Safar, A.H. 99 (Sept. Oct. A.D. 717) and died in the month of Rajab, 101 (Jan. Feb. A.D. 720).<sup>16</sup> It was in 'Umar's residence that he expired. Hamzah's elegy proves also that Mukhallad died at Dabiq, which is a village situated in the government of Aleppo, and to the north of the city. It gives its name to a large meadow (marj) in the neighbourhood. Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik died at that place and there also is his tomb, a well-known monument.

Let us resume our account of Yazid. Abu Ja'far al-Tabari (vol. II, p. 597) says, in his great historical work: "Al-Mughirah, the son of al-Muhallab, acted as his father's lieutenant at Marw, and held the government of that city and of the province." He died in the month of Rajab, 82 (Aug.-Sept. A.D. 701), as we have said in the life of al-Muhallab when this news reached Yazid, he told it to the military (chiefs) but kept it from al-Muhallab's knowledge; preferring that he should learn it from the women. Al-Muhallab, hearing their lamentations, asked what was wrong and, being informed that al-Mughirah was dead, he exclaimed: 'From God we came, and to God we must return!' His grief was so excessive that he let it appear, and was reprimanded, for that reason, by one of his domestic officers. He then called in Yazid and sent him off to Marw, after giving him instructions for his conduct. During all this time, his tears were trickling down over his beard. Al-Hajjaj wrote to him a letter of condolence for the loss of al-Mughirah, who was truly an able chief."—I may here mention that al-Mughirah had a son named Bishr of whom Abu Tammam (vol. I, p. 348) speaks in the first part of his 15 This parenthesis is supplied by conjecture.

16 This passage is important in a philological point of view: it proves that the expression في خلود signifies on or about.

Hamasa (p. 119), and some of whose poetry he inserts in that work. One of these pieces, composed by him on (his uncle) Yazid, we here give:

The amir (al-Muhallab) has treated me ill and so did al-Mughirah; Yazid also has turned his back upon me. All of them have got (governments) wherewith to sate their appetite; yet it is disgraceful for a man to be sated when his companion suffers from hunger. Use me gently, dear uncle, and employ me when an untoward event arrives; time (as you know) is an assemblage of vicissitudes. I am your sword and, though swords may sometimes rebound (without cutting), yet the sword of a man like me will never rebound, to the detriment of your cause. At what door shall I ask permission to enter, if I be replied from the door of which I was the guardian?

Let us return to al-Tabari's narration: "On the day of al-Mughirah's death, al-Muhallab was stopping at Kish (or Kiss), in Transoxiana, being engaged in r with the people of that place. Yazid set out with sixty horsemen and met, in the desert, with a body of five hundred Turks. A desperate conflict ensued, and Yazid was wounded in the thigh by an arrow. After that, al-Muhallab made peace with the inhabitants of Kish, on receiving from them a (sum of money, as) redemption. He then left them and set out for Marw. On arriving at Zaugh ul, which is a village in the government of Marw al-Rud, he was attacked by pain in the bowels. He then called in Habib and such of his other sons as were with him. Some arrows, tied up so as to form a bundle, were brought in, by his order, 'What think you?' said he, 'could you break them all, now that they are tied together?' They answered that they could not. 'And if they were separated?' 'Certainly', said they, 'We could break them.' 'Such,' continued he, 'is the effect of union!' He then made them a long exhortation."--which it is needless for us to repeat here, and finished by saying: 'I nominate Yazid as my lieutenant appoint Habib to the command of the jund (the Arab troops), until he led them to Yazid, whose authority they will all acknowledge. His son al-Mufaddal then said: 'Had you not placed him at our head, we ourselves would have done so.' Habib received his dying injunctions and, after saying the funeral prayer over the corpse, he proceeded to Marw. Yazid wrote to 'Abd al-Malik, informing him that al-Muhallab was dead and had chosen him as his successor."

This nomination was confirmed by al-Hajjaj, who afterwards, in the year 85 (A.D. 704), revoked it and gave the government to al-Mufaddal. Yazid's brother. His motive for so doing was this: Having gone (some years before) to visit (the khalif) 'Abd al-Malik, he passed on his way back by a monastery at which he halted. Being then informed that a very old and learned Christian was residing there, he had him brought in and said to him: "Tell me, shaykh! do you find in your books any thing concerning you and us?" "I have," replied the other; "we find therein all that has already happened to you and the mention of your present state and of what it will be." "Are we designated by our names or are we merely described?" "All is described without being named, but there is a name without description." "What description do you find of the Commander of the faithful?" "We find that, for the time in which we are, he is a bald sovereign before whom every one who stands in his way must fall prostrate." "What do you find next?" "A man named al-Walid",<sup>17</sup> "And what then?" "A man whose name is that of a prophet and by whom God will display his power to men." That was Sulayman, the son of 'Abd al-Malik. "Do you know what will happen to me?" "I do" "Who will succeed to me in the authority?" "A man called Yazid." "Will that be in my life-time or after my death?" "I do not know," Do you know his description?" "He will act with perfidy; that is all I know." the person (who related this anecdote) said: Al-Hajjaj was struck with the idea that the person thus indicated was no other than Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab and, during the remainder of his journey, which required seven days, he never ceased thinking of the old man's words. On his arrival, he wrote to 'Abd al-Malik, requesting permission to resign the government of Iraq and received from him a letter containing these words: "I see very well what your intention is; you wish to discover how you stand in my opinion." He then vainly employed every means for the purpose of bringing about Yazid's deposition, till one of al-Muhallab's cavalry officers, named al-Khiyar Ibn Sabrah and who was then in the service of Yazid, came to see him and was asked by him how that amir was getting on. Al-Khiyar replied: "His obedience (towards the khalif) and the mildness of his administration are most exemplary." "That is a fib!" exclaimed al-Hajjaj, "tell the truth." His visitor then said: "God alone is greater and more mighty than he; he has saddled (the steed of independence) and has put no bridle on (to restrain it)." "You now speak the truth!" replied al-Hajjaj, and at a later period, he gave to al-Khiyar the government of 'Uman (in Arabia, or of 'Amman, in Palestine?).<sup>18</sup> He then wrote to 'Abd al-Malik, blaming his conduct of

---

17 The son and successor of 'Abd al-Malik.

18 Khiyar was put to death at 'Uman by Ziad, the son of al-Mahallab.-- (Ishtiaq.)

Yazid and of all the Muhallab family; in short, the addressed him so often on that subject that he received from him a letter containing these words: "You are always speaking against Yazid and the family of al-Muhallab; point me out another man capable of governing Khurasan. Al-Hajjaj named Maja'ah (or Mujja'h) Ibn Sa'd al-Sa'di. To this, 'Abd al-Malik returned the following answer: "The same motive which impels you to effect the ruin of the Muhallab family has induced you to propose Maja'ah Ibn Sa'd. Look out for a man of decision, and capable of executing your orders." Al-Hajjaj sent him the name of Qutaybah Ibn Muslim al-Bahili (vol. II, p. 514) and received for answer: "Appoint him." When Yazid learned that al-Hajjaj had effected his deposition, he said to the members of his family: "Who, do you think, will receive from al-Hajjaj the government of Khurasan?" They answered: "Some man of (his own tribe) the Thaqif." "Not at all!" replied Yazid, "one of you will receive from him a letter appointing him to that place and, when I am gone to meet him (and am in his power), he will replace that person by another, and Qutaybah Ibn Muslim is the fittest man." The narrator of this anecdote said: When al-Hajjaj obtained from 'Abd al-Malik the authorisation to depose Yazid, he felt that he would do wrong if he announced to him by a letter that the command was taken from him, and therefore wrote to him a dispatch in which he said: "Leave (your brothers) al-Mufaddal as your lieutenant and come here." Al-Husayn الحسين Ibn al-Mandir, whom Yazid consulted on receiving this letter, advised him to give a pretext for remaining where he was. "Because," said he, "you stand very high in the good opinion on the Commander of the faithful. This is a stroke aimed against you by al-Hajjaj. If you delay your departure, I am in hopes that the khalif will write to him the order to confirm you in your post." To this Yazid replied: "We are of a family whose fidelity (towards the khalifs) has always been for it a benediction; I detest disobedience and opposition to orders." He then commenced making preparations for his departure. Al-Hajjaj, thinking that he delayed too long, wrote these words to al-Mufaddal, Yazid's brother: "I have appointed you to the government of Khurasan." Yazid, whom al-Mufaddal then pressed most earnestly to depart, said to him: "Al-Hajjaj will not leave you in place, once I am gone; his only motive in acting as he does is the fear of my resisting his orders." "You are mistaken" replied al-Mufaddal, "and are jealous of my good fortune." "I am not jealous of you," replied Yazid, "and that you shall soon have reason to know." In the month of the latter Rabi' 85 (April-May, A.D. 704) Yazid left Khurasan, and al-Hajjaj replaced al-Mufaddal by Qutaybah Ibn Muslim. Husayn Ibn al-Mundhir, or according to another statement, Firuz Ibn Husayn, said, in speaking of Yazid:

I advised you to take a decided step, but you would not hear me; and now, that you are stripped of your commandment, (al-amarat) you regret (your folly). But I shall not weep for you through fondness, neither shall I pray that you return home safely.

When Qutaybah Ibn Muslim arrived in Khurasan, Husayn was asked by him what he had said of Yazid and he made the following answer:

I advised you to take a decided step, but you would not hear me; blame then yourself, if you mean to blame. If al-Hajjaj learns that you resist his orders, you will find that his power is overwhelming.

Qutaybah then asked him what was the advice he gave, and Husayn replied: I told him not to keep a single yellow or white (piece of money), but to send them all to the emir (al-Hajjaj)."

The following verses by 'Abd Allah Ibn Hammam al-Saluli were composed on the replacement of Yazid by Qutaybah.

We said, Qutaybah! the morning you came here. "Assuredly, we have got in you a one eyed substitute for Yazid. Your father in no way resembled al-Muhallab; your (family) compared to his, is mean and despicable. Wide is the difference between one who rose to fortune by castanets and one who brandished the sword amidst the fires of war. Here come the squinting Bahilites under whose domination liberality has perished and infamy flourishes.

The expression a one-eyed substitute (badal a'war) is figuratively applied to a man generally despised who succeeds, in office, to one who always deserved praise. They say also, in the same sense: a one-eyed successor (khalaf a'awar). The word castanets alludes to the fact that Qutaybah, in his youth, was a (public dancer and) player on those instruments. Qutaybah is here called a squinter (ahwal), and so he was; the plural form of this adjective is analogous to those of aswad, ahmar, etc which are sudan, humran. Some say that these verses were composed, not by 'Abd Allah Ibn Hammam, but by Nahar Ibn Tawsi'ah al-Yashkuri.<sup>19</sup>

Al-Tabari says, under the year 90 (A.D. 708-9): "Al-Hajjaj went forth against the Kurds, who had occupied the entire province of Farz.

---

19 Nahar Ibn Tawsi'ah was one of al-Muhallab's favorite poet. He died A.H. 103 (A.D. 721-2).

He took with him Yazid and his brothers al-Mufaddal and 'Abd al-Malik. When he encamped, he had them placed in a tent, near his own lodgings and under a guard of Syrian troops; this tent was surrounded with a sort of ditch. He exacted from them a sum of six million (£ 150,000) and put them to the torture (in order to enforce payment). Yazid suffered those pains with such firmness as provoked the anger of al-Hajjaj. It is said that he (Yazid) had been wounded by an arrow, the head of which remained in his thigh, and that, if any thing touched him there, he would cry out; even if it was moved in the slightest manner, he would utter a cry. Al-Hajjaj ordered him to be tormented and receive strokes on the thigh. This was done; Yazid cried out and his sister Hind, who was then with her husband al-Hajjaj, heard the cry and began to scream and to lament. On this, al-Hajjaj divorced her. He afterwards let them alone and began to ask money from them. They commenced furnishing it and, during that time, they made arrangements for effecting their escape. Having sent to (their brother) Marwan Ibn al-Muhallab, who was then in Basra, they told him to put torsos at their disposal and to give the public to understand that he meant to offer them for sale; they bade him also ask so high a price for them that no one would buy them. 'They will be for us, said they, 'a means of escape, if we succeed 'in getting out of this place.' Marwan did so, whilst his brother, Habib, also was undergoing tortures at Basra. Yazid then ordered a copious repast to be served to the guards and had them provided with wine. Whilst they were drinking and unmindful of their charge, he put on the clothes of his cook, placed a false white beard over his own and went out. One of the guards saw him and said: 'That is Yazid's manner of walking.'<sup>20</sup> He then went up, looked at him in the face, --it was in the night, and seeing the white beard, he turned away, saying: 'This is an elderly man.' Al-Mufaddal followed his brother without being remarked and they went to a boat which was kept ready for them in the swamps (al-Bataih) by their directions. They were then at the distance of eighteen parasangs from Basra. When they reached the boat, they waited for 'Abd al-Malik who had met with something to detain him, and at length Yazid said to al-Mufaddal: 'Get into the boat with us and let him follow.' To this, al-Mufaddal, who was born of the same mother as 'Abd al-Malik, replied: 'By Allah! I shall not stir from this spot till my brother comes, even should I be taken back to prison.' Yazid stopped till 'Abd al-Malik came up; they then embarked and voyaged the remainder of the night, until daybreak. The next morning, the guards discovered that their prisoners had escaped and sent to inform al-Hajjaj of what had happened. He was 20 Yazid had been lamed by an arrow.

---

dismayed at the news and, imagining that they had fled in the direction of Khurasan, he sent off, by the post horses, to Qutaybah Ibn Muslim, a dispatch in which he gave him warning of their approaching arrival, ordered him to make preparations for resisting them and to send messengers to the commanders of all the districts (quran) and frontier stations, enjoining them to hold themselves in readiness and to keep a look-out for the fugitives. He sent also another dispatch to (the khalif) al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, informing him of their evasion and expressing his opinion that they intended to go to Khurasan, and not elsewhere. He continued thinking of what they intended to do and would sometimes say: 'I am sure that Yazid's mind prompts him to act like Ibn al-Ash'ath.'--I may here observe that Ibn al-Ash'ath whose names were 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Muhammad Ibn al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays, of the tribe of Kindah, revolted against 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan. His history is well known and is to be found in the books of annals.

When Yazid (and his companions), says al-'Tabari, "drew near to al-Bataih"<sup>21</sup>, the horses which had been kept in readiness were brought to them, and they rode off with a guide who took the way which crosses (the desert) of al-Samawah. Two days later, al-Hajjaj learned that they were on the road to Syria, that their horses were fatigued with the journey and that a person had seen them travelling towards the desert. He immediately sent off this news to al-Walid. Yazid continued his route till he reached Palestine and there he stopped at the dwelling of Wuhayb Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman al-Azdi, a person whom Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik (the khalif's brother) held in high esteem. Wuhayb took his guest to Sulayman and said: 'Here is Yazid; his brothers are at my house; they have 'fled hither from al-Hajjaj and they seek refuge under your protection.' 'Bring them to me,' said Sulayman, 'I answer for their safety. He (al-Hajjaj) shall 'never lay hands on them, as long as I live.' Wuhayb brought them and thus placed them out of danger. Al-Hajjaj then wrote to al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, saying: 'The family of al-Muhallab have defrauded the treasury; they escaped from me and are now with Sulayman.' When al-Walid knew that Yazid was with Sulayman, his uneasiness of mind was diminished to a certain degree, but he was greatly incensed at the loss of the money and therefore wrote to his brother Sulayman, asking where Yazid was. 'He is with me,' replied Sulayman, and I have engaged myself for this safety. He owes no more than three millions of the six which al-Hajjaj required of them.

---

21 The immense marshes which extend from Basra to the Persian gulf were called the Bataih.

They have paid three and owe three, which I shall take upon myself.' Al-Walid returned this reply: 'By Allah! I shall not pardon him till you send him to me chained.' To this, Sulayan answered: 'If I send him to you, I will go with him; but, for God's sake! do not dishonour me or bring me into disgrace.' Al-Walid wrote back as follows: 'By Allah! if you bring him to me, I shall not forgive him.' Yazid then said (to Sulayman): 'Send me to him; by Allah! I do not wish to raise enmity and hostile feelings between you and him, or to let you and your brother gain a bad reputation on my account. Send me to him; let your son come with me and write to him (the khalif) as mild a letter as you can.' Sulayman dispatched his son Ayyub with him and, as al-Walid had ordered the prisoner to be brought in chains, he said to his son: 'When you enter into the khalif's presence, appear before him bound in the same chain as Yazid.' When they reached the place where al-Walid was, they appeared before him in that state and the khalif, on seeing his brother's son attached to the same chains as Yazid, exclaimed: 'By Allah! we have offended Sulayman!' The youth (Ayyub) then handed him his father's letter and said: 'Commander of the faithful! may my life be laid down to save yours! do not cast dishonour on my father, you who are our natural protector; do not deprive us of the hope that people shall always continue to expect safety under the protection of us who are so closely allied to you; do not disappoint those whose hope to gain honour in becoming attached to us who derived our honour from you.' He then read his father's letter, which ran as follows: 'To the servant of God, al-Walid Commander of the faithful; for, Sulayman, the son of 'Abd al-Malik. Here is the point: Commander of the faithful I certainly think that, if an enemy who revolted against you and resisted were to solicit my protection and place himself under my safeguard, you would not dishonour my guest and bring my right of protection into discredit; how then should it be if the person whom I received as my guest had always been devotedly obedient to your will and rendered, not only he but his father and all the members of his family, the most signal services to Islamism. I have now sent him to you and, if you wish (taghzu) to come to a rupture with me, to annul my credit as a protector and to injure me in the gravest manner, you have the power of doing so and may do it. But I implore you, in God's name! to avoid a rupture, to refrain from casting a blemish on my honourable reputation and to continue the kindness and friendship which you have hitherto shown me. By Allah! Commander of the faithful! you know not how long my life and yours may endure, neither do you know when death shall part us. If the Commander of the faithful, whose happiness may God prolong! be inclined to retard the moment of my death, to act kindly towards me, to respect my rights and to abstain from hurting me, I pray him to do so. By Allah! Commander' of the faithful! there is nothing in the world, after my duty towards God, in which I find more delight than in your good will and your happiness; it is by deserving your benevolence that we all hope to obtain the favour of God. Commander of the faithful! if you deign, even for a single day, to give me joy, to be friendly towards me, to maintain my honour and to respect my rights, you will pardon Yazid for my sake, and all you reclaim of him shall be paid by me.'

When this letter was read, the khalif said: 'We have been too severe on Sulayman.' He then called his nephew over to him, and Yazid began a speech in which, after extolling the Almighty and praising the Prophet, he said: 'Commander of the faithful! we appreciate to the utmost degree the kindness you have always shown us; others may forget favours, but we, never; others may be ungrateful, but we cannot'. The toils which we have undergone in the service of your noble family, the strokes we have inflicted on your enemies in many great battles, both in the Eastern countries and in the West, are surely good titles to your benevolence.' The khalif then made him sit down, granted him a full pardon and left him free. Yazid returned to Sulayman, and his brothers tried to raise the money which was claimed of him. Al-Walid wrote to al-Hajjaj, saying: 'I did not attempt to touch Yazid and the members of his family, because they were with Sulayman (and under his protection). So do you let them alone and cease writing to me about them.' When al-Hajjaj received this letter, he discontinued his attacks against them and even renounced to one million of dirhems which were owing to him by Abu 'Uyaynah (another of al-Muhallab's sons). He also set at liberty Habib, the son of al-Muhallab. Yazid passed nine months with Sulayman, enjoying agreeable life and great tranquillity of mind. His protector never received a present (of money), but sent him the half of it.

Being asked by one of his usual companions why he did not build a house for himself, he replied: 'What should I do with it? I have always dwelling ready prepared for me.' 'Where is that dwelling?' said his friend. He answered: 'If I hold a commandment, I will be in the government palace; and if I be out of it I will be in the state prison.' He said also: 'I should feel no pleasure in being free from worldly cares and having fortune submissive to my will;' and, being asked his reason, he answered: 'Because I should detest adopting lazy habits.'

It the month of Shawwal, a.H, 95 (June-July A.D. 714) and subsequently to these events, al-Hajjaj died. Some say that his death took place on the 25th of Ramadan, and that, he had then reached his fifty-third or fifty-fourth year. When he was on the point of death, he charged Yazid Ibn Abi Kabshah to replace him in the administration of the two cities (al-Misran), that is, of Kufa and Basra and to take the direction of military affairs and the presidency of the public prayer. To Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim (see next article) he confided the administration of the land-tax (kharaḡ). Those two nominations were confirmed by al-Walid, who approved also of all the other appointments made by al-Hajjaj. According to another account, it was from al-Walid himself that they received their appointment. Al-Hajjaj held the government of the two Iraqs during twenty years.

Al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik died on Saturday, the 15th of the latter Jumada, A.H. 96 (25th February, A.D. 715) at Dayr Maran." I may observe that this monastery is situated on the slope of Qasiun, the mountain which lies near Damascus. He was buried in the cemetery outside the gate called Bab al-Saghir:

Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik was proclaimed khalif on the day of his brother al-Walid's death and, in that year,--I mean the year 96, --he took the government of Iraq from Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim and gave it to Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab. Khalifah Ibn Khayyat (vol. I, p. 492) says: "In the year 97 (A.D. 715-6), Yazid untied in his own hands the commandment of the two cities,"--meaning Kufa and Basra. God knows best, "Salih Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman received from him the administration of the land-tax with the order that he should put to death the members of the 'Aqil<sup>22</sup> family, that to which al-Hajjaj belonged. He, in consequence, arrested them and then put to the torture, under the direction of 'Abd al-Malik, the son of al-Muhallab."

Al-Walid intended to have taint from Sulayman the right of succeeding to the khalifate and of transferring it to his own son 'Abd al-'Aziz. Al-Hajjaj had taken a solemn engagement to second the khalif and so also did Qutaybah Ibn Muslim al-Bahili, the same who replaced Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab in the government of Khurasan. When Sulayman obtained the khalifate, Qutaybah was apprehensive that his government would be taken from him and given to Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab. He therefore wrote to Sulayman congratulating him on his accession, condoling with him on the death of al-Walid, mentioning the services which he himself had rendered to the state and vaunting his fidelity to 'Abd al-Malik and al-Walid. He then added that he would be equally serviceable and obedient to the new khalif, provided that the government of Khurasan were not taken from him. He addressed to him also another letter in which he spoke of the conquests he had effected, of his elevated position and of his influence over the foreign kings, said he, are filled with terror "at my name." He then attacked the sons of al-Muhallab and declared solemnly that if Yazid was named governor of Khurasan, he himself would repudiate the authority of the khalif. In a third letter he declared that he had repudiated his authority. These three dispatches he sent off by a man of his tribe to whom he gave the following instructions: "When the khalif has read the first letter, he may probably hand it to Yazid, if the latter be present. In that case, give him the second letter and, if he hand it also to Yazid, after reading it, give him the third. If, on the contrary, he reads the first letter and put it up without passing it to Yazid do not give him the two others (but keep them up)." The narrator says. Qutaybah's messenger arrived, found Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab with Sulayman and delivered the first letter to the khalif who read it and passed it to Yazid. He then gave the second letter which was read and passed also to Yazid. On this, he gave the third. Sulayman read it, changed colour and, having called for (sigillary) clay, he sealed it up and kept it in his hand.

---

22 According to Ibn Durayd, in his Ishtiqaq, the name عقیل should be pronounced 'Aqil. In the life of al-Hijjaj (vol. I p. 366), it has been transcribed 'Uqayl. In the genealogy given there Ibn 'Uqayl must be replaced by Ibn Abi 'Aqil.

According to Abu 'Ubaydah Ma'mar Ibn al-Muthannah (vol. III, p. 388), the first letter contained an attack on Yazid, accusing him of perfidy, ingratitude and thanklessness; in the second was an eulogium on the same person and, in the third, were written these words: "If you do not confirm me in the place which I now occupy and give me the positive assurance then I have nothing to fear from you, I shall cast off your authority as I cast off my slippers, and shall certainly fill it (the land) with horse and foot to attack you." Sulayman then ordered Qutaybah's messenger to go down to the guest house and, when the evening set in, he sent for him and gave him a purse of dinars (gold pieces), saying: "This is to requite your trouble and here is a diploma "containing your master's nomination to the government of Khurasan; set out, and a messenger of mine shall accompany you." The Bahilide (Qutaybah's emissary) departed with the khalif's messenger and, on reaching Hulwan, they were told by the people that Qutaybah had revolted. On this, Sulayman's agent turned back after delivering the diploma to Qutaybah's man, who pursued his journey. When Qutaybah saw the messenger, he consulted his brothers on the line of conduct which he should follow, and they replied: "After what has occurred here, Sulayman can no longer have any reliance on you." Some time after, Qataybah was slain, as we have related in our account of him (vol. II, p. 516); this occurrence we mentioned in a summary manner, because the details would have led us too far.--Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab, having then obtained the government of Iraq, reflected (on the state of that province) and said to himself: Iraq has been ruined by al-Hajjaj; the people of that country place all their hopes in me yet, if I go there and begin to exact the payment of the kharaj (land-tax), I shall be obliged to act with great severity, become (for them) as bad as my predecessor and plunge then into a civil war. God forbid that I should bring down upon them again the afflictions from which He has just delivered them, and yet, if I did not furnish to Sulayman the same amount (of revenue) as he received from al-Hajjaj, he would reject what I send though it came from me." He therefore went to the khalif and said: "I can point out to you a man who well understands the administration of the kharaj and to him you might confided that duty. His name is Salih Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman, and he is a mawla of the tribe of Tamim." Sulayman replied: "I accept your recommendation" Yazid then set out for Iraq, whither Salih had preceded him and was then stopping at Wasit. On drawing near the town, he met all the inhabitants, who had gone forth to receive him, but Salih did not appear till he had nearly reached the place. It was only then that Salih set out, preceded by (a guard of) four hundred Syrians. He returned to the town with Yazid and, on entering, said to him: "There is a house which I have cleared out for you." Yazid stopped there, and Salih proceeded to his own residence. (From that moment) he stinted Yazid (in money matters) and would not allow him to meddle, even in the slightest degree (with the finance department). Yazid caused one thousand tables to be got ready, so that he might give a repast to the inhabitants; Salih took them from him (and did not restore them) till Yazid said: "Write down the expense to my own account." Yazid purchased a great quantity of objects and, having drawn bills on Salih for the amount, he sent to have them cashed. They were not accepted, and the bearers returned to Yazid who go into a passion and said to himself: "This is my own doing." Soon after, he received the visit of Salih and made room for him on his own seat. "What are those bills?" said Salih, "the kharaj administration cannot take charge of them; a few days ago, I accepted a bill of yours for one hundred thousand dirhems ( £ 25,000) and I have already advanced you the amount of your salary. Other sums you asked of me, and I gave them. Matters cannot go on so; the Commander of the faithful will never approve of these proceedings and you will be certainly called so an account." Yazid replied, in laughing: "Come now, Abu'l-Walid! accept these last bills," and wrought him into a so good humour that he said: "Well I shall I accept them, but do not draw too many on me." "I shall not." replied Yazid."

Sulayman, having given to Yazid the government, not of Khurasan but of Iraq, said to 'Abd al-Malik, the son of al-Muhallab: "How would you act were I to appoint you to the government of Khurasan?" 'Abd al-Malik replied: "Commander of the faithful! you would always find me acting according to your wishes. The khalif then turned the conversation to another subject, and 'Abd al-Malik sent to some of the military chiefs in Khurasan, who were attached to him, a letter in which he said that the Commander of the faithful had offered to him the government of that province. Intelligence of this reached Yazid, who was disgusted with the government of Iraq on account of the restraint in which he was held by Salih, with whom he found that he could do nothing. He therefore called in 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Ahtam and said to him. "I want your advice concerning an affair which preoccupies my mind, and wish you to free me from the uneasiness it gives me." Ibn al-Ahtam answered: "I shall obey whatever order you are pleased to give." Yazid then spoke to him in these terms: "You see in what restraint I am kept here and may imagine the annoyance which it gives me. Now, the government of Khurasan is vacant and I have been informed that the Commander of the faithful spoke of it to 'Abd al-Malik Ibn al-Muhallab, Is there any means (by which I might obtain it)" "There is, most certainly;" replied the other, "send me to the Commander of the faithful and I am sure that I shall return here with your appointment to that post." "It is well," said Yazid, "but be careful not to speak of what I have told you." He then wrote a letter to Sulayman in which he described the state of Iraq and praised highly Ibn al-Ahtam, as being a man perfectly well acquainted with the affairs of Khurasan. He authorised Ibn al-Ahtam to travel by post and gave him thirty thousand dirhems (£ 750). Ibn al-Ahtam was seven days on the road. On arriving, he went to Sulayman's residence with the intention of delivering to him Yazid's letter. Being introduced, he found him at breakfast and therefore sat down in a corner of the room. Two (raasted) pullets were then brought to him and, when he had finished eating, Sulayman said to him: "You shall have an audience later, do not miss it." One third (of the day) had passed, when the khalif sent for him and said: "Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab informs me by his letter that you are well acquainted with the state of Iraq and of Khurasan, and he speaks of you with commendation. How did you acquire your information respecting these countries?" Ibn al-Ahtam replied: "No man knows them as I do; I was born and brought up in Khurasan."—"Ah!" said Sulayman, "the Commander of the faithful is in great want of a man like you, whom he may consult respecting these two provinces. Whom would you recommend as a fit person to govern Khurasan?" Ibn al-Ahtam replied: "The Commander of the faithful knows whom he would like to appoint; if he deign to name the person, I shall tell him whether he is fit for the place or not." Sulayman mentioned a man of the tribe of Quraysh, and the other said: "That is not the man for Khurasan." The khalif then named 'Abd al-Malik, the son of al-Muhallab. Ibn al-Ahtam replied: "He will not answer till he knows how to levy a body of troops."<sup>23</sup> Among the last whom the khalif named was Waki' <sup>دكح</sup> Ibn Abi Sud. "Commander of the faithful" said the other, "Waki' is a man of great bravery, decision and gallantry, but he is not of that (county) and, besides, he has never commanded a body of three hundred men and has always been under the orders of a superior." "You say true," replied Sulayman, "but come now, tell me who is the fittest man." Ibn al-Ahtam answered: "One whom, I know, but whose name you did not produce." "Who is that?" said the khalif, "I shall not mention his name unless the Commander of the faithful promise to keep the secret to himself and to protect me against the ill-will of that person." "I promise it to you," said the khalif, "Name him." "Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab," replied Ibn al-Ahtam. The khalif said: "But that man is in Iraq and prefers residing there to being in Khurasan."—"You know him well, Commander of the faithful!" replied the other, "but you may oblige him to accept and authorise him to leave a lieutenant in Iraq when he is about to set out."—"You have hit on it! exclaimed Sulayman. He then had a diploma drawn up, by which Yazid was constituted governor of Khurasan, and, to it he joined a letter in which he said: "Ibn al-Ahtam is, as you mentioned, a man of intelligence, piety, talent and judgment." Ibn al-Ahtam received the letter with the diploma and, after a journey of seven days, he rejoined Yazid "What news do you bring with you?" said the latter. Ibn al-Ahtam handed him the letter. "Nonsense, man!" exclaimed Yazid, "have you any news?" The other handed him the diploma. Yazid immediately gave order to make preparations for his departure and, having called in his son Mukhallad, he sent him on before, to Khurasan, that very day. Yazid then set out and stopped in Kuurasan three or four months, after which he invaded and took Jurjan, Tabaristan and Dishistan. This was in the year 93 (A.D. 710-7). Having lost five thousand men in besieging one of the fortresses of Jurjan, he swore, by a most solemn oath, to slay so many of the enemy that the blood would suffice to turn a mill. He therefore massacred numbers, but it was necessary to pour water on the blood in order to make it flow and turn the mill. He then ate bread made of the flour which had been ground by means of their blood. Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik died soon after. His death took place at Dabiq, on the eve of Friday, 19th of Safar, A.H. 99) 1st October, A.D. 717), or, according to another statement, on the 10th of that month. Dabiq is a village lying to the north of Aleppo.

23 The Arabic text says: till he can count men.

'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, whom he appointed as his successor, took the government of Khurasan from Yazid and gave it to 'Adi Ibn Artat'l-Fazari, who immediately arrested his predecessor, bound him in chains and sent him to the new khalif. 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz detested Yazid and all the members of that family: "They are a domineering set," said he, "and I do not like such people." Yazid, on his part, declared that he thought 'Umar to be hypocrite. When Yazid was brought before 'Umar, the latter said to him: "What has become of the money about which you wrote to Sulayman Ibn 'Abd al-Malik?" Yazid answered: "You know on what footing! was with Sulayman; I wrote him that (story) merely that he might tell it to the people, for I knew very well that he would be incapable of calling me to an account, if he heard any thing against me, or of treating me in a manner which I should not like." 'Umar replied: "I see that this affair of yours will bring you to prison. Have therefore the fear of God before your eyes and pay the money which is claimed of you; it belongs by right to the Muslim people and I cannot possibly avoid exacting it." He then sent him back to prison.<sup>24</sup>

Al-Baladhuri (vol. I, p. 438) states, in that chapter of his Book of Conquests which treats of Jurjan and Tabaristan, the Yazid, having finished with Jurjan, went to Khurasan and received on the way the usual presents. He then confided to his son Mukhallad the government of Khurasan and went to see Sulayman, after writing to him that he had with him twenty-five millions of dirhems. This letter fell into the hands of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz whom in consequence, arrested Yazid and cast him into prison. God knows the exact truth! 'Umar then sent for al-Jarrah Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Hakami and dispatched him to Khurasan, Mukhallad the son of Yazid, then came to 'Umar and had with him the conversation which we have already related. When Mukhallad left the room, 'Umar said: "In my opinion, that youth is better than his father." Mukhallad died very soon after. As Yazid refused to pay the money which was claimed of him, 'Umar had him clothed in a woollen cloak and placed on the back of a camel. He then said: "Take him off to Dahlak."--Dahlak is an island in the Sea of Idhab (the Red Sea), and not far from Sawakin. The khalifs used to confine there the persons with whom they were displeased. The narrator continues: "When Yazid was taken forth and saw the people passing near, he exclaimed: Good 24 This relation from the Annals of Taburi.

God! have I not relations and friends enough to prevent me from being taken to Dahlak, where none are sent but scandalous criminals?" Salamah Ibn Nu'aym al-Khawlanî (who heard these words) went in to 'Umar and said: "Commander of the faithful! let Yazid be taken back to prison; for I fear that, if you send him off the Dahlak, his people will take him by force out of our hands. I saw some of them, and they were indignant at the manner in which he was treated." Yazid was taken back to prison and there he remained till he was informed of 'Umar's sickness. It is said that 'Adi Ibn Artat had caused Yazid's hands to be chained to his neck and his legs to be fettered; after which, he delivered him up to Waki Ibn Hassan Ibn Abi Sud al-Tamimi, who had orders to transport the prisoner to 'Ayn al-Tamr, whence he was to be taken before 'Umar. A troop of Azdites stooped Waki' with the intention of taking Yazid from him by force; but he drew his sword, cut the cuble of the boat, took away the prisoner's sword and said: "I declare my wife divorced if I do not strike off his head; therefore disperse and leave him." Yazid then called out to them and informed them of Waki's oath, on which they dispersed, Waki' pursued his route and delivered the prisoner to the jund (or detachment of Arab troops) at 'Ayn al-Tamr. The jund took him to 'Umar, who put him into prison. When Yazid was detained in Umar's prison, he received the visit of al-Farazdaq the poet who, seeing him in chains recited these lines:

Your chains hold in bondage liberality and beneficence, the man who paid for others the price of blood and who wrought every virtuous deed; one who never gave way to insolent joy when worldly goods were heaped upon him; one who is patient under affliction and refers his cause to God.

On this, Yazid exclaimed: "Alas! what have you done? you have done me harm." "How so?" said the poet. Yazid replied "You praised me and I in such a state!" Al-Farazdaq answered: "I saw that you were now held cheap and I meant to obtain you (your favour) in exchange for my (poetical) merchandise." Yazid then threw him his ring and told him to sell it: "That," said he, "is worth one thousand dinars, which will serve as the interest of a capital to be paid to you later.

He remained in prison till the year 101 (A.D. 719-20) when 'Umar was taken ill, and he was filled with dread at the prospect of Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik's succeeding to the khalifate. When he, the son of al-Muhallab, had obtained the government of Iraq, he had cruelly persecuted, as we have already said, the family of Abu 'Aqil, the same of which al-Hajjaj was a member. The mother (niece)<sup>25</sup> of Hajjaj was the daughter of Muhammad Ibn Yusuf Ibn al-Hakam Ibn 'Abi Aqil and had married Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. She bore him a son named al-Walid, the same who was (afterwards) called the Fasiq (debauched reprobate) of the 'Umayyad family. She was the daughter of al-Hajjaj's brother. He, Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik had promised her that, if ever God placed Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab in his power, he would cut off one of his limbs. The son of al-Muhallab, fearing that this threat would be executed, took measures for escaping from prison and sent to his clients the order to keep camels in readiness, so as to facilitate his flight. 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz fell sick at Dayr Sam'an: When the illness grew serious, Yazid descended from the prison, went to the place where the camels were stationed, according to agreement, and rode off. When he had got out of danger, he wrote these words to 'Umar: "BY Allah! if I wear sure that you would survive, I should not have left my prison; but I cannot be otherwise than afraid of Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik." On this, 'Umar said: "Almighty God! if Yazid mean to be wicked towards the people, protect them from his wickedness and turn his artifices against himself. It was thus that Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab effected his escape.

Waqidi (vol. III, p. 61) says that Yazid did not fly from prison till after the death of 'Umar. I found in the rough copy of the Qadi Kamal al-Din Ibn al-'Adim's History (vol. I, p. 247) that 'Umar imprisoned Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab and his son Mu'awiyah at Aleppo and that their evasion took place there God knows best! 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz died at Dayr Sam'an on Friday,—some say on Thursday,—the 25th of Rajab, 101 (10th February, A.D. 720). Others say that he died on the 20th of that month. He was then aged thirty-nine years and some months. Other accounts say that he died at Khunasirah and ancient village in the neighbourhood of Aleppo and of which al-Mutanabbi has spoken in the following line:

I love the country between Emessa and Khunasirah every man loves the spot where he passed his early life.

Umm 'Asim, the mother of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz, was the daughter of 'Asim, the son of (the khalif) 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab. He ('Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz) was called the Umay al with the sear on the forehead; having been wounded in that part by one of his father's horses. Nafi' (vol. III, p. 521) the mawla of ('Abd Allah), the son of 25 This passage is not found in most manuscripts. The indication given in it, and corrected by the translator, is evidently erroneous.

---

'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, relates as follows: "The son of 'Umar was often heard to say: "I should be glad to know that descendant of 'Umar who is to have "a mark on his face and who will fill the earth with (his) justice."

Salim al-Aftas related as follows: "Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz received a kick from a horse, at Damascus, when he was a little boy. He was taken to his mother 'Umm 'Asim, who clasped him in her arms and began to wipe the blood off his face. She had not finished, when seeing his father come in, she turned towards him in a passion and began to reproach and upbraid him: 'You have killed my child,' said she, 'because you would not give him a servant or a nurse to protect him from accidents such as this.' He replied: "Be silent, 'Umm 'Asim! what a benediction will it be for you if this boy turn out to be the Umayyad with the scarred forehead."

Hammad Ibn Zayd made the following relation: 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab passed by an old woman, in the milk-market, who had milk to sell, and he said to her: 'Old woman! deceive not the true believers and the visitors of God's holy house, by mixing water with your 'milk.' She replied: 'I shall obey.' Some time after, he passed near her again and said: 'Old woman! did I not forbid you to water your milk?' She answered: 'By Allah! I never do so.' Her daughter, who was within the booth, then spoke to her and said: 'Is it thus that you draw down upon yourself the double reproach of fraud and falsehood?' 'Umar overheard her and intended punishing the old woman, but spared her on account of her daughter's words. He then turned to his two sons and said: 'Which of you will marry that girl? Almighty God may produce from her an offspring as virtuous as herself.' His son 'Asim replied: 'I will marry her;' and did so; and she bore him a daughter whom they named 'Umm 'Asim. This daughter became the wife of 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn Marwan and bore him 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz. After her (death), her husband took another wife whose name was Hafsa and of whom it was (proverbially) said: Hafsa is not one of the women who are like 'Umm 'Asim'.

The shaykh Shams al-Din Abu'l Muzaffar Yusuf Ibn Qizaghli (vol. I, p. 439), a daughter's son to Jamal al-Din Abu'l Faraj Ibn al-Jawzi (vol. II, p. 96), states in his Kitab Jawharat al-Zaman fi tadhkirat il-Sultan,<sup>26</sup> that Ibn 'Umar related as follows: Whilst my father was patrolling at night the streets of Madinah, he heard a woman say 26 This work is not mentioned in Hajji Khalifah's bibliographical dictionary. The title signifies: Gem of the age, being a commemoration of the sultan. I do not know of what subject it treats.

---

to her daughter: 'Rise, my girl! and water the milk.' The other answered: 'O Mamma! did you not hear the Commander of the faithful's public crier forbid the mixing of milk with water?, To this the mother replied: 'His crier is far from you now!' and the daughter answered: 'If he sees me not, she Lord of that crier will see me.' 'Umar wept and, when the morning set in, he sent for the two women and asked the daughter if she was married. The mother answered that she was not, and 'Umar then said to me: O 'Abd Allah! marry that girl; if I stood in need of a wife, I myself would take her.' To this I replied that I (was already provide for and) could do without her. He then said: 'Abu 'Asim! do you marry her.'" Abu 'Asim (whose other name was 'Abd al-'Aziz, married her and she became the mother of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz the Umayyad."

On the death of 'Umar Ibn 'Aziz, Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik was raised to the khalifate. Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab then proceeded to Basra, seized on that city, imprisoned 'Adi Ibn Artat, the officer who governed it in the name of the new khalif and, having openly rejected the authority of Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, he aspired to obtain the khalifate for himself. One of his concubines then went to him, kissed the ground before him and said: "Hail to the Commander of the faithful!" On which he recited this verse:

Return to your place! wait till you see what will happen when this dark thunder-cloud clears off.

I must observe that this verse is taken from a piece composed by Bishr Ibn Katia (?) al-Asadi.* It is not necessary for us to give the particulars of this event (the revolt of Yazid), which we here indicate in a summary manner. Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik then placed his brother Maslamah and his nephew al-'Abbas Ibn al-Walid at the head of the troops and sent them against Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab. This chief marched forth to encounter them and established his son Mu'awiyah in Basra as his lieutenant, leaving with him troops, money and the prisoners. He sent on before him his brother 'Abd al-Malik, who proceeded to al 'Aqr, where he halted.<sup>27</sup> This place is called also the 'Aqr of Babul; it lies near Kufa and not far from Karbala, the spot where al-Husayn, the son of 'Ali, was slain. Al-'Aqr was originally the name of this castle. There are four places which bear this name, but we need not mention the others, as Yaqut al-Hamawi (see page 9 of this vol.) has noticed them in his Mushtarik. — Al-Tabari says: Maslamah

---

* Qa'nat al-Asadi (Cairo ed.) vol. V, p. 346.

27 The recital is evidently taken from al-Tahari's Annals.

Ibn 'Abd al-Malik advanced and took position opposite to Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab. The troops drew up in line and engaged into combat. The people of Basra, charged those of Syria, threw them into disorder and forced them to retreat, but their adversaries rallied, attacked them and put them to flight. 'Abd al-Malik, who commanded the van-guard, retreated after this check and went to join his brother Yazid. The van-guard, retreated after this check had went to join his brother Yazid. The people (of Basra) and taken the oath of fealty to Yazid and sworn, on the Book of God and the Sunnah of his Prophet, that they would support him, provided that he hindered (his) troops from entering into their city رجاء and that he should not recommence towards them the conduct followed by that reprobate, al-Hajjaj. Marwan Ibn al-Muhallab, who was in Basra, excited the people to march against the Syrians and join his brother Yazid. Al-Hasan al-Basri (vol. I, p. 370) tried to dissuade them and said, in one of his public sittings: "I marvel at a reprobate from among the reprobates, an impious man from among the impious, who has passed some time in submitting this people to every dishonour, and that too, in the name of God, and who, in God's name also commits every sin. What they (his partisans) devour is devoured by him, what they take is taken by him, and, when a mouthful is refused him, he swallows it (by force). He said to you: 'I am filled with (a virtuous) anger (for the cause of God), and be you also filled with anger. He has set up a long cane with a rag tied to it (for a standard) and drawn after him a fickle رجاء wild and silly band of youths, who have not the least intelligence. He says: 'I summon you to follow the path traced by 'Umar Ibn 'abd al-'Aziz but were that path followed, he would be fettered in chains and cast into the place where 'Umar had already put him.'" Here a man said to him: "How now, Abu Sa'id, are you making an apology for the Syrians?" meaning the Umayyads. To this he replied: "I make their apology? may God never forgive them! Sa'id, the son of al-'Abbas, related as follows: The Prophet of God said: 'Almighty God! I declare sacred in Madinah all those things which You declared sacred in your town of Makkah. And yet the people of Syria entered into it for three days, and not a door was locked but they burned it (the house) and all that was in it; things went so far that (vile) Copts and Nabateans intruded upon Qurayshite women, tore their veils off their heads and their bracelets off their ankles. Their swords were suspended from their shoulders whilst the Book of God was trodden by them under foot! Shall I let myself be killed for the sake of (one or other of) two reprobates who dispute the possession of (worldly) authority? By Allah! I should be delighted if the earth were to swallow them both up.'" Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab, being informed of what al-Hasan had said, disguised himself, with some of his cousins, and went to the mosque where he held his sittings. After saluting, they took him aside, and the assembly looked on with apprehension. Yazid then commenced with him a discussion in which he was joined by one of his cousins. Al-Hasan said to the latter: "Who are you? what do you mean, you son of a sluttish mother!" The other drew his sword and, being asked by Yazid what he intended to do, he replied: "To kill that fellow." "Sheath your sword," said Yazid, "for, by Allah! if you kill him, the people who are now for us will turn against us." I may here observe that Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab is the person meant in that verse of the Duraydiyah, or Maqsurah, of Ibn Durayd (vol. III, p. 37), which runs thus:

And, before my time, Yazid aspired to reach the height of power, and he was neither feeble nor irresolute.

The commentators of the Duraydiyah have all discoursed on this verse and related the history of Yazid. Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab remained (with his army of) Maslamah.

On Friday, the 14th of Safar, 102 (24th August, A.D. 720), the boats were burned by the order of Maslamah; the two armies met and the fire of war was lighted up. When (Yazid's) people saw the smoke and were told that the bridge of boats was burning, they fled in disorder. Yazid, being informed that they had taken to flight, asked why they did so and, having learned that the bridge was on fire and that not one of them had kept his ground, he exclaimed: "May God curse them for mosquitoes, that fly away before smoke!" He himself had not the slightest thought of retiring. Being then informed that his brother Habib was slain, he said: "Life will have no value for me after the loss of Habib; I abhorred the idea of retreating when my troops took to flight, and now, by Allah! I abhor it more than ever! March forward!" One of his companions said (afterwards): "We knew that the man intended to get killed, so those who disliked fighting hung back and went off, one after the other. But a good troop still followed him whilst he dashed forward. Every band of horsemen which he met was put to rout; not a troop of Syrians but turned aside to avoid him and the lances of his companions. Abu Ruba 'l-Murji then went up to him and said: The rest of our people are gone off; what think you of returning to Wasit, where you may hold out till you receive reinforcements from the people of Basra and till the people of Oman and Bahrayn come to you in their ships. You might entrench yourself (and wait for them)!" Yazid replied: 'Confound your advice! do you pretend to say that my death will be easier there than here?' The other answered: 'I fear for your life; see you not the mountains of from (the masses of armed men) which surround you?' 'I care not for them,' exclaimed Yazid, 'no matter whether they be mountains of iron or of fire. Leave us, if you are not inclined to fight on our side.' He then advanced against Maslamah, without caring to attack any other, and the latter, on seeing him approach, called for his horse and mounted him. The Syrian cavairy gathered round (Yazid) and his companions; Yazid was slain with his brother Muhammad and a number of his partisans. Al-Qahl <sup>القحل</sup> Ibn 'Ayyash al-Qalbi exclaimed, on seeing Yazid: 'I shall kill him or he shall kill me but, as it will be difficult to get at him, some of you must charge with me and occupy his companions till I reach him.' We will charge with 'you'; exclaimed some of his comrades. They dashed on in a body and, after an hour's fighting, when the dust cleared off, the two parties separated, leaving Yazid dead and al-Qahl Ibn 'Ayyash at his last gasp. Al-Qahl made a sign to his companions, pointing out where Yazid was lying.

The head of Yazid was brought in by a mawla of the Murrah family who, being asked if it was he who slew him, answered: 'No.' Whilst the combat was going on, al-Hawari Ibn Ziyad saw a horse without a rider and exclaimed: 'Hurrah! Allahu Akbar* there is the horse of that reprobate, the son of al-Muhallab; God grant that he may be dead!' They looked for him, and his head was brought to Maslamah, who did not recognise it. On this, Haiyan al-Nabati said: 'Think what you please, but think not that the man has fled; he has most certainly been killed.' "What sign is there of that?" said Maslamah. The other replied: "In the time of Ibn al-Ash'ath, I heard him say: 'Shame on Ibn al-Ash'ath! raising dust (in flying before his enemies) was his main occupation. How could he prove himself superior to death unless he died honourably?"

I may here observe that the emir Abu Nasr Ibn Makula says, in that section (of the work entitled al-Ikmal) which is headed by the word al-Qahl, al-Fahl** "Qahl is similar (in its written form) to fahl, except that the first letter has two points (instead of one). He (al-Qahl) was the son of 'Ayyash Ibn Hassan Ibn Samir Ibn Sharahil Ibn 'Uzayr. He slew Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab. Each of them struck his adversary and slew him". When Yazid's head was carried to Maslamah, no person could say whether it was his or not; some one then advised him to have it washed and a turban put on it. That was done, and he recognised him. Maslamah sent it to his brother Yazid Ibn 'Abd * Allahu Akbar see Cairo ed. Vol. V.p, 349.

** Al-Fahl wa'l Qahl, wa'l Ajal in Cairo ed., op. cit., al-Malik; the bearer was khalid Ibn al-Walid Ibn 'Uqbah Ibn Abi Mu'ayt. Khalifah Ibn Khayyat says: "Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab, was born in the year 53 (A.D. 673); he was killed on Friday, the 12th of Safar, 102 (22nd August, A.D. 720)." God knows best!

When those who had reached Wasit, Mu'awiyah, the son of Yazid, had thirty-two prisoners in his power. These he caused to be brought out of prison and beheaded. One of them was 'Adi Ibn Artat. He then marched out of the town, and the people (his soldiers) said to him: "Out upon you! we see clearly that you intend to have us all killed; has not your father been killed?" He advanced as far as Basra, carrying with him the money and the treasures. Al-Mufaddal, the son of al-Muhallab, and the other members of the family were all assembled at Basra, as they feared the disaster which really took place. They then prepared seagoing ships and embarked all sorts of military stores. Mu'awiyah wished to obtain the commandment over the rest of the family, but they assembled and chose al-Mufaddal for their chief. "Al-Mufaddal", said they, "is our senior and you are still a boy like some others of the family." Al-Mufaddal held the commandment over them till they reached Karman where there were many scatters who had escaped from the battle, and he united all those troops under his orders. An army, sent in pursuit of them by Maslamah Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, overtook them at a defile in (the province of) Fars and attacked them with great vigour. Al-Mufaddal and a number of his officers lost their lives in that combat. All the other members of the Muhallab family were afterwards killed, with the exception of Abu 'Uyanah and 'Uthman Ibn al-Mufaddal who took refuge at the court of the Khaqan (chief of the Khazars) and of Ratbil (prince of Kabul). Maslamah sent their heads to his brother Yazid who was then encamped near Aleppo. When the heads were stuck upon poles, Yazid went out to look at them and said to his companions: "That is the head of 'Abd al-Malik; that is the head of al-Mufaddal; by Allah! he looks (as tranquil) as if he were sitting with me and conversing."

Another author, not al-Tabari, says: "When the head of Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab was brought to Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, one of the courtiers began to depreciate the character of Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab; but the khalif said to him: Hold your tongue! Yazid aspired to greatness, encountered dangers and died honourably." When Maslamah had finished the war against the Muhallabites, he obtained from his brother Yazid, that very year, the united governments of Kufah, Basra, Khurasan. The death of Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab was lamented in a number of fine elegies composed by his favourite poet, Thabit Qutnah. In one of these pieces he said:

All the (Arab) tribes swore to second you in what you undertook; they followed you and marched (to battle). But when the lances shocked together and you exposed your troops to the point of the spear, they abandoned you and fled. You were slain, but not disgracefully; and how many the violent deaths which are disgraceful!

This Thabit was one of the best poets and warriors of Khurasan. He lost one of his eyes and, as he kept its socket always filled with cotton (quin), he became known by the name of Thabit Qutnah. Having received, at one time, from Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab the government of a canton in Khurasan, he mounted into the pulpit, but felt so confused and troubled that he was unable to utter a word and got down. The people having then gone to visit him at his house, he said to them:

I cannot stand up among you as your orator, but, when battle rages, I am an able orator with my sword.

When they heard this, they exclaimed: "By Allah! had you said so when in the pulpit, you would have been the very best of orators."

Ibn Qutaybah speaks of him in the Tabaqat al-Shu'ara. It was against Thabit that Sahib al-Fil al-Hanafi, with whom he was often engaged in satirical conflicts, directed these lines:

Abu'l 'Ala'! you met on Friday last with a misfortune: you were troubled and like to choke. Your tongue turned (in your mouth) when you were going to speak, and made a slip like that of a man who tumbles down from a mountain's top. When the eyes of the congregation were fixed on you in broad day-light, you were nearly strangled in clearing your voice.

Ibn al-Kalbi (vol. III, p. 608) says, in his Jamharah: "This Thabit (came of a very noble family being) the son of Ka'b Ibn Jabir Ibn Ka'b Ibn Karman Ibn Tarafah Ibn Wahb Ibn Mazin Ibn Tamim Ibn al-Asad Ibn al-Harith Ibn al-'Atiq Ibn al-Asad Ibn 'Imran Ibn 'Amr Muzayqiya' Ibn 'Amir Ma al-Sama'.

An author, but not al-Tabari, says that Yazid was killed by al-Hudhayl Ibn Zufar Ibn al-Harith al-Kilabi. Al-Kalbi says also: "When I was a boy, the people used to say: 'The Umayyads exposed religion (to ignominy) on the day of Karbala (When al-Husayn, the son of 'Ali, was killed), and they injured generosity on the day of al-'Aqr!'"

Muhammad Ibn Wasi' , واسع related as follows: "When we received the news of al-Yazid's death, a woman of Oman, who was a professional weeper at funerals, came to me and made in my presence a lament for those of the Muhallab family who had been killed."

Ibn 'Abbad said: "During more than twenty years after the death of the Muhallabs, not a girl was born in our family and not a boy died.<sup>28</sup> Khalifah Ibn Khayyat says: "In the year 102, on Friday, the 12th of Safar (22nd August, A.D. 720), Yazid, the son of al-Muhallab, was slain, at the age of forty-nine years. He was illustrious by his noble character, his generosity, his rank and his bravery." It is related that the khalif Yazid received a visit from his brother Maslamah, at the time of Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab's revolt, and, seeing him dressed in coloured robes (as if to enjoy a party of pleasure), he said to him "Why do you wear clothes, you who are one of those whom the poet designated in this verse:

People who, when engaged in war, tighten their garments around them (and abstain) from women; leaving them to pass the night in a state of purity.

Maslamah answered: "We fight against our equals, those who belong to the Quraysh family; but, when a raven croaks, we do not mind it."--I may add that the author of this verse was al-Akhtal al-Taghlibi, a Christian and a celebrated poet.

790 YAZID IBN ABI MUSLIM

Abu'l-'Ala Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim Dinar, a member, by enfranchisement, of the tribe of Thaqif, was a mawla of al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf (vol. I, p. 356) and his secretary. It was for the talent and abilities which he displayed in the management of affairs that al-Hajjaj raised him to eminence. We mentioned, in the life of Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab that al-Hajjaj, in his last illness, appointed Ibn Abi Muslim to act as his deputy in the administration of the kharaaj (land-tax) of Iraq. On the death of al-Hajjaj, he was confirmed in that post by (the khalif) al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, and no modifications were made in his attributions. Some say that he held his appointment from al-Walid, subsequently to the death of al-Hajjaj and that al-Walid said: "I am, with regard to al-Hajjaj and Ibn Abi Muslim, like a man who lost a piece of silver and found a piece of gold." Sulayman, the brother and successor of al-Walid, dismissed Ibn Abi-Muslim from office and sent Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab to replace him. Ibn Abi Muslim was brought before the khalif with his hands and neck enclosed in a wooden collar جامة. Being low-set, and ungainly دسيم, with an ugly face and a large belly, he presented to the eye a very despicable appearance, Sulayman, on seeing him, said: Are you Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim?" The other replied. "I am; may God direct the Commander of the faithful." "The curse of God be on him," exclaimed Sulayman, "who shared his trust with you and confided to you authority on his own responsibility." "Commander of the faithful!" replied Ibn Abi Muslim, "make not (such a wish); you see me now that things have turned badly for me. But, if you saw me in prosperity, you would admire, not despise, think highly of me and not scorn." On hearing these words, Sulayman exclaimed: "Curse on the fellow! what a quick intelligence he has and what a sharp tongue!" He then said to him: "Tell me, Yazid! your master al-Hajjaj is he still falling down to hell, or has he already reached the bottom of it?" He replied: "Commander of the faithful! say not such things; al-Hajjaj was a foe to your foes and a friend to your friends; he lavished his blood for you and his place, on the day of the resurrection, will be on the right hand of 'Abd al-Malik and on the left of al-Walid; so, put him where you think fit."

---

<sup>28</sup> This seems to mean that the death of the Muhallabites brought good luck to the people.

According to another relation, he replied: "Tomorrow, on the day of the resurrection, he will be between your father and your brother; so place them where you will." "Curse-on the fellow!" said Sulayman, "how devoted he is to his master! it is such men as he that should be admitted into favour." One of the khalif's social companions here said: "Commander of the faithful! take that man's life; do not spare it." Ibn Abi Muslim asked who that person was and said, on hearing his names: "By Allah! I have been told that his mother had not always her ears hidden by her.<sup>1</sup> Sulayman, on hearing these words, could not refrain from laughing and ordered the prisoner to be set at liberty. He then caused an enquiry to be made into his conduct and thus learned that he had not defrauded the state even of a dinar or of a dirhem. He even thought of taking him for his secretary, but 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz (who was afterwards khalif) said to him: "Commander of the faithful! I implore you, in God's name, not to revive the recollections left by al-Hajjaj by taking his secretary for yours." Sulayman replied: "Abu Hafs! I had his conduct examined into and have not found in it the least trace of speculation." 'Umar replied: "I could find for you an individual who cares as little as he for dinars and dirhems. Who is that?" said the khalif. "Satan;" replied 'Umar; "he handles neither dinars nor dirhems, and yet he brought ruin upon mankind." Sulayman abandoned his project.

---

1 This seems to mean that her had been cut off at one Time to punish her for being a prostitute.

Juwayriyah Ibn Asma<sup>2</sup> related as follows: 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-Aziz, being informed that Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim had set out on an expedition with some Muslim troops, wrote to the 'amil (or superintendent) of the army, an order for his recall. 'I detest,' said he, 'the thought of gaining victories by means of an army in which that man is.'

The hafiz Abu'l Qasim Ibn 'Asakir (vol. II, p. 252) gives, in his (biographical) history of Damascus an article on Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim, in which he relates as follows, on the authority of Y'aqub<sup>3</sup>: "In the year 101 (A.D. 719-20), Yazid was appointed to the government of Ifriqiyah (Mauritania), in which post he replaced Isma'il Ibn 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Abi'l-Muhajir, a mawla of the tribe of Makhzum. Yazid acted in the most commendable manner and was killed in the year 102."

Here is, however, what al-Tabari (vol. II, p. 597) relates, in his great historical work: "He resolved, it is said, on acting towards them (the Muslims of Mauritania) in the same manner as al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf had treated those members of the population of Sawad (Babylonia) who had embraced Islamism and settled in the cities of Iraq: al-Hajjaj sent them back to the districts of which they were natives and exacted from them the poll-tax, such as they had to pay before their conversion. Yazid resolved on doing like him, but the people consulted together and decided on killing him, which they did. They then placed at the head of affairs Yazid's predecessor in the government and wrote to (the khalif) Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik a letter in which they said: 'We have not cast off our allegiance, but Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim treated us in a manner which neither God nor the Muslims could brook. We therefore slew him and reinstated in office your former governor.' To this, Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik replied by a letter in which he said: 'I disapprove of Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim's conduct and confirm the appointment of Muhammad Ibn Yazid to the government of Ifriqiyah. This was in the year 102.'"

---

2. The Traditionist Juwayriya Ibn Asma, a member of the Dubay'ah tribe, died A.H. 173 (A.D. 789-90).

3. A number of Traditionists bore the name of Ya'qub, but we have not means of determining which of them it was whose authority is cited by Ibn Asakir.

Al-Waddah Ibn Khaythamah related as follows: 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz ordered me to set at liberty some people who were in prison, and Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim was among them. Him I left where he was, but let out all the others. This he could never forgive me. When we were in Ifriqiyah, we heard that Yazid was coming to act as governor, and I therefore took to flight. He, being informed of the place where I was, sent persons to arrest me and bring me to him. When I was taken before him, he said: 'For a long time I have been asking Almighty God to place you in my power.' To this I replied: 'For a long time I have asking Almighty God to protect me from you, God has not protected you,' said Yazid, "and, by Allah! I shall kill you. Were the angel of death to come for you, I should hasten to take your life before he did.' He then called for the sword and the nat'.<sup>4</sup> They were brought in, and al-Waddah was placed on the nat' by his order, with his hands tied behind his back. A man holding a sword stood behind him and (at that very moment) was heard the call to prayer. Yazid went out to join the congregation and, as he was making the prostration, the swords (of the conspirators) took away his life. A man then came in to al-Waddah, cut his bonds and set him at liberty. Muhammad Ibn Yazid, a mawla of the Ansars, was re-established in the government.

So says al-Tabari; he names Muhammad Ibn Yazid, but Ibn 'Asakir gives that of Isma'il Ibn 'Ubayd Allah. God knows best! I may here observe that al-Waddah was chamberlain to 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz. Being ordered by that khalif, who had been taken ill, to set at liberty all the prisoners, he let every one of them out, with the exception of Yazid. On the death of 'Umar, al-Waddah fled to Ifriqiyah, through fear of Yazid, and then took place what has been related.--'Umar fell sick at Khunasirah, The word جامعة jam'iah employed above, where mention is made of Yazid Ibn Abi Muslim's being brought before the khalif, means a collar by which the hands are fastened to the neck.--The (d) in the word ذميم damim which occurs in the expression (rendered by) low-set and ungainly, is written without a point and signifies ugly. 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab (the khalif) said: "Give not your daughters in marriage to ugly ذميم men, for that which, in men, pleases women is the same which, in women, pleases men (i.e. beauty). ذميم (damim) with a point on the ذ signifies blamable. Ibn al-Rumi (vol. II, p. 297) employed the word rightly when he said:

4 The nata' was a circular carpet of leather, having round the border a running string by means of which it might be drawn up into the round shape. The executioner made use of it to receive the blood of those whom beheaded.

Like the fellow-wives of a handsome woman; they say of her face, unjustly and through envy, that it is ugly (damim).

I have indicated the right orthography of the word because it is often incorrectly written.--Khunasirah is the name of an ancient village in al-Ahass, which is a district in the province of Aleppo. It lies to the south-east of that city, near Qinnisrin 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz acted there as governor, in the name of (the khalif) 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan and in that of Sulayman, the son of 'Abd al-Malik. It is this place which is meant in the following verse of al-Mutanabbi.

I love the country between Emessa and Khunasirah; every man loves the spot where he passed his early life.

The celebrated poet 'Adi Ibn al-Riqa' al-'Amili<sup>5</sup> mentions also this place in his well-known qasidah which rhymes in d; he says:

When the vernal flowers follows in succession, may the rains water abundantly the Khunasirah of al-Ahass.

791 YAZID IBN 'UMAR IBN HUBAYRAH

Abu Khalid Yazid Ibn Abi'l-Muthanna 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah Ibn Mu'ayyah Ibn Sukayn Ibn Khadij Ibn Baghid Ibn Malik Ibn Sa'd drew his descent from 'Adi, the son of Fazarah, whose genealogy is so well known<sup>1</sup> that we need not lengthen this article by its insertion. According to Ibn Durayd (vol. III, p. 37) Mu'ayyah معية is the diminutive of mi'an معان which itself is the singular of the word am'a, which signifies the intestines. This opinion is, however, rejected by others who consider the word as the diminutive of (the proper name) Mu'awiyah. -- The vowels of Sukayn are an u and an a; in Khadij and Baghid the first vowel is an a. The other names are so generally known that it is not necessary for us to mark their pronunciation.

According to the hafiz Abu'l Qasim Ibn 'Asakir (vol. II, p. 252), 5 'Adi Ibn Riqa' al-'Amili, one of the numerous poets who flourished in the reign of al-Walid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik, had frequently satirical encounters with the celebrated Jarir (vol I, p. 294). He usually resided in Damascus.

1 genealogy is given by M. Caussin de Perceval in his Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes. According to the tables, Fazara drew his descent from Ma'add Ibn 'Adnan, by Ghatafan.

he (Yazid) was a native of Syria and governed Qinnisrin in the name of (the khalif) al-Walid Ibn Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik. He accompanied Marwan Ibn Muhammad, the last of the Umayyads, when that prince took the city of Damascus (A.H. 127, A.D. 744-5), and then obtained from him the government of all Iraq. He was born in the year 87 (A.D. 705-6). Ibn 'Ayyash (vol. I, p. 553) mentions him in the list of those governors who ruled in Iraq and held under their orders al-Misrayn (the two cities) that is to say, al-Basra and al-Kufa.

Ibn Qutaybah (vol. II, p. 22) says the same thing in his Kitab al-Ma'arif, where he names those emirs who governed simultaneously the two Iraqs. The first name on the list is that of Ziyad Ibn Abihi (vol. I, p. 364) who acted there as the lieutenant of Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan, and the last is that of Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah, the subject of this article. The same writer adds: "No other, after these, over held the united governments of the two Iraqs." In the same work, he had already spoken of him, in the article on 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah. There he says: "Abu Ja'far al-Mansur besieged Yazid in Wasit during some months and obtained the surrender of the city by granting him amnesty and protection. When Yazid rode forth, at the head of his household, to meet him, he said: "No empire could prosper with such a man in it: and had him put to death."

Khalifah Ibn Khayyat (vol. I, p. 492) says: "In the year 128 (A.D. 745-6), Marwan Ibn Muhammad dispatched Yazid to Iraq, as governor. This was subsequently to the death of al-Dahhak." — He means al-Dahhak al-Shaybani Ibn Qays the Kharijite.<sup>2</sup> "Yazid went as far as Hit, and there stopped. He was tall and corpulent, brave, liberal, a good orator and a great eater, but inclined to envy."

Abu Ja'far al-Tabari mentions him in his History, under the year 128: "In this year," says he, "Marwan Ibn Muhammad sent Yazid

---

2 There were two generals bearing the names of al Dahhak Ibn Qays. One of them was a Qurayshite, of the family of Fibr: he governed the district of Damascus in the name of Mu'awiah Ibn Abi Sufyan, joined the party of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr, then had himself acknowledged as khalif by his own troops, the Qaysides. He was slain at Marj Rahit, A.H. 64 (A.D. 683-4) in fighting against the khalif Marwan the first (see vol. I, p. 100). The other belonged to the tribe of Shayban. He put himself at the head of the Harurites, branch of the Kharijit party in Mesopotamia, took the city of Kufa from 'Abd Allah, the son of 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Azid, and then marched against Marwan the second. He was slain in battle at Kafaratutha in the month of Safar, 128 (November, A.D. 745). — Notwithstanding Reiske's recommendation, one of those chiefs has been sometimes confounded with the other, a fault of which there is example in this work, vol. II, p. 109: the note (15) should be struck out.

Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah to Iraq, for the purpose of warring against the Kharijites who were in that country." He then, under the year 132 (A.D. 749-50), speaks of the revolt got up by Qahtabah Ibn Shabib, one of the 'Abbasid missionaries (of political agents), subsequently to the triumph of that party in Khurasan and the adjoining countries. Abu Muslim al-Khurasani, the same of whom we have already spoken (vol. II. p. 100), was the principal abettor of that movement and continued to be its main-spring till the 'Abbasids had fully established their authority. The history of these events is well known, and, as we have given some account of them in our article on Abu Muslim we need not enter into further particulars. Qahtabah revolted in Iraq and marched against Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah. Some encounters, too numerous to be related, took place between them, and we may state, in a summary manner, that Qahtabah forded the Euphrates (with his army), in the neighbourhood of al-Falujah, a well-known village in Iraq, and advanced to attack Ibn Hubayrah, who was in the opposite bank of the river. Qahtabah was drowned. This occurred on Wednesday evening, the of Muharram (27th Aug. A.D. 749), towards sunset, and his son, al-Hasan, replaced him as chief of the army. This is not a fit place for relating this celebrated battle, as full account of it would be too long. Ma'an Ibn Zaidah al-Shaybani (vol. III. p. 398) was one of Yazid Ibn Hubayrah's partisans and his ablest assistant in all affairs, either of war or otherwise. It is said that in the night (of the battle), he struck Qahtabah Ibn Shabib with his sabre on the head or, according to another statement, on the shoulder, so that he fell into the water. He was taken out alive and said (to his people): "If I die, let the water be my grave, so that no one may know what has become of me." Other relations are given respecting the manner in which he was drowned, and God best knows the truth!

Let us return to our account of Ibn Hubayrah: Seeing his troops vanquished and put to flight by the army of which Qahtabah, and then al-Hasan, the son of Qahtabah, was the commander, he took refuge in Wasit and fortified himself in that city. Abu'l 'Abbas 'Abd Allah, the son of Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib, and surnamed as Saffah, then arrived from al-Humaymah with his brother Abu Ja'afar 'Abd Allah Ibn Muhammad (the same who was) surnamed al-Mansur. The village of al-Humaymah, situated on that part of the Syrian frontier which extends from the territory of al-Balqa' to Kufa, was then the residence of the 'Abbasids, and there were assembled a number of their partisans, their agents and the persons who were assisting them in establishing the 'Abbasid dynasty and overthrowing that of the Umayyads. The chief of the latter dynasty and the last of its sovereigns was at that time, Marwan Ibn al-Hakam. He bore the surname of al-Ja'di and was designated familiarly by the nickname of al-Himar.<sup>3</sup> When they arrived at Kufa, Abu'l 'Abbas al-Saffah was solemnly acknowledged as sovereign: The inauguration took place on Friday, the 13th of the latter Rabi', 132 (29th November, A.D. 749). Another account places that event in the month of the first Rabi' but the preceding date is the true one. The cause of the 'Abbasids then began to triumph and their power augmented whilst that of the Umayyads declined. (Abu Ja'far) Al-Mansur, being then dispatched by his brother, al-Saffah, with the order to besiege Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah in Wasit, joined the army which was then posted near the city, under the orders of al-Hasan Ibn Qahtabah.

Al-Tabari says, in his great historical work: "Frequent messages passed between Abu Ja'far al-Mansur and Ibn Hubayrah. The latter then demanded by letter that an aman (or full pardon) should be given to him. A paper to that effect was drawn up and sent to him. He passed forty days in consulting doctors of the law (on its validity,) before he consented to accept it. Abu Ja'far, to whom it was then brought back, sent it to al-Saffah, who ordered him to ratify it in Yazid's favour. Abu Ja'far's intention was to fulfil all the conditions granted, but al-Saffah never took a decision without the approbation of Abu Muslim al-Khurasani, who was the chief director of the 'Abbasid party and had a spy who informed him by letter of al-Saffah's proceedings. Abu Muslim then wrote these words to al-Saffah: 'The best of roads is a bad one if there be stones on it, and, by Allah! no road is good in which one meets with Ibn Hubayrah'. When the letter of amnesty was signed, Ibn Hubayrah left the city at the head of thirteen hundred Najjarites<sup>4</sup> and was proceeding to enter on horseback into the enclosure (surrounding Abu Ja'far's tent), when the door-keeper stood up and said: 'Welcome, Abu Khalid! dismount quietly!' Ten thousand of the Khurasani troops were then drawn up about the enclosure. Yazid dismounted, asked for a cushion so that he might sit down and then, at his request, The chiefs of the troops who came with him were admitted. The door-keeper now said to him: 'Abd Khalid! you may go in.' The other replied: 'Do you mean me and those who are with me?' The door-keeper answered: 'I asked permission for you alone to enter'. Yazid stood up and went in. A cushion was placed for him and he conversed for some time

---

3 Al-Himar means the ass. Marwan received this nickname for the tenacity of his character.

4 The Majjarites formed a branch of that religious and political party, the Kharijites, who may be considered as the Puritans of Islamism.

with him (Abu Ja'far). As he was withdrawing, Abu Ja'far kept his eyes fixed upon him till he disappeared. (Yazid) then went to visit him every second day, accompanied by a troop of five hundred horse and three hundred foot. Yazid Ibn Hatim (see the next article) then said to Abu Ja'far: 'Emir! this Ibn Hubayrah is capable of coming and intimidating (our) troops, for he had lost none of his influence.' Abu Ja'far, in consequence, ordered the door-keeper to inform Ibn Hubayrah that, in coming again, he ought not to bring with him all his troop, but merely his usual attendants. Ibn Hubayrah changed colour on receiving this message and came (the next time,) with a suite of about thirty persons. On this, the door-keeper said to him: 'You seem to have come prepared (for what ever may happen).' The other replied: 'If you tell me to come on foot, I shall do so', -- 'Nay,' said the door-keeper, 'I mean nothing disrespectful, and the emir has given no orders but for your advantage.' After that, Yazid made his visits every third day.

Muhammad Ibn Kathir related as follows: One day, in a conversation between Ibn Hubayrah and Abu Ja'far, the latter made use of the expression: 'I say, you sir!' or: 'I say, my man!' and then added, as if to correct himself; 'Emir! I merely employed the terms in which I not long ago heard people address you, and my tongue has outrun my thought. Abu'l 'Abbas al-Saffah insisted on Abu Ja'far's putting Ibn Hubayrah to death and, on his persisting to refuse, he wrote to him these words: 'By Allah! you must kill him; or else I shall send a person who will take him out of your enclosure and put him to death.' This letter decided Abu Ja'far on taking Yazid Ibn Hubayrah's life. He therefore caused all the rooms of the public treasury (in Wasit) to be sealed up and sent for the principal officers in Ibn Hubayrah's service. When they came, his door-keeper stepped forward and called out the names of two eminent chiefs, Ibn al-Hawtharah and Muhammad Ibn Nubatah. They stood up, went in, and were immediately deprived of their swords and handcuffed by three officers whom Abu Ja'far had posted within the precincts of his tent, with one hundred men. Then two other chiefs were introduced and treated in the same manner. Two others were then let in and underwent a similar treatment. This was done also with the rest. Musa Ibn 'Aqil (who was one of them) said: 'You took an engagement with us in God's name and have betrayed us: but I hope that God will punish you.' Ibn Nubatah (intending to express his contempt) made a noise with his lips, as if breaking wind<sup>5</sup> on which 5 The Arabic signifies literally: pepedit in barta sua. This noise, made with the lips, was probably meant to express contempt.

---

Ibn al-Hawtharah said to him: 'That will avail you nothing.' The other replied: 'This I had almost foreseen. They were all put to death and their signet-rings taken off. Hazim, al-Haytham Ibn Sha'bah and al-Aghlab Ibn Salim then took with them about one hundred men and, having gone to Ibn Hubayrah's residence, they sent in to him this message: 'We must have your treasures.' He told his door-keeper to go with them and point out where they were deposited. They placed guards at each of the doors and began to search every corner of the house. Ibn Hubayrah had then with him his son Da'wud, his secretary 'Umar Ibn Ayyub, his door-keeper, some of his mawlas and, in his arms, he was holding a young child, one of his sons. Alarmed at the sight of these people, he exclaimed: 'I declare, by Allah! that the looks of those men portend nothing good.' They went up to him, the door-keeper placed himself before them and said: 'Stand off!' on which al-Haytham Ibn Shabah gave him a blow on the shoulder (with his sabre) and brought him to the ground, Da'wud then attacked them but was killed; the mawlas also lost their lives. On this, he (Ibn Hubayrah) laid down the child, exclaiming: 'Take care of the boy!' and prostrated himself (in prayer). He was slain whilst in that position. Abu Ja'far, to whom their heads were carried, ordered a general amnesty to be proclaimed. Abu 'Ata' al-Sindi whose real name was Marzuq or Aflah, and who was mawla of the tribe of Asad, lamented Ibn Hubayrah's death in the following lines:

"The eyes which shed not over thee abundant tears, on the (fatal) day of Wasit, were surely congealed. On that evening the female mourners stood forward, whilst bosoms and cheeks were torn in the presence of the assembly. The court before thy dwelling is now deserted, but often did visitors station there, band after band. From those who came to visit thee, thou did never keep away: but alas! how far away are those who repose under the earth."

I may observe here that Abu Tammam al-Ta'i (vol. I, p. 348) has given this piece in his Hamasah, section of elegies. Here finish the indications borrowed from al-Tabari; they are roughly put together, having been extracted from different parts of his work. Another author says: "When Abu Ja'far joined al-Hasan Ibn Qahtabah (under the walls of Wasit) the latter gave up his tent to him and went somewhere else. Hostilities continued for some days; Ibn Hubayrah, seconded by Ma'an Ibn Zaidah, held out firmly and sustained a long siege. Abu Ja'far happened to say that Ibn Hubayrah, in sheltering himself behind ramparts, acted like a woman, and the latter, who was told of this, sent him a message to the following effect: 'If you said so and so, come out and meet me (in single combat): You will then see (what I am).’ Abu Ja’far answered in these terms: I know of nothing to which I and you can be compared except a lion who met a wild-boar. The boar said to him: ‘Come and fight me;’ the other answered: You are not my equal in rank; if I encounter you and get a hurt. I should be disgraced, and, if I killed you, it would only be the killing of a boar, and I should obtain for that neither praise nor honour.’ The boar said: ‘If you come not out to fight me.’ I shall tell the other animals that you were afraid to meet me.’ The lion answered: ‘It will be easier for me to bear with your false imputations than with the disgrace of defiling my claws with your blood.’

Al-Mansur, having opened a correspondence with Ibn Hubayrah and the other chiefs, they asked to capitulate and drew up a model of a treaty of peace and safeguard. Al-Mansur sent this document to his brother, al-Saffah, who ratifies it, after inserting the following clause: ‘If Ibn Hubayrah break his word or infringes this agreement, the engagements taken with him and the amnesty granted to him shall be null and void.’ Abu-Mansur’s intention was to act with good faith towards Ibn Hubayrah.

Abu’l Hasan al-Madaini (vol. I, p. 438) says: ‘When the treaty of peace was written out, Ibn Hubayrah went to visit al-Mansur, who had a curtain drawn before him, and spoke in these terms: ‘Emir! your dynasty has only commenced; so, let the people taste of its sweetness and spare them its bitterness; love for your family will thus penetrate into their hearts and the mentioning of your names will be agreeable to their tongues. We always thought your cause would succeed.’ When he had finished, al-Mansur caused the curtain to be drawn from between them and said to himself. ‘How strange that he (my brother) should order me to kill such a man as this!’ Ibn Hubayrah in his last days, went to dine and sup with al-Mansur, taking with him only three of his companions, and was treated with the utmost regard.<sup>6</sup>

It is said that he engaged in a correspondence with ‘Abd Allah, the son of al-Hasan, the son of al-Hasan the son of ‘Ali Ibn Abi Talib, that he tried to gain partisans for the cause of the ‘Alids and intended to overthrow the power of the ‘Abbasids. He (al-Saffah) then received a letter from Abu Muslim, urging him to put Ibn Hubayrah to death, and al-Saffah, in consequence, wrote to al-Mansur, the order to take his life. Al-Mansur replied: ‘I shall not do so; I am engaged towards that man by a treaty and a promise of protection; these I shall not <sup>6</sup> Literally: and the cushion was doubled for him. See note (11) of this volume.

---

break at the word of Abu Muslim.' Al-Saffah answered: 'I do not order his death in consequence of a word from Abu Muslim, but because he has infringed the treaty and is carrying on a secret intrigue with the family of 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib: his blood is lawfully forfeited.' To this al-Mansur returned no answer, declaring that such a deed would be the ruin of the empire. Al-Saffah then wrote to him, saying: 'If you do not put him to death, I shall break of all connection with you.' Al-Mansur then said to al-Hasan Ibn Qahtabah: 'Do you kill him?' 'I will not,' replied al-Hasan. On this, Hazim Ibn Khuzaymah declared that he was willing to do the deed. He therefore took with him some of the Khurasani chiefs, entered into the castle where Ibn Hubayrah was and found him in company with his son Da'wud, his secretary and his mawlas. He had on an Egyptian shirt and a rose-coloured mantle; a barber was with him and about to cup him. When he saw them come in, he prostrated himself (in prayer) and was slain by them, as also his son Da'wud, his secretary and those who were with him. His head was borne to al-Mansur. Ma'an Ibn Zaidah escaped the same fate, being then with al-Saffah. Al-Mansur sent the head to his brother. This took place in the year 132 (A.D. 749-50)."

Al-Haytham Ibn 'Adi (vol. III, p 633) related as follows: "When Ibn Hubayrah was killed, a Khurasanide said to one of that chief's followers: 'What an enormous head your master had!' and received this reply: 'Your granting him a safeguard was even more enormous.'"

The khatib Abu Zakariya al-Tabrizi says, in his commentary on the Hamasa, section of elegies, after giving the verses rhyming in d which were composed by Abu 'Ata' al-Sindi on the death of Ibn Hubayrah, "Al-Mansur had sworn to act with good faith towards him and confirmed that engagement by a most solemn oath.<sup>7</sup> When he killed him, the head, was brought to him and he said to the guard (who came with it): 'Look at the enormous size of his head;' and to this, the guard replied: 'The safeguard to him was a greater enormity than his head.' Al-Mansur destroyed the castle of Wasit."

Hafiz Ibn 'Asakir says, in his greater history: "Every morning, when Ibn Huayrah awoke, they brought him an uss عسر, --this word means a large bowl, --"containing some honey, or else some sugar, on which milk had been drawn (from the camel). He would drink it off and towards the hour of morning prayer, would remain seated in the oratory till the proper time for saying it came. After 7 This passage is omitted in Breytag's Hamasa. It must have existed in the larger Hamasa, but not a copy remains of that work.

that he would retire and, when the milk operated, called for breakfast. At this repast he ate two fowls, two nahids," or young pigeons--"half a kid and flesh-meat drest in a variety of ways. He then went out, examined into the applications made to him, and, at noon, when he retired, he would send for some of his officers and of the chief men of the place, and then call for dinner. Placing a napkin over his breast, he would swallow large morsels without stopping. When he finished, the company retired and he went in to the women, with whom he remained till the hour of the afternoon prayer. He would then come out to pray, after which, he should give audience to applicants, examine into their affairs and say the 'asr prayer. A throne being then set up for him and chairs placed for the others, all sat down, and bowls ('isas) of honied milk and other drinks were brought in. The cloth being spread for the people and covered with dishes of meat, a table was set on an estrade for himself and his companions. They ate with him and, after sunset, they went to attend the evening prayer. When the prayer was over, the persons who were to pass the evening with him would assemble in a room and sit there till called in. Conversation would then be carried on till the night was far advanced. Every evening, he allowed ten services to be asked of him, and these were all granted the next morning. His (yearly) salary was six hundred dirhems (£. 15,000). Every month he would distribute large sums to his companions, to the legists and to the members of respectable families. 'Abd Allah Ibn Shuburnat al-Dabbi, the qadi and jurisconsult of Kufah, who was one of those who were admitted to his evening conversations, said:

"When the night was advanced and sleep was overcoming us, 'Ayyad would bring to us one of the two reliefs.

'Ayyad was his door-keeper and the two reliefs were the permission of going in (to the emir) or of retiring. (At these social meetings) he had no napkin and, when he called for one (it was a signal for) the company to rise up (and retire)."

A shaykh of the Quraysh tribe related as follows: "On a very hot summer's day, Yazid Ibn 'Umar Ibn Hubayrah admitted some people (who were waiting to be introduced). He had on an old tunic the breast of which was patched. They looked at him with wonder and he, remarking their astonishment, recited this verse of Ibrahim Ibn Harma's,<sup>8</sup> applying it to himself:

---

8 Abu Ishaq Ibrahim Ibn 'Ali Ibn Harmah, a member of the tribe of Quraysh, inhabited Madinah and bore a high reputation as a poet. He was

A gallant youth can attain to glory, though his robe be torn and his tunic patched.

His generous deeds, his noble qualities and the anecdotes related of him are numerous and well-known.--Khalifah Ibn Khayyat says: "Ibn Hubayrah was put to death at Wasit, on Monday, the 16th of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, 132 (26th June, A.D. 750).--In al-Tabari's historical work, the death of al-Hasan, the son of Qahtabah, is placed under the year 181 (A.D. 797-8).

792 YAZID IBN HATIM AL-MUHALLABI

Abu Khalid Yazid was the son of Hatim Ibn Qabisah Ibn al-Muhallab Ibn Abi Sufrah al-Azdi. The rest of the genealogy has been already given in our article on his (great-) grandfather al-Muhallab (vol. III, p. 508). We have spoken of his brother [Rawh] Ibn Hatim (vol. I, p. 529), of his father's uncle, Yazid Ibn al-Muhallab and of his descendant, the vizir Abu Muhammad al-Hasan Ibn Muhammad al-Muhallabi (vol. I, p. 410). They belonged to an eminent family which produced a great number of illustrious and distinguished men.

Ibn Jarir al-Tabari (vol. II, p. 597) says, in his Annals, that the khalif Abu Ja'far al-Mansur took the government of Egypt from Humayd Ibn Qahtabah and gave it to Nawfal Ibn al-Furat, whom he replaced, A.H. 143 (A.D. 760-1) by Yazid Ibn Hatim. In the year 152 (A.D. 769), al-Mansur appointed Muhammad Ibn Sa'id as the successor of Yazid Abu Sa'id Ibn Yunus (vol. II, p. 93) says, in his Annals, that Yazid Ibn Hatim obtained the government of Egypt in the year 144, and another author adds: "in the middle of the month of Dhu'l Qa'adah." "Then," says he (al-Tabari), "in the year 154 (A.D. 771), al-Mansur went to Syria and visited Bayt al-Maqdis (the house of the holy place, Jerusalem) and, from that place, he dispatched Yazid Ibn Hatim to Ifriqiyah, with an army of fifty thousand men, for the purpose of carrying on the war against the Kharijites, who had killed 'Umar Ibn Hafs, his governor in that country.<sup>1</sup> Yazid held the born A.H. 90 A. D. 708-9); in A.H. 140 (A.D. 757) he recited to the khalif al-Mansur a qasidah of his composition. He was notorious for his fondness of wine and his avarice. His death took place in the year 186 (A.D. 802) (Kitab al-Aghani: Nujum).

---

<sup>1</sup> See Ibn Khaldun's History of the Berbers, vol. I, p. 384 of the French translation.

government of Ifriqiyah from that moment (till his death). He vanquished the Kharijites and then made his entry into Qayrawan, A.H. 155 (A.D. 771-2), the year of his arrival in Ifriqiyah. By his liberality and his princely disposition he drew numerous visitors to his court; all spoke loudly in his praise and a number of poets who extolled his merits received from him magnificent rewards." Abu Usamah Rabi'ah Ibn Thabit al-Raqqi (vol. I, p. 530), a member of the tribe of Asad, or, by another account, a mawla of the tribe of Sulaym, went to visit Yazid Ibn Usayd, who was then governor of Armenia and who held that place for a long time under the khalifate of Abu Ja'far al-Mansur and of that prince's son and successor, al-Mahdi. The genealogy of this Yazid is as follows: Yazid Ibn Usayd Ibn Zafir Ibn Asma Ibn Usayd Ibn Qunfud Ibn Jabir Ibn Qunfud Ibn Malik Ibn 'Awf Ibn 'Amri al-Qays Ibn Buhthah Ibn Sulaym Ibn Mansur Ibn Tkrimah Ibn Khasafah Ibn Qays Ghaylan Ibn Mudar Ibn Nizar Ibn Ma'dd Ibn 'Adnan. He held a very high rank in the tribe of Qays, of which he was one of the bravest warriors and the ablest politicians. The Rabi'ah above mentioned praised him in a poem of considerable merit but, not having received from him an adequate retribution, he composed another on Yazid Ibn Hatim, the subject of this article, and was treated by him with the utmost munificence. He, in consequence, recited a qasidah in which he extolled Yazid Ibn Hatim and depreciated Yazid Ibn Usayd. As the latter had an imperfection* in his speech, he alluded to this defect in the poem and said:

I declare by an oath which will admit of no subterfuge, by the oath of a man who swears without intending to prevaricate, that wide is the difference in generosity between the two Yazids him of the tribe of Sulaym and the illusive son of Hatim! Yazid of Sulaym is a saver of money, but that hero, the brother of the Azdites, is not a saver of his. Profusion is the Azdite hero's only aim, but the Qaysid's passion is to hoard up dirhems. Let not the stammerer suppose that I satirize him: I merely assign pre-eminence to men of merit. O thou who strivest to reach the height attained by him whose generosity is (not less copious than) oceans full to overflowing! Thou hast vainly endeavoured to imitate, in munificence, the son of Hatim; thou wert often remiss, but the Azdite was so never. Be satisfied with (admiring) the edifice of noble deeds raised by the son of Hatim whilst he toiled in delivering captive and faced the greatest dangers. Son of Usayd! strive not to rivalize with the son of Hatim; if you do, you will gnash your teeth with regret. He is the ocean; if you attempt to enter it, you will perish in the shock of its waters. I foolishly hoped to find honour in the tribe of Sulaym; what an idle, what a visionary thought! But the family of Muhallab is a brilliant constellation and, in war, it leads yours (like a camel) by the bridle. The family of Muhallab are as the nose on the face: all others are as the soles of the feet, and the nose is far exalted above the soles. I have declared them worthy of all glory and justly pronounced them superior to all other men. They alone possess the noblest of qualities, liberality and bravery in a battle. Even in adversity, they set no value on their money; even when borne on the bier, they gave protection to every outlaw.

---

* [Tamtamah means stammering]

Da'bil Ibn 'Alī al-Khuza'i, the poet of whom we have already spoken (vol. I, p. 507), related the following anecdote: "I said to the poet Marwan Ibn Abi Hafsah: 'Tell me Abu al-Simt, who is the best of all your modern poets?' He replied: 'The man who, of them all, composed the simplest of verses, 'Who is that?' said I. He answered: The man who said:

How different in generosity are the two Yazids, he of the tribe of Sulaym and the illustrious son of Hatim."

I already gave some of these verses in the life of [Rawh] Ibn Hatim (vol. I, p. 350), Yazid's brothers, but since met with a more complete copy of the poem and then decided on giving a separate notice of Yazid himself; for, in the case of a person so important, the slight account of him which we inserted in the life of his brother was really insufficient. Rabi'ah Ibn Thabit al-Raqqi had gone to visit Yazid some time before this, but did not obtain from him the favourable reception which he expected. He therefore composed a piece of verse in which was the following line:

I render God due thanks; but here I am returning with the boots of Hunayn<sup>2</sup>, as a gift from the son of Hatim.

When Abu Ja'far al-Mansur gave the government of Ifriqiyah to Yazid (Ibn Hatim) Ibn al-Muhallab and that of Egypt to Yazid (Ibn Usayd) of the tribe of Sulaym, they both set out together, and the former defrayed the expenses of the troops (which escorted them). To this, Rabi'ah al-Raqqi alluded in these verses:

Yazid the bountiful! your namesake, the Yazid of our tribe,

---

2 See vol. III, p. 573.

is not so lavish of his gifts as you. He leads troop of horse; you, another; yet both of them are paid by you.

This proves that Sulaym was the tribe to which Rabi'ah belonged, for he says that Yazid (Ibn Usayd) was of his tribe. Ash'ab<sup>3</sup>, he who was so notorious for his cupidity, visited Yazid (Ibn Hatim), who was then in Egypt, and sat down with the company assembled in the saloon. Seeing him whisper to a servant-boy, he went over to him and kissed his hand. 'Why do you so?' said Yazid. Ash'ab replied: 'Because I saw you whisper to your boy and thought that you were telling him to give me something.' Yazid laughed and said: 'I told him no such thing, but "I shall do it." He therefore made him a present and treated him with kindness.

Al-Turtushī (vol. II, p. 665) says, in his Siraj al-Muluk: "Sahnun Ibn Sa'id (vol. II, p. 131) declared that Yazid Ibn Hatim was truly a sage because he used to say: 'By Allah! I fear nothing so much as a man whom I may have wronged and who, to my knowledge, has no one to protect him except God. What I dread is, that he may say: 'May God call you to an account! may He judge between me and you!'"

Abu Sa'id al-Sam'ani (vol. II, p. 156) says, in his kitab al-Ansab: "The poet al-Mushahhar al-Tamimi went to visit Yazid, who was then in Ifriqiyah, and recited to him these lines:

"That I might reach you sooner, I shortened my prayers by half, during a month's journey and another month added to that. I fear not that the hopes which I placed on you shall be frustrated; but the sweetest gift is that which comes soonest.

On this, Yazid gave orders to bring money for the troops which he had in his pay and which formed an army of fifty thousand men. He then said: 'Those who wish to please me will lay aside two dirhems out of their pay for this man who has come to visit me.' He thus made up for him the sum of one hundred thousand dirhems, to which he himself added as much more." I must here observe that I found these two verses attributed to Marwan Ibn Abi Hafsah.

Abu'l Qaism Ibn 'Asakir (vol. II, p. 250) says, in his History of Damascus, after giving an account of Yazid's life and mentioning the 3 Ash'ab Ibn Jubah, a native of Madinah was always expecting to receive presents, even from persons whom he did not know. Numerous are related of his infatuation. See Abu'l Fida's Annales t. II, p. 632, and Freytag's Meidani; t. II, p. 50. He died A. H. 154 (A.D. 771).

---

government which he held: "Yazid Ibn Hatim said to the persons who were sitting in his company: 'Let me hear from you three choice verses.' Safwan, a member of the Banu Harit<sup>4</sup> family, which is a branch of the tribe of Khazraj, said to him: 'Must they be on you? Let them be on whom you please'; replied Yazid. One would have thought that the poet had them ready in his sleeve, for he recited immediately these lines:

I never knew what beneficence was except by hearsay, till I met with Yazid, the asylum of mankind (al-Nasi). I then met the most beneficent of those who walk upon feet; he was arrayed in an ample robe of liberality and bravery (wa'l-Basi). If glory could be procured by beneficence<sup>4</sup>, you would be its (sole) possessor and be more worthy of it than...

There (said the poet) 'Finish the verse', said (Yazid) by the words the 'Abbasides (Al 'Abbas)'. The poet answered: 'That would not be proper'. He (Yazid) then said: 'Let no one ever hear you recite this piece.'

Yamut Ibn Muzarr<sup>5</sup> related as follows: I went, one day, to salute al-Asma'i<sup>6</sup> and hear him recite pieces composed by the good eulogistic poets of Muslim times, and I said to him: 'Tell me, Abu 'Uthman, Ibn al-Mawla, was he a good eulogistic poet?' To this he replied: 'He was; and I have been kept awake all last night by that fine passage in which he praises Yahya Ibn Hatim and says:

If honour could be bought or sold, others might sell it but Yazid would be the purchaser. When the lightning prepares to flash from the cloud of his (beneficence), the hands of those who invoke such showers are held forth before the flash appears. When you (Yahya) do a noble act, you accomplish it with hands whose generous gifts are always unalloyed. When people count those who are the bravest among the horsemen, every finger points you out as one of the number.'

Ibn al-Mawla went to see Yazid, when the latter was governor of Egypt, and recited to him the following verses:

---

4 The text says: If beneficence could by glory. All the manuscripts agree in the reading, but it is not satisfactory.

5 The life of Yamut will be found in this volume.

6 This is certainly a mistake; al-Asma'i died eighty-eight years before Yamut, and we find, lower down, that the latter gives him the surname of Abu 'Uthman, not of Abu Sa'id. Our author probably meant to name Abu 'Uthman al-Jahiz (vol. II, p. 405), who was Yamut's uncle.

Thou who, of all the Arabs, standest alone, without an equal, did another like thee exist, there would not be a poor man in the world.

Yazid, on hearing these verses, called for his treasurer and asked him how much money he had remaining in his chests. They replied: "There are gold and silver pieces to the amount of twenty thousand dirhems (£ 500)"; he told them to give the whole sum to the poet, whom he then addressed in these terms: "Brother, I ask pardon of God and next of you; did I possess more, I should not withhold it from you." Ibn al-Muwla was the surname of the poet Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Muslim.

Al-Asma'i (vol. II, p. 123) related also<sup>7</sup> that, when Yazid was in Ifriqiyah, a courier came with the news that a son was born to him in Basra. On hearing this, he said: "I give him the name of al-Mughirah." (The poet) al-Mushahhar al-Tamimi, who was present, exclaimed: "God grant that this child be a blessing to you and that his sons be as great a blessing to him as his father has been to his grandfather." Yazid held the government of Ifriqiyah till his death. He died at Qayrawan, on Tuesday, the 18th of Ramadan, 170 (13th March, A.D. 727), and was buried near the city gate called Bab Salm. His son, Da'wud, was appointed by him as governor of Ifriqiyah, but was removed from office, in the year 172 (A.D. 781-9), by Harun al Rashid. His successor was Ruh (Rawh) Ibn Hatim.

793 YAZID IBN MAZYAD AL-SHAYBANI

Yazid surnamed Abu Khalid and Abu Zubayr, was the son of Mazyad Ibn Za'idah al-Shaybani and the nephew of Ma'n Ibn Za'idah, him whose life we have already given (vol. III, p. 398). The remainder of the genealogy is there set forth in full, so, we need not repeat it here. This Yazid was a famous chieftain, renowned for bravery. He was governor of Armenia, but, in the year 172 (A.D. 788-9); he was deposed by Harun al-Rashid. Eleven years later, that khalif appointed him to the united governments of Armenia and Adharbaijan. We have already related something of his history in our account of al-Walid Ibn Iarif (vol. III, p. 668); it was Yazid who <sup>7</sup> The insertion of the word also ايضاً is probably a mistake of the author's. See the preceding note.

---

conducted the war against that Kharijite and slew him. Al-Walid took up arms against Harun al-Rashid in the year 178 (A.D. 794-5). He revolted in al-Jazirah (Mesopotamia), the province situated between the Euphrates and the shatt (or river) of Mosul (the Tigris); His partisans, the Shurat, became so numerous that they overran all that country and killed the governor of Diyar Rabi'ah, who had al-Malik Ibn Salih Ibn 'Ali the 'Abbasid (vol. I, p. 316) in al-Raqqah. Al-Rashid asked the advice of Yahya Ibn Khalid the Barmaki, as to whom he should send to carry on the war against the insurgents. Yahya replied: "Send Musa Ibn Hazim of the tribe of "Tamim—or Pharaoh's real name was al-Walid and he was drowned by Musa (Moses)." Al-Rashid placed this chief at the head of a numerous army and sent him off. Al-Walid and his partisans advanced against him, put his troops to flight and slew him. When this news reached al-Rashid, he dispatched against him, Ma'mar Ibn 'Isa al-'Abdi. A number of encounters took place between the two armies, in the territory of Dara (a city) in Diyar Rabi'ah; hostilities continued for a considerable time, and the bands of al-Walid increased to such a degree that he became extremely powerful. Al-Rashid then said: "No person is capable of conducting this war except that bedouin Arab, Yazid Ibn Mazyad al-Shalbani. The poet Bakr al-Nattah<sup>1</sup> said:

"Send not against (the tribe of) Rabi'ah any other than a Rabi'anite; iron cannot be cut except by iron."

Al-Rashid placed Yazid at the head of a numerous army and ordered him to go and give battle to the rebel. Yazid went in pursuit of al-Walid who, being full of craft and cunning, endeavoured to circumvent him. A number of conflicts ensued; al-Rashid, being informed that Yazid was dilatory in his movements, sent him one troop of cavalry after another, and then dispatched an officer to reprimand him. Yazid went therefore in pursuit of the enemy and, having stopped in order to say the morning prayer, he was surprised, before finishing, to see al-Walid come up with his troops. The cavalry, on both sides, fell into rank, the soldiers marched forward and the battle was engaged. At that moment, Yazid called out and said: "Al-

---

1 Abu Wa'il Bakr Ibn al-Nattah, a member of the Yamenite tribe of Hanifah, led for sometime the life of a vagabond and then entered into the service of Abu Dulaf (vol. II, p. 502), one of al-Ma'mun's generals, who admitted him into the Jund, or armed militia and assigned to him a regular pay out of the coffers of the state (rizkan sultanian). Ibn al-Nattah was an excellent horseman, eminent for courage and intrepidity, and possessing a good talent for poetry. In his verses, he frequently vaunted his own prowess. He always remained attached to Abu Dulaf. — Kitab al-Aghani) Walid! why do you take shelter behind your men? come out and fight with me." That I will', replied al-Walid. On this the armies halted, and not a man stirred from his place; the two champions tilted against each other, and the conflict lasted for some hours, without any advantage to either. At last, Yazid found an opportunity, and gave his adversary such a stroke on the leg that he felled him to the ground. He (Yazid) then carried out to his cavalry, which dashed forward, and they cut off his (al-Walid's) head.

Abu Ya'qub Ibn Ibrahim, surnamed Ibn al-Furat<sup>2</sup> al-Harawi, says, in the historical work of which he is the author, that al-Walid Ibn Tarif was killed by Yazid Ibn Mazyad at al-Hadithah, a place situated near 'Amah (عماة), in the territory of the Euphratian al-Jazirah (Mesopotamia). It is called Hadithah tal-Nurah lies at the distance of some parasangs from al-Anbar and must not be confounded with the Hadithan of Mosul. Yazid sent his son Asad (اسد) to al-Rashid with al-Walid's head and a letter announcing the victory. On this occasion, the celebrated poet, Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-Ansari (vol. I, p. 25), who was wholly devoted to Yazid, pronounced these verses:

The khalif found among the descendants of Mudar a word so sharp that it separated bodies from heads. Were it not for Yazid,--and esteem has always a motive,--al-Walid would have flourished many more years than two. Noble is Yazid, and so were his fathers before him. To perpetuate their glory, they left (the recollection of) battle-days followed by battle-days.

When Yazid returned to court, al-Rashid called him forward, assigned to him a place of honour and said: "Yazid! most of the Muslim emirs belonged to your tribe." To this Yazid replied: "They did; but instead of mounting into pulpits (to say the khutbah as they hoped to do), they were mounted upon trunks of palm-trees." By these words he meant the posts to which their bodies were attached when they lost their lives. Al-Walid Ibn Tarif was slain in the year 179 (A.D. 795), as we have said in his article. Al-Fariah, his sister, lamented his death in those admirable verses which we have there given and alluded again: to it in the following piece:

---

2 In the manuscripts this name is written in various manners; one reads القراب (al-qirab or al-qarrab), another الفرات (la-Furat), a third الغرات (al-Gharat), etc. Hajji Khalifah does not mention this author in his Bibliographical Dictionary.

* See Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 371.

Children of Wa'il! the sword of Yazid has cast you into affliction by striking al-Walid. Had another sword than that of Yazid attacked him, it would not have been so fortunate. The children of Wa'il cannot be slain but by each other: iron cannot be notched except by iron.

It is related that Harun al-Rashid, on sending Yazid Ibn Mazyad against al-Walid, gave him Dhu'l Faqar, the sword which had belonged to the Prophet. "Take it, Yazid! by it you will be victorious." He took it, departed, and then occurred what we have related of al-Walid's defeat and death. To this, Muslim Ibn al-Walid alludes, in the following verse of a qasidah composed by him in praise of Yazid:

You caused the Prophet's sword to recollect his way of acting and the bravery displayed by the first (Musulman) who ever prayed and fasted.

By these last words he meant 'Ali, the son of Abu Talib, for he was the person who dealt blows with it. Hisham Ibn al-Kalbi (vol. III, p. 608) mentions, in his Jamhara al-Nisab, something which refers to Dhu'l Faqar and, as it is a piece of useful information, I insert it here. In treating of the genealogy of the Quraysh family, he says: "Munabbih and Nabih, the sons of al-Hajjaj Ibn 'Amir Ibn Hudhayfah Ibn Sa'd Ibn Sahm the Qurayshite, were the chiefs of the Sahm family previously to the introduction of Islamism. They were slain at the battle of Badr and died in their infidelity. As chiefs, they were greatly respected. Al-'Asi, the son of Nabih, was killed with his father. To him belonged Dhu'l Faqar. 'Ali slew him on the day of Badr and took that sword from him." Another author says that Dhu'l Faqar was given to 'Ali by the Prophet. I must observe that faqar, with an a after the f, is the plural of faqara, which means a vertebra of the back. The plural forms are faqar and faqarat. The name of this sword is also pronounced Dhu'l Fiqr, the word fiqr is the plural of fiqrah (vertebra). We find in the language no other word of a similar form in the singular having such a plural form except ibrah (needle), the plural of which is ibar.

Let us return to our account of Dhu'l Faqar. The manner in which it came into the hands of Harun al-Rashid is thus related by al-Tabari (vol. II, p. 597), in a traditional account which he traces up to 'Umar, the son of (the khalif) al-Mutawakkil. The mother of that prince had been in the service of Fatimah, the daughter of al-Husayn, the son of 'Ali, the son of Abu Talib. She said: Dhu'l Faqar was borne by Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Hasan Ibn al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib on the day in which battle was given to the army of Abu Ja'far al-Mansur the 'Abbaside." The history of this event is well known.<sup>3</sup> "When he felt death to be near, he gave Dhu'l Faqar to a merchant who had followed him and to whom he owed four hundred dinars (£ 200). 'Take this sword,' said he, 'any member of the Abu Talib family whom you may meet with will buy it from you and give you the sum to which you are entitled.' The sword remained with the merchant till (the 'Abbasid prince) Ja'far the son of Sulayman Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib obtained the governments of Yaman and Madinah. He, being informed of what had happened, sent for the merchant, took the sword and gave him four hundred dinars. It remained with Ja'far till al-Mahdi, the son of al-Mansur, was raised to the khalifate. This sovereign, having learned where the sword was got possession of it. From him it passed to Musa al-Hadi and, from Musa, to his brother Harun al-Rashid."

Al-Asma'i (vol. II, p. 123) related as follows: "I saw al-Rashid at Tus with a sword suspended from his neck, and he said to me: 'Asma'i! would you like to see Dhu'l Faqar?' I replied: 'Most willingly; may God accept my life as a ransom for yours!' He then bade me draw the sword which he was wearing. I did so and found on it eighteen faqaras."<sup>4</sup>--We have digressed from our subject, and must now return to the history of Yazid Ibn Mazyad.

The khatib Abu Bakr Ahmad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Thabit al-Baghdadi (vol. I, p. 75) relates, in his History of Baghdad, that Yazid, having gone to visit al-Rashid, was addressed by him in these terms: "Tell me, Yazid! who was the person that composed on you these lines:

No perfumes are on his hands or on his hair, neither does he wipe antimony powder from his eyes. He has taught the birds (of prey) a custom in which they have full confidence; so they follow him in all his expeditions.'

Yazid replied that he did not know, and al-Rashid exclaimed: "How can it be that verses such as these should be composed in your honour without your knowing the author?" Yazid felt quite abashed and, having returned to his dwelling, he said to the chamberlain: "Is there any poet at the door?" The other answered: "Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-Ansari is there." "How long have you kept him waiting?"

3 This is the celebrated 'Alied surnamed al-Nafs al-Zakiyah, who revolted against the khalif al-Mansur in the year 145 (A.D. 762-3).

4 The worth faqara must here designate either a sort of waving ornament engraved on the blade or else a notch on its edge. It is doubtful which is meant, probably the latter.

said Yazid. For a long time," replied the chamberlain, I knew that you were not now in easy circumstances." "Let him in," said Yazid. The poet was introduced and recited to him the entire qasidah. When he had finished, Yazid said to his intendant [wakil]: "Sell such and such a farm of mine; give the poet one half the price obtained for it and put up the remainder for my own expenses." The property was sold for one hundred thousand dirhems, of which Yazid gave fifty thousand to Muslim. Al-Rashid, being informed of the circumstance, sent for Yazid and questioned him on the subject. Having learned the particulars, he said: "I shall order you a sum of two hundred thousand dirhems; with one hundred thousand you may repurchase your farm; add fifty thousand to those which you gave to your poet and keep fifty thousand for yourself." Abu Bakr Ibn al-Walid stole the idea from al-Nabighah al-Dhubyan<sup>5</sup> who said (in one of his poems):

When those chiefs go on an expedition with their troops, flocks of birds, led on by other flocks, hover in circles over them. They accompany them till the inroad be effected; for they are well trained and accustomed to blood. They are ready to swoop down, being certain that the tribe of those (chiefs) will be victorious, when two hostile troops meet in battle. They have learned from those (chiefs) a custom and know well to practise it when the lance is couched (and projects) over the horse's shoulger (kawathib)"

Kawathib is the plural of kathibah and signifies that part of the horse's back which is before the pommel of the saddle.

Muslim's poem began thus:

I roamed, free as a libertine, and courted the fair<sup>6</sup>, whilst my censors thought to upbraid me but abstained.

The eulogistic part of it contains this passage:

The khalif possessed, in one of the sons of Matar, a sword of which the blade corrected those who swerved (from their duty). How many were the (princes) who but for the Yazid of the tribe of Shayban, had never domineered from the exalted pinnacles of an empire. When war shews its curved teeth, the imam (khalif)

5 De Sacy has given an account of the anteislamite poet, al-Nabighah al-Dubyan, in the second volume of his Chrestomathie arabe.

6 The true reading of this hemistich appears to be اجررت حبل خليع في الصبا غزل

shews his by (setting forward) Yazid, a chief who smiles in the heat of battle<sup>7</sup>, when the faces of the bravest warriors change colour. He obtains by mildness what defies the efforts of all other men; like death, he attains quickly to his aim, though he proceeds with slowness. People would not travel (to obtain gifts), were there not in his tent (an object which), like the temple (of Makkah), forms the meeting-point of every road. He clothes his swords in the souls (the blood) of those who breaks their engagements, and, with their heads, he makes crowns for his pliant spears. In the morning, he marches forth, bearing death on the points of his lances which, when couched, announce to the foe that his last hour is come. When a band (of rebels) is to proud to advance and do homage to the (khalif), he holds their death (ready prepared and) hidden behind his swords and spears. Even in peace, you will always find him armed in a double coat of mail; for he trusts not Fortune and is ready to act at the first call.

Abu'l Faraj al-Isbahari (vol. II. p. 249) relates as follows in the article on Muslim. Ibn al-Walid, which he gives in his Kitab al-Aghari: 'Al-Rashid," said Yazid Ibn Mazyad, 'sent for me one day, at an hour in which it was not usual (for him) to require the presence of (chiefs) such as me. So, I went to him with all my armour on and ready to execute whatever he might order. When he saw me, he laughed and asked me who was the person that composed the following verses in my praise:

Even in peace, you will always find him armed in a double coat of mail; for he trusts not Fortune and is ready to act at the first call. God established on earth (the family of) Hasim as a mountain (of glory); and the supports of that mountain are you and your son.

I replied that I did not know; on which he exclaimed: 'It is a shame for you, the chief of a great people, not to know the person from whom you received such an eulogy. It has come to the knowledge of the Commander of the faithful; he has heard it recited and recompensed the author. That man is Muslims Ibn al-Walid.' On my return home, I sent for the poet, made him a present and treated him kindly."

The two verses here mentioned are taken from the qasidah of which we have just given a fragment. It is related that Ma'n, the son of Zai'dah preferred his nephew Yazid to his own children, and was reproached by his wife for doing so. "How long," said she, "will 7 Literally: When war shews its teeth.

you continue to put forward your nephew Yazid and keep back your sons? If you advanced them, they would get on well; if you raised them to some authority; they would continue to rise in rank." He replied: "Yazid is nearly related to me and has a right to my treating him as a son, for he is my nephew. Nevertheless, my own children are dearer to my heart and nearer to my affection, but I do not find in them that talent of being useful which is possessed by Yazid. If the services which he did me ما يظلم به were rendered to a stranger, he would gain his affection and, if rendered to an enemy, he would convert him into a friend. This very night, I shall let you see something which will induce you to excuse me: Page! go and send here Jassas, Zai'dah, 'Abd Allah,"--he here named all his sons. In a short time, they came, dressed in perfumed waistcoats and Sindian shoes, though more than one third of the night had gone by.<sup>8</sup> They saluted and sat down. He then said: "Page! go and call Yazid." Very soon after, Yazid arrived, sheathed in armour and, leaving his lance at the door, he entered into the saloon. "Abu Zubayr!" said Ma'n, "why are you thus appareled?" The other answered: Emir! a messenger came to me from you, and my first impression was that you required my presence for some important affair; I therefore put on my armour and said to myself: 'If my conjecture be right, I shall not be obliged to return back, and, if I be mistaken, it will be very easy for me to strip off this apparel.'" Ma'n then said: "You may all retire and God protect you!" When they had withdrawn his wife declared that he well deserved to be excused. On this, he recited the following lines, applying them (to his nephew):

'Isam's noble mind raised 'Isam to power, taught him to advance and change the foe, and made of him a princely hero.<sup>9</sup>

It was to this circumstance that Muslim Ibn al-Walid alluded when he said: "Even in peace, you will always find him arrayed in a double coat of mail." It is related that, when Muslim came to this verse in reciting his poem, Yazid, in whose honour it had been composed, said to him: "Why did you not express yourself in the same manner as the A'sha of (the tribe of) Bakr Ibn Walid did<sup>10</sup> when he celebrated the noble deeds of Qays, the son of Ma'di Karib? He said:

8 They had been at a party of pleasure.

9 'Isam, was vizir to al-Nu'man, the king of Hira. See de Sacy Chrestomathie arabe, t. II, p. 532.

10 For the history of this poet, who was a contemporary of Muhammad, see de Sacy's Chrestomathie arabe t. II, p. 471.

When a troop of horse approaches, so dark and serried that warriors clothes in mail shun its encounter, you dash forward, without even taking a shield, and, proclaiming your name, you strike down the bravest with your sword.'

Muslim replied: "What I said is better; for that poet extolled his patron's imprudence (khurq)," -- this word signifies ignorance of the right manner of eating,--"and I extolled your resolution." The Qays whom al-A'sha eulogized was the father of al-Ash'ath Ibn Qays al-Kindi, one of the Prophet's Companions. We have already mentioned the verse:

He has taught the birds a custom in which they have full confidence etc.

And state I that the idea was borrowed from al-Nabighah: the same was done by a number of other poets, Abu Nuwas, for instance. 'Umar al-Warraq related as follows: "I heard Abu Nuwas recite his qasidah which rhymes in r and begins thus:

O thou who art visited by a demon! thou shalt not be of my evening parties nor with those who converse therein. I drive not birds away from a tree of which I found, by experience, that the fruits were bitter.

These verses excited my jealousy (but I suppressed my feelings) till he came to the following passage:

When the lances were dripping with gore and death appeared in her proper form, then at evening, came home, proudly stalking in (yuthanni fi) his coat of mail, a lion, the points of whose claws were stained with blood. The birds of prey journey forth on the morning of his departure, being gorged with the (flesh of) his victims.

I then said: 'You have left to al-Nabighah nothing out of that verse of his:

When those chiefs go on an expedition with the troops, etc.!

To this he answered: 'Hold your tongue! If I am not good at invention, I am not bad at imitation.'

The same idea was taken up by Abu Tammam Habib Ibn Aws al-Ta'i (vol. I, p. 348), who said:

In the morning, the eagles of his standards were overshadowed by eagle-birds, accustomed to quench their thirst in blood; they kept close to the standards and seemed like a part of the army, only they did not fight.

Abi al-Tayyib al-Mutanabbi also said: (something similar) in the following verse:

The birds (of prey), encouraged by their frequent feeding on the slain, were ready to swoop down upon the living.

In the description of a troop given by the last-named author, we find an idea which comes near to the preceding; he says:

(On come,) with a stunning noise (a troop of hunters), before which the possessors of wings fled but could not escape, and from which the wild beasts, starting from their coverts, were not safe. The sun passed over that (troop), but with a feeble light, and he could scarcely be seen, for the wings of the vultures. When his rays found an opening through the (crowded flock of) birds, his round disk appeared like a dirhem over the helmets.

When Yazid held the government of Yaman, he received the visit of Marwan Ibn Muhammad, a well-known poet who was a mawla to Marwan Ibn Muhammad, al-Ja'di, the last of the Umayyad khalifs. This poet's surname was Abu Muhammad, but he was usually known by the appellation of Abu al-Shamaqmaq (the son of the man tall and active). He arrived on foot, in ragged attire, and recited to Yazid an eulogium, in which he described his own state of misery, saying:

Those who are in search of beneficence saddle their camels to visit you but the camel which bore me to you were my sandals.<sup>11</sup> I took them for my steed, having no other, in order to get through my journey. That steed outruns even the most active and, in its rapid course across the desert wilderness, it leaves behind the mehari camels, thin-flanked and full-chested. It goes to visit him who has the noblest reputation of all the family of Wa'il, (him who is) a dome erected to the glory of that tribe. It is Yazid whom I mean, the sword of the family of Muhammad, Yazid who dispels every misfortune which a man can dread. He has two days (for acting); one luxuriant with gifts and favours, the other, copious with bloodshed and the taking of lives. I have come to him with confidence, being assured that he will hear an eulogium and not defer its recompense.

---

11 Literally: and I travelled towards you on a sandaled camel.

To this he replied: "You say the truth; I never, on receiving an eulogium, defer its recompense; give this man one thousand dinars (£ 500)."

A long and excellent poem, rhyming in b, was composed in his praise by Abu'l Fadl Mansur Ibn Salamah al-Namri<sup>12</sup>, a well-known poet. It contains this passage:

Had the tribe of Shayban no other title to honour than Yazid, it would yet surpass all the others. Men know full well that liberality repels contumely, but he (not content with being munificent), dilapidates his wealth.

Abu'l 'Abbas al-Mubarrad (vol. III, p. 31) relates, in his Kamil, that Yazid Ibn Mazyad, meeting, one day, with a man who had a great flowing beard which covered his breast and was dyed (with hinna), said to him: "That beard of yours must put you to some expense." The man replied: "It certainly does and, for that reason, I say:

Every night, it costs me a dirhem for pomatum and another for hinna; thus one piece (of money) outruns the other. Were it not for the gifts of Yazid Ibn Mazyad, the scissors (jalamani) would have to twang around its borders."

Harun al-Rashid said to him one day: "I count upon you, Yazid! for an important business," and received this reply: 'Commander of the faithful! God has prepared for you, in me, heart sincerely devoted to your service, a hand ready to obey you and a sword whetted to slay your foes. If you have any order to give, speak."

---

12 Abu'l Fadl Mansur, qualifié d'en-Nemri parce qu'il était issu de Nemr Ibn Kacit, poète du temps des 'Abbasides. Sa patrie était la Mesopotamie. El-Fadl, fils de Yahya, de fit venir à Bagdad, à Haroun al-Rashid dont Mansur acquit bientôt les bonnes grâces. Mansur avait compris le goût de Haroun en fait de poésie par la faveur que ce prince accordait à Merwan, fils d' Abu Hafsa. Il avait senti que le calife désirait qu'on joignît à son éloge quelques traits contre la famille d'Ali comme de fait Merwan, de manière à montrer qu'on ne reconnaissait à cette famille aucun droit à l'émirat. Mansur imita Merwan en suivant cette voie; mais il ne lança aux 'Alides que des traits indirects et ménagés, parce qu'il était au fond leur partisan, tandis que Merwan attaquait franchement et avec énergie les descendants d'Ali, contre lesquels il était animé de sentiments hostiles par conviction autant que par ambition.

Mansur en-Nemri mourut à Ras-el-Ain sous le règne de Haroun. (Caussin de Perceval, gives this note on the authority of the Kitab al-Aghani. The author of that work says that the name of Mansur's father was Zibrikan).

Al-Mas'udi states, in his Muruj al-Dhahab wa M'adin al-Jawhar (meadows of gold and mines of jewels), that this conversation passed between Harun al-Rashid and Ma'n Ibn Za'idah, the uncle of Yazid; then, farther on, he adds that, according to some, it took place between al-Rashid and Yazid Ibn Mazyad. I must observe that it could not possibly have passed between al-Rashid and Ma'n, because the latter lost his life when Abu Ja'far al-Mansur was khalif, as we have already mentioned in his (Ma'n's) biographical notice, and, thought there be some difference of opinion respecting the precise date, it is certain that the event occurred not long after the year 150 (A.D. 767). How then could he have held this conversation with al-Rashid who did not obtain the khalifate till the year 170 (A.D. 786-7)?

Ibn 'Awn relates the following anecdote in his work entitled al-Ajwibah al-Muskinah (silencing answers)<sup>13</sup>: Al-Rashid was one day playing at mall [la'b al-sawalijah] and told Yazid to take the side of 'Isa Ibn Ja'far.<sup>14</sup> On Yazid's refusing, he got angry and said: 'Are you too proud to be his partner?' Yazid replied: 'I swore to the Commander of the faithful, that I would never be against him, either in sport or in earnest.'

I read in a compilation of anecdotes that some person related as follows: 'I was one night with Yazid Ibn Mazyad and we heard a voice exclaim: O! Yazid Ibn Mazyad!' He ordered the man who uttered that cry to be brought into his presence and then said to him: 'What induced you to call out that name?' The other replied: I used up my mule and spent my stock of money; then hearing a poet recited a verse, I drew a good omen from it. Yazid bade him repeat the verse, and he recited as follows:

If honour, generosity and beneficence require a supporter, call with a loud voice upon Yazid Ibn Mazyad.

When Yazid heard those words, he treated the man with affability and asked him if he knew that Yazid. The other replied: 'By Allah! I do not.' 'Well,' said Yazid, 'I am he.' He then gave him one hundred dinars and a pied horse which was great favourite of his.'

We have been rather been prolix in this article but discourse will branch into digressions, each of them connected with the other. The anecdotes told of Yazid's noble conduct are very numerous.

---

<sup>13</sup> A work bearing this title is attributed to Abu Hamid al-Ghazzali (vol. II, p. 621) by Hajji Khalifah in his Bibliographacil Dictionary, but that author takes no notice of Ibn 'Awn.

<sup>14</sup> 'Isa Ibn Ja'far was the grandson of the khalif al-Mansur.

He died in the year 185 (A.D. 801). An elegy was composed on his death by Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah Ibn Ayyub,<sup>15</sup> a well-known poet of the tribe of Taym; some persons attribute it to the well-known poet Muslim Ibn al-Walid al-Ansari, but they are mistaken. We give it here:

Is it true that Yazid is no more? Tell us, you who announce so loudly tidings of death! Do you know him whose death you proclaim? how have your lips been able to utter his name? may your mouth be (for ever) filled with caly.<sup>16</sup> Is the champion of (our) glory and of Islamism dead? Woe be to thee, to Earth! why hast thou not shuddered? See if the pillars of Islamism be not shaken and if the children's hair has not turned grey (with affright). See if the swords of the tribe of Nizar be reposing in their scabbards and if the saddle-cloths have been taken off the horses. See if the heavy clouds continue still to water the land with their showers and if the trees are still covered with verdure. When he died, did Nizar not feel the shock? It did, and its edifice of glory has fallen to the ground. When he was laid in the grave, the glory he acquired and his hereditary honours were there entombed. By Allah! my eyes shall never cease pouring forth floods of tears for his loss. The vile may abstain from weeping, but the eyes of worthy men shall never remain dry. Can the female mourners be parcimonious with their tears after the death of Yazid? can they spare their cheeks (and not tear them)? Let the pavilion of Islamism lament, him, for the cords of that tent are now weakened, as also its support. A poet from whom he never withheld his wealth now weeps over him, and laudatory poems have lost their value. Yazid is dead; but every living being is near to death or it hurried towards it. Let it be a consolation for (the tribe of) Rabi'ah that it never again can meet with (so sad) a day as this.

The idea enounced in the last verse has been employed by a number of poets. Muti Ibn Iyas (vol. I, p. 438) said, in an elegy on the death of Yahay Ibn Ziyad al-Harithi (vol. II, p. 403):

(Say to Death:) You may now carry off whom you please; misfortunes can no longer give us pain now that Yahya is no more!

---

15 Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah Ibn Ayyub, a member of the tribe of Tayyem Allat, was one of the poets who flourished under the 'Abbasids. He was patronised by al-Amin. Died A.H. 209 (A.D. 824-5).—(Nujum)

16 The expression: earth in your mouth! is equivalent to: I wish you were dead!

Abu Nuwas (vol. I, p. 391) said, in a lament composed on the death of (the khulif) al-Amin:

His death was the only thing I feared, and nothing now remains for me to dread.

Ibrahim Ibn al-'Abbas al-Suli (vol. I, p. 22) said, on the death of his father:

Thou wast dear to me as the apple of my eye; for thee (alone) my eyes shed their tears. Die now who may, since thou art gone; thou was my only care.

The article on Muslim Ibn al-Walid, which Abu'l Faraj al-Isbahani (vol. II, p. 249) has given in the Kitab al-Aghani, contains the following piece of information which is traced up by the author of that work to Ahmad Ibn Abi Sa'id. "Yazid Ibn Mazyad was eating his dinner when he received the present of a salve-girl. Immediately on finishing, he had intercourse with her and died in her arms. He was then in Barada'ah and there he was buried. He had with him Muslim and a number of his ordinary companions. Muslim lamented his death in these lines:

There is a tomb in Barda'ah and, in the grave which it covers, is hidden worth unequalled. On his death, Fortune left (the tribe of) Rabi'ah in such sorrow that, by Allah! it will never be exchanged (for joy). He always led on the Arabs in the path of glory: how much then were they astounded when death overtook him. On his death, the saddles (the travellers) lost every hope of gaining wealth,<sup>17</sup> and the cities recalled those who had left them in order to visit him. Depart (in peace, o emir!) depart like the rain-cloud, which leaves the plains and the hills extolling its beneficence.

This last verse is said to be the most expressive of any that are to [be] found in an elegy. The piece itself is given in the Hamasah, section of elegies. بردعة (Barda'ah) is the name of a town situated at the furthest extremity of Adharbaijan; so I find it mentioned in books of history, but native of that place say that it is in the province of Arran.* Barda'ah is written with a pointed or an unpointed a (-d- or -d-), and such also is the case when the same word is employed to designate the pad which is placed under the saddle.--Some say 17 This verse is cited by our author so incorrectly that it scarcely admits of a reasonable explication. See it correctly given in Freytag's Hamasah, p. 428.

* Irra in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 382.

that this elegy was composed by Muslim Ibn al-Walid on the death of Yazid Ibn Ahnadh al-Sulami.<sup>18</sup> According to another statement, he composed it on the death of Malik Ibn 'Ali al-Khuza'i, and the first verse ran thus: There is a tomb in Hulwan, etc.; the person whose death he lamented having died in that place. Hulwan is a city in Sawad (Babylonia), or in one of the governments into which Iraq is divided. God knows best which of these statements is true! 'Abu 'Abd Allah al-Marzubani (vol. III, p. 67) says, in his Mu'jam al-Shu'ara' (alphabetical dictionary of poets), that Abu'l Balha' 'Umayr Ibn 'Amir, who was one of Yazid's mawlas, composed the following lines:

How excellent the hero by whose death the vicissitudes of time brought down affliction upon his brethren, on the day he was interred.<sup>19</sup> The access to his court was easy when you alighted at his door: his hands were prodigal and his servants polite. When you see his friends and his brothers, you cannot tell which of them are his blood-relations (they are all so deeply afflicted).

Abu Tammam al-Ta'i, has given this piece in his Hamasah, section of elegies<sup>20</sup> must attributes it to Muhammad Ibn Bashir al-Khariji<sup>21</sup> According to some, we must read Yasir يسير in place of (Bashir). Yasir is an adjective derived from your (opulence); Bashir comes from Bishara (good news). He bore the surname of al-Khariji, not because he was a Kharijite, but because he belonged to the tribe of Kharijah, a branch of that of 'Adwan. God knows best! -- Here is another elegy on the death of Yazid; it was composed by Mansur al-Namari and is given in the Hamasah (page 440):

Abu Khalid! what an awful stroke fell upon (the descendants)

18 We should perhaps read: Yazid Ibn Usayd al-Sulami (member of the 'tribe of Sulaim).

19 Literally: on the day of al-Baqi. Al-Baqi was the name of the principal cemetery of Madinah, but the poet employs it here to designate the cemetery of Barda'ah, the town where his patron died.

20 See Hamasah, p. 376.

21 Mohammed, fils de Bechir, qualifié d'el-Kharedji qu'il descendait de Kharedja, fils d'Adwan, poète du Hidjaz, Son prénom était Abu Seuleyman. Il vécut sous les Omeyyades (et peut-être aussi sous les Abbasides, mais je l'ignore). Il fut particulièrement attaché à Abu Obeyda, fils d'Abd Allah, fils de Rabia, Coraychite de la famille d'Abd el-Ozza. Les panegyriques et élégies funébres qu'il a composées pour ce personnage sont les meilleures de ses poésies. Il habitait le plus ordinairement les déserts voisins de Médine et l'endroit nommé er, Rauhha الروحا (Note by Mr. Caussin de Perceval.)

of) Ma'dd, on the day in which you were consigned to your last home! By my life if the enemies (of the empire) now look cheerful and display an insulting joy, an insulting joy, they must have passed by the court of your dwelling and found it empty. Time hastened to terminate your existence, but renown will exhaust (the efforts of) time.

Yazid Ibn Mazyad had two sons, both of them illustrious by their noble character and exalted rank. One of them was the Khalid Ibn Yazid whose praises were celebrated by Abu Tammam al-Ta'i. This poet composed in his honour some beautiful pieces which we should insert here, were they not to be found in his collected poetical works. The other son was Muhammad Ibn Yazid, who was noted for his liberality: he never sent away an applicant (empty-handed); if he had not money to give, he would never say "No," but "Later," and would then hasten to fulfil his promise. Ahmad Ibn Abi Fanan Salih Ibn Sa'id composed verses in his praise. I since found the following lines in the Kitab al-Bari', where they are attributed to Abi al-Shis الشيس al-Khuza'i:<sup>22</sup>

Noble actions were his passion and the occupation of his time; but few are those who love to do noble deeds. He scattered good offices throughout the land, and thus drew, from all quarters, a rich harvest of praise.

Khalid Ibn Yazid was appointed governor of Mosul by (the khalif) al-Ma'mun. He arrived there in company with Abu'l Shamaqmaq the poet already mentioned in this article. When he entered Mosul, the staff of his standard, which had been planted on the top of the city gate, was broken in two. He was about to draw a bad omen from this accident, when Abu'l Shamaqmaq extemporized to him these lines:

The breaking of the standard denotes neither danger to be feared nor evil to come suddenly. Being deprived it of its force at the aspect of this petty government, it declared that Mosul was much too small.

The khalif, being informed of what had passed, wrote these words to Khalid: "We have added to your government that of all Diar Rabi'ah, because your standard found Mosul too small." Yazid was delighted with the news and bestowed an ample reward on the poet. In the reign of al-Wathiq, the affairs of Armenia fell into great disorder, and Khalid Ibn Yazid was dispatched to that province with a numerous army. Being taken ill on the way, he died at Daybil, a town in Armenia. This was in the year 230 (A.D. 844-5).

<sup>22</sup> According to the author of the Nujum, the poet Abu al-Shis Muhammad Ibn Razzin died in A.H. 196 (A.D. 811-2).

794 [YAZID] IBN MUFARRIGH

"Abu 'Uthman Yazid was the son of Ziyad Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn Mufarrigh Ibn Dhi'l 'Ashirah Ibn al-Harith Ibn Dallal Ibn 'Awf Ibn 'Amr Ibn Yazid Ibn Murrah Ibn Marthad Ibn Masruq Ibn Zayd Ibn Yahsub al-Himyari (the Himyarite). The remainder of the genealogy, from Yahsub upwards, is well-known, so there is no need of our giving it." It is thus that Ibn al-Kalbi (vol. III, p. 608) traces up Yazid Ibn Mufarrigh's genealogy in the Kitab al-Jamharah, but he does not mention his surname which, however, is given by the author of the Aghani (vol. II, p. 249). Most of the literati say that this Yazid was the son of Rabi'ah and the grandson of Mufarrigh; thus suppressing the name of Ziyad.

The author of the Aghani says: "His grandfather Mufarrigh received this name because he made wager that he would drink the whole contents of a skin filled with milk, and he did not lay it down till he emptied it. He was therefore called Mufarrigh." The same author relates, in the article of the Aghani which contains the history of al-Sayyid al-Himyari (vol. II, p. 241), who was Mufarrigh's grandson, that Ibn 'A'ishah<sup>1</sup> said: "Mufarrigh was the same person as Rabi'ah, Mufarrigh being merely a surname. Those who say that Rabi'ah was the son of Mufarrigh are mistaken."—God knows best.

---

1 Abu 'Abd al-Rah-man 'Abd Allah Ibn Muhammad was generally known by the surname of Ibn A'ishah, because he was the son of A'ishah, the daughter of Talhah Ibn 'Ubayd Allah al-Tamimi, one of Muhammad's principal Companions and the same who was slain at the battle of the Camel, A.H. 36 (A.D. 656). As a traditionist and a transmitter of historical and literary information, he enjoyed a high reputation. It was at Baghdad that he gave his lessons. To his natural talents philological knowledge, peity and a perfect acquaintance with the history of the day (or encounters) of the desert Arabs, he joined great bodily strength. It would appear that he was an orthodox Muslim, believing that the Qur'an was God's uncreated word, for it is stated that the khalif al-Mamun a great adversary of that doctrine and a cruel persecutor of those who professed it, had him severely flogged. An accident which happened to him whilst undergoing this punishment gave to that reprobate poet, Abu Nuwas (vol. I, p. 394), the idea of composing on his misadventure a piece of verse which became generally known. He died A.H. 228 (A.D. 842-43), — (Nujum.)

Al-Fadl Ibn 'Abd al-Rahm al-Nawfali says that Mufarrigh was a blacksmith in Yaman; he made a lock for his wife on the condition that, when he had finished it, she would bring him a skin of milk. She did so and when he had drunk some of its contents, he laid it down. She told him to give her back the skin, and he replied: "I have nothing to empty it in." She insisted on having it and he emptied it into his belly. "O!" said she, "you are an emptier (mufarrigh)!" and, by this nickname he became generally known. According to the members of his (Yazid's) family, he belonged to the tribe of Himyar.

Ibn al-Kalbi and Abu 'Ubaydah (vol. III. p. 388) state that Mufarrigh followed the trade of a patcher and mender at Tabalah. I must here make some observations: Tabalah is a village on the road which leads from Makkah to Yaman. It is situated in a very fertile spot and is often mentioned in historical relations, proverbs and poems. This was the first government which al-Hajjaj Ibn Yusuf al-Thaqafi (vol. I, p. 356) ever obtained. Till that time, he had never seen it. He set out for it and, on getting near it, he asked whereabouts it was. They answered: "It is behind that hill." On this he exclaimed: "A government that can be hidden by a hill is worth nothing!" and he turned back and left it. From that time the Arabs said proverbially of any thing despicable: It is more contemptible than Tabalah was for al-Hajjaj.

The narrator (of Ibn Mufarrigh's adventures)<sup>2</sup> says: He [Yazid] pretended that he drew his descent from Himyar. He was affiliated by oath to the family of Khalid Ibn Usayd Ibn al-'Is <sup>الميص</sup> the Umayyad. According to another statement, he was a slave to al-Dahhak Ibn 'Awf al-Hilali by whom he was treated with kindness. Yazid was a poet and composed good amatory (and satirical) pieces. One of his descendants was al-Sayyid al-Himyari, whose name was Isma'il and whose father, Muhammad, was the son of Bakkar and the grandson of this Yazid. So it is stated by Ibn Makula vol. II, p. 248 in his Ikmal. His title was al-Sayyid (the chief) and his surname Abu Hashim. He was one of the heads of the Shi'ite party. The history of his proceedings [akhbar] in that cause and the poems composed by him in support of it are well known. One of the finest passages in Yazid's poems is to be found in a qasidah containing the praises of the 'Umayyad prince Marwan Ibn al-Hakam, by whom he had been generously treated. Here it is:

2 The Kitab al-Aghani has a long article on Ibn Mufarrigh. That is the source from which our author has extracted, verbatim, the greater part of the information which is contained in this article.

You opened a market for (the purchase of) eulogy, at a time that eulogy was not considered as a marketable ware. God seems to have granted to you the privilege of taking lives and of distributing gifts.

The first of these verses has been given in our article on Yazid Ibn Mazyad Ibn Za'idah (page 230 of this vol.); it is there attributed to Ahmad Ibn Abi Fanan and said to be taken from a qasidah in which that famous poet<sup>3</sup> extolled the merits of Khalid, the son of Yazid Ibn Mazyad. God knows best! When Sa'id, the son of (the khalif). 'Uthman Ibn 'Affan, was appointed governor of Khurasan, he invited Yazid Ibn Mufarrigh to accompany him thither. Yazid refused, as he preferred becoming the retainer of 'Abbad<sup>4</sup>, the son of Ziyad Ibn Abih.<sup>5</sup> On this, he said to him: Since you refuse bearing me company and prefer following 'Abbad, hearken to the advice which I here give you; Abbad is a man of a low mind; avoid therefore being too familiar with him, although he encourage you to make free; he then only means to delude you. Visit him seldom, for he is greatly inclined to find irksome (the presence of visitors). Do not bandy arguments with him, even though he attack you, for he will not bear with such observations coming from you as you would have to bear with if they came from him." He then sent for some money and gave it to him, saying: "Let this help to defray your travelling expenses. If you perceive that you are not on a good footing with 'Abbad recollect that, with me, you shall always find a favourable reception and come to me." Sa'id then departed for Khurasan, and Ibn Mufarrigh set out with 'Abbad. When 'Ubayd Allah, the son of Ziyad and the governor of the two Iraqs, was informed that his brother 'Abbad was taking Yazid with him, he felt very uneasy and went out with the people to see him off. Whilst they were saying farewell to the travellers, he went to take leave of his brother and, having called Ibn Mufarrigh over to him, he said: "You asked 'Abbad to take you with him and he granted your request; now, that is a thing which annoys me greatly." "God protect the emir!" said Ibn Mufarrigh, "why should that annoy you?" 'Ubayd Allah replied: A poet is not to be satisfied

---

3 Of Ibn Abu Fanan little or no information has yet been found, except a few indications given by Ibn Khallikan and the author of the Kitab al-Aghani. He seems to have been one of the poets who flourished in the time of Harun al-Rashid.

4 'Abbad Ibn Ziyad was named governor of Sijistan by Mu'awiyah in A.H. 673), and he was still holding that place in the year 69 (A.D. 688-9). — (Nujum.)

5 In this article will be found an account of Ziyad's origin.

with such attentions as ordinary men show one to another; he is led away by his imagination, what he imagines the takes for certain and he never overlooks an affront, even when he ought to do so. Now, 'Abbad is going to a country which is the seat of war, and he will be so greatly taken up with the direction of his troops and the collecting of the landtax that he will not think of you.' Such neglect you will not forgive and (in your satires) you will cover us all with obloquy and shame." Yazid answered: "Emir! I am not what you think; I am profoundly grateful for the kindness which he has already shown me, and, besides, if I forget myself (in my conduct towards him), I shall always find a ready pardon." "That you will not; replied 'Ubayd Allah, "so you must promise me that if he delays giving what you expect from him, you will not hasten to attack him but write to me." "That I promise you;" said the poet. "It is well;" said 'Ubayd Allah, "so, now depart under favourable auspices." The narrator (in the Kitab al-Aghani) continues thus: 'Abbad arrived in Khurasan, or as some say, in Sijistan, — and was there so deeply engaged in warfare and in the collecting of the imposts that Ibn Mufarrigh thought the attention to which he was entitled very long in coming. So without writing a letter of complaint to 'Ubayd Allah, as he had engaged to do, he gave free career to (the virulence of) his tongue and attacked 'Abbad with sarcasms and satire. That emir had so great a beard that it resembled a fodder-bag. The poet was travelling with him, one day, and, seeing the beard shaken and tossed about by the wind, he laughed and said to a man of the tribe of Lakhm who was (riding) at his side:

O, that his beard was hay! we might then fodder all the Muslim cavalry.

'Abbad, to whom the Lakhmite perfidiously related what the poet had said, flew into a passion; "It does not become me now," said he, "to chastise him whilst he is in my company; but, though I defer his punishment, I intend later to "gratify my revenge; many are the times in which he cast abuse on my father." Ibn Mufarrigh, being informed of this, said: "I perceive the odour of death (for me proceeding), from 'Abbad!" He then went in to him and said: "Emir! I was with Sa'id Ibn 'Uthman, whose good opinion of me you have learned; you know also the favourable impression which he has left on my mind. I preferred you to him, but, as yet, I have derived from you no advantage. I therefore request permission to depart; I have no need of being your retainer." 'Abbad replied: "As you chose me, so also did I choose you into my service because you asked me to do so. You now hasten to prevent me from taking proceedings against you, and therefore you ask permission to depart. But you mean to return to your people and give them the most unfavourable opinion of my character. Well, you have that permission and may make use of it when I have treated you according to your deserts." Being then informed that his honour and reputation were attacked by Ibn Mufarrigh, he encouraged some of the poet's creditors to cite him before (the tribunal presided by) himself, and the result was that he put him into prison and had him severely beaten. After that, he sent to him this message: "Sell me al-Arika* and Burd." Al-Arika was a female musician belonging to Ibn Mufarrigh and Burd was his slave-boy. He had brought them up from their childhood and was greatly attached to them. The poet sent back by the same messenger an answer to this effect: "Ask the emir, if a man can possibly sell himself or his child." 'Abbad then took them from him (by force) or according to another, he sold them against their owner's will, to a native of Khurasan. When the two slaves entered into this man's house, Burd, who was very intelligent and had received a good education, said to him: "Do you know what you have bought? The other answered: "I do; I have bought you and that girl." "No, by Allah!" replied Burd, "you have bought for yourself nothing but shame, ruin and contumely, which will endure as long as you live." The man was alarmed at these words and exclaimed: "Woe betide you! how can that be?" Burd answered: "We belong to Yazid Ibn Mufarrigh, and, by Allah! nothing has reduced him to the state in which he now is but his evil tongue. You are aware that he dared to satirize 'Abbad, who is the emir of Khurasan<sup>6</sup> whose brother, 'Ubayd Allah, is the emir of the two Iraqs, and whose uncle is the khalif Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan. (He attacked him) because he thought him too slow (in granting favours); will he then withhold his tongue from you that have bought me and a girl who is as dear to him as his heart within his bosom. By Allah! I know of no man into whose dwelling has entered a more fatal acquisition than that which has now entered into yours." The man answered: I take you to witness that I declare you and her to be still his property: if you wish to go away, you may depart; I fear greatly for myself if Ibn Mufarrigh learns what has happened; if you wish to stay with me, both of you, may." Burd said to him: "Write those words to my master." The man wrote to Ibn Mufarrigh, who was still in prison, informing him of what he had done, and the other replied by a letter in which he thanked him for his conduct and requested him to keep the two slaves at his house till such time as God should set their master at liberty. 'Abbad then said to his chamberlain: "I do find that the fellow,"--meaning Ibn Mufarrigh, "is much annoyed at being in prison; sell his horse, his arms, all his effects, and distribute the price between his creditors. "This order was executed, but there still remained unpaid a part of the debt for which Ibn Mufarrigh was imprisoned. He composed the following lines on the selling of his slaves:

* [Al-Arakah in Cairo ed.]

6 The narrator probably meant to say: of Sijistan.

I sold (sharitu) Burd, and his sale depended upon me, I should not have sought an advantage for myself in selling him. Were it not for that bastard ('Abbad) and for the misfortunes which have befallen me, I should never have been separated from him. O Burd! never before did time bring on me so painful a stroke as this; never before did it oblige me to sell (one whom I considered as) my child.

Sharitu here means; I sold; it is one of those verbs which have two opposite significations, as it means to sell and to buy. — The piece to which these verses belong contains many more, but I omit the remainder.—Ibn Mufarrigh, having (at length) perceived that, if he continued, whilst in prison, to insult and satirize 'Abbad, he would only do more harm to himself, used then to answer in these terms to the persons who asked him what was the cause of his imprisonment: "(I am) a man to whom his emir is giving a lesson, for the purpose of correcting his extravagance and allaying his violence. That, I declare, is better than if he drew the skirt of his robe over the traces of his retainer's faults. 'Abbad, being informed of this, took pity on him and let him out of prison. Yazid then fled till he reached Basrah whence he proceeded to Syria, where he continued to err as a fugitive from one city to another, and to recite satires against Ziyad and his son ('Abbad). In one of those pieces, which we give here, the poet alludes to his abandoning Sa'id Ibn 'Uthman Ibn 'Affan for the purpose of following 'Abbad Ibn Ziyad, and he mentions in it the forced sale of Burd:

After some days passed at Ramah, you (O poet!) broke the bonds which attached you to Imamah. The winds drop tears for her affliction whilst the lightning smiles from the cloud. O! how I regret committing an act which has terminated in repentance. I left the generous Sa'id and his palace which is supported by lofty columns. (I left him who is) a lion in battle and who gives up the pleasures of love for the purpose of marching against the foe. Samarqand was conquered by his prowess and, in its precincts, he erected his pavilions, whilst I followed a slave belonging to the family of Ilaj.<sup>7</sup> Such thing are signs foreboding

---

7 'Abbad's grandfather was a slave. The history of his origin is given further on.

the end of the world. With him (with the poet) went an Abyssinian maid so small of ears (sakka) that she might be taken for an ostrich; one of those dark-complexioned females whose faces bear the mark of an inferior race. I sold Burd. O that, after (losing) Burd, I had become an owl<sup>8</sup> or its female, which invokes the echos between al-Mush<sup>h</sup>aq<sup>q</sup>ar and al-Yamamah. But a man must encounter what he most fears, if he wish to escape from ignominy and oppression. Slaves only should be beaten with the stick; a reprimand had sufficed to correct a freeman.

The family of 'Ilaj belonged to the tribe of Taif. We shall speak of it again, in this article, when we give an account of al-Harith Ibn Kaladah, Abu Bakr Ibn Durayd (vol. III, p. 37), makes a similar statement in his Kitab al-Ishtiqaq<sup>9</sup>, and cites the following lines to prove the fact:

Come to your senses, family of Abu Bakrah, is the sun to be compared with a candle? It is better to be a mawla' to the Prophet than to claim relationship with the family of 'Ilaj.

We shall speak of Abu Bakra Nafi'a** Ibn Harith in this article and mention the circumstance which gave rise to these verse. (Ibn Mufarrigh) says, in the last<sup>10</sup>, verse of his piece that this Abyssinian maid resembled an ostrich in the smallness of her ears. They (the Arabs of the desert) say of a small ear, that it is sakka': this word designates also such female animals as have no (apparent) ears. The same Arabs say: "Every Sakka' lays eggs, and every Sharqa' brings forth its young alive." By the word Sharqa' is meant animals having long ears. These Arabs consider it as a general law that every animal having visible ears is viviparous and that every animal without visible ears is oviparous.

The narrator continues in these terms: Ibn Mufarrigh then persisted in satirizing ('Abbad) Ibn Ziyad, so that his poems were publicly sung by the people of Basra. 'Ubayd Allah (Ibn Ziyad) caused an active search to be made for the poet, who narrowly escaped being taken and succeeded in reaching Syria. Narrators do not agree as to the person who delivered the fugitive to ('Ubayd Allah) Ibn Ziyad; one says it was Mu'awiyah. It must have been the latter, for he was 8 One of the superstitious ideas of the pagan Arabs was that the same of the dead passed into the bodies of screech-owls.

9 See page 186 of Wustenfeld's edition of that work.

10 The verse to which our author refers is now followed by others which have been added at a late period.

** [Nafi' in Cairo ed.]

already reigning when 'Abbad was appointed to the government of Sijistan. The author of the Aghani relates, farther on, that Sa'id, the son of 'Uthman Ibn 'Affan, went to visit (the khalif) Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan and said to him: "Why have you nominated (your son) Yazid as your successor, to my exclusion? By Allah? my father was a better man than his, and I am better than he. We raised you to power and have not deposed you: through us you obtained what you have." "To this Mu'awiyah replied: "You are right in saying that your father was a better man than his; I freely acknowledge that 'Uthman was better than I am: you say that your mother was a better woman than his: (to that I reply:) a woman's worth must be appreciated by her remaining with her family, by her deserving the good will of her husband and by giving birth to noble-minded boys. You say that you are better than Yazid. To this, my son! I answer that, if I was offered in exchange for Yazid as many persons like you as would fill the Ghutah<sup>11</sup>, I should feel no pleasure in accepting the proposal. You say that your people raised me to power and did not depose me; (to that I answer that) I received my (first) command from one who was better than you, from 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, and your people confirmed my nomination. Moreover, I have not been a bad governor for you: I revenged your wrongs, killed the murderers of your father, elevated you to power and authority, enriched those among you who were poor and raised the lowest of you to high stations." Yazid then spoke in his (Mu'awiyah's) favour and obtained for himself the government of Khurasan.

Let us return to the history of Ibn Mufarrigh. The narrator says: He continued passing from one town of Syria to another and satirizing the sons of Ziyad. His poems having reached Basra, 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ziyad, the emir of the two 'Iraqs, wrote on that subject to (the khalif) Mu'awiyah or, by another and more correct account, to Yazid (the son and successor of Mu'awiyah).

In this letter he said: 'Ibn Mufarrigh has satirized Ziyad and the sons of Ziyad; calumniating the former in his grave and covering the latter with eternal dishonour. From them he has passed to Abu Sufyan, whom he stigmatizes as a fornicator, and whose sons he attacks in the foulest language. He escaped from Sijistan, and I caused such strict search to be made for him that he fled the country.<sup>12</sup> He has now reached Syria where he mangles our 11 The country surrounding Damascus and covered with the gardens is called the Ghutah.

12 Literally: that the country spat him out, i.e., rejected him, was too hot to hold him.

reputation<sup>13</sup> and tears our honour to pieces. I send you the satires which he has directed against us, so that you may be induced to do us justice," He then sent (to the khalif Yazid) all the poems that Ibn Mufarrigh had composed on them. Yazid gave orders that search should be made for the offender who, being thus obliged to fly from one place to another, was driven out of Syria. He then went to Basra and stopped at the house of al-Ahnaf Ibn Qays. Of this person, whose real name was al-Dahhak, we have already spoken (vol. I, p. 635) his prudence became proverbial. Al-Ahnaf, of whom he asked protection, replied in these terms. "Were I to promise you my protection against the son of Sumayyah<sup>14</sup>, I should only be deceiving you (fughirra); I can protect any man against his own family but not against the person under whose authority he is."<sup>15</sup> The poet then went to others, none of whom would engage to protect him, but he at last obtained from al-Mundhir Ibn at Jarud al-'Abdi<sup>16</sup> a promise to that effect. As 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ziyad was the husband of al-Mundhir's daughter and respected no man so much as her father, the latter, presuming on his influence over him, gave, inconsiderately, an asylum to the poet. 'Ubayd Allah was already informed of the fugitive's arrival in Basra. When he learned that he had taken refuge at al-Mundhir's, he sent for the latter and, when he appeared before him, he dispatched to his house some of the police guards. The dwelling was searched, Ibn Mufarrigh arrested, and his protector knew nothing of the matter till he saw the prisoner standing beside him. On this, he rose up, went over to 'Ubayd Allah and spoke to him in favour of his guest. "Emir! said he, "I implore you, in God's name, not to discredit my right of protection: I promised that man to be answerable for his safety." 'Ubayd Allah answered: "Mundhir Allah!<sup>17</sup> I have no objection to that man's composing verses in praise of your father and you, but he has satirized both me and my father, and yet you try to screen him from my vengeance. God forbid that he escape me! that shall never be, and I shall not pardon him." Al-

---

13 Literally: where he devours our flesh.

14 Ziyad, the father of 'Abbad, was the son of Sumayyah. See her history farther on.

15 Lit.: but not against his sultan.

16 Abu'l Ash'ath al-Mundhir Ibn al-Jarud al-'Abdi was appointed governor of Istakhar by 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib; and, in the year 62 (A.D. 681-2), he was nominated to the government of Sind by 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ziyad, who was then emir of Iraq. Al-Mundhir died in Sind.-- (Masrif, Nujum, Baladhuri.)

17 Mundhir Allah means: monitor or God. Was that Ibn al-Jarud's real name?

Mundhir replied in an angry tone and received this answer: "You presume too much on your daughter that is with me; by Allah! if I please, I shall separate from her and signify to her a full and absolute divorce. "Al-Mundhir retired and 'Ubayd Allah then turned towards the poet and said: "Evil for 'Abbad has been your fellowship with him." The prisoner replied: "Evil for me has been his fellowship. I preferred him to Sa'id Ibn 'Uthman and spent, in accompanying him, all that I possessed. I imagined that he was not devoid of intelligence such as Ziyad's, of mildness such as Mu'awiyah's and of liberality such as that of the Quraysh; but he disappointed all my expectations, treated me with indignity and made me suffer every thing disagreeable, imprisonment, (persecution for) debt, upbraiding and beatings. I was like the man who watched delusive lightnings proceeding from a cloud without rain; he hoped that it would pour showers upon him and he died of thirst. I fled from your brother because I feared that he would act in a manner of which he would have to repent. Now, I am in your power do with me what you please." 'Ubayd Allah sent him to prison and then addressed to Yazid Ibn Mu'awiyah a letter in which he asked permission to put the poet to death. Yazid wrote back to him in these terms: "you must avoid putting him to death, but you may serve him for a lesson and make your authority to be respected, without endangering his life. He has relations in my army (jund) and among the persons of my court: were he put to death, they would be displeased with me and nothing would calm them except retaliating on you. Avoid that; know that all things are taken seriously by them and by me and that they would make you responsible for his death. Without going so far as to take his life, you have sufficient latitude for satisfying your anger." 'Ubayd Allah, on receiving this letter, gave orders that the prisoner should be obliged to drink so sweet nabidh (grape-juice) containing an infusion of shubrum (euphorbia), -- or, as some say, of turbid (turbith). This produced a diarrhoea and, whilst he was in that state, they paraded him through the city, with a she-cat and a sow tied on his (shoulders). The drug began to operate and the little boys ran after him, hooting and shouting. The evacuation persisted with such violence that he lost his strength and fell to the ground. 'Ubayd Allah being then told that they could not answer for his life, ordered him to be washed and taken back to prison. When they were washing him, he recited this verse:

Water can wash away what I have done, but my words (satires) shall remain even when your bones are mouldered into dust.

'Ubayd Allah, being asked why he chose such a punishment for the poet, answered: He cast his filth on us and I intended that the sow should discharge her filth on him".<sup>18</sup> Out of the numerous verses directed by Ibn Mufarrigh against 'Abbad Ibn Ziyad, we may cite the following:

Now, that Mu'awiyah the (grand-) son of Harab, is dead, announced to your vase (your influence?) already cracked, that it will soon be (completely) broken. I now declare, (O Ziyad!) that your mother (did not lay) lay aside her veil (her dress) in order to have intercourse with Abu Sufyan but a thing occurred of a doubtful nature, and in (a moment of) great fear and trepidation.

The following verses are by the same poet.

Come! announce to Mu'awiyah, the son of Sakhr (Abu Sufyan), a message from the man of Yaman.<sup>19</sup> Are you angry when people say that your father was chaste, and pleased, when they call him an adulterer? (In that case,) I declare that your relationship (rihm) to Ziyad and that Sakhr never approached Sumayyah.

The expression. I declare that your relationship to Ziyad, etc., is borrowed from the following verse, belonging to a poem which was composed by Hassan Ibn Thabit al-Ansari,<sup>20</sup> surnamed Abu'l Walid, or, according to some, Abu 'Abd al-Rahman:

I declare that your relationship (ill) to the family of Quraysh is like the relationship of the young camel (saqb) to the young ostrich (ral).

The word ill has the same meaning as rihm; saqb means a camel's foal; ral means a young ostrich, The following verses were composed by Hassan Ibn Thabit on Abu Sufyan (Ibn al-Harith):<sup>21</sup>

Come! announce to Abu Sufyan a message from me to him, for that which was hidden has been brought to light. You 18 From this we should infer that it was not the poet but the sow which had taken the purgative draught. Muslim writers are sometimes very inattentive.

19 The poet was proud of belonging by birth to the powerful party of the Yamanites.

20 Hassan Ibn Thabit, one of the poets employed by Muhammad to satirize his adversaries, lived to the age of one hundred and twenty years, as his father, grandfather had done before him. He died A.H. 54 (A.D. 673-4).--(Nujum.)

21 See lower down, in the same page.

lampooned Muhammad and I answer in his defense; my recompense for that I shall find with God. How dare you attack him; you that are not his equal? May the worst (sharr) of you two be sacrificed to save the best (khayr). Assuredly, my father my father's father and my honour are sufficient to protect the honour of Muhammad against your insults.

The phrase: may the worst of you two, etc., gave rise to a discussion among the learned, because the words khayr and sharr are terms which express superiority and require to be associated (with a compliment).<sup>22</sup> Hassan Ibn Thabit composed this answer by order of the Prophet. I may here observe that in the Prophet's family were five individuals who resembled him in their looks; namely, this Abu Sufyan (Ibn al-Harith Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib), al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, Ja'far Ibn Abi Talib, Qutham Ibn al-'Abbas Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib, and al-Saib Ibn 'Ubayd Ibn 'Abd Yazid Ibn Hashim Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib Ibn 'Abd Manaf, the ancestor of the Imam al-Shafi'i.<sup>23</sup>

This Abu Sufyan became a Muslim on the day in which Makkah was taken; that happened in the eighth year of the Hijrah. His subsequent conduct attested the sincerity of his conversion. He accompanied the prophet during the campaign of Taif and Hunayn. When the Muslims were routed at the battle of Hunayn, Abu Sufyan was one of the seven who stood firm and remained with the Prophet, till those who had fled rallied and came back. They then obtained the victory and a booty of five thousand captives. These the Prophet set at liberty. An account of this (battle) would form a long narrative, for which this is not a fit place. On that day, Abu Sufyan held the Prophet's mule by the bridle, without ever letting go his hold; and the Prophet used to say: "I hope to find in him one capable of replacing Hamzah Ibn 'Abd al-Muttalib." He declared also that Abu Sufyan would be one of those who were to enter into Paradise. He said also, "Abu Sufyan Ibn al-Harith is one of the youths of Paradise." or (according to another statement), "the chief of the youth of the people of Paradise." Most of the learned consider the surname (Abu Sufyan) to be his real name and say that he had no other; but some of them declare that his name was al-Mughirah. Others again say that al-

---

22 The author means to say that they are really adjectives in the comparative degree, although they have not the form proper to such adjectives. Formed according to rule, they would have been a 'Khyar and asharr'.

23 This genealogy agrees with that given by Ibn Durayd in his Ishtiqiq. The same genealogy as it occurs in the life of al-Shafi'i (vol. II, p. 569), is faulty, --some of the names being incorrectly spelled.

Mughirah was the name of his brother, that he was called Abu Sufyan and nothing more. It is stated that, from the time of his conversion to Islam, he never dared to look the Prophet in the face, so much was he ashamed of having satirized him at a former period.

Let us resume our account of Ibn Mufarrigh. He is one of the poets who are mentioned in the Hamasa. We find there<sup>24</sup> this piece of his:

Behold! Zaynab visited me towards the close of the night (and I said to her): "Blessings be upon you! have come back, the (happy) days I passed (with you)?" She replied; "Avoid us and approach us not." (I answered); "How can I avoid you who are the sole object of my wishes? People ask if the sports of love continue when thirty years are passed, and I answer: Can they exist before the thirtieth year. The arrival of hoariness would be a great misfortune if, when it appears, the palanquin (riders?) were precluded from every sport."

The Spanish author al-Muzaffar<sup>25</sup> says, in his great historical works, that, joined to those verses (min jumlahhadhi 'l-abyat) were the following:

Were my body<sup>26</sup>, when it grows weak, to become the sport of noble princes (?) or (the prey) of lions or of wolves, that (thought) would alleviate my sufferings and console me in my misfortune; but (I cannot be consoled because) she who was the most cruel to me<sup>27</sup> exists no more.

When al-Husayn, the son of 'Ali Ibn Talib, was informed of Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan's death and the accession [bay'ah] of Yazid, the son of (Mu'dwiyah) (to the khalifate), he resolved on proceeding to Kufa, whither he had been invited by a letter addressed to him by a number of the inhabitants of that city. This is one of the well-

24 See Freytagh Hamasa, page 572.

25 Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Muhammad Ibn Maslamah the second 'Aftaside sovereign of Badajoz, bore the title of al-Muzaffar (the victorious). He composed a work in fifty volumes, forming an encyclopedia of all the sciences, historical annals, biography, literature, etc. This immense compilation was named after him the Muzaffarian. The author died A.H. 460 (A.D. 1068). —Maqqari vol. II, p. 258 and 763 of the Leyden edition, and vol. I, p. 147 of the English translation by Gayangos.

26 Literally: my flesh.

27 Lit: the most ardent in worrying my flesh.

known circumstances of the affair which cost al-Husayn his life. During that time, he often recited and applied to his own case the following verses of a poem composed by Yazid Ibn Mufarrigh:

May I never spread terror through the flocks and herds by an incursion made at morning's dawn, if I call not Yazid (to simple combat) on the day in which, not without fear, he does (me) an injustice! May the fates watch (to seize) me, if I avoid (the combat).<sup>28</sup>

The persons who heard him discovered from this that he intended to have a struggle with Yazid Ibn Mu'awiyah for the supreme power. He set out for Kufa and when he drew near it, the governor, 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ziyad sent against him a body of troops commanded by 'Umar Ibn Sa'd Ibn Abi Waqqas. Al-Husayn was slain at Taff and then happened what happened. It is related that (before this) Mu'awiyah had written to him in these terms: "I am certain that you have taken into your head the idea of assailing (our government) and that you will be unable to conceal it. If I be then living, I shall most willingly forgive you."

It is stated that (the Umayyad khalif) 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz said: "Were I one of al-Husayn's murderers and were God pleased to pardon me and to admit me into Paradise, I should not enter there, so much I would feel ashamed in the presence of God's apostle." 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ziyad said to al-Harithah Ibn Badr al-Ghudani<sup>29</sup>: "What think you will happen to me and to al-Husayn on the day of the resurrection?" Received from him this answer: "His father and 28 In this piece the words wa la daaoutu Yazida seem equivalent to illa (or in la) daaoutu Yazida. The translator adopts this opinion the more readily as the expression la min kada wa la min kada does not mean: neither of this nor of that; but: not only this but that. For examples, see the Arabic text of Ibn Khaldun's Prolegomena, Parts edition, tome I, p. 247 and tome III, p. 270.

---

29 Al-Ghudani الغداني is the right reading: see Ibn Durayd's Ishtiaq, page 140. That author informs us that al-Harithah Ibn Badr, surnamed Abu'l 'Anbas, was distinguished for his courage, his love of good wine and the rectitude of his judgment. Ziyad (Ibn Abih), with whom he was a great favourite, had his name inscribed on the roll of the Qurayshite troops (in order that he might receive a higher pay). He had been designated by 'Umar Ibn al-Rabi' as commander of the troops which were to be sent against the Azarika (vol. II, p. 514) of al-Ahwas, but al-Muhallab (vol. III, p. 508) forestalled him. He was drowned at that place. For more information respecting the character, conduct and death of this Arabic chieftain, see the first volume of Dozy's Historie des Musulmans d'Espagne, tome I, pages 139, 141, 1e, seq.

his grandfather will intercede for him; your father and your grandfather will intercede for you. Learn from that what you want to know!"

The Mir'at al-Zaman (mirror of time), a historical work drawn up in the form of annals and composed by Shams al-Din Abu'l-Muzaffar Yusuf Ibn Qizughli, surnamed Sibt Ibn al-Jawsi<sup>30</sup>, because he was the son of Abu'l-Faraj Ibn al-Jawsi (vol. II, p. 96) daughter, and the autograph of which, in forty volumes, I saw at Damascus, contains, under the year 59 of the Hijrah, an account of what passed between Yazid Ibn Mufarrigh and the sons of Ziyad. He then adds: "Yazid Ibn Mufarrigh died in the year 69," that is to say, of the Hijrah, (A.D. 688-9). God knows best<sup>31</sup>! Abu'l-Yaqzan (vol. II, p. 578) says in his

30 See vol. I, p. 439.

31 Here the author finishes his account of Ibn Mufarrigh, without informing us what became of him when he was delivered up to 'Abbad. Had he continued his extracts from that poet's biography as given in the Kitab al-Aghani, he would not have left his readers in the dark. In order to repair his omission I insert here an abridged account of Ibn Mufarrigh's subsequent adventures, as related in the Aghani. During his detention in the prison to which 'Ubayd Allah had sent him, he never ceased composing satires on the family of Ziyad. 'Ubayd Allah, being informed of this, had him taken under escort, to his brother 'Abbad. (Here, in the Aghani, the names of the two brothers are displaced, one being put for the other.) The guards had orders to pass with to every caravanserai (khan) at which he had stopped on flying from 'Abbad, and to force him to efface all the satirical verses which he had written on the walls of the chambers in which he had lodged. As they would allow him no instrument with which he might scratch out the writings, he had to employ his nails and, when these were worn out and the tips of his fingers used to the bone, he was obliged to efface the obnoxious line with his blood. 'Abbad, to whom he was then delivered, put him into close confinement. The poet succeeded however, in discovering a man who, for a recompense, went to Damascus and there recited aloud, in one of the most public places, (the ms, has درب دمشق two verses by which the Yamanite troops were informed that their countryman and relative was kept in prison by the son of Ziyad. These Arabs, yielding to the spirit of party which animated the Yamanites against the Qaysides, could not suppress their indignation and carried their complaint before the khalif Mu'awiyah. He at first refused to grant what they demanded and sent them away, but then, listening to the dictates of his usual prudence, he had them called back and granted their request. A letter sent by him to 'Abbad procured the poet his liberty. Ibn Mufarrigh then waited on Mu'awiyah and obtained from him a full pardon with a gift of ten thousand dirhems (£250), on the condition of his not attaching the family of Ziyad. Having received from him also the permission of inhabiting whatever province he proceeded to Mosul and form

(Contd. on the next page)

Kitab al-Nisab (book of patronymics): "'Abbad Ibn Ziyad died A.H. 100 (A.D. 718-9) at Jarud."--Jarud is a village situated in the dependencies of Damascus and lying in the government of Hims (Emessa). Onagers are extremely abundant in that country. When the division of Egyptian troops entered into Syria, A.H. 660 (A.D. 1261-2) and marched against Antioch with the troops of Syria, it halted for a short time at Damascus, where I then was, and from that it returned back. The army entered into Damascus towards the end of the month of Sha'ban of that year (July, 1262). A person belonging to that army related to me a circumstance so curious that it may very well be mentioned here. They had halted at Jarud, the place of which we are speaking, and hunted down a great number of onagers. So, at least, they said. A soldier, having killed one of them, proceeded to cook its flesh in the usual manner. Being unable to bring it to a proper state of coction, he added wood to the fire and augmented the flame; but that produced no effect, although the fire was kept up for a whole day. Another soldier then rose, took up the animal's head and found on the ear an inscription which, when he read it, proved to be the name of Bahram Gur. When they brought me the ear, I found the mark to be quite visible, the hair on the ear being as the smallest shreds. This Bahram Gur was one of the (ancient) kings of the Persians and lived a long time before our Prophet. When that prince took more animals at the chase than he required, he would mark some of them and let them go. God knows how old this onager was when Bahram captured it and to what age it would have reached, had they set it at liberty and not killed it. The fact is that the onager is one of the long-lived animals. This individual must have lived that to Basra. He then went to see 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ziyad and offered him his excuses. These were well received and procured for him the authorisation of going to the province of Kerman. Some time after, he returned to Iraq and continued passing from one place to another till he at length obtained the favour of Mansur Ibn al-Hakam (?). He returned to Basra when 'Ubayd Allah feed from that place to avoid being murdered by the inhabitants who, seeing the troops of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr every where victorious, had resolved on taking their governor's life, 'Ubayd Allah was killed at the battle of the Zab, A.H. 67 (A.D. 687), in fighting against al-Mukhatr. For the history of the latter, the first volume of Dozy's brilliant and conscientiously written work on the Spanish Musulmans may be usefully consulted. When Ibn Mufarrigh returned to Basra, he renewed his attacks against the Ziyad family. Some time afterwards, he received abundant presents from 'Ubayd Allah, the son of Abu Bakra, and settled at al-Ahwaz where he continued to spend his wealth with the greatest liberality.--The article of the Kitab al-Aghani is very long and contains a great quantity of verses, anecdotes and digressions which are here omitted.

upwards of eight hundred years.<sup>32</sup> In the territory of Jarud is situated the famous mountain called al-Mudakhkhan. It is mentioned by Abu Nuwas (vol. I, p. 391) in the poem wherein he names the places at which he halted on his way to Egypt, where he intended to visit al-Khasib.<sup>33</sup> He says:

Towards the East I saw the temples of Tadmur (Palmyra) and found them empty: they are walls facing the summit of al-Mudakhkhan.

This name must be pronounced Muddakhhan.<sup>34</sup> The mountain was so called because it is always capped with clouds which appear like a mass of smoke (dukhan). — I since read the following passage in the Mafatih al-'Ulum (the keys of the sciences), a work composed by Muhammad Ibn Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Yusuf al-Khuwarazmi: "Bahram Gur was the son of Bahram, the son of Sapur al-Junud, the son of Sapur Dhu'l-Aktaf. He was called Bahram Gur because he was fond of hunting the 'ayr. This last word serves to designate both the wild and the domestic ass."<sup>35</sup> Having calculated the duration of their dynasty from that period to the Hijrah, I found it to be two hundred and sixteen years. This onager must therefore have lived for more than eight hundred years, if we count from the time it was marked by Bahram Gur till the year 660, when it was killed; But God knows best!

In this article, frequent mention has been made of Ziyad, of his sons, of Sumayyah, of Abu Sufyan and of Mu'awiyah, as also of the poems composed upon them by Ibn Mufarrigh; now, as readers not acquainted with the facts may desire some information respecting them, I shall give here a summary account of the affair. There was a king of Yaman called Abu'l Jabr, of whom Ibn Durayd (vol. III, p.

32 The inscription was perhaps traced on the ear after the death of the animal.

33 Abu Nasr Khasib Ibn 'Abd al-Hamid was appointed intendant of the finances in Egypt, by the khalif Harun al-Rashid. According to Elmacin (al-Makin), page 119, and the author of the Rawd al-Akhyar, cited by Reiske in the Annals of Abulfeda, t. III. p. 751, Khasib's nomination took place in the year 190 (A.D. 305-6). This fact I do not find mentioned in the Nujum, a work of which the main subject is the history of Egypt, Al-Khasib was noted for his generosity and highly praised by the poets of the day.

34 This appears to be an error: the measure of the preceding verse requires the redoubling of the third consonant, not of the second.

35 Gur is the Persian name of the onager or wild ass. Our author has written Jur.

31) has spoken in the following verse of his celebrated qasidah which is entitled the Maqsurah:

And sadness mingled with the soul of Abu Jabr, till death joined him to the number of those whom it had already seized.

The surname Abu'l Jabr was his real name, some say that his name was Yazid and that he was the son of Shurahbil the Kindite; others state that Abu'l Jabr was really his name and that he was the son of 'Amr. Having been dethroned by his subjects, he went to Persia for the purpose of obtaining from Kisra (Chosroes) the assistance of a body of troops. The Persian king sent with him a band of his Asawirah (cavalry). When they reached Kazimah and saw the sterility and unproductiveness of Arabia, they said: "Where is this man taking us to?" and then delivered some poison to his cook promising him, at the same time, an ample recompense, if he put it into the meat which was to be served before the king. This was done, and the food had no sooner settled in his stomach, than he felt intense pain. When the Asawirah were informed of this, they went in to where he was and said to him: "Since you are reduced to such a state, give us a letter for king Chosroes, in which you have authorised us to return." He wrote a letter for them to that effect and, feeling some alleviation, he proceeded to Taif, the town situated in the vicinity of Makkah, and put himself under the care of al-Harith Ibn Kaladah the Thaqafite, who was the great physician of the Arabs and who resided there. Ibn Kaladah treated and cured him, for which service he received from his patient a rich present in which were included (a slave-girl named) Sumayyah and (a slave named) 'Ubayd. Kisra had given them to Abu'l Jabr. The latter then set out for Yaman but, having had a relapse, he died on the way.

Ibn Kaladah gave Sumayyah in marriage to 'Ubayd, and she had a son whilst 'Ubayd was still living.<sup>36</sup> Her son was called by various names, such as Ziyad Ibn 'Ubayd, Ziyad Ibn Sumayyah, Ziyad Ibn Abihi (Ziyad, the son of his father) and Ziyad Ibn Ummihi (Ziyad the son of his mother).<sup>37</sup> Those were the appellations by which he was known before his adoption (into the Umayyah family by Mu'awiyah, an occurrence of we shall speak farther on. Sumayyah had also by al-Harith Ibn Kaladah a son named Abu Bakrah Nafi' نافع.

36 Literally: she brought forth a son on the bed of 'Ubayd. The Muslim law term: a child born on the bed of such a one, indicates that it was born in wedlock.

37 The three last denominations indicate that he was considered as a bastard, begot by an unknown father. Ziyad was so named by his enemies.

Ibn al-Harith, whom some persons call Nafi' Ibn Masruh and who became known, under the name of Abu Bakrah, as one of the Prophet's Companions. She had also two other sons, one named Shibi Ibn Ma'bad, and the other Nafi' (نافع) Ibn al-Harith. These were the four brothers who bore witness against al-Mughirah Ibn Shu'bah as being an adulterer. When we finish our account of Ziyad, we shall speak of that affair.

In the time of heathenism [al-jahiliyah], Abu Sufyan Sakhr Ibn Harb the Umayyad and the father of Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan, had incurred (disreputable) suspicions in consequence of his frequent visits to Sumayyah. It was in the time of their acquaintance that she gave birth to Ziyad, but she had still her husband 'Ubayd.<sup>38</sup> When Ziyad grew up, he displayed great talents and command of language, and became an orator whose eloquence, sagacity and intelligence filled the Arabs with admiration. It was for that reason that Abu Musa al-Ash'ari, on being appointed to the government of Basra by 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, took Ziyad Ibn Abihi for his secretary. Some time after, Ziyad brought a message from Abu Musa to 'Umar, who was so highly pleased with him that he ordered him a present of one thousand dirhems (£ 25). When Ziyad was gone, 'Umar thought of the money (he had given) and said: "There is one thousand lost, since Ziyad has gotten it." The next time that Ziyad came to see him, he said to him: "What has become of your thousand?" Ziyad answered: "I purchased a little slave ('Ubayd) with them and gave him his liberty. By the word 'Ubayd' he meant his own father (who was so called). 'Umar replied: "Your thousand has not been spent uselessly. Will you bear to Abu-Musa al-Ash'ari a letter in which I order him to take another secretary in place of you?" Ziyad answered: "Most willingly; provided that the order does not proceed from a feeling of anger (against me)." "It does not proceed from any feeling of anger;" replied 'Umar. "Why then, said Ziyad, do you send him such an order?" (When dispatches were brought to 'Umar from Basra, he preferred that Ziyad should be the bearer of them, because he was sure of obtaining from him satisfactory information). He then gave him a government in the dependencies of Basra and soon after, took it from him [job] saying: "It is not as disgrace that I depose you, but I am unwilling that your superior intelligence should contribute to the oppression of the people (an ahmil' alu'n-nasi fadl 'aqlika)."

Abu Musa, having dismissed Ziyad, took for secretary al-Husayn Ibn Abi 'l-Hurr al-'Anbari. A dispatch, written by the latter, was received by 'Umar who, finding in it a fault of orthography, wrote back these words to Abu Musa: Give a flogging to your secretary." Ziyad, being sent by 'Umar to quell some troubles which had broken out in Yaman (accomplished his mission so promptly that he) had scarcely arrived when he set out again. On his return, he addressed the people in a speech the like of which they had never heard before. 'Amr Ibn al-'Asi then said: "By Allah! did that youth belong to the family of Quraysh he would (force the Arabs to obey and) drive them before them with his stick." Abu Sufyan, hearing this, said: "By Allah! I know the man who deposited him in his mother's womb." "Tell me," said 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, "who he was." "It was I," replied Abu Sufyan. "Take care of what you say, Abu Sufyan!" said 'Ali. To this the other answered by the following lines:

38 Lit: she brought him forth on 'Ubayd's bed.

By Allah! were I not afraid, O 'Ali! that a certain person might look on me as his enemy, I, Sakhr Ibn Harb, should reveal the secret, even had there been no question of Ziyad. Long ago I was on good terms with (the tribe of) Thaqif and I then left a proof of my affection.<sup>39</sup>

When 'Ali obtained the supreme authority, Ziyad was sent by him to Persia, where he reduced all the country to obedience, protected it against attacks, collected the imports and remedied abuses, Mu'awiyah then wrote to him with the intention of turning him against 'Ali but this letter had no effect and was to 'Ali by him who had received it. In it were some verses which I abstain from inserting here. 'Ali wrote back to Ziyad in these terms: "I appointed you to the commandment which you hold, because I thought you worthy of it. In your present career, you cannot obtain the object you have in view unless you act with patience and a sincere conviction. 'Under the rule of 'Umar, Abu Sufyan committed a fault by which no relationship or right of inheritance can be established. As for Mu'awiyah, he can circumvent any man; so be on your guard against him; be on your guard! Receive my salutation." When Ziyad read this letter, he exclaimed: "I swear by the Lord of the Ka'bah, that the father of al-Husayn (i.e. 'Ali) bears witness in favour of me." It was this (communication) which emboldened Ziyad and Mu'awiyah to act as they (afterwards) did al-Hasan, the son of 'Ali, having obtained the khalifate after the murder of his father, gave up the supreme authority to Mu'awiyah, a fact which is well known. Mu'awiyah then endeavoured to gain over Ziyad and acquire his good will, so that he might be induced to serve him with the same fidelity that he had shewn to 'Ali. This, joined to the words which escaped from his father in the presence of 'Ali and 'Amr Ibn al-'Asi (produced the desired effect) and in the forty-fourth year of the Hijrah Ziyad was acknowledged by Mu'awiyah (as his brother) and became known by the name of Ziyad Ibn Abi Sufyan.

---

39 Lit: the fruit of my heart.

When Abu Bakrah was informed that his brother had been adopted, with his own consent into the family of Mu'awiyah he declared most solemnly that he would never speak to him again. "That fellow," said he, "declares his mother to be an adultress and disavows his father. By Allah! I do not think that Sumayyah ever saw Abu Sufayn. Evil befall him! how will he manage with Umm Habibah, the daughter of Abu Sufyan and the widow of the Prophet. If he goes to visit her, she will refuse him admittance, and thus disgrace him, and, if she receive him, she will be guilty of an act injurious to the profound respect which all have for the Prophet."

Under the reign of Mu'awiyah, Ziyad went to Makkah for the purpose of making the pilgrimage and meant to visit Umm Habibah under the pretext that he and Mu'awiyah considered her as his sister but he then thought of what Abu Bakrah had said and abandoned his intention. According to another account, Umm Habibah refused to receive him, and, if we are to believe another statement, he made the pilgrimage but paid no visit in consequence of the words uttered by Abu Bakrah. "May God reward Abu Bakrah! said he, "he never, in any case, gives bad advice." Having gone to see Mu'awiyah, for whom he was acting as lieutenant, he took with him a magnificent present containing, amongst other objects, a collar of pearls so valuable that it excited Mu'awiyah's admiration. He then addressed him in these terms: "Commander of the faithful! I have subdued for you that country,"--meaning 'Iraq,--"I have collected for you its tribute, both by land and by sea, and have brought you the almond with its shell." On this, Yazid Ibn Mu'awiyah, who was sitting in the room, said to him: "If you have really done that, we shall transfer you from (the tribe of) Thaqif to (that of) Quraysh, from 'Ubayd to Abu Sufyan and from the rank of a secretary to that of governor."<sup>40</sup> Mu'awiyah, on hearing these words, said to Yazid. "That is quite enough! you are the flint I wanted for striking fire from my steel."<sup>41</sup> Abu'l-Hasan al-Mada'ini (vol. I, p. 438) states that the katib Abu'l Zubayr told him that Abu Ishaq related to him what follows: "Ziyad, <sup>40</sup> Literally: from the pen to the pulpit. In the manuscripts we read manabir (pulpits).

<sup>41</sup> That is: you hit precisely on my idea.

after purchasing his father 'Ubayd, went to see 'Umar, who said to him: "What did you do with your pay, the first time you received it?" Ziyad replied: "I purchased my father with it." This answer gave great pleasure to 'Umar. The anecdote (told above concerning Yazid and Ziyad) is in contradiction, with the statement that it was Mu'awiyah who declared Ziyad a member (of the tribe of Quraysh). When Mu'awiyah acknowledged Ziyad (as his brother), the Umyyads went to see him (and remonstrate). One of them, named 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn al-Hakam, and brother to Marwan Ibn al-Hakam, then addressed him in these terms: "Mu'awiyah, had you found none but negroes (Zanj) to adopt, you would have (taken them for member of your family and) outnumbered us by (an act of) meanness and degradation." Mu'awiyah (on hearing this reproach), went up to Marwan, 'Abd al-Rahman's brother, and said: "Turn out that blackguard." Marwan replied: "By Allah! (for you to say) that he is a blackguard is not to borne." Mu'awiyah: "By Allah! were it not for my mildness and clemency, I should teach you that it must be borne. Did he not send me verses composed by himself against Ziyad and me? Hear them from my lips:

"Come! say to Mu'awiyah, the son of Sakhr: "We cannot suffer what you have done. Are you angry when people say that your father was chaste and pleased when they say he was an adulterer?"

We have already given the rest of this piece and attributed it to Ibn Mufarrigh; but there is a difference of opinion respecting its author: some say that it was composed by Ibn Mufarrigh, and others, by 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn al-Hakam. In the former case, the first verse is that which has been previously given; in the latter, it must be read as it is here.

Ziyad, on his adoption by Mu'awiyah was treated by him with great favour, obtained a commandment and became one of his most effective supporters in the contestations with the sons of 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib. It is related that, when he was governor of the two 'Iraqs, he caused active search to be made for a man named Ibn Sarh who was a partisan of al-Hasan, [the son of 'Ali] the son of Abu Talib. The name of this person had been included in the act of amnesty granted to the companions of al-Hasan, when the latter abdicated the khalifate in favour of Mu'awiyah. Al-Hasan, in consequence, wrote, the following letter to Ziya: "From al-Hasan to Ziyad: You know that we obtained an amnesty for our partisans, and yet Ibn Sarh informs me that he has been exposed to your attacks. I therefore request that you act towards him only for his good. Receive my salutation." This letter commenced by the writer's name and did not give to Ziyad the surname of the son of Abu Sufyan. Ziyad was offended at it and replied in these terms: "From Ziyad, the son of Abu Sufyan, to al-Hasan: I received your letter concerning a reprobate who is now harboured by others, by partisan of yours and of your father. By Allah! I shall pursue and arrest him, even were he (hidden) between your skin and your flesh. The flesh that I most wish to devour is that of which you are a part." When al-Hasan received this epistle, he sent it to Mu'awiyah who, on reading it, was so indignant that he wrote to Ziyad a letter containing these words: From Mu'awiyah, the son of Abu Sufyan, to Ziyad: Al-Hasan, the son of 'Ali, has sent to me a letter written by you in answer to one in which he spoke to you concerning Abu Sarh. Its contents surprised me greatly and I perceived by it that you have two ways of judging matters, one which you inherited from Abu Sufyan, and the other from Sumayyah. That which you owe to Abu Sufyan is all prudence and precaution: the other, for which you are indebted to Sumayyah, is just such as should be expected from one like her. It was the last which produced the letter in which you revile al-Hasan and treat him as a reprobate. Now, by my life! you are more deserving of that epithet than he. If, through a sentiment of superiority, he commenced his letter by his own name, that could not derogate from your merit; but, by rejecting the application made by him in favour of a person whom he thought deserving of his intercession, you have thrown off your own shoulders a task which shall be executed by one who has a better right to accomplish it than you. On the receipt of this, my letter, restore to Ibn Sarh the property of his which is in your hands and do not attempt to injure it. I have written to al-Hasan, informing him that, if he pleases, the fugitive may either stay with him or return to his own country, [balad] and that you have been prohibited from harming him either by word or deed. In your letter to al-Hasan, you call him by his name without mentioning of whom he is the son; I therefore let you know, inconsiderate fellow! that al-Hasan is above the reach of contempt.<sup>42</sup> Did you then think that his father was so contemptible a person? but that person was 'Ali the son of Abu Talib; or did you think it (not) worth while to join his name to that of his mother was Fatimah, the daughter of the Apostle of God, and, if you have any intelligence remaining, you must acknowledge that therein he excels us all. Receive my salutation." — The word rajwani is a dual which (has a plural signification and) means places of danger.

---

42 The Arabic words have this meaning, but their literal signification is: the two sides (rajawani) cannot bandy him about; that is, he is not to be cast from side to side. Lower down, the author explains (rajawani) by its figurative signification.

I must here observe that the same anecdote is related in another form, and shall therefore give it here: Sa'id Ibn Sarh was a mawla<sup>43</sup> to Kurayz Ibn Habib Ibn 'Abd Shams, one of 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib's partisans. When Ziyad, the son of his father (Ibn Abih) arrived at Kufa in the capacity of governor, he persecuted Ibn Sa'id and caused strict search to be made after him. Ibn Sa'id then went to Madinah and alighted at the door of al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali, who said to him: "What has forced you to quit your residence and come here?" The fugitive told his story and described the conduct of Ziyad towards him. Al-Hasan therefore wrote to Ziyad in these terms: "You engaged towards a certain Musulman that he should partake of all the advantages enjoyed by those of his belief, and incur the same obligations which are imposed on them. Yet you have pulled down his house, seized on his property and arrested the members of his family. Therefore, when this, my letter, reaches you, rebuild his house, and restore to him his property and the members of his family; I have given him hospitality and have been requested by him to interfere in this matter." To this Ziyad replied: "From Ziyad the son of Abu Sufyan, to al-Hasan the son of Fatimah: I received your letter, in which you commence by placing your own name before mine, and yet you request of me a service; you, a man of the people, from me, a sovereign (sultan)! You write to me in favour of a reprobate whom none would harbour except a reprobate like himself; and, what is still worse, he has found in you a patron (tawallihi lyaka)! You have allowed him to reside with you, him disaffected (to government) and taking pleasure in being so. But, by Allah! you shall not save him from me even were he hidden between your skin and your flesh; and certainly the flesh that I should most like to devour is that of which you are a part. Deliver him up by the halter<sup>43</sup> to one who has a better right to him than you. If I then pardon him, it shall not be in consequence of your intercession and, if I put him to death, it shall be on account of the love you bear him." When al-Hasan read this epistle, he wrote to Mu'awiyah an account of Ibn Sarh's affair and enclosed in the letter (a copy of) his own to Ziyad and the answer which he had received. He wrote also a letter to Ziyad (and addressed it) thus: "From al-Hasan, the son of Fatimah, who was the daughter of the Apostle of God, to Ziyad, the son of Sumayyah, who was a slave of the tribe of Thaqif, (to Ziyad) legitimate by birth and yet the son of an abandoned adulterer." When Mu'awiyah read al-Hasan's letter (he was so much ashamed that) Syria seemed too narrow 43 This is common proverbial expression; it refers to the practice of leaving the halter on the animal which is sold, in order that the purchaser may lead it away without difficulty.

---

to hold him, and he wrote to Ziyad in the terms which we have already mentioned.<sup>44</sup>

'Ubayd Allah Ibn Ziyad declared that, of all the verses directed against him, none wounded his feelings so much as the following, which were composed by Ibn Mufarrigh:

Reflect for reflection may give you a moral lesson. Are you not indebted for all your honours to your nomination as governor? As long as Sumayyah lived, she never suspected that her son belonged to the tribe of Quraysh.

Qatadah (vol. II. p. 513) relates that Ziyad, when on the point of death, said to his sons: "O, that your father had been a shepherd leading his flocks to countries far and near, and that what he came by had never befallen him!"

The verses directed by Ibn Mufarrigh against Ziyad and his sons are all of the same cast: he treats them as pretenders and goes so far as to say of the sons of Sumayyah:

Ziyad, Nafi' and Abu Bakrah are for me a cause of wonder. These three were formed in the same womb and had all the same father, yet one says that he is a Qurayshite, the other is an enfranchised slave, and the third has an Arab for his uncle.

As these lines require explanation, I shall give here what is related by persons versed in history: Al-Harith was the son of Kaladah Ibn 'Amr Ibn 'Ilaj Ibn Abi Salamh Ibn 'Abd al-'Uzza Ibn Ghiaarah Ibn 'Awf Ibn Qasi. This last was the same person as Thaqif. It is thus that Ibn al-Kalbi exposes this genealogy in his Jamharah. Al-Harith was a celebrated physician among the Arabs. He died soon after the promulgation of Islamism, but the fact of his conversion has not been ascertained. It is related that the Prophet of God ordered Sa'd Ibn Abi Waqqas to go and take the advice of al-Harith Ibn Kaladah on a malady by which he had been attacked. This proves the lawfulness of consulting on medical questions, persons who are not Muslims, provided they be of the nation as the sick man.<sup>45</sup> His son, al-Harith Ibn al-Harith, was one of those whose hearts had been reconciled,<sup>46</sup> and he is counted as one of the Prophet's Companions. It is said that al-Harith Ibn Kaladah was incapable of begetting children and that he died in the khalifate of 'Umar. The Prophet, when he laid siege to Taif, made this declaration: "Whatever slave lets himself down (from the wall) and comes to me shall be free." Abu Bakrah then lowered himself down from the fortress by means of a bakaah* (pulley), -- which is a thing traversed by a rope and placed over a well for the purpose of drawing water. It is called a bakarah by common people, but this pronunciation is not correct, although the author of the Mukhtasar al-'Ayn (abridgment of the 'Ayn)<sup>47</sup> gives it as good. It has, however, so little to recommend it that no other philologist ever authorised it.

---

44 The edition of Bulaq and some of the manuscripts insert here another copy of Mu'awiyah's letter, with a few slight changes in the wording of the text. As these alterations are of no importance, the letter is suppressed in the translation.

The narrator continues: He received therefore from the Prophet the surname of Abu Bakrah (the pulley-man), and used to say that he was a mawla of the Prophet of God. His brother, Nafi' was also going to lower himself down when al-Harith Ibn Kaladah said to him: 'Remain, and I adopt you as my son.' He therefore remained and was surnamed Ibn al-Harith. Abu Bakrah, before his conversion to Islam, bore also that surname, but, when he became a good Musulman, he gave it up. On the death of al-Harith Ibn Kaladah, Abu Bakrah abstained, through self-mortification, from receiving any part of the inheritance. This, I must observe, might have been the case, were we to admit the statement of those who say that al-Harith died a Musulman, for, if he did not, Abu Bakrah would have been excluded from inheriting, on account of the difference of religion.<sup>48</sup>

(The narrator continues:) Ibn Mufarrigh was induced to compose the three verses above-mentioned because Ziyad pretended to be a Qurayshide on the plea of his adoption by Mu'awiyah: because Abu Bakrah declared himself a mawla of the Prophet, and because Nafi' used to say that he was the son of al-Harith Ibn Kaladah, of the tribe of Thaqif. They were, besides, born of the same mother, the Sumayyah already mentioned. It was also for that reason that the poet composed on the family of Abu Bakrah the two verses which commence by the words: Come to your senses, family of Abu Bakrah!

45 The text may also signify: provided they be regular physicians.

46 After effecting the conquest of Makkah, Muhammad made large presents to some of the vanquished who had embraced his religion. He thus hoped to gain their hearts. (Al-Qur'an, sur. IX, verse 60.)

47 The author of this work was Abu Bakr al-Zubaydi, see Vol. III, p. 83.

* Bakrah or Bakarah.

48 According to the Muslim law, persons of different religions cannot inherit one of the other.

'Haj was the grandfather of al-Harith Ibn Kaladah, as we have already state. This an abridged account of the affair of Ziyad and his sons.

I must again make an observation: these words of Ibn Mufarrigh in the second verse: they had the same father, are not true, for no one ever said that Ziyad was the son of al-Harith Ibn Kaladah; on the contrary, he was the son of 'Ubayd, having been born on his bed (in his lifetime). As for Abu Bakrah and Nafi', they were considered as the sons of al-Harith; How then could the poet say with truth that they had all the same father? Weigh these observations.

Ibn al-Nadim<sup>49</sup> says, in the work entitled the al-Fihrist, that Ziyad was the first person who compiled a work containing things disreputable to the Arabs. Ziad Ibn Abihi having been calumniated and seeing his genealogy impugned, composed that book for the use of his sons and said to them: "Defend yourselves with this against the Arabs, and they will cease to attack you."

The anecdote concerning al-Mughirah Ibn Shu'bah the Thaqifid and the evidence given against him must now be related: Al-Mughirah, having been named governor of Basra by 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, used to go out of the government palace every day, at the hour of noon. Abu Bakrah, having met him said: "Where is the emir going?" and received this answer. "I am going on business." To this Abu Bakrah replied: "An emir receives visits but never makes any." He (al-Mughirah) was going, is said, to see a women named Umm Jamil, who was the daughter of 'Amr and the wife of al-Hajjaj Ibn 'Atik Ibn al-Harith Ibn Wahb al-Jushami.--Ibn al-Kalbi states, in his jamharah, that Umm Jamil was the daughter of al-Afqam Ibn Mihjan Ibn 'Amr Ibn Shu'bah Ibn al-Huzam, and he counts this family among those of the Ansars. Another author furnishes this additional information: "Al-Huzam was the son of Ruwaybah Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Hilal "Ibn 'Amir Ibn Sa'sa'ah Ibn Mu'awiyah Ibn Bakr Ibn Hawazin." God knows best!

The narrator continues: Abu Bakrah was in an upper room with his brothers, Nafi', Ziyad and Shib Ibn Mabad, who were all sons of the same mother, her who was named Sumayyah. Umm Jamil was in a chamber opposite to theirs, and, the wind happening to blow open her door, they saw al-Mughirah in the act of carnal intercourse with her. On this, Abu Bakrah said:

---

49 Abu'l Faraj Muhammad Ibn Ishaq, surnamed Ibn al-Nadim (the son of the boon companion) and Ibn Abi Ya'qub al-Warraq (the stationer), was a native of Baghdad. He composed in the year 377 (A.D. 987-8) a sort of encyclopaedia, full of literary, bibliographical, biographical, and historical information, to which he gave the title of (list or index). The fullest and most satisfactory account of this highly important and rare work has been given by professor Flugel in the thirteenth volume of the German Oriental Society's journal (Zeitschrift der Deutschen Morgenlaendischen Gesellschaft).

There is a calamity for you! look at that." They looked till they were convinced, and Abu Bakrah then went down stairs and sat there, waiting till al-Mughirah came out. When he saw him, he said: "You know full well what you have done, so you had better quit us (and leave the city)."

The narrator says (farther on): Al-Mughirah went to say the afternoon (zuhr) prayer at the head of the congregation, and Abu Bakrah rose to go out, saying: "By Allah! you shall not preside at our prayer after what you did:" "Let him go on with the prayer," said (some of the) people, "for he is our emir. Write down your complaint and send it to (the khalif) 'Umar." He and his brothers did so, and 'Umar summoned al-Mughirah to appear before him, and them also as witnesses. When they arrived, 'Umar took his seat and cited them all forward. Abu Bakrah advanced, and (the khalif) said to him.<sup>50</sup> "Vidistine illum inter femora mulieris?" Respondit: "Per Deum! latera duo femorum divaricata adhuc mihi videre videor." Tunc eumden (testem) compellavit al-Mughira dixitque: "Callide aspeixisti!" Respondit Abu Bakra: "Moriar si non declarem id propter quod te Deus ignominia affecturus est." Dixit 'Umar: "Quinimo oportet te eum vidisse penem intromittentem in yulvam. Respondit Abu Bakrah: "Illud vidict attestor." Tunc dixit 'Umar: "Vae tibi, Mughirah! effugit quarta pars (vita) Tuae." Tunc Nafiam advocavit et ei dixit: "Quid east testimonium tuum?" Respondit: "Sicut testimonium Abu Bakrah." Dixit Omar: "Necesse est declarare illud (scil. mentulam) in mulierem intromissum fuisse, sicut stylum in pyxidem." Respondit: Certe intromissum fuit usque ad radicem (kudad). -- Vox kudad sagittae pennam significat. -- Tunc dixit Omar: "Vae tibi, Mughirah! effugit dimidium tuum." Postea (testem) tertium appellavit 50 The rest of the story, containing an account of the trial and the evidence of the trial and the witnesses, cannot be rendered into English; so it is given here in a Latin translation. That the observations addressed by 'Umar to al-Mughirah may be well understood, it is necessary to recal to mind that the Muslim law punishes adultery by lapidation and that a most formal declaration by four eye-witnesses is requisite for the proof of the crime. 'Umar, with all his austerity and uprightness, tried every means to save his friend and had the witnesses severely punished although he well knew that their depositions were true. His conduct in that business was very unfair and not such as his great reputation for integrity would have led us to expect.

---

evedixit: "Quid est testimonium tuum? Respondit: 'Idem est quod socii mei duo prestiterunt.'" Dixit 'Umar: "Vae tibi, Mughira! efiugit (vice) tuae dodrans." Tunc scripsit (Omar) and Ziadum qui nondum comparuerat, et postquam eum vidit, consedit in moschaeo, ducibus Muhajirorum et Ansariorum congregatis. (Mughira), Ziadum intrantem aspiciens, dixit: "Video hominem cujus lingua, Deo volente, Muhajirum ignominia afficere nolet," Sustulit Omar eaput disitque: Quid novisti, otidis pulle!" Fertur quoque al-Mughiram surrexisse ad Ziadum et dixisse: "Post Arusam aromati locus non est."<sup>51</sup> Dico hand locutionem proverbium esse, Arabibus notum, sed illud exponere haud convenit, praesertim caum in hoc capite oratio nostra latius diffusa sit -- Tradidit narrator; Dixit ei al-Mughira; "Ziade! Dei excelsr memor esto coram quo staturus es in die resurrectionis. Certe Deus, ed liber ejus, et Propheta ejus et quao staturus es in die resurrectionis. Certe Deus, et liber ejus, et Propheta ejus et imperator fidelium effusionem sanguinis mei prohibebunt, dummode de iss quae vidisti ad ea quae non vidistitransire noles; cave ne propter rera turpem quam vidisti transeas ad rem quam non vidisti. Per Deum! si inter ventrem meum et ventrem illius (mulieris) fuisses, me mentulam in illam intromittentem haud vidisses." Tradidit narrator: "Tunc Ziadus, cujus oculi lacrymabant et facies rubore suffundebatur, dixit: "Imperator, fidelium! verum esse quod alii provero decerunt, dicere non possum; sed vidi consessum, audivi suspiria crebra et occasionem arreptam; vidi illum super illam recubantem." Dixit Omar: "Vidistine rem insetam in vulva sicut stylum in pyxide?" Respondit; "Haud vidi." Fertur etiam Ziadum dixisse; "Vidi illum pedes mulieris sustollentem; vidi testiculos ejus oscillantes super femora mulieris, cum, impetu vehementi."

'Umar then exclaimed: Praise be to God!" Al-Mughirah, being told by him to go over and beat them (for having borne false witness against him), inflicted on Abu Bakrah eighty strokes and flogged also the (two) others. Ziyad gave, by his deposition, great satisfaction to 'Umar, as it averted from al-Mughirah the penalty (of lapidation) fixed by the law. Abu Bakrah exclaimed after undergoing his punishment: "I bear witness that al-Mughirah did so and so" (repeating his former evidence). Umar was about to have him chastised a second time; when 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib said to him: "If you beat him, you must lapidate your friend."<sup>52</sup> He therefore let him alone and told him to repent

51 This proverb is explained by al-Maidani; see Freytag's edition, vol. II, p. 482. The speaker meant to say that he would be a lost man if Ziyad, the fourth witness, deposed against him.

52 These words of Ali's are explained farther on.

of his sin. "Do you bid me repent," replied Abu Bakrah, so that you may receive whatever evidence may be given me later?" 'Umar answered: "Such is my motive," and Abu Bakrah replied: "I shall (therefore) never serve as a witness between two parties, as long as I live." When he was undergoing the legal penalty, al-Mughirah addressed him thus: "Glory and praise be to God who has thus brought shame upon you!" "Not so," said 'Umar, "but may God bring shame upon the place in which these (people) saw you!"

'Umar Ibn Shabbah (vol. II, p. 375), states, in his history of Basra, that, when Abu Bakrah was beaten, his mother caused a sheep to be flayed and the skin applied to his back. This made people say that, assuredly, the strokes must have been very heavy. 'Abd al-Rahman, the son of Abu Bakrah, related that his father swore never to speak to Ziyad as long as he lived. One of Abu Bakrah's dying injunctions was that Ziad should not be allowed to say the funeral service over him, and that Abu Barzah al-Aslami, a person to whom he had been united in brothership by the Prophet of God, should discharge that duty. When Ziyad was informed of this, he (left the place and) went to Kufah. Al-Mughirah was greatly pleased with Ziyad's conduct (at the trial) and testified to him all his gratitude. At a later period when the pilgrims had assembled in Makkah, 'Umar received the visit of Umm Jamil and said to al-Mughirah, who was present: "Tell me, Mughirah! do you know this woman?" "I do," replied the other, "she is Umm Kulthum, the daughter of 'Ali." On hearing these words, 'Umar exclaimed: "Do you intend to make me believe that you do not know her? by Allah! I now think that Abu Bakrah did not accuse you wrongfully and, when I see you, I fear lest stones should be thrown down on me from heaven (for saving you from lapidation)."

The Shaykh Abu Ishaq al-Shirazi (vol. I, p. 9) says, in his Muhaddhab, towards the commencement of the chapter on the number of witnesses (required by law): "Testimony was given against al-Mughirah by three persons: Abu Bakrah, Nafi' and Shibl Ibn Ma'bad. As for Ziyad (the fourth witness), he (merely) said: Vidi culum resilientem, (audivi) anhelitum fortem et (vidi) pedes duos (erectos) ad 'instar aurium asini; quid fuerit ultra, nescio! 'Umar caused therefore the three witnesses to be chastised and did not punish al-Mughirah."

Legists have discussed what 'Ali meant when he said: "If you beat him, you must lapidate your friend;" and Abu Nasr Ibn al-Sabbagh (vol. II, p. 164) writes, in his Shamil, a treatise on the (Shafi'i) system of jurisprudence: "He ('Ali) meant to say: That sentence (of yours) can only be (applicable) in case of your counting what he said for another (a fourth) deposition; but then the number (of depositions requisite for the condemnation of al-Mughirah) would be complete: if it (your sentence) applies to the first deposition (made by Abu Bakrah, it can... be executed, because) you have already punished him for it."

'Umar Ibn Shabbah relates as follows, in his history of Basra: "Al-'Abbas, the son of 'Abd al-Muttalib, said to 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab: "The Prophet of God made me a grant of (the province of) al-Bahrayn" "Who was witness to that?" replied 'Umar. Al-'Abbas named al-Mughirah Ibn Shubah, but 'Umar refused to admit such an evidence."

This article has run to a our statements took therefore a wide spread. They are not, however, devoid of utility.

795 YAZID B. SALAMAH, (IBN AL-TATHRIYAH)

"Abu'l Makshuh Yazid Ibn Salamah Ibn Salamah al-Khayr Ibn Qushayr Ibn Ka'b Ibn Rabi'ah Ibn 'Amir Ibn Sa's'ah, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Tathriyah and a celebrated poet." It is thus that Abu 'Amr al-Shaybani (vol. I, p. 182) traces his genealogy. The appellation of al-Khayr (the good) was given to his (great-) grand-father because Qushayr had another son who was called Salamat al-sharr (Salamah the bad). The same author states that the name of this Yazid's father was al-Muntashir Ibn Salamah. According to Ibn al-Kalbi vol. III, p. 608), Yazid was the son of Simmah, who was one of the sons of Salamat al-Khayr. The learned men of Basra held him to be the son al-A'war Ibn Qushayr, which person is spoken of by Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Tusi<sup>1</sup> towards the commencement of Ibn al-Tathriyah's Diwan (collected poetical works) of which compilation he was the author. Here are his words: "Ibn al-Tathriyah was a poet by nature [matbu'an], intelligent, elegant in language, well-educated and of a noble, manly disposition; never did he incur either reproach or blame. He was liberal, brave, and held, by the nobleness of his family and character, a high rank in his tribe, which was that of Qushayr. The Umayyads had him for one of their poets and treated him with great favour."

1 Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Sinan al-Taymi (of the tribe of Taym Allah) al-Tusi (a native of Tus), was a man of learning and a narrator of anecdotes concerning the (Arabian) tribes, of poems and of (the adventures of) heroes (fuhal). He met (and was taught by) the great masters (masharkh) who professed at Basrah. The preceptor whose sittings he most frequented and from whom he received the greater part of his information was Ibn al-'Arabi. (Fihrist.) --Ibn al-'Arabi died A.H. 231 (A.D. 846). (See vol. III, p. 25.) We here learn from Ibn Khallikan that al-Tusi collected the poem's of Ibn al-Tathriyah into a diwan.

Another author says: "Yazid Ibn al-Tathriyah was surnamed al-Muwaddiq (the exciter) on account of his handsome face, the beauty of his poetry and the sweetness of his discourse. People used to say that, when he sat in the company of women, he excited them to love. In speaking of a female, the verbs istawdaqat (in the tenth form) and wadaqat (in the first form) are employed to signify that a female desires the approach of the male. This verb, taken in its primitive signification, was only applied to animals having hoofs, but it was subsequently employed in speaking of human beings. A Muwaddiq is a person who inspires woman with an inclination for him. He frequented the company of females and liked conversing with them. It is said that he was impotent, incapable of having intercourse with a woman or of begetting children."

Abu Tammam al-Ta'i (vol. I, p. 348) mentions this highly distinguished poet in different places of his Hamasah; thus, in the section of amatory poetry [nasib] (p. 588), he has inserted as his the following lines:

(I think of) that 'Uqaylide female whose (ample forms) enveloped in her gown are (in shape, smoothness and colour) like a sand-hill, and whose waist is like a wand. She passes the summer within the tribe's reserved grounds and, in the afternoon, she makes her siesta at Na'man, in the valley of Arak. The glance which I cast at her, is it for me a very slight (satisfaction)? By no means! a (pleasure coming) from her is never slight. Friend of my soul! thou except whom I have no other sincere friend! O thou for whose sake I have concealed my love, disobeyed (the advice of thy) enemies and placed no faith in the words of those (intriguers) who 'interfered against thee! Is there no way of reaching a place near thee, where I may complain of the great distance (which lay between us) and of the dread (in which I stood) of (jealous) foes? May my life be the ransom of thine! numerous are my enemies, wide is the distance (between us), few are the partisans whom I have near thee. (If I die of grief), take not the fault thereof upon thyself, for thou art too weak (to bear it); to answer for my blood on the day of judgment would be a heavy responsibility! When I went (to see thee.) I had always a pretext, but now, that I have not every day a business which may take me to your country; every day, I cannot send there a messenger.

Abu'l Faraj al-Isfahani, the author of the Kitab al-Aghani, formed [compiled] also a diwan of Ibn al-Tathriyah's poetry and attributes to him the following piece:

I should sacrifice my father for the safety of one who inspired me such love that my body is quite extenuated, for one on whom all eyes are fixed and who is the object of my passion, for one whose charms never cease augmenting desire and who is never to be seen unless under the protection of a watchful guard. If I am forbidden to hold converse with her, if I should have to encounter enemies and combats in case I tried to meet her, yet I shall continue to extol the beauty of Layla in eulogiums brilliant with the ornaments of rhyme and sweet to hear from the lips of the public. Dearest Layla! take care not to diminish my strength (by thy disdain) and permit me, though far away and an outcast, to hope that at I retain a share in your affection. Let me still give lasting trouble to jealous spies, as they have given constant annoyance to me. If you fear that you cannot support the bitterness of love, restore to me my heart, our visiting place is near.

The same author attributes to Ibn al-Tathriyah the piece which here follows:

I should sacrifice my life for the safety of one whose cool hand, if passed over my breast, would heal my pains, (I devote myself) for her who always fears me and whom I always fear; for her who never grants me a favour and from whom I never ask one.

Abu'l Hasan al-Tusi gives the following verses as Ibn al-Tathriyah's:

I should blush before God were I to be seen succeeding to another in the affections of a female or replaced therein by a rival. (I should be ashamed) to quench my thirst at a lake of which the borders are become like a beaten path, or to be a suitor for such love as you could grant, love too weak to endure.

I met these verses elsewhere and found that, after the first, was inserted another which I give here:

Water filled with dregs and troubled by the frequent visits of those who come to drink inspires me with disgust.

Al-Tusi gives also the following verses as his:

Many hope for a thing cannot obtain it, whilst it is granted to others who sit (quietly and make no effort). One man toils for a favour and another receives it; he to whom, it is granted had given up all hopes when it came.

The same author extracts this passage from a piece of verse composed by our poet:

I persist in turning away from her, though much against my will; and, when she is absent, I avoid listening to those who saw her or heard of her. Love for her came to me before I knew what love was, and it found a lasting abode in a heart till then unoccupied.

He gives also the following verses by the same poet.

And (I pronounced) a word which, when she (whom I loved) accused me of numerous crimes, dissipated every foul imputation. (I said): "If I am innocent, you do me wrong; if guilty, I have repented and merit pardon." When she persisted in rejecting my excuses and let herself be pushed to the utmost extreme by the lies of vile defamers, I discovered that indifference could console me when suffering from her disdain, and I no longer wished to approach one who refused me her love. I acted like the man who, afflicted with a malady, looks for a physician and, not finding one, becomes his own doctor.

The piece which we now insert is given as Ibn al-Tathriyah's by Abu 'Abd Allah al-Marzubani in his Mu'jam al-Shu'ara' (vol. III, p. 67), and is also to be found in the Hamasah (page 584); but some persons attribute it to 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Dumaynah al-Khathami.<sup>2</sup>

I should sacrifice my life and my family for the safety of her who, when unjustly wronged, knew not what to answer. She tried not to justify herself as one would do who is innocent, but remained astounded, so that people said: "How very suspicious!"

---

2 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Dumaynah al-Khathami was one of the early Muslim poets and lived probably in the first century of the Hijrah. Having learned that Muzahim Ibn Qays of the tribe of Salul was paying court of his wife, he assassinated the lover, smothered the women some time afterwards, and then killed his young daughter because she wept for her mother. He was detained for a long time in the prison of Tabalah but was finally liberated because the charge could not be made out against him. At a later period he was killed by the son of him whom he had murdered.--(Aghani, Shawahid al-Mughni).

In the same work, al-Marzubani gives also the piece (which begins) as follows:<sup>3</sup>

Though you long to see Raiya, you postpone the day of your meeting with Raiya! and yet you both belong to a branch of the same tribe!

I must here observe that, in this piece, the poet has attained the light of tenderness and elegance. It is given by Abu Tammam in his Hamasah, towards the commencement of the section which contains the amatory poetry. That author attributes it, however, to al-Simmah Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qushayri. God knows if he be right! Abu 'Amr Yusuf Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, the author of the Isti'ab, which work contains the history of the Prophet's Companions, -- we shall give his life (wa sayati dhikruhu), - says in (another work of his), the Bahjat-al-Majalis (the beauties of sittings, or conferences): "Al-Simmah Ibn 'Abd Allah Al-Qushayri composed the following lines:

Had you remembered me as faithfully as I remember you
I declare that you would not have refrained from tears. She replied: "By Allah! this quite the contrary; (I ever remember you and the sadness of) that recollection would burst even a solid rock!"<sup>4</sup>

Farther on, the same writer says: "Most of the literati consider him to be the author of: Though you long to see Raiya." He then gives all the verses, just as they are to be found in the Hamasah, and adds: "Some persons however attribute them to Qays Ibn Dharih,<sup>5</sup> others

3 This piece consists of nine verses and is to be found in the Hamasah, page 538.

4 Literally: Nay, by Allah! a recollection which, if poured upon the solid rock, it (the rock) would split asunder.

5 Abu Zayd Qays Ibn Darth ; al-Laythi, belonged to a beduin family which lived in the desert outside of Madinah, and was the foster-brother of al-Husayn the son of 'Ali. He married Lubna, the daughter of al-Hubab, but as their union was not fruitful, he was forced by his father to divorce her after ten years cohabitation. He then took another wife of the same name, but sore against his will and, soon after, he died of grief for being separated from his first love. He composed on Lubna a number of poems, passages of which are given in the article of the Kitab al-Aghani wherein his history is related. An abridged and tolerably fair translation of the prose account offered by the Aghani will be found in the second volume, page 412, of von Hammer-Purgsall's Literaturgeschichte der Araber. The author of the Nujum states that Ibn Dharih died on or about the year 65 (A.D. 684-5).

consider them as the production of al-Majnun<sup>6</sup>, but the majority say that al-Simmah is the author. God knows best!" From this we see the difference of opinion respecting the person who composed these verses; was it Ibn al-Tathriyah or al-Simmah Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Qushayri, or Qays Ibn Dharih, or al-Majnun? God knows best!

Al-Marzubani mentions our poet in his Muwaththaq<sup>7</sup> and says: "Abu'l Jaysh recited to me the following lines as the composition of Yazid Ibn al-Tathriyah:

After nightfall, my camel moaned through (grief and) longing for its companion; O what dismay I felt, whilst her moans cast despondency into my heart! I said to her: Suffer with patience; the female of every couple must, sooner or later, be separated from the male.

He gives also the following verses and attributes them to the same author:

How can I receive consolation (when separated from you) who are the most amiable of being that walk (on earth)? My soul is afflicted and your dwelling - place far away. My life is in your hands, if you wish to take it; my soul can heal, if you choose to heal it. When you shewed no compassion for a man afflicted, you knew full well that, were I to visit a distant land, my soul should never admit of consolation and forget you.

Here is another piece cited by him as our poet's:

When I went (to visit her), I adorned myself not with ornaments, through fear of hostile spies; but she appeared in all her beauty. I never salute her first and, to escape their malice, I never ask them how she is.

The same author gives a great many more pieces composed by this poet, but we may confine ourselves to what is inserted here.

In the Ansab al-Ashraf (genealogies of the sharifs), the author, Abu Bakr Ahmad Ibn Yahya Ibn Jabir al-Baladhuri (vol. I, p. 438) says, 6 Al-Majnun (the insane, the possessed) is the surname by which was designated a poet whose love for Layla became proverbial. His name, it is said, was Qays Ibn al-Maluh, but his existence has been generally doubted. De Sacy in his Anthologie grammaticale arabe, page 150, has a note on this subject. Be that as it may, a number of amatory poems pass under the name of al-Majnun.

7 The orthography of this name is not certain.

after relating the events of the year 126 (A.D. 743-4) and the death of the Umayyad khalif al-Walid Ibn Yazid Ibn 'Abd al-Malik Ibn Marwan: Whilst those things were going on, al-Mundalith Ibn Idris of the tribe of Hanifah was killed and, with him, Yazid Ibn al-Tathriyah.<sup>8</sup> This happened near a village called al-Falaj and situated, I believe, in (the province of) Yamamah." I then found the following passage in the work which Abu Bakr al-Hazmi. (vol. III, p. 11) composed on the names of places: "Falaj is a large village belonging to the Banu Ja'lah and having a pulpit.<sup>9</sup> It is also called Falaj al-Aflaj, and is situated in Yamamah." According to another author, Falaj is at six day's journey from Hajar, the capital of al-Bahrayn, and nine days journey from Makkah. Abu Ishaq al-Zajjaj (vol. I, p. 28) says, in that part of his Ma'ani 'l-Qur'an (rhetorical figures of the Qur'an) which contains his observations on the surat al-Furqan (the 25th): "Al-Rass, a valley in Yamaamh, is named also Falaj." From what he says, this may be the village of which we are now treating. A place (of nearly the same name) is mentioned in a verse which we here give:

They whose blood was shed at Falaj were the men! the best of men, O Umm Khalid!

But, in this name, the vowel a is omitted after the l. It is a valley on the road leading from Basra to the Hima (or reserved grounds) of Dariyah, which is a village near Makkah. A Faljah is mentioned in (the following passage of) a poem composed by an Arab of the desert:

Fair are the landmarks of Faljah at morning, and fair the tents set up on its hills, at either side (wa khaynu rawabi hillatayha 'l-munassabu). They say that the soil of Faljah is salt and the water brackish; 'tis true, but the water, though salt, is sweet unto the heart.

Faljah is the name of two places, one lying between Makkah and Basrah, and the other in (the valley of) al-'Aqiq.

The combat (which cost Ibn al-Tathriyah his life) took place in the year of al-Walid Ibn Yazid the Umayyad's death. Now, al-Walid was 8 It appears, from the Kitab al-Aghani, that the tribe of Hanifah and that of 'Uqay had for some time, being carrying on against each other a war of surprises and predatory incursions. In one of these encounters Ibn al-Tathriyah lost his life.

9 A town can not have a pulpit on cathedral mosque, unless it be the capital of a province or of a considerable district. The governor, who is also the khalif's representative, has alone the privilege of pronouncing the khutbah from the pulpit.

killed on Thursday, the 27th of the latter Jumada, 126 (16th April, A.D. 744), at al-Bukhra.<sup>9</sup> Abu'l-Hasan at-Tusi says, in speaking of this combat that the standard was borne by Yazid Ibn al-Tathriyah. When al-Mundalith was killed and his partisans were routed, Ibn al-Tathriyah stood his ground with the standard. He was dressed in a silk gown which got entangled in an 'Usharah-tree (asclepias gigantea), — The 'Usharah is a thorny plant and produces gum. — This accident caused him to fall, and the Banu Hanifah then kept striking him till he died. This combat is mentioned subsequently to the account of al-Walid's death and in the same year; so, the death of Ibn al-Tathriyah must be placed between that of al-Walid and the end of the year 126.

Abu'l Faraj al-Isfahani says towards the commencement of the volume (diwan) in which he has given the collection of Ibn al-Tathriyah's poetical works, that he was killed by the Banu Hanifah under the khalifat of the 'Abbasids; but the former indication is nearer to the truth. The following elegy was composed on the poet's death by al-Quhayf Ibn 'Umayr<sup>10</sup> Ibn Sulaym al-Nida Ibn 'Abd Allah al-'Uqayli:

Let the noble sons of Qushayr weep for the loss of their chief and their hero. O Abu'l Makshuh; now that you are gone, who is there to protect (us)? who is there to hurry on the (war-) camels whose feet are already used and worn by travel?

Al-Quhayf composed also a lament on the death of al-Walid Ibn Yazid. The following verse on the death of Ibn al-Tathriyah was composed by his brother Thawr Ibn Salamah:

I see that the tamarisk, my neighbour in the valley of al-'Aqiq, still holds itself erect (and yields not to grief), though fate has taken Yazid by surprise and overwhelmed him.

This verse belongs to a choice piece of poetry which Abu Fammam has inserted in the Hamasah (page 468). He attributes it to Zaynab Bint al-Tathriyah but others say that it was composed by the poet's mother.

Al-Tusi states that the combat above-mentioned was fought at 10 The Paris ms of the Aghani reads Himyar instead of 'Umayr. In this translation the reading of Ibn Khalikan and of the author of the Qamus is adopted. The history of al-Kuhaf, who was a contemporary of Ibn al-Tathriyah and belonged to the same tribe as he, offers nothing deserving of being noticed here.

---

al-'Aqiq. We find in Yaqt al-Hamawi's Mushtarik* that there were ten places of this name. According to al-Asma'i vol. II, p. 123) the 'a'iqah (which word is the plural of 'aqiq) are valleys in which there is running water. In enumerating the places being this name, Yaqt says: "The third is the 'Aqiq of 'Arid, in al-Yamamah. It is a large valley near al-'Aramah and into it flow all the streams of al-'Arid. It abounds in sources and villages," He then says: "Al-'Aqiq a town in al-Yamamah, belongs to the Banu 'Uqayl. It is called the 'Aqiq of Namirah** and lies on the road leading from al-Yamamah to Yaman." The valley of al-'Aqiq mentioned in the foregoing verse, is perhaps the first of the places thus indicated, or perhaps the second. God knows best! -- Ibn al-Tathriyah was called Abu'l Makshuh because he had on his kashh a scar caused by a burn. The word kushh signifies the side.

Yazid's mother was called al-Tathriyah<sup>11</sup> and he was surnamed after her. She was one of the children of Tathr Ibn 'Anz Ibn Wail. "The word tathr signifies fertility and abundance of milk. It is said that she was born in a year of which that was the distinguishing character, but others contradict this statement and say that she gave birth to her son in a year of that kind. Others again relate that she toiled in exacting butter from milk and was named al-Tathriyah because the tathr of milk is its butter." This account is, in itself, quite objectionable: all say that the poet's mother was of the family of Tathr Ibn 'Anz, whence we must conclude that she was named after that tribe, and declare that the words "she was born in a year of such a character" or "she gave birth to him in a year of such a kind" or "she extracted butter from milk" are here quite inapplicable. We submit these remarks to the reader; but it is evident that there were two opinions on the subject; according to one, she was named after her tribe and, according to the other, for the reasons stated in the second place. A great number of poems are attributed to Zaynab Bin al-Tathriyah the sister of Yazid. Such is the eulogistic piece which we here give:

He is proud when you go to ask of him a favour, and he bestows on you whatever he holds in his hand. Had he nothing to give but his life, he would bestow it; so let those who apply to him take care lest (by taking away his life,) they offend God.

---

* "a lexicon of places bearing the same name.

<sup>11</sup> According to the author of the Qamus, this name should be pronounced al-Tathriyah, with an a after the th.

** [Marrah in Cairo ed. vol. V, p. 416. Ed]

These verses have been attributed to Ziyad al-A'jam (vol. I, p. 631). The second is also to be found in the diwan of Abu Tammam's poems, where we meet with it in the qasidah which begins by these words:

Vernal abode! thou of which the inhabitants have departed!
it is, alas! too true that the rains (?) have effected upon thee that (destruction) which they intended.

But, in all that, God best knows the truth!

796 YA'QUB AL-MAJISHUN

Abu Yusuf Ya'qub, the son of Abu Salamah Dinar, or Maymun, according to some bore the surname of al-Mujishun and stood allied (by clientship) to the Banu Taym, a branch of tribe of Quraysh (al-Qurashi al-Taymi). He was a mawla' of the Munkadirs, a family of Madinah Traditions were taught to him by Ibn 'Umar (vol. I, p. 567), 'Umar Ibn 'Abn al-'Aiz (afterwards khalif), Muhammad Ibn al-Munkadir (vol. II, p. 119) and 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Hurmuz al-A'araj;<sup>1</sup> traditions were taught on his authority by his sons Yusuf and 'Abd al-'Aziz, and by his nephew 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Abi Salamah. "Al-Majishun, says Ya'qub Ibn Shaybah,<sup>2</sup> was a mawla of the Hudayr family."<sup>3</sup> When 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-Aziz was governor of Madinah, Ya'qub al-Majishun knew him and used to converse with him

1 Abu Daw'ud 'Abd al-Rahma Ibn Hurmuz, surnamed al-'Araj (the lame), was a native of Madinah and a mawla of a Quraysh family, that of Harish Ibn Abd al-Muttalib, or that of 'Umar Ibn Abi Rabi'ab. He handed down a quantity of traditions, most of which he had received from Abu Hurayrah (vol. I, p. 570). Traditions were given on his authority, which was considered as perfectly sure. He died at Alexandria. A.H. 117 (A.D. 785-6)—(Dahabi's Tahdib).

2 Abu Yusuf Ya'qub Ibn Shainah Ibn Asfur, of the tribe of Sadus and a native of Basrah, fixed his residence at Baghdad and composed a musnad, or collection of authenticated Traditions, which work was very extensive, but remained unfinished. As a Traditionist, he was considered to be a good authority. He Musnad formed five volumes and a collection of traditions, which he traced up to Abu Hurayra, filled two hundred quires of paper. He was nominated qadi of Iraq but did not fill that office. His death took place in the first Rabi', 246 (May-June, A.D. 860).—(Dahabi's Huffaz).

3 Al-Munkadir Ibn 'Abd Allah, the father of Muhammad Ibn al-Munkadir was the son of al-Hudayr. —(Qamus).

familiarly 'Umar on his elevation to the khalifate, said to al-Majishun, who had come to visit him: "I have given up your acquaintance, because I have given up wearing silk clothes," and then turned away from him.<sup>4</sup>

Muhammad Ibn Sa'd (vol. III, p. 64) says, in his Tabaqat, that Ya'qub Ibn Shaybah related as follows: "Mus'ab (vol. I, p. 186) said: 'Al-Mujishun used to side with Rabi'at al-Rai (vol. I, p. 517) against Abi al-Zinad (vol. I, p. 580), because the latter was hostile to Rabiah, and that Abu al-Zinad was heard to say: "What passes between me and Ibn al-Majishun is similar to that which is related of the wolf. That animal used to enter into a village and devour children. The inhabitants, at last, assembled and went after him, but he fled away and they gave up the pursuit. One of them, a dealer in earthen ware, continued, however, to follow him, on which the wolf stopped and said: 'I can excuse the others (for pursuing me), but what have I done to you? I never broke a single pot of yours!' Now, as for that al-Majishun, I never broke any of his kabars (lambourines) or of his barbers (guitars)!' Al-Majishun's son related as follows: "The soul of al-Majishun was taken up aloft (i.e. his animation was suspended) and we placed the body on a bench, so that it might be washed (according to the prescription of the law). We then informed the people that we were going to carry forth the corpse (to the grave), when the washer (of the dead) came in and perceived, whilst he was operating, that an artery was still beating in the lower part of the foot. He came out to us and said: 'I find an artery still beating; so, I advise you not to hasten the interment.' On this, we induced the people to retire by informing them of what we had seen and, the next morning, when they returned, the washer went in and found the artery beating as before. We again made excuses to the people, and during three days, my father remained in the same state. He then sat up and said: 'Bring me some porridge. We brought it and, when had suspend it up, we asked him if he could tell us what he had seen? He replied. 'I can; when my soul was taken away, the angel mounted with me to the heaven of this earth and ordered the door to be opened. It was opened to him and he proceeded (successively) though the other heavens till he reached the seventh. There he was asked whom he had brought with him, and he answered: 'Al-Majishun.' On this, a voice said to him: 'He has not yet received permission to come here he has still to live such and such a number of years and of months and of days and of hours.' Whilst I was a carrying down, I saw the 4 It appears from this and from an anecdote related lower down, that al-Majishun was a man of pleasure who dressed finely and was fond of music.

---

Prophet, with Abu Bakr on his right hand, 'Umar on his left, and 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz (sitting) at his feet. I said to the angel who was with me: 'Tell me who is that? and he answered: 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz'. On this, I said: "He is allowed to sit very near the Apostle of God" and I received this answer: He acted uprightly in an age of perversity, as the two others did in an age of righteousness." This relation is given by Ya'qub Ibn Shaybah in his article on al-Majishun. Abu'l Hasan Muhammad Ibn Ahmad al-Qawwas al-Warraaq states that Ya'qub al-Majishun died in the year 164 (A.D. 780-1), I have taken all this information from the work designed, by the hafiz Abu'l Qasim Ibn 'Asakir (vol, II, p. 252), to serve as a (biographical) history of Damascus.

Ibn Qutaybah says, in the article on Muhammad Ibn al-Munkadir, which he has given in the Kitab al-Ma'arif,<sup>5</sup> that one of Ibn al-Munkadir's mawlas was Ya'qub Ibn Majishun. He states also that he (Ya'qub) was a legist, and then adds: "Al-Majishun had a brother named 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Salamah, whose son, 'Abd al-'Aziz Ibn 'Abd Allah, was surnamed Abu 'Abd Allah. He (al-Majishun) died at Baghdad; (the khalif) al-Mahdi said over him the funeral sevice and buried him in the Quraysh cemetery. This was in the year 164." We have already given in this work an article on his (nephew's) son and mentioned there what has been said by the learned respecting the signification of al-Majishun; it is therefore needless to repeat their words here.

In the expression: "I never broke any of his kabars or of his barbats," occur two words which require explanation. The Kabar is a drum having only one face (or head), and the barbat is a sort of lute ('ud), the musical instrument so called. Its name is derived from bar, which signifies breast in Persian, joined to the (Arabic) word batt (duck), the well-known fowl so called. As this instrument bears a resemblance to the beast of a duck, it was so denominated. In Arabic, it is called al-'ud and al-mizhar; in Persian, it bears the name of barbat, as we have just said.

797 THE QADI ABU YUSUF

The qadi Abu Yusuf Ya'qub al-Ansari (a descendant of one of the proselytes of Madinah) was the son of Ibrahim, the son of Habib, the son of Khunays, the son of Sa'd, the son of Habtah, who was one of the Prophet's Ansars. "Sa'd was known amongst the Ansars by the surname of Ibn Habtah (the son of Habtah); being thus denominated after his mother. Mulik, the father of Habtah, belonged to the family of 'Amr Ibn 'Awf the Ansaria. 'Awf, the father of Sa'd Ibn Habtah, was the son Bahir, who was the son of Mu'awiyah, the son Salama, the son of Bajilah, who was allied, by an oath of fraternity, to the family of 'Amr Ibn 'Awf the Ansaria." It is thus that the genealogy of Sa'd Ibn Habtah is traced up in the Isti'ab.<sup>1</sup>

---

5 See the Kitab al-Ma'arif, page 234.

The Khatib Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi (vol. I, p. 75) says, in the historical work composed by him, that Sa'd was the son of Bahir,* the son of Mu'awiyah, the son of Quhafah, the son of Balil, the son of Sadus, the son of 'Abd Manaf, the son of Abu Usamah, the son of Shahmah, the son of Sa'd, the son of 'Abd Allah, the son of Faddad,** the son of Tha'labah the son of Mu'a'wiyah, the son of Zayd, the son of al-Ghawth, the son of Bajilah.

Abu Yusuf, a qadi and a native of Kufah, was one of Abu Hanifah's (vol. III, p. 555) disciples, a legist, a learned scholar and a hafiz (possessing great traditional information). He heard Traditions (hadith) from the lips of Abu Ishaq al-Shaybani,<sup>2</sup> Sulayman al-Taymi,<sup>3</sup> Yahya Ibn Sa'id al-Ansari (vol. II, p. 549), al-A'mash (vol. I, p. 587). Hisham Ibn 'Urwah (vol. III, p. 606), Ata' Ibn al-Sa'ib,<sup>4</sup> Muhammad Ibn Ishaq Ibn Yasar (vol. II, p. 677) and other Traditionists of the same class; he attended also the sittings (or lectures) of Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Abi Layla (vol. II, p. 584) and afterwards those of Abu Hanifah al-Nu'man Ibn Thabit (vol. III, p. 555). The system of jurisprudence taught by Abu Hanifah was that which he preferred, though he differed, in many points, from that master. Traditions were deferred on his authority by Muhammad Ibn al-

1 See the Life of Ibn 'Abd al-Barr, in this volume.

2 Abu Ishaq Sulayman Ibn Firuz, a member of the tribe of Shayban, a traditionist and a native of Kufah, died A.H. 141 (A.D. 758-9), or 149. (Haffaz.)

3 Abu'l-Qasim Sulayman Ibn Tarkhan, al-Taymi, one of the Tab'is, or disciples of Muhammed's Companions, was most assiduous in the practice of piety. The author of the Najum places his death in the year 143 (A.D. 760-1).

4 Abu'l-Sa'ib 'Ata Ibn al-Sa'ib Ibn Malik, a member of the tribe of Thaqif and a native of Kufah, was a traditionist of good authority. He died in the year 136 (A.D. 753-4), or thereabouts. — (Huffaz.)

* Bajir in Cairo — ed.

** Qaddad in Cairo — ed.

Hasan al-Shaybani al-Hanafi (vol. II, p. 590), Bishr Ibn al-Walid al-Walid al-Kindi,<sup>5</sup> 'Ali Ibn al-Ja'd (vol. I, p. 476), Ahmad Ibn Hanbal (vol. I, p. 44), Yahya Ibn Ma'in and others. Whilst he resided at Baghdad, he acted there as a qadi during the reigns of three khalifs, al-Mahdi, al-Hadi, the son of al-Mahdi, and Harun al-Rashid. By the latter he was treated with great honour and respect, and he continued to enjoy under him the highest favour. He was the first who bore the title of Qadi'l Qudat (the qadi of the qadis, Chief Justice), and it is said that he was also the first who changed the dress of the learned (the 'ulama) and gave it that form which it retains to this day. Before his time, persons of all classes dressed in the same manner, so that they had nothing in their attire to distinguish them one from one other. Yahya Ibn Ma'in, Ahmad Ibn Hanbal and 'Ali Ibn al-Madini (vol. II, p. 242) agree in considering him a sure and trustworthy Traditionist. Abu 'Umar Ibn Abd al-Barr, the author of the Isti'ab, says, in his work entitled Kitab al-Intiqa fi fa'dil al-thulathat al-Fuqaha' (the choice selection, treating of the merits of the three legists),<sup>6</sup> that Abu Yusuf was eminent as a hafiz, his memory ditionists," says Ibn Jarir al-Tabari (vol. II, p. 597), "mistrusted the Traditions delivered by him, because he was much inclined to resolve points of law by rational deduction (rai), drawing consequences from the maxims of the Divine law; besides which they disapproved of his having frequented men in power (sultan) and undertaken to fill the duties of a qadi."<sup>7</sup>

5 Abu Bakr Bishr Ibn al-Walid Ibn Khalid al-Kindi, one of the most eminent of Abu Hanifah's disciples, was highly distinguished for his learning, his piety and the austerity of his life. In the year 208 (A.D. 823), he was appointed by al-Mamun to act as a Qadi in the quarter of Baghdad which was then called 'Askar al-Mahdi, and which became afterwards known by the name of al-Rusafah. When he held that place, he incurred the displeasure of Yahya Ibn Akhham because he refused to execute a judgment pronounced by that powerful magistrate. Being cited for that reason before al-Ma'mun, he declared that the unfavorable character which he had received of Yahya from that qadi's own townsmen prevented him from obeying his mandates. Yahya asked the khalif to depose the qadi, but his request was not granted. Bishr Ibn al-Walid became qadi of Baghdad and of the suburb of al-Karkh under the khalifate of al-Muta'sim, but was afterward persecuted and confined to his house by that prince because he refused to declare that the Al-Qur'an, which is the word of God, was created and not eternal. The khalif al-Mutawakkil set him at liberty and authorised him to give opinions on points of law and teach Traditions. He lived to an advanced age and died A.H. 238 (A.D. 852-3).—(Lives of the Hanifite doctors; ms. of the Bib. imp. of Paris, supplement, n. 699, fol. 95.—Nujum).

6 The three legists of which this work treats were Malik, Abu Hanifah and al-Shafi'i.

7 See vol. I, p. 235.

The Khatib Abu Bakr states, in his history of Baghdad, that Abu Yausuf related as follows: "When I first applied to the study of Traditions and law [hadith and fiqh] I was very poor and ill dressed. One day, whilst I was at Abu Hanifah's (lectures), my father came, took me out and said to me: 'My son do not try to march in step with Abu Hanifa; he has always his bread ready baked, whilst you are in need, without the means of subsistence.' In consequence of this, I abstained from the pursuit of knowledge, thinking it preferable to shew obedience to my father. Abu Hanifah, having remarked my absence, asked what had become of me, so, Al recommenced attending his sittings. The first day of my appearing thereafter a considerable absence, he said to me: 'What kept you away from us so long?' and I answered: 'Seeking a livelihood and shewing obedience to a father.' I then took my place and, when the class broke up, he handed to me a purse saying: 'Make use of this.' I looked into it and found there one hundred dirhems ( £ 2.10s). He then said: 'Follow my class regularly and, when you have emptied that, let me know.' I attended the class assiduously, and soon after, he gave me another hundred. From that time, he continued to repeat his gifts without my ever informing him of my penury or of my having spent what I had received. Whenever my money was gone, it was as if he had been informed of the circumstance, (and these acts of beneficence continued) till I was able to do without assistance and had become rich."

The Khatib then says: "According to another statement Abu Yusuf was a child when his father died, and it was his mother who disapproved of his attending Abu Hanifah's lectures." Farther on, the same author gives a relation which he traces up, through an unbroken series of narrators, to 'Ali Ibn al-Ja'd,<sup>8</sup> who said that the qadi Abu Yasuf made to him the following statement: "My father died, leaving me an infant in my mother's arms. Some time after, she put me to service with a fuller, and I used to leave (the shop of) my master and go to Abu Hanifah's class, where I would sit down and listen. My mother sometimes came, took me by the hand and led me back to the fuller. My assiduity in attending Abu Hanifah's lessons and zeal for acquiring knowledge interested him in my favour. My mother finding, at length, that those escapades of mine were too frequent and too long, said to him: 'You alone are the ruin of this boy; he is an orphan possessing nothing; I procure him food with the produce of my spindle, and my sole hope is that he may soon be able to gain a penny for his own use. Abu Hanifah answered her in these terms: 'Go away, you silly talkative woman; your son in here learning how to eat faludaj<sup>9</sup> with pistachio oil.' On this she turned away from him and went off, saying: 'You are an old dotard and have lost your wits.' From that time I attended Abu Hanifah's lessons regularly and, with the help of God, I acquired learning, rose in the world, obtained the qadiship, was admitted into the society of al-Rashid and ate at his table. One day, some faludaj was set before al-Rashid and he said to me: 'Abu Ya'qub, eat this; it is not ways that the like of it is prepared for us.' I said to him: 'What is it? Commander of the faithful!' He replied: 'Faludaj with pistachio oil.' On hearing this, I laughed. What makes you laugh?' said he. I answered: 'Commander of the faithful! it is all right (it is nothing).' He said: 'You must tell me, and he insisted to such a degree that I related to him the whole story, from beginning to end. It pleased him so much that he exclaimed; 'By Allah! science is profitable in this 'world and in the next. May the mercy of God light upon Abu Hanifah! he could see with the eye of his intelligence that which was invisible to the eye of his head.'"

---

8 Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn al-Ja'd Ibn 'Ubayd al-Jawhari, one of Abu Yusuf's disciples, died A.D. '132 (A.D. 749-50), at the age of ninety-six years. Lives of the Hanifites, fol. 104).

'Ali Ibn al-Muhassin al-Tanukhi (vol. II, p. 567) states that his father said to him: My father related to me as follows: "Abu Yusuf's intimacy with al-Rashid was brought about in the following manner. The former came to Baghdad subsequently to the death of Abu Hanifah, and a certain qa'id (military chief), who was afraid of having committed a perjury, was then looking out for a mufti (casuist) whom he might consult on the matter. Abu Yusuf being brought to him, declared that the oath was not infringed, and the qa'id bestowed on him some gold pieces and procured for him a house near his own. Some days after the qa'id went to visit al-Rashid and, finding him in low spirits, asked him the cause of his sadness (the khalif) replied: 'What afflicts me is a matter which concerns religion: look out for a legist whom I may consult.' The qa'id brought him Abu Yusuf. Here is the latter's account of what passed: 'When I entered the alley which lies between the (two lines of) houses (forming the khalif residence), I saw a handsome youth of a princely appearance, confined in a chamber. He made signs to me with his finger as if asking me to assist him, but I did not understand what he wanted. When I was brought into the presence of al-Rashid and stood before him (waiting for what he had to say), he asked me my name and I answered: 'Ya'qub;

---

9 Faludaj, in french nougat, is a cake or hard paste made of almonds and honey.

may God favour the Commander of the faithful!"* 'What say you, said he, of an imam (khalif) who saw a man commit adultery? must he inflict on him the punishment fixed by law?"<sup>10</sup> I replied: 'No.' When I pronounced that word, al-Rashid prostrated himself on the floor, so, it struck me that he had seen a member of his family committing that act and that the young man who made signs to me as if imploring my assistance was the guilty person. Al-Rashid then asked me on what authority I had pronounced my decision and I answered; 'From those words of the Prophet: 'Reject (the application of) penalties in cases of doubt. Now, in this case there is a doubt which suppresses the penalty.'

On this, Al-Rashid said: 'How can there be doubt, since the act was seen.' I answered: "Seeing is not more effective than knowing for authorising (the application of) a penalty, and the simple knowing (of a crime) is not sufficient to authorise its punishment. Besides, no one is allowed to do justice to himself even though he knew (that the right was on his side).'

The khaif made a second prostration and then ordered me a large sum of money. He told me also to remain in the house (the palace?), and I did not leave it till a present was brought to me from the young man, another from his mother, and others from the persons attached to his service. That was the foundation of my fortune. I continued to remain at the house and one servant would come to consult me on a case of conscience; another, to ask my advice, and I at length rose so high in al-Rashid's favour that he invested me with the qadiship (of Baghdad)."<sup>11</sup>—I must here observe that this statement is in contradiction with that which I have already given and in which it is said that he held the qadiship under three of the khalifs. God knows the truth!

Talhah Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ja'far<sup>11</sup> said: 'The history of Abu Yusuf is well known and his great merit is evident to all. He was Abu Hanifah's pupil; the ablest legist of that time, and none of his contemporaries surpassed him (in talent). He attained the highest point in learning, in wisdom, in authority [al-riyasat]" and in influence 10 An adulterer cannot be punished unless four witnesses declare that they saw him in the act. Here the question is, if the khalif, as chief of the religion, had the right of inflicting the punishment, because he witnessed the commission of the crime.

---

* اللّٰه الله امير المؤمنين

11 Talhah Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ja'far was one of the witnesses to the act by which the Khalif al-Mu'uti addicated in favour of his son at-Tai. This document was signed the 13th of Dhu'l Qa'deh a, 363 (5th August, A.D. 974).—(Nujum)

** [i.e., principles of administration and government —Ed.].

[al-qadr]. It was he who, the first, composed works on the fundamentals of jurisprudence, according to the Hanifite system. He dictated and developed the problems of which that science treats, and he spread the doctrines of Abu Hanifah over all parts of the world."

"Of all Abu Hanifah's disciples, there was none," said 'Ammar Ibn Abi Malik, "who could be compared with Abu Yusuf. Had it not been for him, no one would ever have heard of Abu Hanifah or of Muhammad Ibn Abi Layla (col. II, p. 584). It was he who put their opinions into circulation and spread abroad their learning."

Muhammad Ibn al-Hasan (vol. II, p. 590), one of Abu Hanifah's disciples, said: "Abu Yusuf was taken so dangerously ill, whilst Abu Hanifah was still living, that fears were entertained for his life. Abu Hanifah then went to visit him and we went with him. On retiring he put down his hand on the threshold of the door and said: If that youth die, the most learned of those who are on that -- pointing to the ground, 'will disappear."

Abu Yusuf related the following anecdote: "Al-A'mash (vol. I, p. 587) questioned me on a point of law and I resolved it for him. 'Where did you find that solution?' said he. I replied: 'I took it from one of the Traditions which you taught us,' and then repeated it to him. 'Ya'qub,' said he, 'I learned that tradition by heart before your father ever consorted with your mother, but I did not understand its application till now!'"

Hilal Ibn Yahya<sup>12</sup> related as follows: "Abu Yusuf knew by heart the explanations of the Qur'an, the history of the (Muslim) wars and of the encounters which took place between the Arabs of the desert;* the science of which he knew the least was that of law. Amongst the disciples of Abu Hanifah, there was not one to be compared to Abu Yusuf."

In the work entitled al-Jalis wa'l-Anis, the author, Abu'l Faraj al-Mu'afa al-Nahrawani (vol. III, p. 374) states that al-Shafi'i (vol. II, p. 569) made the following narration. The qadi Abu Yusuf absented himself from Abu Hanifah's lessons for some days, in order to hear

12 Hilal Ibn Yahya Ibn Muslim, a native of Basrah and surnamed Hilal al-Rai (clear-sighted Hilal) on account of his great learning and intelligence, studied jurisprudence under Abu Hanifah and Zufar (see note 14). He died A.H. 245 (A.D. 859-60). (Lives of the Hanifites, fol. 97)

* al-tafsir wa al-maghazi wa ayyam al-'Arab.

Muhammad Ibn Ishaq (vol. II, p. 677) and others relate (traditional accounts of) the expeditions (undertaken by the early Muslims). When he returned to Abu Hanifah's lessons the latter said to him: "Abu Yusuf! tell me the name of Goliath's standard-bearer." Abu Yusuf replied: You are an imam (a master of the first rank); yet, if you do not abstain from making such questions, I declare by Allah! that I shall ask you in the presence of all the class, which of the combats occurred first, that of Badr or that of Uhud? I am sure that you do not know which of them preceded the other." Abu Hanifah then let him alone.

It is stated in the same work that 'Ali Ibn al-Ja'd related the following anecdote: "The qadi Abu Yusuf was one day writing a letter, and a man who was (sitting) at his right hand kept looking over what he was writing. Abu Yusuf perceived this and, when he had finished, he turned round to the man and asked him if he had remarked any faults in the letter. The other answered: "By Allah! not a single word misspelt." Abu Yusuf then said to him: "I am much obliged to you for sparing me trouble of revising my letter," and recited this verse:

"One would think, from his bad education, that he had been converted to Islamism by (the lecture of that chapter in the book of Traditions which is entitled: On) bad manners<sup>13</sup>."

Hammad the son of Abu Hanifah (vol. I, p. 469) said: "I saw Abu Hanifah one day, with Abu Yusuf on his right hand and Zufar<sup>14</sup> on his left. These two were discussing a question and one could not advance an assertion without being refuted by the other. This continued till after the hour of noon, when the mu'adhdhin called to prayers. Abu Hanifah then rose [raised] his hand, clapped Zufar on the thigh and said: "Hope not to obtain the first place as a legist in any town where Abu Yusuf may be; declaring thus that Abu Yusuf had the advantage over Zufar. After the death of Abu Yusuf, Zufar had not his equal among the disciples of Abu Hanifah."

The following anecdote was related by Tahir Ibn Ahmad al-Zubayri. "There was a man who attended Abu Hanifah's lessons without ever uttering a word. Abu Yusuf at length said to him: "Do 13 The translation of the last verse is conjectural.

14 The imam Zufar Ibn Hudhayl Ibn Qays, a native of Basrah and an eminent doctor of the Hanifite sect, was one of Abu Hanifah's ablest disciples. He was appointed to the qadiship of Basrah, the inhabitants of which place esteemed him highly, and he died there in the year 158 (A.D. 774-5), at the age of forty-eight years.-- (Lives of the Hanifites, fol. 80) you never intend to speak (and ask a question)?" The man answered: "By no means; and I shall now ask you at what time he who keeps a fast should break it?" Abu Yusuf replied: "When the sun has set." 'Well' said the man, 'and if he does not set till midnight?' Abu Yusuf laughed and said: You were right in remaining silent, and I was wrong in asking you to speak.' He then pronounced the following verses as applicable to the circumstance:

I admired the indifference of that man who was so careless about himself and wondered at the silence of a person who knew well how to speak. For the indifferent man, silence serves as a veil (to hide his ignorance), and for him who can speak well it is a docket indicating his talent.

One of Abu Yusuf's sayings was: "Associating with one who fears neither disgrace nor shame, will be the cause of disgrace and shame on the day of the resurrection."

He said also: "There are three chief blessings: that of being a Muslim, without which, no other blessing is complete; that of health, without which there is no pleasure in life, and that of wealth, without which life cannot be completely enjoyed."

'Ali Ibn al-Ja'd related that he heard Abu Yusuf say: "Science al-'ilm will not give to you a portion of itself, unless you give yourself totally up to it; and if you do not so for the purpose of obtaining<sup>15</sup> a mere portion, you commit a grave error."

Abu Yusuf was one day riding, and his servant boy was running on foot after him. A man then said to him: "Does the law permit you to make your boy run after you and not give him whereon to ride?" Abu Yusuf replied: "Do you admit that I may consider my boy in the light of a mukari?"<sup>16</sup> The other replied: "I admit that you may." "Well," said Abu Yusuf, "in that case, he must run at my side, as a mukari should do."

Yahya Ibn 'Abd al-Samad relates that, al-Hadi, the Commander of the faithful, brought before the qadi Abu Yusuf a suit relative to a garden of which he was in possession. His claim at first sight, appeared just, but it was, in reality, ill founded, (sometime after,) he said to the qadi: "What have you done in the affair which we submitted to your judgment?" The qadi answered: "The Commander of the faithful's adversary requires of me that I make you declare, upon oath, that your witnesses have truly deposed." "Do you think that he has a right to do so?" said al-Hadi. "Ibn Abi Layla is of that opinion," said the qadi. "Then," replied al-Hadi, "let the garden be restored to the man." This was a device imagined by the qadi (in order to get out of the difficulty), for he knew that al-Hadi would not swear.

---

15 The word min seems to stand here for fi.

16 The makari keeps an ass, a horse or a mule for hire, and accompanies on foot the person who hires the animal.

Bishr Ibn al-Walid al-Kindi states that the qadi Abu Yusuf made to him the following relation: "Yesterday evening, when I had got into bed, I heard a violent knocking at the door. I wrapped the sheet about me and went to see who was there, and lo! it was Harthamah Ibn 'Ayan.<sup>17</sup> I saluted him and he merely said to me: 'Answer the call of the Commander of the faithful.' I replied: 'Abu Hatim! I know that you have some regard for me; the time is now late, as you see, and I am afraid that the Commander of the faithful wants me for some serious matter. Could you not try and have the affair put off till tomorrow morning? perhaps he may then have changed his mind.' Harthamah answered: 'That I have not in my power to do.' I asked him then what was the cause of his being sent, and he replied: The eunuch Masrur came out and ordered me to bring you before the Commander of the faithful.' I said to him: 'Will you allow me to make the (funer) lotion and perfume myself; if the affair be grave, I shall be prepared for the worst, and that (precaution) will do me harm if God, in his bounty, deliver me from danger.' Having obtained his consent, I went into my chamber, put on new clothes, perfumed myself with such odours as were at hand. We then went out together and proceeded to the residence of the Commander of the faithful, Harun al-Rashid. We found Masrur standing there, and Harthamah said to him: 'I have brought you the man.' I then addressed Masrur in these terms: 'Abu Hashim! (I owe you) my humble respects, my service and my friendship. This is a painful moment; can you tell me what the Commander of the faithful wants me for?' He answered that he could not. I then asked him who was with the khalif, and he replied: "'Isa Ibn Ja'far.'<sup>18</sup> 'And who else' said I. 'There is not third person,'" was the answer. He then said to me: 'Go forward and, when you are in the vestibule, you will find him sitting in the porch. Scrape your foot on the ground; he will ask who is there and you will answer: 'It is I.' I went in and did as I had been told. He (Al-Rashid) said: 'Who is that?' and I answered: 'Ya'qub.' He told me to enter and, when I went in, I found him seated, with 'Isa Ibn Ja'far on his right hand. I made him the salutation; he returned it and said: 'I think that we must have alarmed you.' I replied: You did, by Allah! and have alarmed those also whom I left behind me.--'Sit down', said he. I sat down and, when my apprehensions were allayed, he turned towards me and said: 'Abu Y'qub! do you know why I sent for you?' I replied: 'I do not.' 'I sent for you', said he, 'so that you might receive the declaration which I am going to make against this man who is here. He possesses a slave-girl; I asked her from him as a present, and he refused; I asked him to sell her to me, and he refused. Now, by Allah! if he does not (consent to my demand), I shall take his life.' On this, I turned towards 'Isa and said: 'See what God has effected by means of a girl!<sup>19</sup> you refuse giving her to the Commander of the faithful and are therefore reduced to this extremity.' He replied: 'You have spoken before knowing what I have to say.' I asked him what he could say for himself', and he answered: 'I am bound by oath to divorce my wife, to liberate my slaves and to distribute to the poor all I possess, in case I sell that girl or give her away.' Al-Rashid then turned towards me and said: 'Has he any means of getting out of that?' I replied that he had. 'And how so?' said he. I answered: 'Let him give you the half of her and sell you the other half; he will then have neither given her nor sold her. 'Is that the law?' said 'Isa. I replied that it was. 'Then,' said he, 'I take you to witness that I give him the half of her and sell him the other half for one hundred thousand dinars (£ 50,000).' Al-Rashid answered: 'I accept the gift and purchase the half of her for that sum. Bring in the girl.' She was brought in and the money also. 'Isa then said: 'Commander of the faithful! receive her, and may you find in her a blessing from God.' When he had taken the money, al-Rashid said: 'Abu Ya'qub! one thing still remains to be done.' 'What is it?' said I. 'She is a slave,' said he, 'and I cannot approach her till she has had her next monthly infirmity; now if I do not pass this night with her, I think my soul will quit my body.' I replied: 'Commander of the faithful! declare her free and marry her; for a freewoman is not bound by that obligation. He said: 'I declare her free; who will marry me to her?' I answered: 'I.' On this, he called in Masrur and Husayn (to serve as witnesses). I recited the khutbah (invocation), praised God and then married them, on the condition of his giving her a dowry of twenty thousand dinars (£ . 10,000). He sent for the money and gave it to her, after which he said to me: 'Ya'qub! you may retire.' He then looked up to Masrur, who replied: 'I am at your orders.' To him he said: 'Carry to Ya'qub's house two hundred dirhmes (£ . 10,000) and twenty chests of clothing.' That was done. Here Bishr Ibn al-Walid said: 'Abu Yusuf

---

17 Harthamah Ibn 'Ayan was one of al-Rashid's principal generals.

18 'Isa Ibn Ja'far was the grandson of the khalif al-Mansur and the cousin of al-Rashid.

19 The Arabic expression is here translated by conjecture.

then addressed me: 'Do you see anything wrong in what I did?' I answered: 'No.' Then', said he, take your fee (for this consultation). I asked him how much was my fee, and he replied: 'The tenth (of the whole). I thanked him, prayed for his happiness and was about to stand up (and withdraw) when an old woman came in and said: 'Abu Yusuf! (one who considers herself as) your daughter sends me to salute you and to say, in her name: 'By Allah! all I received last night from the Commander of the faithful was the dowry which you know of; I here send you the half of it and reserve the rest for my own use.' The qadi said to the woman: 'Take the sum back to her; by Allah! I shall not accept it. I delivered her from servitude, married her to the Commander of the faithful, and she thus shows me her satisfaction.<sup>20</sup> I and my uncles remonstrated with him till he accepted, and he then ordered one thousand dinars to be taken out of the sum and given to me."

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Yusufi related as follows: "Umm Ja'far Zubaydah, the daughter of Ja'far<sup>21</sup> and the wife of al-Rashid, wrote a letter to Abu Yusuf in which he asked his opinion relatively to something 'the legality of which', said she, 'is, for me, highly desirable.' He returned her a favourable decision, and she sent him a silver case containing a number of silver boxes placed one over the other and containing, each of them, a different species of perfume. With that camera vase filled with silver money, in the midst of which was another vase filled with gold. One of the company then reminded him that the Prophet had said: When a man receives a present, his companions<sup>22</sup> must be sharers in it. To this (hint), Abu Yusuf replied: 'Those words were said at a time when the usual presents consisted of milk or dates."

Yahya Ibn Ma'in (gives us another version of the same story); he says: "I was at the qadi Abu Yusuf's and with him were a number of Traditionists and other (learned) men. A present was then brought to him from Umm Ja'far; it consisted of boxes containing flowered and plain stuffs, liqueurs* perfumes, little figures composed of odorous paste for fumigations, and other objects. One of the persons who were in the room then repeated to me the saying of the Prophet: When a man receives a present, the by-sitters must be sharers therein, Abu 20 It is not clear whether the qadi thought the sum too little or meant to show his disinterestedness.

21 This Ja'far was the son of the khalif al Mansur.

22 Literary: his by-sitters.

* [evidently soft drinks.-Ed.]

Yusuf overheard these words and said: 'How can that apply? The Prophet said so a time when presents consisted of curds, or dates, or raisins, and not of objects such as these. Up with them, boy! and take them to the store-room.'

I shall now give a passage which I found in a work bearing the title of al-Lafif (the Miscellany), but in which the name of the author is not mentioned. "Abd al-Rahman Ibn Mushir, the brother of 'Ali Ibn Mushir,<sup>23</sup> was the qadi of al-Mubarak." Al-Mubarak is a village situated on the bank of the Tigris, between Baghdad and Wasit. "This qadi, having learned that al-Rashid was going to Basrah in his barge, with Abu Yusuf, requested the inhabitants of his village to speak in praise of him when the khalif and Abu Yusuf would be passing by. As they refused to do so, he put on his (outside) clothes, with a high-peaked cap and a black scarf (thrown over it). He then went to the landing-place and, when the barge approached, he bawled out: 'Commander of the faithful! we have an excellent qadi, a qadi of sterling worth.' From that he proceeded to another landing-place and repeated the same words. On this, Rashid turned to Abu Yusuf and said: 'The worst qadi on earth must be here! a qadi who in the place 'where he resides, can find only one man to speak well of him.' Abu Yusuf replied: 'The Commander of the faithful would be still more surprised if he 'were told that it was the qadi who praised himself. Al-Rashid laughed heartily and said: 'He is a clever fellow and must never be dismissed from office. From that time, whenever he thought of this qadi, he would say: 'That fellow shall never be deposed.' Abu Yusuf was asked how he could have nominated such a man, and he replied: 'He was for a long time (a suitor) at my door, complaining of poverty, and I therefore gave him an appointment.

Abu'l 'Abbas Ahmad Ibn Yahya, surnamed Tha'lab (vol. I, p. 83) says, in his Fasih: "One of my companions informed me that al-Rashid said to Abu Yusuf: 'I am told that all those whose depositions you receive when they appear before you to give evidence, are considered-by you as hypocrites and that you say so.' The qadi answered, 'That is the truth' "How?' said al-Rashid. The qadi replied 'People who are really respectable and truly honest have no occasion to know us, nor we them; those whose (profligacy) is evident and whose (bad) character is well known never appear before us as witnesses, neither would their evidence be received. One class only remains, and those are the hypocrites who put on the appearance of virtue in order to hide their vices.' Al-Rashid smiled and said: 'That is the truth.'

23 Ibn Durayd informs us, in his Ishtikak, that 'Ali Ibn Mushir was qadi of Mosul. We see from the passage quoted by our author that he lived under the khalifate of Harun al-Rashid.

Muhammad Ibn Sama'ah<sup>24</sup> relates that he heard Abu Yusuf utter these words on the day of his death. 'I declare, my God' that I never pronounced intentionally an unjust sentence, when judging between two of Thy servants, in my decisions I always endeavoured to follow the prescriptions of Thy book and those of Thy Prophet's Sunnah; in every case which was doubtful, I placed Abu Hanifah between me and Thee, for I solemnly declare that I considered him to have been a man well acquainted with Thy commandments and never deviating from the truth, when he knew it." There is here an idea borrowed from a saying of Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah, the son of al-Hasan and the grandson of al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib: He passed his hand over his boots (when making the ablution for prayer, and did not take them off in order to wash his feet), and a person said to him: "Do you pass your hand over your boots?" His reply was: 'I do; 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab did so; and he who places 'Umar between himself and God has secured himself from danger.'" It is Ibn Qutaybah who mentions this in his Kitab al-Ma'arif, where he speaks of 'Ali.

The anecdotes related of Abu Yusuf are very numerous, and the doctors of the law enlarge upon his preeminence and the respect to which he is entitled. In the Khatib's greater history of Baghdad, we find things said of Abu Yusuf which are shocking to hear and which we therefore abstain from mentioning. They are given on the authority of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Mubarak (vol. II, p. 12), Waki Ibn al-Jarrah (vol. I, p. 374), Yazid Ibn Harun (vol. I, p. 374), Muhammad Ibn Isma'il al-Bukhari (vol. II, p. 594); Abu'l Hasan al-Daraqutni (vol. II, p. 239) and others. God knows best!

The qadi Abu Yusuf was born in the year 113 (A.D. 731-2): his death took place at Baghdad on Thursday, the 5th of the first Rabi' A.H. 182 (26th April, A.D. 798), at the first hour of the afternoon; some say, but erroneously, that he died in the year 192. He was 24 The imam Abu Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Samaa Ibn 'Ubayd Allah al-Tamimi, a learned Traditionist and doctor of the Hanifite sect, studied jurisprudence under Abu Yusuf. He composed a number of works such as the Guide for Kadis (Adab al-Kadi), the conversations (Muhadarat), models of acts (Sijillat) and Anecdotes (Nawader). In the year 192 (A.D. 807-8), on the death of Yusuf, the son of Abu Hanifah, he was appointed qadi of Baghdad by al-Ma'mun. He died in the year 233 (A.D. 847-8) at the age of one hundred and three years.--(Lives of the Hanifites, fol. 92).

---

appointed qadi in the year 166 (A.D. 782-3), and died in office. His son Yusuf studied and practised the application of rational deduction (rai) to questions of law. He learned Traditions from Yunus Ibn Abi Ishaq al-Sabi'<sup>25</sup>, al-Sari Ibn Yahya and others. He was appointed qadi of the western suburb of Baghdad in his father's lifetime and, by the order of al-Rashid, he presided at the Friday prayer in the city of al-Mansur (the suburb of al-Karkh). He held the qadiship till his death. That event occurred at Baghdad, in the month of Rajab, 192 (May A.D. 808).

The Khatib of Baghdad states that, when the qadi Abu Yusuf died, al-Rashid nominated in his place Abu'l Bakhtari Wahb al-Qurashi, the same of whom we have given an account (vol. III, p. 673). Abu Ya'qub al-Khuzaymi a poet of some celebrity and an intimate friend of Abu Yusuf and his son, having heard a man say, on the death of the former: 'To-day jurisprudence is dead,' recited the following lines:

O thou who announced the death of jurisprudence to the members of its family, because Ya'qub has ceased to live, thou art not aware that jurisprudence is not dead but has merely passed from one bosom to another; from Ya'qub to Yusuf; from goodness to purity. Whilst he (Yusuf) remains and wherever he stops, it will stop (with him; when he dies), it will descend to the tomb.

Khunays is the diminutive form of akhnas, which (adjective) signifies: having the nose sunk into the face and the point of it slightly prominent. The masculine is akhnas and the feminine khansah. This form of the diminutive is called the apocopated (tarkhim); to obtain it, the rule is that the servile letters are to be suppressed and that the regular diminutive form is to be given to what remains of the word. It is thus that Azhar, Aswad and Ahmad have for apocopated diminutives Zuhayr, Suwayd and Humayd.<sup>26</sup>

Instead of the name Bahir, some persons read Bujayr, but they are in the wrong. I turned over law-books and other treatises in hopes of discovering the meaning of the word Habtah, but did not succeed in my search. The other names (in the genealogy) are so well known that we need not indicate their orthography.

<sup>25</sup> According to al-Dhahabi the Traditionist Yunus Ibn Abi Ishaq al-Sabi'i died in the year 159 (A.D. 775-6).

<sup>26</sup> The regular diminutives of these words would be Uzhayir, Uswayid and Uhmaid.

Sa'd Ibn Khabtah [Habtah] was one of those volunteers who, on account of their extreme youth, were dispensed by the Prophet from fighting at the battle of Uhud. The others were al-Bara' Ibn 'Azib<sup>27</sup> and Sa'id al-Khudri (vol. II, p. 208). At the battle of the Intrenchment, [al-Khandaq] the Prophet remarked Sa'd Ibn Khabtah who, though very young, was fighting with great bravery. He called him over to him and asked him his name. The other replied. "Sa'd (happiness), the son of Habtah, on which the Prophet stroked his head and said: "May God grant you happy fortune."

Hunays was the person after whom was named the open place in Kufa which is called the *Tehihar Suh** are Persian words and mean four streets. This place was effectively an open square from which streets branched off in four directions.

798 YA'QUB AL-HADRAMI

Abu Muhammad Ya'qub Ibn Ishaq Ibn Zayd Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Ishaq al-Hadrami (a hadramite) by clientship and a native of Basra was a celebrated teacher of the Qur'an-readings (vol. I, p. 152), and the eighth of the ten Readers.<sup>1</sup> The system of readings taught by him<sup>2</sup> is well-known and has been regularly handed down by oral transmission. He came of a family which produced men learned in the Reading,<sup>3</sup> in grammar and in the (pure) language of the Arabs, 27 Abu 'Umarah al-Bara' Ibn 'Azib, one of the Ansars, died A.H. 71 (A.D. 690-1).--(Nujum.)

* [jahar suj, in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 432-Ed.]

1 We find frequent mention of seven principal Readers and also of ten. Were we to class the ten by the dates of their deaths. Ya'qub would hold, not the eighth place, but the ninth, and we should obtain a list arranged in this order Ibn 'Amir, Ibn Kathir, 'Asim, Yazid, Abu 'Amr, Hamzah, Hafei', al-Kisai, Ya'qub and al-Bazzar. The biographers place Ya'qub as the eighth on the list and create thus a difficulty of which the solution has not yet been found by the translator. The list called that of the seven Readers, should be arranged thus, if the chronological order were to be followed: Ibn 'Amir, Ibn Kathir, 'Asim, Abu Amr, Hamza, al-Kisai and Nafi. To make up the list of ten, the names of Yazid, Ya'qub and al-Bazzar were added.

2 The Reading, or rather the system of readings or lections adopted by each of the seven or ten Readers, may be considered as an edition of the Qur'anic text.

3 See vol. I page 152.

men distinguished for having transmitted down a great quantity of various readings and for their knowledge of the law. Ya'qub was one of the most eminent Readers, and those of the two holy aities (Makkah and Madinah) of the two 'Iraqs, of Syria and of other countries, learned his system by heart, either with or without the isnads (vol. I, introd, p. xxii). He obtained a full acquaintance with the readings (or editions) by reciting them aloud to able masters, such as Sallam Ibn Sulayman al-Tawil,<sup>4</sup> Mahdi Ibn Maymun<sup>5</sup> and Abu'l Ashhab al-Utaridi.<sup>6</sup> He taught some lections (huruf)<sup>7</sup> which he had learned from Hamzah (vol. I, p. 478); he heard lections taught by Abu'l Hasan al-Kisai (vol. II, p. 237) and he heard also (traditions taught by) his grandfather Zayd Ibn 'Abd Allah and by Shu'bah (vol. I, p. 493). The isnad of the reading adopted by him reaches up to the Prophet in the following manner: he read under Sallam's tuition, Sallam under that of 'Asim Ibn Abi al-Nujud (vol. II, p. 1), 'Asim under that of Abu' Abd al-Rahman al-Sulami (vol. II, p. 4), Abu Abd al-Rahman under that of 'Ali Ibn Talib, and 'Ali under that of the Prophet. A number of Readers handed down that reading after learning it from Ya'qub and reciting it under his direction: such were Rawh Ibn 'Abd al-Mu'min,<sup>8</sup> Muhammad Ibn al-Mutawakkil,<sup>9</sup> Abu Hatim al-Sijistani (vol. I, p. 605) and others. Al-

4 Abu'l Mundir Sallam Ibn Sulayman, a native of Basrah and a mawla of the tribe of Muzayna was known as a Reader and a grammarian. He spoke with elegance and was considered as veracious (saduq) in what he taught. His death took place in the year 171 (A.D. 787-8). Persons not well informed have confounded him with Abu Sulayman al-Tawil al-Madaini al-Sa'di, surnamed al-Khurasani.-(Kitab Ma'arif al Qurra', ms. of the Bib. imp. n. 742, fol. 30.) --Has Ibn Khalikan fallen into the mistake pointed out by Shams al-Din Muhammad Ibn Ahmad al-Dhahabi, the author of the Qurra'?

5 Abu Yahya Mahdi Ibn Maymun al-Azdi, a mawla and a native of Basrah, is placed by al-Dhahabi among the Traditionists. He died A.H. 171 (A.D. 787-8) or 172.-(Huffaz.)

6 Abu'l Ashhab Ja'far Ibn Hayan al-Utaridi died in Basrah, towards the year 165 A.D. 781-2), at a very advanced age.-(Kitab al-Ma'arif, Huffaz.)

7 The word harf is employed as a technical term in the science of the Readings and has then two different significations. It designates the systems of Quran-reading, that is, the editions of the Qur'anic text taught by the great masters, and also the various readings or lections which are found in the different texts of the Qur'an. The plural is huruf.

8 Abu'l Hasan Rawh Ibn 'Abd al-Mu'min, a native of Basrah and one of Ya'qub's disciples in Qur'an-reading, died towards the year 234 (A.D. 848-9).-(Qurra', fol. 58, verso.)

9 Muhammad, the son of the Khalif al-Mutawakkil, was distinguished as a poet and died A.H. 282 (A.D. 895-6). He may be the person indicated here.

Za'farani<sup>10</sup> heard it from his (Ya'qub's) lips and, after the death of Abu 'Amr Ibn al-'Ala' (vol. II, p. 399) the most eminent of the Basra literati approved the choice which he had made, and all or most of them adopted his system. Tahir Ibn 'Abd al-Mu'min Ibn Ghalbun, the imam of the great mosque of Basra, never recited (to the congregation of) any other reading of the Qur'an than that of Ya'qub.

According to Abu'l Husayn Ibn al-Munadi Ya'qub read the Qur'an under the tuition of Abu 'Amr, but there he is mistaken. 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Abi'l Hatim stated that Ahmad Ibn Hanbal (vol. I, p. 44), being asked his opinion of Ya'qub al-Hadrami, answered: "Veracious",<sup>11</sup> and Abu Hatim al-Sijistani said: "Of all the persons whom we have seen or met with, Ya'qub al-Hadrami is the best acquainted with the lections, the differences (observable in the text) of the noble Qur'an, the manners of conciliating these differences and the systems followed by the grammarians in analyzing the text of the Qur'an." He (Ya'qub) composed a work which he entitled the Jami (collector) in which he noted all the difference which exist between the various manners of reading the Qur'an, and indicated the persons to whom each of those readings could be traced up. In a word, we may say that, in his time, he was for the people of Basrah the chief doctor in the Readings. He would sometimes question his disciples respecting the number of verses contained in the Qur'an and, if any of them made a mistake in the enumeration, he would order him to stand up (and leave the class). He died in the month of the first Jumada, 205 (Oct.-Nov. A.D. 820); those who place his death in the month of Dhu'l Hijjah are mistaken. He, his father Ishaq, and his grandfather Zayd, lived each of them to the age of eighty-eight years. His father's grandfather 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Ishaq al-Hadrami, was one of those great and distinguished doctors (in law and grammar) whom all point at for their learning.

Abu 'Ubaydah Ma'mar Ibn al-Muthannah (vol. III, p. 388) says, that the first person who laid (the foundations of) Arabic grammar was Abu'l Aswad al-Duwali (vol. I. p. 662); after him came Maymun al-Aqran<sup>12</sup>, who was succeeded by 'Anbast

---

10 Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah Ibn Hashim al-Za'farani (a native of the village of Zafaranih near Baghdad), was a teacher of the readings. The date of his death is not given by the author of the Qurra'.

11 Muftis, or casuists, when consulted on a doubtful point, always draw up their answer in the most concise manner possible.

12 Little or nothing is known of Maymun al-Aqran.

al-Fil<sup>13</sup> who was followed by 'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Ishaq al-Hadrami. In another version of this statement, 'Anbasah's name is placed before that of Maymun. God knows best which reading is preferable.

'Abd Allah Ibn Abi Ishaq was a contemporary of 'Tsa Ibn 'Umar al-Thaqafi (vol. II, p. 419) and Abu 'Amar Ibn al-'Ala', but died before them.

Abu ['Abd] Allah Ibn al-Marzubani (vol. III, p. 67) says in his Muqtabis (information picked up), which work contains an account of the celebrated grammarians, that al-Mubarrad (vol. III, p. 31) said: "Ali agree in considering Abu'l Aswad al-Duwali as the first who laid down the principles of Arabic grammar and that he learned them from 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib. Abu'l Aswad taught them to 'Anbasah Ibn Ma'dan al-Mahri, who transmitted them to Maymun al-Aqran by whom they were communicated to 'Abd Allah (Ibn Abi Ishaq) al-Hadrami, from whom they passed to 'Tsa Ibn 'Umar<sup>14</sup> then to al-Khalil Ibn Ahmad (vol. I, p. 493), then to Sibawayh (vol. II, p. 396) and then to al-Akhfash."

Bilal Ibn Abi Burda (vol. II, p. 2), the son of Abu Musa al-Ash'ari (vol. III, p. 633), was governor of Basrah when he brought about a conference between 'Abd Allah (Ibn Abi Ishaq) and Abu 'Amar Ibn al-'Ala'. The latter said (in his account of what then passed): 'Tbn Abi Ishaq got the better of me in a discussion concerning the (letter) hamzah, but I afterwards studied the question and attained superiority." This 'Abd Allah frequently objected to al-Farazdaq (vol. III, p. 612) the faults which he committed in his poems, and the latter at length said: "By Allah! I will compose against him a satirical verse which will obtain currency among literary men and be quoted by them as a proverb." He then made this verse:

If 'Abd Allah was a (simple) mawla, I should satirize him: but 'Abd Allah is a mawla of a family which are mawlas.

13 Little is known of Abu'l Aswad 'Anbasah Ibn Ma'dan al-Fil. He possessed some grammatical knowledge and transmitted down orally a great number of poems, amongst which were many composed by Jarir and al-Farazdaq. He must therefore have lived in the second century of the Hijrah. His father was called Ma'dan al-Fil, because he had received one of those animals as a present from the governor of Iraq, Ziyad Ibn Abihh, whose children he was the preceptor. The title of al-Fil passed to his son.--(Fluegel's Grammatische Schulen der Araber.)

14 The grammarian 'Tsa Ibn 'Umar of the tribe of Thaqif died at Basrah A.H. III (A.D. 729-30). For details see Fluegel's Schule der Ar., p. 29.

He said so because 'Abd Allah was a mawla of the Hadramis, which family was confederated by oath (halif) with that of 'Abd Shams Ibn 'Abd Manaf. The Arabs of the desert say that the word halif is the equivalent of mawla, and they cite verses in proof of their assertion. Some of these passages I should give here were I not apprehensive of lengthening this article too much; besides which, this is not a fit place for them.

799 ABU 'AWANAH [YA'QUB IBN ISHAQ] THE HAFIZ

Abu 'Awamh Ya'qub Ibn Ishaq Ibn Ibrahim Ibn Yazid, an inhabitant of Naysapur (Naysapuri) and afterwards of Isfarain (Isfaraini), is the author of the book entitled al-Musnad al-Sahih (collection of authentic Traditions), the materials of which he extracted from the work of Muslim Ibn al-Hajjaj (vol. III. p. 348). He was one of those hafizes who travelled about and gathered up a great quantity of Traditions. He rambled over Syria and Egypt and visited Basrah, Kufah, Wasit, Hij: z, Mesopotamia, Yaman, Isfahan, Rayy and Fars.

The hafiz Abu'l Qasim, generally known by the surname of Ibn 'Asakir (vol. II. p. 252) says of him, in the History of Damascus: Abu 'Awanah heard, at Damascus, the lessons of Yazid Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Samad, Isma'il Ibn Muhammad Ibn Qirat,<sup>1</sup> Shu'ayb Ibn Shu'ayb Ibn Ishaq and others. In Egypt, he heard Yunus Ibn 'Abd al-A'ala, Ibn<sup>2</sup> Akhi Wahb,<sup>3</sup> al-Muzani (vol. I, p. 200), al-Rabi (vol. I, p. 519), Muhammad Ibn al-Hakam and Sa'd Ibn al-Hakam. In 'Iraq he heard Sa'dan Ibn Nasr, al-Hasan al-Za'farani (vol. I, p. 373). 'Umar Ibn Shabbah (vol. II, p. 375) and others. In Khurasan, his teachers were Muhammad Ibn Yahya al-Dhuhli, Muslim Ibn al-Hajjaj. Muhammad Ibn Raja' al-Sindi and others. In Mesopotamia he heard 'Ali Ibn Harb and others. Traditions were taught on his authority by

---

1 Isma'il Ibn Muhammad Ibn Qirat the Traditionist died A.H. 397 (A.D. 1006-7).—(Nujum.)

2 The life of Yunus Ibn 'Abd al- A'ila will be found in his volume.

3 The manuscripts offer the reading which we give here the edition of Boulac has: Ibn Akht Wahb.

Abu Bakr al-Isma'ili (vol. I, p. 8), Ahmad Ibn 'Ali al-Razi<sup>4</sup>. Abu 'Ali al-Husyan Ibn 'Ali, Abu Ahmad Ibn 'Ali Sulayman al-labarani (vol. I, p. 592). Muhammad Ibn Ya'qub Ibn Isma'il the hafiz. Abu'l Walid the legist and his own son Abu Mus'ab Muhammad Ibn 'Ali 'Awanah. He made the pilgrimage five times.' "When I was at al-Missisah" says Ibn Abi 'Awanah, "my brother, Muhammad Ibn Ishaq, wrote to me a letter in which were these lines:

If we meet before (our) death, we shall cure our souls of the pains caused by our mutual reproaches, and if the hand of death anticipates us (we can only say) how many of our absent friends are now under ground.

Abu 'Abd Allah al-Hakam (vol. II, p. 681) declared Abu 'Awanah to be a learned and most exact Traditionist, one of those who travelled over the regions of the earth in search of Traditions. He died in the year 316 (A.D. 928-9).

Hamzah Ibn Yusuf al-Sahmi (vol. I, p. 25) mentioned that, in the year 292 (A.D. 904-5) Abu 'Awanah was seen in Jurjan.

The hafiz Abu'l Qasim Ibn 'Asakir states that the following narration was made to him by the holy and fundamentally learned shaykh (al-Shaykh al-Salih al-Asil) Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn 'Umar al-Saffar, a native of Isfarani: "The tomb of Abu 'Awanah, at Isfarain, is visited by all "pious people, and considered as bringing a blessing on those who go to it. At the side of it is the tomb of the scholar by whom his Traditions were handed down, I mean Abu Nu'aym 'Abd al-Malik Ibn al-Hasan al-Azhari of Isfarain. These tombs are in the same mausoleum: it lies within the city, on the left hand of the person who enters by the gate of Nisapur. Near that mausoleum is another containing the tomb of the ustad (or master) Abu Ishaq al-Isfaraini (vol. I, p. 8); it is on the right hand of the person who enters the city by the gate just mentioned. Beside it is the tomb of Abu 'Awanah's disciple and inseparable companion in life and death: I mean the ustad (master) Abu Mansur al-Baghdadi, who was eminent as an imam, a legist and a dogmatic theologian. They both assisted each other in defending religion by means of arguments and logical proofs. I heard my grandfather, the imam 'Umar Ibn al-Saffar, to whom God be merciful! say after looking at the tombs which surrounded that of the ustad Abu Ishaq, and pointing at the mausoleum: "It is said that forty imams and legist of the Shafite there

---

4 Abu Bakr Ahmad Ibn Ali al-Razi (a native of Rayy), was an eminent hafiz. He died in the year 403 (A.D. 1012-3).--(Huffaz.)

reposing, every one of whom was worthy of governing the sect and of giving opinions comfortable to his, al-Shafi'i's, views and decisions. The people visit the mausoleum of the imam Abu Ishaq more frequently than of Abu 'Awanah, that great imam and Traditionist whose worth they do not appreciate because he died a long time ago; they know Abu Ishaq's merit because he died but lately. Abu 'Awanah, as, however, the first to make known at Isfarain the doctrine of the imam al-Shafi'i. This he did on his return from Egypt, where, he had studied under Abu Ibrahim al-Muzani (vol. I, p. 200). When my grandfather passed near the mausoleum of the ustad (Abu Ishaq), I remarked that he never entered into it, through a feeling of reverence, and that he was satisfied with kissing the threshold, to which there were a number of steps leading up. He would remain there standing for some time, like a man penetrated with respect and veneration, and then pass on with the look of a man who has just said farewell to a person of high dignity. When he reached the mausoleum of Abu 'Awanah, he would display more respect, reverence and veneration than he had done at the other, and would remain there a longer time."

As we have already spoken of the adjectives Nisapuri (vol. I, p. 61) and Isfaraini (vol. I, p. 55), we need not repeat our observations here.

800 YA'QUB B. ISHAQ IBN AL-SIKKIT

Abu Yusuf Ya'qub Ibn Ishaq, generally known by the surname of Ibn al-Sikkit (the son of the taciturn), is the author of the (philological work entitled) Islah al-Mantiq (the correcting the language) and other treatises. The haifz Ibn 'Asakir (vol. II, p. 252) says of him, in the History of Damascus: "He delivered (his philological) information on the authority of Abu 'Amr Ishaq Ibn Mirar al-Shaybani (vol. I, p. 182), Muhammad Ibn Muhanna, and Muhammad Ibn Subh Ibn al-Sammak the preacher. The same information was received from him and taught to others by Ahmad Ibn Farah al-Muqri,<sup>1</sup> Muhammad Ibn

---

1 Abu Ja'far Ahmad Ibn Farah Ibn Jibril, a teacher of the Qur'an readings, a Traditionist and an expositor of the Qur'an, was a blind man and a native of Baghdad. His vast learning and the exactitude of his information brought him into great repute. As a Traditionist, he is considered to be sure and trustworthy. He died A.H. 393 (A.D. 915-6) at the age of nearly ninety years.— (Qurra, fol. 65.)

'Ajlan al-Akhbari, Abu Tkrimah al-Dabbi, Abu Sa'id al-Sukkari.<sup>2</sup> Maymun Ibn Harun the katib, and others. He gave lesson to (the khalif) al-Mutawakkil's sons, and he said: "Muhammad Ibn al-Sammak uttered this saying: "He who knows mankind humours them; he who has not that knowledge thwarts them, and the main point, in humouring mankind, is to abstain from thwarting them."<sup>3</sup>

Ibn al-Sikkit taught also philology on the authority of al-Asma'i (vol. II, p. 123), of Abu 'Ubaydah (vol. III, p. 388), of al-Farra and of many others. His works are good and full of sound information. Such are the Islah al-Mantiq, the Kitab al-Alfaz (vocabulary), the Ma'ani al-Shi'r (ideas currently used in poetry) and the treatise on grammatical permutations and substitutions (al-Qalb wa'l ibdal). As a grammarian, he wanted penetration. In his religious belief he inclined towards the opinions and doctrines of those (the Shi'ites) who assigned preeminence to 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib. The following relation was made by Ahmad Ibn 'Ubayd<sup>4</sup>: "Ibn Sikkit consulted me on the propriety of his becoming one of al-Mutawakkil's social companions, and I advised him to refuse. He attributed my counsel to envy and accepted the proposal made to him. One day, whilst he was with al-Mutawakkil, (that prince's two sons) al-Mu'tazz and al-Mu'wayyad came in, and al-Mutawakkil said to him: "Tell me, Ya'qub! which you like best, these two sons of mine or al-Hasan and al-Husayn (the sons of 'Ali)?" Ibn al-Sikkit answered by depreciating the merit of the two princes and giving to al-Hasan and al-Husayn the praise to which they were well entitled. On this, al-Mutawakkil ordered his Turkish guards to chastise him, and they (threw him down and) trod on his belly. He was then carried to his house, where he died two days afterwards. This happened in the year 244 (A.D. 857-9)." 'Abd Allah Ibn Abd al-'Aziz, a person who also had advised Ya'qub 'Ibn al-Sikkit) not to enter into the service of al-Mutawakkil, said on this occasion:

2 Abu Sa'id al-Hasan Ibn al-Husayn al-Sukkari studied at the schools of Kufa and Basra, acquired great philological, grammatical information and published highly esteemed editions of the ancient poets. He composed some treatises on philological subjects and an extensive work on the poems of Abu Nuwas. Born A.H. 212 (A.D. 827-8), died A.H. 275 (A.D. 888-9).—(Fihrest; Fluegel's Grammatische Schule der Araber, p. 89)

3 This maxim is probably inserted here because the neglect of it cost Ibn al-Sikkit his life.

4 Abu Ja'far Ahmad Ibn 'Ubayd, surnamed Abu Asida, was one of the learned men of Kufa and preceptor to Ja-Muntasir and al-Mu'tazz, the son of al-Mutawakkil. He composed some philological works and died A.H. 273 (A.D. 886-7), or 278, by another account.—Fihrest; Fluegel's Cram, Schule der Ar., p. 161.)

I advised you, Ya'qub! to avoid the proximity of a gazelle which, if it attacked a lion, would overcome him. Taste therefore and swallow that which you preferred to drink (ma stahsaitahu)! I shall not say, if you miss your footing: "God set you up again!" but shall say: "May (you fall dead and flat) on your hands and your mouth!"

It is related that al-Farra' asked Ibn al-Sikkit what was his native place and received this answer: "I am a Khuzian, God bless you! and come from Dawraq."--Dawraq is a village in Khuzistan and forms a district in the province of al-Ahwaz. --I may here observe that Ahwaz forms also a part of Khuzistan.--Al-Farra' then remained in his house during forty days, without letting himself be seen by any of his acquaintances, and, being asked why he did so, he replied: "May God be glorified! I should be ashamed to meet with Ibn al-Sikkit, for I asked him what was his country and, though he answered me truly, there was in his reply a shade of reprehension."<sup>5</sup>

Abu'l Hasan al-Tusi<sup>6</sup> related as follows: "We were at a sitting held by Abu'l Hasan 'Ali al-Lihyani,<sup>7</sup> who proposed dictating to the company such rare and curious philological anecdotes as he was acquainted with though very feeble he was in the art of dictating: One day, he said: The Arabs (of the desert) make use of this expression. "A heavily loaded ( مَثَل camel) helps itself up with its chin ( بِدَقَّتْ bi-dhiqini). "On this, Ibn al-Sikkit, who was then a mere youth, rose up (went over) to him and said: "Abu'l Hasan! the correct expression is: A heavily loaded (camel) helps itself up with its two flanks ( بِدَفَّيْ bi-deffayhi); and it means that, when a camel rises with its load, it gets up with the help of its two sides."

5 Al-Farra, on opening his course of lectures, asked each of his scholars what was his name and from what country he came. Ibn al-Sikkit answered frankly that he was from Khuzistan, a country the inhabitants of which, according to Yaqut, were notorious for their avarice, their stupidity and the vileness of their inclinations. It was said that a year's residence in that country sufficed to change the cleverest man into an idiot.--(Dictionnaire geog. de la Perse, translated from the Arabic of Yakut by Barbier de Meynard)

6 See p. 269 of this volume and Flueger's Gramm. Schure der Ar., p. 156.

7 Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn al-Mubarak al-Lihyani, was al Ksai's servant boy. Having had frequent opportunities of meeting with men of learning and Arabs of the desert who spoke their language with elegance, he picked up a great quantity of literary information, and composed some works. Abu 'Ubayd al-Qasim Ibn Sallam (vol. II, p. 486) received lessons from him. He died probably towards the commencement of the third century of the Hijja (A.D. 912).--(Fihrest, fol. 64.).

Abu'l Hasan ceased dictating that day. Having resumed his lessons at another sitting, he said: "The Arabs (of the desert) say: Such a one is my next-door neighbour mukashiri: on which Ibn al-Sikkit again stood up to him and said: God bless you, sir! what does mukishir mean? the right expression is: such a one is my mukishir: in as much as the kasr, or side of his tent touches the kasr of mine." Al-Lihyani ceased to dictate and never commenced again." "Never," said Abu'l 'Abbas al-Mubarrad, did I meet with a work composed by a Baghdadian which surpassed Ibn al-Sikkit's treatise on the language."

Ahmad Ibn Muhammad Ibn Abi Shaddad related as follows: "I complained to Ibn al-Sikkit of being in narrow circumstances, and he asked me if I had ever spoken (in verse)? I answered that I had not, on which he said: But I can do so: and he then recited to me these lines:

I desire things which I cannot possibly obtain as long as I remain in apprehension of what destiny may bring about. Travelling (as a merchant) in search of riches is not travelling (and fatigue); it is your remaining in a state of misery travelling (i.e. fatiguing)."

Ibn al-Sikkit related that a man wrote to a friend of his in these terms: "A case of necessity has occurred which obliges me (to have recourse) to you (qibalaka). If I succeed, I shall find therein my share (of good fortune) and the rest shall be your share. If you ask to be excused (I shall only say that every thing) good may always be expected of you and that I now offer beforehand my excuses. (Receive my salutation)."<sup>8</sup>

The following anecdote was copied from a note in his (Ibn al-Sikkit's) handwriting: Sulayman Ibn Rabi'ah al-Bahili<sup>9</sup> was reviewing his cavalry (man by man) and, when 'Amr Ibn Ma'di Karib al-Zubaydi<sup>10</sup> passed before him on horseback, he said to him: "Your horse is of a base breed." "Nay," replied 'Amr, "he is a blood-horse." On this, Sulayman ordered that the animal should be kept from water till it got thirsty, and had then a large basin brought out, filled with water. The blood-horses to which it was offered drank out of it, and so did

---

8 The epistolary style of the thoughts and the elegant concision of the style. The Europeans this elliptical style appears obscure and affected.

9 This was one of the khalif 'Umar's generals.

10 This celebrated chieftain was a contemporary of Muhammad and the first khalifs. For his adventures, see Caussin de Perceval's Essai sur l'histoire des Arabes.

the horse of 'Amr, but in bending the leg. "Do you see that?" said Sulayman. "I do," replied 'Amr, "one base-born animal has recognised another." 'Umar Ibn al-Khattab, to whom this was told, wrote to 'Amr in the following terms: I have been informed of what you said to your superior officer, and am told that you have a sword which you call Simsamah. Now, I also have a sword the name of which is Simsim and, by Allah! if I lay it across your head, I shall not withdraw it has reached your rahabah. If you wish to know whether I say truth or not, you have only to recommence. Receive my salutation." The term rahabah takes the same vowels as the word sahabah (cloud) the designates that bone of the breast which is shaped like tongue and is situated above the stomach.

Abu 'Uthman al-Mazini said: "I met Ibn al-Sikkit at the house of the vizir Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik al-Zayyad (vol. III, p. 249), and the latter said to me: Propose a question to Abu Yusuf (Ibn al-Sikkit). Being unwilling to do so, I hesitated and delayed, fearing to displease Ibn al-Sikkit, who was my intimate friend. The vizir insisted and asked why I did not obey; so, I endeavoured to choose an easy question and thus do him a friendly act. I therefore said to him: What is the grammatical form of the verb naktal in that passage of God's book where it is said: Send our brother with us, so that we may have (corn) measured to us. (Qur'an sur 12, verse 63). He replied: 'Its form is naʿal.' On this, I observed to him that, if it were so, the preterite (or root) of the verb would be katal—I do not mean that, said he, the form is naftail. On this, I asked him how many letters there were in naftail. (when in Arabic characters), and he answered: "five." And how many," said I, are there in naktal? He answered: "Four." How then said I, can a word of four letters have the same form as one of five" Being unable to answer, he coloured up and remained silent."<sup>11</sup> On this, Muhammad Ibn 'Abd al-Malik said to him: You receive, every month, a salary of two thousand dirhems (" 50), and yet you cannot indicate the form of naktal.' When we withdrew, Ya'qub (Ibn al-Sikkit) said to me: 'Abu 'Uthman! do you know what you have done?' I replied: 'By Allah! I endeavoured to find for you an easy question, and do you a service.' Abu'l Hasan Ibn Sidah (vol. II, p. 272) states, in his Muhkam, towards the beginning of his preface, that this scene passed in the presence of (the khalif) al-Mutawakkil. God knows best!

---

<sup>11</sup> Arabic scholars will easily understand the question: so, we shall merely state that Ibn al-Sikkit's second answer was right unfortunately, he had forgotten that verbs having a vowel for one of their radicals, lose it in the unconditional mood.

An author, but not Ibn 'Asakir, says that street of Madina tas-Salam (Baghdad) which is called Darb al-Qantarah (Bridge Street), and, wanting to gain something more, he applied to the study of grammar. It is related that the father, having made the pilgrimage and the circuits around the House (the Ka'bah), and the running (between Safa' and Marwah), prayed God to render his son learned in grammar. (Ibn al-Sikkit), having studied grammar and philology, used to visit regularly some persons who resided in (the street of) al-Qantarah, and he received from them, each time, the sum of ten dirhems (5 shillings) or somewhat more. He then went regularly (to teach) Bishr and Harun, who were employed as scribes by Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir al-Khuzai,<sup>12</sup> and he continued to go to them and their children. Ibn Tahir, being then in want of a person capable of bringing up and educating his children confided them to the care of Ibrahim Ibn Ishaq al-Mus'abi, and engaged Ya'qub at a (monthly) salary of five hundred dirhems, which sum he afterwards increased to one thousand.

Abu'l 'Abbas Tha'lab (vol. I, p. 83) said: "Ibn al-Sikkit was skilled in various branches of knowledge. His father, who was a virtuous man and had been one of Abu'l Hasan al-Kisai's (vol. II, p. 237) disciples, was well acquainted with pure Arabic. The motive which induced people to attend Ya'qub's sittings was this: I found that he had collected the poems of Abu al-Najm al-Tjili<sup>13</sup> and ameliorated the text; so, I asked him to lend me the volume in order that I might copy it. 'Abu'l 'Abbas! said he, 'I have sworn that my wife shall be divorced from me if that volume ever gets out of my sight; but there it is before you; so, you may (begin to) copy it (here) and return to me on Thursday next (to resume your task).' My going to see him induced a number of persons to do the same, and the news, having spread about, brought crowds to his lessons." Tha'lab said also: "Our masters were unanimous in declaring that, since the time of Ibn al-A'rabi (vol. III, p. 23), there had not appeared a more learned

---

12 Abu'l 'Abbas Muhammad, the son of the celebrated emir Abd Allah Ibn Tahir, left Khurasan in the year 237 (A.D. 851-2) and obtained from the khalif al-Muttawakki the government of Iraq. He fixed his residence at Baghdad and, in the year 248 A.D. 862-3) he was appointed commander of the shurta (the police guards), and received, in addition to the government of 'Iraq, that of the two holy Cities (Makkah and Madinah). He died A.H. 253 (A.D. 867). His talents, literary acquirements, bravery and generosity rendered his name illustrious.— (Nujum.)

13 The poet Fadl Ibn Qudamah al-Ijli, surnamed Abu al-Najm (the father of the star), was contemporary with the 'Umayyah khalif Hisham Ibn 'Abd al-Malik.— (De Hammer's Literaturgeschichte der Araber, vol. II, p. 362.)

philologist than Ibn al-Sikkī. "--Being obliged by al-Mutawakkil to become the preceptor of his son al-Mu'tazz Billah, he went to that prince's room and said, on taking his seat: "What does the emir wish that we should be in by?" To this al-Mu'tazz replied: "By departing." Then, said Ya'qub, I shall rise (and retire). "I shall be more active in rising than you," said al-Mu'tazz, and he stood up in such haste that his feet got entangled in his trousers, and he fell on the floor. Ya'qub, to whom he then turned, quite abashed and blushing with shame, recited to him these lines:

A man may be punished for a slip of the tongue, but is never chastised for the slipping of his feet. A slip of the tongue may cost him his head, but a slip of the foot is cured by repose.

Al-Mutawakkil, to whom Ya'qub went the next morning and related what had passed, ordered him a gift of fifty thousand dirhems but observed that he had already heard these two verses."

Ya'qub used to say: "I am a better grammarian than my father, but he surpasses me by his acquaintance with poetry and (pure) Arabic.*"

Al-Husayn Ibn 'Abd al-Mujib al-Mausili said: "I heard Ibn al-Sikkī recite the following verses at a sitting held by Abu Bakr Ibn Abi Shaybah:<sup>14</sup>

There are persons who love you ostensibly with a love not to be diminished; and yet, if you ask them for ten farthings, they would refer their dear friend to the bounty of the all-knowing God."

Ibn al-Sikkī composed some poetry capable of giving confidence to a dejected mind. Such, for instance, was the following:

When the heart is filled with despair and the widest bosom is too narrow to hold the grief which invades it, -- when afflictions have lodged therein and taken up their dwelling, -- when you find no means of escaping from misery and perceive that all the address of the most experienced is useless, -- assistance will come to you, whilst you are in despair, as a favour

---

14 The hafiz Abu Bakr 'Abd Allah, surnamed Ibn Abi Shaybah, was a mawla of the tribe of 'Abs and a native of Kufah. As a Traditionist, his authority is cited by al-Bukhari, Muslim, Abu Da'wud and others. He died in the month of Muharram, 235 (July-August, A.D. 849).--(Huffar.) from the bountiful Being, Who hears the prayers of the wretched. When misfortune has reached its height, deliverance is at hand.

* [al'lu]

It was said by the learned that the Islah al-mantiq was a book without a preface and the Adab al-Katib of Ibn Qutaybah (vol. II, p. 22) a preface without a book; the fact is that the preface of the latter work is very long, but it contains much useful information.

One of the learned scholars has said: "There never crossed the bridge (of boats) at Baghdad such a treatise on philology as the Mantiq." It is certainly an instructive and useful work, containing a great quantity of philological information, and there does not exist, as far as we know, a treatise of the same size and on the same subject. A number of persons have made it the special object of their studies: the vizir Abu'l Qasim al-Husayn Ibn 'Ali, surnamed Ibn al-Maghribi (vol. I, p. 450), made an abridgment of it, the khatib Abu Zakariya al-Tabrizi (No. 78 of this vol.) remodelled it, and Ibn al-Sirafi (vol. I, p. 377), composed, on the verses cited in it, an instructive work. The other productions of Ibn al-Sikkit are: The Kitab al-Zibrij (book of precious ornaments), the Kitab al-Maq ur wa'-Mamdud (on the short and the long final a), the Kitab al-Mudhakkar wa'l-Mu'wannath (on masculine and feminine nouns), the Kitab al-Ajnas (on the different species of animals, which is a large work, the Kitab al-Farq on the difference between the names given to the members of the human body and to those of animals), the Kitab al-Sarj wa'l-Lijam (on the saddle and bridle), the Kitab fa'al w' Af'al (on the difference of signification between verbs of the first and the fourth form), the Kitab al- Hasharat (on reptiles and insects), the Kitab al-Aswat (on the cries of men and animals), the *Kitab al-Addad** (on words which have two opposite significations), the Kitab al-Shajr wa'l-Nabat (on trees and plants), the Kitab al-Wuhush (on wild beasts), the Kitab al-lbl (on camels), the Kitab al-Nawadir (on expressions of rare occurrence), the Kitab Ma'ani'l-Shi'r al-Kabir (the greater work on the ideas occurring in poetry), the Kitab Saraqat al-Shu'ara wa m'attafaqa 'alayh (on the plagiarisms of poets and the thoughts in which they agreed unintentionally), etc. The reputation of this author is so great that we need not expatiate on his merits.

The manner of his death has been related otherwise than in the account which we have given: according to some, al-Mutawakkil often attacked the character of 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib and of that khalif's sons, al-Hasan and al-Husayn.— His detestation of them has been already noticed in some verses which we inserted in the life of Abu'l Husayn 'Ali' Ibn Muhammad surnamed Ibn Bassam (vol. II, p. 300).—Ibn al-

* [Kitab al addad in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 443—Ed.]

Sikkit (on the contrary), shewed for them the utmost veneration and attachment. In the conversation of which we have spoken, he said (it appears), to al-Mutawakkil: "Qanbar, 'Alī's slave, was better than you and your sons." On this, al-Mutawakkil ordered his tongue to be plucked out from the back of his neck, and the order was obeyed. This occurred on the eve of Tuesday, the 5th of Rajab, 244 (17th October, A.D. 858); or according to others, in 243 or 246. God best knows the true date! Ibn al-Sikkit had then attained his fifty-eighth year. When he died, ten thousand dirhems were sent to his son by al-Mutawakkil, as the price of the father's blood.

The grammarian Abu Ja'far Ahmad Ibn Muhammad, generally known by the appellation of Ibn al-Nahhas (vol. I, p. 81), states that al-Mutawakkil's conversation with Ibn al-Sikkit began in a jesting tone, which then turned to earnest. According to another account, al-Mutawakkil ordered him to revile and disparage a certain Qurayshite and, perceiving his unwillingness to do so, he caused the Qurayshite to revile Ibn al-Sikkit. The latter replied to this attack; on which al-Mutawakkil said to him: "I gave you an order and you refused to obey; and, on being insulted by this man, you did what I wanted." He then had a beating inflicted on Ibn al-Sikkit, who was immediately afterwards carried out of the room and dragged (home) prostrate (on the ground).—God knows which of these accounts is the true one. An anecdote similar to the one related above has been already given by us in the life of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Mubarak (vol. II, p. 12), who had been questioned respecting the relative merits of Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan and 'Umar Ibn 'Abd al-'Aziz.

The surname of al-Sikkit was given to the subject of this notice because he was very taciturn and would remain a long time without speaking. All words of the forms fa il and fi'lil take an i after the first letter.<sup>15</sup>—Khuzi means belonging to Khuzistan, which is a region lying between Basrah and Fars.

801 YA'QUB IBN AL-LAYTH AL-SAFFAR

Abu Yusuf Ya'lub Ibn al-Layth al-Saffar al-Khariji (the insurgent);

15 As examples of the first of these forms, we may give رديد (ri'did) ابريق (ibriq) اكليل (iklil) and جبريل (jibril). For the second form we have صكيت (sikkit) صديق (siddiq).

of this chief add of his brother 'Amr, historians make frequent mention: they speak of the countries which they conquered, of the numbers which they slew and of the conflicts which took place between them and the khalifs. It is from these accounts that I have extracted the information given in the following pages.

Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad, Ibn al-Azhar al-Akhhari<sup>1</sup> says: 'Ali Ibn Muhammad, a person well acquainted with the proceedings of (Ya'qub) ibn al-Layth al-Saffar and with the history of his wars, related to me as follows: Ya'qub and his brother 'Amr were saffars (coppersmiths) in their youth and, at that time they made a great show of piety. A native of Sijistan then attracted attention by undertaking, of his own accord, to wage war against the Kharijites.<sup>2</sup> This volunteer in God's service (mutawwi'i) came from the town of Bust and bore the name of Salih Ibn al-Nadr al-Kinani (of the Arabic tribe of Kinanah). The two brothers became his partisans and rose to fortune by his means. Ya'qub, having lost his brother, who was slain by that sect of Kharijites which was called the Shurat, was appointed by the above mentioned Salih to act as his lieutenant. On the death of Salih, another of the volunteers (mutawwi'i) named Dirham Ibn al-Husayn occupied his place, and Ya'qub remained with him as he had done with Salih. Dirham, having then fallen into a snare which had been laid for him by the governor of Khurasan, was sent by him to Baghdad and there imprisoned. When set at liberty, he entered into 1 I am inclined to believe that the historian whose names are here given by our author is the same who is designated in the Paris manuscript of the Fihrest, anc. fds. n. 874, fol. 200 v, by the surname of Ibn Abi'l-Azhar and by the names of Abu Bakr Muhammad Ibn Ahmad Ibn Mazyad al-Nahwi (the grammarian), al-Akhhari (the historian), al-Busghanji (native of Bushani, a village at about thirty miles from Herat). In A.H. 313 (A.D. 915-6), he was thirty years of age and lived, probably, much longer. He left a collection of anecdotes concerning the khalif al-Musta'in and his successor al-Muta'zz, an account of those among the ancients who spoke their language with elegance and a history of such men as were distinguished for their talents and the immorality of their lives. According to the author whose authority is followed by professor Fluegel, in his Grammatische Schulen der Araber, p. 97, he died A.H. 325 (A.D. 936-7), aged upwards of ninety years (?), and had been one of al-Mubarrad's favorite disciples.

---

2 Nearly all the provinces of the Muslim empire were, at that time, in the power of chiefs who, though acknowledging the supremacy of the khalifs, were in fact, independant sovereigns. Such were the Tahirides in Khurasan and the Tulunides in Egypt, whilst the 'Alides of Tabaristan, the Kharijites of Mosul and of the countries to the north of Persia rejected complete the authority of the khalifs. The south of Iraq was ravaged by the Zenj.

the sultan's service, but afterwards confined himself to his house and manifested great piety, devotion and the intention of making the pilgrimage. This continued till Ya'qub became powerful." Our professor 'Izz al-Din Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn Muhammad, surnamed Ibn al-Athir (vol. II, p. 288), says, in that section of his Annals [Al-Kamil fi al-Ta'rikh] which contains an account of Ya'qub's first proceedings and which is placed under the year 237 (A.D. 851-2): In this year, a native of Bust whose name was Salih Ibn al-Nadr made himself master of Sijistan. With him was Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth. Tahir Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir Ibn al-Husayn, the governor of Khurasan, marched against him and delivered the province from the invaders. Some time after, a man named Dirham Ibn al-Husayn, who was also one of the volunteers, made his appearance in the same country and subdued it, he was, however, unable to provide for his troops and so glaring was his incapacity that his partisans rallied around Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth, who held the command of the army, and placed him at their head, having already remarked the talent with which he administered, governed and maintained order. Dirham, being informed of this, offered no resistance and abdicated in favour of Ya'qub. The new chief subdued all the country and became very formidable; reinforcements came to him from every quarter, and his authority increased in the manner which we shall relate."

Let us resume and terminate the recital made by 'Ali Ibn Muhammad: "When Dirham Ibn al-Husayn arrived in Baghdad, Ya'qub took the command of the volunteers, and continued the war against the Shurat Kharijites. These sectaries he succeeded in vanquishing and destroying, and in laying waste, their villages. By his skill and address he obtained from his partisans such obedience as they had never shown to his predecessors. His power and might then became so great that he was able to effect the conquest of Sijistan, Herat, Bushanj and their dependencies. There was in the frontier territory of Sijistan a Turkish tribe called the Darari and governed by a king named Ratbil. Ya'qub, incited by the inhabitants of Sijistan, who stated that this people did even more harm than the Shurat Kharijites and better deserved to be punished, marched against them, slew their king and three princes, all of them bearing the title of Ratbil. He then returned to Sijistan with the heads of these princes and some thousands more. Having become formidable to all the kings of the countries around him, he obtained the humble submission of the sovereigns who reigned over Multan, al-Ruk<sup>h</sup>khaj, al-Tabasayn, Zabulistan, al-Sind, Makran and other places. His expedition against Herat and Bushanj took place in the year 253 (A.D. 867). At that time, the emir of Khurasan was Muhammad Ibn Tahir Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir Ibn al-Husayn al-Khuza'i. The officer who commanded for him in these cities, and whose name was Muhammad Ibn Aws al-Anbari, marched against the invader at the head of a numerous force, magnificently equipped and armed. In the battle which ensued, he fought bravely and kept his ground, till Ya'qub, by a skilful manoeuvre, intercepted his communications with Bushanj and thus obliged him to make a precipitate retreat. It is said that (Ya'qub), in all his battles, never met with a more obstinate resistance than that offered by Ibn Aws. He then occupied Bushanj and Herat. Having got into his power a number of 'Tahirians, persons so called because they were attached to the family of Tahir Ibn al-Husayn al-Khuza'i, he took them with him to Sijistan and kept them prisoners. The khalif al-Mut'azz Billah obtained their liberty by sending to him a letter, the bearer of which was Shims named Ibn Bal'am. I was informed, said Ibn al-Azhar Albert, by Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Marwan, than Ibn Balam related to him as follows: 'I set out with a letter for him from al-Mu'tazz Billah and, on arriving at Zaranj, the capital of Sijistan, I asked permission to see him. The authorisation being granted, I went in without saluting and sat down in his presence without his inviting me to do so. I then delivered the letter to him and, when he received it, I said to him: Kiss the letter of the Commander of the faithful.' That he did not do, but broke the seal and opened it. I then retired walking backwards, towards the door of the saloon in which he was, and said: 'Salutation to the emir and the mercy of 'God.'<sup>3</sup> He was so much pleased with this that he togged me well, made me a present and set the Tahirians at liberty. The same Ibn Bal'am related as follows: 'I went, one day, to visit Yusuf al-Saffar, and he said to me: 'There is a man coming to me from Fars, or that quarter, for the purpose of obtaining my protection, and he has with him three or four others; nay, there are five in all.' This declaration of his I did not believe and remained silent; yet, before I was aware, the chamberlain entered and said: 'Emir! there is a man at the door who comes to ask protection, and with him are four others.' The visitor being introduced by Ya'qub's order, informed him, after saluting, that he had with him four companions. These also were admitted. I turned to the chamberlain and asked him if this was a juggling trick of his? He replied with a solemn oath that the men had arrived quite suddenly and that no one had been aware of their coming. Some time after, I asked Ya'qub about it. 'Emir,' said 'I remarked something said by you which was really surprising, how did you know of this suppliant's coming with his companions?' He replied: 'I was thinking of Fars when I saw a raven alight on a spot fronting the road which leads to that country and I felt in one of my toes a twitching which passed successively to each of the others. Now, as toes are not noble members of the body, I knew that some people from that quarter would come to see me, either as suppliants or envoys of little consequence.

---

<sup>3</sup> This singular proceeding was perhaps conformable to the etiquette observed by all the khalif's ambassadors.

'Ali Ibn al-Hakam related as follows. I asked Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth al-Saffar how he came by the scar which disfigured him so much and which extended from the bridge of his nose across his cheek. He replied that he got the wound in one of his encounters with the Kharijites: a man whom he had wounded with his lance turned upon him and struck off (with a sabre) one half of his face. The piece was then replaced and sewed on 'During twenty days' said he, 'I remained with a tube in my mouth, which had to be maintained open lest the inflammation should extend to the head, and my food consisted of liquids which were poured down my throat.' His chamberlain added. 'Notwithstanding this wound the emir went out as usual to direct the movements of his troops and fought (like the others).'

Ya'qub sent to al-Mut'azz Billah a magnificent present and amongst other objects, a operative mosque made of silver and large enough to hold fifteen persons at a prayers. He asked that the province of Fars should be given to him, and engaged (to pay a yearly tribute of) fifteen millions of dirhems in case he succeeded in expelling from that province 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Quraysh, him who governed it.<sup>4</sup> Ya'qub, having sent this letter to al-Mu'tazz, left Sijistan with the intention of proceeding to Kirman, and halted at Bam.-- This place marks the point which separates Sijistan from Kirman.-- "Al-'Abbas Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Quraysh, the brother of the above-mentioned 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn, then departed from Kirman with 'Ahmad Ibn al-Layth al-Kurdi and took the road of Shiraz. Ya'qub placed a body of troops under the orders of his brother 'Ali Ibn al-Layth and sent him forward to al-Sirjan whilst he himself remained at Bam.--Al-Sirjan is a town in Kirman.

"Ahmad Ibn al-Layth al-Kurdi then turned from his way, with a numerous body of Kurds and other troops, and proceeded to Darabrd.-- This name is common to three localities, of a vast district in Fars, and the second a village of Fars, in the district of Istakhar, at which there is a mine of quicksilver. It must have been to one 4 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn Ibn Quraysh had been appointed governor of Fars by the khalif, but, though he acknowledged the authority of the court of Baghdad, he acted as an independant prince.

---

of these two places that they went, for the third is at Nishapur in Khurasan, to which province it is probable that they did not go, since it has no connection with Fars. -- The narrator continues thus "Ahmad Ibn al-Layth then met with a band of Ya'qub's troops who were on a foraging party killed some of them and put the rest to flight. The heads of the slain he sent to Fars, where they were stuck up by 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn. Ya'qub, on learning what had happened, entered into Kirman. 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn sent against him Tawq Ibn al-Mughallis* at the head of five thousand Kurds and the troops which Ahmad Ibn al-Layth al-Kurdi had brought with him. He marched to Unas<sup>5</sup>, a city in the province of Kirman and there halted. Tawq then received a letter from Ya'qub in which he was told that he had made a mistake in coming into a province which did not belong to him, and to this he replied: 'You are more skilled in the working of copper than in the work of war.' This gave great offence to Ya'qub. There was in Tawq's army three hundred of the Abna'.<sup>6</sup> When Ya'qub reached the city of Unas, [Iyas, in Cairo ed.] he gave battle to Tawq, killed part of his troops and put the rest to flight; but the Abna' stood their ground so bravely that Ya'qub had pity on them and offered to spare their lives. This proposal they rejected and continued fighting till they died. In this battle, Ya'qub slew two thousand men, took one thousand prisoners and, with them, Tawq Ibn al-Mughallis [Muflis?]. The latter he put into light chains and provided abundantly with food and other necessities, but obliged him to deliver up his treasures. Having then left Unas, he entered into the government of Fars, and 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn retrenched himself in Shiraz. This took place on Tuesday, the 17th of the latter Rabi' 255 (14 April, A.D. 869). Ibn al-Husayn then wrote to Ya'qub a letter in which he declared that he had not ordered Ibn al-Mughallis [Muflis?] to act as he had done and that hostilities had been commenced by that chief without authorization. 'If you intend to take Kirman,' said he, 'you have turned your back to it, if you wish to obtain possession of Fars, produce a letter from the Commander of the faithful ordering (me) to give it up: then I shall retire.' Ya'qub

---

* [Al-muflis in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 448. Ed.]

5 The editions and the manuscripts read Ayas اياس instead of Unas اناس but the orthography given by the geographical dictionary entitled the Marasia, seems, preferable.

6 The word abna signifies sons. It was generally employed to designate persons one of whose parents was an Arab and the other of a foreign race. At the time of Muhammad and afterwards, there was in Yaman a great number of abna whose mothers were Arabs.

answered that he had a letter from the sultan<sup>7</sup>, but would not deliver it till he had entered the town and that, if he ('Ali Ibn al-Husayn) would evacuate the place and give it up, he would do an act of piety and remove all cause of evil. If not, said he, the sword must decide between us, and our place of meeting shall be the marj of Sinkan.-- This is a large and moist tract of land at the distance of three parasangs from Shiraz. "The post-master and the chief men of the place then wrote to Ya'qub, saying: For you to whom God has given a spirit so devoted to his service and so zealous for the interests of religion, for you who have slain the Kharijites and expelled them from the princes of Khurasan and Sijistan, it is not befitting to be hasty in the shedding of (Muslim) blood. 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn will not give up the town unless he receives a written authorisation from the khalif.' The people of Shiraz then prepared to sustain a siege. When the troops of Tawq had been put to flight, three of Ya'qub's partisans fell into the hands of the fugitives and were imprisoned by 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn. As for Tawq, he had purchased, previously to marching against Ya'qub, a house in Shiraz for which he paid seventy thousand dirhems (£ 1.750) and had allotted another sum of money to be spent upon it. He now wrote these words to his son (who was in the town): 'Do not suspend the work of the masons; for the emir Ya'qub treats me with honour and kindness. Obtain the liberation of his three partisans; that is what he asks for. And he has promised, if it be done, to set me at liberty.' 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn (being informed of this), said: 'Write to Ya'qub and tell him that he may crucify Tawq Ibn al-Mughallis, for I prize the meanest of my slaves more than him.' Tawq, whom Ya'qub questioned respecting the means of which 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn could dispose, represented them as very inconsiderable and, to gain Ya'qub's favour, he offered him the money which he had in Shiraz and said that he would write to his family the order to send it. 'This,' said he, 'will help you to war against him.' Being told to do so by Ya'qub, he wrote to his sort, but the letter fell into hands of Ali Ibn al-Husayn, who immediately seized on the money and other things which were in Tawq's house, and had them carried to his own. Ya'qub then began his march and 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn levied troops."

Ahmad Ibn al-Hukam relates as follows: "Ya'qub said to me: 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn is he a Muslim or not? I answered that he was. On 7 It is remarkable that in this ancient relation and in the account given by the historian al-Tabari, the khalif is designated, not by the title of imam, but by that of sultan. This latter term generally serves to indicate sovereigns who possess, not the spiritual, but the civil authority.

---

this he said: 'How can you consider him to be a Muslim who brings it to the land of Musulmans troops of infidel Kurds, for the purpose of killing the true believers, carrying off their women and seizing on their wealth? Know you not that Ahmad Ibn al-Layth al-Kurdi put seven hundred men to death in Kirman, to avenge the murder of a single individual, that the Kurds violated two hundred virgins of the best families and carried out of the country upwards of two thousand women? Do you consider him to be a Muslim who permits such doings?' I replied that Ahmad has acted so without 'Ali's orders. In another conference, Ya'qub bid him take this message to 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn; 'I have brought with me a people of freemen, and cannot send them away unless I give them what they want. Let me have therefore wherewithal to satisfy them and send me also such a gift as is fitting for a person of my rank. If you do so, I shall be for you as a brother and lend you my assistance against those who may attack you; I shall deliver Kirman over to you, so that you may gorge upon it, and shall return to my own government.' Ya'qub, having departed, halted at a village called Khuzistan (sic) and, on Tuesday, the 8th of the first Jumada of that year (24th April, A. D. 869). Ahmad Ibn al-Hakam rejoined 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn, and delivered to him Yaqub's letter.

'Ali Ibn al-Husayn, said Ibn al-Hakam, was so greatly astounded at the news which brought him that he could understand nothing of it. The contents of the letter were, in a summary manner, what we here relate: "The writer began by good wishes for the person to whom it was addressed and then said: 'I have well understood the purport of your letter and your allusion to my arrival at this most important town without having received the Commander of the faithful's authorisation. Know that I am not one of those persons whose minds aspire to act unjustly I am not capable of such conduct; so I thus deliver you from the trouble of ruminating over that point. The town belongs to the Commander of the faithful, and we are his servants who act by his orders throughout his land and his dominions, and who are obedient towards God and towards him. I have heard the observations of your envoy, and leave to him the task of delivering to you my answer to the message which you charged him with, and of communicating to you a reply which I hope, will tend to your advantage and to mine. If you act as I advise, you will assure your own welfare, please God! and, if you refuse, (recollect) that the will of God is not to be resisted or avoided. As for us, we place ourselves under the protection of the Almighty, so that we may be saved from perdition; we have recourse to Him against the dictates of injustice and the strokes of disappointment. We hope that, in His bounty, he will assure our happiness in this world and in the next. May God grant you long life! Written on Monday, the 1st of the first Jumada, 255 (17th April, A.D. 869).

The two armies then marched against each other; that of 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn consisting of fifteen thousand men. On Wednesday morning, the 4th of the same month, he sent forward Ahmad Ibn al-Layth with the vanguard. On Thursday, Ya'qub's vanguard came up and two armies met. The first charge had no result, but, in the second, 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn's partisans were driven from their positions and, after an obstinate conflict, they were thrown into disorder and every man of them fled without once looking back. 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn followed his troops, crying after them: Stop, in the name of God! come back!' but they did not mind him, and he remained with only a few of his companions. The fugitives reached the gates of Shiraz on the evening of the same day. It was shortly after the hour of noon that the battle took place. The gates being too narrow to admit the crowd, numbers of them ran thought the outskirts of the town, nor did they stop till they reached al-Ahwaz. In that battle they lost about five thousand men. 'Ali received three wounds from some of Ya'qub's cavalry, who hacked at him with their sabres, brought him out of the saddle to the ground, and were just going to kill him outright when he exclaimed; 'I am 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn.' On this, they took off his turban-cloth' tied it about his waist and led him to Ya'qub. The soldier who took him prisoner asked for a reward and was offered ten thousand dirhems ( £ 250), but rejected that sum, and Ya'qub said to him, 'You brought me a dog which you took, and I have nothing more for you than what I offer.' The man went away. Ya'qub then gave the prisoner, with his own hand) ten strokes of a whip over the head, seized his chamberlain by the beard and plucked nearly all of it off; having then ordered that 'Ali should be fettered with irons of twenty pounds' weight; he had Tawq Ibn al-Mughallis fettered also and confined them both in the same tent. Immediately after, he marched towards Shiraz, and the partisans of 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn fled in all directions. He made his entry into that city with drums beating before him, and the inhabitants, thinking that he would do them, by shedding their blood and plundering their wealth, because they had warred against him, and not dare to utter a word. He had in fact, promised to his troops that they should have permission to sack the city in case he was victorious. The people, being aware of that, shut themselves up in their houses. He returned to his camp, the same night, after having perambulated the city and, the next morning, he caused an amnesty to be proclaimed, and the inhabitants, being informed that they might go out into the market places, took advantage of the permission. He then announced by proclamation that whoever sheltered any of 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn's secretaries would be outlawed by the fact. When Friday came (he went to the mosque and) offered up the prayer for [i.e. in the name of the imam (khalif)] al-Mu'tazz Billah, but without naming himself, and, as this was remarked to him, he replied: 'The emir (or governor) has, not yet arrived'.<sup>8</sup> He said to them also: 'I shall stay with you only ten days and then return to Sijistan.' His brother whom he sent to the house of 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn, took out of it the carpets and other furniture, but was unable to discover where the money was hid. On this, he (Ya'qub) had 'Ali brought before him and induced him, by threats and promises, to declare that he would point out the place where he had concealed his treasures. 'Ali, being then taken to his house, drew forth four hundred badras<sup>9</sup>, or one thousand, according to another account. This sum Ya'qub distributed to his troops, instead of the pillage which he had promised them, and each man obtained for his share three hundred dirhems ( £ 7, 10s).

He then inflicted on 'Ali tortures of various kinds, caused his testicles to be compressed and bound the two glands (?) to his cheeks. The prisoner said to him: 'You have already taken from me furniture and other objects, to the value of forty thousand dinars ( £ 20,000);' but Ya'qub persisted in torturing him and had him bound in fetters of forty pounds's weight. 'Ali then pointed out to them a place in his house where they found four millions of dirhems ( £ 100,000) and a great quantity of jewels. He was again tortured and informed that he (Ya'qub) would not be satisfied (an additional sum of) thirty thousand dinars ( £ 15,000). 'Ali, though now deranged in mind by the violence of his sufferings, was delivered over to al-Hasan Ibn Dirham, who beat, tortured and reviled him; Tawq Ibn al-Mughallis, was tortured also by Ibn Diham and shut up with 'Ali in the same chamber.

On Saturday, the 28th of the first Jumada of the same year (14th May, A.D. 869), Ya'qub departed from Shiraz for his own country, and took with him 'Ali Ibn al-Husayn and Tawq Ibn al-Mughallis. On reaching Kirman, he had them dressed in party-coloured clothes, 8 Yaqub wished to propitiate the khalif by refusing to take the title of emir, till authorized to do so by the court of Baghdad.

9 The badrah or purse contained one thousand dirhems ( £ 25), according to some, ten thousand, according to others.

(9 bis, p. 311) The word ghilman, here rendered by dependants, means boys, servants, pages. Those whom Ya'qub had in Baghdad were perhaps slaves or mawlas who traded there on his account.

with women's bonnets on their heads, and paraded them about whilst a public cryer walked before, announcing who they were. After that, he cast them into prison and went on to Sijistan. On the third of Rajab, the same year (17th June, A.D. 869), the khalif al-Mu'tazz-Billah was deposed, and, on the same day, the imam al-Muhtadi Billah was raised to the Khalifate. This prince also was deposed, on the afternoon of Tuesday the 16th of Rajab, 256 (19th June, A. D. 870), and al-Mu'tamid'ala Allah was solemnly acknowledged as khalif. During the Khalifate of al-Muhtadi, Ya'qub al-Saffar did nothing of importance: he merely continued making predatory incursions, warring against the neighbouring [muluk] princes who reigned in Sijistan and its dependencies, and making irruptions into the districts of Khurasan, those of Kuhistan which were in that vicinity and those dependencies of Herat and Bushanj which were contiguous to Sijistan. He then returned to Fars and, having gathered in its crops, he returned to Sijistan with about thirty millions of dirhems ( £ 750,000). Muhammad Ibn Wasil was left by him in Fars to direct the military operations in that country, collect the taxes, correspond with the Khalif and transmit to him part of the money which he gathered in. The Kharaj (or landtax) of Fars, which he was to send to his master every year was fixed at five millions of dirhems ( £ 125,000. That country he (Ya'qub) held by right of conquest, and the Khalif would not have confirmed him in its possession had he found amongst his dependants anyone capable of taking his place.

In the month of the latter Jumada, 258 (April-May. A.D. 872), news was received (at Baghdad) of Ya'qub's entry into Balkh. From that city he proceeded to Nishapur, where he arrived in the month of Dhu'l-Qa'dah, 259 (Aug-Sept, A.D. 873), and made prisoners Muhammad Ibn Tahir al-Khuza'i, the emir of Khurasan and a number of Tahirides. In the month of Muharram 260 (Oct.-Nov. A.D. 873), he left that country, taking with him as prisoners Muhammad Ibn Tahir and upwards of sixty persons attached to that family. He then marched towards Jurjan, with the intention of encountering the 'Alide prince, al-Hasan Ibn Zayd, who was the emir of that country and of Tabaristan. Al-Hasan, being informed that Ya'qub was coming to attack him raised thirteen millions of dirhems ( £ 325,000) out of the land-tax (Kharaj), by calling in the arrears and exacting advances on the imposts of the following year. After which, he retired from Jurjan to Tabaristan. Ya'qub entered into Jurjan and dispatched some of his partisans against Sariya*, (the capital) of Tabaristan, which place they took. In Jurjan the daily rations of his cavalry amounted to one thousand bushels (qafiz) of barley. He then set out for Tabaristan, and al-Hasan Ibn Zayd marched against him with a large body of troops. Ya'qub, having declared to his partisans that he would put to death whoever fled from the enemy, set out to light accompanied with five hundred of his slaves, and, having encountered the troops of al-Hasan, he charged them with such vigour that he put them to rout. Al-Hasan Ibn Zayd, who a heavy, corpulent man had already provided for his safety by causing horses and mules to be kept in readiness at each village on the road by which he intended to retreat. Ya'qub, having rallied his partisans, set out at the head of five hundred horse (jaridah) in pursuit of al-Hasan who, however, effected his escape. The treasures which the latter had with him and which consisted of three hundred (horse-) loads of wealth, most of it coined money, fell into the hands of Ya'qub and, besides that, a number of persons descended from 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib. These he treated with great cruelty and cast into prison. This encounter took place on Monday, the 26th of Rajab, 260 (17th May, A.D. 874). After this Victory, Ya'qub pushed forward and entered Amul," -- the capital of Tabaristan.

---

* [Shawiyah in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 45.-Ed.]

"Al-Hasan Ibn Zayd fled to a city called Salus, but not obtaining from the inhabitants as favourable a reception as he had been led to expect, he departed and left them. Ya'qub set out from Amul in pursuit of al-Hasan and had already made one day's march when he received intelligence of the occupation of Marw al-Rud by al-Tahir Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir, aided by the lord of Khuwarizm at the head of two thousand Turks. This obliged him to give up his project and cease advancing into the heart of the country. He, in consequence, abandoned the pursuit of al-Hasan Ibn Zayd and retraced his steps. In the month of Dhu'l-Hijjah 260 (Sept-Oct, A.D. 874) had wrote to the emir of Rayy the order to leave that place, stating that he himself had been appointed governor of it by the Khalif. When the khalif was informed of this, he declared Ya'qub's assertion to be false and chastised such of the dependants of that chief as were in Baghdad, by casting them into prison and seizing on their money. In the month of Muharram, 261 (Oct-Nov, A.D. 874), Ya'qub, who was in Tabaristan, set out for Jurjan and had an encounter with al-Hasan Ibn Zayd, whom he met near the (Caspian) sea and who had with him a body of troops from Daylam, al-Jibal and Tabaristan. Al-Hasan dispersed Ya'qub's partisans, killed all those whom he was able to overtake and obliged their chief to take refuge in Jurjan. A terrible earthquake then occurred by which two thousand of Ya'qub's men lost their lives. Al-Hasan Ibn Zayd retook Tabaristan, that is Amul Sariya and their dependencies. Ya'qub remained in Jurjan where he oppressed the people by levying heavy taxes (kharaḡ) and seizing on their wealth. The earthquake lasted three (days), and a number of the inhabitants of Jurjan retired to Baghdad. These refugees being asked what Ya'qub al-Saffar was doing, spoke so loudly of his tyranny and oppression that the khalif resolved on marching against him, and made preparations accordingly. Al-Saffar (Ya'qub) had returned to the neighbourhood of Rayy, and the pilgrims were come back from the fair (of Makkah)* when the khalif al-Mu'tamid 'ala' Allah wrote to 'Ubayd Allah, the son of 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir Ibn al-Husayn, who was then governor of Iraq, ordering him to assemble the pilgrims of Khurasan, Tabaristan, Jurjan and Rayy, and to read to them a letter which he sent to him. 'Ubayd Allah assembled those pilgrims who had come from the farthest parts of the empire, and read to them a letter by which the Commander of the faithful ordered the people to war against al-Saffar. Thirty copies of this document were drawn up, one of which was given to the people of each province, so that the news might be spread throughout all the country اقبال.** When Ya'qub al-Saffar was informed of the imprisonment of his servants and learned that 'Ubayd Allah had assembled the pilgrims at his palace and delivered to them copies of this letter, he perceived evidently that the khalif intended to march against him and judging that his troops were not sufficiently numerous to resist those of his adversary, he returned to Nishapur. On his arrival in that city, he extorted money from the inhabitants and, in the month of the first Jumada, 261 (Feb.-March, A.D. 875), he set out for Sijistan. When he arrived there, letters came from the khalif by which all the princes of Khurasan and all the men possessed of means and influence were declared, each of them, governor of the place in which he resided. When these letters arrived, al-Saffar's partisans were scattered (in detachments) throughout the province of Khurasan. Al-Saffar then went to 'Askar Mukram, in Khuzistan and (having collected he) wrote to the khalif a letter in which he demanded the governments of Khurasan. Fars and all the provinces which had been possessed by the family of Tahir Ibn al-Husayn al-Khuza'i. He asked also for the commandment of the shurtah of Baghdad and that of Saira-man-ra'a, and required his nomination to the governments of Tabaristan, Jurjan, Rayy, Kirman, Adhrbayjan, Qazwin, Sijistan and Sind. He demanded also that those to whom had been read the letter copies of which had been made at the palace of 'Ubayd Allah Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir should be assembled and another letter read them, annulling the former. All this was done by al-Muwaffaq Billah Abu Ahmad Talhah, the son of al-Mutawakkil 'ala' Allah and the brother of the khalif al-Mutamid 'ala' Allah. This al-Muwaffaq was also the father of al-Mu'tamid Billah, the khalif who succeeded to al-Mu'tamid. The entire direction of public affairs was in the hands of al-Muwaffaq, who left nothing of the khalifian authority to his brother except the mere title. He (al-Muwaffaq) granted to him (Ya'qub) what he demanded, and, having assembled the people, he read to them a dispatch by which he complied with al-Saffar's request and nominated him to the offices for which he asked. This answer, rendered in the khalif's name, to what was exacted by al-Saffar, caused great perturbation among the Mawlaz<sup>10</sup> (in garrison) at Sarra man-ra'a and threw them into a ferment.

* [Al-mawsim i.e. hajj or annual pilgrimage to Makkah --Ed.]

** [See Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 455.--Ed.]

Al-Saffar cared so little for what was granted to him that he entered into Sus, a city forming one of the districts of, Khuzistan and situated near 'Askar Mukram. On arriving there, he took the resolution of attacking the khalif al-Mu'tamid who on his side, made preparations for embarking (with his troops) on the Tigris and going down to give him battle. When the two armies advanced against each other, the Mawlas, struck by the conduct of al-Muwaffaq, thought that al-Saffar's approach was the result of the letters which he had sent him. 'If it be not so', said they, 'it is most extraordinary that a rebel should set out from Zaranj,' -- the capital [Kursiyy] of Sijistan, which country separates Sind from that of the Turks and Khurasan, -- 'should come into 'Iraq with an army well-equipped, for the purpose of waging war against the khalif whose empire, of old extended from the eastern to the western extremities of the earth, Al-Saffar alone advances with his army, having no other chief to support him or to share with him in this enterprise'. The khalif, being informed of what passed, called for the mantle which had belonged to the Prophet*, his (caliph's) rod and then took his bow with the intention of being the first who shot an arrow (against the enemy), and pronounced a malediction on al-Saffar. By this he quieted the minds of the Mawlas.

---

10 The mawlas were the Turkish slaves or mamluks who formed the khalif's guard.

* For the history of this mantle which the Prophet had gifted to the poet Ka'b Ibn Zuhayr when at the time of his conversion to Islam in 9 A.H. he had recited a qasidah in his (Prophet's) praise, see Ibn Hisham, Sirat al-Nabawiyyah (Cairo, 1955), vol. II, p. 501 et seq; Ibn al-Athir, al-Kamil (under year, 9 H. also see within Muir, life of Mohammad (ed. T. H. Weir, Edinburgh, 1912), pp. 436-37.

On Sunday morning, the 9th of Rajab A.H. 262 (8th April, A.D. 876), al-Saffar's troops arrived, in order of battle at a village called Istarband and situated between al-Sib and Dayr al-Aqul, in the province of central Nahrwan. He then assembled his companions, with the intention of leading them to the charge as he used to do, and proceeded forward, wearing a tunic of black brocade. When the two armies were in presence, the qa'id Khishtij, who was one of the Mawlas, advanced between the two armies, and harangued al-Saffar's troops in these terms: 'Men of Sijistan! you were hitherto known to us for your obedience towards the sultan, for your assiduity in reading the Qu'an, for your zeal in performing the pilgrimage and in studying the Traditions, but know that your faith will not be perfect till you follow (the orders of) the imam (khalif). That reprobate has, no doubt, deceived you by false statements and told you that the sultan invited him hither by letter. Now, here is the sultan himself who has come forth against him. So, let those among you who hold to the right and are firmly attached to their religion and the laws of Islam, abandon the man who has misled them, for he is a rebel and wages war against the sultan,' This speech produced no effect."

Khishtij was remarkable for his courage and intrepidity. We have already mentioned that al-Saffar had taken prisoner Muhammad Ibn Tahir Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Husayn, the governor of Khurasan, and carried him into bondage. When he recovered his liberty, Khishtij addressed him in these terms: "Son of Tahir you purchased me with your money and gave me as a present to the 'abbaside family. They chose me for their lieutenant, put me in possession of landed estates and wealth, I even obtained the command of their armies and fought for the integrity of the Muslim empire. And now, before my departure from the world, I, aided by our lord, the Commander of the faithful, have attached al-Saffar for your sake, emir of Khurasan! have delivered you from captivity and heavy chains, have conducted you from city to city, mounted on a well-harnessed mule, and have taken you back from Iraq to Khurasan. Praise be to God, for the favour which he granted us in delivering you and for His signal bounty in letting us possess you again."

We may now resume and finish our account of al-Saffar. The narrator says: "When al-Saffar's army was reviewed, its camp was found to cover the space of one square mile: the cavalry was in excellent condition and amounted, it is said, to more than ten thousand men. The khalif distributed to his soldiers the (customary) donative (or pay), caused the trees and brushwood which were on his line of march to be cut down and prepared for action. The troops displayed great ardour in getting ready and were told that they must fight for victory, because their defeat would be the ruin of the empire. The khalif al-Mu'tamid took his station, having at his horse's side Muhammad Ibn Khalid." — the grandson of the Yazid Ibn Mazyad Ibn Za'idah al Shaybani, of whose life we have given an account in this volume -- A number of other warriors, noted for bravery and intrepidity, stood beside the khalif. The archers advanced before him, shooting off their arrows, and his brother al-Muwaffaw, having uncovered his head, cried out: 'I am the boy of the Hashmides', and charged upon the partisans of al-Saffar. Numbers were slain on both sides. Al-Saffar, seeing how matters were turning, retreated from the field, leaving there his treasures, wealth and riches, and fled straight before him, without being accompanied by any of his followers. Not a man of his army but received an arrow wound, and such was the disorder and press that when the night overtook them they fell into the canals and were covered with wounds. Abu al-Saj Divdad<sup>11</sup> Ibn Dust, the same whose name was borne by the al-ajnad al-Sajiyah* at Baghdad, said to al-Saffar subsequently to his flight: 'You did not show the least skill in war: how could you expect to vanquish an adversary after placing in your front the baggage, the treasure and the prisoners and invading a country with which you were ill-acquainted? You had not even a guide to show you the way through the marshes and canals. You fought on a Sunday, and had the wind in your face; you took forty days to march from al-Sus to Wasit with an army badly provided for, and, when they received provisions and money and were brought into good order, you marched them from Wasit to Dayr al-Aqul in two days and then retreated at the moment you had an opportunity of obtaining the victory. You fled when you should have kept your ground.' To this al-Saffar replied: 'I did not think that I should have been obliged to fight; had no doubt of obtaining what I wanted, and imagined that envoys would come to me in order to avert the danger (which threatened the khalif) and that I then might have obtained whatever I pleased!' --End of the extract from Ibn al-Azhar's recital.

What follows I have taken from the work composed by Abu'l Husayn 'Ubayd Allah as a continuation of his father Ahmad Ibn

---

11 The editions and manuscripts read Abu'l -Saj Dawud, but it is well ascertained that the name of this chief was Divdad (God's gift). We have spoken of him in the first volume, p. 500. A history of the Sajites has been published by Mr. Defremery in the Journal asiatique for 1847. The Sajite junds were probably regiments of cavalry which Abu'l Saj had formed and kept up at his own expense. Kamal al-Din Ibn al-Adim, takes notice occasionally of this chief in his history of Aleppo. See Freytag's Selecta ex historia Halebi.

* [ al-ajnad al-Sajiyah in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 457- Ed.]

Tahir's (vol. 1, p. 291) history of Baghdad. As the accounts given by that writer are very prolix, اطال القول فيه we abridge them and suppress the repetitions: "Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth, says he, having attacked Dirham Ibn an Nadr," -- so the last name is written (instead of al-Husayn), --took Sijistan from him on Saturday, the 5th of Muharram, 347 (21st March, A.D. 861). Dirham had governed three years, after having expelled from that country, in the month of Dhu'l Hijjah, 237 (May-June, A.D. 852),<sup>12</sup> Salih Ibn al-Nadr, an Arab of the tribe of Kinanah. Ya'qub remained in Sijistan, where he continued to wage war against the Shurat and the Turks, in the ostensible character of a volunteer in God's holy cause. He set out for Herat in the year 253 (A.D. 867) and then proceeded to Bushanj, which place he besieged and took by assault. This happened in the khalifat of al-Mu'tazz. When al-Mu'tazz died, no change had taken place in Ya'qub's conduct, and things continued so till the reign of al-Mu'tamid 'ala Allah. He then entered into Balkh, whence he marched to Ramhurmuz, making, all the time, an outward show of obedience to the khalif al-Mu'tamid. This was in the month of Muharram, 262 (Oct.-Nov. A.D. 875). He then dispatched envoys to Baghdad, where they made their entry on the 14th of the latter Jumada of the same year (15th March, A.D. 876). After that, he went to Wasit where he installed a lieutenant. (On Saturday, the 8th of Rajab (7th April, A.D. 876), he proceeded to Dayr al-'Aql and from that to Istarband where he made a halt. Al-Mu'tamid, being informed of what was going on and learning that Ya'qub was directing his march towards Baghdad, assembled troops from all quarters for the purpose of combating the invader, and, having left Sarra-mand-ra'a, he entered Baghdad on Sunday, the 24th of Dhu'l Hijjah, of that year (18th September, A.D. 876).

"Abu'l Faraj, who was secretary to the qadi Abu 'Umar, related as follows: When the khalif set out to attach al-Saffar, he continued, during his march, to dispatch letters by which that chief was ordered to retire, warned of the danger to which his conduct exposed him and informed that the Commander of the faithful was in march with troops, arms and ammunition, for the purpose of encountering him. The answers returned by him, were all of this cast: I know that the Commander of the faithful has set out, but it is with the intention of doing me honour and indicating the high esteem in which he holds me.' The khalif then drew up his troops in order of battle at the village above-mentioned, and caused the road by which al-Saffar had passed to be laid under water. This was the main cause of his (al-Saffar's) defeat, for he was not aware that his retreat had been cut off. The two armies then drew up for action and attacked each other in repeated charges till (that of) al-Saffar was put to flight. An immense quantity of baggage fell into the hands of the victors who, thinking that it had been left there as a snare to entrap them, did not pursue al-Saffar, as they should have done. A person who had been present at this battle informed me that the number of arrows shot off in it by the regiment of Mawlas amounted to twenty thousand. The khalif returned full of joy at the victory which God had granted him. Amongst the persons who, on that day, were delivered from the captivity in which al-Saffar held them was Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Tahir, the emir of Khurasan. The khalif before whom he appeared with his chains still on, caused them to be struck off and clothed him in an imperial robe. Al-Mu'tamid related that, on the night before, he had a dream in which he saw a man come and inscribe on his bosom these words (of the Qur'an): we have granted to you a signal victory. He related this to his intimates and said: 'I reckon with confidence on the Almighty. Previously to the battle, letters were received from al-Saffar in which he gave the assurance of his profound submission and declared that he was merely coming to offer his humble respects to the Commander of the faithful, in whose presence he wished to have the honour of appearing and whose aspect he longed to contemplate. To this he added that he was ready to die at the side of the imperial stirrup. Al-Mu'tamid said, on receiving this communication: 'We are still in the midst of his stratagems; let him know that I have nothing for him but the sword.' He gave orders also that a letter should be sent to Abu Ahmad 'Ubayd Allah, the son of 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir and the uncle of Muhammad Ibn Tahir Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir, informing him of the deliverance of his nephew. Abu Ahmad was then holding the commandment of the shurta of Baghdad in the capacity of lieutenant for his nephew; the latter being not only governor of Khurasan but commander of the Baghdad shurtah and that of Sarra-man-ra'a.

12 There is here same error in the dates.

As the paragraphs of this letter are very long we shall give here a simple summary of its contents: The writer enumerates the crimes of al-Saffar the favours and marks of kindness which he had received from the khalif, who had invested him with the government of Khurasan and the countries of which mention has been already made, who had raised him to a lofty station, who had ordered that, in the dispatches addressed to him, he should be designated by a title of honour, who had conceded to him a number of fine landed estates and who had done every thing possible in order to gain his goodwill. This, however, only served to increase his perversity and disobedience: when things were refused to him which he demanded, he would march against the seat of the empire, for the purpose of existing troubles and domineering (over the government). The Commander of the faithful, not thinking proper to comply with his demands, sent him letter, enjoining him to retire into the magnificent provinces of which he had been appointed governor, and advising him not to attempt acts which would bring to an end all the blessings conferred on him by Almighty God. He was informed that if he persisted in the resolution of approaching the imperial residence, he would be guilty of an act of disobedience, of rebellion and of revolt.

Another time, the Commander of the faithful sent a band of qadis, legists, and military chiefs to remonstrate with him on the same subject, thinking that this deputation would induce him to return to his duty. But he (al-Saffar) still persisted in following the same path, that of iniquity, contumacy and disobedience; he would not be turned from it by good advice, but allowed to be circumvented by Satan, who was leading him towards his ruin and making him swerve from the path of salvation towards the precipice of perdition. When the Commander of the faithful perceived that such was really the case, he thought fit to act towards him in the same (hostile) manner, and marched against him, putting his trust in God and convinced that, with the divine aid, he would turn from the execution of (pernicious) projects a reprobate who was advancing, by forced marches, towards the battle-field wherein he was destined to be vanquished. The rebel was already half-way between Baghdad and Wasit, bearing standards on some of which were crosses: he had called the ploytheists to his assistance against the true believers, and openly displayed the secret enmity which he bore in his heart towards God, so that the Lord might deliver him over by the bridle (to the hands of perdition). He abandoned the laws of Islam and its maxims, broke every covenant, violated every engagement and let all men see that he was in open revolt. This obliged the Commander of the faithful to send forth his brother Abu Ahmad al-Muwaffaq Billah, the acknowledged successor to the khalifate, and with him a body of those imperial Mawlas whose fidelity to God had tested and whose views were fixed on the necessity of defending the empire. He accompanied them with his best wishes, praying God to assist them and render them victorious over the enemy. In all the times and all the conjectures wherein God knew the sincerity of his heart, he pronounced maledictions against the rebel and abandoned him to the fatal consequences of his conduct. The Commander of the faithful continued to superintend the proceedings of his brother, of his Mawlas and of his partisans, and to send them reinforcements and supplies.

Al-Muwaffaq Billah took his station in the centre of the army, whilst the accursed, the enemy of God, surrounded by those who partook his errors, had arrayed himself in the vest of disobedience and the trousers of iniquity, confiding in the number of his troops and the multitude of his followers. When the two armies were in presence, the enemy of the Faith and his partisans brandished their arms and hastened to attack the Mawlas and the supporters of the Commander of the faithful; but, against that accursed and misguided man were directed the trenchant blades of the good cause, its piercing lances and its penetrating arrows. The wretch was covered with wounds, and his followers, seeing what had happened to him, hastened to cry out "All is lost!" (lit. woe and ruin! The Commander of the faithful's Mawlas and partisans followed in their pursuit, killing some and taking others prisoners, and God hurried to the fire (of hell) an immense number of the rebels. This continued till Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Tahir, the servant of the Commander of the faithful was delivered unharmed from the hands of the enemy, who had been driven from all his positions. The survivors took to flight in great disorder, without once looking behind them. God allowed them and the accursed to escape, but all their gains and plunder, gathered up in former days when God permitted them to hold the regions of the earth (were taken from them); treasures, goods, effects, camels, beasts of burden, mules and asses became the prey of the Mawlas and the other partisans of the khalif. Those objects the (victors) removed to the place where they had deposited their baggage". -- As this letter is very diffuse, we have been obliged to abridge it. At the end of it were these words: "Written by 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Yahya, on Wednesday, the 12th of Rajab, 262 (11th April, A.D. 876)."

The historian then adds: "Al-Saffar fled to Wasit and his troops pillaged all the villages on the line of their retreat. The victorious army seized on the arms and baggage of the vanquished, but the Mawlas did not continue the pursuit, fearing that al-Saffar might turn and attack them; they were, besides, too much occupied in collecting the booty and the spoil. The khalif returned to his camp, and al-Saffar went back to al-Sus, where he levied contributions. From that he proceeded to Tustur, which place he besieged and took. Having installed there one of his lieutenants, he assembled again a multitude of troops and set out for Fars; in the month of Shawwal (July). The khalif returned to al-Mada'in where he stopped two days, and then departed for Baghdad, whence he proceeded to Sarra-man-ra'a. He arrived there on Friday, the 13th of Sha'ban (12th May, 876)."

The historian then mentions that, on Tuesday, the 14th of Shawwal (11th of July), the khalif received the news of Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth's death. The quantity of money found in his treasuries amounted to four millions of dinars (£ 2,000,000), in gold pieces, and fifty millions of dirhems (£ 1,250) in silver.

On Thursday, the 22nd of Shawwal, Ahmad Ibn al-Asbagh arrived there. He had been sent by the khalif for the purpose of arranging matters with Ya'qub and was just reaching Wasit, on his return, when he learned the news of that chief's death. Ya'qub had been acknowledged by the khalif as governor of Khurasan, Fars, Kirman, Rayy, Qumm and Isbahan; he was commander of the two shurtahs, that of Baghdad and that of Sarra-man-ra'a, and was authorised to place these troops under the orders of whom he pleased. In return, he engaged to pay in two-thirds of the taxes furnished by all the provinces which he governed. His brother 'Amr Ibn al-Layth succeeded to his authority by the unanimous consent of the army, and then wrote to the khalif's brother, al-Muwaffaq, a letter in which he declared himself the humble and obedient servant of the khalifate, provided that he was confirmed in the possession of the offices held by his brother. To this a favourable answer was returned and his nomination took place in the month of Dhu'l Qa'dah of that year (July-August, A.D. 876).

To judge from the context of this history, Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth al-Saffar died in the latter part of the year 262, for the author says, in relating the events of that year: "Shortly after Ya'qub's defeat in the month of Shawwal, news was received of his death." This appears to denote that he died in that year, but what I have learned from a number of historical works does not agree with that indication: Abu'l Husayn al-Salami says, in his account of the governors of Khurasan, towards the beginning of the chapter which he devoted to 'Amr Ibn al-Layth: "The cause of Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth's death was this: he had an attack of colic and was advised to follow a treatment but he refused and preferred dying. His death took place at Jundi Shapur, in Khuzistan, on Tuesday, the 14th of Shawwal, 265 (9th June, A.D. 879).

Abu'l Wafa al-Farisi relates that he read on the flag of marble which is placed over the tomb of Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth:

"I ruled over Khurasan and the regions of Fars; neither did I despair of ruling over 'Iraq. But now, farewell to the world and to the sweetness of its zephyrs! Ya'qub no longer sits therein."

In some rough notes written by myself I found the following passage: "Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth al-Saffar died in the year 265 (A.D. 878-9) at al-Ahwaz. His bier was carried to Jundi Shapur and there he was interred. On his tomb were inscribed these words.

This is tomb of poor Ya'qub.

You confided in Fortune [ayyam] because she favoured you and you were deceived by her; days of prosperity are followed by days on trouble".

I then found in another note written by myself that he died at Jundi Shapur and was interred in the hippodrome of that city. He was then on his way to Iraq. The date of his death as before. "He died of a colic; the doctor told him that there was no remedy for it but an injection; this he refused to take and preferred dying. His malady, which was a colic accompanied with hiccough, lasted sixteen days. He reigned over Sijistan and the provinces in that quarter, during fourteen years and some months."

Our shaykh Ibn al-Athir (vol. II, p. 288) says, in his Annals, under the year 265: "Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth died on the 19th of Shawwal of this year (14th June, A.D. 879)." He mentions also the colic and Ya'qub's refusing to take an injection, and then adds that he died at Jundi Shapur, which is a district in the province of al-Ahwaz. I may observe that Jundi Shapur is a district of Khuzistan, lying between Iraq and the province of Fars. He says also: "The khalif al-Mu'tamid, being desirous of conciliating his good-will, sent him an agent with a letter by which he nominated him governor of Fars. When this envoy arrived, Ya'qub, though unwell, held a sitting to receive him. At his side he had a sword, a small loaf made of unbelted flour and some onions. The ambassador being introduced, delivered his message and Ya'qub answered him in these terms: "Tell the khalif that I am sick and that, if I die, he and I will be delivered from the uneasiness which each of us gives to the other; but, if I recover my health, nothing shall settle matters between us except this word. If he must try for vengeance, if he succeed in ruining my power and reducing me to poverty, I shall return as before, to bread and onions such as these. The messenger departed and Ya'qub died shortly after."

Ibn Hawqal<sup>13</sup> says, in his work entitled al-Masalik wa'l-Mamalik (routes and realms): Jundi Shapur is a fortified city abounding in all the necessities of life. Its date-tree plantations and tilled grounds are 13 Abu'l-Qasim Muhammad Ibn Hawqal, a native of Baghdad and the author of a very remarkable geographical work, entitled al-Masalik wa 'l-Mamalik, put his last corrections to, that treatise in the year 366, A.D. 976-7). He travelled over many countries and appears to have been a secret agent of the Fatimides. The date of his death is not known.

---

very extensive. Ya'qub Ibn al-Layth chose it for his residence on account of its ample resources and the constant abundance of its supplies."

Ya'qub was so steadfast in purpose that the 'Alide prince, al-Hasan Ibn Zayd, designated him by the nickname of al-Sindan (the anvil). He was seldom seen to smile and was noted for intelligence and resolution. One of his sayings was: "If you keep company with a man during forty days without discovering his true character, you will not discover it in forty years."

'Amr (Yaqub's brother), having obtained the supreme authority, governed his subjects with such ability that people said: "Since a very long time, no person attained to the height reached by 'Amr Ibn al-Layth in the art of administering an army and practising the rules by which an empire should be governed." Al-Salami, in his History of Khurasan, speaks very often of his great abilities and his skill in applying the maxims of good government, but I omit these observations lest I should be led too far. He paid his troops every three months and then never omitted to be present. When he passed them in review, he took his seat and had the money placed before him in the presence of all the army. A crier then called out the name of 'Amr Ibn al-Layth, who immediately sent forward his horse fully equipped, and presented him for inspection. The agent examined the animal and ordered the owner a donative of three hundred dirhems (£ 7, 10s.), measured by weight. This sum was carried to him in purse which he took and kissed, saying: "Praise be to God who hath held me in obedience to the Commander of the faithful so that I deserved this gratification!" He then placed it in one of his boots and left it to the servant who pulled them off. All those who received a fixed pay were then called forward, according to their rank, and they appeared before the inspector fully equipped and having with them their vigorous steeds. They were then examined in order to obtain the certitude of their having about them every object, large or small, which is requisite for a horseman or a foot-soldier; and, if even one of those things was missing, the delinquent was deprived of his pay. One day, at a review, 'Amr saw a horseman pass before him with a very lean steed, and he said to him: "Fellow! how dare you take our money and spend it all upon your wife? You fatten her up and allow the horse to grow lean on which you go to war and which gains for you your pay? Go off! I have nothing for you." The trooper replied. "My life for yours! were you to pass my wife in review, you would find that my horse is fatter than she is." 'Amr laughed at this, and told the man to take his pay and get another horse.

The qadi Kamal al-Din, better known by the surname of Ibn al-'Adim [al-Hanbali] of Aleppo,<sup>14</sup> relates, in his history of that city, an anecdote which deserves to be inserted here on account of its similarity to the preceding: Kisra Anushirwan, the son of Qubad (and king of Persia) confided the administration of the army to an eminent katib (or civil officer), highly distinguished for intelligence and talent, and whose name was Babak Ibn Nahrawan. This officer then said to Kisra: "O king! you have charged me with a duty which to be well executed, requires that you support patiently such severity as I may use towards you. I have to pass your men in review every four months; I must see that those of each class be provided with the arms required by their rank, and examine the conduct of the instructors who teach the soldiers horsemanship and archery, so that I may retribute them well if they do their duty and punish them if they neglect it. By that means, my administration will hold the course which it ought to follow." Kisra replied: "He whose request is now granted cannot be more happy than the granter; they both partakes of the advantages (procured by that arrangement); the granter will still continue to enjoy repose, and therefore gives his assent to what you ask." A platform was then built by his order at the place where the reviews were to take place, and over it were appeared magnificent carpets. The inspector took his seat upon it and a crier summoned all the soldiers to present themselves. When they were assembled, the inspector dismissed them because he did not see Kisra among them. The next day, he acted in the same manner, on account of Kisra's absence and, on the third day, he had a proclamation made to this effect: "Let not single soldier remain absent from the review, even were he one of those who are honoured with the diadem and the throne. It is a review in which no indulgence or respect of persons will be shown." Kisra, being informed of this, put on his armour, got on horseback and passed before Babak. Every horseman was obliged to exhibit a tijfah (horse-armour); a coat of mail, a breast-plate, a helmet with its neck-piece in chain mail, two armlets, two cuishes, a spear, a buckler, a mace stuck in the belt, a tabarzin (battle-axe), 14 Kamal al Din 'Umar Ibn Ahmad, surnamed Ibn al-'Adim and chief qadi of Aleppo, wrote a biographical dictionary in which he noticed all the remarkable men who had been in that city. Another good work of his the History of Aleppo, has been analyzed by professor Freytag in the Selecta ex historia Halebi, which contains also a long extract from Kamal al-Din's treatise, with instructive notes. Kamal al-Din was born A.H. 588 (A.D. 1192), and died at Cairo, A.H. 660 (A.D. 1261-2). He had been driven from Aleppo by the invasion of the Tartars. For a full account of his life, see p. xxxvi of the introduction of Freytag's work.—The anecdote related by Ibn Khalikan is borrowed from Tabari.

---

a mace, a case containing two bows with their strings, thirty arrows and two bow-strings rolled up and suspended behind the helmet. Kisra appeared completely armed before the inspector who, missing the bow-strings which ought to have been behind the helmet, did not inscribe his approval after the sovereign's name. Kisra then recollected the bow-strings, attached them to his helmet and passed again before Babek, who then gave his approval and said: "For the chief of the men in armour, four thousand dirhems (£ 100) and one dirhem." The highest pay was four thousand, but he gratified Kisra with one dirhem more. On rising from his seat, he went into the sovereign and said: "O king! blame me not for my severity; I only wished to introduce the custom of proceeding with justice and equity, and to eradicate the habit of showing respect to certain persons." Kisra replied: "The man is not severe for us, who acts with the intention of correcting our faults or of rendering a service to the government. Why should we not submit to his rigour as the sick man submits to take a nauseous medicine in the hope of its doing him good."

Let us resume our account of 'Amr Ibn al-Layth. Al-Salami says: "Rafi' Ibn Harthamah was a follower of Abu Thawr, who was one of Muhammad Ibn Tahir's generals: When Ya'qub al-Saffar arrived at Nishapur, Abu Thawr was one of those chiefs who sided with him against Muhammad Ibn Tahir. Ya'qub then returned to Sijistan, and Abu Thawr went with him, accompanied by Rafi' Ibn Harthamah. The latter was an ugly man with a long beard and a stern, gloomy aspect. He went, one day, to see Ya'qub who, when he had retired, said: 'I feel no inclination for that man: let him leave us and go where he will!' Rafi' then sold all his effects and returned to his residence at Bamin*, which is a village in the district of Kanj-Rustaq. There he remained till Ahmad Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Khujistani sent for him." Khujistan is a village in the mountains of Herat and situated in the district of Badghis.--Al-Khujistani was one of Ya'qub's followers, but, having repudiated his authority, he effected the conquest of Nishapur and Bistam in the year 261 (A.D. 874-5). He affected to be inclined towards the Tahirite party, in order to gain the good-will of the inhabitants of Nishapur, and went so far as to sign his letters with the words: Ahmad Ibn 'Abd Allah the Tahirite. He then wrote to Rafi' Ibn Harthamah who was still in his native place, inviting him to come and join him. Rafi' complied and received from him the command of the troops." The wars and battles in which al-Khujistani was engaged are very famous, but it does not suit our purpose to speak of them here.--Some time after, two of his (al-Khujistani's) pages conspired against his life and murdered him whilst he was asleep and drunk. This happened on the eve of Wednesday the 23rd of Shawwal, 268 (16th May, A.D. 882). Rafi' who was then absent, went to join al-Khujistani's troops and was acknowledged by them as their chief. They took the oath of allegiance to him in the city of Herat, or of Nishapur, by another account. In the year 271 (A.D. 884-5), al-Muwaffaq Billah deprived 'Amr Ibn al-Layth al-Saffar of the Khurasan and gave it to Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Tahir. The latter, who was then residing in Baghdad, appointed Rafi' Ibn Harthamah to act as his lieutenant in that country, and Nasr Ibn Ahmad Ibn Asad al-Samani was established by al-Muwaffaq as Muhammad Ibn Tahir's lieutenant in the provinces of Transoxiana. Some time after, Rafi' received dispatches from al-Muwaffaq by which he was ordered to make an expedition against Jurjan and Tabaristan, both of which had belonged to al-Hasan Ibn Zayd, the 'Alide, and had fallen, on the death of that prince, A.H. 270 (A.D. 883-4), into the hands of his brother, Muhammad Ibn Zayd. In the year 274, Rafi' marched against the latter and, finding that he had abandoned these places and taken refuge in Astarabad, he blockaded him in that city during two years. Muhammad then left it by night with a few partisans and fled to Daylam. In the year 277 (A.D. 890-1), Rafi' was master of Tabaristan. In the month of Rajab, 279 (Sept.--Oct. A.D. 892), the khalif al-Mu'tamid 'ala Allah died and the supreme authority passed into the hands of Abu'l 'Abbas al-Mu'tadid 'ala Allah, the son of al-Muwaffaq (who had died two years before). On the death of Nasr Ibn Ahmad the Samanide, his brother, Abu Ibrahim Isma'il was appointed governor of Tansoxiana by al-Mu'tamiad,--I may here observe that Nasr died at Samarqand on the 23rd of the latter Jumada, 279 (20th Sept. A.D. 892).

---

* [Mamin in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 466--Ed.]

The historian continues: "He (al-Mu'tadid) took from the above-mentioned Nasr Ibn Ahmad the government of Khurasan and gave it to 'Amr Ibn al-Layth. Rafi' continued to reside at Rayy and, having entered into friendly relations with the princes of the neighbouring countries, he gained their assistance against 'Amr Ibn al-Layth. He then marched towards Nishapur and, in the month of the latter Rabi', A.H. 283, (May-June, A.D. 896), he had an engagement with 'Amr and was defeated. Being closely pursued by the victor, who followed him to Abiward, he left that city with the intention of going either to Herat or so Marw. 'Amr having then learned that he was setting out for Sarakhs, resolved on taking the same direction and cutting off his adversary's retreat. Rafi', being informed of his design, departed from Abiward with a guide who led him across the mountains of Tus and brought him to the gates of Nishapur. He entered into that city and 'Amr came back to besiege him. (A combat ensued in which) the partisans of Rafi were defeated, and that chief, accompanied by a small troop of adherents, all mounted on dromedaries, succeeded in reaching the province of Khwarizm with his baggage and his treasures. This took place on Saturday, the 25th of Ramadan. 283 (5th Nov. A.D. 896). The emir of Khwarizm dispatched an officer to render him every service and provide him with whatever he required till he reached (the capital of) the province: but that agent, finding Rafi accompanied with a very feeble escort, took the opportunity and killed him. This occurred on Friday, the 7th of Shawwal, 283 (17th Nov. A.D. 896). He then cut off his head and sent it to 'Amr Ibn al-Layth at Nishapur, by whom it was dispatched to al-Mu'tadid Billah. Rafi was not the son of Harthamah (as his surname seems to imply); Harthamah was his stepfather and, as his name was a usual one, Rafi adopted it as a surname. His real father bore the name of Tumard."

Ibn Jarir al-Tabari says, in his Annals, under the year 283: "On Friday, the 22nd of Dhu'l Qa'dah (31st December, A.D. 896), letters were read from all the pulpits, announcing the death of Rafi' Ibn Harthamah and, on Thursday, the 4th of Muharram, 284 (11th Feb. A.D. 897), a courier sent by 'Amr Ibn al-Layth al-Saffer arrived at Baghdad with Rafi's head. Al-Mu'tadid caused it to be set up in the eastern quarter of the city and, in the afternoon, it was removed to the western quarter, where it remained exposed till nightfall. It was then carried back by his order to the palace of the khalifs (dar al-sultan)."

Al-Salami says: "All Khurasan, up to the border of the Jayhun, fell into the power of 'Amr Ibn al-Layth."

Al-Buhturi (vol. III, p. 657), the celebrated poet, composed an eulogium on Rafi' Ibn Harthamah to whom he gives the surname of Abu Yusuf. He sent this poem to him from Iraq and received, in return, a gift of twenty thousand dirhems (£ 500).

Al-Salami says: "When 'Amr Ibn al-Layth sent Rafi's head to al-Mutadid, he demanded that the province of Transoxiana should be conceded to him on the same conditions by which 'Abd Allah Ibn Tahir held his commandments, and he received a promise to that effect. Some time after, whilst he was in Nishapur, a magnificent present was sent to him by al-Mu'tadid, but this he refused to accept unless the promise already made was executed. The messenger who brought those gifts wrote back to al-Muktafi Billah, the son of al-Mu'tadid, informing him of 'Amr's declaration. That prince was then at Rayy with a number of his father's officers, and it was decided by them that the diploma of 'Amr's nomination should be made out. This document was brought to him with the presents which he had refused to accept and among which were seven robes one after the other, and, as each was put on, ('Amr) prostrated himself and made a prayer of two rak'ahs. The diploma being then presented to him, he asked what it meant, and the envoy informed him that it was the thing he asked for. To this 'Amr replied: "Of what use will it be to me? Isma'il Ibn Ahmad will not deliver up that province unless (I enforce my demand) by one hundred thousand swords." To this the envoy answered: 'It was yourself who asked for it: so, get ready to take possession of the province and govern in his place,' 'Amr then received the diploma, kissed it and laid it down before him; after which, he sent to the envoy and his suite a gift of seven hundred thousand dirhems (£ 17,500) and dismissed them. He then equipped an army for the purpose of attacking Isma'il Ibn Ahmad; who on learning this crossed the Jayhun, to meet them, cut to pieces a part of them and put the rest to flight. 'Amr Ibn al-Layth was then in Nishapur. This engagement took place on Monday, the 17th of Shawwal, 286 (26th Oct. A.D. 899). Isma'il, returned to Bukhara, a city forming one of the districts of Transoxiana."

'Amr Ibn al-Layth, says al-Salami, "had charged Muhammad Ibn Bishr<sup>15</sup> to lead this army against Isma'il. When the latter crossed the Jayhun, Musa al-Sijazi<sup>16</sup> went into the place where Ibn Bishr was and, finding that he was getting his head shaved, he said to him: 'Did you obtain leave from Isma'il to have your head shaved?' giving him thus to understand that by attempting to contend with Isma'il, he had already rendered that chief the master of his head. To this Muhammad Ibn Bishr replied: 'Begone out of my sight, and may the curse of God light upon you.' Muhammad's troops were put to rout and he himself was taken prisoner and had his head cut off. Isma'il, to whom this and the other heads were brought, charged some of Muhammad's partisans to examine them and point out the head of their chief. One of these persons then related to Isma'il what Musa al-Sijazi had said, and this ill-omened prognostic caused him great surprise."

In al-Tabari's Annals, under the year 287, is a passage to this effect: "On Wednesday, the 25th of the first Jumada (28th May, A.D.

15 In the editions and the manuscripts this name is preceded by the word -ud- which must be suppressed.

16 The diacritical points of the word which I read Sijazi (native of Sijistan) vary greatly in the manuscripts.

* [Al-Sanjari in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 469-Ed.]

900), the sultan<sup>17</sup> received, it is said, a letter announcing that a battle had taken place between Isma'il Ibn Ahmad and 'Amr Ibn al-Layth, that the army of the latter had been completely routed and that he himself had been taken prisoner. Here is an account of what passed between them: The sultan, being asked by 'Amr for the government of Transoxiana, granted his request and sent to Nishapur, where he ('Amr) was residing, the robe of investiture and the standard under which he was to hold that province and carry on the war against Isma'il Ibn Ahmad. On this, Isma'il wrote to him ('Amr) in these terms 'You have obtained the government of a vast country and I possess Transoxiana; be satisfied with what you have and let me remain in this frontier province.' 'Amr refused to accept his proposal and, being spoken to, respecting the river of Balkh (the Oxus) and the difficulty of crossing it, he answered: 'Were I inclined to make a dike across it with bags of money and pass over on that, I could do so,' Isma'il, having given up the hope of turning 'Amr from his project, assembled all the dihqans (landed proprietors) who were under his authority and crossed over to the western side of the river, whilst 'Amr Ibn al-Layth posted himself in Balkh. He then occupied the neighbouring country, and 'Amr, perceiving that he was in some measure blockaded, regretted what he had done and, it is said, requested a suspension of arms. Isma'il refused to grant, and, although no considerable combat took place between them, 'Amr found himself obliged to make a hasty retreat. On his way, he came up to a jungle and, being informed that a shorter road passed through it, he told the main body of his troops to follow the highway, and then engaged in the wood with a small escort. The animal which he rode got into some marshy ground and fell, leaving him without the means of escape, whilst his companions pushed forward without minding him. Some of Isma'il troops then came up and took him prisoner. When al-Mu'tadid was informed of what had passed, he praised Isma'il's conduct, blamed that of 'Amr and said: 'Let Abu Ibrahim Isma'il be invested by patent with all the authority which appertained to 'Amr. The robes of investiture were then sent off to him."

Al-Tabari says, under the year 288: "On Thursday, the 1st of the first Jumada (23rd April, A.D. 901), 'Amr Ibn al-Layth arrived in Baghdad. I have been told that Isma'il Ibn Ahmad gave him the choice of remaining with him as a prisoner or of being sent to the Commander of the faithful, and that he was taken to the Commander of the faithful because he preferred it."

---

17 Here the word sultan is employed by Tabari to designate the khalif. See above, note (7).

Al-Salami says, in his History of Khurasan: 'Amr, having proceeded to Balkh, had there an encounter with Isma'il and was taken prisoner. This happened on Tuesday, the 15th of the first Rabi' 287 (20th March, A.D. 900). Isma'il had him put into irons and taken to Samarkand."—This city lies (in Transoxiana), on the other side of the river which is called the Jayhun.—His (Isma'il's) brother, Abu Yusuf, being placed by him at the service of the prisoner, remained with him till 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Fath arrived with Isma'il's nomination to the government of Khurasan, bringing with him the diploma, the standard, the diadem and the robe of investiture. This was in the year 288. He was accompanied by Ashnas<sup>18</sup> who was charged to transport 'Amr Ibn al-Layth to Baghdad. The prisoner was given to him by Isma'il and taken to that city."

Ibn Abi Tahir (vol. I, p. 291), the historian already cited, says: 'Amr Ibn al-Layth al-Saffar was defeated and a great number of his partisans were slain.

The battle was fought at the gates of Balkh, on Wednesday, the 17th of the latter Rabi', 287 (21st April, A.D. 900). Previously to the encounter, his secretary, Ibn Abi Rabi'ah passed over to Isma'il, and was accompanied by one of the generals with a large body of troops. On the morning of the day on which the battle took place, 'Amr was informed of this desertion and, finding that most, of his partisans had gone over to Isma'il, he lost courage and took to flight, Isma'il, whose attention was engaged by the state of his army, sent a detachment after 'Amr. They found him on horseback, but at a full stop<sup>19</sup>, and took him prisoner. Isma'il, to whom they brought him, sent a dispatch to al-Mu'tadid, informing him of what had occurred and stating that 'Amr should be sent to Samarkand (and he detained there) till the Commander of the faithful's answer arrived. The khalif was highly pleased at this news and granted to Isma'il, in addition to the government which he already held, all the provinces over which 'Amr had extended his authority. 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Fath then set out for the purpose of receiving the prisoner. When he arrived, Isma'il had 'Amr brought in and sent him off bound in chains. One of his soldiers was placed at the side of 'Amr, with a drawn sword in his hand, and to 'Amr was said: 'If the people attempt to deliver you, we shall throw to them your head. Not a man stirred. They arrived at Nahrawan on Tuesday, the 26th of the second Rabi' 288

18 The orthography of this proper name is uncertain.

19 The Arabic words may also signify: they found him standing upon a horse. If this be the true meaning, the horse was his own, which had sunk into the mud.

(19th April, A.D. 901) and there took off 'Amr's chains. On Thursday, the 1st of the first Jumada (23rd April), the troops (of the city) rode forth to meet him. He arrived in a palanquin the curtains of which were let down (so as to prevent him from being seen). On arriving at (the gate called) Bab al-Salamah, he was taken out of that conveyance, clothed in a brocade gown and placed, with the bonnet of displeasure<sup>20</sup> upon his head, on the back of a camel with two humps (a dromedary), an animal which, when large and strong, is called a falij. This camel was one of the presents which had been formerly sent by him to the khalif; it was (the) covered with silk housings and adorned with tresses and harness, all inlaid with silver. They led him through Baghdad; down the high street, till they reached the Qasr al-Husna (the abode of bliss), which was then the khalif's residence. During that time, he held his hands up in prayer and uttered words of resignation and humility; but that was through craftiness, for the purpose of exciting commiseration. Effectively, the people abstained from reviling him. He was then taken before the khalif, who held a special sitting for the purpose of receiving him and had convoked to it a great number of persons. He stopped at the distance of about fifty cubits from the khalif, who merely said to him: 'This is what you have been working for, O 'Amr'!. After that, he was lead to a cell which had been prepared for him."

Ya'qub al-Saffar married an Arab woman of Sijistan who, after his death, became the wife of his brother 'Amr. She died without children and had then in her possession one thousand seven hundred female slaves.

A person of that time related as follows: "I was with the Traditionist [Muhaddith] Abu 'Ali al-Husayn Ibn Muhammad Ibn Fahm<sup>21</sup>, when a student in Traditions came in and said: Abu Ali, I saw yesterday 'Amr al-Saffar mounted on one of the dromedaries which he sent, three years ago to the khalif as a present. On this, Abu 'Ali pronounced the following lines:

As a man of talent and of rank it is sufficient to indicate al-Saffar. Morning and evening he marches at the head of an army. He gave camels as presents, but knew not that he should be mounted upon one and led as a prisoner.

---

20 This was a sort of fool's cap which criminals were obliged to wear when exposed to public view.

21 Abu Ali al-Husayn Ibn Muhammad Ibn Fahm, a learned Traditionist and a native of Baghdad, died A.H. 289 (A.D. 902), aged seventy-eight years.—(Huffaz)

'Ali Ibn Muhammad Ibn Nasr Ibn Bassam, a poet of whom we have already spoken (vol. II, p. 301), composed the following lines on the same subject:

O thou who art deluded by thy worldly prosperity! didst thou see 'Amr? After possessing a kingdom and great power, he was forced to ride on a dromedary and to wear the bonnet of displeasure as a humiliation. With hands raised up, he prayed to God aloud and in his heart, begging to be saved from death and allowed to work again in copper.

Al-Tabari says: "Al-Mu'tadid Billah died on the eve of Monday, the 21st of the latter Rabi', 289 (4th April, A.D. 902). The khalifate devolved to his son, al-Muktafi Billah Abu Muhammad 'Ali, who was then absent, at al-Raqqah. After his return to Baghdad, he gave orders, on Tuesday, the 8th of the latter Jumada (20th May), that the subterraneous cells which his father had caused to be made for the reception of criminals should be filled up. The next morning, 'Amr Ibn al-Layth al-Saffar died and was buried in the neighbourhood of the Qasr al-Husna. When Mu'tadid was laying speechless on his death-bed, he ordered by signs and indications that 'Amr should be executed. Those signs he made by placing his hand on his neck and then on his eye; they meant: 'Kill the one-eyed man! 'Amr had lost an eye. Safi al-Harami to whom this order was given did not fulfil it, being unwilling to take 'Amr's life because he knew that the khalif would soon breathe his last.

It is related that al-Muktafi had no sooner arrived in Baghdad than he asked of (the vizir) al-Qasim Ibn 'Ubayd Allah (vol. II, p. 300) if 'Amr was still alive, and was highly pleased to learn that he was. 'I wish,' said he, 'to do him good.' During his residence at Rayy, in the life-time of his father, he had received from 'Amr a great quantity of presents and numerous marks of good-will. It is said that al-Qasim, disliking to be questioned about the prisoner, caused him to be murdered. 'Amr governed nearly twenty-two years."

Ya'qub was called al-Saffar because he had been a worker in sufr (copper), that is to say, in nahas (brass). At the time, his brother 'Amr kept asses for hire. The syndic* of the coppersmiths related as follows: "When Ya'qub as a boy, in the shop, learning to work in copper, I often perceived between his eyes the sign of his future greatness." Being asked what he had remarked, he said: "I used to look at him from a place in which he could not perceive me, and

* [Shaykh min al-Saffarin in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 474--Ed.]

I always saw him with his eyes cast down like a person full of thought and absorbed in his reflexions. After that, he became what we have seen."

The katib 'Ali Ibn al-Marzuban al-Isfahani made the following relation: "I once asked a partisan of the Saffaride family what had been the trade of 'Amr Ibn al-Layth, the brother of Ya'qub. 'Amr was then imprisoned in Madinat al-Salam (Baghdad). The man returned me no answer, but, on the death of 'Amr, he said to me: "It would not have been prudent in me, had I given you any information on that subject whilst 'Amr was still to be feared or to be hoped in. But now, I may tell you that he continued to hire out asses till his brother rose to power and got possession of Khurasan. He then went to join him and gave up that trade."

A number of historians relate, in their works, that Abu Ahmad 'Ubayd Allah Ibn Tahir Ibn al-Husayn al-Khuzai, the same person of whom we have spoken (vol. II, p. 79), would sometimes say: "Three are the wonders of the world; first that which happened to al-'Abbas Ibn 'Amr al-Ghanawi (vol. III, p. 417) and his army of ten thousand men: they were all put to death and he alone had his life spared; secondly, 'Amr Ibn al-Layth's army of fifty thousand men; all of them escaped and he alone was taken prisoner; thirdly, my being out of office and my son Abu'l 'Abbas being employed to administer (the tolls received at) the two bridges of boats which are at Baghdad."

The history of al-'Abbas Ibn 'Amr al-Ghanawi was this: When the Qarmats became powerful, they invaded the neighbouring countries and indulged to the utmost in the shedding of blood. In the year 287 (A.D. 900), al-Mu'tadid Billah sent against them an army under the orders of al-'Abbas al-Ghanawi. A battle ensued in which Abu Sa'id al-Qarmiti (vol. I, p. 427), the chief of the Qarmats, took al-'Abbas and all his army prisoners. The next day, he had them all brought before him, put them to death and had their bodies burned. Al-'Abbas, whom he set at liberty, was the only of the army who returned to al-Mu'tadid. This was towards the end of Sha'ban (end of August) in that year. The encounter took place between Basrah and al-Bahrayn, and furnished matter to a long and well-known relation. We present here a mere summary of it, because this is not a fit place for entering into particulars. If it pleases God, we shall give a full relation of it in our great historical work.<sup>22</sup> The first of the two verses which were said to have been inscribed on Ya'qub's tomb and which we have already given, terminates with a hemistich borrowed from the piece of verse which was sung by Mu'awiyah Ibn Abi Sufyan the 'Umayyad, when he had established his domination in Syria and received the visit of Jarir Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Bajali, who had been sent to him from Kufah by 'Ali Ibn Abi Talib, Mu'awiyah heard the message from Jarir and, when the sitting was over, had him lodged in a chamber near his own. That night, he sung the following verses, so that Jarir might hear them and repeat them so 'Ali:

---

22 This work was probably never published.

Long and uneasy is my night, vague the suppositions which assail me, since the arrival of a visitor who came to me with vain and futile talks (turrahat basabia). Jarir has come, though events are crowding on, with proposals equivalent to the amputating of our noses. I bear with him, but the sword is still between me and him; for I am not a man to put on the raiment of ignominy. Syria has offered me the same obedience which I already received from Yaman, and the chiefs, of that country declare it loudly in their assemblies. If they act (as they promise), I shall attack 'Ali with a band (jubbah) which shall break down, to his harm, all the branches, green or withered (which affords him shelter). I hope for the greatest advantage which any man ever obtained, neither do I despair of ruling over 'Iraq.

The word turrahat signifies futilities; in its primitive acceptation, it designates the paths which branch off a highway. Turraha, its singular form, is a Persian word arabicized turrehe. Being subsequently employed to signify futilities, it gave rise to the expression turrahat basabis. --The word abbah means a troop of men. The poet, in using it, gave to understand that he would attack 'Ali with a body of horse and foot. The other words of the poem are so well known that they do not require explanation.

I found the following indications in the handwriting of a person who cultivated this branch of science (history): When 'Amr Ibn al-Layth was taken prisoner, his grandson, Tahir Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Amr obtained the government of Fars. This took place on the 17th of Safar, 288 (10th February, A.D. 901). In the year 296 (A.D. 808-9), he and his brother Ya'qub Ibn Muhammad were arrested by Subuk al-Subukri, a chief who had been one of their grandfather's pages, and were sent by him to Madinat al-Salam (Baghdad). The authority then passed to al-Layth, a nephew of Ya'qub and 'Amr, who made the conquest of Sijistan, A.H. 296. A number of conflicts had passed between Tahir and Subukri, who finally obtained possession of the country. Al-Mu'adhdhal (Ibn-'Ali) Ibn al-Layth, who governed Sijistan in the name of his brother al-Layth (Ibn-'Ali), then invaded Fars, and Subuk fled to the khalif for assistance. In the month of Ramadan, 296 (May-June, A.D. 909), al-Muqtadir Billah sent off troops, under the orders [command] of Munis al-Muzaffar, Badr al-Kabir and al-Husayn Ibn Hamdan. These generals encountered al-Layth Ibn 'Ali, routed his army and took him prisoner with his brother Muhammad and his son Isma'il. Munis returned to Baghdad with the prisoners and arrived there in the month of Muharram, 297 (Sept-Oct. A.D. 909). Al-Layth Ibn 'Ali was paraded through the city on an elephant, and al-Mu'adhdhal Ibn 'Ali obtained the government of Sijistan. Ahmad Ibn Isma'il the Samanide then marched against him with a numerous army of horse and foot, and deprived him of that province. After that, Subuk al-Subukri possessed it for some time and was subsequently carried prisoner to Baghdad with Muhammad Ibn 'Ali al-Layth. Thus ended the power of the Saffarides.

802 YA'QUB IBN YUSUF IBN 'ABD AL-MU'MIN

Abu Yasuf Ya'qub, the son of 'Abu Ya'qub Yusuf and the grandson of Abu Muhammad 'Abd al-Mu'min al-Qaysi al-Kumi,<sup>1</sup> was sovereign of Maghrib.<sup>2</sup> We have spoken of his grandfather 'Abd al-Mu'min (vol. II, page. 128), and shall give an article on his father Yusuf. (He was of a very light tawny complexion<sup>3</sup>, rather tall<sup>4</sup> and well-looking; his mouth wide, his eyes large and very dark, his limbs bulky, his voice loud and his discourse fluent. He was the most various of men, the most elegant in language and the most fortunate in his suppositions. He managed affairs with skill whilst acting as vizir to his father and watched over his provincial governors and other public officers so attentively, that he acquired a perfect acquaintance with all the details of the administration):

---

1 Al-Qaysi al-Kumi, means member of the Arabic tribe of Qays and of the Berber tribe of Qumiyah. The sovereigns of the Ziride, Almoravide, Almohade and other Berber dynasties were always too proud to acknowledge their real origin and readily found genealogists who could show that their family descended from one or other of the noble Arabian tribes, Ibn Khaldun declares positively, in his Histoire des Berbers, t. I. p. 251, that the genealogy given as that of 'Abd al-Mumin is a forgery.

2 By Maghrib (the West) and Mghrib al-Aqsa (the Ulterior West) is meant the country which is now called the empire of Morocco.

3 The text of this paragraph is not to be found in our manuscripts.

On the death of his father, the shaykhs (or chiefs) of the Almohades [Al-Muwahhidin]* and of the descendants of 'Abd al-Mu'min agreed on placing him at the head of affairs and, having tendered to him the oath of allegiance they instituted him chief of the empire and saluted him by the appellation of Amir al-Mu'minin (Commander of the faithful)<sup>5</sup>, the same which was borne by his father and his grandfather. They gave him also the surname of al-Mansur (the victorious). He governed with great ability, displayed (to the world) the glory of the (Almuawwahid) empire, set up the standard of the holy war (against the Christians), settled the balance of justice on a firm basis and established throughout the land the application of the prescriptions announced in the divine law: He watched over the interests of religion and of piety, corrected public morals by ordering the people to do what was commendable and avoid what was reprehensible; the penalties fixed by law were applied by him not only to his subjects in general but even to the members of his own family and to his nearest relations. His reign was therefore prosperous and his conquests extensive. When his father died (A.H. 580- A.D. 1184, at the siege of Santarem), he was with him, and, from that moment, he took into his own hands the administration of the empire. In the space of two months, he re-established order in (Muslim) Spain, ameliorated greatly the state of that country, placed garrisons in the centers of administration and did all that might promote the welfare of the people. He gave direction that the Surah Fatihah when recited in the public prayer, should be preceded by the Bismillah<sup>6</sup>, and orders to that effect were sent by him to all the Muslim countries under his rule. These orders some complied with, but others disobeyed. He then returned to Morocco, which city was the capital of the (Al-mohade) empire. After that, in the month of Sha'ban, 580 (Nov.-Dec. A.D. 1184), the Almoravide [Murabit] prince 'Ali Ibn

---

4 For the signification of the expression ماحر see de Sacy's Grammaire, t. I, p. 543.

5 This title was given to khalifs only. The Almohades of Morocco and the Almohade Hafsid of Tunis considered their sovereigns as khalifs and designated them by that title.

* ["Al-Mohade" has been retained hereinafter -Ed.]

6 The fatihah is the first surat of the Qur'an and contains only seven verses. The bismillah is the invocation placed at the beginning of all the surats except one, and which may be rendered thus: In the name of God, the Merciful, the Clement! In the orthodox Muslim prayer, the fatihah should not be preceded by the bismillah, but, in the Almohade sect, this and a number of other irregularities were authorized.

Ishaq Ibn Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Ghaniah<sup>7</sup> departed from the island of Majorca and took possession of Bugia* and the neighbouring country. The emir<sup>8</sup> Ya'qub (he who is the subject of this article) sent against him a fleet and an army of twenty thousand horse; then, in the beginning of the year 583 (March, A.D. 1187), he set out himself and recovered the countries which had been taken from him. He then returned to (the city of) Morocco and, in the year 586, he learned that the Franks (the Spanish Christians) had obtained possession of Selves, (Shilba) a city in the west of Spain. He, in consequence, set out thither in person and, having retaken it, he immediately dispatched on an expedition a body of Almohade (Berber) troops and of Arabs. This army entered into the country of the Franks and took from them four cities of which they had effected the conquest forty years before. The sovereign of Toledo (Alphonso IX, king of Castile) then conceived such fear of Ya'qub that he asked for peace and obtained a truce of five years. Ya'qub then returned to (the city of) Morocco. The truce had nearly expired when some Franks, at the head of a numerous army invaded the Muslim territory, plundering and slaying all before them and committing horrible depredations. When this news reached the emir Ya'qub, who was then in Morocco, he levied a numerous body of troops among the Almohade (Berber) and Arab tribes, for the purpose of going to meet the enemy, and after a rapid march, he passed the S'traits and landed in Spain. This was in the year, 591 (A.D. 1195). The Franks, being informed of his approach, collected, from far and near, a great multitude (of warriors), and advanced to encounter him.

I must here relate that, towards the close of the year 668 (July, A.D. 1270), I saw, in Damascus, a notebook in the handwriting of Taj al-Din 'Abd Allah Ibn Hamawayh who had acted there in the capacity of shaykh of the shaykhs (chief of the professors) and who having travelled to Spain, had written down, during his residence there some notes concerning the proceedings of that (the Almohade) administration. The book of which I am speaking contained on that even, a chapter which must be inserted here: "Towards the close of the year

---

7 For a full account of the Ghania family and of their wars against the Almohades, see Ibn Khaldun's Histoire des Berbers, tome II. The same volume contains a satisfactory account of the Almoravides and the Almohades.

* ["Al-Moravid" has been retained hereinafter -Ed.]

* Bujayah in Cairo ed., vol. VI, p. 5.

8 The orthodox Muslim historians give to the Almohade sovereigns the title of amir al-Muslimin.

590 A.D. 1194), when the truce expired which the emir and sovereign the West (Morocco and Spain), Abu Yusuf Ya'qub, the son of Yusuf and the grandson of 'Abd al-Mu'min, had concluded with al-Adhfonsh (Al-phonso) the Frank, who possessed the western part of the Spanish peninsula and who had Toledo for the seat of his government, the former, who was then in (the city of) Morocco, took the resolution of passing into Spain for the purpose of encountering the Franks. He, in consequence, wrote to the governors of his provinces and the chiefs of his troops, ordering them to join him. He then proceeded to Sila (Sallee), outside of which town the troops were directed to assemble. It happened, however, that he was taken seriously ill and the physicians lost all hopes of his recovery. This (untoward occurrence) interrupted the organizing of the army, and the emir Ya'qub was carried back to Morocco. The (nomadic) Arabs and other tribes who were stationed in that neighbourhood, being encouraged by this to ravage the country, spread, throughout all quarters, ruin and devastation, whilst Alphonso did the same in the territory of the Spanish Muslims. The result was that the army of the emir Ya'qub had to be broken up and sent, in detachments, east and west, for the purpose of protecting these countries and quelling the insurrection. Alphonso then conceived such hopes of conquering the provinces (of Muslim Spain) that he sent to the emir Ya'qub an ambassador charged to exact from him, by threats and menaces, the surrender of a certain fortress (or some fortresses) situated in the vicinity of the Christian territory. He wrote to him also a letter which had been drawn up (in Arabic) by one of his vizirs named Ibn al-Fakhkhar and which ran thus: 'In Thy name, O God! Creator of the heavens and of the earth. His blessings be upon the Lord Messiah, the Spirit of God. His eloquent messenger.<sup>9</sup> Now, to the point:<sup>10</sup> It cannot escape the attention of whoever is gifted with a penetrating intellect and a good understanding that you are the emir of the Hanifite<sup>11</sup> community as I am that of the Christian one. You well

---

9 This invocation has nothing in it to offend the orthodoxy of a Muslim. The letter was evidently drawn up by a Muslim, but, from internal evidence, I am inclined to consider it as a forgery.

10 This is the usual form by which, in Arabic letters, the writer enters into the subject, after commencing by a pious invocation or a series of compliments and good-wishes. It was approved of by Muhammad himself. In North Africa, the form -ud- (yalih, i.e. after which follows), is very generally employed.

11 Muhammad designated himself and his followers as hanifites, (Hanifs) which term, according to the Muslim doctors, signifies the followers of the ancient orthodox religion.

know how the chiefs of the Spanish Muslims have abandoned and deserted each other, how they neglect the care of their subjects and how greatly they are inclined to enjoy repose. (You know that) I make them undergo the law of the strongest, expelling them from their abodes, carrying their children into captivity and making an example of their men. You have at present no excuse to offer for not coming to their assistance, since the hand of Providence has given you the means of doing so. You pretend that Almighty God has prescribed to you as a rule that, when we kill one of your people, you must kill ten of ours. But God has now alleviated you (from that necessity), because he knew that you have among you many men so weak and feeble that, if we were to slay ten of yours in order to avenge the death of one of ours, they would be incapable of resistance and unable to defend their lives. I was informed that you had prepared for war and ascended to the summit of the hill of battle<sup>12</sup>; yet you procrastinate, year after year, making one step forward and the other backward. I know not whether you be detained by cowardice or by the intention of belying the promise made by thy Lord. But, being told that you could not find an opportunity of passing the sea on account of a circumstance which, as long as it subsists, will prevent your engaging in such an undertaking, I shall now make you a proposal which will set you at ease and deliver you from the blame of not fulfilling your promises and engagements and of not furnishing a great number of guarantees: send me some of your servants with ships, galleys, transports and mistics<sup>13</sup>, so that I may pass over to you with my bands and fight with you in the place which you like best. If you gain the victory, an abundant spoil shall have thus been brought to you and a magnificent present set before you; if I am victorious, I shall hold a high hand over you and deserve to be the emir of the two communities and the sovereign of the two continents. It is God Who prepares success and Who facilitates the accomplishment of wishes. There is no Lord but He, no good but that comes from Him: God's will be done.' The emir Ya'qub, on receiving this letter, tore it to pieces and wrote words on the back of one of the fragments: 'Return to them; for we shall certainly go unto them with troops which they shall not be able to withstand and we will expel them from their (possessions), humbled and despicable.'<sup>14</sup> My answer you shall see, not hear!' Under this, he wrote the following verse:

---

12 This metaphoric expression signifies: preparing for fight.

13 Mistics are small vessels with latteen sails.

14 Al-Qur'an, surat 27, verse 37.

He has no letters to send but swords; no other ambassadors then the fivefold host (i.e. the army which is drawn up in five divisions)."

This is a verse of al-Mutanabbi's.

"He then dispatched letters, calling the people to arms and ordering up the troops established in the cities; on that very day, he caused his tents to be pitched outside the town. Having assembled his army, he proceeded to the sea which is called Ziqqaq Sibtah (the straits of Ceuta), crossed from thence to Spain and penetrated, into the country of the Franks. Having met the enemy, who were already assembled and prepared for battle, he made them suffer a most disgraceful defeat. This took place (at al-Arcos) in the year 592 (A.D. 1196)."—End of the extract made from the note-book above mentioned.

I then met with a work composed by Abu'l Hajjaj Yusuf Ibn Muhammad Ibn Ibrahim al-Ansari al-Bayasi<sup>15</sup> and entitled Tadhkir al-'Aqil wa Tanbih al-Ghafil (i.e. remembrancer for the intelligent and advertiser [warner?] for the negligent), and, in it I found letter ascribed to Adfonch Ibn Ferdiland (Alphonse IX, the son of this Ferdinand), who addressed it to the Commander of the Musulmans, Yusuf Ibn Tashfin, a sovereign whose life we shall give. Yusuf's answer was drawn up in the same terms as that which we have just given. God knows where the truth lies: 'Al-Bayasi than adds an indication which seems to prove that he borrowed them from a document in the handwriting of the Egyptian katib Ibn al-Sayrafi<sup>16</sup>, and, if that be true the message could not have been sent to Ya'qub, Ibn Yusuf, al-Sayrafi lived long before the time of that sovereign. I met with a number of learned Maghribians who considered the date given above as incorrect<sup>17</sup> and related what we shall here expose: "The Franks, having assembled an immense army marched against the emir Yusuf who, being informed of their approach, hastened to encounter them, without being alarmed by what he had heard of their multitude and 15 An account of al-Bayasi will be found in this volume.

---

16 The historian al-Sayrafi was living A.H. 507 (A.D. 1113), as we have remarked in vol. II, page 276, note (8); and we learn here that he died a long time before the reign of Y'aqub Ibn Yusuf the Almohade, who mounted the throne A.H. 580 (A.D. 1184). We may therefore suppose that he died A.H. 525 (A.D. 1130-1).

17 The date of the battle of Alarcos, given above, is certainly incorrect; the battle was fought on the 8th or the 9th Shaban, 591 (18th or 19th July, A.D. 1195).

of their advancing against him. The two armies met in the Marj al-Hadid (the iron meadow), which is a plain in the neighbourhood of Qal'ah Rabah (Calatrava), and lying to the north of Cordova. This plain is traversed by a river which Ya'qub passed in order to encounter the Franks and drew up his troops in order of battle. This was on Thursday, the 9th of Sha'ban, 591 (19th July, A.D. 1195). He thus followed the example of his father and grandfather who generally gave battle on a Thursday, and commenced their campaigns in the month of Safar. The engagement began by champions sallying forth to encounter their adversaries in single combats, whilst the armies kept their ground, till the emir Ya'qub, at length, ordered the Almohade cavalry and the Arab chiefs to charge. They did so, routed the Franks and put them to the sword. All were exterminated, except their king, who escaped with a few followers, and, had the night not set in, not a man of the enemy would have remained alive. The mass of booty taken by the Muslims was immense; it is said that the number of coats of mail which fell to the share of the Bayt al-Mal (the public treasury) amounted to sixty thousand.<sup>18</sup> Beasts of burden of all kinds were taken in such quantities that it was impossible to count them. Never was such a defeat heard of in Spain. It was the custom of the Almohades to make no prisoners when their adversaries were polytheists; even if they took a great king, they would strike off his head and those of the other captives, no matter how numerous they might be. The next morning, the Muslim army went in pursuit of the fugitives and found that they had evacuated Qal'ah Rabah, so great was their terror. The emir Ya'qub occupied the fortress, placing in it a wali (governor) with a garrison. The quantity of booty which fell into the hands of the victors was so great that Ya'qub was unable to advance farther into the territory of the Franks and therefore turned his arms against Toledo. This city he blockaded and attacked with great vigour; he caused the trees in the neighbourhood, to be cut down, sent detachments to ravage the country all around and took a great number of castles situated in the environs of the place. The garrisons of these places were put to the sword, the women carried into captivity, the walls and buildings demolished. After reducing the Franks to such an extremity that they did not once care to make a sally against him, he returned to Seville, where he remained till the middle of the year 593 (April-May, A.D. 1197). He then entered, for the third time, into the country of the 18 As the share of the Bayt al-Mal was a fifth, three hundred thousand Christian knights, if we are to believe the narrator, must have fallen in that battle. Muslim historians have no idea of numbers.

---

19 This is a Qur'anic expression and signifies being reduced to despair.

Franks and acted there as he had done before. That people, unable to resist him and finding the earth, wide as it was, too narrow for them<sup>19</sup>, sent to ask for peace. He consented to their prayer on account of the news which had reached him respecting 'Ali Ibn Ishaq (Ibn Ghaniah) the Majorcan, him of whom mention has been already made in this article.

"That chief had invaded the territory of Ifriqiyah<sup>20</sup>, ruined a number of its towns and was advancing towards al-Gharb (the west, i.e. the empire of Morocco), in the hope of taking the city of Bugia; for he knew that the emir Ya'qub's attention was totally engaged by the state of Spain and by the holy war which he was carrying on in that country. He knew also that he had been absent from al-Gharb during three years. Ya'qub granted therefore a truce of five years to all the Spanish kings, on the conditions which they themselves had proposed, and returned to (the city of) Morocco towards the end of the year 593 (Oct-Nov., A.D. 1197). On his arrival, he gave orders for the construction of cisterns and watering-places (on the line of his intended march), and to prepare all the materials and provisions necessary for an expedition into Ifriqiyah. The shaykhs (chiefs) of the Almohades then waited on him and said: 'Sir! we have made a long absence in Spain; some of us have been there five years, others four, and others three. Favour us therefore with a respite and let the expedition be put off till the beginning of the year 595'. He granted their request and then went to Sala (Sallee) where he witnessed a magnificent pageantry got up for his reception. He had already founded near that place another large city to which he gave the name of Ribat al-Fath (the redoubt or station of victory, now called Rabat) and which he had constructed on the plan of Alexandria, the streets being wide, the quarters well distributed, the edifices solid, the whole city handsome and well fortified. It was built near the surrounding sea (the Atlantic), on the southern bank of a river and opposite to Sala. After visiting all parts of that country and admiring its beauties, he returned to Morocco."

I must here observe<sup>21</sup> that accounts very greatly respecting his proceedings after this epoch: some say that he abdicated the throne and wandered through the land till he arrived in the East, where the meanness of his appearance prevented him from being

---

20 Ifriqiyah or as it is generally pronounced, Friqiyah is the name given to the province of Tunis. In former times, the kingdom of Ifrikiya included also the provinces of Tripoli, Constantina and Bugia.

21 This passage is not to be found in our manuscripts.

recognized, and where he died in obscurity. Others relate that, after his return to (the city of) Morocco, he died there on the 1st of the first Jumada, 595 (1st March, A.D. 1199), or on the 1st of Safar (3rd December, A.D. 1198). Some say that he died at Sala (Sullee). God knows best! I may add that, in the year 680 (A.D. 1281-2), a number of persons spoke to me at Damascus of a mausoleum situated close to al-Hamarah, which is a village not far from al-Mijdal, a town in the dependencies of al-Biqah al-'Azizi (Calosyria). This monument is called the tomb of the emir Ya'qub, king of al-Gharb. The inhabitants of the place all agree on this point. The tomb is at the distance of two parasangs from al-Mijdal, in a south-western direction.

Ya'qub was a just and beneficent king and a strict observer of the holy law الشرع المطهر; he obliged all men, without respect of persons, to hold a laudable conduct; he presided regularly at the five public prayers and wore (the simple) woollen (garment of the devotees); He would stop to hear the complaints of women and of poor people, and render them justice. His dying injunction was that he should be buried at the road-side, so that the travellers who passed by might pray to God to have mercy on him.

I heard an anecdote respecting him which deserves to be inserted here: The emir and shaykh Abu Muhammad 'Abd al-Wahid, who was the son of the shaykh Abu Hafs 'Umar and the father of the emir Abu Yahya Ibn 'Abd al-Wahid (the Hafside) held the government of Ifriqiyah. He had married the sister of the emir Ya'qub, and she dwelt with him. A quarrel then arose between them, and she moved to the house of her brother, the emir Ya'qub. The emir 'Abd al-Wahid sent to bring her back and, on her refusal to return, he addressed a complaint to Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Marwan (qadi of the community)<sup>22</sup> at Morocco. The qadi had an interview with the emir Ya'qub and said to him: "the shaykh 'Abd al-Wahid demands that his wife<sup>23</sup> should be restored to him. The emir Ya'qub kept silent: Some days afterwards, 'Abd al-Wahid met the qadi in the emir Ya'qub's palace at Morocco and said to him: "You are the (chief) qadi of the Muslims: I asked to have my wife restored to me, but she 22 In Spain and in the states of North Africa, the chief of the qadis, or lord chief-justice, was called the qadi of the community.

---

23 The qadi, instead of saying wife, made use of the word family (ahl). A euphemism of this kind is absolutely required by Muslim delicacy: nothing can be more unpolite or more offensive than to speak to a man, in direct terms, of the female part of his family.

* [al-auf]

is not yet come." On this the qadi went to see the emir Ya'qub and said to him: "Commander of the faithful, here is twice that the shaykh 'Abd al-Wahid has asked to get back his wife." The emir Ya'qub returned no answer. Some time after, the shaykh Abd al-Wahid met the qadi in the same palace whither he had gone for the purpose of presenting his respects to the emir Ya'qub, and said to him: "Qadi of the Muslims, I told you twice, and now tell you for the third time, that I asked them to restore to me my wife and that they will not let me have here." The qadi had then an interview with the emir Ya'qub and said: "Sir! the shaykh asked that his wife should be restored to him and he has now renewed his request. So you must either send her to him or accept my dismissal from the qadiship." The emir Yusuf remained silent for a time, --or, according to another account he said: "'Abu Abd Allah, this is really becoming too troublesome." He then called forward an eunuch and said to him secretly: "Take 'Abd al-Wahid's wife back to him." That was done the same evening. Ya'qub was not offended with the qadi, neither did he say a word to displease him. In this, he acted according to the prescriptions of the divine law and executed its injunctions. It was a good action which (on the day of judgment), will surely be put to his account and to that of the qadi. He certainly did his utmost to maintain erect the beacon of justice. The same emir was particularly strict in obliging his subjects to say the five daily prayers, and he sometimes put to death those who drank wine. He inflicted the same punishment on the governors who, by their misconduct, excited the complaints of those whom, they administered. He gave orders that all the secondary maxims (deduced from the main principles of the law and received by the orthodox community) should be laid aside, and that the muftis (consulting-lawyers, casuists) should draw their decisions directly from the noble book (the Qur'an) and from the Sunnah (or Traditions concerning the acts and opinions) of the Prophet. His injunctions were that they should pay no attention to the decisions of the mujtahid imams who lived in former times, but judge according to the maxims which they themselves could deduce, by the exercise of private judgment, from the Qur'an, the traditions, the general agreement of the Muslim community and analogical deduction.<sup>24</sup>

A number of Maghribin doctors whom I met here (at Damascus) followed that system; such were Abu'l Khattal' Ibn Dihyah (vol. II, p. 384): his brother Abu 'Amr (vol. II, p. 386, and Muhi al-Din Ibn al-'Arabi<sup>25</sup>, a settler at Damascus. He (Ya'qub) punished those who stayed away from the (five public) prayers and had proclamations made in the streets ordering all to go to the mosque; those who absented themselves through inattention, or the necessity of working for their livelihood, received flogging. His empire was vast and his realm so extensive that all the regions of Maghrib, from the surrounding ocean <sup>بحر المحيط</sup> to Barqah, acknowledged his authority and formed provinces of his empire. He possessed besides a part of the Spanish peninsula. Y'aqub was beneficent and friendly to the learned (in the law); he favoured literary men, listened willingly to poems composed in his praise and rewarded generously the authors. It was for him that Abu'l Abbas Ahmad Ibn 'Abd al-Saian al-Jirawi compiled the Safwa ai-Adab was Diwan al-'Arab (Choice selection of literature and collection of poems composed by the Arabs). The pieces which form this miscellany are remarkably well chosen. The gold Maghribian coins which are called Y'aqubian were so named after this sovereign. In the year 587 (A.D. 1191-2), the sultan Salah al-Din (Saladin) Abu'l Muzaffar Yusuf Ibn Ayyub, a prince whose life we shall give, dispatched a member of the M'nqidh family as ambassador to the emir Ya'qub, for the purpose of obtaining his assistance<sup>26</sup> against the Franks who had come from the countries of the West to invade Egypt and the maritime provinces of Syria. (In his dispatch) he did not give Ya'qub the title of Emir al-Mu'minin, (Commander of the faithful), but that of Emir al-Muslimin (Commander of the Muslims). This gave Ya'qub great offence and prevented him from granting the demand.<sup>27</sup> The ambassador's name was Shams al-Dawlah Abu'l Harith Rahman, the son of Najm al-Dawlah Abu 'Abd Allah

---

24 This was putting aside all the questions which had been already resolved and established as precedents by the most learned doctors of the law, and permitting his own qadis, most of whom were ignorant men, to examine and settle them again as they thought fit.

25 Muhi al-Din Muhammad Ibn 'Ali Ibn Muhammad al-Hatimi, surnamed Ibn al-Arabi, was one of the most voluminous writers on Sufism that the Mohammedan world ever produced. He was born in the month of Ramadan, 560 (July-August, A.D. 1165) at Murcia, a city in Spain. after studying the law and the Qur'an in that country, he went to the East, made the pilgrimage, visited Cairo and other cities, and died at Damascus in the month of the second Rabi, 638 (Oct-Nov. A.D. 1240). The number of works composed by him is enormous; see Hajji khalifah's Bibliographical Dictionary, vol. VII, p. 1171. Of these the most remarkable is the al-Futuhat al-Makkiyah (revelations obtained at Makkah). [forming a very large and thick volume closely written, and filled with mystical reveries. His Fusus al-Hikam (maxims of wisdom set as jewels) is another work of the same kind. A long account of him is given by al-Maqqari, vol. I, p. 567 of the Arabic text, Layden edition, and by M. de Hammer in the Literaturgeschichte der Araber, vol. VII, p. 422.

* * * [Khatab in Ciro ed., vol. VI, p. II-Ed.]

26 That is, the assistance of his fleet.

27 For an account of this embassy, see Ibn Khaldun's Histoire des Berbers, vol. II, p. 215.

Muhammad Ibn Murshid. The rest of the genealogy has been already given in our article on his uncle, Usamah Ibn Munqidh.<sup>28</sup> The hafiz Zaki al-Din 'Abd al-Azim al-Mundhiri (vol. I, p. 89) mentions him in his Takmilat al-Wafayat (supplement to the Obituary)<sup>29</sup> and say: "He died in Cairo, the year 600 (A.D. 1203-4): he was born at 'Shayzar in the year 523 (A.D. 1128-9). He composed some pieces in prose and in "verse".

Let us resume our account of Ya'qub. One of the poets who frequented his court was Abu Bakr Yahya Ibn 'Abd al-Jalil Ibn 'Abd al-Rahman Ibn Mujir, a native of Murcia in Spain, I looked over his collected poetical works and found the greater part of them to be in praise of the emir Ya'qub. In one of these poems he says:

Think you that the poet will cease to extol the fair whilst he is still in his youth and has reached the height of manhood? He was always captivated by the charms of graceful maids and, never, from the age of reason, did he allow indifference to occupy his heart. He cannot admire the character of him who, having once tasted (the sweets of) love, can become indifferent. You who censure me! I am so occupied that I heed not your reproaches. My ear is deaf to your reprimands, though never deaf to the call of love. It can bear a fond discourse though held in whispers, but it cannot hear words of blame. My eyes, to their misfortune, directed (towards her) glances which (for me) were equivalent to death.<sup>30</sup> On the morning in which I appeared before her she left me as an example to show what love might be. 'Twas she who robbed me of (the bloom of) youth, (so that the darkness of my hair disappeared) and became the dark colouring of her eyelids.<sup>31</sup> The magic of her glances annihilated the reality of all that belonged to me; that magic was not unreal. She turned from 28 This an oversight of the author: the genealogy is not given in that article.

---

29 This was one of the numerous works composed as supplements to the hafiz Abu Sulayman Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah's Wafayat al-Naqalah (Necrology of persons who handed down traditional information), which obituary extended from the time of the Hijra till A.H. 338 (A.D. 949).

30 Such appears to be the poet's meaning if the verse be correctly given. Even in that case, the absence of vowel points renders the reading and the sense very uncertain.

31 The poet means to say that his hair was now gray, because she whom he loved had taken its darkness away and made use of it as kohl, or colouring matter, for her eyelashes.

me through coquetry and, when she perceived my affliction, she turned away in confusion; as if she had been frightened by something which excited fear. She thought I meant to burn her, when she saw the grayness of my head shine like a flame. Noble chieftains of the tribe! you who are the fittest in the world to encounter the greatest dangers! we halted in your neighbourhood; we were grateful for your protection, and yet your gazells (maidens) freed us boldly and filled us with fear and dread. You answered for the safety of your guests, but you did not provide for the safety of your roads. You intended to ravish away our souls by scattering among them glances from (maidens) eyes. Better would it have been for us had we plunged into the midst of swords than to have encountered these large eyes! A band of your maidens attacked us and thus infringed the pact which we made (with you). They were Thoalites (skilful archers) with their glances, though they never heard of Thoal.<sup>32</sup> These delicate nymphs levelled against us the graces of their movements when we levelled our pliant lances (for the fight). Their glances struck us successively, and we cast away helmet and spear. They shot at us with arrows, and yet rifled all the hearts which had been ensnared in the toils of love. These graceful maids stripped me of my firmness, and yet I deck them with the jewels of amatory verse. I obliged my soul to face temptations and told her to be firm, but she could not resist them. She (who tempted me) then said: "You must surrender your soul to love, either as a booty or as a gift;" and I replied: "She (my soul) belongs to the Commander of the faithful, and (I shall) therefore not (give her up to you). Never did a king like him appear before our eyes; he who sees him has attained his utmost hopes: Benignity has established in his cheek a fountain of kindness whose waters heal every indisposition; when he is moved by generosity, gifts burst forth from his right hand and flow like a torrent."

The qasidah from which we have taken this extract is rather long, as it contains one hundred and seventy verses; so, we shall confine our choice to what we have here given. This poet died at Morocco in the year 587 (A.D. 1191-2), at the age of fifty-three years. [Abu Ishaq Ibrahim Ibn Ya'qub al-Kanimi,<sup>33</sup> a negro who was a good literary scholar and a poet, entered, one day, into the presence of the emir Ya'qub and recited to him these verses:

---

32 The tribe of Thoal was celebrated for having produced the best archers in Arabia.

33 The text of this passage is not to be found in our manuscripts.

He caused the curtain to be drawn which concealed him from my sight, yet seemed to be still veiled by a curtain, such was the awe which he inspired. He allowed me, through condescendence, to draw near and that awe (mahabatubu) disappeared when I approached him.

The race of Negroes called the Kanim and that of the Takrur are cousins. Neither of them derive their name from a maternal or a paternal ancestor: Kanim is the name of a town situated in the territory of Ghanah, and is the metropolis of the Sudan (or Blacks) who reside to the south of al-Gharb (the states of Morocco). The Kanim are so called after this town. Takrur is the name of a territory and is borne also by those who inhabit it. They are all descended from Kush the son of Ham, the son of Noah.

When the emir Ya'qub received the visit of death and expired, his son Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad was proclaimed sovereign under the title of al-Nasir (the defender). This prince marched into Ifriqiyah routed the troops of Ibn Ghaniah recovered al-Mahdiyyah from the lieutenants of that adventurer. It had been taken by Ibn Ghaniah when Ya'qub was occupied in waging war against the enemies (of the faith). Muhammad (al-Nasir), the son of Ya'qub, then made an expedition into Spain and fought the battle of al-'Uqab (Las Navas) in the year 609 (A.D., 1212. He died on the tenth of Sina'ban, 610 (25th Dec., A.D. 1213). He was born in the year 576 (A.D. 1180-1). The Maghribans state that Muhammad Ibn Ya'qub had told the slaves who were employed to guard his garden at Morocco, that they might lawfully kill whoever they found there at night. Wishing then to know what case they made of his orders, they put on a disguise, one night, and went to walk in the garden. When the slaves saw him, they attacked him with their spears, and, though he cried out to them: 'I am the khalif! I am the khalif!' they would not believe him, but took his life. God knows if that be true.<sup>34</sup>

The supreme authority then passed to his son Abu Ya'qub Ibn Muhammad, the grandson of the emir Ya'qub, who took the title of al-Mustansir Billah. He was born on the first of Shawwal, 594 (6th August, A.D. 1198). There was not, among all the descendants of 'Abd al-Mu'min, a handsome man then he or a more eloquent pulpit orator; but he was so fond of his ease that he never stirred from his capital. Therefore, under his reign, the empire founded by 'Abd al-Mu'min began to decline. He died without issue in the month of Shawwal (Oct-Nov.), or of Dhu'l qa'dah 620, (Nov-Dec., A.D. 1223).

---

<sup>34</sup> The accounts of al-Nasir's death vary greatly. See the Histoire des Berbers, t. II, p. 226, note.

The principal officers of the state ther. agreed to nominate as their sovereign Abu Muhammad 'Abd al-Wahid, the son of Yusuf and the grandson of 'Abd al-Mu'min. They fixed their choice on him because he was advanced in age and highly intellegent; but as he soon showed his inability to govern and knew not how to humour the inclinations of the chiefs who held a high rank in the administration, he was deposed by them and strangled, after a reign of nine months. When he was proclaimed sovereign at Morocco, his authority was rejected at Murcia by Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah, the son of the emir Ya'qub, who, thinking himself better entitled than he to the supreme power invaded the Spanish provinces situated in the neighbourhood of his own, took possession of them without difficulty and assumed the (imperial) surname of al-'Adil. When 'Abd al-Wahid was strangled at Morocco, the army of this 'Abd Allah was attacked by the Franks and underwent a most disgraceful defeat. He himself took to flight and embarked with the intention of going to Morocco, after authorizing his brother Abu'l-'Ala (or 'Ula) Idris, the son of the emir Ya'qub, to act at Seville, as his lieutenant. On his way to Morocco, he was greatly harassed by the nomadic Arabs and, on his arrival there, he found everything turned against him and was imprisoned by the inhabitants of that city. A conference was then held by them respecting the choice of a person to whom they might confide the power, and they finished by electing Abu Zakariya Yahya, the son of Muhammad al-Nasir and the grandson of Ya'qub. This prince was incapable of governing, as might have been seen from his looks, and had not the least talent for business. A few days only elapsed from his accession to the throne when news arrived that Abu'l 'Ala Idris had caused himself to be proclaimed khalif at Seville and received the oath of allegiance from the inhabitants of the Spanish provinces (which belonged to the Almohades). Yahya's affairs then took so bad a turn that he was besieged in Morocco by the Arabs: his troops underwent so many defeats that the people of the city got tired of him, lost patience and expelled him from the capital. He took refuge in the mountain of Dirin (the Atlas) and then entered into a secret correspondence with some of the Moroccans for the purpose of obtaining his recall and the death of the chiefs who directed Ibn Abi'l 'Ala's party in that city. He subsequently arrived there and had them all killed, Abu'l 'Ala had now come from Spain, where the emir Muhammad, the son of Yusuf Ibn Hud al-Judami,<sup>35</sup> had revolted and proclaimed the supremacy of the 'Abbasids. The popular feeling in his favour, the cause of Abu'l-'Ala Idris was abandoned (in Spain). The latter, on arriving at Morocco, found there the emir Yahya Ibn al-Nasir and gave him battle. Yahya was defeated and fled to the mountain, whilst Abu'l-'Ala took possession of Morocco. He then assembled a body of troops and marched against Abu'l 'Ala, who was still in that city, but, being defeated in a number of encounters, he was forced to take refuge among some people who held a castle in the neighbourhood of Talimsan (Tlemcen). A servant-boy (ghulam) who was there, and who had to avenge the death of his father, lay in wait for Yahya, one day that he was riding out, and killed him.<sup>36</sup> Abu'l 'Ala, having then obtained the supreme authority, took the title of al-Ma'mun. He was brave, resolute, intrepid and audacious in his enterprises. He died a natural death, in one of his expeditions, but I have not been able to discover the date of that event. I have been since told by some people from that country that he died in the year 630 (A.D. 1232); God knows best<sup>37</sup>! His son Abu Muhammad 'Abd al-Wahid concealed his death till he had made all requisite arrangements and provided for his own safety. He then assumed the title of al-Rashid, subdued his elder brother and took the supreme command. Abu'l 'Ala had caused the name of the Mahdi Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn Tumart (vol. III, p. 205) to be suppressed in the khutbah, at Friday prayers, but this order was revoked by his son, who thus gained the hearts and the affection of the Almohads. Al-Rashid continued to reign over Ulterior Maghrib and a part of Spain till the year 641 (A.D. 1243-4). What happened to him since, I am unable to say, having no knowledge of it.

---

35 See the translation of Maqqari by Gayangos, vol. II, p. 326.

Since this article was written out, I met a native of Morocco, a man of talent and information, who had lately quit that city, and I learned from him that in the year 640 (A.D. 1242-3), al-Rashid was drowned in a pond of his garden, at Morocco, the seat of the empire. His death was kept secret for some time by the chamberlain, so that the month in which it occurred is not known. Al-Rashid was succeeded by his half-brother, Abu'l Hasan 'Ali Ibn Idris who took the title of al-Mu'tadi, but was generally known by the appellation of al-Sa'i. Some time after, he made an expedition in the direction of Tilimsin (Tlemcen) and, having laid siege to a castle (Temzezzekt), at the distance of one day's march from that city, he was killed there,

---

36 In the Histoire des Berbers vol. II, p. 241, Ibn Khaldun gives a different account of Yahya's death.

37 According to Ibn Khaldun, the death of Abu'l 'Ala took place in that year.

whilst riding about. This took place in the month of Safar, 646 (May-June, A.D. 1248). He was succeeded by al-Murtada Abu Hafs 'Umar, the son of Abu Ibrahim (Ishaq) and the grandson of Yusuf. This was in the month of the latter Rabi (July-August) of that year (A.D. 1248). On the 21st of Muharram, 665 (22nd Oct. 1266) al-Wathiq Abu'l 'Ala Idris, the son of Abu 'Abd Allah Yusuf Ibn 'Abd al-Mu'min<sup>38</sup>, and generally designated by the name of Abu [Ibn, in Cairo ed., vol. V, p. 17] Dabbus (the man with the club or mace) entered into Morocco, and al-Murtada fled from thence to Azemmor<sup>39</sup>, a place in the dependencies of that city. The governor of Azemmor had him arrested, and sent a dispatch with this intelligence to al-Wathiq, who gave orders that the prisoner should be put to death. Al-Murtada was executed on one of the last ten days of the latter Rabi', 665 (between the 11th and the 28th of January, A.D. 1267), at a place called Kutamah and situated at the distance of a three day's journey from Morocco. Al-Wathiq maintained his power during three years and lost his life in the war which had broken out between him and the Merinides who reigned at Tilimsan.<sup>40</sup> With him fell the dynasty which had been founded by 'Abd al-Mu'min. Al-Wathiq was killed at a place situated three days journey north of Morocco, and in the month of Muharram, 668 (September, A.D. 1267). The Merinides then took possession of the empire. Their sovereign, at the present time, is Abu Yusuf Ya'qub Ibn 'Abd al-Haqq Ibn Hammamah; but God knows best.

Let us now speak of 'Ali Ibn Ishaq, (Ibn Ghaniah) the Majorcan of whom frequent mention has been made in this article. His father, Abu Ibrahim Ishaq Ibn Hammu Ibn 'Ali the Sanhajian, surnamed Ibn Ghaniah, was sovereign of Majorca, Ivica, (Yabisah) and Minorca, three islands situated near each other and lying in the Western sea (the Mediterranean). He died in the year 580 (A.D. 1184-5) and left four sons<sup>41</sup> one of whom, named Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad, proceeded to Spain, after the death of his father, and joined the party of the Almohades.

---

38 Abu Dabbus al-Wathiq, was the son of Muhammad, the son of Abu Hafs 'Umar, the son of 'Abd al-Mu'min. --(Hist. des Berb., vol. II, p. 252).

39 The fortress of Azemmor is situated at the mouth of the Morbia, that is, the Omm-Pabia.

40 The Merinides were then reigning at Fez, not at Tilimsan, which belonged to the 'Abd al-Wadites.

41 According to Ibn Khaldun. Hist des Berbers, t. II, p. 88, Ishaq Ibn Ghawiah left eight sons.

They received him with the utmost cordiality and gave to him the city of Denia 'Ali and Yahya, two other of these brothers, left their country and invaded Ifriqiyah, where they committed such deeds of war and devastation as excited astonishment, and of which the recollection still subsists. 'Ali died, I know not in what year, but he was alive in the year 591 (A.D. 1195).<sup>42</sup> His brother Yahya pursued the same career and continued it for a long time. The hafiz Zaki al-Din 'Abd al-'Azim al-Mundhiri mentions him (Yahya) in the Kitab al-Wafayat and says: "He left Majorca in the month of Sh'aban, 510 (Nov.-Dec., A.D. 1184), conquered many countries and gained high renown by his courage and enterprising spirit. His death took place towards the end of the month of Shawwal, 633-(June-July, A.D. 1236), in a desert region (situated at some distance from the city) of Tilimsan. His attacks were directed against the dynasty of 'Abd al-Mu'min (the Almohades). The youngest brother, Abu Muhammad 'Abd Allah, remained in Majorca till the year 599 (A.D. 1202-3), when Muhammad al-Nasir, the son of Ya'qub, sent a fleet against him. The troops landed on the coast of Majorca, and 'Abd Allah, who was a noble-minded and brave warrior, advanced to give them battle. In the encounter, his horse fell under him, and he was beheaded by the invaders. His body was then suspended to the wall (of the city) and his head was sent to Morocco. Majorca was then conquered by the Almohades and remained in their possession till the year 627 (A.D. 1230), when it was taken by the Franks (the Catalanians). Horrible deeds were then perpetrated by them such as massacring the inhabitants and reducing them to slavery."—Adh fainsh<sup>43</sup> was the name borne by the principal king of the Franks. He is now master of Toledo.

YA'QUB IBN DAWUD, THE VIZIR

Abu 'Abd Alla Ya'qub Ibn Dawud Ibn 'Uthman Ibn 'Amr Ibn Tahman was an adopted member of the tribe of Sulaym, being a mawla to Abu Salih 'Abd Allah Ibn Hazim al-Sulaymi, the governor

42 He lost his life in a skirmish, A.H. 584 (A.D. 1138-9).—(Hist. des Berbers)

43 Adh funth or Athfonsh is the Arabic transcription of Adefonz, which is the old manner of writing Alphonso. See Hist. des Berbers, t. II, p. 78.

of Khurasan.<sup>1</sup> Ya'qub was secretary to Ibrahim Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Hasan Ibn al-Hasan Ibn 'Ali Ibn 'Abi Talib, the same who, stirred up a revolt, in the city and province of Basrah, against Abu Ja'far al-Mansur, and was put to death with his brother Muhammad, who had aided him in that attempt.<sup>2</sup> This is not a fit place to speak of their enterprise which, being related in historical works, is well known. Dawud Ibn Tahman, the father of Ya'qub, and his (Dawud's) brothers were clerks employed in the office of Nasr Ibn Sayyar, who was then governor of Khurasan for the 'Umayyads. After the death of Dawud, his sons 'Ali and Ya'qub became eminent by their literary acquirements, their talents and their information in all the various branches of knowledge. When al-Mansur defeated the above mentioned Ibrahim Ibn 'Abd Allah, he got Ya'qub into his power and imprisoned him in the Matbaw.<sup>3</sup> This was in the year 144 (A.D. 761-2), or, by another account, in the year 146. The latter is probably the right date, because Ibrahim was put to death in 145, as we have said elsewhere. We may suppose, however, that Ya'qub was made prisoner anteriorly to the death of Ibrahim, when the latter commenced his revolt; but God knows best! Ya'qub was of a kind disposition, liberal, generous charitable and always ready to oblige. Di'bil Ibn 'Ali al-Khuza'i (vol. I, p. 507), the celebrated poet, mentions him in the book which contains the names of the poets. He was often visited by poets, some of them highly eminent, who came to eulogize him in their verse; such were Abu'l Shays al-Khuza'i,<sup>4</sup> Salm al-Khasir (vol. I, p. 22), Abu Khunays and others. When al-Mahdi succeeded to the khalifate, on the death of his father al-Mansur, Ya'qub (whom he had released from confinement) endeavoured to ingratiate himself with

1 Abu Salih 'Abd Allah Ibn Hazim, a member of the tribe of Sulaym, governed Khurasan during ten years. He adhered to the party of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Zubayr and was killed, A. H. 71 (A.D. 690-1), by his own lieutenant Waki وكيع in a revolt which the latter got up against him at the instigation of the Umayyad khalif 'Abd al Malik Ibn Marwan.-(Tabari's Annals: Price's Retrospect).

2 See De Sacy's Chrestomathie Arabe, vol. I, page 3; Abu'l-Fida's [Abu'l-Fida] Annals, tom II; page 15, and Price's vol. II, page 15. The revolt of Al-Nafa al-Zakiya and his brother Ibrahim took place A.H. 145 (A.D. 762-3).

3 The word matbaq signifies anything with a lid. It was the name given to the state-prison wherein political offenders were confined for life. (Al-Fakhri, page 220 of the Arabic text). It was a pit or under-ground chamber, communicating with the exterior by a deep and narrow passage like a well.

4 Abu 'l-Shays (Shik ?) or Abu Ja'far, Muhammad Ibn 'Abd Allah al-Khuza'i was the cousin of the poet Di'bil Ibn 'Ali al-Khuza'i. He died A.H. 196 (A.D. 811-2). See vol. I, page 510 of this translation, and Freytag's Hamasah page 602 of the Arabic text.

the new sovereign and having succeeded in gaining his favour, he attained so high a place in his confidence that he became a personage of great importance. An edict [Kitab] was even addressed to all the boards of administration, declaring that the Commander of the faithful had adopted as a brother Ya'qub Ibn Dawad. This induced Salm al-Khasir to pronounce the following lines:

Say to the imam who obtained the khalifate by a title not to be contested: "Excellent is the associate whom you have chosen to assist you in your devotions! your brother in God, Ya'qub Ibn Dawud."

In the year 160 (A.D. 776-7) al-Mahdi made the pilgrimage [hajj] and took Ya'qub with him. In 161, he permitted him to establish commissaries in all the provinces of the empire, so that none of the governors should address dispatches to court without his (Ya'qub's) authorisation. Al-Mahdi had then for vizir Abu 'Ubayd Allah Mu'awiyah Ibn 'Abd Allah Ibn Yasar al-'Ashari al-Tabarani, the same after whom the square (murabb'ah) of Abu 'Ubayd Allah, in Baghdad, was so named. His grandfather Yasar was a mawla to 'Abd Allah Ibn 'Idadah<sup>5</sup> al-Ash'air. Al-Rabi' Ibn Yunus, the same of whom we have already spoken (vol. I, p. 521) endeavoured to indispose al-Mahdi against him (Abu-'Ubayd Allah) and was the cause of that vizir's son being put to death, having furnished to the khalif proofs that the young man was a zindiq (an infidel), sometime after, he represented to al-Mahdi the danger of keeping about him such a man as Abu 'Ubayd Allah: "Be on al-Mahdi the danger of keeping about him such a man as Abu 'Ubayd Allah: "Be on your guard against him," said he, "now that you have killed his son." He also spoke to him of Ya'qub Ibn Dawud's great talents and succeeded in having him appointed vizir. Abu 'Ubayd Allah was thus deprived of his place, and the only charge left to him was the direction of the board of correspondence [diwan al-rasa'il]. This occurred in the year 163 (A.D. 779-710). Four years after, al-Mahdi removed Abu 'Ubayd Allah from that office and gave it to al-Rabi' Ibn Yunus. Abu 'Ubayd Allah continued to visit al-Mahdi as usual, in order to testify his sentiments as an humble and devoted servant. This induced a native of Kufah called 'Ali Ibn al-Khalil to compose a poem in which was the following passage [abyat]:

---

5 According to Ibn Durayd, in his Ishtiqaq, 'Idah, -ud- was a noble Arab chief who settled in Syria after the conquest (min ashraf ahli's-Sham). The vizir Abu 'Ubayd Allah Mu'awiyah Ibn Yasar died A.H. 170 (A.D. 786-7). Same account of him is given in Ibn al-Tiqtaqa's Fakhri, page p.o.

Say to the vizir Abu 'Ubay Allah: "What resource have you left? Ya'qub now disports himself in the direction of affairs and you turn away your eyes: You brought him into office and he has prevailed over you; such misfortunes attend the great. By your remissness in taking proper measures you have deliberately brought about your own ruin."

Ya'qub then gained such influence over al-Mahdi that he took from him the direction of affairs. Al-Mansur, in dying, had left in the treasure-chambers nine hundred millions and sixty thousand dirhems (£ 22,501,500), and Abu 'Ubayd Allah always advised al-Mahdi to be moderate in his expenses and spare the public money. When Abu 'Ubayd Allah was deposed, his successor Ya'qub flattered the inclinations of the khalif and encouraged him to spend money, enjoy all sorts of pleasures, drink wine and listen to music. By this means, he succeeded in obtaining the entire administration of the state. Bashshar Ibn Burd, the poet of whom we have already spoken (vol. I, p. 254), was induced by this to composed the following lines:

Awake, sons of Umayyah! your sleep has ended too long.
It is Ya'qub Ibn Dawud who is now khalif. Family (of al-'Abbas)!
your khalifate is ruined; if you seek for the vicar (khalif) of God, you will find him with a wine-flask on one side and a lute on the other.

Abu Harithah al-Nahdi<sup>6</sup>, the guardian of the treasure-chambers, seeing that they had got empty, waited on al-Mahdi with the keys and said: "Since you have spent all your treasures, what is the use of my keeping these keys? give orders that they be taken from me." Al-Mahdi replied: "Keep them still, for money will be coming unto you." He then dispatched messengers to all quarters in orders to press the payment (of the reve use), and, in a very short time, these sums arrived. A slight diminution was then made in the expenses, and the sums paid and in were so abundant that Abu Harithah had enough to do in receiving them and verifying the amount. During three days, he did not appear before al-Mahdi, who at length said: "What is he about, that, silly Bedwin 'Arab?" Being informed of the cause which kept him away, he sent for him and said: "What prevented your

---

<sup>6</sup> This surname is variously written in the manuscripts; one of them gives Hindi, another Mahdi, etc. As the individual who bore it belonged to an Arabian tribe, the only plausible reading is that of Nahdi, (a member of the tribe of Nahd Ibn Kudd'ah). Farther on, it will be seen that al-Mahdi called him a Bedwin Arab.

coming to see us?" "The arrival of cash," replied the other. "How foolish it was in you", said al-Mahdi, "to suppose that money would not come in to us." "Commander of the faithful!" replied al-Mahdi, "if some unforeseen event happened which could not be surmounted without the aid of money, we would not have the time to wait till you sent to have cash brought in."

It is related that al-Mahdi made the pilgrimage one year and passed by a milestone on which he saw something written. He stopped to see what it was, and read the following line:

O Mahdi! you would be truly excellent had you not taken for a favourite Ya'qub, the son of Dawud.

He then said to a person who was with him. "Write underneath that" (It shall still be so) in spite of the fellow's nose who wrote that, bad luck attend him!" On his return from the pilgrimage, he stopped at the same milestone, because the verse had probably left an impression on his mind; and such, in fact, appears to have been the case, for very soon after he let his vengeance fall on Ya'qub. Rumours unfavourable to this minister had greatly multiplied; his enemies had discovered a point by which he might be attacked and they reminded the khalif of his having seconded Ibrahim Ibn 'Abd Allah the 'Alide in the revolt against al-Mansur. One of his servants informed al-Mahdi that he had heard his master say: "That man (the khalif) has built a pleasure-house and spent on it fifty millions of dirhems ( £ 1,250) out of the public money." The fact was that al-Mahdi had just founded the town of 'Isabad.<sup>7</sup> Another time, al-Mahdi was about to execute some project when Ya'qub said to him: "Commander of the faithful, that is mere profusion [saraf]. To this al-Mahdi answered: "Evil betide you! does not profusion befit persons of a noble race? At last Ya'qub got so tired of the post which he filled that he requested of al-Mahdi the permission of giving it up, but that favour he could not obtain.

Al-Mahdi then wished to try if he was still inclined towards the party of the 'Alides and sent for him, after taking his seat in a saloon of which all the furniture was red; he himself had on red clothes and, behind him, stood a young female slave dressed in red; before him was a garden filled with roses of all sorts. "Tell me, Ya'qub!" said he. "What you think of this saloon of ours." The other replied: "It is the very perfection of beauty; may God permit the Commander of the faithful to enjoy it long!" "Well," said al-Mahdi, "all that it contains is yours, with this girl to crown your happiness and, moreover, a sum of one hundred thousand dirhems( £ 2,500)." Ya'qub invoked God's blessing on the khalif, who then said to him: "I have something to ask of you." On this, Ya'qub stood up from his seat and exclaimed. "Commander of the faithful, such words can only proceed from anger; may God protect me from your wrath! "Al-Mahdi replied: "I wish you to take the engagement of doing what I shall ask." Ya'qub replied: "I hear and shall obey." "Swear by Allah," said the khalif. He swore. "Swear again by Allah." He swore "swear again." He swore for the third time, and the khalif then said to him: "Lay your hand on my head and swear again." Ya'qub did so. Al-Mahdi, having thus obtained from him the firmest promise that could be made, spoke to him in these terms: "There is an 'Alide named."--such a one, the son of such a one--"and I wish you to deliver me from the uneasiness which he gives me and thus set my mind at rest. Here he is; I give him up to you." He then delivered the 'Alide over to him and bestowed on him the girl with all the furniture which was in the saloon and the money (which he had offered). Ya'qub was so delighted to have got the girl that he lodged her in a room close to his own, so that he might the more easily go and see her. The 'Alide, whom he had then brought in and whom he found to be a man of intelligence and information, said to him: "Ya'qub! beware lest you have my blood to answer for before God; I am descended from Fatimah the daughter of Muhammad, on whom God's blessings and favours always repose!" To this, Ya'qub replied: "Tell me, sir, if there be good in you," The 'Alide answered: "I shall be grateful and pray for you happiness." "Receive this money," said Ya'qub, "and take whatever road you like." "Such a road," said the 'Alide, naming it, "is the safest." "Depart with my good wishes," said Ya'qub. The girl heard all this conversation and told a servant of hers to go and relate it to him (al-Mahdi) and to say it her name: "Such is the conduct of one whom, in giving me to him, you preferred to yourself. Such is the return which he makes you for your kindness!" Al-Mahdi had immediately the road occupied by guards, so that the 'Alide was taken prisoner. He then sent for Ya'qub and said to him, as soon as he saw him: "What become of that man?" Ya'qub replied: "I have delivered you from the uneasiness he gave you" "Is he dead?" "He is." "Swear by Allah." "I swear by Allah!" "Lay your hand on my head." Ya'qub did so and swore by his head. Al-Mahdi then said to an attendant: "Boy, bring out to us those who are in that room." The boy opened the door and there the 'Alide was seen with the very money (which Ya'qub had received from the khalif). Ya'qub was so much astounded that he was unable to utter a word and knew not what to say. "Your life," said al-Mahdi, "is justly forfeited, and it depends on me to shed your blood, but I will not. Shut this man (Ya'qub) up in the Matbaq." He had him confined in that dungeon and gave orders that no one should ever speak to him or to any other about the prisoner. Ya'qub remained there during the rest of al-Mahdi's reign, which was two years and some months, and during the reign of Musa al-Hadi, and during five years and seven months of the reign of Harun al-Rashid. Yahya the Barmakide having then learned where he was, interceded in his favour and obtained his deliverance. When Ya'qub was taken out of prison, he had lost his sight. Al-Rashid treated him with great kindness, restored to him all his property and allowed him the choice of a place of residence. Ya'qub chose Makkah, and, having received permission to go there, he remained in that city till his death. This event took place in the year 187 (A.D. 803). When he recovered his liberty, he asked for a number of his dearest friends and, being informed that they were all dead, he pronounced these lines:

---

<sup>7</sup> 'Isabad (the dwelling of sa), was so named after-'Isa, the son of al-Mahdi. It lay to the east of Baghdad—(Marasid.)

All men have a cemetery near their residence, and as their number diminishes, that of the tombs augments. But, though their dwelling be near at hand, the time of meeting them again (the day of the resurrection) is far distant.

These two verses are to be found in the Hamasah, section of elegies. I must observe that the date of his death, as given above, is the same which is mentioned by Abu 'Abd Allah Muhammad Ibn 'Abdus al-Kufi, generally known by the surname of al-Jihshiri (vol. II, p. 137), in his Tarikh al-Wuzara' (history of vizirs), but another author states that Ya'qub Ibn Dawud died in the year 182 (A.D. 798-9); God knows best!

'Abd Allah, the son of Ya'qub Ibn Dawud, related that, when his father was imprisoned in a well by al-Mahdi a cupola was built over it by that khalif's order. He mentioned also that his father related to him as follows: "Every day, during the fifteen years of my remaining there, a small loaf of bread and a pitcher of water were let down to me by a cord and the hours of prayer were announced so that I might hear the call. Towards the end of the thirteenth year, I saw in a dream a figure which came to me and said:

The lord took pity on Joseph and drew him forth from the bottom of a well, and of a chamber where darkness was around him.

I gave thanks to God and said: Deliverance is coming! I then remained another year without seeing anything, till the same figure visited me again and addressed me thus:

God may perhaps, bring deliverance; every day, he does something for His creatures.

I remained another year without seeing anything, but at the expiration of that time, the same figure came to me and said:

The affliction in which you were yesterday may perhaps be followed by a prompt deliverance from care. He that is in fear may cease to dread, the captive may be delivered and the stranger in a distant land may be taken back to his family.

When morning came, I heard a voice calling on me, but thought it was the call to prayers. A black (camel-hair?) rope was lowered down and I was told to tie it about my waist. I did so and was drawn up. When I faced the daylight, my sight was extinguished. They led me to al-Rashid and bade me salute the khalif. I said: 'Salutation to the Commander of the faithful, the well directed (al-Mahdi), on whom be the mercy of God and His benediction!' The prince answered: 'I am not he. I then said: 'Salutation to the Commander of the faithful, the director (al-Hadi), on whom be the mercy of God and his benediction!' He replied again: 'I am not he.' On this, I said: 'Salutation to the Commander of the faithful, the rightly guided (al-Rashid), on whom be the mercy of God and His benediction!' To this al-Rashid replied: 'Ya'qub Ibn Dawud! no one interceded with me in your favour, but, this night, as I was carrying one of my children on my shoulder, I remembered that you, formerly, used to carry me about in the same manner; so, I had compassion on you, thinking of the high position which you once held, and I ordered you to be taken out of confinement.'

When al-Rashid was a little boy, Ya'qub used to carry him about and play with.

After Ya'qub's imprisonment, Abu Ja'far al-Fayd Ibn Abi Salih was appointed to the vizirate by al-Mahdi. He had been one of 'Abd Allah Ibn al-Muqaffa's (vol. I, p. 431) servants and was noted for his excessive pride. His father was a Christian. It was of al-Fayd that a poet said:

O you who unjustly debar me from what I claim, may God oblige you to have recourse to al-Fayd's beneficence; to that man who, when he grants a favour, (shuffles about) as if walking upon eggs!

The name Tahman is to be pronounced with an a after the h is not followed by a vowel.—Abu 'Ubayd Allah Mu'awiyah al-Ash'ari was born in the year 100 (A.D. 718-9) and died in the year 170 (A.D.

786-7), or 169. It is said that he and (the khalif) Musa al-Hadi died on the same day. He breathed his last at Baghdad and was interred in the Quraysh cemetery. The vizir al-Fayd died in the year 173 (A.D. 789-790), and was replaced by al-Rabi' Ibn Yunus (vol. I, p. 521). We have spoken of Ya'qub Ibn Dawud in the life al-Bashshar Ibn Burd (vol. I, p. 256) and stated that he contributed to the death of that poet. An elegy was composed on his (Ya'qub's) death by Abu Hanash of the tribe of Hilal, or of that of Numayr, according to another account. He was a native of Basrah and his true name was Khudayr Ibn Qays. He lived to the age of one hundred years. Some verses of his elegy are given in the Hamasah (p.969). The first of them is this:

Ya'qub! let us not lose you! O that you may escape from death; otherwise, we shall have to weep for the days in which you ruled and which were so flourishing and so prosperous.

---

* Hudayri Ibn Qays al-Basri, in Cairo ed. vol. VI, p. 25.

